49. On 31 August 1992, CEDC and the Founders of CET 21 agreed on a draft document named "Terms of Agreement". This document provided that CEDC would invest a sum of at least USD 10,000,000 in the establishment of a commercial television station in Prague "through an equity investment in CET21" in the form of redeemable "preferred stock or equivalent equal to 49% ownership of CET 21" and of "an equal amount of common stock". The Founders would be entitled to 2% of CET 21 each, i.e. 14% in total. The remaining 37% of CET 21 would be held by the Founders in reserve for additional investors (Exhibit C139).
50. On 28 September 1992, CET 21 prepared a document named "Project of an Independent Television Station". This document stated that CEDC "is a direct participant in CET21's application for the license" (Exhibit C9).
51. On 21 December 1992, the Media Council held preliminary hearings for the granting of the License. Messrs. Mark Palmer, President of CEDC, and Len Fertig, then consultant with CEDC, were present at the portion of the hearings on CET 21's application. The record of this portion of the hearings, drafted by the Media Council, speaks of "extensive share reserved for foreign capital" and "direct capital share, not credit". It also states that "they [CEDC] see themselves as a predominantly passive investor, we want a station independent of foreign influence and political influence" (Exhibit R58).
52. On 5 January 1993, CEDC and the Founders of CET 21 signed a document named "Terms of Agreement". This document provided for the same participation of CEDC in CET 21 as the above mentioned draft agreement dated 31 August 1992, i.e. 49% of redeemable preferred stock and of common stock (Exhibit C61).
53. The same day, the Media Council held a hearing which was attended by Messrs. Palmer, Fertig and Železný. The participants addressed the issues of other possible partners besides CEDC in the CET 21 investments, mainly Česká spořitelna, a.s., the Czech Savings Bank (hereinafter: "CSB"), the scope of CEDC's investments in the project, and the programming (Exhibit C141).

54. On 22 January 1993, the Media Council held further preliminary hearings. The record of the portion of the hearings on CET 21 expressly referred to CEDC. It stated that “the participation of foreign capital is expected” and “the combination of domestic and foreign capital is important, necessity of safeguard - diversification of the investments sources” (Exhibit C64).
55. On 30 January 1993, the Media Council held a session on the issuance of the License. It was decided that CET 21 was awarded the License. The following statements were made by some members of the Media Council at this session: “(…) it is very significant that this is a business which can not be financed only by credit” (Mr. Brož); “considers the Czech and foreign capital in CET 21 positive” (Mr. Brož); “positive in that there is a stabilisation factor, as far as foreign capital and its involvement is concerned” (Mr. Pýcha) (Exhibit R54).
56. The same day, the Media Council issued a press release announcing that CET 21 had been awarded the License. The press release stated that “A direct participant in the application is the international corporation CEDC (…)” (Exhibit C11).
57. The same day, the Media Council sent a letter to CET 21 informing them of its decision on the award of the License. This document also referred to “(…) a direct party to the application being the international corporation CEDC (…)” (Exhibit R9).
58. The Media Council’s decision to award the License to CET 21 raised strong opposition, mainly from the political party ODS. The ODS blamed the Media Council for having hastily chosen a company, CET 21, whose representatives were bankrupt politicians and in which foreign capital prevailed (Exhibits R83, C144, and C145).
59. On 3 February 1993, CET 21 and CEDC submitted to the Media Council a document named “Overall Structure of a New Czech Commercial Television Entity”. This document stated that CET 21 and CEDC would jointly create a new Czech company, which would have the exclusive use of the License “(…) as long as CET 21 and CEDC have such a license”. The shareholders of the new company would be CET 21, CEDC and CSB, the last two of them providing the necessary funds (Exhibits C14 and C149).

60. At the oral request of Mr. Jakobec, director of the Programming and Monitoring Section of the Media Council, the above mentioned document of 3 February 1993, was significantly modified, mainly to reflect the fact that the License would be granted to CET 21 only, and not to CET 21 and CEDC jointly. The modified document was issued on 5 February 1993 (Exhibit C150; declaration of Mrs. Landová of 5 December 2000, p. 8).
61. The same day, the Media Council held a meeting to which representatives of CET 21 were invited. The latter submitted to the Media Council the modified version of the above mentioned document named "Overall Structure of a New Czech Commercial Television Entity" (Exhibit R55).
62. On 9 February 1993, CET 21 issued a document stating that its general assembly, which had met the previous day, approved the conditions of the Media Council for the legal confirmation of the License (Exhibit R78).
63. The same day, the Media Council rendered the decision to award the License to CET 21. This decision referred to CEDC as CET 21's "contractual partner" (Exhibits R10 and C16).
64. The same day, the Media Council issued the License for a period of 12 years, expiring on 30 January 2005. The Appendix to the License set forth 31 conditions (hereinafter: "the Conditions") that CET 21 had to observe. Condition 17 required among other matters that CET 21, CEDC and CSB submit a business agreement to the Media Council for approval within 90 days (Exhibit R5).
65. The same day, CET 21 accepted without reservation the License, including the Conditions (Exhibits R11 and R77).
66. The same day, CSB confirmed its intention to participate in the broadcasting company to be set up together with CET 21 and CEDC (Exhibit R81).
67. On 8 April 1993, Mr. Železný acquired a 16.66% participation in CET 21.

68. On 21 April 1993, after having held several sessions to discuss the draft business agreements between CET 21, CEDC and CSB, and after having had several contacts in this matter with the representatives of these companies, the Media Council issued a letter approving the last version of the business agreement (Exhibit C19).
69. On 4 May 1993, CET 21, CEDC and CSB signed the final version of the business agreement, named “Memorandum of Association and Investment Agreement” (hereinafter: “the MOA”). The MOA provided for the formation of the CNTS, a Czech company which would manage the television station. CEDC would contribute 75% of CNTS’s capital and obtain a 66% ownership interest (Article 1.4.3), CSB would contribute 25% of the capital and obtain a 22% ownership interest (Article 1.4.2). and CET 21 would contribute “the right to use, benefit from, and maintain the License (...) on an unconditional, irrevocable and exclusive basis” and obtain a 12% ownership interest (Article 1.4.1) (Exhibit R12).
70. On 12 May 1993, the Media Council rendered a decision amending and clarifying the License issued on 9 February 1993. The main amendment regarded Condition 17, which stated that the MOA was “an integral part of the license terms” (Exhibit C20).
71. On 8 July 1993, CNTS was incorporated in the Commercial Register administered by the District Court for Prague (Exhibit C89).
72. Mr. Železný was appointed General Director of the company.
73. CNTS then launched a television station named TV Nova, which soon became very successful.

3.2 The 1994-1997 events

74. On 12 May 1994, the Czech Parliament’s Committee for Science, Education, Culture, Youth, and Physical Training PSP issued a statement that the Media Council had allowed television broadcasting by an unauthorized entity, i.e. CNTS.

75. In an undated opinion, the Media Council answered that CET 21 was the holder of the License, and CNTS was authorized by the former to perform all acts related to the development and operation of TV Nova. However, the License “as such has not been contributed to CNTS and is separate from all other activities of CNTS”. The Media Council added that, after having consulted “with a number of leading legal experts, both Czech and foreign”, this “standard business procedure” was discussed and approved, and did not violate any effective legal regulations (Exhibit C21).
76. On 4 July 1994, CNTS and CSB acquired 1.25% each of CET 21’s stock (Exhibit R107). As a result, the participation in CET 21 was as follows:
- Mr. Železný: 16,66%
  - The remaining Founders: 80.84%
  - CEDC: 1.25%
  - CSB: 1.25%.
77. On 28 July 1994, CEDC assigned all its capital interest in CNTS to CME Media Entreprises B.V. (hereinafter: “CME”), a Dutch company over which the Claimant also exercised control (Exhibit C128).
78. In the summer of 1994, the Czech Parliament replaced some members of the Media Council.
79. On 8 December 1995, the Czech Parliament amended the Media Law, effective 1 January 1996. Among the most relevant modification was the deletion of Article 12(3) of the original Media Law, which stated that “In addition to conditions stated in paragraph 2, the decision to grant a license also includes conditions which the license-granting body will set for the broadcasting operator”. The Media Law in Article 3 also contained a much narrower definition of the term “broadcaster” as the person to whom a license had been granted (see also the memorandum of Mrs. DeBruce of CME of 15 May 1996; Exhibit C111) (Exhibit R3).

80. On 2 January 1996, CET 21 applied to the Media Council for the cancellation of most of the Conditions set in the License (Exhibit R31).
81. On 18 January 1996, the Media Council asked the District Court for Prague 1, acting as authority for the Commercial Register, to re-examine CET 21's and CNTS's registrations and to submit a report thereon, being noted that such request had already been made on 2 February 1995, and was later repeated on 11 April 1996 (Exhibits R30, R32 and R33).
82. On 12 February 1996, the Media Council requested Mr. Bárta, at the State and Law Institute of the Academy of Science of the Czech Republic, to provide an expert opinion on CNTS's authority to operate television broadcasting (Exhibit C27).
83. On 19 February 1996, Mr. Bárta issued the requested expert opinion on the letterhead of the State and Law Institute of the Academy of Science of the Czech Republic. Based on the assumption that television broadcasting of TV Nova was operated by CNTS, the author came to the conclusion that administrative proceedings could be initiated to impose a fine for unauthorized broadcasting against CNTS. In addition, the Media Council could decide to cancel the License of CET 21 (Exhibit R14).
84. On 13 March 1996, a meeting was held between the Media Council and CET 21. Several issues were discussed, among them the relationship between CET 21 and CNTS regarding the operation of television broadcasting. The Media Council was concerned with the fact that CNTS was operating television broadcasting without being the holder - or the co-holder - of the License. Mr. Železný, acting on behalf of CET 21, argued that the current situation had been approved by the Media Council. At the Media Council's request, it was eventually agreed that a contract on the provision of performances and services between CET 21 and CNTS would be drafted and further discussed. It was also agreed that CET 21 would not require, in its application for cancellation of license conditions dated 2 January 1996, the cancellation of Condition 17. The application for cancellation of this specific condition would be the subject of further administrative proceedings (Exhibit C84).
85. On 21 March 1996, CET 21 applied for cancellation of Condition 17 (Exhibit R62).

86. At some time in April 1996 and as requested at the meeting of 13 March CET 21 and CNTS submitted to the Media Council two draft agreements setting forth their legal relationships (Exhibit R15).
87. On 2 May 1996, the State and Law Institute of the Academy of Science of the Czech Republic provided the Media Council with a legal opinion on the two above mentioned draft agreements between CET 21 and CNTS. It concluded that the situation of CET 21 was correctly resolved, the key point being that CET 21, and not CNTS, actually operated broadcasting on its own account (Exhibit R16).
88. On 15 May 1996, CME expressed its concern to Messrs. Železný and Fertig with respect to the contemplated changes to the MOA resulting from the above mentioned draft agreements. CME specifically referred to CET 21's envisaged power to withdraw CNTS's use of the License if CNTS allegedly breached the agreement (Exhibit C111).
89. On 23 May 1996, after two additional meetings between the Media Council and CET 21 (Exhibits R105 and C85), CNTS and CET 21 entered into a new agreement (hereinafter: "the May 1996 Agreement") setting forth their legal relationships. The Agreement stated in preamble that the MOA was not changed. In substance, it set forth that CET 21 was the holder of the License and the operator of television broadcasting, that the License was non-transferable, and was not the subject of a contribution from CET 21 to CNTS. CNTS's role was to arrange the television broadcasting (Exhibit R17).
90. On 4 June 1996, the Media Council informed CET 21 that the latter had breached the License by failing to timely announce changes in the registered capital, in the signing process, and in the company's registered office. It directed CET 21 and CNTS to change their registrations with the Commercial Registry, in particular to modify CNTS's business activity with respect to "television broadcasting" (Exhibit R95).
91. In June 1996, the Supreme State Attorney Office requested the Media Council to enable it to consult the files relating to the issue of the License to CET 21 and to CNTS's rights as the administrator of TV Nova. On this occasion, the Media Council was informed that criminal investigations were pending with respect to CET 21's and CNTS's rights to administer TV Nova (Exhibit R89).

92. On 28 and 29 June 1996, the Media Council held a meeting during which it decided to cancel most of the Conditions to the License. The cancellation of Condition 17 was postponed in light of the court proceedings with respect to the registration in the Commercial Registry and the criminal investigation (Exhibit R56).
93. On 17 July 1996, CME purchased the 22% interest in CNTS held by CSB for a consideration in excess of USD 36,000,000 (declaration of Mrs. DeBruce of 30 June 2000, p. 5; declaration of Mr. Radvan of 30 June 2000, p. 5). As a result, CME held 88% of CNTS's stock, and CET 21 maintained its participation of 12% in CNTS.
94. On 22 July 1996, as its previous requests of 2 February 1995, 18 January and 11 April 1996, had been ignored, the Media Council asked the Regional Commercial Court in Prague to start proceedings on compliance of CET 21's and CNTS's registrations in the Commercial Register (Exhibit R36).
95. On 26 July 1996, the Media Council issued a decision regarding the cancellation of most of the Conditions to the License, as per its above mentioned meeting of 28 and 29 June (Exhibit R35).
96. The same day, the Media Council issued a decision to interrupt the administrative proceedings with respect to the envisaged cancellation of Condition 17 to the License because of the pending criminal investigation (Exhibit R34).
97. On 23 July 1996, the Media Council decided to commence administrative proceedings against CNTS for operating television broadcasting without authorization. CNTS was informed of said decision the same day (Exhibits R37 and R18).
98. On 1 August 1996, CME and Mr. Železný entered into a loan agreement pursuant to which the former would provide the latter with a loan of USD 4'700'000 for acquiring from the other individual shareholders 47% of CET 21's stock. The agreement provided for Mr. Železný to exercise all his voting rights as directed by CME until full repayment of the loan (Exhibit R38). As a result, the participation in CET 21 was as follows:

- Mr. Železný: 60%
- The four remaining Founders: 37.5%
- CME: 1.25%
- CSB: 1.25%.

99. The Media Council was not informed of the change in CET 21's ownership.
100. On 13 August 1996, the Institute of the State and Law of the Academy of Sciences of the Czech Republic issued a legal opinion to CNTS pursuant to which the Media Council was obliged to meet CET 21's application to cancel the Conditions to the Licence (Exhibit C28).
101. On 21 August 1996, CET 21 requested the Media Council to cancel Condition 17 to the Licence (Exhibit R63).
102. On 4 October 1996, CET 21 and CNTS made proposals to the Media Council aimed at resolving the differences with respect to the legal relationships between the two companies. CET 21 and CNTS would enter into a new agreement providing that CET 21 is the operator of television broadcasting and is entirely responsible before the Media Council. Both companies would request that their registrations with the Commercial Register be modified. The Media Council, in turn, would continue the administrative proceedings on the cancellation of Condition 17 to the License, and would confirm that the arrangements between the two companies are in compliance with legal regulations. However, there was no mention of the administrative proceedings initiated by the Media Council against CNTS for unauthorized conducting of television broadcasting (Exhibit R19).
103. The same day, CNTS provided the Media Council with its position with respect to the initiation of the administrative proceedings against it. It denied the allegation of unauthorized television broadcasting (Exhibit C26).

104. The same day, CET 21 and CNTS signed an agreement (hereinafter: “the October 1996 Agreement”) specifying their legal relationships as set forth in the amended MOA. The October 1996 Agreement was similar to the May 1996 Agreement. The main difference was in the October 1996 Agreement’s statement that such agreement did not affect CET 21’s exclusive liability for the programming (Exhibit R21).
105. On 6 November 1996, the Media Council’s legal department issued an internal memorandum on the legal aspects of the October 1996 Agreement. It stated that said agreement “undoubtedly reacts to the commencement of administrative proceedings against CNTS for illegal broadcasting with the aim of making it seem that CNTS has not been committing such illegal acts”. The memorandum nevertheless expressed some doubts if the October 1996 Agreement fully achieved this purpose (Exhibit R96).
106. On 14 November 1996, CME issued a memorandum expressing its concern about the contemplated amendment of Article 1.4.1 of the MOA. CME’s main fear was that the draft amendment would allow CET 21 to chose another party to benefit from the License (Exhibit C112).
107. The same day, a meeting was held between CNTS’s shareholders, i.e. CME, CSB and CET 21. Article 1.4.1(a) of the MOA was amended and replaced as follows: “the Company is granted the unconditional, irrevocable, and exclusive right to use and maintain the know-how and make it the subject of profit to the Company, in connection with the License, its maintenance, and protection”. In addition CNTS was granted the right to acquire the License from CET 21 “[i]n the case of change in the legal regulation and in the prevailing interpretation of the legal community” (Exhibit C59).
108. On 20 November 1996, the Media Council expressed to the Police of the Czech Republic its opinion that none of the Media Council’s members could be criminally liable with respect to CNTS’s alleged illegal television broadcasting (Exhibit R66).
109. On 13 December 1996, the October 1996 Agreement was slightly amended (Exhibit R21).

110. On 17 December 1996, the Media Council decided to cancel Condition 17 to the Licence (Exhibits R57 and C30).
111. In December 1996, CME acquired from CET 21 a 5,2% participation in CNTS for a consideration of about USD 5,300,000. During the same period, the Founders of CET 21 transferred an additional 5,8% interest to Nova Consulting a.s. (hereinafter: “Nova Consulting”), a Czech company owned by Mr. Železný (declaration of Mrs. DeBruce of 30 June 2000, p. 5; declaration of Mr. Radvan of 30 June 2000, p. 5). As a result, the participation in CNTS was as follows:
- CME: 93,2%
  - Nova Consulting: 5,8%
  - The Founders: 1%.
112. On 29 January 1997, the Media Council, which had become aware of the loan agreement between CME and Mr. Železný, held a meeting with CET 21 for the purpose of obtaining information thereon from Mr. Železný (Exhibit R123).
113. On 5 February 1997, the October 1996 Agreement was amended to replace all previous agreements between CET 21 and CNTS with respect to their legal relationships (see Exhibit R21).
114. On 12 February 1997, CNTS’s registration in the Commercial Registry was modified as to delete, under the company’s business, the sentence “operating television broadcasting under license no. 001/93” (Exhibit R25).
115. On 21 April 1997, Mr. Radvan, counsel for CME, issued an affidavit stating that the loan agreement between CME and Mr. Železný had been terminated pursuant to an agreement entered into by the parties on 24 February 1997 (Exhibit C91).
116. On 15 May 1997, the criminal investigation against CNTS for alleged illegal operation of television broadcasting was suspended (Exhibit R25).
117. On 21 May 1997, CNTS and CET 21 entered into an agreement named “Contract on cooperation in ensuring service for television broadcasting,” together with a supplement to this agreement (hereinafter: “the 1997 Agreement”), replacing all previous agreements between the parties. The 1997 Agreement confirmed that CET 21 was the holder of the License and the operator of television broadcasting and had the exclusive responsibility for programming. CNTS had the exclusive rights and obligations to arrange services for television broadcasting (Exhibits C29 and R22).

118. The same day, CME transferred all its interests in CNTS to CME Czech Republic B.V. (hereinafter: also “CME”), a Dutch company, for a consideration of USD 52,723,613 (Exhibit C130).

119. On 1 July 1997, the Czech Parliament passed the Act on the Czech Republic Council for Radio and Television Broadcasting, which represented a consolidated version of the statute (Exhibit R7).

120. In August 1997, CME purchased Nova Consulting, which owned a 5.8% participation in CNTS, from Mr. Železný for a consideration of USD 28,500,000. As a result, CME held 99% of CNTS’s stock and the founders of CET 21 were left with a 1% participation in CNTS (declaration of Mrs. DeBruce of 30 June 2000, p. 5; declaration of Mr. Radvan of 30 June 2000, p. 5).

121. On 16 September 1997, the Media Council decided to stop the administrative proceedings against CNTS for illegal operation of television broadcasting. The Media Council’s main reasoning was that CNTS had “removed the inadequacies” by modifying its registration with the Commercial Registry and by proceeding to “amendments to the contractual relationship” with CET 21 (Exhibit R25).

3.3 The 1998-2000 events

122. On 31 January 1998, the Media Council issued its 1997 Report to the Czech Parliament. The report contained a long statement of the Media Council’s relationship with CNTS and CET 21. The Media Council explained that the legal relationship set up at the time the License was granted complied with the law as it then was in force and the Conditions to the License, mainly Conditions 17 and 18 had been issued in accordance with the Law. When the Media Law was amended and provided for the cancellation of all the Conditions, the Media Council protested on the ground that it "practically lost every possibility of checking on CNTS and its relationship to CET21. (...) The situation changed fundamentally when the amendment of the broadcasting law became effective. The licensing conditions that in principle guaranteed the legal character of the existing links between the license holder and the servicing firms were annulled and the Council had to solve the issue about how to attend, in the newly formed situation, to the sharp loosening up of the regulatory possibilities. The Council had an expertise made concerning the related issues and on the basis of it, initiated gradually negotiations with the affected Companies and opened up administrative proceedings in the subject of unauthorized broadcasting (...)". CET 21 and CNTS took the necessary steps to carry out the necessary adjustments, by changing their registrations in the Commercial Registry and the agreements setting forth their legal relationships. These actions led to the termination of the administrative proceedings for unauthorized television broadcasting. However, the Media Council's decision was not unanimous (5 in favor, 3 against and 1 abstention), and even reflected "the big difference of opinions over this case" (Exhibit C12).

123. On 21 June 1998, Mr. Radvan, counsel for CME, had lunch with Mrs. Hulová, Vice Chairman of the Media Council. According to Mr. Radvan, Mrs. Hulová said during lunch that CNTS had become "the target for a group of disgruntled persons" (Exhibit R102).
124. On 1 July 1998, the Media Council informed CET 21 that it was opening administrative proceedings against the latter to revoke the License on the ground that the television station was not providing information "in an objective and balanced manner" (Exhibit R124).
125. On 17 November 1998, the Media Council decided to stop the above mentioned administrative proceedings against CET 21, due to the fact that appropriate actions had been taken (Exhibit R125).

126. On 15 December 1998, CME and CET 21 amended the MOA so that all prior changes were incorporated (Exhibit C60).
127. On 24 February 1999, a Meeting of the Board of Representatives of CNTS took place during which the relationships between CET 21 and CME were discussed. The Minutes of the meeting indicate that Mr. Železný reported that at least one member of the Media Council had claimed that the actual situation contravened the law, and that "the Council wants to change its original decision and to write a letter with the statement that the present relationship between CET 21 and CNTS is not correct". Mr. Železný asserted that in his view, which he claimed was confirmed by his lawyers, the 1997 Agreement was not exclusive and CET 21 could request any services then provided by CNTS from any other company. He informed CNTS that, based on this assertion, CET 21 would hire another advertising agency. He added that, "in case he would be asked", he would resign from his function of executive as well as General Director of CNTS. He stated that "his proposal was an ultimatum, which meant that CME could either accept or not" (Exhibit C31).
128. On 2 March 1999, the Media Council held a meeting to which Mr. Železný was invited. According to the Minutes, CME's alleged financial difficulties were discussed. Mr. Železný, acting on behalf of CET 21, asked the Media Council to repeat some of its previous statements about exclusivity and the withdrawal of the License "in relation to all steps within the logic of the development of the relationships between CET and the Council". It was then stated that "[I]f Zelezny wants to affect the interests of CNTS, he will need to be supported by a formal or informal letter" (Exhibit R97).
129. On 3 March 1999, Mr. Železný, on the letterhead of CET 21, sent a letter to the Media Council requesting that the latter issue an opinion defining the relationship between CET 21 and CNTS, to be used by CET 21 "for discussions with our contractual partners". The opinion was to assert that "[r]elations between the operator of broadcasting [CET 21] and its service organisations must be established on a nonexclusive basis". CET 21 "should order services from service organizations at regular prices so as to respect rules of equal competition. (...) the licensed subject must have the ability to select relevant services anytime and anywhere at will" (Exhibit C33).

130. On 15 March 1999, the Media Council issued a letter to CET 21 laying out, inter alia, the non-exclusive basis of the relations between the operator of broadcasting and the service organizations, the operator's responsibility for structuring and composing the program, and the allocation to the operator of the revenues from advertising (Exhibit C34).
131. In March 1999, CME set up an action plan to deal with the tense situation with CET 21 (Exhibit R132).
132. On 19 April 1999, Mr. Železný was dismissed from his position as General Director and Chief Executive of CNTS (Exhibit C68).
133. On 24 June 1999, CNTS requested the Media Council to give its position or to take measures aimed at resolving the current dispute between CNTS, CME and CET 21, resulting, among other reasons, from CET 21 entering into contracts with third parties, which "were granted rights to trade benefits from the License" (Exhibit C39).
134. On 28 June 1999, after CNTS had positioned two commercial spots into television broadcasting despite CET 21's disapproval, the Regional Commercial Court in Prague rendered a preliminary measure ordering CNTS to refrain from any interference with television broadcasting operated by CET 21 (Exhibit C13).
135. On 13 July 1999, in the context of the Media Council's opinion to the Permanent Media Commission of the Parliament of the Czech Republic, CNTS provided the Media Council with an analysis of its legal relationship with CET 21 (Exhibit C40).
136. On 26 July 1999, the Media Council sent a letter to CNTS calling it to stop its media campaign in connection with its dispute with CET 21. CNTS was also to inform the Media Council on the steps taken to minimize the risks described in its opinion to the above-mentioned Commission, mainly the risks of breaches of the Media Law, and on the actions taken to come to a final settlement of the dispute. Enclosed with this letter were Sections 7 and 8 of the Media Council's opinion to the Permanent Media Committee with respect to the dispute between CET 21 and CNTS (Exhibit C44).

137. On 2 August 1999, CNTS and CME sent a letter to the Permanent Media Committee of the House of Representatives of the Parliament of the Czech Republic in response to Sections 7 and 8 of the Media Council's opinion to the Permanent Media Committee, a copy of which had been provided to CNTS with the Media Council's letter of 26 July 1999 (Exhibit C41), raising the question that the acts of the Media Council might constitute violations of the Treaty.
138. On 5 August 1999, Mr. Rozehnal, counsel for CET 21, informed CNTS that CET 21 "hereby withdraws from the Agreement on Cooperation in Provision of Services for Television Broadcasting, as amended, concluded on May 21, 1997". This decision was based on CNTS's failure on 4 August 1999 to submit to CET 21 within the usual deadline the Daily Log, which contains the daily programming, regarding the broadcasting for the following day (Exhibit C35).
139. On 6 August 1999, CNTS filed a request with the Media Council for the withdrawal of the License to CET 21 (Exhibit C42).
140. On 13 August 1999, CNTS informed the Media Council of its willingness to conduct negotiations with CET 21 to resolve their dispute, and requested that CNTS and CME be invited to the Media Council's ordinary session to be held on 17 August 1999 (Exhibit C43).
141. On 16 August 1999, CET 21 sent a letter to CME Ltd. detailing the business relationship between CET 21 and CNTS (Exhibit C13).
142. On 19 August 1999, Mr. Lauder initiated the present arbitration proceedings.
143. Numerous other court and arbitration proceedings opposing CNTS, CME, CET 21, Mr. Lauder and/or Mr. Železný were commenced in the context of the disputes between CNTS, CME and Mr. Lauder, on the one side, and CET 21 and Mr. Železný, on the other side. In particular:
- CME initiated parallel UNCITRAL arbitration proceedings against the Czech Republic on the basis of the bilateral investment treaty between the Netherlands and the Czech Republic;

- CME brought ICC arbitration proceedings against Mr. Železný (Exhibit R46);
- Numerous civil actions were commenced before the Czech courts, most of them opposing CNTS and CET 21 (Exhibit R49).

144. On 19 September 1999, the Media Council issued a written opinion for the Permanent Media Commission of the House of Deputies of the Parliament with respect to the dispute between CET 21 and CNTS. It was qualified as a “typical commercial dispute” related to the assessment of the real value of CME in the context of its merger with Scandinavian Broadcasting Services. Generally, this dispute could be identified as an issue of relations between the broadcaster, investors and service organizations, resulting from insufficiently transparent arrangements and leading to a dual broadcasting system. Similar problems were encountered with almost all nationwide broadcasters (Exhibit C68).
145. On 30 September 1999, the Standing Committee for Mass Media of the House of Representatives of the Czech Republic issued a resolution stating its serious dissatisfaction with the work of the Media Council in the context of the dispute between CNTS and CET 21 (Exhibit C108).
146. On 15 November 1999, the Media Council provided the Permanent Commission for the Media of the House of Representatives of the Czech Republic with a supplement to its position on the situation of TV Nova (Exhibit R126).
147. On 21 December 1999, the Media Council rendered a decision pursuant to which CME could be a party to the administrative proceedings regarding changes in the License at CET 21’s request (increase in the registered capital, changes in the participants and values of their capital contributions) (Exhibit C50).
148. As a result of the end of the relationships between CET 21 and CNTS, the latter had to take drastic measures to cut its spending, e.g. to lay off many employees (Exhibit C38).
149. On 4 May 2000, the Regional Commercial Court in Prague decided that CET 21 was obligated to procure all services for television broadcasting exclusively through CNTS. However, the Court refused to decide that CET 21's withdrawal from the 1997 Agreement was invalid, nor to confirm the existence of CNTS's exclusive right on the basis of the 1997 Agreement (Exhibit C54).

150. On 1 June 2000, CET 21 filed an appeal against the above mentioned judgment with the High Court in Prague (Exhibit C55).
151. On 14 December 2000, the High Court in Prague granted CET 21's appeal and decided that CET 21 was not obligated to procure all services for television broadcasting exclusively through CNTS (Exhibit R134).
152. The case is now pending before the Czech Supreme Court.

4. Jurisdiction and Admissibility

4.1 Introduction

153. At various stages of the proceedings, the Respondent challenged the Arbitral Tribunal's jurisdiction on several grounds:
  - a) The Claimant has failed to prove that he owns or controls an investment within the Czech Republic;
  - b) The Claimants claim is not an investment dispute under the Treaty;
  - c) The Claimant already submitted the same dispute to the courts of the Czech Republic and to other arbitral tribunals (Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty);
  - d) The Claimant may not concurrently pursue the same remedies in different fora;
  - e) The Claimant's claim constitutes an abuse of process;
  - f) The Claimant did not comply with the six-month waiting period (Article VI(2)(a) of the Treaty) (see Statement of Defence, p. 12-13; Response, p. 40-49; Sur-Reply, p. 14-17).
154. In the Written Closing Submissions of 30 March 2001, the Respondent stated that it did not dispute that:

- The Treaty is prima facie applicable to events occurring after 19 December 1992;
- Mr. Lauder is a national of the United States;
- CEDC's (and later CME's) shareholding in CNTS is an investment;
- The Claimant's allegations constitute an investment dispute for the purpose of the Treaty;
- For jurisdictional purpose only, the Claimant controlled the investment (see Written Closing Submissions, p. 4-5).

155. The Arbitral Tribunal therefore takes note that the Respondent has withdrawn the two grounds under a) and b) above. The Arbitral Tribunal will therefore only address the four remaining grounds under c), d), e) and f) above.

4.2 The same dispute is submitted to state courts and to other arbitral tribunals

156. The Respondent argues that Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty precludes the Arbitral Tribunal from exercising jurisdiction on the ground that the same dispute was submitted to Czech courts and to another arbitral tribunal before the present proceedings were initiated. Those proceedings arise from the same circumstances and seek the same substantive remedy, so that the issue in dispute is the same in all cases. As a result, Mr. Lauder has removed the dispute from any arbitral tribunal under the Treaty (Response, p. 47-48).

157. The Claimant argues that the present proceeding is the only one in which he claims that the Czech Republic violated obligations under the Treaty. Article VI(3)(a) actually sets forth a limited form of the principle of lis alibi pendens, whose elements are not met (Reply Memorial, p. 50-62).

158. Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty reads as follows:

"(...) Once the national or company concerned has so consented, either party to the dispute may institute such proceeding provided:

- (i) the dispute has not been submitted by the national or the company for resolution in accordance with any applicable previously agreed dispute-settlement procedures; and
- (ii) the national of company concerned has not brought the dispute before the courts of justice or administrative tribunals or agencies of competent jurisdiction of the Party that is a party to the dispute. (...)"

159. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the word “dispute” in Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty has the same meaning as the words “investment dispute” in Article VI(1), which reads as follows:

“For the purposes of this Article, an investment dispute is defined as a dispute involving (a) the interpretation or application of an investment agreement between a Party and a national or company of the other Party; (b) the interpretation or application of any investment authorization granted by a Party’s foreign investment authority to such national or company; or (c) an alleged breach of any right conferred or created by this Treaty with respect to an investment”.

160. It is undisputed that the Claimant’s allegations concern an investment dispute under Article VI(1)(c) of the Treaty, i.e. “an alleged breach of any right conferred or created by this Treaty with respect to an investment”.

161. The purpose of Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty is to avoid a situation where the same investment dispute (“the dispute”) is brought by the same the claimant (“the national or the company”) against the same respondent (a Party to the Treaty) for resolution before different arbitral tribunals and/or different state courts of the Party to the Treaty that is also a party to the dispute.

162. The resolution of the investment dispute under the Treaty between Mr. Lauder and the Czech Republic was not brought before any other arbitral tribunal or Czech court before – or after - the present proceedings was initiated. All other arbitration or court proceedings referred to by the Respondent involve different parties, and deal with different disputes.

163. In particular, neither Mr. Lauder nor the Czech Republic is a party to any of the numerous proceedings before the Czech courts, which opposed or are opposing CNTS or the various CME entities, on the one side, and CET 2.1 or Mr. Železný, on the other side. The Respondent has not alleged - let alone shown - that any of these courts would decide the dispute on the basis of the Treaty.
164. The ICC arbitration proceeding was between CME and Mr. Železný, and dealt with the latter's alleged breach of the 11 August 1997 Share Purchase Agreement pursuant to which CME acquired a 5.8% participation in CNTS held by Nova Consulting, a.s., an entity owned by Mr. Železný.
165. The parallel UNCITRAL arbitration proceeding (hereinafter: "the Stockholm Proceedings") is between CME and the Czech Republic, and is based on the bilateral investment treaty between the Netherlands and the Czech Republic.
166. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal holds that Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty does not preclude it from having jurisdiction in the present proceedings.

4.3 The same remedies are sought in different fora

167. The Respondent argues that, independently of Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty, the Claimant cannot seek the same remedies in multiple parallel actions.
168. At first the Respondent asserted that if the Claimant chooses to pursue a contractual remedy in the local courts or in an arbitral tribunal, he should not be allowed to concurrently pursue a remedy under the Treaty. The Claimant could indeed not complain of any mistreatment of his investment by the State until that State's courts had finally disposed of the case. In addition, by initiating proceedings under the Treaty, the Claimant deprives the other party to the court proceedings of the opportunity to argue its case before the Treaty tribunal. Here, the existence of multiple proceedings creates a risk of incompatible decisions, a prospect of disorder "that the principle of lis alibi pendens is designed to avert" (Response, p. 46-47).

169. Later the Respondent indicated that it was not seeking “to rely upon technical doctrines of lis alibi pendens or res judicata”, but on a new “important issue of principle, not yet tested (...) in previous court or arbitral proceedings”. The multiplicity of proceedings involving, directly or indirectly, the State “amounts to an abuse of process”, in that no court or arbitral tribunal would be in a position to ensure that justice is done and that its authority is effectively upheld. The Respondent added that there is “an obvious risk of conflicting findings between the two Treaty tribunals” (Sur-Reply, p. 14-15).
170. The Claimant argues that no principles of lis alibi pendens are applicable here. Should such principles apply, it would not deprive the Arbitral Tribunal of jurisdiction, since the other court and arbitration proceedings involve different parties, different claims, and different causes of action. However, if CNTS could obtain any recovery from the Czech courts, this may reduce the amount of damage claimed in the present proceedings (Reply Memorial, p. 50-62).
171. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the Respondent’s recourse to the principle of lis alibi pendens to be of no use, since all the other court and arbitration proceedings involve different parties and different causes of action (see 4.2 above). Therefore, no possibility exists that any other court or arbitral tribunal can render a decision similar to or inconsistent with the award which will be issued by this Arbitral Tribunal, i.e. that the Czech Republic breached or did not breach the Treaty, and is or is not liable for damages towards Mr. Lauder.
172. It is to be noted that the risk of conflicting findings is even less possible since the Claimant withdrew his two reliefs on the imposition of conditions to the License and the enforcement of such conditions, and only maintained its relief for damages. Assuming that the Arbitral Tribunal would decide that the Respondent breached the Treaty and that the Claimant is entitled to damages, such findings could not be contradicted by any other court or arbitral decision. The damages which could be granted in the parallel proceedings could only be based on the breach by CET 21 and/or Mr. Železný of their contractual obligations towards CNTS or any CME entity (decision by Czech courts or the ICC arbitral tribunal) or on the breach by the Czech Republic of its obligations towards CME pursuant to the Dutch/Czech bilateral investment treaty (decision by the parallel UNICTRAL arbitral tribunal). The only risk, as argued by the Claimant, is that damages be concurrently granted by more than one court or arbitral tribunal, in which case the amount of damages granted by the second deciding court or arbitral tribunal could take this fact into consideration when assessing the final damage.

173. There might exist the possibility of contradictory findings of this Arbitral Tribunal and the one set up to examine the claims of CME against the Czech Republic under the Dutch-Czech Bilateral Investment treaty. Obviously, the claimants in the two proceedings are not identical. However, this Arbitral Tribunal understands that the claim of Mr. Lauder giving rise to the present proceeding was commenced before the claims of CME was raised and, especially, the Respondent itself did not agree to a de facto consolidation of the two proceedings by insisting on a different arbitral tribunal to hear CME's case.

174. Finally, there is no abuse of process in the multiplicity of proceedings initiated by Mr. Lauder and the entities he controls. Even assuming that the doctrine of abuse of process could find application here, the Arbitral Tribunal is the only forum with jurisdiction to hear Mr. Lauder's claims based on the Treaty. The existence of numerous parallel proceedings does in no way affect the Arbitral Tribunal's authority and effectiveness, and does not undermine the Parties' rights. On the contrary, the present proceedings are the only place where the Parties' rights under the Treaty can be protected.

175. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal holds that the seeking of the same remedies in a different fora does not preclude it from having jurisdiction in the present proceedings.

4.4 The abuse of process

176. Besides the already addressed issue of alleged abuse of process in connection with the fact that the same remedies are sought in different fora (see 4.3 above), the Respondent argues that the Claimant commits an abuse of process (i) in pursuing his claim in the present proceedings under the Treaty whereas it is alleged in the parallel arbitration proceedings that CME has a better claim, and (ii) in not disclosing a prima facie case that the Respondent has breached the Treaty (Response, p. 48-49).

177. The Arbitral Tribunal does not see any abuse of process by the Claimant's pursuit of his claim in the present proceedings and by CME's pursuit of its claim in the parallel arbitration proceedings. As already stated (see 4.3 above), the claimants and the causes of action are not the same in the two cases. Only this Arbitral Tribunal can decide whether the Czech Republic breached the Treaty towards Mr. Lauder, and only the arbitral tribunal in the parallel Stockholm Proceedings can decide whether the Czech Republic breached the Dutch/Czech bilateral investment treaty in relation to CME. As a result, CME has neither a better - nor a worse - claim in the parallel arbitration proceedings than Mr. Lauder's claim in the present arbitration proceedings. It only has a different claim.
178. It should furthermore be noted that the Respondent refused to allow the constitution of identical arbitral tribunals to hear both treaty cases. If the same tribunal would have been appointed in both cases the procedure could have been co-ordinated with the corresponding reduction in work and time and of cost to the Parties. The possibility of conflicting decisions would also have been greatly reduced.
179. There is also no abuse of process by the Claimant's alleged non-disclosure of a prima facie case that the Respondent has breached the Treaty. No such obligation derives from the Treaty or from the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules. Even less would the absence of such disclosure result in the Arbitral Tribunal lacking jurisdiction. Furthermore, as stated hereunder, the Claimant actually disclosed more than just a prima facie case against the Respondent.
180. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal holds that there is no abuse of process on the part of the Claimant which would preclude it from having jurisdiction in the present proceedings.

4.5 The six-month waiting period

181. The Respondent argues that the Claimant did not comply with the waiting period set forth in Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty pursuant to which arbitration can be initiated only six months after the dispute arose. For the purpose of this provision, the dispute arises when the State is advised that a dispute exists. Here, the Czech Republic was first advised of Mr. Lauder's complaints under the Treaty by CNTS's and CME's letter to the Media Committee of the Czech Parliament of 2 August 1999. Therefore, the Notice of Arbitration served only 17 days later is defective, and the Arbitral Tribunal lacks jurisdiction (Statement of Defence, p. 13; Written Closing Submissions, p. 5).
182. The Claimant argues that the Respondent has waived or abandoned this objection by not having advanced it between its Statement of Defence of 31 January 2000 and its Written Closing Submissions of 30 March 2001 (Rebuttal to The Respondent's Written Closing Submission, p. 4-5).
183. Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty reads as follows:
- "At any time after six months from the date on which the dispute arose, the national or company concerned may choose to consent in writing to the submission of the dispute for settlement by conciliation or binding arbitration (...)"*
184. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that, as stated above with respect to the Respondent's other objection based on Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty (see 4.2 above), the word "dispute" in the context of the six-month waiting period shall have the same meaning as the words "investment dispute" in Article VI(1), i.e. in this case "an alleged breach of any right conferred or created by this Treaty with respect to an investment".
185. However, the waiting period does not run from the date at which the alleged breach occurred, but from the date at which the State is advised that said breach has occurred. This results from the purpose of the waiting period, which is to allow the parties to enter into good-faith negotiations before initiating arbitration.

186. Here, the Respondent's alleged violations of the Claimant's rights under the Treaty occurred during the period from February 1993, when the License was granted, until 15 March 1999, when the Media Council sent a letter to CET 21 expressing its opinion on the requirements of television broadcasting (see Summary of Summation, p. 1-9). No evidence was, however, put forward that the Czech Republic was advised of said alleged Treaty violations before CNTS's and CME's 2 August 1999 letter to the Media Committee of the Czech Parliament. Only 17 days lie between said letter and the filing of the Notice of Arbitration on 19 August 1999.
187. However, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that this requirement of a six-month waiting period of Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty is not a jurisdictional provision, i.e. a limit set to the authority of the Arbitral Tribunal to decide on the merits of the dispute, but a procedural rule that must be satisfied by the Claimant (Ethyl Corp. v. Canada, UNCITRAL June 24, 1998, 38 I.L.M. 708 (1999), paragraphs 74-88). As stated above, the purpose of this rule is to allow the parties to engage in good-faith negotiations before initiating arbitration.
188. Here, although there were only 17 days between CNTS's and CME's letter to the Media Committee of the Czech Parliament of 2 August 1999 and the filing of the Notice of Arbitration on 19 August 1999, there is no evidence that the Respondent would have accepted to enter into negotiation with Mr. Lauder or with any of the entities he controlled and which were involved in the dispute during the waiting period. On the contrary, the Media Council did not react at all to CNTS's letter of 13 August 1999 requesting that CNTS and CET 21 be invited to the Media Council's ordinary session to be held on 17 August 1999 in order to try to find a solution to their dispute (Exhibit C43).
189. Furthermore, the Respondent did not propose to engage in negotiations with the Claimant following the latter's statement in his Notice of Consent of 19 August 1999, filed together with the Notice of Arbitration, that he remained "open to any good faith efforts by the Czech Republic to remedy this situation". Had the Respondent been willing to engage in negotiations with the Claimant, in the spirit of Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty, it would have had plenty of opportunities to do so during the six months after the 19 August 1999 Notice of Arbitration.

190. To insist that the arbitration proceedings cannot be commenced until 6 months after the 19 August 1999 Notice of Arbitration would, in the circumstances of this case, amount to an unnecessary, overly formalistic approach which would not serve to protect any legitimate interests of the Parties.
191. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal holds that the requirement of the six-month waiting period in Article VI(3)(a) of the Treaty does not preclude it from having jurisdiction in the present proceedings.

5. Findings

5.1 Introduction

192. The Claimant alleges that the Respondent, through the Media Council actions, has breached five independent obligations under the Treaty within three separate time periods.
193. The five obligations are the followings:
- a) the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures;
  - b) the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment;
  - c) the obligation to provide full protection and security;
  - d) the obligation of treatment in accordance with general principles of international law;
  - e) the obligation not to expropriate unlawfully (Reply Memorial, p. 62; Summary of Summation, p. 13-14).
194. The three time periods are the followings:
- a) the 1993-1994 period;
  - b) the 1996-1997 period;
  - c) the 1998-1999 period (see Mr. Kiernan's oral opening submission, 5 March 2001, p. 18).

195. The Arbitral Tribunal feels it appropriate to address the issues in the following order:
- a) the obligation not to expropriate unlawfully with respect to all time periods;
  - b) the obligation of treatment in accordance with the general principles of international law with respect to all time periods;
  - c) all remaining alleged violations of the Treaty within the 1992-1993 time period;
  - d) all remaining alleged violations of the Treaty within the 1994-1997 and 1998-1999 time periods.

5.2 The obligation not to expropriate unlawfully (all time periods)

196. The Claimant alleges that the Media Council committed unlawful expropriation by instituting administrative proceedings against CNTS in 1996 and by other actions that forced CNTS to amend the MOA, as well as by the accumulation of actions and inactions over the period from 1996 through 1999 to which the Claimant never consented voluntarily or otherwise. The Claimant precisely referred to (i) the 1996 administrative and criminal proceedings, (ii) the indication by the Media Council in 1998 and thereafter that it did not accept an exclusive business relationship between CET 21 and CNTS, coupled with the Media Council's continued pressures to restructure said relationship, (iii) the Media Council's 15 March 1999 letter to CET 21, and (iv) the Media Council's refusal to take action against CET 21 when the latter severed all dealings with CNTS (Reply Memorial, p. 73-77).
197. The Claimant argues that the Treaty protects foreign investors from direct and indirect expropriation, i.e. not only from the taking of tangible property, but also from measures tantamount to expropriation. Expropriation includes interference by the State in the use of property or with the enjoyment of its benefits, even if legal title to the property is not affected. There is even heightened protection against deprivations resulting from regulatory actions when the acquired rights have obtained legal approval on which investors justifiably rely. The intent of the State to deprive the investor of property is not a necessary element of expropriation. There is no regulatory exception (Memorial, p. 50-52; Reply Memorial, p. 63-73).

198. The Respondent argues that, although the Treaty includes both direct and indirect forms of expropriation, interference with property rights has to be so complete as to amount to a taking of those rights. Detrimental effect on the economic value of property is not sufficient. Parties to the Treaty are not liable for economic injury that is the consequence of bona fide regulation within the accepted police powers of the State. The Respondent asserts that the lawful commencement of administrative proceedings against CNTS in 1996 in respect of a suspected violation of the law did not constitute expropriation. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the Media Council threatened to revoke the License. In addition, CNTS and/or Mr. Lauder made no mention of expropriation before the Notice of Arbitration was filed on 19 August 1999. Finally, Mr. Lauder failed to prove that the Czech Republic caused CET 21 to withdraw from its contractual relationship with CNTS, the acts of the latter's contractual counter-party not constituting expropriation by the State (Response, p. 50-55; Written Closing Submissions, p. 9-10).

199. Article III(1) of the Treaty provides:

"Investments shall not be expropriated or nationalized either directly or indirectly through measures tantamount to expropriation or nationalization ("expropriation") except for a public purpose; in accordance with due process of law; in a nondiscriminatory manner; upon payment of prompt, adequate and effective compensation; and in accordance with the general principles or treatment provided for in Article II(2) ".

200. The Bilateral Investment Treaties (hereinafter: "BITs") generally do not define the term of expropriation and nationalization, or any of the other terms denoting similar measures of forced dispossession ("dispossession", "taking", "deprivation", or "privation"). Furthermore, the practice shows that although the various terms may be used either alone or in combination, most often no distinctions have been attempted between the general concept of dispossession and the specific forms thereof. In general, expropriation means the coercive appropriation by the State of private property, usually by means of individual administrative measures. Nationalization involves large-scale takings on the basis of an executive or legislative act for the purpose of transferring property or interests into the public domain. The concept of indirect (or “de facto”, or “creeping”) expropriation is not clearly defined. Indirect expropriation or nationalization is a measure that does not involve an overt taking, but that effectively neutralizes the enjoyment of the property. It is generally accepted that a wide variety of measures are susceptible to lead to indirect expropriation, and each case is therefore to be decided on the basis of its attending circumstances (Rudolf Dolzer & Margrete Stevens, Bilateral Investment Treaties, p. 98-100 (1995); Georgio Sacerdoti, Bilateral Treaties and Multilateral Instruments on Investment Protection, 379-382 (1997)). The European Court of Human Rights in Mellacher and Others v. Austria (1989 Eur.Ct.H.R. (ser. A, No. 169)), held that a “formal” expropriation is a measure aimed at a “transfer of property”, while a “de facto” expropriation occurs when a State deprives the owner of his “right to use, let or sell (his) property”.

201. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that the Respondent did not take any measure of, or tantamount to, expropriation of the Claimant’s property rights within any of the time periods, since there was no direct or indirect interference by the Czech Republic in the use of Mr. Lauder’s property or with the enjoyment of its benefits.

202. The Claimant has indeed not brought sufficient evidence that any measure or action taken by the Czech Republic would have had the effect of transferring his property or of depriving him of his rights to use his property or even of interfering with his property rights. All property rights of the Claimant were actually fully maintained until the contractual relationship between CET 21 and CNTS was terminated by the former. It is at that time, and at that time only, that Mr. Lauder’s property rights, i.e. the use of the benefits of the License by CNTS, were affected. Up to that time, CNTS had been in a position to fully enjoy the economic benefits of the License granted to CET 21, even if the nature of the legal relationships between the two companies had changed over the time. Because the Claimant has not alleged – and even less proved – that the action which seriously interfered with the Claimants property rights, i.e. CET 21’s decision to withdraw from the 1997 Agreement on 5 August 1999, was one of the State, and not one of a private entity completely independent of the State, there can be no expropriation under the Treaty.

203. In addition, even assuming that the actions taken by the Media Council in the period from 1996 through 1999 had the effect of depriving the Claimant of his property rights, such actions would not amount to an appropriation - or the equivalent - by the State, since it did not benefit the Czech Republic or any person or entity related thereto, and was not taken for any public purpose. It only benefited CET 21, an independent private entity owned by private individuals.
204. Finally, the Claimant, directly or through CNTS or any other entity controlled by himself, did not complain of any action taken by the Media Council and which allegedly constituted an expropriation, or a measure tantamount to expropriation, before CME's and CNTS's letter to the Czech Parliament of 2 August 1999, after Mr. Železný had been dismissed of his functions with CNTS and at a time of great tensions between CNTS and CET 21. This failure by the Claimant to invoke the Treaty or to advance any violation of the obligations of the Czech Republic when the now disputed actions were taken, tends to show that no violations of his property rights were committed at that time.

5.3 The obligation of treatment in accordance with general principles of international law (all time periods)

205. The Claimant alleges that the Media Council violated its obligations arising under international law when it withdrew its prior approval of CNTS's activities, and by committing "the same wrongs that establish its breach of other individual protections under the Treaty" (Reply Memorial, p. 89; Mr. Kiernan's oral closing submissions, p. 177-178).
206. The Claimant argues that the general principles of international law include, among others, a variant of pacta sunt servanda, the protection of acquired rights, the treatment of foreign investment in good faith, the principle of estoppel, and recognized standards relating to the protection of property. These general standards refer exclusively to international law, to the exclusion of domestic law (Reply Memorial, p. 88-89; Mr. Kiernan's oral closing submissions, p. 177-178).

207. The Respondent argues that the Claimant has not identified any obligation of treatment in accordance with general principles of international law which is distinct to the other obligations (Written Closing Submissions, p. 14).
208. Article II(2)(a) of the Treaty provides that "[i]nvestment (...) shall in no case be accorded treatment less than that which conforms to principles of international law".
209. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the Claimant has not identified any specific obligation of international law which would provide the foreign investor with a broader protection than the other four Treaty obligations on which he otherwise relies. In particular, the Claimant does not allege that either the variant of the principle pacta sunt servanda, which would create under certain circumstances a sui generis investor-state relationship, or the general obligation of good faith goes further in the protection of the foreign investor than the Respondent's obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment (see below 5.5.3) or the Respondent's obligation to provide full protection and security (see below 5.5.4). On the contrary, by stating that the Respondent's alleged "breach of the obligation to adhere to general international law arises from the same wrongs that establish its breach of other individual protections under the Treaty", the Claimant himself recognizes that there is no action or inaction by the Czech Republic which could amount exclusively to a violation of the obligation of treatment in accordance with general principles of international law, without also constituting a violation of other obligations under the Treaty.
210. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal will refer to the developments made in the other sections of the present award.

5.4 The 1992-1993 time period

5.4.1 Introduction

211. Because the Claimant, in his more general statement about the "totality of other actions and inactions by the Media Council", expressly refers to the rights provided to CNTS, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that his allegation of unfair and inequitable treatment does not cover the events leading to the creation of CNTS and the replacement of the Media Council, i.e. the first time period in 1993-1994, but includes only the second and third time periods in 1996-1997 and 1998-1999.

212. With respect to the separate obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment, the Claimant alleged that the Respondent breached said obligation through the Media Council's reversal of critical prior approvals, i.e. when the Media Council directed in 1996 the removal in the MOA of the provision giving CNTS the exclusive right to use, benefit from and maintain the License, and through its hostile conduct towards CNTS, i.e. the totality of other actions and inactions by the Media Council that undermined the rights which had been provided to CNTS (Reply Memorial, p. 77-83; Summary of Summation, p. 13).
213. The only identified alleged violation of specific Treaty obligations within the 1992-1994 time period concerns the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures. Such measures occurred when the Media Council insisted on CEDC not becoming a direct shareholder of CET 21 in 1993 (Reply Memorial, p. 87; Mr. Kiernan's oral closing submissions, 12 March 2001, p. 175).

5.4.2 The prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures

214. The Claimant alleges that the Respondent took arbitrary and discriminatory measures when the Media Council insisted in 1993 on CEDC not becoming a direct shareholder of CET 21. The Claimant argues that the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures must be inferred from the circumstances. It is not necessary that a measure be founded on a violation of domestic law for such a measure to be arbitrary and/or discriminatory. Arbitrary action may actually include regulatory actions without good-faith governmental purpose (Memorial, p. 54; Reply Memorial, p. 85-88; Mr. Kiernan's closing submissions, Transcript of 12 March 2001, p. 175-176; Summary of Summation, p. 14).

215. The Respondent argues that Article II(2)(b) of the Treaty, in comparison with Article II(1), requires the Claimant to prove that the Respondent's conduct was both arbitrary and discriminatory. Only an illegal act under domestic law can be - but is not necessarily - arbitrary, and the Claimant did not even prove that the Czech Republic behaved unlawfully. For an act to constitute discrimination, it must first result in actual injury and, second, it must be done with the intention to harm the aggrieved party. In particular, there is no discrimination in the requirement that foreign investors invest in the State through the medium of a locally-incorporated company, since it is only a regulation on how foreign investment is to be organized. Here, the Media Council awarded the License on the precise terms of CET 21's application, pursuant to which CEDC would become a minor shareholder in CET 21. The CNTS structure was proposed by CEDC (Response, p. 56-57; Written Closing Submissions, p. 12-13).

216. Article II(2)(b) of the Treaty provides:

“Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary and discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investment. For the purpose of dispute resolution under Articles VI and VII, a measure may be arbitrary and discriminatory notwithstanding the fact that a party has had or has exercised the opportunity to review such measure in the courts or administrative tribunals of a Party”.

217. Article II(1) of the Treaty reads as follows:

“Each Party shall permit and treat investment, and activities associated therewith, on a nondiscriminatory basis, subject to the right of each Party to make or maintain exceptions falling within one of the sectors or matters listed in the Annex to this Treaty. (...).”

218. Clause 3 of the Annex to the Treaty provides:

“Consistent with Article II, paragraph 1, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic reserves the right to make or maintain limited exceptions to national treatment in the sectors or matters it has indicated below:

ownership of real property; and insurance”.

219. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that a violation of Article II(2)(b) of the Treaty requires both an arbitrary and a discriminatory measure by the State. It first results from the plain wording of the provision, which uses the word “and” instead of the word “or”. It then results from the existence of Article II(1) of the Treaty, which sets forth the prohibition of any discriminatory treatment of investment, except in the sectors or matters expressly listed in the Annex to the Treaty. If Article II(2)(b) prohibited only arbitrary or discriminatory measures, it would be partially redundant to the prohibition of discriminatory measure set forth in Article II(1).
220. A discriminatory measure is defined in Article II(1) and the Clause 3 of the Annex to the Treaty. It is one that fails to provide the foreign investment with treatment at least as favorable as the treatment of domestic investment (“national treatment”: see Annex 3 to the Treaty). For a measure to be discriminatory, it does not need to violate domestic law, since domestic law can contain a provision that is discriminatory towards foreign investment, or can lack a provision prohibiting the discrimination of foreign investment. It is only in the sectors or matters for which it has reserved the right to make or maintain an exception in the Annex to the Treaty that the State may treat foreign investment less favorably than domestic investment. Due to the fact that the Czech Republic has not made any reserve in the matter of broadcasting television, contrary to the reserve made by the United States of America in the matter of “ownership and operation of broadcast or common carrier radio and television stations” (Clause 1 of the Annex to the Treaty; Exhibits R1 and C1), the Czech Republic is bound to provide U.S. investment in the field of broadcasting with a treatment at least as favorable as Czech investment.
221. The Treaty does not define an arbitrary measure. According to Black’s Law Dictionary, arbitrary means “depending on individual discretion; (...) founded on prejudice or preference rather than on reason or fact” (Black’s Law Dictionary 100 (7th ed. 1999)).

5.4.2.1 CEDC not becoming a shareholder in CET 21

222. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that the Czech Republic took a discriminatory and arbitrary measure against Mr. Lauder in violation of Article II(2)(b) of the Treaty when the Media Council, after having accepted the idea of a direct investment in CET 21 by CEDC , a company which Mr. Lauder controlled, eventually did not allow such investment, and required that a third company, CNTS, be created.
223. There is clear evidence that CEDC intended to acquire a direct participation in CET 21, should the latter be awarded the License. The draft “Terms of Agreement” prepared by CEDC and CET 21 in August 1992 (Exhibit C139) as well as the final version of this document signed by both companies in January 1993 (Exhibit C61) expressly referred to “an equity investment in CET 21” from CEDC. The document named “Project of an Independent Television Station” drafted by CET 21 in September 1992 stated that CEDC is “a direct participant in CET 21's application for the license” (Exhibit C9).
224. There is also clear evidence that the Media Council was aware of such intention. The Minutes of the preliminary hearings held on 21 December 1992 by the Media Council with the various bidders for TV Nova stated, as regards CET 21, that “extensive share [is] reserved for foreign capital; (...) direct capital share, not credit”(Exhibit R58). The Minutes of the further preliminary hearings held on 22 January 1993 provided that “[t]he participation of foreign capital is expected” and that “the combination of domestic and foreign capital is important, necessity of safeguard - diversification of the investments sources” (Exhibit C64). The Minutes of the session of the Media Council of 30 January 1993, where the decision to award the License to CET 21 was made, stated some member’s of the Media Council’s words that “(...) it is very significant that this is a business which can not be financed only by credit”, “the Czech and foreign capital in CET 21 [is] positive”, and it is “positive in that there is a stabilisation factor, as far as foreign capital and its involvement is concerned” (statements of Messrs. Brož and Pýcha; Exhibit R54).

225. The above mentioned statements also clearly indicate that the Media Council had accepted, and even was satisfied with, the fact that CEDC would be a shareholder of CET 21. As a result, this Tribunal Arbitral considers that there can be no doubt that when the Media Council informed CET 21 in its letter of 30 January 1993 (Exhibit R9) and the public in its press release of the same day (Exhibit C11) that the License had been granted to CET 21 and that "[a] direct participant in the application is the international corporation CEDC", the Media Council agreed and approved meant that CEDC would be a shareholder of CET 21.
226. Even assuming that the Media Council thought of another form of participation of CEDC at the time it made the decision to award the License to CET 21, CEDC could reasonably believe that its project of becoming a shareholder in CET 21 had been properly understood and accepted by the Media Council. At no time until the decision was made did the Media Council express any misunderstanding or dissatisfaction with such project.
227. The various statements of the members and staff of the Media Council in the beginning of 1993 submitted in the present proceedings, the immediate rising of strong political opposition to the Media Council's choice in favor of CET 21, and the overall circumstances of the case show that the Media Council realized immediately after the decision on the award of the License had been made that it had to bring some modifications to the project of CET 21 and CEDC. In particular, the Media Council could no longer accept CEDC as a shareholder of CET 21, as it became clear from the political reactions to the recent decision to award the License to CET 21 that even stronger political opposition would arise, opening the way for an attack on the entire selection process. The Media Council therefore gave CET 21 and CEDC the task of proposing an acceptable structure (declaration of Mrs. Landová of 5 December 2000, p. 6-7; declaration of Mr. Brož of 5 December 2000, p. 2-3; declaration of Mr. Pýcha of 21 December 2000, p. 1-3; Exhibits R83, C144 and C145).
228. As a result, CET 21 and CEDC prepared a document named "Overall Structure of a New Czech Commercial Television Entity" pursuant to which CET 21 and CEDC would jointly create a new Czech company which would have the exclusive use of the License. The shareholders of the new company would be CET 21, CEDC and CSB, the last two of them providing the necessary funds. There was no mention anymore of any direct participation of CEDC in CET 21 (Exhibits C14 and C149). After some modifications were made at the request of the director of the Programming and Monitoring Section of the Media Council, the final version of the document was submitted to the Media Council on February 5, 1993 (Exhibits C150 and R55). On the basis of this document, the Media Council rendered its decision to award the License to CET 21, which stated that CEDC was a "contractual partner" of CET 21 (Exhibits R10 and C16).

229. The 1997 Report of the Media Council to the Czech Parliament actually provides a good summary of the actions and their motivations which took place between 30 January and 9 February 1993: "When granting the license to the Company CET 21, for fear that a majority share of foreign capital in the license holder's Company might impact the independence of full-format broadcasts, the Council assumed a configuration that separates the investor from the license holder himself. That is how an agreement came into existence (upon a series of remarks from the Council) by which the Company CNTS was established the majority owner of which is CEDC/CME".
230. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that the Media Council decision to move from a direct participation by CEDC, a German company controlled by Mr. Lauder, an American citizen, to a contractual relationship providing for the creation of a third company amounted to an arbitrary and discriminatory measure.
231. The measure was discriminatory because it provided the foreign investment with a treatment less favorable than domestic investment. It indeed results from the above mentioned circumstances that the Media Council changed its mind because of its fear that the strong and rising political opposition to the granting of the License to an entity with significant foreign capital could lead to an attack on the entire selection process. It is probable that if CEDC had been a Czech investor, there would have been no political outcry, and the original plan of becoming a shareholder in CET 21 could have been carried out.

232. The measure was arbitrary because it was not founded on reason or fact, nor on the law which expressly accepted "applications from companies with foreign equity participation" (Exhibit R2), but on mere fear reflecting national preference.
233. However, there is no single piece of evidence that CEDC opposed, or protested against, or even less fought against, this measure. On the contrary, it results from the circumstances that CEDC immediately proposed a new structure in which it would become a contractual partner of, rather than a shareholder in, CET 21. CEDC and its successor CME actually accepted the measure without reservation for the next six years, as long as it was able to conduct the joint venture profitably. It is only in the context of the present proceedings, after CET 21 had terminated the contractual relationship with CNTS, which was by that time fully controlled by CME, that CME complained about the measure. Even the Notice of Arbitration did not refer to the measure, which was first mentioned in the Memorial (p. 1-2).
234. The question therefore arises if the breach by the Respondent of its Treaty obligations gives rise to any damages to be paid to the Claimant. It is most probable that if in 1993 Mr. Lauder's investment in the Czech television could have been made directly in CET 21, the Licence holder, the possible breach of any exclusive agreements in 1999 could not have occurred in the way it did. Even if the breach therefore constitutes one of several "sine qua non" acts, this alone is not sufficient. In order to come to a finding of a compensable damage it is also necessary that there existed no intervening cause for the damage. In our case the Claimant therefore has to show that the last, direct act, the immediate cause, namely the termination by CET 21 on 5 August 1999 (and the preceding conclusions by CET 21 of service agreements with other service providers) did not become a superseding cause and thereby the proximate cause. In other words, the Claimant has to show that the acts of CET 21 were not so unexpected and so substantial as to have to be held to have superseded the initial cause and therefore become the main cause of the ultimate harm. This the Claimant has not shown. First of all, the Claimant itself in 1993 did not protest against the change imposed by the Media Council. Furthermore, it was completely impossible at that time to envisage that the Claimant itself would actively participate in all those later steps which allowed Mr. Železný to disengage himself from CNTS and to acquire control of CET 21 in order to be able to pursue his own interests without having to rely on CME. These acts of CET 21, and through it by Mr. Železný, are the real cause for the damage which apparently has been inflicted to the Claimant.

235. The arbitrary and discriminatory breach by the Respondent of its Treaty obligations constituted a violation of the Treaty. The alleged harm was, however, caused in 1999 by the acts of CET 21, controlled by Mr. Železný. The 1993 breach of the Treaty was too remote to qualify as a relevant cause for the harm caused. A finding on damages due to the Claimant by the Respondent would therefore not be appropriate.

5.5 The 1994-1997 and 1998-1999 time periods

5.5.1 Introduction

236. Within the 1994-1997 and 1998-1999 time periods, the Claimant alleges that the Respondent violated all five obligations under the Treaty (see above 5.1). As the Arbitral Tribunal has already addressed the alleged violations of the obligation not to expropriate unlawfully (see above 5.2) and of the obligation of treatment in accordance with general principles of international law (see above 5.3) with respect to all time periods, it will address the three other alleged violations in the context of the events which occurred in the period from 1994 through 1999, i.e.:

- a) the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures;
- b) the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment;
- c) the obligation to provide full protection and security (Reply Memorial, p. 62-89; Summary of Summation, p. 13-14).

5.5.2 The prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures

237. The Claimant alleges that the Respondent took arbitrary and discriminatory measures (i) when the Czech Parliament replaced the Media Council in 1994, (ii) when the Media Council initiated in 1996 the administrative proceedings against CNTS for unauthorized television broadcasting, (iii) when the Media Council stated in its 1996 and 1998 reports that the target of its investigations was CNTS, and that the others did not receive any attention: (iv) through ongoing efforts to eliminate the original structure between CET 21 and CNTS in favor of non-exclusive contractual arrangements; (v) by statements of a Media Council's member, Mr. Štěpánek, that CNTS was promoting flight of Czech capital abroad; and (vi) when Mr. Josefík admitted that it did not even occur to him to consider the interest of foreign investor after Mr. Železný's request of March 2, 1999 (Reply Memorial, p. 87-88; Mr. Kiernan's closing submissions, Transcript of 12 March 2001, p. 175-176).

238. The Respondent mainly alleges that the Media Council did not discriminate in the treatment of the Claimant's investment. The administrative proceedings were initiated because there were objective grounds for suspecting a breach of the law, especially when similar proceedings were commenced against others in a similar situation. Furthermore that the existence of anti-American feelings within the Czech Republic was the result of a democratic freedom of expression (Response, p. 56-57; Written Closing Submissions, p. 12-14).
239. As regards the content of the prohibition against discriminatory and arbitrary measures, the Arbitral Tribunal refers to the developments made in the context of the 1992-1993 time period (see above 5.4.2).

5.5.2.1 The replacement of the Media Council

240. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that the replacement of the Media Council in 1994 did not amount to an arbitrary and discriminatory measure of the Czech Republic.
241. There is indeed no evidence that this replacement was in any direct relation to the involvement of Mr. Lauder in TV Nova, nor that it constituted in any manner a discriminatory and arbitrary measure vis-a-vis the Claimant and his investment in CNTS.

242. Furthermore, any country is entitled to organize its own organs as it pleases as long as this does not result in a discriminatory and arbitrary measure against a foreign investor, protected by the investment Treaty.
243. The replacement of the Media Council in 1994 as such did not cause any harm to Mr. Lauder's investment in the Czech Republic.

5.5.2.2 The Media Council's 1996 and 1998 reports, and Messrs. Štěpánek 's and Josefík's statements

244. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that the Claimant's allegations of discriminatory and arbitrary measures with respect to the Media Council statements in its 1996 and 1998 reports that the target of its efforts was CNTS; to Mr. Štěpánek's statements that CNTS was promoting flight of Czech capital abroad; and to Mr. Josefík admission that it did not even occur to him to consider the interest of foreign investor after Mr. Železný's request of 2 March 1999, are clearly unfounded for similar reasons. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal will examine these three allegations together.
245. First, the Media Council alleged statement in its 1996 and 1998 reports that its target effort was CNTS does not constitute a "measure" under the Treaty. Such a statement did indeed not have any direct effect on the Claimant's investment, and it is not alleged that it had such an effect. In the light most favorable to the Claimant, it may only have been evidence of the Media Council's intent to treat CNTS as a target in the context of a measure contemporaneously taken by the Media Council. Therefore, such a statement in itself cannot amount to an arbitrary and discriminatory measure.
246. Then, the alleged statements of Mr. Štěpánek that CNTS was promoting flight of Czech capital abroad does not constitute a "measure" under the Treaty either. Furthermore, a statement by a member of the Media Council is not attributable as such to the Media Council, and to the Czech Republic. On the contrary, it must be considered as a personal opinion of said member, which may or may not reflect the Media Council's opinion on the subject. Therefore, it cannot amount to an arbitrary and discriminatory measure. It apparently also did not occur to the Claimant that this alleged measure would constitute a violation of the Treaty at the time the statement was made, as this allegation of a violation of the Treaty was raised for the first time in the course of the present arbitration proceedings.

247. Finally, the alleged admission by Mr. Josefík that it did not even occur to him to consider the interest of foreign investor after Mr. Železný's request of 2 March 1999 is also a personal statement, and, as such, does not constitute a "measure" under the Treaty. In addition, it is not attributable to the Czech Republic. Therefore, it cannot amount to an arbitrary and discriminatory measure. Apparently it did also not occur to the Claimant until the August 2, 1999 letter of CNTS and CME (Exhibit C41)!

5.5.2.3 The initiation of the administrative proceedings

248. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that the initiation in 1996 of the administrative proceedings against CNTS for unauthorized television broadcasting did not constitute an arbitrary and discriminatory measure of the Czech Republic.

249. There is indeed sufficient evidence that the Media Council thought – or could think – that CNTS was violating the Media Law. The Media Council had indeed received complaints from the public on the content of the programs of TV Nova. As regulatory body for radio and television broadcasting, it was responsible, among other duties, for ensuring the observance of the Media Law (Article 16(2)).

250. Article 3(l) of the Media Law, as amended with effect on 1 January 1996, set forth that a broadcasting operator was one who had "acquired authorization to broadcasting on the basis of law (a "broadcaster by law") or being granted a license under this Act (a "licensed broadcaster") or by registration under this Act (a "registered broadcaster")". According to Article 2(1)(a), broadcasting "means dissemination of program services or pictures and sound information by transmitters, cable systems, satellites and other means intended to be received by the public" (Exhibit R3).

251. Here, the License had been granted to CET 21, and not to CNTS (Exhibits R10 and C16). CNTS actually did not enter into any of the three categories of broadcaster under Article 3(1) of the Media Law (broadcaster by law, licensed broadcaster and registered broadcaster).
252. Several objective facts existed which could cast the doubt on whether CET 21 or CNTS was actually operating the broadcasting of TV Nova. For instance, CNTS's entry into the Commercial Registry stated that its business activity was "operating television broadcasting on the basis of the license no. 001/1003" (Exhibits R10 and C16). CNTS had also directly entered into agreements with other companies for the dissemination of broadcasting. In addition, Mr. Železný held at that time the position equivalent to that of a Chief Operating Officer of both companies. Finally, most activities in connection with TV Nova were performed from CNTS's large premises in Prague with an important staff, whereas CET 21 had a much smaller organization.
253. All these facts lead to a confusion of the roles actually played by CNTS and CET 21, and the Media Council could legitimately fear that a situation had arisen where there had been a de facto transfer of the License from CET 21 to CNTS.
254. Furthermore, the Media Council, upon its request, had been provided with an expert opinion from Mr. Jan Bárta from the State and Law Institute of the Academy of Science of the Czech Republic stating that the License was issued to CET 21, and therefore this company had to itself operate the broadcasting activities. Assuming that broadcasting was actually operated by CNTS, administrative proceedings to impose a fine could be initiated against the latter (Exhibits C27 and R14). In this respect, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that this opinion was issued by the State and Law Institute of the Academy of Science of the Czech Republic and not only by Mr. Bárta personally, since the Media Council's letter requesting the opinion had been sent to Mr. Bárta at the Institute, and the opinion was issued on the Institute's letterhead.
255. The commencement of the administrative proceedings against CNTS for alleged unauthorized broadcasting constituted the normal exercise of the regulatory duties of the Media Council. Therefore, this measure was not arbitrary.

256. In addition, administrative proceedings for unauthorized broadcasting were not only initiated against CNTS, a company controlled by a foreign investor, but also against two other companies, Premiera TV a.s. and Radio Alfa a.s. (Exhibits R37 and C22). Although Radio Alfa was also controlled by CME in 1996 and thus can equally be qualified as a foreign investor, Premiera TV was controlled by a domestic investor.
257. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the Media Council decision to initiate administrative proceedings against CNTS was objectively not discriminatory, since the same measure was taken against Premiera TV, which was controlled by a domestic investor. The foreign investment of Mr. Lauder was therefore not provided a treatment less favourable than the domestic investment controlling Premiera TV. In this respect, the Arbitral Tribunal is of the opinion that the Claimant's allegation that the consequences of the administrative proceedings were less serious for Premiera TV than for CNTS is not relevant, because the measure itself is the same in both cases, i.e. the existence of administrative proceedings for unauthorized broadcasting. Discrimination can only occur when the measure against foreign investment and the measure against domestic investment are of a different nature, and the former is less favourable than the latter.
258. Therefore, the initiation of the administrative proceedings against CNTS was also not discriminatory.
259. This being said, the Arbitral Tribunal notes that neither CNTS nor CME raised any objection at the time the administrative proceedings were initiated that this action was in violation of any Czech law let alone that they violated the Treaty or any obligation of the Czech Republic.

5.5.2.4 The Media Council's ongoing efforts to eliminate the original structure between CET 21 and CNTS

260. The Arbitral Tribunal also considers that the alleged ongoing efforts by the Media Council to eliminate the original structure between CET 21 and CNTS in favor of non-exclusive contractual arrangements did not constitute an arbitrary and discriminatory measure of the Czech Republic.

261. It is first to be noted that this allegation is rather vague. The Arbitral Tribunal understands that the alleged ongoing efforts to eliminate the original structure between CET 21 and CNTS refer both to the changes in their contractual relationships, i.e. the amendment to the MOA and the conclusion of the various agreements, and to the issuance by the Media Council of its 15 March 1999 letter, in response to CET 21's request of 3 March 1999 (Exhibit C34).
262. For the sake of clarity, the Arbitral Tribunal will examine these two sets of facts separately.

5.5.2.4.1 The changes to the contractual relationships between CET 21 and CNTS

263. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the Media Council's actions leading to the changes to the MOA and the conclusion of the various agreements between CET 21 and CNTS did not constitute arbitrary and discriminatory measures.
264. The Arbitral Tribunal is of the opinion that the main reason for the Media Council to direct CME, CET 21 and CNTS to bring some modifications to their legal relationships was the same as the ground for initiating the administrative proceedings against CNTS for unauthorized broadcasting, i.e. the fear that the unclear legal and factual situation could actually amount to a de facto transfer of the License from CET 21 to CNTS, in violation of the Media Law.
265. Article 1.4.1(a) of the original MOA stated that "CET shall contribute to the Company unconditionally, unequivocally, and on an exclusive basis the right to use, exploit and maintain the License held by CET". The MOA did not contain any definition of the words "use, exploit and maintain", which remained open for interpretation.

266. This legal uncertainty, reinforced by the doubts about the factual allocation of responsibilities between CET 21 and CNTS, led the Media Council to ask the two companies to enter into a service contract setting forth their respective roles in the operation of TV Nova. This process was initiated at the meeting between the Media Council and CET 21 of 13 March 1996. The first conclusion of this meeting was that "[l]awyers of the Council and CET 21 will prepare the first version of a contract on provision of performances and services between CET 21 and CNTS (...)" (Exhibit C84).
267. As a result, CET 21 and CNTS concluded the May 1996 Agreement. This agreement expressly set forth in the preamble that its "purpose (...) is to specify the mutual rights and mutual obligations which arise to CET 21 as the party making and CNTS as the party accepting a contribution made under the memorandum of association of May 4, 1993, by which CNTS was established. The memorandum of association is not changed by this agreement". The agreement stated that CNTS had the authorization to "arrange" the television broadcasting operated on the basis of the License (Article 2(1); Exhibit R17).
268. The amendment to the MOA in November 1996 (Exhibit C59), as well as the conclusions of the October 1996 Agreement (Exhibit R21) and of the 1997 Agreement (Exhibits C29 and R22), were further steps of the same process consisting in specifying the legal relationship between CET 21, CME and CNTS in order to ensure the creation of a clear situation in observance of the Media Law.
269. In this respect, the October 1996 Agreement was mainly similar to the May 1996 Agreement, except for the new Article 1(3) providing that said agreement "does not affect the exclusive liability of CET 21 for the programming" under the Media Law. The amended Article 1.4.1(a) of the MOA stated that "the Company is granted the unconditional, irrevocable, and exclusive right to use and maintain the know-how and make it the subject of profit to the Company, in connection with the License, its maintenance, and protection". Finally, the 1997 Agreement further specified CNTS's activities by listing the scope of its business (Article 1(3)), and expressly stated that the contracts on the provision of services would be concluded by CNTS on behalf of CET 21 (Article 5(1) and (2)).

270. As they were based on an objective ground, i.e. the efforts to create a clear legal situation in compliance with the Media Law, and as there is no sufficient evidence that they were specifically targeted against foreign investment, the Media Council's actions leading to the changes to the MOA and the conclusion of the various agreements between CET 21 and CNTS did not constitute arbitrary and discriminatory measures.
271. This being said, neither CNTS nor CME raised any objections to this process to the Media Council. On the contrary, both CET 21 and CNTS fully collaborated. The letter sent by both companies to the Media Council on 4 October 1996 indeed constituted a proposal to take several steps "(...) for how to best and most quickly meet the parliamentary commission's demands and thus how to amicably resolve the prolonged differences which arose in addressing the legal situation concerning the arrangement of legal relationships between [CNTS] and CET 21 s.r.o., as well as around the cancellation of license conditions (...)" (Exhibit R19). These steps were, among others, the above mentioned amendment to the MOA and conclusion of the agreements between CET 21 and CNTS.
272. This collaboration took place despite the CME's awareness that their legal situation vis-à-vis CET 21 might be affected. In an memorandum dated 15 May 1996, Mrs. DeBruce of CME indeed expressed her concern with respect to the contemplated amendment to the MOA. All proposed amendments to the MOA and contracts between CET 21 and CNTS should be reviewed by legal counsel prior to be entered into (Exhibit C111).
273. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal holds that the Claimant acquiesced to the Media Council's above mentioned actions, and is in any event barred from making a claim deriving therefrom.
274. Finally, the Arbitral Tribunal notes that no sufficient evidence was offered that the damage claimed by Mr. Lauder in the present arbitration proceedings, i.e. the termination of the contractual relationship between CET 21 and CNTS on 5 August 1999 on the initiative of the former, was caused by the insistence of the Media Council on the respect of the Media Law in 1996 and 1997. On the contrary, such damage was the direct result of Mr. Železný's own behavior, which was not backed in 1996 or 1997 by the Media Council or any other organ of the Respondent. Regarding further the question of causality between the alleged acts of the Media Council and the damage claimed see above § 234 and 235.

5.5.2.4.2 The 15 March 1999 opinion of the Media Council

275. The Claimant especially draws the attention of the Arbitral Tribunal to the visit by Mr. Železný to the Media Council on 2 March 1999 (R97), the following letter of CET 21, signed by Mr. Železný to the Media Council on 3 March 1999 (C33) and the answer to the Media Council by its Chairman Josef Josefík of 15 March 1999, addressed to Mr. Železný “CEO of TV NOVA and Executive Director of CET 21” (C34). According to these documents, and especially the description of the oral discussion which took place between Mr. Železný and the Media Council, it is clear that the Media Council was informed of the differences between Mr. Železný as master of CET 21 and CNTS. It was clear that Mr. Železný wanted the support of the Media Council in his struggle to free CET 21, and therefore himself, from the restrictions of the arrangements with CNTS. Although not in all points but at least in one of the key issues, namely the exclusive nature of the agreements between CET 21 and CNTS, the Media Council clearly expressed its opinion that in the context of television broadcasting the “business relations between the operator of broadcasting and service organizations are built on a non-exclusive basis.”
276. This view would seem to be contrary to what the 1996 Agreements, which were discussed and agreed with the Media Council in 1996, with the very active participation of Mr. Železný, then wearing the two hats of CEO of both CNTS and CET 21 have stipulated. The question which this Arbitral Tribunal, however, has to decide is not whether the Media Council was allowed to send such a letter, but whether the sending of the letter constituted a breach of the Treaty obligations of the Respondent.

277. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the issuance of the Media Council's 15 March 1999 letter does not constitute an arbitrary measure and therefore cannot be considered as a breach of the Treaty.
278. As stated above (see 5.5.2.3 and 5.5.2.4.1), the Media Council was concerned with the fact that the unclear legal and factual situation may lead to a de facto transfer of the License to CNTS, in violation of the Media Law. The exclusive relationship between CET 21, the licensed broadcaster, and CNTS, its partner in the operation of TV Nova, was regarded with suspicion, because the Media Council was of the opinion that it presented the inherent danger of a de facto transfer of the License.
279. The Media Council's view on this issue was expressed, for instance, in its opinion to the Permanent Media Commission of the House of Deputies of the Parliament of 19 September 1999 with respect to the dispute between CET 21 and CNTS. Chapter 4 reads as follows: "Each party has its own version of the heart of the issue based on a different interpretation of concluded agreements. CME insists on exclusivity and claims that CET 21 is obliged to broadcast exclusively through CNTS whereas CET 21 denies exclusivity and claims its right to conclude service agreements with any companies it pleases. As in the past, the Council's position in this matter is closer to the opinion that an exclusive relationship between the license holder and a service company is not desirable as it gives an opportunity to manipulate with the license" (Exhibit C68). The Media Council also expressed its view on this issue in the supplementary report of 15 November 1999 to the same Commission: "Administrative proceedings to revoke a license can be started only in the event of serious violation of the Broadcasting Act, and there must be provable reasons for them. Interrupting the cooperation of two private companies is not such a reason, and in addition, the council considers the exclusive relationship between the broadcaster and the only service organization as undesirable, due to the danger of a hidden transfer of the license" (Exhibit R126).
280. The disputed 15 March 1999 letter to CET 21 contained the following statement: "Business relations between the operator of broadcasting and service organizations are built on a nonexclusive basis. Exclusive relations between the operator and the service organization may result in de facto transfer of some functions and rights pertaining to the operator of broadcasting and, in effect, a transfer of the license” (Exhibit C34).

281. This statement is to be replaced in the context of the letter, which expressed the Media Council’s opinion on the requirements of the Media Law with respect to television broadcasting: “Because the Council was also asked by the Parliamentary Media Committee to issue an opinion on whether commercial television broadcasting complies with the Act on Broadcasting and valid licenses, we would like to summarize requirements that, in our opinion, express the contents of television broadcasting: (...).” Beside the list of said requirements, among them the above mentioned statement on regarding the exclusive relationship, the letter also explained the reason for terminating the administrative proceedings against CNTS for unauthorized broadcasting, and requested CET 21 to inform the Media Council about the implementation of the various changes with respect to the legal relationships between CET and CNTS, and to submit the current program composition and broadcasting schedule.
282. Although the statement about the non exclusive basis of the relationship between the holder of the license and the service organization might be viewed as a change of the previous position of the Media Council with respect to this issue, because the Media Council had been satisfied with the amendment of the MOA and the various 1996 and 1997 agreements between CET 21 and CNTS, which all stated the exclusive basis of the relationship between the two companies, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that it does not constitute a “measure” within the meaning of the Treaty, but merely expresses the general opinion of a regulatory body regarding the proper interpretation which should be given to the Media Law.
283. This letter was not aimed at having, and could not have, any legal effect. Condition 17 to the License, which required CET 21 to submit to the Media Council for approval any change in the MOA, had been cancelled end of 1996 (Exhibits R57 and C30). Since then, the Media Council had no authority to approve or disapprove any modification to the relationship between CET 21 and CNTS.

284. Since the Media Council's 15 March 1999 letter to CET 21 did not amount to a "measure", the Respondent did not violate the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures.
285. The Arbitral Tribunal also considers that said letter was neither arbitrary nor discriminatory. There indeed existed reasonable grounds, even if not necessarily conclusive, for the Media Council to view the existence of an exclusive relationship between CET 21 and CNTS as a danger of a de facto transfer of the License.
286. In addition, the Media Council remained independent from the dispute between CET 21 and CNTS. The 15 March 1999 letter was indeed significantly different from the request for said letter filed by CET 21 on 3 March 1999. In particular, the Media Council's letter did not reproduce CET 21's statement that the operator, i.e. CET 21, "should order services from service organizations at regular prices so as to respect rules of equal competition", nor the statement that "[f]or the level of provided services to agree with the terms of the license and Czech regulatory requirements, the licensed subject must have the ability to select relevant services anytime and anywhere at will" (Exhibit C33). Those differences between CET 21's request and the Media Council's letter show that the latter did not just follow the wishes Mr. Železný, who controlled CET 21 at that time.
287. In this respect, the Arbitral Tribunal notes that the Claimant or the entities he controls did not commence any administrative or other proceedings before the appropriate courts of the Czech Republic in the course of which the issue of the overall attitude of the Media Council in this affair, mainly its alleged contradictory interpretation of the Media Law, could be addressed and decided. The Arbitral Tribunal considers that these proceedings do not constitute the appropriate forum to decide on hypothetical questions of the interpretation of the Media Law.
288. The Arbitral Tribunal also considers that the issuance of the Media Council's 15 March 1999 letter was not the cause of the damage incurred by the Claimant. Although this letter might have strengthened the resolve of Mr. Železný to break up the relationship between CET 21 and CNTS, it was not used to achieve this purpose. CET 21 did not terminate the 1997 Agreement on the basis that it provided for an exclusive relationship with CNTS whereas the Media Council expressed the view such a relationship was undesirable. The legal reason for the termination was that CNTS had failed to submit a television program (Daily Log) on time, a requirement under the 1997 Agreement. Furthermore, there is no evidence that even if the Media Council had not written the 15 March 1999 letter, CET 21 would not have tried to terminate the 1997 Agreement on the ground of breach of contract.

5.53. The obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment

289. The Claimant alleges that the Respondent breached the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment to the Claimant's investments through the Media Council's reversal of critical prior approvals. This concerns the Media Council's proceedings in 1996 aimed at removing in the MOA the provision giving CNTS the exclusive right to use, benefit from and maintain the License. Furthermore the Claimant asserts that the Media Council demonstrated hostile conduct towards CNTS, by the totality of its other actions and inactions that undermined the rights which had been provided to CNTS (Reply Memorial, p. 81; Summary of Summation, p. 13).
290. The Claimant argues that the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment has its basis in the general principle of good faith. The State bound by the Treaty must indeed pursue the stated goal of achieving a stable framework for investment. The minimum requirement is that the State not engage in inconsistent conduct, e.g. by reversing to the detriment of the investor prior approvals on which he justifiably relied. Such a requirement is independent of the State's domestic law, i.e. the obligation to provide fair and equitable investment can be violated even if the State complied with the requirements under its domestic law. In addition, it is not relevant whether domestic investors in the same field received the same treatment as the foreign investor, since the level of protection may be different under domestic law and under the Treaty (Reply Memorial, p. 77-83; Mr. Kiernan's oral closing submissions, p. 161-168).

291. The Respondent argues that there exists no precise definition of the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment. What is fair and equitable is to be determined on the basis of the facts in each individual case. Anyway, this obligation is concerned with the conduct of the State, not with the results of the investments. Therefore, the fact that the investor loses money does not indicate that the State has breached the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment. There is no evidence of a violation of this obligation by the Czech Republic. Up to 1997, the Media Council was indeed seeking to monitor and enforce the Media Law in the face of growing concern that CNTS was breaching it. The Media Council did not discriminate against the Claimant in favor of nationals, did not reverse prior express permissions, and did not maliciously misapply the law. Between 1997 and 1999, the Media Council did not want to take sides with respect to the dispute between CET 21 and CNTS, which was considered a commercial dispute. In particular, the Media Council's letter of March 15, 1999, whose wording is different from the one requested by Mr. Železný, expressed the Media Council's policy in a lawful and non-discriminatory manner (Response, p. 55; Written Closing Submissions, p. 10-11).
292. Article II(2)(a) of the Treaty sets forth that "[i]nvestments shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatments, (...)". As with any treaty, the Treaty shall be interpreted by reference to its object and purpose, as well as by the circumstances of its conclusion (Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, Articles 31 and 32). The preamble of the Treaty states that the Parties agree "that fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective utilization of economic resources". The Arbitral Tribunal notes that there is no further definition of the notion of fair and equitable treatment in the Treaty. The United Nations Conference On Trade And Development has examined the meaning of this doctrine. Fair and equitable treatment is related to the traditional standard of due diligence and provides a "minimum international standard which forms part of customary international law" (U.N. Conference On Trade & Development: Bilateral Investment Treaties In The Mid-1990s at 53, U.N. Doc. UNCTAD/ITE/IIT/7, U.N. Sales No. E.98.II.D.8 (1998) (English version). In the context of bilateral investment treaties, the "fair and equitable" standard is subjective and depends heavily on a factual context. It "will also prevent discrimination against the beneficiary of the standard, where discrimination would amount to unfairness or inequity in the circumstances” (U.N. Conference On Trade & Development: Fair And Equitable Treatment, Vol. III at 10,15, U.N. Doc. UNCTAD/ITE/IIT/II, U.N. Sales No. E.99.11.D.15 (1999) (English version)).

293. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that none of the actions and inactions of the Media Council, which have already been examined with respect to the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures (see above 5.5.2), constitutes a violation of the duty to provide fair and equitable treatment.
294. In order to avoid redundancy, the Arbitral Tribunal mainly refers to the developments made under the chapter addressing the issue of the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures, for most of the arguments denying the existence of any arbitrary and discriminatory measure from the Czech Republic as from 1996 also apply to the Respondent’s compliance with the obligation to provide fair and equitable treatment.
295. This being said, the Arbitral Tribunal does not see any inconsistent conduct on the part of the Media Council which would amount to an unfair and inequitable treatment.
296. In particular, the initiation of the administrative proceedings for unauthorized broadcasting in 1996 was not inconsistent with any prior conduct of the Media Council. At that time, the Media Council had objective reasons to think that CNTS was violating the Media Law, i.e. that it was the broadcaster of TV Nova in lieu of CET 21, the holder of the License. The Media Council’s duties were, among others, to ensure the observance of the Media Law.
297. There can not be any inconsistent conduct in a regulatory body taking the necessary actions to enforce the law, absent any specific undertaking that it will refrain from doing so. No such undertaking was given by the Media Council or any other organ of the Czech Republic.
298. The prior approval by the Media Council of the MOA, in the context of the License being granted to CET 21, contained no commitment to allow CET 21 and CNTS to violate the Media Law. On the contrary, the License expressly stated that “[t]he license holder (...) also agrees to observe the conditions stated in the appendix to this license". Condition 1 to the License set forth that "[t]he license holder agrees (...) that its broadcasting will be in accordance with the laws of the Czech Republic and the international obligations of the Czech Republic. Broadcasting will, in particular, observe (...) the provisions of Act no. 468/1991 Coll., on operating radio and television (...)" (Exhibit R5). The amendment to the Media Law did not change anything with respect to CET 21's obligation to comply with the Media Law.

299. The administrative proceedings against CNTS for unauthorized broadcasting was not initiated on the ground that CNTS would have abided by the previously approved MOA, which would itself then be considered as violating the Media Law. As already stated, the reason for commencing such proceedings was the Media Council's concern that CNTS was operating the broadcasting of TV Nova in violation of the License and of the Media Law.
300. Regarding the changes to the legal relationships between CET 21 and CNTS, i.e. the amendment to the MOA and the conclusion of the various agreements between the two companies, there was also no inconsistent conduct on the part of the Media Council.
301. At no time did the Media Council decide that the approval of the original MOA was deemed null and void, and that any guarantee given to CET 21 and CNTS at that time had to be withdrawn. As stated above (see 5.5.2.4.1), all changes to the legal relationships between CET 21 and CNTS made in 1996 and 1997 were aimed at specifying, not altering, the content of said relationships in order to ensure a clear situation in observance of the Media Law.
302. Furthermore, CET 21, CNTS and CME fully cooperated to this process, after being given proper legal advice on the various issues addressed.
303. Finally, the issuance of the 15 March 1999 letter by the Media Council, although in some way in contradiction with the previously approved MOA on the question of the exclusive nature of the contractual relationship between CET 21 and CNTS, was nothing more than an opinion without any legal effect. It did not alter - and was not aimed at altering – the contractual relationships between the two companies, which remained governed by the 1997 Agreement then in force.

304. In addition, the Arbitral Tribunal is of the opinion that the 15 March 1999 letter was not the direct cause of the damage allegedly suffered by the Claimant. Any damage resulted from the decision of CET 21, controlled by Mr. Železný, to terminate the 1997 Agreement with CNTS. CET 21 made no use of the 15 March 1999 letter. There is no evidence that CET 21 would not have terminated the contractual relationships with CNTS if the Media Council had not issued the 15 March letter, or, for argument's sake, had stated that it was of the opinion that an exclusive relationship between the two companies fully complied with the Media Law. With respect to causality in general see above § 234 and 235.

5.5.4 The obligation to provide full protection and security

305. The Claimant alleges that the Respondent failed to provide full protection and security to his investment (i) by forcing a change in the Media Law, (ii) by initiating the administrative proceedings against CNTS in 1996, (iii) by subsequent pressures to bring about the restructuring of CNTS, (iv) by issuing the 15 March 1999 letter, (v) by refusing all CNTS's requests to halt CET 21's dismantling of all dealings with the former, and (vi) by authorizing a share capital increase in CET 21 with knowledge that it would frustrate the ICC arbitral panel's interim order and would defy an express contrary request from Parliament (Reply Memorial, p. 85).

306. The Claimant argues that the obligation of full protection and security requires that the State take all steps necessary to protect foreign investments whatever the requirements of domestic law are and regardless of whether the threat to the investment arises from the State's own actions. The State has an obligation of vigilance under which it must take all measures necessary to ensure the full enjoyment of protection and security of the foreign investment (Memorial, p. 55; Reply Memorial, p. 83-85).

307. The Respondent argues the obligation of full protection and security is not an absolute obligation. A State is only obliged to provide protection which is reasonable under the circumstances. Furthermore, the obligation is limited to the activities of the State itself, and does not extend to the activities of a private person or entity. There can also be no legitimate expectation that there will not be any regulatory change (Response, p. 57-59).
308. Article II(2)(a) of the Treaty provides that "[i]nvestment (...) shall enjoy full protection and security". There is no further definition of this obligation in the Treaty. The Arbitral Tribunal is of the opinion that the Treaty obliges the Parties to exercise such due diligence in the protection of foreign investment as reasonable under the circumstances. However, the Treaty does not oblige the Parties to protect foreign investment against any possible loss of value caused by persons whose acts could not be attributed to the State. Such protection would indeed amount to strict liability, which can not be imposed to a State absent any specific provision in the Treaty (Dolzer and Stevens, Bilateral Investment Treaties, p. 61).
309. The Arbitral Tribunal holds that none of the facts alleged by the Claimant constituted a violation by the Respondent of the obligation to provide full protection and security under the Treaty.
310. Here again, in order to avoid redundancy, the Arbitral Tribunal refers to the findings made under the chapter addressing the issue of the prohibition against arbitrary and discriminatory measures (see above 5.5.2), for most of the arguments denying the existence of any arbitrary and discriminatory measure from the Czech Republic as from 1996 also apply to the Respondent's compliance with the obligation to provide full protection and security.
311. In particular, as regards the amendment to the Media Law in late 1995, effective on 1 January 1996, there is no evidence that such amendment, enacted by the Czech Parliament, was forced by the Media Council. Furthermore, the change in the Media Law did not constitute a danger for the Claimant's investment in the Czech Republic. In particular, the deletion of Article 12(3) authorizing the Media Council to include conditions to the grant of a license was not aimed at, nor suited to, destroying

Mr. Lauder's investment. On the contrary, such a change was favorably viewed by the entities operating TV Nova, since CET 21, represented by Mr. Železný, who was at that time on the side of the Claimant, immediately applied to the Media Council for the cancellation of most of the Conditions set in the License, among others Condition 17 (Exhibit R31).

312. Furthermore, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that it is not the Media Council's role to halt the alleged dismantling by CET 21 of all its dealings with CNTS, nor to enforce an ICC arbitral tribunal interim order. In any event, if the Media Council had acted in violation of its own obligations in respect of these two issues, the present arbitration proceedings are not the proper forum to seek relief. The Claimant should have and in fact did initiate action before the competent administrative or civil courts of the Czech Republic.
313. In addition, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that none of the actions or inactions of the Media Council caused a direct or indirect damage to Mr. Lauder's investment. The action which actually caused the Claimant to lose part of his investment was the termination by CET 21 of its contractual relationship with CNTS in 1999. In other words, the business relationship between CET 21 and CNTS survived all the alleged actions and inactions of the Media Council. It so did until Mr. Železný changed sides and decided to act in favor of CET 21, which by 1999 he controlled, against CNTS in which he no longer had any direct or indirect control. Regarding the issue of causality for the alleged loss suffered by the Claimant see especially § 234 and 235 above.
314. The investment treaty created no duty of due diligence on the part of the Czech Republic to intervene in the dispute between the two companies over the nature of their legal relationships. The Respondent's only duty under the Treaty was to keep its judicial system available for the Claimant and any entities he controls to bring their claims, and for such claims to be properly examined and decided in accordance with domestic and international law. There is no evidence – not even an allegation – that the Respondent has violated this obligation. On the contrary, the numerous Czech court proceedings initiated by CNTS, CME and Mr. Lauder against CET 21 and Mr. Železný show that the Czech judicial system has remained fully available to the Claimant. In particular, the 4 May 2000 decision by the Regional Commercial Court in Prague that CET 21 was obligated to procure all services for television broadcasting exclusively through CNTS (Exhibit C54) is conclusive evidence of this availability. While this decision was later annulled by the High Court in Prague (Exhibit R134) an appeal is now pending before the Czech Supreme Court, which may still rule in favor of CNTS.

6. Costs

315. Article 38 of the UNCITRAL Rules states that the Arbitral Tribunal shall fix the costs of arbitration in its Award and defines the term "costs".
316. At the Hearing of 17 March 2000 the Parties and the Arbitrators agreed on the formula for the fees of the Arbitral Tribunal. The fees and travel and other expenses incurred by the Arbitrators are herewith fixed at United States Dollars 501'370.20
317. According to Article 40 of the UNCITRAL Rules, the costs of arbitration shall in principle be borne by the unsuccessful party. However, the Arbitral Tribunal may apportion such costs between the Parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable, taking into account the circumstances of the case. The same applies according to Article 40(2) with respect to the costs of legal representation and assistance. The Arbitral Tribunal can take into account the circumstances of the case and is free to determine which Party shall bear such costs or may apportioned such costs between the Parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable.
318. Among the circumstances the Tribunal has taken into account is its finding that the Respondent, at the very beginning of the investment by the Claimant in the Czech Republic, breached its obligations not to subject the investment to discriminatory and arbitrary measures when it reneged on its original approval of a capital investment in the licence holder and insisted on the creation of a joint venture. Furthermore, various steps were taken by the Media Council, especially, but not only, the 15 March 1999 letter to CET 21. Although the Arbitral Tribunal came to the conclusion that such acts did not constitute a violation of the Treaty obligations of the Respondent, the Claimant bona fide could nevertheless feel that he had to commence these arbitration proceedings. Furthermore, the behaviour of the Respondent regarding the discovery of documents, which the Claimant could rightly feel might shed more light on the acts of the Respondent, needs to be mentioned in this context.

319. Taking all these circumstances of the case into account, the Arbitral Tribunal comes to the decision that each Party shall pay one half of the fees and expenses of the Arbitral Tribunal and the hearing cost and bear its own costs for legal representation and assistance and the costs of its witnesses.

NOW THEREFORE THE ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL

DECIDES

1. It has jurisdiction to hear and decide this case.
2. The Respondent committed a breach of its obligation to refrain from arbitrary and discriminatory measures when in the Winter of 1993 it changed its original position, which had been made known to the Claimant and to the public at large, allowing an equity investment of the Claimant in CET 21, the holder of the licence to broadcast, and insisted that the participation of the Claimant could not be made in the form of an equity participation but only through a joint venture company.
3. The claim for a declaration that the Respondent committed further breaches of the Treaty are denied and all claims for damages are denied.

4. Each Party shall pay one half of the fees and expenses of the Arbitral Tribunal which are fixed at US$ 501'370.20
5. Each Party shall pay one half of the direct costs involved in the London Hearings, including room hire, cost of court reporters, etc.
6. Each Party shall carry its own costs for legal representation and assistance, including the travel and other expenses of witnesses presented by the respective Party.
7. All other claims are herewith dismissed.

LEGAL AUTHORITY CA-73

Arbitration CAS 2009/A/1782 Filippo Volandri v. International Tennis Federation (ITF), award of 12 May 2009

Panel: Mr Efraim Barak (Israel), President; Prof. Luigi Fumagalli (Italy); Prof. Ulrich Haas (Germany)

Tennis

Doping (Salbutamol)

CAS scope of review

Burden of proof

Degree of fault of the player

1. By adopting and implementing the principle of consistency with the WADAC and by adopting the commitment to “incorporate without any substantive changes” the provision of the WADAC which recognize inter alia the unrestricted scope of review of the CAS Panel as provided under R57 of the CAS Code, the 2008 ITF Programme actually solves by itself the question of the co-existence of its two apparently conflicting provisions regarding the CAS scope of review. In order to exercise its power of review (as apparently allowed by the 2008 ITF Programme), the CAS must be able to examine the formal aspects of the appealed decisions but also, above all, to evaluate – sometimes even de novo – all facts and legal issues involved in the dispute.
2. According to the ITF Programme, the fact that a player has established, on the balance of probabilities, how the specified substance entered his body and has also established, to the comfortable satisfaction of the hearing body, that his ingestion of the specified substance was not intended to enhance his sporting performance or to mask the use of another prohibited substance only allows the player to benefit from the possible elimination or reduction of the period of suspension but is irrelevant with regard to the occurrence or non occurrence of the adverse analytical finding. As the player has not offered any persuasive evidence of how the concentration found in his urine could be the result of the therapeutic use, he has not succeeded in discharging the onus on him and, hence, must be considered as having committed a doping offence.
3. The degree of a player's fault is minor if the threshold of 1,000 ng/mL is just exceeded. Furthermore, the fact that the player has never previously been found guilty of an anti-doping rule violation, and more importantly, the fact that the procedures before the IF were slow and suffered from inconsistencies, with the result that the player was left in a state of uncertainty of over 8 months before formally being charged with a doping offence, must be taken into account to assess the player's degree of fault. Such a long period is unacceptable and incompatible with the intention of the anti-doping regime that matters should be dealt with speedily.

Mr Filippo Volandri, born on 5 September 1981, is a professional tennis player of Italian nationality (the “Player”). He entered the top 50 in the world ranking in 2003 and obtained the best result of his career in 2007, when he reached the 25th place in the ATP world rankings.

The International Tennis Federation (ITF) is the international governing body for sports related to tennis worldwide. It has its registered seat in London, England.

The circumstances stated below are a summary of the main relevant facts, as established on the basis of the written submissions of the parties and the evidence examined in the course of the proceedings. Additional facts may be set out, where relevant, in connection with the legal discussion.

Since his early childhood, Mr Filippo Volandri has suffered from asthma induced by dust-mite, dog epithelium as well as by physical exercise. His treating physician was then Dr Fabrizio Gadducci, presently director of the Bronchopneumology and Respiratory Allergology Section of the Livorno Hospital, Italy.

When he first started his professional career as a tennis player, Mr Filippo Volandri did not take any medication for asthma nor did he seek any specific medical care.

Over the years, the Player’s condition worsened and required notably a treatment in the form of inhalation of Ventolin, a salbutamol-based asthma medicine, achieved through a metered-dose inhaler.

Salbutamol is included in the list of prohibited substances under the World Anti-Doping Code (WADC), which is incorporated in the ITF Tennis Anti-Doping Programme (the “ITF Programme”). The authorisation to take this substance for a legitimate medical need is treated differently depending on whether the 2008 or the 2009 ITF Programme is applicable. In the first case, the administration of salbutamol by inhalation requires an application for an abbreviated Therapeutic Use Exemption whereas in the second case, the submission for a standard Therapeutic Use Exemption is needed. Also, in the first case, salbutamol in a concentration greater than 1,000 ng/mL is a prohibited substance and not a specified substance, whereas in the second case, salbutamol, even in a concentration greater than 1,000 ng/mL, is qualified as a specified substance. However, both the 2008 and 2009 ITF Programmes provide that despite the granting of a Therapeutic Use Exemption (TUE), the presence of salbutamol in urine in excess of 1,000 ng/mL will be considered an adverse analytical finding unless the Athlete proves that the abnormal result was the consequence “of the therapeutic use of inhaled salbutamol” or “of the use of a therapeutic dose of inhaled salbutamol”.

In respect of his use of salbutamol, Mr Filippo Volandri was granted his first TUE in 2003. Since then he applied for TUEs every year.

Regarding the year 2006, Mr Filippo Volandri filed a submission for a TUE for the use of salbutamol by inhalation. This document is dated 8 December 2005 and the indicated dosage strength was 100 mcg to be administered by a metered-dose inhaler “if necessary”. On the application form, the box marked “once only” and the box marked “emergency” were ticked. The space provided to “indicate all relevant information to explain the emergency or the insufficient time to submit the TUE application” was filled in with the words “weezing e/o dispnea”.

On 8 December 2005, the International Doping Tests and Management of Lindigö, Sweden (IDTM) confirmed the receipt of Mr Filippo Volandri’s application, accepted it without reservation and drew the Player’s attention on the fact that “the dose, method and frequency of administration as it has been notified have to be followed meticulously!”.

On 1 December 2006, Mr Filippo Volandri applied for a TUE covering the year 2007 and permitting the use of salbutamol by inhalation. The indicated dosage strength was 200 mcg to be administered three times a day. On the application form, the box marked “once only” and the box marked “emergency” were also ticked. It is not disputed that this document was eventually accepted by the IDTM.

On 21 November 2007, Mr Filippo Volandri and Dr Fabrizio Gadducci signed a TUE application form for the year 2008. The prohibited substances concerned were formoterol and albuterol, which is another name for salbutamol. Regarding this last drug, the treatment foreseen consisted in two puffs of 100 mcg to be administered by inhalation twice daily. On the application form, the box marked “once only” and the box marked “emergency” were also ticked and the space provided to “indicate all relevant information to explain the emergency or the insufficient time to submit the TUE application” was filled in with the words “2 puffs if necessary”.

It is accepted by the parties as well as by the lower instance that the present case must be examined in the light of the content of the TUE application form signed by the Player on 21 November 2007 (the “TUE of November 2007”). It is undisputed that the subsequent management of this document by the IDTM is irrelevant.

On 19 November 2008, Mr Filippo Volandri signed a TUE, seeking permission to take montelukast, budesonide and salbutamol. With regard to the last substance, the indicated dosage strength was 2 puffs of 100 mcg to be administered by inhalation. The box related to the “frequency” of administration was filled with the words “Rescue” and “al bisogno”.

On 24 November 2008 and following his application, Mr Filippo Volandri received from the IDTM an approval for the therapeutic use of budesonide and salbutamol. This document is a fix-term authorisation for two years, effective from 21 November 2008 to 22 November 2010 and allows the Player to use salbutamol in a dosage of 200 mcg by inhalation, “as needed”. It is also stipulated that the dose, method and frequency of administration as notified have to be followed meticulously.

At the end of the year 2008, Mr Filippo Volandri was referred to an asthma specialist, Mr Pierluigi Paggiaro, Professor in Respiratory Medicine, at the University of Pisa, Italy, and member of the executive committee of the Global Initiative for Asthma. In a written statement made on 8 December 2008, Professor Pierluigi Paggiaro confirmed among other things that “In the last months, symptoms are present every day (2-3 times daily use of rescue medication) particularly during physical activity. (...) Therefore, we conclude for “Bronchial asthma with severe bronchial hyperresponsiveness” and we recommended the following therapeutic regimen: Budesonide. Viatrix 400 mcg, one inhalation in the morning and in the evening. Montelukast 10 mg, one tablet in the evening. Rescue salbutamol, 2 puffs when needed. Periodic evaluations of pulmonary function are recommended”.

In March 2008, Mr Filippo Volandri was participating in an ATP Tour tournament, which took place in Indian Wells, California, United-States.

In the morning of 13 March 2008, at about 2:30, Mr Filippo Volandri was awakened by what he says to be the most serious asthma attack of his life. This happened just a few hours before his first match in the tournament, which was scheduled for the early afternoon of the same day.

Some details of this incident can be found in the transcript of the hearing held before the ITF Independent Anti-Doping Tribunal on 7 January 2009:

Filippo Volandri

I used Ventolin every 20 minutes up to the situation getting back to normal.

Jonathan Taylor

Do you remember how many puffs you had to take to get the situation back to normal?

Filippo Volandri

No, I don't recall the number exactly.

(...)

Jonathan Taylor

I'm not asking you exactly for how many puffs you think it took to get you back to normal, but one can try and narrow the range, so would it have been more than four?

Filippo Volandri

I don't feel I can answer that question because I don't remember when exactly it happened when I wake up, so I'm not really entirely awake yet and I can't actually count them sometimes. It was a situation which started during the night.

Jonathan Taylor

...any range, it would have been something between zero and ten, it would have been something between 20 and 30, or you just simply can't say?

Filippo Volandri

I cannot say, but it's between zero and ten, I would say (...)”.

Transcript: pages 48 and 49

“Filippo Volandri

What I remember was that this attack began in the middle of the night as usually happens. It was perhaps half past two/three o'clock in the morning I woke up due to this attack. The attack woke me up and I wasn't breathing well. I didn't wake up to say go to the toilet and then realise that I wasn't breathing well. I woke up because I was not breathing well. I began using Ventolin as had been explained to me by my physician, one or two puffs every 15 to 20 minutes. I was a little concerned about the situation, I called my trainer because it was the first time that such a serious attack had taken place, and apart from the fact that my trainer could not help me, he came to me for support. I continued using Ventolin, he came to my room approximately an hour later because we were sleeping in different hotels. I continued with the Ventolin, also following his own advice, he noticed that my medical situation was not normal, and around four/half past four in the morning the situation normalised and my trainer left my room. One of his pieces of advice was, 'Let's call a doctor,' then luckily there was no need for this.

(...)

Jonathan Taylor

First of all you say you were taking – would it be two puffs every 15 to 20 minutes?

Filippo Volandri

Yes.

Jonathan Taylor

In this period did you do that throughout? So in every 15/20 minutes you took two puffs, or were there sometimes longer gaps?

Filippo Volandri

There were some longer gaps when the situation went back to normal, and then perhaps I had another small attack, but I'd say 15/20 minutes, or maybe when my coach arrived it was a longer gap, one hour, for instance. What I want you to understand is that in a situation like this, looking at the watch to see how long the gap is, is a bit unrealistic.

Jonathan Taylor

I'm trying to see if there's any way for us to getting the parameters of how many puffs. Let me see if I've got this right. The period lasted from about 2.30 to three, to four to 4.30, so that would be a maximum of two hours about?

Filippo Volandri

More or less, yes.

Jonathan Taylor

And during that time the trainer came and there was a gap then of about an hour when you didn't need to take any puffs? Did I understand that correct?

Filippo Volandri

More or less, yes. I repeat that it's hard to remember exactly because this happened last March, not last week, so it's difficult to remember the times. I can give you a general timeframe, but I cannot be more precise than this".

In the briefs filed on behalf of Mr Filippo Volandri with the ITF Independent Anti-Doping Tribunal and with the Court of Arbitration for Sport, it is stated that when his coach joined the Player in his hotel room, he found the latter "gasping for breath".

On 13 March 2008, just after the loss of his first game in two straight sets, Mr Filippo Volandri was subject to in-competition doping testing. On the doping control form, the Player indicated the correct number of his TUE as well as the use of Ventolin.

It is undisputed that the WADA-accredited laboratory in Montreal, Canada, was instructed to conduct the analysis of Mr Filippo Volandri's urine sample and that, on 9 April 2008, it identified in the Player's A sample the presence of salbutamol in a concentration of 1,167 ng/mL (without taking into account the measurement uncertainty of 87 ng/mL).

It is only on 25 July 2008 (three and a half months after the finding on the A sample and four and a half months after the doping test), that Mr Stuart Miller, the ITF technical manager, notified in writing the Player of the result of the A sample analysis and asked him documented explanations with regard to the said concentration of 1,167 ng/mL.

The same day, the Player sent to Mr Stuart Miller an e-mail with the following justification: "the reason why the level of salbutamol on my urine collected during the last Indian Wells was a bit higher, is that due to a strong attack of allergy caused by the dust of the carpet I had to use more Ventolin, the inhalation spray with salbutamol. I use as therapeutic treatment. I had to do that because I couldn't breath well, especially with that hot temperature".

It then took the ITF another almost two months to refer to the Player's letter. By courier dated 18 September 2008, Mr Stuart Miller acknowledged receipt of the Player's e-mail and explained that his clarifications were insufficient. On this letter, that was sent six months after the event, Mr Miller requested Mr Filippo Volandri to provide details on a) the time at which he last urinated prior to providing sample on 13 March 2008, b) the time(s) at which he used his inhaler on 13 March 2008 and c) the number of puffs he took on each of those occasions. In particular, Mr Stuart Miller stated that "if the Review Board finds that you have no case to answer, you will be informed and no further action will be taken. If the Review Board finds that you have a case to answer, then you will be charged with commission of a Doping Offence under Article C.1 of the Programme".

On 22 September 2008, the Player answered to Mr Stuart Miller by e-mail, referring to his TUE and confirming notably the following:

"I wouldn't be honest, Dr Stuart, if I try to answer to the 3 questions you sent me in the letter, as I have no chance to remember when I urinated before the one connected to the fact, or the times I used the inhaler on 13 March 2008.

The only thing I can perfectly remember is that the temperature at the tennis centre was terrible, and I had to use the inhaler several times in those days, also during the night because of the dust of the carpet in my room. I had so many problems to breath and sleep.

I had to do that otherwise I would have called the hospital”.

In a letter dated 8 October 2008 and addressed to Mr Filippo Volandri, Mr Staffan Sahlström of IDTM, presented himself as the Anti-Doping Programme Administrator of the ITF Programme appointed by the ITF “to administer various aspects of the Programme”. Mr Staffan Sahlström informed the Player that a confirmatory analysis was going to be carried out on his B sample. He also reported to the Player that he or his representative could attend the opening of the B sample. The letter also reads as follow:

“No Provisional Suspension

For the avoidance of any doubt, (1) you have not yet been formally charged with the commission of a Doping Offence; and (2) unless and until you are charged and you have formally admitted committing a Doping Offence, or you have been found by Anti-Doping Tribunal to have committed a Doping Offence, you will not be deemed to have committed such an offence. Nor will any provisional period of ineligibility be imposed upon you and you will remain free to compete. (See Article J.4.1 of the Programme).

However, in the event that you are subsequently found to have committed a Doping Offence, and a period of Ineligibility is imposed, any period after the date of receipt of this letter during which you have voluntarily foregone any form of involvement in Competitions will be credited against the total period of any Ineligibility that you have to serve. (See Article M.8.3 of the Programme)”.

On 16 October 2008, the WADA accredited laboratory in Montreal, Canada, conducted the confirmatory analysis on the Player’s B sample and corroborated the presence of salbutamol in a concentration of 1,192 ng/mL.

By letter dated 13 November 2008, Mr Stuart Miller notified Mr Filippo Volandri that he was charged with commission of a doping offence within the meaning of article C.1 of the ITF Programme. The letter also indicates the potential consequences of a doping offence: Disqualification of the results obtained at the Indian Wells tournament; disqualification of the results obtained in Covered Events since 13 March 2008; imposition of ineligibility for a period of two years.

Between the period following the 2008 edition of the Indian Wells tournament and the notice of charge dated 13 November 2008, Mr Filippo Volandri took part in several tennis tournaments and was selected for three doping controls:

On 7 January 2009, a hearing was held before the ITF Independent Anti-Doping Tribunal (the “ITF Tribunal”).

On 15 January 2009, the ITF Tribunal passed a decision (the “Appealed Decision”), in which it concluded that the ITF had sufficiently established the objective elements of a violation of the applicable ITF Programme, i.e. the presence of salbutamol in the Player’s A sample in a concentration of 1,167 ng/mL, which amounts to an adverse analytical finding.

In its decision, the ITF Tribunal held that “Our best estimate on the basis of the evidence we have is that [Mr Filippo Volandri] probably took between 10 and 20 puffs overall. It was common ground that one puff corresponds to 100 mcg of salbutamol. Therefore the amount taken corresponds, in our estimation, to between 1,000 and 2,000 mcg”. Based on these findings, it concluded that the Player took too much salbutamol. It was fortified in its conclusion “by the fact that the player did not adduce any scientific evidence to show that the amount of salbutamol which he took, according to his best estimate, could have produced a concentration of 1,167 ng/ mL in his urine 8-18 hours later”.

The ITF Tribunal accepted that Mr Filippo Volandri inhaled salbutamol and did not ingest it in any other way. However, it held that the Player did not meet his burden of proof that his use of salbutamol on 13 March 2008 was therapeutic or in compliance with the TUE of November 2007, according to which salbutamol was to be administered daily with 2 times two puffs of 100 mcg, plus “2 puffs if necessary”. The ITF Tribunal found that the reference to inhalation of salbutamol “if necessary” must be interpreted in line with an objective approach, which requires treating as therapeutic only doses of salbutamol which do not exceed what is regarded as necessary and appropriate treatment, according to accepted medical opinion. The ITF Tribunal held that the appropriate treatment is to be found in the guidelines issued by the Global Initiative for Asthma, as revised in 2007, known as the “GINA guidelines”. In the view of the circumstances and in the presence of a severe asthma attack qualified by the Player himself as life threatening, the ITF Tribunal was of the opinion that the GINA guidelines commended the Player to seek care in a clinic or a hospital. “He decided not to do so. Instead, he called his coach and opted to deal with the situation by inhaling salbutamol, apparently without imposing any limit on himself. (...) If this were acceptable, the player himself would become the judge of what is therapeutic, even though he is not medically qualified. We do not think that can be right. The issue must be judged by reference to accepted medical opinion, not the player’s subjective and medically uninformed view of what dose is therapeutic”.

With regard to the sanction imposed upon Mr Filippo Volandri, according to the 2009 ITF Programme, the ITF Tribunal, applying the lex mitior principle, accepted that salbutamol is a specified substance and that it had not been used to enhance sport performance or to mask the use of a performance enhancing substance. It held that the Player was at fault for inhaling too much salbutamol. It found fair not to disqualify the Player’s results (including ranking points and prize money) obtained before the Manerbio tournament, as he was not aware of any problem arising from the test done at the 2008 edition of the Indian Wells tournament. “However, by 18 August 2008 when the player next competed at Manerbio, he had had sufficient time to obtain some advice about the adverse A sample result, including on the question of whether to cease competing. [The ITF Tribunal] consider[s] that fairness does not require his results in competitions from then onwards to remain undisturbed”.

On 15 January 2009, the ITF Tribunal decided the following:

- (1) confirms the commission of the doping offence specified in the notice of charge set out in the ITF’s letter to the player dated 13 November 2008; namely that a prohibited substance, salbutamol, has been found to be present in the urine sample that the player provided at Indian Wells on 13 March 2008;*
- (2) finds that the player has failed to establish on the balance of probabilities that the abnormal test result was the consequence of the player’s therapeutic use of inhaled salbutamol;*
- (3) orders that the player’s individual result must be disqualified in respect of the Indian Wells tournament, and in consequence rules that the prize money and ranking points obtained by the player through his participation in that event must be forfeited;*
- (4) orders, further, that the player’s individual results (including ranking points and prize money) in competitions including and subsequent to the Manerbio competition on 18 August 2008 shall be disqualified and all prize money and ranking points in respect of those competitions shall be forfeited;*
- (5) orders, however, that the player’s results (including ranking points and prize money) in all competitions subsequent to the Indian Wells tournament up to and including the Cordenons competition on 28 July 2008 shall remain undisturbed;*

(6) finds that the player has succeeded in establishing to the comfortable satisfaction of the Tribunal that his use of the prohibited substance leading to the positive test result in respect of the sample taken on 13 March 2008 was not intended to enhance his sport performance;

(7) declares that the player shall be ineligible for a period of three months (i.e. calendar months) starting on 15 January 2009 and expiring at midnight London time on 14 April 2009 from participating in any capacity in any event or activity (other than authorised anti-doping education or rehabilitation programmes) authorised by the ITF or any national or regional entity which is a member of or is recognised by the ITF as the entity governing the sport of tennis in that nation or region”.

On 4 February 2009, Mr Filippo Volandri filed a statement of appeal and, on 13 February 2009, an appeal brief with the Court of Arbitration for Sport (CAS). It challenged the Appealed Decision of the ITF Tribunal, submitting the following request for relief:

principally: to acquit Filippo Volandri of the charge of having committed a doping offence as specified in the charge dated 13 November 2008, and as a consequence revoke the period of disqualification imposed, and declare that the player’s results (including ranking points and prize money), which have been revoked, be declared to be valid;*

alternatively: in the unlikely event that the player were still to be considered guilty of having committed a doping offence, to backdate the period of disqualification imposed, counting the period of voluntary suspension observed by the athlete, and as a result, declare that all of the player’s results (including ranking points and prize money) which have been revoked, be considered valid, and in any case, to reduce the period of disqualification, because it is excessive”.*

On 9 March 2009, the ITF submitted an answer containing the following prayers for relief:

“For the reasons set out above, the ITF respectfully submits that the Player has failed to make out any grounds for disturbing the Decision and that therefore the appeal should be dismissed in its entirety”.

A hearing was held on 26 March 2009 at the CAS premises in Lausanne.

LAW

CAS Jurisdiction

1. The jurisdiction of the CAS, which is not disputed, derives (a) from article 33 of the Articles of Association of ITF Limited, (b) from section O of the 2008 ITF Programme and (c) from article R47 of the Code of Sports-related Arbitration (the “CAS Code”). It is further confirmed by the order of procedure duly signed by the parties.
2. It follows that the CAS has jurisdiction to decide the present dispute.

Applicable law

3. Article R58 of the CAS Code provides the following:

“The Panel shall decide the dispute according to the applicable regulations and the rules of law chosen by the parties or, in the absence of such a choice, according to the law of the country in which the federation, association or sports-related body which has issued the challenged decision is domiciled or according to the rules of law, the application of which the Panel deems appropriate. In the latter case, the Panel shall give reasons for its decision”.

4. In the present case, it results from their respective submissions that the parties agree that the matter under appeal is governed by the rules and regulations of the ITF. In this respect and on 28 December 2007, Mr Filippo Volandri signed an agreement confirming that he would comply with and be bound “by all provisions of the 2008 ATP OFFICIAL RULEBOOK and the ATP Tour, Inc’s (“ATP”) By-Laws (the “ATP Rules”), including, but not limited to, all amendments to the ATP Rules”.

5. The 2009 ITF Programme reads as follows where relevant:

“A.5 The effective date of this Programme is 1 January 2009 (the “Effective Date”)

A.6 Transitional provisions:

A.6.1 The Programme shall apply in full to all cases where the alleged Doping Offence occurs after the Effective Date.

*A.6.2 Any case pending prior to the Effective Date, or brought after the Effective Date but based on a Doping Offence that occurred before the Effective Date, shall be governed by the predecessor version of the Programme in force at the time of the Doping Offence, subject to any application of the principle of lex mitior by the Anti-Doping Tribunal hearing the case”.*

6. It appears that the 2009 ITF Programme contains an express transitional provision, which clearly indicates that the 2008 ITF Programme remains applicable in the present proceedings because Mr Filippo Volandri’s case was pending before the 2009 ITF Programme came into force on 1 January 2009. However, article A.6 of the 2009 ITF Programme allows the ITF Independent Anti-Doping Tribunal as well as the CAS Panel to apply the lex mitior principle, i.e. the principle whereby a disciplinary regulation applies as soon as it comes into force if it is more favourable to the accused. This is a fundamental principle of law applicable and accepted by most legal regimes and which applies by analogy to anti-doping regulations in view of the quasi penal or at the very least disciplinary nature of the penalties that they allow to be imposed (CAS 2005/C/841, page 14; CAS 94/128, in Digest of CAS Awards (1986-1998), p. 477 at 491).
7. It follows that the ITF regulations, in particular the 2008 ITF Programme (subject to more favourable provisions to Mr Filippo Volandri under the 2009 ITF Programme) are applicable.

8. Article A.10 of the 2008 ITF Programme provides that it is governed by and shall be construed in accordance with English law, subject to article A.8, which requires the ITF Programme to be interpreted in a manner that is consistent with the WADC. The WADC prevails in the event of a conflict between its provisions and those of the ITF Programme.
9. The application of the (rules of) law chosen by the parties has its confines in the ordre public (Zürcher Kommentar zum IPRG/HEINI, 2nd edition 2004, Art. 187 marg. no. 18; see also KAUFMANN-KOHLER/RIGOZZI, Arbitrage International, 2006, marg. no. 657). Usually, the term ordre public is thereby divested of its purely Swiss character and is understood in the sense of a universal, international or transnational sense (KAUFMANN-KOHLER/RIGOZZI, Arbitrage International, 2006, margin no. 666; Zürcher Kommentar zum IPRG/HEINI, 2nd edition 2004, Art. 187 margin no. 18; cf. also PORTMANN, causa sport 2/2006 pp. 200, 203 and 205). The ordre public proviso is meant to prevent a decision conflicting with basic legal or moral principles that apply supranationally. This, in turn, is to be assumed if the application of the rules of law agreed by the parties were to breach fundamental legal doctrines or were simply incompatible with the system of law and values (TF 8.3.2006, 4P.278/2005 marg. no. 2.2.2; Zürcher Kommentar zum IPRG/HEINI, 2nd edition 2004, Art. 190 margin no. 44; CAS 2006/A/1180, no. 7.4; CAS 2005/A/983 & 984, no. 70).

Admissibility

10. The appeal was filed within the deadline provided by article O.4.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme. Furthermore, it complied with all other requirements of article R48 of the CAS Code.
11. It follows that the appeal is admissible.

Procedural motions – scope of review of the CAS

12. Article R57 of the CAS Code provides that “the Panel shall have full power to review the facts and the law”. Under this provision, the Panel’s scope of review is basically unrestricted. It has the full power to review the facts and the law and may even request the production of further evidence. In other words, the Panel not only has the power to establish whether the decision of a disciplinary body being challenged was lawful or not, but also to issue an independent decision (CAS 2004/A/607; CAS 2004/A/633; CAS 2005/A/1001; CAS 2006/A/1153).
13. The CAS Code contemplates a full hearing de novo of the original matter.
14. However, in the present case, the ITF submits a) that the power of review of the CAS Panel is limited by the applicable ITF regulations and b) that article R57 of the CAS Code applies only to the extent agreed by the parties, which did not accept the rules of arbitration fixed by the CAS Code in whole. The ITF alleges that the scope of review of the CAS is restricted to determining whether the Player has established that the ITF Tribunal's findings were erroneous based on all of the evidence before it at first instance.

15. To support its opinion, the ITF refers to article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme, which reads as follows:

16. The CAS Panel observes that the situation is not clear because of the confusion generated (a) by the apparent conflict between article O.2 and O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme and (b) by the unclear wording of article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme. However, the Panel is of the opinion that this unclear situation is actually and practically solved by the ITF Programme itself, as will be explained hereunder, by reference to other articles of the ITF Programme which leads to the conclusion that the unrestricted scope of review of the CAS Panel as provided under R57 of the CAS Code does not seem to be limited by article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme.

17. Pursuant to article O.2.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme “A decision that a Doping Offence has been committed, a decision imposing Consequences for a Doping Offence, a decision that no Doping Offence has been committed, a decision by the Review Board that there is no case to answer in a particular matter, a decision that the ITF lacks jurisdiction to rule on an alleged Doping Offence or its Consequences, may be appealed by any of the following parties exclusively to CAS, in accordance with CAS's Procedural Rules for Appeal Arbitration Procedures (...)”.
18. Article O.2.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme refers to the CAS Code without any restrictions or limitations, whereas article O.5.1 of the same Programme seems to limit, in certain circumstances, the CAS Panel's scope of review. At a first glance, the 2008 ITF Programme seems to offer no indication as to which of those two provisions should prevail or as to how they should co-exist. However, as will be further explained, this question is indeed solved within the framework of the 2008 ITF Programme itself.
19. This possible confusion was obviously noticed by the ITF which amended its 2009 ITF Programme by suppressing the reference to the “CAS's Procedural Rules for Appeal Arbitration Procedures” in its new article O.2.1.
20. Moreover, the ITF is a signatory to the WADC. Its 2008 Programme was adopted and implemented pursuant to the mandatory provisions of the WADC (Article A.2 of the 2008 ITF Programme). According to article A.8 of the 2008 ITF Programme, “The Programme shall be interpreted in a manner that is consistent with the [WADC] (...). In the case of a conflict between the Programme on the one hand and the mandatory provisions of the [WADC] (as referenced in the Introduction to the [WADC]) on the other hand, the mandatory provisions of the [WADC] shall prevail”.

21. In its Part One, the applicable WADC (the version approved in 2003 and effective 1 January 2004 to 31 December 2008) reads as follows where relevant: “While some provisions of Part One of the [WADC] must be incorporated essentially verbatim by each Anti-Doping Organization in its own anti-doping rules, other provisions of Part One establish mandatory guiding principles that allow flexibility in the formulation of rules by each Anti-Doping Organization or establish requirements that must be followed by each Anti-Doping Organization but need not be repeated in its own anti-doping rules. The following Articles, as applicable to the scope of anti-doping activity which the Anti-Doping Organization performs, must be incorporated into the rules of each Anti-Doping Organization without any substantive changes (allowing for necessary non-substantive editing changes to the language in order to refer to the organization’s name, sport, section numbers, etc.); Articles 1 (Definition of Doping), 2 (Anti-Doping Rule Violations), 3 (Proof of Doping), 9 (Automatic Disqualification of individual Results), 10 (Sanctions on Individuals), 11 (Consequences to Teams), 13 (Appeals) with the exception of 13.2.2, 17 (Statute of Limitations) and Definitions”.
  22. Article 13 of the WADC sets forth the appeal process applicable in case of decisions made under the WADC or rules adopted pursuant to the WADC. It specifies in great detail which decisions may be subject to appeal, and who is entitled to file an appeal. Pursuant to article 13.2.1 of the WADC, “In cases arising from competitions in an international Event or in cases involving International-Level Athletes, the decision may be appealed exclusively to the Court of Arbitration for Sport (“CAS”) in accordance with the provisions applicable before such court” (emphasis added).
  23. It is therefore the view of the CAS Panel that Art. A.8 of the 2008 ITF Programme, by adopting and implementing the principle of consistency with the WADAC and the ITF’s commitment hereunder to “incorporate (...) without any substantive changes”, inter alia, article 13 (Appeals) of that Code, actually solves by itself the question of the co-existence of these two articles and establishes the supremacy of Art. O.2.1. over Art. O.5.1.
- B. The ambiguous wording of article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme
24. The wording of article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme is ambiguous and leaves the Panel in a state of perplexity:
    - on the one hand, the said provision allows the CAS to review the appeal in the form of a de novo hearing only “where required in order to do justice”.
    - on the other hand, in all the other cases (i.e. where not required in order to do justice), the CAS must limit its scope of review to a “consideration of whether the decision being appealed was erroneous”.
  25. The concept of “in order to do justice” is illustrated in the Programme with just one example (i.e. “for example to cure procedural errors at first instance hearing”), which does not help to understand why the CAS Panel does not “justice” when/if it considers that the “decision being appealed was erroneous”.

26. However, the Panel is a fortiori allowed to review the Appealed Decision if it is arbitrary, i.e. if it severely fails to consider fixed rules, a clear and undisputed legal principle or breaches a fundamental principle. A decision may be considered arbitrary also if it harms in a deplorable way a feeling of justice or of fairness or if it is based on improper considerations or lacks a plausible explanation of the connection between the facts found and the decision issued. Likewise, the Panel is of the opinion that it must be able to review the Appealed Decision with regard to the fundamental rights of the Player. Any other interpretation would lead to possible abuse of process and of authority, which would be absolutely unacceptable and would represent a substantial and specific danger to sporting spirit. Furthermore, any agreement between the parties to restrict the powers of this Panel would have to be viewed critically in the light of the limitations imposed by the Swiss ordre public. Agreements between athletes and international federations are – in general terms – not concluded voluntarily on the part of the athletes but rather imposed upon them unilaterally by the federation (ATF 133 III 235, 242 et seq.). There is, therefore, a danger that a federation acts in excess of its powers unless the contents of the agreement does take sufficiently into account also the interests of the athlete. The Panel has some doubts whether a provision that restricts the Panel’s power to amend a wrong decision of a federation to the benefit of the athlete balances the interests of both parties in a proportionate manner.
27. In order to exercise such a review (as apparently allowed by the 2008 ITF Programme), the CAS must be able to examine the formal aspects of the appealed decisions but also, above all, to evaluate – sometimes even de novo – all facts and legal issues involved in the dispute.
28. The Panel wonders if the purpose of article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme is to prohibit the parties to bring before the CAS Panel new evidence which has not been presented to the ITF Tribunal. In this respect, the Panel observes that all the parties – including ITF – have filed various submissions and evidence after the hearing before the ITF Tribunal. Moreover, in the case at hand, there was no “evidential ambush” which might have given unfair advantages to one or the other party.
29. In the view of all the above and under the circumstances of the case and the findings of the Panel as explained hereunder, the unrestricted scope of review of the CAS Panel as provided under R57 of the CAS Code does not seem to be limited by article O.5.1 of the 2008 ITF Programme. Furthermore, at the present case, it is the view of the Panel that there are sufficient grounds to resolve the issue at stake (i.e. its scope of review) even within the framework of article O.5.1 as is.

Merits

30. In the view of the above, the main issues to be resolved by the Panel are:
  - a) Has a doping offence been committed?

- b) If the first question is answered in the affirmative, are the sanctions imposed by the ITF Tribunal upon the Player appropriate?

A. Has a doping offence been committed?

31. The following is undisputed:
- Mr Filippo Volandri suffers from asthma.
  - The presence of salbutamol in a concentration of 1,167 ng/mL was found in Mr Filippo Volandri's A sample collected on 13 March 2008. The analysis on the Player's B sample confirmed the presence of salbutamol in a concentration of 1,192 ng/mL.
  - The accuracy of the testing methods or the test results and positive findings are not contested. Mr Filippo Volandri did not try to allege the possible occurrence of a breach in the chain of custody.
  - The presence of salbutamol in urine in excess of 1,000 ng/mL is considered an adverse analytical finding unless the player proves that the abnormal result was the consequence "of the therapeutic use of inhaled salbutamol" or "of the use of a therapeutic dose of inhaled salbutamol".
  - The present case must notably be examined in the light of the content of the TUE of November 2007 irrespective of the subsequent management of this document by the IDTM. In this respect, it is not disputed that the indication "2 puffs if necessary" on the TUE of November 2007 must be interpreted in accordance with the GINA guidelines.
  - The GINA guidelines determine the appropriate treatment objectively admissible in terms of "therapeutic" (or "therapeutic dose" under the 2009 Programme) use of salbutamol.
32. In sum, the only question that arises is whether the concentration of salbutamol found in Mr Filippo Volandri's samples is consistent with the inhalation of the substance in accordance with the GINA guidelines.
33. Salbutamol is a rapid-acting inhaled beta2-agonist indicated for relief of bronchospasm during acute exacerbations of asthma and for pre-treatment of exercise-induced bronchoconstriction.
34. It is here interesting to note that according to the GINA guidelines, medications to treat asthma can be classified as controllers or relievers. Controllers are medication taken daily on a long-term basis to keep asthma under clinical control. Relievers are medications used "on a as-needed basis" that act quickly to reverse bronchoconstriction and relieve its symptoms.
35. It appears that the terms "as needed", "if necessary", "al bisogno" seen on the ATUE/TUE application forms filled on behalf of Mr Filippo Volandri are not just an easy to understand way of expression, but are actually used in medical terms and are consistent with the GINA guidelines.

36. The ITF has successfully established that the presence of salbutamol in Mr Filippo Volandri's samples was in a higher concentration than 1,000 ng/mL. Under the 2008 and 2009 ITF Programmes, the burden of adducing exculpatory circumstances is on Mr Filippo Volandri, who must prove that the abnormal result was the consequence "of the therapeutic use of inhaled salbutamol" (Par. S3, appendix 2 to the 2008 ITF Programme) or "of the use of a therapeutic dose of inhaled salbutamol".
37. The ITF Tribunal held that the asthma attack on 13 March 2008 was severe as it was potentially life threatening. It held that Mr Filippo Volandri a) took too much salbutamol and b) should have sought medical help as the Player's condition did not improve one hour after the beginning of the asthma attack. In particular, he relied on Dr Fabrizio Gadducci's statements according to which, if after the first hour, normal breathing was not restored, the patient should go to the hospital. The ITF Tribunal concluded that by not complying with those requirements, the Player did not respect the GINA guidelines and the use of salbutamol was therefore not "therapeutic". The ITF Tribunal was "fortified in that conclusion by the fact that the player did not adduce any scientific evidence to show that the amount of salbutamol which he took, according to his best estimate, could have produced a concentration of 1,167 ng/mL in his urine 8-18 hours later".
38. In the present case, Mr Filippo Volandri has established, on the balance of probabilities, how the specified substance entered his body. It is not contested that the positive findings are the result of the inhalation of salbutamol between 12 and 13 March 2008. It is also not challenged that the Player established, to the comfortable satisfaction of the hearing body, that his ingestion of the specified substance was not intended to enhance his sporting performance or to mask the use of another prohibited substance. However, those accepted facts only allow the Player to benefit from the possible elimination or reduction of the period of suspension (See article M.4 of the 2009 ITF Programme) but are irrelevant with regard to the occurrence or non occurrence of the adverse analytical finding.
39. It is Mr Filippo Volandri's burden to explain that the presence of salbutamol in a concentration of 1,167 ng/mL is consistent with the "therapeutic" use of the concerned specified substance. With this respect, Mr Filippo Volandri simply affirmed that, between 12 and 13 March 2008, he only took the amount of salbutamol recommended by the GINA guidelines. Based on the Pocket Guide for Asthma Management and Prevention revised in 2007 by the GINA, the Player submitted that there was an authorized intake of approximately 32 puffs of salbutamol in the 8-18 hours before the providing of his sample on 13 March 2008. The Player alleged that the concentration of salbutamol greater than the 1,000 ng/mL is the inevitable consequence of those puffs. However, he did not offer any scientific evidence whatsoever to support this position. In order to corroborate his allegations, he exclusively produced an "expert opinion" issued on 9 February 2009 by F., professor of forensic toxicology, at the institute of forensic medicine in Milan, Italy. This document contains no reference to any scientific literature, no technical data, no indication with regard to F.'s field of expertise or qualifications. The CAS Panel may take into consideration the declarations of F. as mere personal statements, with no additional evidentiary value. This is particularly true as F. was not present at the hearing. The Player chose, although he had the right to bring any witness before the Panel, not to invite him to the hearing, and, therefore, F. was not exposed to any cross-examination on his opinion by Counsel for the ITF, which should have been a minimum requirement in order to add some weight to his opinion which, as already mentioned, was not supported by any scientific literature, nor any technical data.

40. The CAS Panel considers that Mr Filippo Volandri did not offer any persuasive evidence of how the concentration of 1,167 ng/mL found in his urine could be the result of the therapeutic use of salbutamol. Based upon the evaluation of the foregoing facts, the Player has not succeeded in discharging the onus on him and, hence, must be considered as having committed a doping offence.

B. Are the sanctions imposed by the ITF Tribunal upon the Player appropriate?

a) The undisputed facts

- Under the 2008 ITF Programme, salbutamol in a concentration greater than 1,000 ng/mL was qualified as a prohibited substance. The presence of salbutamol in a player's specimen was sanctioned with a two-year period of ineligibility, unless the player could a) establish that the presence is consistent with a therapeutic use exemption (article C.1) and/or b) show "No Fault or Negligence" (article M.5.1) or "No Significant Fault or Negligence" (article M.5.2) or c) provide assistance in discovering or establishing a doping offence by another person (article M.5.3). There was no other provision in the 2008 Programme that could have given the ITF Tribunal discretion to depart from a two-year ban.
- Under the 2009 ITF Programme, salbutamol, even in a concentration greater than 1,000 ng/mL, is reclassified as "Specified Substances", meaning that the hearing body has discretion (assuming it accepted that the Player did not take the medication with intent to enhance his performance or mask the use of a performance-enhancing substance) to impose a sanction of anything from a reprimand up to a two-year period of ineligibility.
- It is accepted that, on the basis of article A.6 of the 2009 ITF Programme, salbutamol must be treated as a specified substance and that the regime of sanction implemented by the 2009 ITF Programme is applicable in the present case. Therefore, Mr Filippo Volandri is entitled to rely on article M.4 of the 2009 ITF Programme ("Elimination or Reduction of the Period of Ineligibility for Specified Substances under Specified Circumstances").
- The player has been able to establish how salbutamol entered his body and it is accepted that he inhaled the substance and did not ingest it in any other way. It is also not challenged that the player took salbutamol to treat his asthma and not to enhance his sporting performance. There is no question of masking the use of a performance-enhancing substance in the present case.
- In the event Mr Filippo Volandri is found guilty of a doping offence, his individual results in respect of the 2008 Indian Wells tournament must be disqualified, and in consequence, the prize money and ranking points obtained by him through his participation in that event must be forfeited.

b) In the case at hand:

41. The ITF Tribunal found that the “player was unwilling to speculate about how many puffs he took, even when pressed by Mr Taylor at the hearing. Our best estimate on the basis of the evidence we have is that he probably took between 10 and 20 puffs overall. It was common ground that one puff corresponds to 100 mcg of salbutamol. Therefore the amount taken corresponds, in our estimation, to between 1,000 and 2,000 mcg”.

42. Based on the foregoing, the ITF Tribunal concluded “In the present case, the player was at fault for inhaling too much salbutamol. He ought to have sought medical advice on what dose was therapeutic, just as he ought to have sought medical assistance if he felt his life was at risk”.

43. The CAS Panel considers the Appealed Decision of the ITF Tribunal as arbitrary, because it harms a feeling of justice and of fairness and because it lacks a plausible explanation of the connection between the facts found and the decision issued.

44. As a matter of fact, the first instance held that because Mr Filippo Volandri took between 10 to 20 puffs of salbutamol, he is “at fault for inhaling too much salbutamol”. This is inconsistent with the ITF Tribunal own findings according to which the GINA guidelines determine the appropriate treatment objectively admissible in terms of “therapeutic” use of salbutamol. Based on the said guidelines, Mr Filippo Volandri was allowed to take, during the relevant period of time, much more puffs than “between 10 to 20 overall” as accepted by the ITF Tribunal:

On 12 March 2008: 2 puffs evening as allowed by the TUE of November 2007

During asthma attack: 16 puffs 4 puffs every 20 minutes for the 1st hour as recommended by the GINA guidelines

10 puffs 2nd hour as recommended by the GINA guidelines

On 13 March 2008: 2 puffs morning as allowed by the TUE of November 2007

Total 32 puffs

45. The Player could have taken up to 32 puffs during the 8-18 hours before the providing of his samples. There is a considerable difference between the figures in accordance with the GINA guidelines and the figures taken into consideration by the ITF Tribunal. Thus, the lower instance has not ascertained objectively how the Player’s degree of fault has been calculated or on what basis it was founded.

46. The ITF Tribunal held that Mr Filippo Volandri should have sought medical help as the asthma attack was life threatening. It was of the opinion that by not going to the hospital, the Player did not follow the GINA guidelines. Further, it found that “that the player felt able to regain control of his breathing by using the inhaler, without calling for medical help, and that he used his inhaler to the extent needed to regain control of his breathing”.

47. Again, if “the extent needed to regain control of his breathing” amounts to 10-20 puffs, then the Player was within the limits set in the GINA guidelines.
48. Moreover, the life-threatening emergency justifying clinical assistance seems very difficult to assess as Mr Filippo Vollandri was by himself when the asthma attack occurred. Under those circumstances, the CAS Panel does not see how the ITF Tribunal is in a better position than the Player to decide what is right for him. It is accepted by the Player that he called his coach and asked the latter to come to his room. This validates the fact that the situation was somehow out of ordinary. It is also agreed that it was the worse asthma attack the Player has ever dealt with and that the coach suggested to go to the hospital. In contrast, Mr Filippo Vollandri obviously decided that he was able to take care of the problem. This is also in accordance with the GINA guidelines which seek to encourage self-management, that is, to give people with asthma the ability to control their own condition. It appears that after a couple hours, the situation went back to normal.
49. ITF submitted that after an hour following the beginning of the attack, the breathing of Mr Filippo Vollandri did not improve. In order to corroborate this allegation, it refers to the Player’s own brief according to which the coach found the latter “gasping for breath”. Here too, the only witnesses are the Player himself and his coach. At what precise time did the coach arrive? What does “gasping for breath” actually mean? Does it mean that the respiratory distress was greater than the one usually observed by asthmatic people under asthma attack? Was the coach impressed by a situation he is not familiar with? How much longer was the Player “gasping for breath” after the arrival of his coach? How many puffs did the Player take on the arrival of his coach? How is the life-threatening situation compatible with the fact that the only testimony on the event is the one of the Player who described it during his cross-examination in front of the ITF Tribunal in the words: “I was a little concerned about the situation?”, and how is the life-threatening situation compatible with the fact that the Player was able to play his match 8 hours later, and, most of all, with the fact that the coach left just an hour after he joined the Player in his room, i.e. less than two hours following the beginning of the asthma attack? Under such circumstances, how can the ITF Tribunal qualify the asthma attack as “severe” and not just “mild”? With this regard, and according to the GINA guidelines, milder exacerbations are defined by a reduction in peak flow of less than 20% and nocturnal awakening. Why does this definition not fit the events of the 13 March 2008?
50. The fact that the above questions, that could lead to a better understanding of the circumstances and the facts and to a more accurate assessment of the severance of the event, did not find an answer cannot be blamed on Mr Filippo Vollandri as he was informed of the positive findings only on 25 July 2008, that is more than 4 month after the sample collection. Despite of the facts that those questions remain unanswered, the ITF Tribunal felt comfortable to come to the conclusion that Mr Filippo Vollandri violated the Gina guidelines by not going to a hospital. It is obvious to the CAS Panel that the lower instance has assumed that the Player was at high risk of asthma-related death, which is arbitrary and purely speculative.

51. Furthermore, the ITF Tribunal has not explained how or why Mr Filippo Vollandri did not respect the GINA guidelines when “he probably took between 10 and 20 puffs overall” nor has it established that the Player had to get medical help. Under such circumstances, the CAS Panel does not see on what basis the ITF Tribunal imposed such harsh sanctions upon the Player.
52. As a result, the CAS Panel considers that it has no duty of deference towards the holdings of the ITF Tribunal.
53. The CAS Panel observes that Mr Filippo Vollandri was indeed at fault, as he has not been able to prove that the presence of salbutamol in his sample in excess of 1,000 ng/mL was the consequence “of the therapeutic use of inhaled salbutamol”. However, the degree of his fault is minor as the threshold of 1,000 ng/mL was just exceeded. If, as ascertained by the ITF Tribunal itself, one puff corresponds to 100 mcg of salbutamol, the litigious excess represents less than a couple of puffs. Furthermore, the CAS Panel cannot ignore the fact that the Player traveled all the way to California to take part in a tournament, that he was far from home, a few hours away from a match, in the very early morning. After having put all that effort into coming to play, it is understandable that Mr Filippo Vollandri decided not to go to the hospital as it would probably have kept him from playing.
54. However, in assessing the appropriate sanction, the CAS Panel also took the following factors into account. First, Mr Filippo Vollandri has never previously been found guilty of an anti-doping rule violation. This, of itself, is of comparatively little weight: the same point can be made for any first-time offender. Secondly, however, and more importantly, the CAS Panel has been concerned that the procedures before the ITF were slow and suffered from inconsistencies, with the result that the Player was left in a state of uncertainty of over 8 months, which is very long in sporting matters. As a matter of fact, it is only on 13 November 2008 that the Player was formally charged with a doping offence. Before then, Mr Filippo Vollandri received information from the ITF which is to some extent contradictory and may also be confusing:
  - The litigious samples collection occurred on 13 March 2008; the positive findings were known on 9 April 2008 but communicated to the Player on 25 July 2008. Between the sampling and the communication of its results, the Player was able to take part in 12 tournaments and to undergo 3 anti-doping tests (which were all negative).
  - On 25 July 2005, the Player was requested by the ITF to explain the presence of the important concentration of salbutamol found in his urine in March 2008. The same day, Mr Filippo Vollandri wrote to the ITF to give his version of the facts. It is only on 18 September 2008 that the ITF reacted to the Player’s mail. Between those two dates, the Player took part in at least four more tournaments.
  - On 8 October 2008, the Anti-Doping Programme Administrator of the ITF Programme wrote to the Player a letter with very ambiguous terms, which could easily be misleading: “For the avoidance of any doubt, (1) you have not yet been formally charged with the commission of a Doping Offence; and (2) unless and until you are charged and you have formally admitted committing a Doping Offence, or you have been found by Anti-Doping Tribunal to have committed a Doping Offence, you will not be deemed to have committed such an offence. Nor will any provisional period of ineligibility be imposed upon you and you will remain free to compete. (See Article J.4.1 of the Programme)” (emphasis added).

- Finally a notice of charge was addressed to Mr Filippo Volandri on 13 November 2008. Between 18 September and 13 November 2008, the latter played in three more tournaments.
55. Although the ITF knew of the adverse analytical findings, it chose not to inform Mr Filippo Volandri and to let the latter take part in 19 tournaments before formally charging him with a doping offence. Such a long period is unacceptable and incompatible with the intention of the anti-doping regime that matters should be dealt with speedily. The Panel was taken aback when it saw that on 18 September 2008 (more than 6 months after the sampling collection) the ITF requested Mr Filippo Volandri to provide details on a) the time at which he last urinated prior to providing sample on 13 March 2008, b) the time(s) at which he used his inhaler on 13 March 2008 and c) the number of puffs he took on each of those occasions. It is obvious that the Player was not in the position to answer to such questions precisely, because of ITF’s fault and was therefore deprived of the right to fair evidence proceedings, which emerges from the right to be heard, the right to a fair trial and the principle of equal treatment, which are fundamental and which were disregarded in the present case.
56. Based on the above considerations, the Panel is of the opinion that fairness requires that a) a reprimand is imposed upon Mr Filippo Volandri, b) that no period of ineligibility is imposed on the Player and c) that his individual result in respect of the 2008 Indian Wells tournament only is disqualified, and in consequence, the prize money and ranking points obtained by him through his participation in that event are forfeited.

The Court of Arbitration for Sport rules that:

1. The appeal of Mr Filippo Volandri against the decision of the ITF Independent Anti-Doping Tribunal dated 15 January 2009 is partially upheld.
2. The decision issued by the ITF Independent Anti-Doping Tribunal on 15 January 2009 is set aside.
3. On these grounds:
  - a. Mr Filippo Volandri is found guilty of the anti-doping offence specified in the notice of charge set out in the ITF’s letter to the player dated 13 November 2008.
  - b. A reprimand is imposed upon Mr Volandri.
  - c. No period of ineligibility is imposed on Mr Volandri.

- d. Mr Volandri's individual result in respect of the 2008 Indian Wells tournament only is disqualified, and in consequence, the prize money and ranking points obtained by him through his participation in that event are forfeited.
  - e. All of Mr Volandri's results (including ranking points and prize money) in all competitions subsequent to the 2008 Indian Wells tournament shall remain undisturbed.
4. (...)
  5. All other motions or prayers for relief are dismissed.

LEGAL AUTHORITY CA-74

3. In the particular circumstances of the case, this finding of illegality does not inevitably involve a declaration that a provision of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 is invalid. The illegality of Article 5 of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 cannot be removed merely by the fact that the Court, in proceedings under Article 177, rules that the contested provision was in part or in whole invalid. As the situation created, in law, by Article 5 of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 is incompatible with the principle of equality, it is for the competent institutions of the Community to adopt the measures necessary to correct this incompatibility.

JUDGMENT

Facts and issues

The facts of the case, the course of the procedure and the written observations submitted under Article 20 of the Protocol on the Statute of the Court of Justice of the EEC may be summarized as follows:

I — Facts and written procedure

1. Quellmehl, a product processed from maize, common wheat or broken rice, and pre-gelatinized starch, which is processed from the same basic products, are to some extent in competition with each other, their common feature being that they are both used as an aid to baking, more specifically as leavening in the making of rye bread.

2. Regulation No 19 of the Council of 4 April 1962 on the progressive establishment of the common organization of the market in cereals (JO of 20. 4. 1962, p. 933), introduced a system of levies for certain cereal products. Article 24 of the regulation provided however that the Council might adopt measures derogating from those provisions.

Such measures had been adopted by Regulation No 55 of the Council of 30 June 1962 relating to the system in respect of processed products based on cereals (JO of 2. 7. 1962, p. 1583). Article 17 of that regulation had established the system of discretionary refunds for certain starches. The thirteenth recital in the preamble to the regulation reads as follows:

'Whereas because of the special situation on the market in starches and in particular the need for that industry to keep prices competitive with those for substitute products, it is necessary by way of derogation from the provisions ... of Regulation No 19 of the Council, to ensure by means of a production refund that the basic products used by the industry are made available to it, at a lower price than that which would result from applying the system of levies...'

Regulation No 141/64/EEC of the Council of 21 October 1964 concerning the rules applying to processed products derived from rice and other cereals (JO of 27. 10. 1964, p. 2666) had continued the system of discretionary production refunds. It had however established for the first time a production refund for maize and common wheat used in the quellmehl industry.

Regulation No 142/64/EEC of the Council of 21 October 1964 providing for the extension and adjustment to 31 March 1965 of the limitations on the production refunds for cereal and potato starch (JO of 27. 10. 1964, p. 2673) and fixing the refunds provided for under Regulation No 141/64/EEC accordingly provided in Article 1 (1) (e) thereof that:

'In the case of quellmehl the refund for maize, common wheat and broken rice used in the manufacture of that product shall be the same as that granted for the same cereals used for starch manufacture.'

The system established by the definitive basic Regulation No 120/67/EEC of the Council of 13 June 1967 on the common organization of the market in cereals (OJ English Special Edition 1967, p. 33) made the grant of the production refund compulsory. In the tenth recital in the preamble to that regulation it is inter alia stated

'Whereas ... because of the interchangeability of starches with quellmehl and maize groats and meal, production refunds should also be granted in respect of the latter products;'

Article 11 (1) of the regulation reads:

- '1. A production refund shall be granted:
- (a) for maize and common wheat used by the starch industry for the manufacture of starch and quellmehl;
  - (b) for potato starch;
  - (c) for maize used in the maize industry for the manufacture of maize groats and meal (gritz) used by the brewing industry.

Regulations Nos 178/67/EEC of 27 June 1967, 371/67/EEC of 25 July 1967 of the Council, fixing the production refunds for starch, potato starch and quellmehl (JO of 28. 6. 1967, p. 2617 and of 31. 7. 1967, p. 40) maintained this parity between starch and quellmehl.

The production refund for quellmehl was maintained until 1 August 1974 with effect from which date it was abolished by Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 of the Council of 29 April 1974 amending Regulation No 120/67/EEC (OJ L 128 of 10. 5. 1974, p. 12). However the refunds for maize, common wheat and broken rice used for the manufacture of starch and consequently pre-gelatinized starch continued to be granted.

The third and fourth recitals in the preamble to the latter regulation stated that:

'the production refund for quellmehl was initially granted with a view to promoting certain specific uses of quellmehl as a food for human consumption, account being taken of the possibility of its competing with a number of other products;'

and that

'experience has shown that the opportunity for such substitution is economically slight, if not non-existent; ... the production refund for quellmehl should therefore be abolished;'

Regulation (EEC) No 1132/74 of the Council of 29 April 1974 on production refunds in the cereal and rice sectors (OJ L 128 of 10. 5. 1974, p. 24), which fixed the refunds provided for by Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, resulted in the reduction of the production refund for maize and common wheat used for the manufacture of starch to 24.60 units of account per metric ton [hereinafter called 'tonne']. In order to give a reason for the maintenance of the refund for starch manufacture, the second recital in the preamble to the regulation states inter alia that 'a precise assessment of the situation resulting from the level of common prices and from the competition between, on the one hand, maize starch, rice starch, potato starch and, on the other, the substitute chemical products, indicates that the refund should be fixed at such a figure that the price of maize used in starch manufacture is brought down to 8.20 u. a. per 100 kg...'

Regulation (EEC) No 3113/74 of the Council of 9 December 1974 amending Regulation (EEC) No 1132/74 on production refunds in the cereals and rice sectors (OJ L 332, p. 1) resulted in a subsequent reduction (to 15.55 u. a. per tonne) of the refund granted for maize for the manufacture of starch.

Regulation (EEC) No 665/75 of the Council of 4 March 1975 amending Regulation (EEC) No 120/67/EEC (OJ L 72 of 20. 3. 1975, p. 14) which entered into force on 1 August 1975 made, inter alia, the production refund for cereals used in the manufacture of starch no longer compulsory. Moreover the regulation abolished the production refund for maize groats and meal (gritz) used by the brewing industry.

In Regulation (EEC) No 1955/75 of the Council of 22 July 1975 on production refunds in the cereals and rice sectors (OJ L 200 of 31. 8. 1975, p. 1) which also entered into force on 1 August 1975, the production refund on, inter alia, maize for the manufacture of starch was once more reduced and fixed at 10 u. a. per tonne.

3. The respective plaintiffs in the main actions, who are producers of quellmehl, applied to the respective defendants in the main actions on 22 July (Case 117/76) and 15 August (Case 16/77) 1975 for a permit relating to the grant of a production refund for maize used for the manufacture of quellmehl. These applications were rejected on the ground that Community regulations no longer provided for the grant of production refunds for quellmehl.

The plaintiffs in the main actions brought the present proceedings before the Finanzgericht Hamburg against these decisions rejecting the applications.

Before that court, the plaintiffs in the main actions urged in particular that the prohibition of discrimination laid down in the second subparagraph of Article 40 (3) of the Treaty has been infringed in so far as a production refund was granted only for pre-gelatinized starch and not for quellmehl, a product which is in competition with starch.

The defendants in the main actions contended that the applications should be dismissed.

4. Holding that the cases raised questions of interpretation of Community law the Finanzgericht Hamburg, by orders of 8 November 1976 and 18 January 1977, stayed the proceedings and requested the Court of Justice under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty to give a preliminary ruling on the following questions:

- '1. Do Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC as last amended by Regulation (EEC) No 665/75 of 4 March 1975 (OJ L 72 of 20. 3. 1975, p. 14) and Article 1 of Regulation (EEC) No 1955/75 of 22 July 1975 (OJ L 200 of 31. 8. 1975, p. 1) or does Article 11 of Regulation (EEC) No 2727/75 of 29 October 1975 (OJ L 281 of 1. 11. 1975, p. 1) infringe the prohibition of discrimination contained in Article 40 (3) of the EEC Treaty and are they invalid in so far as they do not grant a production refund of the same amount on maize for the manufacture of quellmehl as they do for the processing of this product into starch?
2. If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, have manufacturers of quellmehl a direct claim to the same production refund as the manufacturers of pre-gelatinized starch or is a legal measure adopted by the Council required for this?

5. In the grounds for the orders making the reference the Finanzgericht Hamburg made, inter alia, the following comments:

‘The determination of this dispute turns on the question whether the abolition of the production refund on maize for the manufacture of quellmehl is invalid because it infringes the prohibition of discrimination in Article 40 (3) of the EEC Treaty.

‘There might under Community law be prohibited discrimination if — as the plaintiff maintains — quellmehl and pre-gelatinized starch are interchangeable as aids to baking in the baking industry and if as a result of the abolition of the production refund for quellmehl on the one hand and the retention of the production refund for pre-gelatinized starch on the other hand quellmehl is no longer competitive and has been ousted from its former market. The recitals in the preamble to Regulation No 120/67/EEC state that a production refund should be granted because of the inter-changeability of starches with quellmehl. Accordingly if the purpose of the production refund is the interchangeability of the products, there might be discrimination against the plaintiff in connexion with the manufacture of quellmehl if and in so far as a production refund is granted on the raw materials used in the manufacture of pre-gelatinized starch, because from the point of view of technology, economics and price quellmehl and pre-gelatinized starch are interchangeable. The plaintiff submits that the recital in the preamble to Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, which states that the production refund for the manufacture of quellmehl should be abolished, because experience has shown that the opportunity for such substitution is economically slight, if not non-existent, does not correspond to the facts.

‘The adjudicating Senate finds that it is unable to ascertain and review the actual prerequisites for the abolition of the production refund in connexion with the manufacture of quellmehl, in order to be able to decide accordingly whether there is any prohibited discrimination against the plaintiff and other similar undertakings. The recitals in the preamble to Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 disclose that those responsible for the regulation were in possession of information, which is not available to the court, to the effect that quellmehl as a substitute product in fact was not or was only to an economically insignificant extent in competition in the territory of the EEC with products containing starch. Since the plaintiff contests this, with supporting evidence, the question arises whether Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 is valid in so far as it relates to the abolition of the production refund on quellmehl, since it may infringe Article 40 (3) of the EEC Treaty. The adjudicating Senate therefore considers that a ruling by the European Court of Justice is necessary in the interest of a uniform application of Community law.

If the Court of Justice should come to the conclusion that the abolition of the production refund on quellmehl is invalid, then there remain doubts as to the legal basis upon which the plaintiff can satisfy its claim and as to the formal conditions which have to be fulfilled. For this reason it has been necessary to refer Question 2.’

6. The orders making the references were registered at the Court Registry on 10 December 1976 and 31 January 1977 respectively.

In accordance with Article 20 of the Protocol on the Statute of the Court of Justice of the EEC, written observations were submitted by the plaintiffs in the main actions, the plaintiff in Case 117/76 being represented by the Chambers of Fritz Modest, Hamburg, the plaintiff in Case 16/77 being represented by E. Eckelt, A. Kallenbach and K.-D. Rathke, Advocates, of Augsburg, and by the Council, represented by Daniel Bignes, Director of its Legal Service, assisted, in Case 16/77, by Felix Van Craeynest, Principal Administrator of the said service and by the Commission, represented by its Legal Advisers Peter Kalbe and Götz zur Hausen, acting as Agents.

By order of 25 May 1977 the Court decided to join the cases for the purposes of the procedure.

After hearing the report of the Judge-Rapporteur and the views of the Advocate-General the Court decided to open the oral procedure without any preparatory inquiry.

Nevertheless the Court requested the parties, the Council and the Commission to give certain explanations in writing either before or during the hearing.

II — Written observations submitted to the Court

The first question

1. (a) The plaintiffs in the main actions point out first of all that quellmehl does not have the same importance in the other Member States as in Germany. On the other hand it is not correct to claim, as the defendants in the main actions have done, that quellmehl is of importance only in Germany.

(b) From the technical point of view quellmehl and pre-gelatinized starch are interchangeable and equal from the point of view of their use as aids to the baking of products made from rye flour.

(c) Where there is free competition as regards prices, quellmehl has a slight advantage over pre-gelatinized starch. This advantage amounts to less than the production refund paid in respect of maize starch. On the other hand the advantage is so marked that in the first place, the baking industry and bakers prefer quellmehl-based aids to baking and, secondly, the starch industry no longer disputes that advantage because it has other ways of selling its starch. The grant of a production refund of the same amount as for maize and rice processed into quellmehl or starch has enabled quellmehl to retain intact its competitive advantage over pre-gelatinized starch.

(d) The reasons advanced to justify the abolition of the production refund granted for the manufacture of quellmehl and the retention of the refund for starch are untrue.

(e) It is only because the allocation of a production refund of an equivalent amount enables the natural competitive situation between pre-gelatinized starch and quellmehl to be maintained that pre-gelatinized starch has not ousted quellmehl from the market in baking aids for rye-flour-based products.

(f) The abolition of the production refund for quellmehl created a fundamental change in the competitive situation which naturally exists between quellmehl and pre-gelatinized starch; after it was abolished pre-gelatinized starch could be offered on the market at a lower price than quellmehl.

According to the plaintiff in the main action in Case 117/76 it is because the manufacturers of quellmehl and of ingredients of quellmehl-based baking products paid the production refund out of their own pockets that they have been able, in the main, to maintain their position on the market.

The plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77 considers that the level of prices subsequent to the abolition of the production refund led to a reduction of more than 70 % in the turnover in quellmehl-based products. It adds that the selling price of quellmehl cannot, on the most conservative estimate, be less than DM 100 per 100 kg. On the other hand pre-gelatinized starch made from maize or wheat is at present already being offered at from DM 85 per 100 kg free at destination. The two biggest manufacturers of quellmehl-based ingredients of baking products have suffered a reduction in their turnover in one case of 7.5 % in 1975, compared with 1974, in the other case of 40 % in 1976, compared with 1974. In the case of the two undertakings referred to this reduction in sales has, apart from the abolition of the production refund, resulted in a substantial reduction in the cover for overheads (Deckungsbeiträgen). The plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77 points out that, until the spring of 1975, the two manufacturers still held their stocks of maize for which production refunds had been granted before entry into force of the contested regulation. The result is that the reduction in the cover for overheads (Deckungsbeiträgen) has become more marked. The manufacturers of quellmehl are suffering losses or, according to circumstances, a considerable reduction in their income and the sole reason for this is to be found in the fact that a production refund is paid for the manufacture of pre-gelatinized starch, whereas, in contrast to this, none is paid for the manufacture of quellmehl.

(g) According to the official statement of the grounds, a production refund for maize, rye and potato starch appears to be required only to enable the starch industry to compete with chemical substitute products. This is an admission that it is not necessary in so far as starch is sold for use in connexion with food for human consumption. Despite this, the production refund is granted for products used in the manufacture of starch without regard to the sector in which the starch is sold.

According to the plaintiffs in the main actions it is possible to restrict the allocation of a production refund for the processing of maize, rice and potatoes used in the manufacture of starch inasmuch as this starch is intended for the industrial sector and is in competition with chemical substitute products.

(h) There is also an unofficial reason for the abolition of the production refund for quellmehl: that a great deal of quellmehl based on maize and rice is sold for animal feed and its use for this purpose is an abuse which must be redressed by abolishing the production refund.

The plaintiffs in the main actions dispute this statement. The association of manufacturers of ingredients for baking products has declared that its members have never sold quellmehl for animal feed. There still exist in the Federal Republic of Germany one or two small undertakings which do not belong to the association of manufacturers of ingredients for baking products but their output is not very great. Outside Germany, there is an undertaking manufacturing quellmehl in Denmark and there are one or two in the Netherlands, but their output is insignificant. But even if these undertakings were to have sold quellmehl for use as animal feed such sales would still have been of comparatively little importance.

They go on to say that the Community regulations on production refunds for the two products in question did not prohibit sale of those products for animal feed. Nor is the production refund restricted to quellmehl or starch used for human consumption or for chemical products.

Unlike quellmehl, large quantities of maize starch are in fact sold for animal feed. But a production refund continues to be granted even for starch used in the animal feed industry.

(i) In the same way as the production refund can be restricted to starch used in industry for chemical purposes, it can, in the case of quellmehl or starch, be restricted exclusively to cases where these products are used for human consumption.

It is not difficult for control to be effectively exercised. The unofficial reason for the abolition of the production refund does not therefore stand up to scrutiny on any count.

(j) The plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77 refers furthermore to the fact that the need to reduce the budget of the Community was also used as an excuse to justify the abolition of the production refund for quellmehl. It finds this argument unconvincing: in the first place the production refund granted hitherto for the manufacture of quellmehl is of little importance compared with the total volume of production refunds and also with the production refund for the manufacture of starch. Secondly, there is no doubt that it is perfectly possible to abolish the production refunds. Nevertheless, when account is taken of the principle of non-discrimination, this could only lead to the abolition of the production refund both for the manufacture of quellmehl and for the manufacture of pre-gelatinized starch. Finally, it would not be possible to effect any saving in the budget of the Community for the simple reason that, as is shown by the state of the market, after the abolition of the refund for quellmehl, pre-gelatinized starch, for the manufacture of which a production refund is granted, would be used in its place.

(k) Finally the plaintiffs in the main actions contend that there is no substantial ground for abolishing the natural disparity between the competitiveness of the two products in question. Contrary to the contention of the defendant in the main action, it is not true that there is discrimination only if quellmehl is of economic importance in the food industry throughout the Common Market. There are in the Community production refunds which benefit only the undertakings in certain Member States such as the aid to durum wheat, colza and olive oil.

(l) Moreover, in the case of the quellmehl manufacturers concerned, discrimination is appreciable and substantial and even if discrimination were minimal the de facto situation would not justify it.

The plaintiffs in the main actions accordingly request the Court to answer the first question of the Finanzgericht to the effect that the provisions mentioned therein are contrary to the prohibition of discrimination laid down in Article 40 (3) of the Treaty and are null and void in so far as they make no provision for a production refund for maize used in the manufacture of quellmehl up to the same amount as that of the refund granted for the processing of this product into starch.

2. (a) The Council and the Commission point out in the first place that, in Case 117/76, the plaintiff in the main action lodged its application on 22 July 1975, that is to say, during the 1974/75 marketing year, while in Case 16/77 the application was lodged on 15 August 1975 and therefore during the 1975/76 marketing year.

In consequence, any entitlement to the refunds and the amounts of the refunds depend, in Case 117/76, on Regulations (EEC) Nos 1125/74, 1132/74 and 3113/74 of the Council and on Regulation (EEC) No 2518/74 of the Commission of 4 October 1974 (OJ L 270, p. 1) and, in Case 16/77, on Regulations (EEC) Nos 1125/74, 665/75 and 1955/75 of the Council.

(b) According to the Council, quellmehl and pre-gelatinized starch are to some extent interchangeable in particular when used as baking materials in the manufacture of rye bread. However because of its different properties quellmehl is more useful than pre-gelatinized starch. It has a greater capacity to absorb water; apart from starch it contains other raw material constituents which are of nutritional value; the process enabling it to be extracted from the raw material is a relatively simple physical operation whereas the manufacture of starch employs a technique which involves relatively more work; and the raw material extraction level is higher. The effect of these advantages is to make quellmehl from 15 to 20 % cheaper than pre-gelatinized starch, which is far more than the amount of the refund which pre-gelatinized starch continued to receive until the 1975/76 marketing year.

Thus the abolition of the subsidy would not have abolished the advantages as regards price and quality which quellmehl enjoys in terms of the manufacture of cooking agents.

(c) As the result of the oil crisis, prices of products competing with starch went up and in consequence did not compete so strongly against starch which, in turn, became a weaker competitor against quellmehl. The competitive pressure of imported processed products was also weaker. Moreover the maize market itself felt the repercussions of the world increase in the prices of cereals and there was less need to protect the processing industries of the Community. Again, the fact that the manufacture of starch is much more costly and complex than that of quellmehl also resulted in making the production costs of starch markedly more sensitive to the increase in investment costs and in labour costs. Finally, the Community realized that quellmehl was no longer put solely to its traditional use, baking, but that, owing to the refund, it was used as a constituent of animal feed. But these developments, which arose from the refund, do not fall within the objectives of the common agricultural policy for the purposes of which the refund was introduced.

It was because it was aware of this state of affairs that the Council reduced the refund for starch (in Regulations (EEC) Nos 1132/74, 3113/74 and 1955/75), made it discretionary (in Regulation (EEC) No 665/75) and abolished it for quellmehl (in Regulations (EEC) Nos 1125/74 and 1132/74).

(d) To grant a refund for starch is consistent with the provisions of Article 39 (1) (c) and (d) of the Treaty. Conversely, because of the use of quellmehl as animal feed, the abolition of the refund for this product furthers the objective designed to limiting the common agricultural policy 'to pursuit of the objectives set out in Article 39' (second subparagraph of Article 40 (3) of the Treaty).

(e) With regard to the alleged infringement of the rule against discrimination, the Council contends that to treat dissimilar situations differently does not amount to discrimination. The grant of a production refund for starch is justified by the state of the market in this product and by its key position between the common agricultural market and the common industrial market. Quellmehl, however, is in a different position. The grant of a refund for quellmehl is in the first place unnecessary as protection for its traditional outlets since the refund granted for pre-gelatinized starch has on several occasions been considerably reduced and, secondly, unjustified inasmuch as it helps to create an unintended outlet by way of animal feed. This different position justifies different treatment despite the fact that the two products concerned are to some extent in competition.

(f) The Council also states that even if, in the past, quellmehl and starch have in general received the same treatment this does not constitute a right to the same treatment, as claimed by the plaintiffs in the main actions. In this connexion the Council refers to the various grounds which it has already given and which, it declares, have now ceased to exist, however much they may have justified this identity of treatment in the past.

This is clear from the fourth recital in the preamble to Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 which gives grounds for the abolition of the payment of a refund for quellmehl and begins to reduce it for starch. The reduction to 10 u.a. per tonne of the refund for starch restored the natural superiority of quellmehl as a cooking agent.

(g) In terms of law, the Council refers to the decisions of the Court since its judgment of 17 July 1963 in Case 13/63 Italy v Commission [1963] ECR 165 which laid down that it is not discriminatory to treat dissimilar situations differently. The Council also refers to paragraph 22 of the judgment of the Court of 11 July 1974 in Case 11/74, Union des Minotiers de la Champagne v France [1974] ECR 877, according to which difference in treatment cannot be regarded as constituting discrimination which is prohibited unless it appears arbitrary.

In the Council's view it appears to be clear from the facts which it has set out, especially from those relating to the natural superiority of quellmehl from the competitive point of view and its use in the manufacture of animal feed, which is contrary to the original object of the subsidy, that it was not guilty of arbitrary discrimination in Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 (1974/75 marketing year, Case 117/76) or in Regulations (EEC) Nos 665/75 and 1955/75 (1975/76 marketing year, Case 16/77). The same applies to Regulation (EEC) No 2727/75, which was effective only from 1 November 1975.

3. (a) The Commission states that the abolition of the production refund for quellmehl is only one aspect of the comprehensive change in the Community's subsidies policy in the case of products processed from cereals, one of the consequences of which is the reduction of refunds for starch. A charge of discrimination cannot therefore be based on the abolition per se of refunds in the case of quellmehl but at most on the fact that the refund granted for pre-gelatinized starch was not abolished in its entirety.

(b) From the legal standpoint the Commission contends that an economic decision of the same kind as the contested measure cannot be discriminatory unless it was based on considerations which are manifestly erroneous; judgment of the Court of 24 October 1973 in Case 43/72, Merkur v Commission [1973] ECR 1055.

(c) The Commission accordingly sets forth the considerations on which the contested measures were based: the financial burdens of the common agricultural policy had to be reduced; price arrangements under the system of production refunds had to be adjusted to economic realities: the supply price (the basis of calculation of the production refund, which represents the difference between this price and the Community threshold price) had not followed the trend of market and threshold prices, which was steadily rising and the refunds were, in consequence, practically doubled; and, because of the increase in the price of synthetic products which are in competition with cereal-based starch as the result of the rise in price of oil products, consideration was being given to the need for a fundamental reappraisal of the policy of granting refunds.

(d) Because starch was in competition with synthetic substitute products, the Council did not abolish production refunds for starch but merely reduced the relevant amounts.

(e) In consequence the question arose whether the timing of the reduction in the production refund for quellmehl should be the same as in the case of starch.

An analysis of the competitive position of these two products disclosed vital differences which made it unnecessary to keep the regulations governing the refund so completely in parallel as they had been hitherto. The explanation why quellmehl and starch are treated alike in Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC lies in the political argument of the 'preservation of the acquired rights' of quellmehl manufacturers rather than in economic necessity and the similarity of economic conditions. In this connexion it must be borne in mind that the manufacture of quellmehl has benefited from a German internal subsidy since 1930.

(f) The amount of the refunds is based on the overall assumption that 161 kg of maize are required for the manufacture of 100 kg of starch. On the other hand the extraction rate for quellmehl is, at most, between 102 and 110 kg and the manufacture of quellmehl involves much less work and requires much less technical knowhow than the manufacture of starch.

Furthermore, cereals themselves need not necessarily serve as raw material for quellmehl. All the other cheaper starch-producing products of the milling industry can be used.

(g) The interchangeability of the two products in question has, in practice, been hitherto of little importance.

On this point the Commission quotes the plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77 as follows:

'... quellmehl has better technical qualities. The capacity to absorb water in particular ... is higher in the case of quellmehl; ... quellmehl has better qualities from the nutritional point of view ... ;'

'... In the end, however, the choice between the two products is only a matter of price since the use of a greater quantity of pre-gelatinized starch makes it possible to obtain absolutely the same capacity to absorb water ...'

Given that the cost price of the raw material is the same, the refund, adapted to the needs of starch manufacture, has over-subsidized the already cheaper production of quellmehl. This difference in price, together with the ability to use cheaper low grade flour, makes it possible for the quellmehl industry to invade the market in animal feed.

It is for this reason that the Community institutions reached the conclusion that there was no compelling reason to adhere to the principle of strict equality of treatment between the manufacturers of quellmehl and manufacturers of starch.

In view of the substantial reductions which took place in the production refunds for starch simultaneously with the abolition of the refund for quellmehl, there is no reason to suppose that great and irreparable harm would be done to the competition with pre-gelatinized starch.

In the animal feed industry, the higher prices of maize as a raw material could have been easily offset by the use of lower-grade flours which are cheaper.

Similarly, there is little reason to suppose that pre-gelatinized starch is forcing rye-flour cooking agents out of the traditional market. Pre-gelatinized starch is certainly coming to supersede quellmehl but not specific cooking agents because it does not possess their qualities.

(h) Nor is there any reason to fear that the natural advantage possessed by quellmehl-based products in terms of competition will be reversed as a result of the undue advantage granted to pre-gelatinized starch in terms of price.

The increase in the price of raw material caused by the abolition of the refund is not reflected fully but only in part in the price of quellmehl, which is also considerably influenced by other factors. The effect of this increase on the price of cooking agents ready to be marketed, like those manufactured by the plaintiffs in the main actions, is even less significant.

Similarly the reduction, owing to the maintenance of refunds, in the price of maize as a raw material compared with the cost price of quellmehl has only a partly favourable effect on the price of pre-gelatinized starch as the finished product.

Price fluctuations due to changes in the amount of the refunds amount to discrimination only if they cause the price of quellmehl to rise appreciably above that of starch.

Like quellmehl producers, the starch manufacturing industry had to bear substantial price increases for maize as its raw material. The advantage which that industry enjoyed in terms of price compared with quellmehl manufacturers lay only in the maintenance of a lower production refund. The amount of the refund which, in the beginning, was as much as 20.40 units of account per tonne fell to 18.45 units of account per tonne in July 1975 and, after August 1975, to 10 units of account per tonne. This was not enough even to come within reach of the advantage of at least DM 100 which quellmehl previously enjoyed as a finished product.

Nor has experience gained in the meantime supplied any evidence of competition which makes it possible for pre-gelatinized starch to replace quellmehl because of the refunds it receives.

Second question

1. The plaintiff in the main action in Case 117/76 states that, in the present case, discrimination can be eliminated retroactively by granting, with retroactive effect, the production refund for the manufacture of quellmehl from maize and rice up to an amount equal to that granted for the manufacture of starch from maize and rice during the same period.

The plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77 adds that if Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 is annulled it will mean that Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC, as it was worded before the entry into force of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, is again valid in so far as it governs the production refund for maize used in the manufacture of quellmehl.

The second paragraph of Article 215 of the Treaty has the same legal effect. The principle that the person responsible for the damage should, in the first place, restore the situation to what it would have been if the event causing the damage had not taken place is one of the general principles relating to the liability of the Community for damage caused by its institutions. The same principle is illustrated by the right to have the consequences made good, which is recognized in administrative law and is also common to the legal systems of the Member States.

The plaintiffs in the main actions accordingly request the Court to give an affirmative answer to the second question.

2. The Council contends that, even if the Court finds that a set of regulations is legally invalid, it may not put itself in the place of the Community legislature in the exercise of the powers of discretion conferred upon the latter and promulgate a positive rule since a whole range of alternative courses is open to the legislature.

Moreover, the aim of the second question is to have an issue concerning the application of the law settled by the Court, and this is not possible.

3. The Commission points out that, even if quellmehl were reentered on the list in Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC of the products entitled to a refund, the Council is not bound to grant a refund for quellmehl. Regulation (EEC) No 665/75 abolished the compulsory refund which existed previously and left the decision whether a refund should be granted for one of the listed products to the discretion of the Council.

A finding that there had been a misuse of powers would mean that the measures taken were invalid and would oblige the Council to replace them with a non-discriminatory measure coming within the scope of its discretionary power.

There could be an exception only if the Council's margin of discretion was confined to one decision only: that of restoring unchanged and with retroactive effect the right to the refund. In this case, there is, in any event, a choice of several possible solutions.

III — The written reply to a question put by the Court

In response to the Court's request for evidence to prove that quellmehl has been used for animal feed, the Commission produced a telex from the Federal Ministry of Food.

According to this telex the trade association for the animal feed production industry ('Fachverband der Futtermittelindustrie') is one of the groups which has got into touch with the Ministry concerning the abolition of the production refund for quellmehl because its abolition placed quellmehl at a disadvantage compared with pre-gelatinized starch in the production of milk substitute foods for calves and pigs. It also appears from the telex that the Ministry of Food is in possession of a report which shows that, at that time, quellmehl was being offered on the market in animal feed components at a price of from DM 65 to DM 70 per 100 kg compared with starch products fetching from DM 80 to DM 85 per 100 kg and was thus selling at from about 80 % to 82 % of the price of starch-based and glucose-based products.

The Commission has not been able to see the original documents or to place them at the disposal of the Court because they contained certain confidential matter.

IV — Oral procedure

At the hearing on 21 June 1977, oral observations were made by the plaintiff in the main action in Case 117/76, represented by Fritz Modest, the plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77, represented by K.-D. Rathke, the Council, represented by the Director of its Legal Service, Daniel Vignes, acting as Agent, and the Commission, represented by its Legal Adviser, Götz zur Hausen, acting as Agent.

The plaintiff in the main action in Case 117/76 states that, according to information which it is unable to prove beyond doubt, only one undertaking in the Federal Republic of Germany, Interquell, has processed some 5 000 tonnes of maize into quellmehl, half of its output, or 2 500 tonnes, being sent to the animal feed industry, while the quellmehl industry as a whole processes from about 40 000 to 50 000 tonnes of maize into quellmehl.

It does not understand how pre-gelatinized starch can replace quellmehl but not the particular baking aids which have different properties; like quellmehl, pre-gelatinized starch can be used as the basic ingredient of an aid for bakery products.

The cost price of quellmehl is DM 98.79 per 100 kg while starch was, owing to the refund, on offer at DM 98 per 100 kg.

The plaintiff in the main action in Case 16/77 states that, while quellmehl, like starch, is largely used as a component of food products other than cooking agents, the ways in which the two products can be used are much the same. The production costs of pre-gelatinized starch and of quellmehl are the same.

It is not true that quellmehl is from 15 to 20 % cheaper to produce than starch. In the foodstuffs industry the price relationship is the opposite: prices are from 20 % higher in the case of quellmehl than in the case of pre-gelatinized starch. Prices mentioned in the telex of the German Federal Ministry of Food referred only to animal feed.

Referring to the statement of the plaintiff in the main action that pre-gelatinized starch was on sale at DM 98 per 100 kg, the Commission states that this figure relates to the present position whereas the comparison of prices made by the Commission refers to the time when the abolition of the refund was being discussed.

The fact that quellmehl was used in the animal feed industry was not merely an unofficial ground: there was a reference, though rather vague, to this effect in the third recital in the preamble to the regulation.

The Court invited the Commission to develop its arguments at the hearing on the following point:

The difference between Cases 117/76 and 16/77 arising from the fact that the application for grant of a refund in the first case was submitted on the date when Article 11, as amended, of Regulation No 120/67/EEC made the grant of a refund for the products covered by the article compulsory (refund shall be granted), whereas the application in the second case was submitted on a date when the wording in force of Article 11 provided for the refund in respect of the products covered to be discretionary (refund may be granted).'

The Commission's reply was that, in neither case, was quellmehl any longer mentioned by the aforesaid provision. This is therefore a question which would arise only if the abolition of the refund for quellmehl were to be declared invalid by the Court. If that occurred, quellmehl would, as a finished product, once more come under the regulation concerning the basic product in respect of which a production refund is granted in the first case and may be granted in the second case.

Even if a basic regulation lays down that a refund shall be granted this does not confer any right to it on the party concerned. A right would be conferred on the party concerned only by the fixing of the amount of the refund. Nor, against this, could it be objected that the amount of the refund had already been fixed for pre-gelatinized starch and that a now legislative measure was not therefore necessary to introduce the refund; this would amount to saying that the Council had exercised its discretion irrevocably, once and for all, because it had fixed the refund at a specific sum for starch. In the Commission's view such a contention would be difficult to justify: the act of simply transferring to quellmehl the refund which had originally been fixed for starch is not the only way to achieve this equality of treatment. It is equally possible to confine the refunds to food for human consumption or to restrict the level of the refund for the two products. That, too, can ensure equality of treatment. In the case of the 1975/76 marketing year, equality is a matter for decision by the legislature and could even consist of the total abolition of the refund for pre-gelatinized starch because at the material time the refund was not compulsory.

The Advocate-General delivered his opinion at the hearing on 22 September 1977.

Decision

- 1 By two orders dated respectively 8 November 1976 and 18 January 1977, which reached the Court on 10 December 1976 and 31 January 1977, the Finanzgericht Hamburg has referred to the Court under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty two questions concerning the validity of certain provisions of Community regulations on the subject of refunds for the manufacture of products derived from maize.
- 2 Since the questions referred in both cases are identical and have essentially the same object, it is proper to join the cases for the purposes of judgment.
- 3 The substance of the first question is whether the provisions of Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC of the Council on the common organization of the market in cereals, as subsequently amended, are invalid in so far as they do not grant a production refund of the same amount on maize for the manufacture of quellmehl as they do for the processing of this product into starch.

The second question is whether, in the event of the reply being in the affirmative, manufacturers of quellmehl can lay direct claim to the same production refund as that granted to manufacturers of pre-gelatinized starch or whether a legal measure adopted by the Council is required for this.

- 4 These questions were referred in connexion with proceedings for the payment of a production refund for quellmehl brought against the competent national authorities by the manufacturers of this product, who claim that the provisions which abolished this refund while maintaining it for starch constitute discrimination contrary to the second subparagraph of Article 40 (3) of the Treaty.
- 5 The production refund for quellmehl extracted from maize, which has been granted in Germany since 1930, was introduced into the common organization of the market in cereals, first as discretionary by Regulation No 142/64/EEC of the Council of 21 October 1964 (JO of 27. 10. 1964, p. 2673) and subsequently as compulsory by Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC of the Council of 13 June 1967 (JO English Special Edition 1967, p. 33).

These arrangements were identical with those established by the same regulations for the grant of production refunds for starch and the amount of the refunds was also the same for the two products.

Although the reason for the grant of production refunds for starch was the need to keep prices competitive compared with the prices of substitute products derived principally from oil, the reason for the grant of production refunds for quellmehl was, as is made clear in particular by the tenth recital in the preamble to Regulation No 120/67/EEC, the interchangeability of starch and quellmehl.

- 6 The situation remained the same until 1 August 1974, the date of the entry into force of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 of the Council of 29 April 1974 (OJ L 128 of 10. 5. 1974, p. 12), whereby Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC was superseded by a new text providing for the grant of production refunds for starch but not for quellmehl.

The recitals in the preamble to Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 stated that the reason for abolishing the production refund for quellmehl was that experience had shown that the opportunity for substituting quellmehl for starch for certain specific uses as food for human consumption was 'economically slight, if not non-existent'.

- 7 The second subparagraph of Article 40 (3) of the Treaty provides that the common organization of agricultural markets 'shall exclude any discrimination between producers or consumers within the Community'.

Whilst this wording undoubtedly prohibits any discrimination between producers of the same product it does not refer in such clear terms to the relationship between different industrial or trade sectors in the sphere of processed agricultural products.

This does not alter the fact that the prohibition of discrimination laid down in the aforesaid provision is merely a specific enunciation of the general principle of equality which is one of the fundamental principles of Community law.

This principle requires that similar situations shall not be treated differently unless differentiation is objectively justified.

- 8 It must therefore be ascertained whether quellmehl and starch are in a comparable situation, in particular in the sense that starch can be substituted for quellmehl in the specific use to which the latter product is traditionally put.

In this connexion it must first be noted that the Community regulations were, until 1974, based on the assertion that such substitution was possible.

However, the plaintiffs in the main actions on the one hand, and the Council and the Commission on the other are not in agreement concerning the continued existence of that situation.

The plaintiffs in the main actions contend that the opportunities for substitution are the same as previously, with the result that, since the abolition of the refund for quellmehl, trade in the latter has fallen off in favour of starch.

While the Council and the Commission have given detailed information on the manufacture and sale of the products in question, they have produced no new technical or economic data which appreciably change the previous assessment of the position.

It has not therefore been established that, so far as the Community system of production refunds is concerned, quellmehl and starch are no longer in comparable situations.

Consequently, these products must be treated in the same manner unless differentiation is objectively justified.

- 9 With regard to this latter aspect, the Council and the Commission contend that the abolition of the refund for quellmehl is justified by the fact that quellmehl has been to a great extent diverted from its specific use in food for human consumption in order to be sold as animal feed.

Although this ground, the correctness of which is moreover disputed by the plaintiffs in the main actions, is referred to in the statement which accompanied the proposal submitted by the Commission to the Council and later adopted as Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, it does not appear in the recitals to that regulation.

During the proceedings, the Commission was requested by the Court to produce evidence to show that quellmehl had been used for animal feed but it was unable to comply with this request.

Even if adequate proof had been forthcoming that it was put to such use and that subsidized starch had not been put to similar use this could have justified the abolition of the refund only in respect of the quantities put to such use and not in respect of the quantities of the products used in food for human consumption.

- 10 In view in particular of the length of time during which the two products were given equality of treatment with regard to production refunds, it has not been established that there are objective circumstances which could have justified altering the previous system as was done by Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, which put an end to this equality of treatment.

It is clear from the foregoing that the abolition, as a result of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, of the refund for quellmehl, while the refund was maintained for maize-based starch, amounts to a disregard of the principle of equality.

- 11 In the particular circumstances of the case, however, this finding of illegality does not inevitably involve a declaration that a provision of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 is invalid.
- 12 It must first of all be borne in mind that the amendment of Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC effected by Article 5 of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 took the form not of the deletion of that part of the text which relates to quellmehl but of the replacement of the previous wording by a new wording in which there is no mention of that product.

Thus the provision is unlawful because of something for which it makes no provision rather than on account of any part of its wording.

- 13 However, this unlawfulness cannot be removed merely by the fact that the Court, in proceedings under Article 177, rules that the contested provision is in part or in whole invalid.

On the other hand the conclusion must be drawn that, in law, the situation created by Article 5 of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74, whereby the previous text was replaced by a new wording of Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC, is incompatible with the principle of equality and that it is for the competent institutions of the Community to adopt the measures necessary to correct this incompatibility.

The need for a reply to this effect to the questions asked is borne out by the existence of several courses of action which would enable the two products in question once again to be treated equally and to make good any damage sustained by those concerned and by the fact that it is for the institutions responsible for the common agricultural policy to assess the economic and political considerations on which this choice of action depends.

Costs

- 14 The costs incurred by the Council and the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable.

As these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main action are concerned, in the nature of a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Finanzgericht Hamburg by orders of 8 November 1976 and 18 January 1977, hereby rules:

1. The provisions of Article 11 of Regulation No 120/67/EEC of the Council of 13 June 1967, as worded with effect from 1 August 1974 following the amendment made by Article 5 of Regulation (EEC) No 1125/74 of the Council of 29 April 1974, and repeated in subsequent regulations, are incompatible with the principle of equality in so far as they provide for quellmehl and pre-gelatinized starch to receive different treatment in respect of production refunds for maize used in the manufacture of these two products.

2. It is for the institutions competent in matters of common agricultural policy to adopt the measures necessary to correct this incompatibility.

OPINION OF MR ADVOCATE-GENERAL CAPOTORTI
DELIVERED ON 22 SEPTEMBER 1977<sup>1</sup>

*Mr President,
Members of the Court,*

1. The opinion which I have to deliver today is concerned with six cases (Joined Cases 64 and 113/76, Joined Cases 117/76 and 16/77 and Joined Cases 124/76 and 20/77) relating to agriculture and they have one important feature in common: they all raise the issue of observance of the principle of non-discrimination by the Community legislature. More specifically, the central issue is whether and under what conditions the principle of non-discrimination must be considered to have been breached when, by means of regulations, the Community authorities decide to abolish aids granted for a time to particular products while maintaining aids already granted to a product in competition with them.

I should state at once that the products which in the present case no longer benefit from aids (in the form of 'production refunds') are 'quellmehl' and 'gritz'; the product which continues to benefit from them is starch. Quellmehl, which is produced by the processing of maize, wheat or broken rice by means of a heat treatment helps to keep dough damp in the breadmaking process and is traditionally used in Germany and Denmark as an additive in the manufacture of rye bread. Gritz is meal which is made from maize by means of a purely mechanical operation and is mainly used in the brewing of beer. For the main purpose for which they are used, each of the two products can, technically speaking, be replaced by starch.

During the stage at which the common organization of the market in cereals was being progressively established, the similar treatment of starch and quellmehl in the matter of production refunds was the outcome, in particular, of

2 THAT QUESTION HAS BEEN SUBMITTED IN THE CONTEXT OF A DISPUTE BETWEEN A GERMAN NATIONAL , THE PLAINTIFF IN THE MAIN ACTION , AND THE BUNDESVERSICHERUNGSANSTALT FUR ANGESTELLTE ( FEDERAL INSURANCE INSTITUTION FOR CLERICAL STAFF ). THE PLAINTIFF PAID CONTRIBUTIONS TO GERMAN INSURANCE FOR CLERICAL STAFF FROM APRIL 1948 TO JUNE 1969 , AND THEN FROM 1973 TO 1974 . IN THE INTERVENING PERIOD ( 1969 TO 1973 ) HE WAS EMPLOYED IN BELGIUM AND COMPULSORILY INSURED UNDER THE BELGIAN INSURANCE SCHEME FOR CLERICAL STAFF . IN HIS FIRST GERMAN INSURANCE PERIOD THERE WERE SOME INTERRUPTIONS , NAMELY FOUR MONTHS IN 1956 AND 41 MONTHS BETWEEN 1964 AND 1967 , DURING WHICH HE WAS NOT INSURED EITHER IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE OR UNDER ANY OTHER OLD-AGE PENSION INSURANCE SCHEME IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY .

3 THE APPLICANT EXPRESSED THE DESIRE TO MAKE USE OF THE FACILITIES AVAILABLE TO PERSONS IN HIS SITUATION UNDER ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) OF THE ANGESTELLTENVERSICHERUNGS-NEUREGELUNGSGESETZ ( CLERICAL STAFF PENSION REFORM LAW , HEREINAFTER REFERRED TO AS ' ' THE 1957 LAW ' ' ) , AS AMENDED BY ARTICLE 2 ( 2 ) 14 OF THE RENTENREFORMGESETZ ( PENSION REFORM LAW , HEREINAFTER REFERRED TO AS ' ' THE 1972 LAW ' ' ) OF 16 OCTOBER 1972 . ACCORDING TO THAT PROVISION : ' ' PERSONS WHO ARE ENTITLED TO BECOME VOLUNTARILY INSURED PURSUANT TO ARTICLE 10 OF THE CLERICAL STAFF INSURANCE LAW MAY , AT THEIR REQUEST , IN DEROGATION FROM THE PROVISIONS OF ARTICLE 140 OF THAT LAW , VOLUNTARILY BUY-IN CONTRIBUTIONS IN RESPECT OF PERIODS FROM 1 JANUARY 1956 TO 31 DECEMBER 1973 WHICH ARE NOT YET COVERED BY CONTRIBUTIONS TO STATUTORY PENSION INSURANCE , PROVIDED THAT A CONTRIBUTION RELATING TO ANY MONTH MAY NOT BE PAID UNLESS THE CONTRIBUTIONS COVERING ALL SUBSEQUENT MONTHS HAVE FIRST BEEN PAID . A CONTRIBUTION RELATING TO ANY MONTH MAY NOT EXCEED THE SMALLEST CONTRIBUTION PAID IN RESPECT OF A LATER MONTH ' ' .

4 RELYING ON THAT TEXT THE APPLICANT APPLIED TO PAY IN THAT WAY THE CONTRIBUTIONS WHICH HE WOULD HAVE PAID HAD HE BEEN INSURED IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY BETWEEN 1948 AND 1969 ( 45 MONTH IN ALL ) . WHILST NOT CONTESTING THAT THE PLAINTIFF SATISFIES THE CONDITIONS FOR THE EXERCISE OF THE OPTION OF MAKING BACK-PAYMENTS , THE DEFENDANT INSTITUTION REFERS TO THE SENTENCE IN ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) WHICH SAYS THAT SUCH ENTITLEMENT SHALL EXIST ' ' PROVIDED THAT A CONTRIBUTION RELATING TO ANY MONTH MAY NOT BE PAID UNLESS THE CONTRIBUTIONS COVERING ALL SUBSEQUENT MONTHS HAVE FIRST BEEN PAID ' ' , ARGUING THAT THE APPLICANT MUST START BY PAYING THE GERMAN CONTRIBUTIONS IN RESPECT OF THE PERIOD CORRESPONDING TO THAT IN WHICH HE WAS COMPULSORILY INSURED AND PAID CONTRIBUTIONS IN BELGIUM . IT IS THAT REQUIREMENT WHICH IS THE SUBJECT-MATTER OF THE MAIN ACTION . THE APPLICANT HAS AN INTEREST IN CHALLENGING IT OWING TO THE FACT THAT THE ' ' BUYING-IN ' ' OF RECENT MISSING PERIODS , IN THIS CASE FROM 1969 TO 1973 , IS MORE EXPENSIVE THAN THAT FOR PERIODS FURTHER BACK , NAMELY 45 MONTHS BETWEEN 1956 AND 1967 .

5 THE PARTIES TO THE MAIN ACTION ARE AGREED THAT THE APPLICANT DOES COME UNDER ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) AND THAT THE REQUIREMENT LAID DOWN BY THE INSURANCE INSTITUTION OF PAYING FIRST THE CONTRIBUTIONS FOR THE PERIODS BETWEEN 1969 AND 1973 , NOTWITHSTANDING THE FACT THAT THEY CORRESPOND TO COMPULSORY INSURANCE PERIODS IN BELGIUM , DERIVES FROM A PROPER CONSTRUCTION OF THE RELEVANT PROVISIONS OF THE GERMAN LEGISLATION IN THE MATTER . THEY ARE AGREED THAT THE OBLIGATION UNDER GERMAN VOLUNTARY INSURANCE TO BUY-IN THE PERIODS CORRESPONDING TO INSURANCE PERIODS IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE MAY BE IMPOSED ONLY ON GERMAN NATIONALS AND ON WORKERS FROM OTHER MEMBER STATES WHO LIVE IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY AND THAT IT CANNOT BE IMPOSED ON WORKERS FROM OTHER MEMBER STATES LIVING OUTSIDE GERMANY .

6 ACCORDING TO THE DEFENDANT INSTITUTION THE CONFORMITY OF THAT REQUIREMENT WITH COMMUNITY LAW IS APPARENT FROM THE TEXT OF PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V TO REGULATION NO 1408/71 OF THE COUNCIL . ON THE OTHER HAND THE PLAINTIFF IN THE MAIN ACTION CONTESTS THAT INTERPRETATION OF THOSE PROVISIONS . HE FURTHER MAINTAINS , AS HIS PRIMARY CONTENTION , THAT IF THE INTERPRETATION PUT FORWARD BY THE DEFENDANT WERE CORRECT , THE DISPUTED PROVISIONS WOULD CONSEQUENTLY BE TAINTED WITH DISCRIMINATION AND WOULD THEREFORE BE ILLEGAL OWING TO THE DIFFERENT TREATMENT IMPOSED ON GERMAN NATIONALS AND ON NATIONALS OF OTHER MEMBER STATES LIVING IN GERMANY BY COMPARISON WITH WORKERS FROM OTHER MEMBER STATES HAVING ACCESS TO THE GERMAN VOLUNTARY INSURANCE SCHEME AND TO THE ' ' BUYING-IN ' ' SCHEME , UPON WHOM SUCH AN OBLIGATION TO BUY-IN PERIODS CORRESPONDING TO A PERIOD OF INSURANCE IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE CANNOT BE IMPOSED .

7 CONSEQUENTLY THE QUESTION REFERRED TO THE COURT PRIMARILY SEEKS TO DETERMINE WHETHER PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V MUST INDEED BE CONSTRUED IN THE MANNER SUGGESTED BY THE DEFENDANT INSTITUTION AND , SECONDLY , SHOULD THE PROVISIONS IN QUESTION HAVE THAT EFFECT , WHETHER THEY ARE NOT THEREFORE INVALID BY REASON OF THE DIFFERENT TREATMENT OF TWO CATEGORIES OF WORKERS BOTH OF WHOM ARE ALLOWED ACCESS TO VOLUNTARY INSURANCE WITH THE OPTION OF MAKING BACK-PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF EARLIER PERIODS .

8 THE PROVISIONS WHICH REQUIRE CONSIDERATION ARE ARTICLE 89 OF REGULATION NO 1408/71 AND PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V TO THE SAME REGULATION . THOSE PROVISIONS READ AS FOLLOWS :

ARTICLE 89

' ' SPECIAL PROCEDURES FOR IMPLEMENTING THE LEGISLATIONS OF CERTAIN MEMBER STATES ARE SET OUT IN ANNEX V . ' '

PARAGRAPH 8 OF PART C OF ANNEX V

' ' ARTICLE 1233 OF THE INSURANCE CODE ( RVO ) AND ARTICLE 10 OF THE CLERICAL STAFF INSURANCE LAW ( AVG ), AS AMENDED BY THE PENSION REFORM LAW OF 16 OCTOBER 1972 , WHICH GOVERN VOLUNTARY INSURANCE UNDER GERMAN PENSION INSURANCE SCHEMES , SHALL APPLY TO NATIONALS OF THE OTHER MEMBER STATES AND TO STATELESS PERSONS AND REFUGEES RESIDING IN THE TERRITORY OF THE OTHER MEMBER STATES , ACCORDING TO THE FOLLOWING RULES :

WHERE THE GENERAL CONDITIONS ARE FULFILLED VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE GERMAN PENSION SCHEME MAY BE PAID :

( A ) IF THE PERSON CONCERNED HAS HIS DOMICILE OR RESIDENCE IN THE TERRITORY OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY ;

( B ) IF THE PERSON CONCERNED HAS HIS DOMICILE OR RESIDENCE IN THE TERRITORY OF ANOTHER MEMBER STATE AND AT ANY TIME PREVIOUSLY BELONGED COMPULSORILY OR VOLUNTARILY TO A GERMAN PENSION INSURANCE SCHEME ;

( C ) IF THE PERSON CONCERNED IS A NATIONAL OF ANOTHER MEMBER STATE , HAS HIS DOMICILE OR RESIDENCE IN THE TERRITORY OF A THIRD STATE AND HAS PAID CONTRIBUTIONS FOR GERMAN PENSION INSURANCE FOR AT LEAST 60 MONTHS , OR WAS ELIGIBLE FOR VOLUNTARY INSURANCE UNDER THE TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS PREVIOUSLY IN FORCE AND IS NOT COMPULSORILY OR VOLUNTARILY INSURED UNDER THE LEGISLATION OF ANOTHER MEMBER STATE . ' '

PARAGRAPH 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V

' ' THE REGULATION SHALL NOT AFFECT ARTICLE 51A ( 2 ) OF THE MANUAL WORKERS PENSION REFORM LAW ( ARVNG ) OR ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) OF THE CLERICAL STAFF PENSION REFORM LAW ( ANVNG ), AS AMENDED BY THE PENSION REFORM LAW OF 16 OCTOBER 1972 . THE PERSONS WHO , UNDER PARAGRAPH 8 ( B ) AND ( C ), MAY JOIN VOLUNTARY INSURANCE , MAY PAY CONTRIBUTIONS ONLY IN RESPECT OF PERIODS FOR WHICH THEY HAVE NOT YET PAID CONTRIBUTIONS UNDER THE LEGISLATION OF ANOTHER MEMBER STATE . ' '

THE CONSTRUCTION OF PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V TO REGULATION NO 1408/71

9 WHEN ARTICLE 49A INCLUDING PARAGRAPH ( 2 ) THEREOF WAS ADDED TO THE 1957 LAW IN 1972 THE BENEFIT OF ' ' BUYING-IN ' ' WHICH IT INTRODUCED WAS RESTRICTED TO GERMAN NATIONALS AND TO FOREIGNERS LIVING IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY . IN THE CASE OF THOSE PERSONS THREE CONDITIONS ARE IMPOSED ON THE RIGHT TO ' ' BUY-IN ' ' :

( A ) BUYING-IN IS RESTRICTED TO A PERIOD BETWEEN 1 JANUARY 1956 AND 31 DECEMBER 1973 ;

( B ) IT MAY BE EFFECTED ONLY IN RESPECT OF PERIODS FOR WHICH THE PERSON CONCERNED PAID CONTRIBUTIONS TO STATUTORY INVALIDITY AND OLD-AGE PENSION INSURANCE ( PRINCIPLE OF THE PROHIBITION ON OVERLAPPING INSURANCE ) - THAT PROVISION , AS HAS JUST BEEN INDICATED , BEING UNDERSTOOD AND IMPLEMENTED BY THE COMPETENT INSTITUTIONS AS REFERRING ONLY TO PERIODS OF CONTRIBUTION TO INSURANCE IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY - AND ,

( C ) BUYING-IN MUST START WITH THE MOST RECENT MISSING PERIODS AND GO PROGRESSIVELY FURTHER BACK IN THE PAST ( PRINCIPLE OF RETROGRESSIVE BUYING-IN ).

10 FOLLOWING THE INTERVENTION OF THE COMMISSION THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY ACCEPTED THAT THE BENEFIT OF THAT PROVISION SHOULD BE EXTENDED TO THE NATIONALS OF OTHER MEMBER STATES WHO DID NOT RESIDE IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY PROVIDED THAT THEY HAD PREVIOUSLY BEEN COMPULSORILY OR VOLUNTARILY INSURED UNDER THE GERMAN OLD-AGE PENSION INSURANCE SCHEME . THAT IS THE OBJECT OF PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V , AMENDED TO THAT END IN 1974 .

11 THOSE TWO PROVISIONS ARE CLOSELY LINKED AND MUST BE CONSTRUED IN CONJUNCTION WITH ONE ANOTHER . THEY DISTINGUISH BETWEEN , ON THE ONE HAND , WORKERS WHO DERIVE THEIR RIGHT TO AVAIL THEMSELVES OF ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) DIRECTLY FROM THE GERMAN LEGISLATION , NAMELY GERMAN NATIONALS WHATEVER THEIR PLACE OF RESIDENCE AND NATIONALS OF OTHER MEMBER STATES RESIDING IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY WHO ARE REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH 8 ( A ) AND IN THE FIRST SENTENCE OF PARAGRAPH 9 , AND , ON THE OTHER HAND , WORKERS ENTITLED TO APPLY TO ' ' BUY-IN ' ' ONLY BY VIRTUE OF COMMUNITY LAW , WHO ARE REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH 8 ( A ) AND ( B ) AND IN THE SECOND SENTENCE OF PARAGRAPH 9 .

12 ACCORDING TO THE SECOND SENTENCE OF PARAGRAPH 9 PERSONS IN THE SECOND CATEGORY , THAT IS TO SAY THOSE REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH 8 ( B ) AND ( C ), MAY ' ' PAY CONTRIBUTIONS ONLY IN RESPECT OF PERIODS FOR WHICH THEY HAVE NOT YET PAID CONTRIBUTIONS UNDER THE LEGISLATION OF ANOTHER MEMBER STATE ' ' . IN OTHER WORDS , THEY ARE BARRED FROM ' ' BUYING-IN ' ' PERIODS WHICH , FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE GERMAN LEGISLATION , ARE ACTUALLY MISSING , WHILST THEY CORRESPOND TO CONTRIBUTION PERIODS IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE , EVEN THOUGH IT MAY BE IN THEIR INTERESTS TO DO SO BECAUSE , FOR INSTANCE , THEY DO NOT HAVE ANY OTHER PERIODS TO BE BOUGHT IN . IT IS THEREFORE

SELF-EVIDENT THAT THE COMPETENT GERMAN INSTITUTIONS CANNOT REQUIRE THEM TO ' ' BUY-IN ' ' THOSE PERIODS EVEN THOUGH THEY ARE MORE RECENT THAN THE PERIODS TO BE ' ' BOUGHT-IN ' ' .

13 ON THE OTHER HAND , IN THE CASE OF WORKERS IN THE FIRST CATEGORY WHO DERIVE THE RIGHT TO ' ' BUY-IN ' ' DIRECTLY FROM THE GERMAN LEGISLATION , THE SITUATION PRIOR TO THE AMENDMENT OF PART C OF ANNEX V MAINTAINED . THEY MAY BUY-IN EVEN PERIODS COVERED BY CONTRIBUTIONS IN OTHER MEMBER STATES - WHICH MAY IN FACT BE TO THEIR ADVANTAGE - BUT THE COUNTERPART OF THAT OPTION IS THAT THEY MAY BE REQUIRED TO BUY-IN THOSE PERIODS BEFORE THE GERMAN PERIODS LYING FURTHER BACK IN TIME . THAT IS CLEARLY EXPRESSED AT THE BEGINNING OF PARA- GRAPH 9 WHICH STATES : ' ' REGULATION ( NO 1408/71 ) SHALL NOT AFFECT . . . ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) OF THE CLERICAL STAFF PENSION REFORM LAW . ' ' THE COMMISSION HAS STATED THAT IT HAS ACCEPTED THE SPECIAL SITUATION OF THOSE WORKERS , NOW IN DISPUTE , OWING TO THE CLOSE AND LEGITIMATE LINK , PARTICULARLY FROM THE FINANCIAL VIEWPOINT , WHICH THE GERMAN LEGISLATURE HAS PLACED BETWEEN A RIGHT TO BUY-IN , WHICH WAS GENEROUSLY EXTENDED TO COVER A WIDE CATEGORY OF PERSONS , AND AN OBLIGATION INTENDED TO PREVENT INSURED PERSONS FROM BEING ABLE TO BUY-IN SYSTEMATICALLY THE LEAST EXPENSIVE PERIODS , IN THIS CASE THOSE FURTHER BACK IN TIME .

14 IT THUS FOLLOWS FROM THE OBJECTS AND THE WORDING OF PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V THAT THOSE PROVISIONS , AND IN PARTICULAR THE FIRST SENTENCE OF PARAGRAPH 9 , ARE INTENDED TO ENABLE THE REQUIREMENT OF RETROGRESSIVE BUYING-IN SET FORTH IN ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) OF THE 1957 LAW TO CONTINUE TO EXIST IN THE LEGISLATION OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY EVEN THOUGH THE MOST RECENT PERIODS CORRESPOND TO PERIODS IN WHICH CONTRIBUTIONS WERE COMPULSORY IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE . WHENEVER A GERMAN NATIONAL OR A NATIONAL OF ANOTHER MEMBER STATE RESIDING IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY CLAIMS THE BENEFIT OF ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) THE CONTRIBUTION PERIODS IN OTHER MEMBER STATES ARE NOT THEREFORE REGARDED AS ' ' COVERED ' ' BUT MUST BE BOUGHT-IN FIRST IF THEY ARE MORE RECENT THAN NATIONAL PERIODS WHICH ARE IN FACT NOT COVERED . ON THE OTHER HAND , THAT REQUIREMENT MAY NOT BE APPLIED AGAINST THE PERSONS REFERRED TO IN PARAGRAPH 8 ( B ) AND ( C ) WHO , MOREOVER , ARE NOT IN ANY EVENT ALLOWED TO ' ' BUY-IN ' ' PERIODS COMPLETED IN OTHER MEMBER STATES .

BREACH OF THE PRINCIPLE OF NON-DISCRIMINATION

15 IT IS NOW APPROPRIATE TO EXAMINE THE QUESTION WHETHER THE DIFFERENCE IN TREATMENT WHICH IS INDISPUTABLY APPLIED BY PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V BETWEEN , ON THE ONE HAND , GERMAN WORKERS AND FOREIGNERS RESIDING IN THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY - REFERRED TO IN THE FIRST SENTENCE OF PARAGRAPH 9 - AND , ON THE OTHER HAND , WORKERS FROM OTHER MEMBER STATES - REFERRED TO IN THE SECOND SENTENCE OF PARAGRAPH 9 - DOES NOT CONSTITUTE DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE FORMER .

16 ACCORDING TO THE ESTABLISHED CASE-LAW OF THE COURT THE GENERAL PRINCIPLE OF EQUALITY , OF WHICH THE PROHIBITION ON DISCRIMINATION ON GROUNDS OF NATIONALITY IS MERELY A SPECIFIC ENUNCIATION , IS ONE OF THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF COMMUNITY LAW . THIS PRINCIPLE REQUIRES THAT SIMILAR SITUATIONS SHALL NOT BE TREATED DIFFERENTLY UNLESS DIFFERENTIATION IS OBJECTIVELY JUSTIFIED .

17 AN EXAMINATION OF THE ADVANTAGES AND DRAWBACKS OF THE TWO LEGAL SITUATIONS WHICH HAVE TO BE COMPARED LEADS TO THE CONCLUSION THAT THE OBJECTION AS TO DISCRIMINATION CANNOT BE SUSTAINED IN REGARD TO EITHER OF THOSE SITUATIONS SINCE THEY CANNOT BE REGARDED AS BEING MORE FAVOURABLE TO ONE THAN TO THE OTHER CATEGORY OF WORKERS CONCERNED . THE FINANCIAL BURDEN OF THE BUYING-IN TRANSACTION WILL IN FACT BE HEAVIER OR LIGHTER FOR EITHER CATEGORY DEPENDING ON WHETHER THE PERIODS TO BE BOUGHT-IN ARE MORE RECENT OR FURTHER BACK IN TIME SO THAT THE FINANCIAL EFFECT OF THE RULES IN QUESTION IS NOT IN GENERAL MORE UNFAVOURABLE TO ONE THAN TO THE OTHER OF THE TWO CATEGORIES . THE VARIATIONS IN THAT FINANCIAL BURDEN FROM ONE INDIVIDUAL CASE TO ANOTHER ARE IN FACT EXCLUSIVELY THE RESULT OF THE OBJECTIVELY DIFFERENT FACTUAL SITUATIONS IN WHICH THE INSURED PERSONS CONCERNED MAY FIND THEMSELVES DEPENDING ON THE CHANGES AND CHANCES OF THEIR WORKING LIFE .

18 THE REPLY TO THE QUESTION SUBMITTED SHOULD THEREFORE BE THAT PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 OF PART C OF ANNEX V TO REGULATION NO 1408/71 , AS AMENDED BY REGULATION NO 1392/74 , MUST BE INTERPRETED TO MEAN THAT A GERMAN NATIONAL WHO HAS PAID CONTRIBUTIONS TO OLD-AGE PENSION INSURANCE IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE AND WHO SUBSEQUENTLY WISHES TO PAY A POSTERIORI , BUT WITH RETROACTIVE EFFECT WITHIN THE MEANING OF ARTICLE 49A ( 2 ) ADDED TO THE ANGESTELLTENVERSICHERUNGS-NEUREGELUNGSGESETZ BY THE RENTENREFORMGESETZ OF 16 OCTOBER 1972 , GERMAN PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS IN RESPECT OF PREVIOUS PERIODS MAY BE REQUIRED TO PAY GERMAN CONTRIBUTIONS IN RESPECT OF PERIODS COVERED BY CONTRIBUTIONS IN ANOTHER MEMBER STATE AND THAT CONSIDERATION OF THE SAID PARAGRAPHS 8 AND 9 , AS THUS CONSTRUED , HAS DISCLOSED NO FACTOR OF SUCH A KIND AS TO AFFECT THEIR VALIDITY .

Decision on costs

19 THE COSTS INCURRED BY THE COMMISSION OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES , WHICH HAS SUBMITTED OBSERVATIONS TO THE COURT , ARE NOT RECOVERABLE . SINCE THE PROCEEDINGS ARE , IN SO FAR AS THE PARTIES TO THE MAIN ACTION ARE CONCERNED , IN THE NATURE OF A STEP IN THE ACTION PENDING BEFORE THE NATIONAL COURT , THE DECISION ON COSTS IS A MATTER FOR THAT COURT .

JUDGMENT

(The account of the facts and issues which is contained in the complete text of the judgment is not reproduced)

Decision

1 By an order of 5 June 1984, which was received at the Court on 2 July 1984, the Bundesarbeitsgericht referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty three questions on the interpretation of Article 119 of that Treaty.

2 Those questions arose in the course of proceedings between Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH and its former employee Karin Weber von Hartz concerning the payment to Mrs Weber von Hartz of a retirement pension from a supplementary pension scheme established by Bilka for its employees.

3 It appears from the documents before the Court that for several years Bilka, which belongs to a group of department stores in the Federal Republic of Germany employing several thousand persons, has had a supplementary (occupational) pension scheme for its employees. This scheme, which has been modified on several occasions, is regarded as an integral part of the contracts of employment between Bilka and its employees.

4 According to the version in force since 26 October 1973, part-time employees may obtain pensions under the scheme only if they have worked full time for at least 15 years over a total period of 20 years.

- 5 Mrs Weber was employed by Bilka as a sales assistant from 1961 to 1976. After initially working full time, she chose to work part time from 1 October 1972 until her employment came to an end. Since she had not worked full time for the minimum period of 15 years, Bilka refused to pay her an occupational pension under its scheme.

- 6 Mrs Weber brought proceedings before the German labour courts challenging the legality of Bilka's refusal to pay her a pension. She argued inter alia that the occupational pension scheme was contrary to the principle of equal pay for men and women laid down in Article 119 of the EEC Treaty. She asserted that the requirement of a minimum period of full-time employment for the payment of an occupational pension placed women workers at a disadvantage, since they were more likely than their male colleagues to take part-time work so as to be able to care for their family and children.

- 7 Bilka, on the other hand, argued that it was not guilty of any breach of the principle of equal pay since there were objectively justified economic grounds for its decision to exclude part-time employees from the occupational pension scheme. It emphasized in that regard that in comparison with the employment of part-time workers the employment of full-time workers entails lower ancillary costs and permits the use of staff throughout opening hours. Relying on statistics concerning the group to which it belongs, Bilka stated that up to 1980 81.3% of all occupational pensions were paid to women, although only 72% of employees were women. Those figures, it said, showed that the scheme in question does not entail discrimination on the basis of sex.

- 8 On appeal the proceedings between Mrs Weber and Bilka came before the Bundesarbeitsgericht; that court decided to stay the proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court:
  - (1) May there be an infringement of Article 119 of the EEC Treaty in the form of 'indirect discrimination' where a department store which employs predominantly women excludes part-time employees from benefits under its occupational pension scheme although such exclusion affects disproportionately more women than men?

(2) If so:

- (a) Can the undertaking justify that disadvantage on the ground that its objective is to employ as few part-time workers as possible even though in the department store sector there are no reasons of commercial expediency which necessitate such a staff policy?
- (b) Is the undertaking under a duty to structure its pension scheme in such a way that appropriate account is taken of the special difficulties experienced by employees with family commitments in fulfilling the requirements for an occupational pension?

9 In accordance with Article 20 of the Protocol on the Statute of the Court of Justice of the EEC written observations were submitted by Bilka, Mrs Weber von Hartz, the United Kingdom and the Commission of the European Communities.

The applicability of Article 119

10 The United Kingdom puts forward the preliminary argument that the conditions placed by an employer on the admission of its employees to an occupational pension scheme such as that described by the national court do not fall within the scope of Article 119 of the Treaty.

11 In support of that argument it refers to the judgment of 15 June 1978 (Case 149/77 Defrenne v Sabena [1978] ECR 1365), in which the Court held that Article 119 concerns only pay discrimination between men and women workers and its scope cannot be extended to other elements of the employment relationship, even where such elements may have financial consequences for the persons concerned.

12 The United Kingdom cites further the judgment of 16 February 1982 (Case 19/81 Burton v British Railways Board [1982] ECR 555) where the Court held that alleged discrimination resulting from a difference in the ages of eligibility set for men and women for payment under a voluntary redundancy scheme was covered not by Article 119 but by Council Directive 76/207 of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (Official Journal 1976, L 39, p. 40).

- 13 At the hearing the United Kingdom also referred to the proposal for a Council directive on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in occupational social security schemes submitted by the Commission on 5 May 1983 (Official Journal 1983, C 134, p. 7). According to the United Kingdom, the fact that the Commission considered it necessary to submit such a proposal shows that occupational pension schemes such as that described by the national court are covered not by Article 119 but by Articles 117 and 118, so that the application of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in that area requires the adoption of special provisions by the Community institutions.

- 14 The Commission, on the other hand, has argued that the occupational pension scheme described by the national court falls within the concept of pay for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 119. In support of its view it refers to the judgment of 11 March 1981 (Case 69/80 Worringham and Humphreys v Lloyds Bank [1981] ECR 767).

- 15 In order to resolve the problem of interpretation raised by the United Kingdom it must be recalled that under the first paragraph of Article 119 the Member States must ensure the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. The second paragraph of Article 119 defines 'pay' as 'the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives, directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment from his employer'.

- 16 In its judgment of 25 May 1971 (Case 80/70 Defrenne v Belgium [1971] ECR 445), the Court examined the question whether a retirement pension paid under a statutory social security scheme constitutes consideration received by the worker indirectly from the employer in respect of his employment, within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 119.

- 17 The Court replied in the negative, taking the view that, although pay within the meaning of Article 119 could in principle include social security benefits, it did not include social security schemes or benefits, in particular retirement pensions, directly governed by legislation which do not involve any element of agreement within the undertaking or trade concerned and are compulsory for general categories of workers.
- 18 In that regard the Court pointed out that social security schemes guarantee workers the benefit of a statutory scheme to which workers, employers and in some cases the authorities contribute financially to an extent determined less by the employment relationship between the employer and the worker than by considerations of social policy, so that the employer's contribution cannot be regarded as a direct or indirect payment to the worker for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 119.
- 19 The question therefore arises whether the conclusion reached by the Court in that judgment is also applicable to the case before the national court.
- 20 It should be noted that according to the documents before the Court the occupational pension scheme at issue in the main proceedings, although adopted in accordance with the provisions laid down by German legislation for such schemes, is based on an agreement between Bilka and the staff committee representing its employees and has the effect of supplementing the social benefits paid under national legislation of general application with benefits financed entirely by the employer.
- 21 The contractual rather than statutory nature of the scheme in question is confirmed by the fact that, as has been pointed out above, the scheme and the rules governing it are regarded as an integral part of the contracts of employment between Bilka and its employees.

- 22 It must therefore be concluded that the scheme does not constitute a social security scheme governed directly by statute and thus outside the scope of Article 119. Benefits paid to employees under the scheme therefore constitute consideration received by the worker from the employer in respect of his employment, as referred to in the second paragraph of Article 119.
- 23 The case before the national court therefore falls within the scope of Article 119.

The first question

- 24 In the first of its questions the national court asks whether a staff policy pursued by a department store company excluding part-time employees from an occupational pension scheme constitutes discrimination contrary to Article 119 where that exclusion affects a far greater number of women than men.
- 25 In order to reply to that question reference must be made to the judgment of 31 March 1981 (Case 96/80 Jenkins v Kingsgate [1981] ECR 911).
- 26 In that judgment the Court considered the question whether the payment of a lower hourly rate for part-time work than for full-time work was compatible with Article 119.
- 27 Such a practice is comparable to that at issue before the national court in this case: Bilka does not pay different hourly rates to part-time and full-time workers, but it grants only full-time workers an occupational pension. Since, as was stated above, such a pension falls within the concept of pay for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 119 it follows that, hour for hour, the total remuneration paid by Bilka to full-time workers is higher than that paid to part-time workers.

- 28 The conclusion reached by the Court in its judgment of 31 March 1981 is therefore equally valid in the context of this case.
- 29 If, therefore, it should be found that a much lower proportion of women than of men work full time, the exclusion of part-time workers from the occupational pension scheme would be contrary to Article 119 of the Treaty where, taking into account the difficulties encountered by women workers in working full-time, that measure could not be explained by factors which exclude any discrimination on grounds of sex.
- 30 However, if the undertaking is able to show that its pay practice may be explained by objectively justified factors unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex there is no breach of Article 119.
- 31 The answer to the first question referred by the national court must therefore be that Article 119 of the EEC Treaty is infringed by a department store company which excludes part-time employees from its occupational pension scheme, where that exclusion affects a far greater number of women than men, unless the undertaking shows that the exclusion is based on objectively justified factors unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex.

Question 2 (a)

- 32 In its second question the national court seeks in essence to know whether the reasons put forward by Bilka to explain its pay policy may be regarded as 'objectively justified economic grounds', as referred to in the judgment of 31 March 1981, where the interests of undertakings in the department store sector do not require such a policy.
- 33 In its observations Bilka argues that the exclusion of part-time workers from the occupational pension scheme is intended solely to discourage part-time work, since in general part-time workers refuse to work in the late afternoon and on Saturdays. In order to ensure the presence of an adequate workforce during those periods it was therefore necessary to make full-time work more attractive than part-time work, by making the occupational pension scheme open only to full-time workers. Bilka concludes that on the basis of the judgment of 31 March 1981 it cannot be accused of having infringed Article 119.

34 In reply to the reasons put forward to justify the exclusion of part-time workers Mrs Weber von Hartz points out that Bilka is in no way obliged to employ part-time workers and that if it decides to do so it may not subsequently restrict the pension rights of such workers, which are already reduced by reason of the fact that they work fewer hours.

35 According to the Commission, in order to establish that there has been no breach of Article 119 it is not sufficient to show that in adopting a pay practice which in fact discriminates against women workers the employer sought to achieve objectives other than discrimination against women. The Commission considers that in order to justify such a pay practice from the point of view of Article 119 the employer must, as the Court held in its judgment of 31 March 1981, put forward objective economic grounds relating to the management of the undertaking. It is also necessary to ascertain whether the pay practice in question is necessary and in proportion to the objectives pursued by the employer.

36 It is for the national court, which has sole jurisdiction to make findings of fact, to determine whether and to what extent the grounds put forward by an employer to explain the adoption of a pay practice which applies independently of a worker's sex but in fact affects more women than men may be regarded as objectively justified economic grounds. If the national court finds that the measures chosen by Bilka correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate with a view to achieving the objectives pursued and are necessary to that end, the fact that the measures affect a far greater number of women than men is not sufficient to show that they constitute an infringement of Article 119.

37 The answer to question 2 (a) must therefore be that under Article 119 a department store company may justify the adoption of a pay policy excluding part-time workers, irrespective of their sex, from its occupational pension scheme on the ground that it seeks to employ as few part-time workers as possible, where it is found that the means chosen for achieving that objective correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate with a view to achieving the objective in question and are necessary to that end.

Question 2 (b)

- 38 Finally, in Question 2 (b), the national court asks whether an employer is obliged under Article 119 of the Treaty to organize its occupational pension scheme in such a manner as to take into account the fact that family responsibilities prevent women workers from fulfilling the requirements for such a pension.
- 39 In her observations Mrs Weber von Hartz argues that the answer to that question should be in the affirmative. She argues that the disadvantages suffered by women because of the exclusion of part-time workers from the occupational pension scheme must at least be mitigated by requiring the employer to regard periods during which women workers have had to meet family responsibilities as periods of full-time work.
- 40 According to the Commission, on the other hand, the principle laid down in Article 119 does not require employers, in establishing occupational pension schemes, to take into account their employees' family responsibilities. In the Commission's view, that objective must be pursued by means of measures adopted under Article 117. It refers in that regard to its proposal for a Council directive on voluntary part-time work submitted on 4 January 1982 (Official Journal 1982, C 62, p. 7) and amended on 5 January 1983 (Official Journal 1983, C 18, p. 5), which has not yet been adopted.
- 41 It must be pointed out that, as was stated in the judgment of 15 June 1978, the scope of Article 119 is restricted to the question of pay discrimination between men and women workers. Problems related to other conditions of work and employment, on the other hand, are covered generally by other provisions of Community law, in particular Articles 117 and 118 of the Treaty, with a view to the harmonization of the social systems of Member States and the approximation of their legislation in that area.

42 The imposition of an obligation such as that envisaged by the national court in its question goes beyond the scope of Article 119 and has no other basis in Community law as it now stands.

43 The answer to Question 2 (b) must therefore be that Article 119 does not have the effect of requiring an employer to organize its occupational pension scheme in such a manner as to take into account the particular difficulties faced by persons with family responsibilities in meeting the conditions for entitlement to such a pension.

Costs

44 The costs incurred by the United Kingdom and the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. As these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions submitted to it by the Bundesarbeitsgericht by order of 5 June 1984, hereby rules:

- (1) Article 119 of the EEC Treaty is infringed by a department store company which excludes part-time employees from its occupational pension scheme, where that exclusion affects a far greater number of women than men, unless the undertaking shows that the exclusion is based on objectively justified factors unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex.

- (2) Under Article 119 a department store company may justify the adoption of a pay policy excluding part-time workers, irrespective of their sex, from its occupational pension scheme on the ground that it seeks to employ as few part-time workers as possible, where it is found that the means chosen for achieving that objective correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate with a view to achieving the objective in question and are necessary to that end.
- (3) Article 119 does not have the effect of requiring an employer to organize its occupational pension scheme in such a manner as to take into account the particular difficulties faced by persons with family responsibilities in meeting the conditions for entitlement to such a pension.

1 Introduction

1.1 Overview

Nykomb Synergetics Technology Holding AB (“Nykomb”) is a joint stock company organized in 1995 under the laws of Sweden.

SIA Windau (“Windau”) is a joint stock company organized in 1991 under the laws of Latvia. Windau was originally 100 per cent owned and controlled by Latvian citizens, but Nykomb acquired 51 per cent of the share capital in March 1999 and 49 per cent in September 2000, making Windau a 100 per cent owned subsidiary of Nykomb.

The State Joint-Stock Company Latvenergo (“Latvenergo”) was organized as a state enterprise under Latvian law in 1991, and was in 1993 transformed into a joint stock company under Latvian law. The Republic of Latvia (the “Republic”) owns 100 per cent of the shares in Latvenergo. By an amendment of 3 August 2000 to the Latvian Energy Law the company is defined as “a national economy object of the State economy” that shall not be privatized. The company is actively involved in the production, purchase and distribution of electric power in Latvia.

On 24 March 1997 Latvenergo and Windau entered into an agreement called Contract No. 16/97 (the “Contract” or “Contract No. 16/97”) whereby Windau undertook to build a so called cogeneration plant in the town of Bauska, which was to produce electric power and heat on the basis of natural gas, the electric power to be purchased by Latvenergo and distributed over the national grid, and the heat to be purchased and distributed by the Bauska municipality. The plant was built and was ready to start production on 17 September 1999, but did not start until 28 February 2000 due to a dispute over the purchase price to be paid by Latvenergo. Since 28 February 2000 the Bauska plant has been delivering electric power to Latvenergo according to an interim or settlement agreement of 10 March 2000, at a price which in the Claimant’s view is less than Windau is entitled to under the Contract. The price dispute will be further explored below, but in short the delivery price stipulated in the purchase contracts entered into by Latvenergo is composed of two elements, the general tariff for average sales prices per kWh set by regulatory authorities and a multiplier set by Latvian laws or regulations. The Claimant contends that Windau was ensured for the first eight years of operation a multiplier of two (the “double tariff”), while Latvenergo considers the correct multiplier to be 0.75 of the tariff.

After unsuccessful attempts to reach an amicable settlement Nykomb on 11 December 2001 requested arbitration at the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce in accordance with Article 26.4.c of the Energy Charter Treaty of 17 December 1994 (the “Treaty” or the “ECT”). After exchanges of written briefs a preparatory meeting on 28 February 2003 and a hearing on 15 – 19 September 2003 was held in Stockholm.

1.2 The Claimant's prayers for relief and legal grounds

1.2.1 The Claimant's prayers for relief

In its Statement of Claim the Claimant made the following prayers for relief:

“Nykomb respectfully requests that the Arbitral Tribunal order the Republic:

- (i) to pay to Nykomb an amount of 667 158 Lats together with interest thereon from 17 September 1999 until actual payment at an annual rate of 6 per cent.
- (ii) to pay to Nykomb an amount of 2 311 020 Lats together with interest thereon from 28 February 2000 until actual payment at an annual rate of 6 per cent.
- (iii) to pay to Nykomb an amount of 4 119 502 Lats together with interest thereon from 16 September 2002 until actual payment at an annual rate of 6 per cent.

Nykomb respectfully requests the Arbitral Tribunal to order the Republic to compensate Nykomb for its cost of arbitration in an amount to be specified later and, as between the parties, alone to bear the responsibility for the compensation to the Arbitral Tribunal and to the Arbitration Institute of the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce.”

In its Brief No. I of 21 March 2003 the Claimant presented as secondary prayers for relief the following:

“Should the Tribunal find that compensation for future losses, i.e. compensation for the period from 30 April 2003 until 16 September 2007 as described above, may not be awarded as claimed by Nykomb in the Statement of Claim – with the exception of the applied discount rate of 6 per cent in Nykomb's present value computation or a finding of an expected yearly production of less than 24 813 MWh - Nykomb respectfully, as a secondary prayer for relief, requests the Tribunal to

- (i) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 667 158 Lats together with interest thereon from 17 September 1999 until actual payment is made at an annual rate of 6 per cent;
- (ii) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 2 817 591,7 Lats - or such higher amount that may follow from electricity produced and supplied during March and April 2003 - together with interest thereon from 28 February 2000 until actual payment is made at an annual rate of 6 per cent;
- (iii) confirm that the surplus electric power produced by and purchased from the Bauska Plant is to be purchased at a tariff to be calculated as twice the average electric sales tariff approved by the relevant regulatory body in the Republic of Latvia, currently  $30,28 \times 2 = 60,56$  Lats/MWh, and
- (iv) confirm that the surplus electric power so purchased shall be paid on a monthly basis.”

In its Brief No. I of 21 March 2003 the Claimant also stated:

“1.8 As a general point for the primary as well as secondary prayers for relief forwarded by Nykomb, the Tribunal may in the alternative and at its discretion decide whether any award shall be performed by the Republic on its own behalf or as principal for (on behalf of) Latvenergo, and likewise whether such performance shall be made to Nykomb on its own behalf or as principal for (on behalf of) its investment enterprise Windau.

1.9 Despite that Windau is not a party to this arbitration; it would in Nykomb's opinion not be incompatible with international law and the concept of arbitration under the Treaty to extend the res judicata effect of an award also to Windau, being wholly-owned and under direct control of Nykomb.

1.10 The Tribunal may also, as far as Nykomb is concerned, in the alternative and at its discretion, consider to ordering that any damages be paid directly to the investment enterprise Windau rather than to Nykomb as claimant investor. Such a solution is supported by arbitral jurisprudence within international investment law (see the “Mondev Award”, at para 86). “

In its Brief No. III of 9 September 2003 the Claimant amended its prayers for relief as follows:

“A. The Tribunal shall:

- (i) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 667 158 Lats together with interest thereon from 17 September 1999 until the day of judgement at an annual rate of 6 per cent, and for the period thereafter until actual payment at an annual rate of 18 %.
- (ii) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 2 311 020 Lats together with interest thereon from 28 February 2000 until the day of judgement at an annual rate of 6 per cent, and for the period thereafter until actual payment at an annual rate of 18 %.
- (iii) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 4 119 502 Lats together with interest thereon from 16 September 2002 until the day of judgement at an annual rate of 6 per cent, and for the period thereafter until actual payment at an annual rate of 18 %.

B. Nykomb’s secondary prayer for relief, as submitted in Brief I dated 21 March 2003, shall be adjusted accordingly. The Tribunal shall:

- (i) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 667 158 Lats together with interest thereon from 17 September 1999 until the day of judgement at an annual rate of 6 per cent, and for the period thereafter until actual payment at an annual rate of 18 %.
- (ii) order the Republic, to pay to Nykomb, an amount of 3 019 030 Lats together with interest thereon from 28 February 2000 until the day of judgement at an annual rate of 6 per cent, and for the period thereafter until actual payment at an annual rate of 18 %.
- (iii) confirm that the surplus electric power produced by and purchased from the Bauska Plant is to be purchased at a tariff to be calculated as twice the average electric sales tariff approved by the relevant regulatory body in the Republic of Latvia, currently 30,28 (double tariff = 60,56) Lats/MWh.
- (iv) confirm that the surplus electric power so purchased shall be paid on a monthly basis.”

1.2.2 Calculation of the amounts in the Claimant's prayers for relief

The specifications given in the Statement of Claim and in subsequent briefs show that the amounts in the Prayers for Relief have been arrived at as follows:

a) Calculations used in the Statement of Claim Prayers for Relief
(i) Deadlock period 17 September 1999-28 February 2000
Expected production (like September 2000-February 2001)	14.661.35 MWh
At double tariff 60.56 amounts to (for 163 days)	779.593 Lats
Lost income on heat	82.700 Lats
Less calculated cost of gas	- 215.135 Lats
Calculated net loss on electricity and heat	667.158 Lats
(ii) Loss of income 28 February 2000-16 September 2002
Actual production in period (according to invoices)	61.057.33 MWh
Difference double-0.75 tariff (60.56-22.71) = 37.85 Lats	2.311.020 Lats

(iii) Loss of income in rest of the 8 years' period, 16 September 2002-16 September 2007
Estimated 5 years' production (like 2001 = 25.249,62 MWh)	126.248.1 MWh
Difference double-0.75 tariff (60.56-22.71) = 37.85 Lats	4.778.491.20 Lats
Discounted at 6 percent per annum	4.119.502.00 Lats

b) Calculations used in the Brief No. III Prayers for Relief

Primary Request for Relief:

Calculations not presented, but the capital sums are identical to the calculations in the Statement of Claims (see details above).
Claims for interest differ from the claims in the Statement of Claim.

(i) Deadlock period 17 September 1999-28 February 2000
Net calculated loss on electricity and heat	667.158 Lats
(ii) Loss of income 28 February 2000-16 September 2002	2.311.020 Lats
(iii) Loss of income 16 September 2002 – 16 September 2007	4.119.502.00 Lats

Secondary Request for Relief:

(i) Deadlock period 17 September 1999-28 February 2000
Net calculated loss (presumably calculated as above)	667.158 Lats
(ii) Loss of income 28 February 2000-30 April 2003
Actual production in period (see Brief No. II page 40)	79.763 MWh
Difference double-0.75 tariff (60.56-22.71) = 37.85 Lats	3.019.030 Lats
(iii) Order for double tariff to be paid in the future.
(This claim is not specified as to time period, but presumably relates to the period 30 April 2003 – 16 September 2007.)

The Arbitral Tribunal notes that the primary request for relief in its final version continues to be based on a period of actual deliveries from 28 February 2000 to 16 September 2002, while the secondary request for relief has been updated to cover a period of actual deliveries from 28 February 2000 to 30 April 2003. Consequently, in both cases the third period concerning future deliveries up to 16 September 2007 includes a period up to the time of this award where deliveries have actually taken place and have been paid at 0.75 of the tariff.

The Arbitral Tribunal further notes that, apart from the claim for lost net income on heat production in the “deadlock” period, all the claimed amounts are based on the estimated or actual production of electricity at Bauska in the various periods, with calculation of the price at the double tariff, less the price at 0.75 of the tariff actually paid by Latvenergo to Windau for deliveries after 28 February 2000. In other words, the amounts claimed in the prayers for relief are equal to Windau’s alleged loss of net income for non-delivered heat and electricity in the deadlock period plus Windau’s alleged loss of income for the period after 28 February 2000 due to the fact that Latvenergo has only paid 0.75 of the tariff for delivered electricity.

1.2.3 Legal grounds asserted by the Claimant

Notwithstanding the way the Claimant calculates its losses, and notwithstanding the remarks in section 1.8-1.10 of the Claimant's brief of 21 March 2003 cited above, the Claimant does not appear to assert that it is entitled to claim payment directly to itself of the damages allegedly due to Windau for loss of net income on undelivered fuel and electricity during the deadlock period or the difference in purchase prices between the double tariff and the price actually paid to Windau for delivered electricity, nor does the Claimant appear to claim that it is entitled to pursue such a claim on behalf of its subsidiary Windau in this arbitration.

The Claimant must be understood to claim for the losses or damages it has incurred itself as a result of the undelivered heat and electricity during the deadlock period and as a result of the refusal of Latvenergo to pay the double tariff in the first eight years of production at Bauska. The Republic is asserted to be liable for breaches of its obligations under the Treaty, a) either directly liable on account of its own actions or lack of action, or liable because Latvenergo is a state organ or enterprise, or because Latvenergo's actions are attributable to the Republic, and b) because the non-payment of the double tariff amount to breaches of the Republic's obligations under Part III of the Treaty.

The Claimant asserts that Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff:

- violates the obligation of fair and equitable treatment of investors, Article 10 (1);
- constitutes a treatment less favorable than required by international law, including treaty obligations, Article 10 (1);
- constitutes an impairment by unreasonable or discriminatory measures, Article 10 (1);
- constitutes measures having effect equivalent to expropriation, Article 13 (1).

With regard to Article 22 in Part IV of the Treaty the Claimant remarked in its closing statement:

“There was no negotiation, and there was obviously no economic motivation for Latvenergo to enter into one or several double tariff agreements, but Latvenergo had to deal with Nykomb, and others, and under conditions established by law only. There was no normal “haggling” about price as stated by Professor Wälde. Latvenergo held and still holds that position itself. It is in a monopolistic, public-service market that this transaction took place and which dominates its character from beginning to the end. This attribution – i.e. the operation by which the conduct of Latvenergo is treated as if it were an integral part of the state and by which the veil of its corporate personality is pierced (or lifted) – is based on customary international law (applicable under Art. 26 (6) of the Treaty), the State Responsibility draft of the International Law Commission as interpreted in the most recent and relevant awards, namely Maffezini I and II and in particular Salini v. Morocco. In addition it is also operated by operation of Art. 22 (1, 3 and 4) of the Treaty. We believe Art. 22 to be a special attribution norm for the primary obligations contained in part III of the Treaty, but whatever the legal argument about this, customary international law rules are fully sufficient for attribution and Art. 22 (1, 3 and 4) merely reinforce, by direct effect or by an indirect interpretative support, the attribution. Using a very old and in civil law established concept, Art 22 is clearly “accessory” (“akzessorisch”, “accessorisk”), to the “primary” obligations in Part III of the Treaty.”

The Claimant denies that its claims, or any part thereof, should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

1.3 The Respondent's prayers for relief and asserted legal grounds

In its statement of Defence of 27 November 2002 the Respondent made the following “Prayers for dismissal”:

“3.1 The Republic respectfully requests the Arbitral Tribunal:

(i) to dismiss the claim on its merits;

(ii) to order Nykomb to compensate the Republic for its costs of arbitration in an amount to be specified later; and

(iii) to order Nykomb, as between the parties, alone to be liable for the compensation to the Arbitral Tribunal and to the Arbitration Institute of the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce.

3.2 The Republic does not admit to the amount of Nykomb’s claim.

3.3 Should the Arbitral Tribunal find that Nykomb has a valid claim for damages the Republic respectfully requests the Arbitral Tribunal to limit any adjudged damages to an amount that does not exceed the loss incurred by Nykomb on its investment”.

In its Response of 4 September 2003 to Claimant’s Brief II the Respondent summed up its position as follows:

“8.2 Accordingly, Latvia respectfully requests that the Arbitral Tribunal adjudge and declare:

(i) that it lacks the jurisdiction to entertain the claim in the nature submitted by Nykomb; or

(ii) that Latvenergo’s conducts are not attributable to Latvia; and/or

(iii) that Latvia has not contravened any of its obligations under Part III of the Treaty; or

(iv) that Nykomb has not suffered any loss to warrant compensation; and

(v) that all costs of this arbitral proceedings, including legal costs, are to be borne by Nykomb”.

The Arbitral Tribunal understands these statements to the effect that the Respondent principally claims that all the Claimant’s claims should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, and in any event be dismissed on their merits. With respect to the Claimant’s new claims for interest at 18 per cent rather than 6 percent per annum from the time of the award, the Respondent requests that the new interest claim be dismissed for being submitted too late.

2 Jurisdiction

2.1 The general basis for the Arbitral Tribunal’s jurisdiction

The Claimant claims jurisdiction for this arbitration on the basis of Article 26.4.c of the Energy Charter Treaty of 17 December 1994 (the “Treaty” or the “ECT”). The article reads in part:

“ARTICLE 26 SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES BETWEEN AN INVESTOR AND A CONTRACTING PARTY

(1) Disputes between a Contracting Party and an Investor of another Contracting Party relating to an Investment of the latter in the Area of the former, which concern an alleged breach of an obligation of the former under Part III shall, if possible, be settled amicably.

(2) If such disputes can not be settled according to the provisions of paragraph (1) within a period of three months from the date on which either party to the dispute requested amicable settlement, the Investor party to the dispute may choose to submit it for resolution:

- (a) to the courts or administrative tribunals of the Contracting Party party to the dispute;
- (b) in accordance with any applicable, previously agreed dispute settlement procedure; or
- (c) in accordance with the following paragraphs of this Article.

(3) ---

(4) In the event that an Investor chooses to submit the dispute for resolution under subparagraph (2) (c), the Investor shall further provide its consent in writing for the dispute to be submitted to:

“Investment” and “investor” as used in Article 26 are defined in Article 1 of the Treaty:

ARTICLE 1 DEFINITIONS

As used in this Treaty:

(6) “Investment” means every kind of asset, owned or controlled directly or indirectly by an Investor and includes:

- (a) tangible and intangible, and movable and immovable, property, and any property rights such as leases, mortgages, liens, and pledges;
- (b) a company or business enterprise, or shares, stock, or other forms of equity participation in a company or business enterprise, and bonds and other debt of a company or business enterprise;
- (c) claims to money and claims to performance pursuant to contract having an economic value and associated with an Investment;
- (d) Intellectual Property;
- (e) Returns;
- (f) any right conferred by law or contract or by virtue of any licences and permits granted pursuant to law to undertake any Economic Activity in the Energy Sector.

A change in the form in which assets are invested does not affect their character as investments and the term “Investment” includes all investments, whether existing at or made after the later of the date of entry into force of this Treaty for the Contracting Party of the Investor making the investment and that for the Contracting Party in the Area of which the investment is made (hereinafter referred to as the “Effective Date”) provided that the Treaty shall only apply to matters affecting such investments after the Effective Date.

“Investment” refers to any investment associated with an Economic Activity in the Energy Sector and to investments or classes of investments designated by a Contracting Party in its Area as “Charter efficiency projects” and so notified to the Secretariat

(7) “Investor” means:

(a) with respect to a Contracting Party:

- (i) a natural person having the citizenship or nationality of or who is permanently residing in that Contracting Party in accordance with its applicable law;
- (ii) a company or other organization organized in accordance with the law applicable in that Contracting Party;

(b) with respect to a “third state”, a natural person, company or other organization which fulfils, mutatis mutandis, the conditions specified in subparagraph (a) for a Contracting Party.

(8) “Make Investments” or “Making of Investments” means establishing new Investments, acquiring all or part of existing Investments or moving into different fields of Investment activity.

Both Sweden and Latvia are Parties to the Treaty. It is not in dispute that Nykomb, being a company organized under the laws of Sweden and having its seat in Sweden is an investor, and that its acquisition of shares in and its giving of credits to Windau constitute investments within the meaning of the Treaty.

Nor is it contested that Nykomb made attempts at an amicable settlement and made a timely request for arbitration sufficient to meet the requirements set out in Article 26 (1) and (2).

2.2 The claims must be relating to an investment

Article 26 requires that claims raised in an arbitration are relating to an investment under the Treaty. The Claimant’s losses or damages are allegedly caused by the reduced income flow into Windau which affects the Claimant’s investment. The Claimant’s allegations create a clear relationship between the claims and the Claimant’s investments in Windau as required by Article 26. However, it remains to be considered in connection with the merits whether there is a causal link between the refusal of Latvenergo to pay the double tariff and the alleged losses or damages.

2.3 The claims must be based on obligations under Part III of the Treaty

Article 26 further requires that the claims must be based on alleged breaches of the Republic’s obligations under Part III of the Treaty.

As summarized in section 1.2.3 above, the Claimant alleges that all its claims against the Republic are based on breaches of provisions in Articles 10 and 13, which are contained in Part III of the Treaty.

The Claimant has also referred to parts of Article 22. The Respondent has objected to the Tribunal’s jurisdiction on the ground that Article 22 is placed in Part IV of the Treaty. The Arbitral Tribunal notes, however, that the Claimant has stated that the provisions Article 22 referred to do not give rise to any separate claim, but are rather invoked as provisions which clarify the scope and contents of other treaty provisions, among them the provisions in Part III that the Claimant relies on as bases for its claims. The Tribunal finds that the interpretation and application of the relevant Articles of the Treaty, Articles 10 and 13, are best considered under the merits part of this award, and that the references to Article 22 cannot as such be dismissed as inadmissible in the form the references are relied on.

2.4 Lack of jurisdiction due to jurisdiction of Latvian courts

a) The Respondent requests, for several reasons all denied by the Claimant, that the Claimant's claims shall be dismissed in their entirety for lack of jurisdiction.

The Respondent notes that the Claimant's claims are based on the alleged breach of the agreements between Latvenergo and Windau, viz. Contract No. 16/97 and the agreement of 10 March 2000, and argues on that basis as follows:

- The Claimant is not party to these agreements, Windau's contract rights are not transferred to, nor can they be pursued by Nykomb even if it is a 100 per cent parent company. The claims are not owned by the Claimant;
- Both agreements contain a jurisdiction clause giving exclusive jurisdiction to Latvian courts;
- There is nothing to prevent Windau from suing for the same alleged breaches in a Latvian court, with a risk of double payment of the same claim; and
- When the Republic signed and ratified the Treaty, it did not contemplate that such claims as raised by the Claimant in this arbitration would be capable of being brought under Article 26 of the Treaty, and consequently has not agreed to this arbitration.

As for the first of these arguments, the Tribunal must agree that if the Claimant were to be understood as pursuing a contractual claim directly and exclusively based on the agreements between Latvenergo and Windau, such claims would not be admissible since Article 26 only allows arbitration of claims based on alleged breaches of the Treaty. However, as stated in section 1.2.3 above, the Claimant must be understood to claim for the losses or damages it has incurred itself as a result of the undelivered heat and electricity in the deadlock period and the refusal of Latvenergo to pay the double tariff during the eight year period, and such claims are alleged to constitute breaches of the Treaty.

As for the second argument, Nykomb is undeniably a legal entity separate from its subsidiary Windau. Nykomb is not a party to either of the two contracts in question and already therefore not bound by their jurisdiction clauses. Nor would Windau have any authority or power, by means of the contract clauses submitting its contracts disputes to the jurisdiction of Latvian courts, to exclude Nykomb from pursuing its own claims in an arbitration under ECT Article 26, even in a situation where Nykomb's claims are based on alleged breaches of Windau's contracts.

The risk of double payment is admittedly an effect of the establishment of an arbitration facility also for alleged losses or damages suffered indirectly by an investor, for instance through violations against its subsidiary in a country that has adhered to the Treaty. No definite remedies have been developed at this stage, but clearly the Treaty based right to arbitration is not excluded or limited in cases where there is a possible risk of double payment. This risk of double payment is only likely to be resolved through the further development of the law in this area, such as by the means of new judgements, decisions, guidance or other relevant developments.

Finally, the Tribunal notes that the Republic did not file any reservations concerning the scope or interpretation of Article 26 when adhering to the Treaty. Clearly, the Republic must then be obliged to accept Treaty arbitration with such scope as follows from a proper interpretation of that Treaty provision.

b) The Respondent further argues that the dispute concerning the alleged breaches of the agreements between Latvenergo and Windau must first be settled by Latvian courts. In its brief of 4 September 2003 the Respondent states:

“Furthermore, Latvia’s argument should not be understood (as do Nykomb and its expert) to advocate the principle of exhaustion of local remedies as a procedural requirement in the traditional sense of international law. Rather, Latvia’s argument regarding Nykomb’s claim for an alleged and contested breach of contract cannot be ascertained until the proper forum has first pronounced on the issue. There is no evidence to suggest that Windau has been prevented from pursuing such a course of action. It is in this sense that Latvia has presented its argument concerning the exhaustion of local remedies, which Nykomb and its legal expert persist in misunderstanding.

For the above reasons, Latvia is of the view that the Arbitral Tribunal lacks the jurisdiction to entertain Nykomb’s claim for the double tariff. Whether such a tariff is due or not is a matter of dispute, and if contested (as seems to be the case here) can only be determined by the proper forum, and in accordance with the proper law of the contracts in question.”

The Arbitral Tribunal understands the quoted statement to the effect that the Respondent does not claim the existence of a general obligation under the Treaty or under international law that local remedies must be exhausted before arbitration can be requested under Article 26 of the Treaty. Nonetheless the Tribunal finds it appropriate to state that in the Tribunal’s view, no such general obligation to exhaust local remedies can be derived from the Treaty or international law in general. On the contrary, according to ECT Article 26 (4) the investor has the option of requesting Treaty arbitration even if it has agreed to the jurisdiction of a local forum – which, however, it has not done in the present case. As a preliminary issue, the Tribunal has come to the conclusion that it has jurisdiction to determine, as a preliminary matter, whether there has been a breach of the contract, insofar as it is necessary for its decision in relation to the claims raised on the basis of the Treaty.

2.5 Lack of jurisdiction due to limited scope of Treaty provisions

The Respondent has asserted several limitations to the scope of the Treaty provisions relied on by the Claimant, which under the circumstances of this case bring the Claimant’s claims outside the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, primarily interpreted as follows:

- a) Contract No. 16/97 was entered into on 24 March 1997, before the Treaty entered into force on 17 March 1998 and at a time when Windau had only Latvian shareholders. The Treaty does not apply retroactively to situations established prior to the entry into force of the Treaty;
- b) The withdrawal of the right to the double tariff occurred before the Claimant’s investments in Windau. The Treaty does not apply retroactively to situations established prior to the Claimant’s investment;
- c) Nykomb was aware of the price dispute, or ought to have been aware of it, before it bought the shares in Windau. Nykomb took a purely business or commercial risk when investing in Windau. The Treaty only protects against political risks and not against commercial or business risks;

- d) Also, the Contract between Latvenergo and Windau for the purchase of electric power, upon which all the Claimant's claims are based, is a commercial contract and as such not protected by the Treaty. The Treaty protection only applies to investment contracts within the meaning of the Treaty.

The Arbitral Tribunal finds that the scope and application of the Treaty provisions relied on by the Claimant is best considered after a general description of the background for the dispute, including the successive laws and regulations and of the purchase contracts entered into by Latvenergo. After such general description the Tribunal will decide whether a claim or a part thereof is found to fall outside the scope of a treaty provision and shall be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, and, if found to be within the scope of the Tribunal's jurisdiction, whether it shall be dismissed on its merits. See section 4.3.3 below.

3 General background

3.1 Latvian public policy concerning electric power

The Claimant has given the following account of the situation since the early 90'ies<sup>1</sup> which appears largely to be undisputed between the parties.

“When the Soviet Union's occupation of the Republic came to an end in 1991, the Republic needed to reduce its dependency on electricity imported from Russia, Lithuania and Estonia. In the long term, the Republic was faced with a possible shutdown of the nuclear reactors in Russia and Lithuania and a significant uncertainty regarding power generation based on oil shale in Estonia. This dependency on electricity imports was deemed to be a national security risk. If the nuclear reactors in Russia and Lithuania had been closed, or had otherwise become unavailable because of breakdowns or defects, the Republic would have been unable to satisfy its needs for electricity. Electricity from Russia and Belarus is transmitted to the Republic through a connection of the main power system of Russia with the high-voltage networks in the Republic. Russia had, however, and still has, the technical ability to disconnect the high-voltage networks from the main power system of Russia. Such a disconnection would, inter alia, raise the electricity costs in the Republic. At the same time, it became apparent that the domestic generating capacity was insufficient to meet the increasing demands on electricity as the Republic was rebuilding its economy. The Republic had also been left with enormous ecological problems, e.g. air pollution from usage of dirty fossil fuels in local heating plants, and needed to encourage the use of cleaner fuels to stimulate a better environment.

To increase domestic generating capacity and the use of cleaner fuels, the Republic needed to attract private investments in the electricity industry, particularly from foreign investors. However, electricity prices were very low in the Republic. This was due mainly to the low import prices charged by the Russian state electricity monopoly and by the Ignalina power plant in Lithuania. Another contributing factor to the low prices in the Republic was the prohibition on several major Latvian hydropower producers to charge the full price for their electricity. Foreign investors could, however, hardly compete on a market so strongly influenced and dependent on import dumping; i.e. the large import of cheap electricity from Russia and Lithuania. Generally, Western investors were quite reluctant at the beginning of the 1990's to risk their capital in Eastern Europe. As a result, Western investors needed a strong incentive, an economic “premium”, to invest in new power generation and co-generation capacity in the Republic.

A co-generation plant is able to produce both electricity and heat, hence co-generation. Through the combined production of electricity and heat co-generation plants are able to use more than 80 per cent of the energy contents in the fuels used. The traditional condensing power plants, which were unable to produce both electricity and heat, could only use between 30 to 40 per cent of the energy contents in the fuels used. When introducing co-generation based on natural gas in Latvia, the Republic could, inter alia, streamline the use of the energy contents in the fuels used and improve the ecological situation by phasing out highly pollutant fossil fuels.”

In pursuance of its policies concerning electric power production and the attraction of foreign investment in general, the Republic took the following measures: On 5 November 1994 the Republic enacted a Law on International Agreements, on 17 December 1994 signed and subsequently ratified the Energy Charter Treaty, on 13 January 1995 signed the US - Latvia Bilateral Investment Treaty (the “US-Latvia BIT”) and on 6 September 1995 enacted a law “On the Regulation of Entrepreneurial Activity in Energetics” (the “Entrepreneurial Law”). The purpose of enacting the Entrepreneurial Law was to “encourage entrepreneurial activity in this field” (cf. Article 2 of the Law). The law established, in Articles 27(9) and (10), that electricity from, inter alia, cogeneration plants with installed capacity from 1 to 12 megawatts was to be purchased into the national power transmission grid at a price twice as high as the average consumer price, i.e. the double tariff. In September 1997 the Parliament adopted the Latvian National Energy Programme. The main purpose of the Energy Programme was to integrate the Latvian electricity market with the European Union and to harmonize Latvian legislation with EU directives and regulations. The Energy Programme aimed to increase competition in the energy sector especially with regard to pricing and tariffs. The Energy Law of 3 September 1998 was enacted as a result of the adoption of the Energy Programme.

3.2 The organization of the Latvian electricity market

According to the Claimant<sup>2</sup>, and not contested by the Respondent, in 2000 slightly more than 25 per cent of the electricity consumed in Latvia was imported, mainly from Russia and Lithuania. Of the electricity generated in Latvia, Latvenergo produced approximately 97 per cent while independent producers such as Windau produced the remaining 3 per cent. Latvenergo is also the sole distributor of electric power through the national grid. In its capacity as the main domestic producer and the sole distributor of electricity in Latvia, Latvenergo was, and still is, holding a dominant position in the Latvian electricity market.

There are also a number of smaller domestic producers, with various capacities and various production techniques. Among the domestic producers are about 28 cogeneration plants of different sizes.

Latvenergo is by law the sole distributor of imported and domestically produced electricity through the national grid, and is for this reason in effect the sole purchaser of electricity produced by private entrepreneurs. The purchase price is derived from the electricity tariff consecutively set by public authorities in accordance with methodologies set out in laws and regulations, and from the so called multipliers which are laid down in laws and regulations. Latvenergo states that it has no authority to deviate from the officially determined tariffs and multipliers. But the purchase prices are set out, with reference to relevant tariffs and multipliers, in Latvenergo’s purchase contracts for electricity.

It follows that the part of the Latvian domestic electricity market in which Windau operates is highly regulated. There is no competition between purchasers when an entrepreneur is ready to sell energy produced in Latvia, nor is there any price competition among the domestic producers of electricity.

3.3 The building and financing of the Bauska cogeneration plant

No information has been given with respect to the activities of Windau from its incorporation in 1991 up to 1996, nor concerning its activities, if any, beside the Bauska and the other 15 cogeneration projects mentioned below.

On 1 July 1996 Windau entered into a contract with Latvenergo for the building of a cogeneration plant at Bauska. The 1996 contract was replaced by the above-mentioned Contract No. 16/97 of 24 March 1997 concerning the building of the same cogeneration plant. On the same day the parties also entered into a Contract No. 17/97 in which Windau undertook to install three cogeneration plants in the cities of Jelgava, Dobeles and Iecava. A third agreement, Contract No. 18/97 entered into on 26 March 1997, is a general agreement pursuant to which Windau undertook to install a further 12 cogeneration plants in various, not specified, cities of Latvia. In all the contracts Windau undertook to sell and Latvenergo undertook to buy any surplus electric power from the plants, that is all the electric power in excess of the power required by the plants for the purposes of their own production.

The three contracts in 1997 were all made effective as of the date of signing. It has been explained by the Claimant that Contract No. 16/97 concerning Bauska, and then presumably also the other two contracts, were signed in anticipation of a limitation of a Latvian law provision which prescribed the double tariff to be paid for a period for eight years for electric power from cogeneration plants. The law amendment was enacted in June 1997 and excluded the double tariff for plants with contracts effective after 31 May 1997. Apparently, the board of Latvenergo reacted negatively to the Windau contracts, and decided on 25 September 1997 that no further contracts were to be entered into with Windau. In a letter of 2 October 1997 to Windau, Latvenergo declared Contracts Nos. 16/97 and 17/97 invalid, inter alia asserting that they were signed on behalf of Latvenergo by an unauthorized person. The same claim was made against another cogeneration operator, Latelektro-Gulbene. Latelektro-Gulbene brought a court action against Latvenergo and defeated Latvenergo's contentions. Latvenergo later brought a court action in a Latvian court against Windau, and withdrew the case in January 2003. But it still refuses to pay to Windau the double tariff referred to in Contract No. 16/97.

Noell-KRC Energie- und Umwelttechnik GmbH ("Noell") was a joint stock company established under the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany and was a subsidiary of the German company Preussag AG. Noell had been engaged in supplying cogeneration plants in Germany and other locations, and the group took an interest in participating in the project of building up to 16 cogeneration plants in Latvia as contracted for by Windau. A PriceWaterhouseCoopers report of 30 October 1998 suggested an investment value of DEM 5,6 million per plant, or all in all a contract value of DEM 90 million for the 16 plants. On 19 February 1998 Noell concluded an agreement with Windau providing for mutual co-operation and the supply of turnkey facilities to the cogeneration plants to be built. The first plant was to be built in Bauska, and was to serve as the model project for the other plants to be built. Noell was to be Windau's turnkey supplier, technical service partner and technical adviser with respect to cogeneration technology.

In mid-1998 major changes took place within the Preussag group. Preussag decided to go out of the engineering business and stop their long term engagement in engineering projects. Noell transferred its power plant business to the German company BBP Power Plants GmbH, a subsidiary of the German company Babcock Borsig AG. Babcock Borsig AG filed for insolvency on 4 July 2002.

According to the oral witness statement by Mr. Bernt Kulbe, the managing director of Noell, Noell in 1998 went looking for another equity holder in the Latvian project. Noell had been working together with Nykomb on different projects since 1996. In the spring of 1998 Noell/Borsig invited Nykomb to take over the developer role for the cogeneration project. Nykomb performed an in-house analysis of the economic and technical parameters of the project and decided in July 1998 to engage and mobilize staff resources to complete the project development process. After further investigations and analyses, including a PriceWaterhouseCoopers report and analysis of 30 October 1999, negotiations concerning financing of the Bauska project were conducted with the Vereinsbank, both with its Riga branch and with its German head office, resulting in a loan agreement dated 12 February 1999 from the Riga branch in the amount of approximately € 1.533.000. It was foreseen at the time that an investment in Bauska would amount to 1.9 million Lats, of which 1.4 million Lats was planned to be covered by loans and 0.4 million Lats by equity.

One part of the financing package was that Nykomb undertook to acquire 51 per cent of the share capital in Windau. In consequence hereof, Nykomb, by a purchase agreement of 11 March 1999 registered on 25 March 1999' bought 51 per cent of the existing shares in Windau and participated with 51 per cent in an increase of the share capital. On 7 September 2000 Nykomb acquired the remaining 49 per cent of the shares to become a 100 per cent shareholder in Windau. It is still the sole shareholder in the company.

Noell and the PreussAG/Borsig group are said to have granted considerable credits to Windau, although further details have not been given. According to a letter of 12 April 2000 from Windau to Latvenergo:

“Currently there is over Lts 2,250,000 invested in this project represented by Lts 750,000 of equity (provided as to Lts 650,000 by Nykomb), Lts 200,000 in supplier credits from Germany and Lts 1,300,000 of local bank loans backed by a strong guarantee from the parent company of Noell KRC in Germany. In addition Nykomb has invested some Lts 200,000 in upgrading the heating grid in the municipality of Ogre.”

By way of illustration, this corresponds to, in Swedish kronor (at 15/-):

	Lats	SEK
Equity	750 000	11 250 000
Supplier credits	200 000	3 000 000
Local bank loans	1 300 000	19 500 000
Investment in Bauska	2 250 000	33 750 000

Plus, as stated in the letter, “Backed by a strong guarantee from the parent company of Noell KRC”.

The Tribunal also notes that according to Windau's annual report for 2001, the managing director of Noell, Mr. Kulbe, was the chairman of the board of Windau. The German group's interest is also indicated by the fact that the German ambassador to Latvia as well as representatives of Noell participated in the meeting with the Prime Minister of Latvia on 26 October 1999, see sections 3.4 and 3.5.7 below. The legal relationship between Nykomb and the German group might have been of interest to the Tribunal when considering the alleged losses or damages incurred by Nykomb because of the reduced income flow into Windau, but this has not been further documented by the Claimant.

The Bauska cogeneration plant was completed and ready for operation on 17 September 1999, but did not start its production until 28 February 2000 due to the dispute over the purchase price for electric power as will be further dealt with below.

3.4 Windau's other cogeneration projects

Preparatory work was also carried out with respect to the other 15 cogeneration plants covered by Contracts Nos. 17/97 and 18/98. Thus, licenses were obtained for two plants in the city of Ogre and for plants in two other cities. An investment was also made in upgrading the grid for distributing heat in Ogre. After the Bauska plant was ready for operation and after the price dispute at Bauska had emerged, a meeting was held on 26 October 1999 with the Prime minister, with the participation of the Swedish and German ambassadors to Latvia as well as representatives of Windau and Noell. The need for a solution of the price dispute was underscored, as was the fact that such a solution was necessary in order for the project work on the other 15 contracted plants to proceed. As will be further explored in section 3.5.7 below, the meeting resulted in a Resolution No. 67 of the Cabinet of Ministers of 30 November 1999 ordering the double tariff to be adhered to. The resolution was however later annulled by the Constitutional Court for constitutional reasons. Thereafter, work on Windau's other cogeneration projects were halted, awaiting a clarification of the purchase prices for electric power at Bauska.

3.5 Latvian laws and regulations concerning purchase prices for electric energy

The Tribunal finds it practical to give a general description of the Latvian laws and regulations pertaining to purchase prices for electric power produced in domestic cogeneration plants, and a description of the parties' differing views on the contents and applicability of some of these legislative instruments.

3.5.1 Regulation No. 54 of 14 March 1995

The system of varying multipliers was first introduced by this regulation, which reads as follows:

“1. In order to promote the production of electric power in the Republic of Latvia, these Regulations provide that the state joint stock company Latvenergo shall purchase electric power from the electric station not under the authority of Latvenergo (hereafter, the “decentralized electric stations”).

2. The purchasing price for electric power produced by decentralized electric stations, except those specified in section 3 hereof, shall correspond to the average calculated tariff for electric power sale of the state joint stock company Latvenergo.

3. The purchasing price for electric power produced by such small-size electric hydroelectric power stations (not in excess of 2 MW), which operate or which shall be restored by 2000, shall correspond to the double average tariff for the sale of electric power for a period of eight years from the start of operation of the respective electric station.” (Emphasis added.)

3.5.2 The Entrepreneurial Law of 6 September 1995

The Law of 6 September 1995 On the Regulation of Entrepreneurial Activity in Energetics (the “Entrepreneurial Law”) replaced Resolution No. 54 and extended the group of power producers to include, inter alia, co-generation plants. Article 27 reads in part as follows:

“Article 27. Procedure for setting tariffs.

(1) The tariffs charged for energy supply shall be calculated by an energy supply enterprise in accordance with the methodology for tariff calculation determined by the Council.

(2) The tariffs shall provide for that enterprises gain economically justified revenues from payments received from the consumers for the coverage of justified costs of energy resources production, salaries, operational and administrative costs, as well as maintenance of existing assets and new approved investments.

(9) Spare power which corresponds to the state power standard from renewable energy resources (minihydropower plants with installed capacity up to 2 MW and wind power plants), as well as from little capacity cogeneration plants with installed capacity from 1 MW up to 12 MW shall be purchased into the state power transmission grid at a higher tariff.

(10) The power purchase price from power plants mentioned in part 9 of this article shall correspond to the double average sales tariff of power and shall be valid for eight years from the starting day of operation of the power plant. After that the purchase price shall correspond to the average tariff of power.”(Emphasis added.)

The parties agree that the Entrepreneurial Law unequivocally provided for the double tariff to be paid for electric power from cogeneration plants with installed capacity from 1 MW up to 12 MW. There was no limitation with respect to the time when a purchase contract with Latvenergo must have been entered into or when the production must have started. Windau’s Contract No. 16/97 with Latvenergo expressly states that the price for electric power from Bauska shall be based on the Entrepreneurial Law.

3.5.3 Regulation No. 23 of 10 January 1997

On 21 December 1995, the Cabinet of Ministers submitted a draft law to the Latvian Parliament proposing to repeal, inter alia, Articles 27 (9) and (10) of the Entrepreneurial Law, in other words a proposal to withdraw the offer to pay the double tariff to cogeneration plants pronounced by the Entrepreneurial Law. However, the draft law was rejected by the Parliament on 25 November 1996. This notwithstanding, the Cabinet of Ministers on 10 January 1997 issued Regulation 23 with a view to amending Article 27 (9) and repealing Article 27 (10), inter alia to the effect that the offer to pay the double tariff contained in the Law was removed, and the authority to determine the price setting procedures was passed to the Cabinet. Upon appeal from Parliament members the Constitutional Court, by decision of 7 May 1997, found the Cabinet’s regulation to be in conflict with Article 81 of the Constitution and declared Regulation No. 23 null and void, however only as from the time of the Court’s decision. In a later decision, the Constitutional Court remarked that Regulation No. 23 was in effect when Contract No. 16/97 was signed on 25 March 1997.

3.5.4 Amendments of 11 June 1997 to Art. 27 (9) and (10) of the Entrepreneurial Law

Subsequent to the judgement of the Constitutional Court of 7 May 1997 the Parliament amended Articles 27 (9) and (10) of the Entrepreneurial Law to read as follows:

“(9) Produced spare power which corresponds to the state power standard from renewable energy resources (minihydropower plants with installed capacity up to 2 MW and wind power plants), as well as from little capacity cogeneration plants with installed capacity up to 12 MW= shall be purchased into the state power transmission grid at a higher tariff. These provisions on purchase of power from the cogeneration plants shall be applied to all physical persons and legal entities whose/which contract with the State Joint-Stock Company “Latvenergo” to be privatised on purchase of the power into the state power transmission grid from cogeneration plants has taken effect by May 31, 1997;

(10) The power purchase price from power plants mentioned in part 9 of this article shall correspond to double average sales tariff of power and shall be valid for eight years from the transferring for operation of the power plant. After that the spare power, which corresponds to the power standard established by the state, shall be purchased into the state power transmission grid at the tariffs established by the Cabinet of Ministers.”

This amendment limited the general application of the double tariff to cogeneration plants where its power purchase contract with Latvenergo “has taken effect by May 31, 1997”. As will be further explored below, Latvenergo and Windau had entered into a contract on 1 July 1996 concerning the installation of a cogeneration plant at Bauska. The contract stipulated that “(t)his Contract shall come into force from the moment when the cogeneration equipment is installed and the Deed of Conveyance signed”. That contract was however replaced by the above-mentioned new Contract No. 16/97 of 24 March 1997, which stipulated that “(t)his Agreement shall take effect as of the date of its signing”. The Claimant has explained that the new contract was negotiated and signed in anticipation of the limitation enacted on 11 June 1997. The Respondent has not denied that the new contract ensured Windau’s continued right to the double tariff also under the Entrepreneurial Law as amended.

3.5.5 The Energy Law of 3 September 1998

The Power Industry Law (the “Energy Law”) was adopted on 3 September 1998 and came into force on 6 October 1998. It repealed the Entrepreneurial Law from the date when the Energy Law was taking effect.

The Energy Law contained no specific provision concerning the use of the double tariff. The right to the double tariff was not repeated for any category of electric power plants in the new law, nor were there any transitory provisions upholding this right for those who were ensured the double tariff under the Entrepreneurial Law as amended in 1997, hereunder the cogeneration plants which had obtained a contract with Latvenergo effective before 31 May 1997 (see section 3.5.4 above).

However, Article 41 provides as follows:

“The Cabinet of Ministers shall determine a common procedure by which licensed electric power supply enterprises must buy up surplus electric power produced which remain after usage for self-needs and in compliance with the electric power parameters determined within the state, from co-generation stations located within the zone of activity of their license and the exploitation of which has been started.” (Emphasis added.)

It is undisputed that this article, authorizing the Cabinet of Ministers to determine common procedures, including price setting for electric power from cogeneration plants, draws a distinction between two categories of plants, depending on the starting point for exploitation. Thus, it is undisputed that the law authorizes the Cabinet to determine procedures for one but not for the other category of cogeneration plants.

However, the parties disagree as to the interpretation and application of Article 41. The Claimant contends that the provision applies only to cogeneration plants that had started production at the time of the enactment of the Energy Law, and consequently does not apply to the Bauska plant, which was only ready for production in September 1999. And since the Energy Law does not otherwise open for the determination of tariffs and multipliers this means, in the Claimant’s view, that for cogeneration plants starting after the Energy Law came into force the Entrepreneurial Law (as stipulated in Contract No. 16/97) must still regulate the purchase price-to be paid, even though the Entrepreneurial Law itself was declared to be null and void and no longer in force as from 6 October 1998.

The Respondent contends that the correct translation of the expression emphasized above is “the exploitation of which has not yet started”. It has submitted a letter dated 17 September 2003 from the legal bureau of the Latvian Parliament, citing and commenting upon the Latvian words used in the law text and in the parliamentary debate, and expressing as its opinion that according to the Latvian wording of Article 41 of the Law means to apply to cogeneration plants the operation of which will be started, i.e., to new cogeneration plants.

The Arbitral Tribunal is satisfied, upon the presented evidence of the meaning of Article 41 in its Latvian original, that the authority of the Cabinet to determine the procedures concerning cogeneration plants according to Article 41 was limited to plants which were starting its production after the enactment (or the coming into force) of the Energy Law.

The Tribunal may add that this understanding is also supported by the logic of the choice. It appears less logical to the Tribunal that the new law should only allow for the determination of new procedures for cogeneration plants already in operation, presumably with established prices and conditions, while not authorizing the Cabinet to determine prices and procedures for new cogeneration plants coming into production after the new law. It appears more logical, taking into account that the legislators wished to limit the authority to determine procedures, that the setting of new procedures was authorized for cogeneration plants not yet in operation while the legislative authority was not extended to plants already established and operating. This limitation of the Cabinet’s power might even be seen as the legislator’s will that plants already in operation shall not be subjected to new price setting procedures.

In consequence of the Claimant’s view that Article 41 only applies to cogeneration plants having started production before the Energy Law was enacted (or came into force), the Claimant draws the conclusion that Regulation No. 425 of 31 October 1998 and Resolution No. 9 of 8 January 2002 issued pursuant to Article 41 (see sections 3.5.6 and 3.5.9 below) do not apply to the Bauska production. The Respondent draws the conclusion that Article 41 authorizes the Cabinet to determine new procedures for cogeneration plants not yet in production, including the Bauska plant, without any limitation with regard to upholding the right to the double tariff ensured under the Entrepreneurial Law.

3.5.6 Regulation No. 425 of 31 October 1998

On 31 October 1998 the Cabinet of Ministers issued Regulation No. 425 pursuant to Article 41 of the Energy Law, effective as from 4 November 1998.

The Regulation reads in part:

1.1. that licenced electric power supply enterprises shall have the obligation to purchase generated surplus electric power ... from the cogeneration stations starting their operation ..., with the installed electric capacity ... not in excess of four MW;

1.2 the procedure in which licenced electric power supply enterprises shall purchase electric power surplus from cogeneration stations with electric capacity not in excess of four MW.

2. If electric power surplus is purchased from cogeneration stations with capacity not in excess of four MW, the purchase tariffs shall be determined based on the value of the average electric power sale tariff (Tv). The Purchase tariff shall change depending on the value of the average electric power sale tariff (Tv), approved by the Energy Supply Regulation Council and which has been published in the newspaper of Latvijas Vestnesis.

4. If surplus electric power is purchased from co-generation stations with capacity from 0,5 MW to four MW, the purchase tariff (Tie) shall be determined depending on the type of fuel used in the technological process of the production:

4.1. Tie = 0,95 TV, if local fuel is used

4.2 Tie= 0,75 Tv, if imported fuel is used”

(Emphasis added.)

The Regulation makes no exception for cogeneration plants which had obtained agreements with Latvenergo before 31 May 1997 and therefore had been ensured the double tariff under the Entrepreneurial Law as amended. The parties agree that this Regulation by its wording expressly prescribes the use of a 0.75 multiplier for this category of cogeneration plants, and thereby expressly abolishes the mandatory use of the double tariff prescribed by the Entrepreneurial Law as amended. But the Claimant contends, as already mentioned, that this new multiplier does not apply to the Bauska plant since Article 41 of the Energy Law did not apply to cogeneration plants not yet in operation, while the Respondent contends – and for that matter procedurally admits – that the applicable multiplier in the case of Bauska was reduced from 2 to 0.75 by this legislative act by the Cabinet.

3.5.7 Resolution No. 67 of 30 November 1999

After a meeting on 29 October 1999 between the Prime Minister of Latvia and the ambassadors of Germany and Sweden, and representatives of Noell and Windau, the Cabinet of Ministers on 30 November 1999 issued the following Resolution:

“1. According to Clause 8, part four, of the Law “On Foreign Investment in the Republic of Latvia”, the Privatization Agency shall ensure conclusion of an agreement between the State Joint-Stock Company under Privatization “Latvenergo” and the Limited Liability Company “Windau” on purchase of surplus electric power, produced by Bauska cogeneration station and meeting electric power parameters established in the State, transmitted to the electric power distribution grid, for a price equal to the double average tariff of electric power sale for eight years after the corresponding power station is commissioned.

2. The Minister of Economy V. Makarovs shall inform the Ambassador of the Kingdom of Sweden about the decision passed.

3 The Ministers, whose Ministries organize tenders for issue of licenses, shall pay special attention to the provisions of the Law “On Foreign Investments in the Republic of Latvia.”

The Latvian Law on Foreign Investments is dated 5 November 1991. Clause 8.4 reads as follows:

“8.4. In the event, that future laws of the Republic worsen the investment conditions, a foreign investment shall be subject to the laws which were in effect on the date the investment was made.”

Again, the decision of the Cabinet was appealed to the Constitutional Court, which on 24 March 2000 ruled that Section 1 of the decision was null and void from the moment of its adoption. One reason given was that the first foreign investments in Windau were registered only on 24 October 1997 and that Clause 8.4 therefore could not be applied to the case. It also found that “the validity of [the agreement of 26 March 1997] is a dispute of civil legal character, which must be settled in a court of general jurisdiction”. The Tribunal notes that this attempt by the Cabinet to safeguard Windau’s rights was unsuccessful, a main reason being that the Latvian Law on Foreign Investment was inapplicable. No position appears to have been taken by the Constitutional Court as to Windau’s right to the double tariff, which obviously was the basis for the Cabinet’s action.

3.5.8 Amendment of 1 June 2001 to Article 41 of the Energy Law

On 1 June 2001 Article 41 of the Energy Law was amended to read as follows:

“1. The Cabinet of Ministers stipulates common requirements to co-generation plants with respect to their operation mode, reliability and efficiency, as well as the common procedure in which, depending on the type of fuel and efficiency, the price for the surplus electricity that is left after consumption for own needs and is purchased from co-generation plants that correspond to the requirements stipulated in this Article shall be determined.

2. The procedure stipulated in Paragraph One of the current Article shall not apply to producers who, by 1 June 2001, have received a license for electricity generation and have commenced the operation of these plants and equipment within the term stipulated in the license.”

By this amendment the Cabinet’s authority under Article 41 apparently was excluded for cogeneration plants that had received a license and had commenced their operations before 1 June 2001. This wording of the law apparently excluded the Bauska plant, which had received its license on 4 April 1999 and started operation on 28 February 2000. But there is no indication in the amendment law, or other documented material, whether this new limitation of the Cabinet’s authority under Article 41 should have the effect of a corresponding limitation of Regulation No. 425 of 31 October 1998 issued under Article 41 in its original wording (see section 3.5.6 above), nor have the parties commented on this particular question. As will be seen in section 3.5.9 below, resolution No. 425 was formally repealed on 8 January 2002, and then replaced by a provision again determining 0.75 to be the multiplier applicable to plants like the Bauska plant.

3.5.9 Regulation No. 9 of 8 January 2002

Regulation No. 9 of 8 January 2002 repealed Regulation No. 425 of 31 October 1998, and stated in its section V. Price determination, inter alia the following:

“20. If the electrical capacity installed is more than 0.5 megawatts, but does not exceed four megawatts and fossil fuel has been utilized in its production process, the price for the purchase of surplus electricity shall be determined by applying the coefficient 0.75 to the average sales tariff in the operating area of the relevant system operator’s licence.”

This Regulation was also issued pursuant to Article 41 of the Energy Law, evidently then in its amended version. As mentioned above, the Claimant contends that this regulation is not applicable to the Bauska plant since Article 41 is not applicable.

3.5.10 Conclusions as to the legislative acts

The development with regard to regulation of purchase prices for electric power from cogeneration plants bears witness of a development from an initial broad-sweeping offer in the 1995 Entrepreneurial Law of the double tariff as an investment incentive, towards a gradual limitation and eventually the abolishment of the double tariff as a mandatory incentive prescribed by statute.

There is agreement between the parties that the double tariff was unequivocally set down by the Entrepreneurial Law in 1995, with a legal obligation for Latvenergo to apply it in its purchase contracts for power plants covered by the law. With the exception of an interim period from 10 January to 7 May 1997, see section 3.5.3 above, the double tariff for certain power plants was in force at least until the Energy Law came into force on 6 October 1998. The Claimant contends that Windau continues to have the right to the double tariff, since the transitory provisions of the Energy Law and subsequent regulations emanated in pursuance of that law do not apply to cogeneration plants coming into production after the enactment of the Energy Law. The Respondent contends, and the Arbitral Tribunal accepts upon the evidence presented, that the categorical application of the double tariff was repealed by the Energy Law and replaced by the subsequent Regulation No. 425 of 31 October 1998, the latter replaced by Regulation No. 9 of 8 January 2002 again determining the multiplier to be 0.75 for plants like the Bauska plant.

3.6 Agreements concerning purchase prices for electric energy

The Tribunal also finds it practical to give a description of contracts entered into by Latvenergo with Windau and others. The agreements presented in this arbitration suggest a system of specific contracts between Latvenergo and prospective producers and sellers of electric power within Latvia; first, a relatively short master agreement setting out the sellers obligation to build the plant and to sell the electric power not needed for its own production, and Latvenergo’s obligation to buy the produced electricity, always stipulating the purchase price with reference to relevant Latvian laws and regulations, and, secondly, a more detailed off-take contract, stipulating mostly technical details. According to the Respondent such off-take contracts were consistently entered into by Latvenergo only at the point in time when the producer had completed its installations and was ready to start production.

As a general background for the dispute concerning the price and force majeure clauses in the Windau agreements a description is given below of such clauses in the purchase agreements documented in this arbitration.

3.6.1 The Liepājas Siltums agreement of 4 April 1995

The first purchase contract documented in this arbitration is an Agreement of 4 April 1995 between Latvenergo (referred to in the agreement as the “Energy System”) and the joint stock company Liepājas Siltums concerning a cogeneration plant with electric power of 4.9 million kWh. The Agreement contains the following clause:

“5. The Energy System shall pay to the Cogeneration Station for the balance of electric power delivered by the Cogeneration Station to the Energy System’s grid according to Regulations No. 54, issued by the Republic of Latvia Cabinet of Ministers on 14.03.95.”

On 1 January 1996, after Regulations No. 54 had been replaced by the Entrepreneurial Law (see sections 3.5.1 and 3.5.2 above), the parties entered into a supplemental agreement replacing inter alia the above-mentioned Clause 5:

“1. From the day of signing this Agreement, [the Parties have agreed] to change and express in the following wording the following Clauses:

Clause 5:

As from 10 January 1996 and until the end of the term of this agreement, the Energy System shall pay to the Cogeneration Station for the balance of electric power delivered by the Cogeneration Station to the Energy System’s grid according to the double calculated average sales tariff for electric power of VAS “Latvenergo” (or its legal successors).

As for 1996, the double average sales tariff for electric power of VAS “Latvenergo” has been mutually agreed in Supplement No. 1 to this Agreement of 01.01.1996, it is 0.048 Ls per 1 kWh.

3.6.2 The Windau contract of 1 July 1996 Bauska

In the contract of 1 July 1996 between Latvenergo and Windau, the first contract concerning the Bauska plant, the price clauses read as follows:

“II. Price

Price for the electric power is defined in lats according to double average electric power sales tariffs on the basis of the Republic of Latvia Law “On Regulation of Entrepreneurial Activities in Energy Industry”.

Prices are fixed in Supplement No. 1, which is an integral part of this Contract.

V. Liability

The Parties shall be released from liability for violation against their contractual obligations, if it has been caused by force majeure conditions – changes in the legislation and decisions of the Government, earthquake, war, floods, etc.

VI. Additional provisions

If the average electric power sales price changes, changes shall also be made in prices defined in this Contract.

The Supplement No. 1 referred to reads:

"The Seller shall sell the excess electric power to the Buyer for the price 0.052 Ls/kWh."

3.6.3 The Windau contract No. 16/97 of 24 March 1997 Bauska

In Contract No. 16/97 of 24 March 1997 that replaced the contract of 1 July 1996 the price clause reads as follows:

"II. PRICE

Price for electric power shall be stated in lats, based on of the Republic of Latvia law "On Regulation of Entrepreneurial Activity in Power Industry".

V. RESPONSIBILITY

The parties shall be released from responsibility for breach of obligations under this Agreement, if the reason for such breach is the so-called FORCE MAJEURE circumstances – changes in laws and resolutions of the Government, earthquakes, war, floods, etc.

VI. ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS

Upon change of average sale price of electric power, also the prices under this agreement shall be changed."

3.6.4 The Windau contract No. 17/97 of 24 March 1997 Jelgava, Dobele and Iecava

In the Contract No. 17/97 of the same date as Contract No. 16/97, concerning cogeneration plants in Jelgava, Dobele and Iecava, the price clauses reads as follows:

"2. Contract price

The price for electric power shall be established in lats on the basis of the law "On the Regulation of Entrepreneurial Activities in the Energy Sector" of the Republic of Latvia.

5. Liability of the Parties

The Parties shall not be liable for the infringement of any provision of this Contract if such infringement is caused by force majeure, i.e. amendments to legislative regulations, government resolutions, earthquake, war, flood, etc.

6. Additional conditions

If the average sales price of electric power changes, the Contract price shall be modified accordingly.

3.6.5 The Windau contract No. 18/97 of 26 March 1997 12 cogeneration plants

In the Contract No. 18/97 signed two days later, on 26 March 1997, concerning the set up of 12 cogeneration plants in (unspecified) towns in Latvia, the purchase price was determined as follows:

"2. Purchase Price

Surplus electric power shall be purchased for the price, which is effective in Latvia on the specific date of purchase."

5. Force majeure

The parties shall be fully or partially released from responsibility, if Force Majeure circumstances have occurred, moreover, if such circumstances have occurred after the execution of relevant agreements and the parties could neither foresee nor influence them.

The parties acknowledge that Force Majeure circumstances include resolutions of the Parliament and the Cabinet of Ministers which eliminate or materially affect the performance of the agreements, natural catastrophes – floods, fire and rebellions. - - -“

3.6.6 The Latelektro-Gulbene letter of intent of 19 May 1997

Concerning another cogeneration plant, “Latelektro-Gulbene”, an agreement called a “letter of intent” was entered into on 19 May 1997, in which the parties inter alia agreed as follows:

2. ... “Latvenergo” agrees:

2.2 To pay the invoices for the electric power produced once every month according to the tariff defined in the law. ...”

The Arbitral Tribunal notes that this plant was granted its production license on 3 April 1997, the same date as the Bauska plant was granted its production license, and the letter of intent, similar to the new Contract No. 16/97 for Bauska, was entered into shortly before the adoption on 11 June 1997 of the amendment to the Entrepreneurial Law providing that only agreements being effective before 31 May 1997 would continue to benefit from the double tariff.

See also section 3.6.8 below.

3.6.7 The Latvenergo – Windau agreement of 10 March 2000

As already mentioned, the Bauska plant was ready for production on 17 September 1999, but Latvenergo refused to enter into an off-take agreement, and production was not commenced, apparently due to the dispute over the multiplier to be used in determining the purchase price. On 30 November 1999 the Cabinet had issued Resolution No. 67 in support of the double tariff. The Resolution was however appealed to the Constitutional Court, see section 3.5.7 above.

With this as a background, operation was started 28 February 2000 and on 10 March 2000, the parties entered into a detailed off-take agreement. With respect to the purchase price for electric energy this agreement provided as follows:

“2. Purchase Price and Sale Price of Electric Energy.

2.1 Latvenergo shall buy from Windau the surplus electric energy generated in cogeneration regime pursuant to requirement of the issued license, after satisfaction of Windau’s own needs (power surplus transmitted to the power system network) and which energy corresponds to parameters specified in the country, at the following price:

(a) until the judgment of the Constitutional Court in respect of the case relating to the acknowledgement as being invalid of Section of the November 30, 1999 protocol decision the Cabinet of Ministers, Latvenergo shall buy from Windau and pay for the electric energy generated at the power plant pursuant to the formula  $Tie = 0.75 Tv$  ...the difference ... shall be paid by

Latvenergo ... to the escrow account at A/S Vereinsbank Riga, which shall be used pursuant to the following conditions:

i in the event that the Constitutional Court acknowledges Section 1 of the November 30, 1999 protocol decision of the Cabinet of Ministers to be valid, this money shall be immediately transferred into the bank account of Windau at the S/S Vereinsbank Riga;

ii ...

(b) after the judgment of the Constitutional Court, Latvenergo shall buy from Windau and pay for the surplus electric energy generated at the power plant for the period of eight years after the commissioning of the Windau cogeneration plant in Bauska, in the following amount i if by virtue of the judgment of the Constitutional Court, the November 30, 1999 decision of the Cabinet of Ministers or Section 1 thereof will remain effective, the purchase price from the cogeneration plant in Bauska shall be calculated pursuant to the formula  $Tie = 2.0 Tv$ ;

ii if by virtue of the judgement of the Constitutional Court, the November 30, 1999 protocol decision of the Cabinet of Ministers or Section 1 thereof will lose effect, the purchase price from the cogeneration plant in Bauska shall be calculated pursuant to the formula  $Tie = 0.75 Tv$ .

2.2 The parties mutually agree that irrespective of adoption of any judgment of the Constitutional Court, either party shall be entitled to submit its objections or claims in respect of the purchase price of electric energy stated in Section 2.1 (b) of this Agreement in the manner prescribed by law, and the parties agree that in the event that following the review of such objection or claim, the decision adopted by court differs from the provisions of Section 2.1.(b), the purchase price, determined pursuant to this court decision shall further be applied.

7. Force Majeure

7.1 The Party referring to Force Majeure circumstances as a hindrance for the performance of its obligations ... shall give notice thereof ... within three calendar days ... .

7.2 If either Party fails to perform its obligations in accordance with this Agreement due to Force Majeure, it shall be released from responsibility ... .”

The Arbitral Tribunal notes that the force majeure clause in this contract does not define or exemplify what is to be considered as force majeure.

3.6.8 The Latelektro-Gulbene agreement of 30 October 2001

The Latelektro-Gulbene plant went into operation on 6 March 1998 but was disconnected from the grid in July 1998 because Latvenergo refused to pay the double tariff prescribed in the Entrepreneurial Law. In October 1998 Latelektro-Gulbene Ltd. filed a claim for the double tariff against Latvenergo in the Riga Regional Court, and won by the court's judgement of 16 December 1998. The decision was appealed, but was confirmed by an appellate court on 30 March 1999 and by the Latvian Supreme Court by a decision of 30 June 1999. All the courts found that the letter of intent of 19 May 1997 constituted a legally binding contract and that it unequivocally stipulated that the double tariff was to be paid in the eight years' period from the commissioning of the plant, by referring to the law in force at the moment of signing the contract. The Tribunal notes that all three court decisions were rendered after the Energy Law had been enacted and had come into force on 6 October 1998.

Following the Supreme Court decision Latvenergo accepted the double tariff and entered into a new agreement with Latelektro-Gulbene dated 30 October 2001. The purchase price is not specifically defined, but the double tariff in the first eight years is clearly assumed in clause 10.3:

7.1 None of the Parties shall be held liable if the performance of any provision hereof is delayed or made impossible by any natural or man-made calamities, by mass disorders, war, riots, as well as action of state authorities or any other condition beyond the control of the Party whose obligations are affected by it, which the Parties could not anticipate, while making this Agreement, and which the Parties are unable to prevent by using reasonable methods available to them.

7.2 The Party, which refers to force majeure conditions ... shall report about it ... not later than within three calendar days ...

10. Term of Agreement

10.1 The Parties agree that this Agreement shall be in force for an undetermined period of time, subject to Clause 10.3 hereof.

10.3 If the Parties do not agree on a new purchase price for electric power by 6 March 2006, when the duty of Latvenergo to buy electric power for the double tariff expires, then this agreement shall lose its legal force at the moment when the said term expires.”

3.7 The legal significance of the price and force majeure clauses

Although the wording of the agreements varies, the purchase agreements documented in this arbitration all have the same general structure: The seller undertakes to install the power plant(s) and to sell to Latvenergo its surplus power (that is, produced power beyond what is needed by the seller for its own production), and Latvenergo undertakes to purchase the surplus power on the basis of tariffs stipulated by law.

Apart from specifying in a couple of the contracts the precise tariff to be paid in the current year, all contracts consistently refer to actual laws and regulations as determining the price to be paid and do not stipulate prices other than those deriving from legislation and administrative decrees. None of the contracts suggests that Latvenergo has had the authority or even the intention to deviate from what follows from laws and regulations, and Latvenergo has expressly denied having any such authority. Thus, in a letter to Windau of 20 March 1998 Latvenergo stated that

However, as may be derived from the court decisions in the Latelektro-Gulbene case, the price clauses in the purchase contracts are not merely references to Latvian laws and regulations at any time, but these clauses are deemed by the highest legal authority, the Latvian Supreme Court, to be legally binding contractual obligations under Latvian law. And specifically, the contracts are to be interpreted as fixing the multiplier in effect at the moment of signing the contract. The situation thus documented are facts interpreted by the Latvian courts concerning the Latvian legal situation that can be taken into regard by this Tribunal, without any need for the Tribunal to embark on any interpretation or application of Latvian national law on its own.

The Tribunal will add that there are several other circumstances that support the understanding of the purchase agreements set down by the Latvian Supreme Court. One is that several of the agreements make express reservations for changes of the tariff for average sale prices but not for changes of the multiplier. Such reservations would be superfluous if the contract was to be understood merely to refer to laws and regulations at any time, and do support the impression that the multiplier was unreservedly granted for the eight years as stipulated in the Entrepreneurial Law. Another is that the offering of an investment incentive to prospective investors for a period of eight years would naturally be perceived by investors as a firm commitment for the full eight year period unless clear reservations were made to the contrary.

3.8 The purchase price agreed between Latvenergo and Windau

a) Following the legal findings of the Latvian Supreme Court in the quite similar Latelektro-Gulbene case there can be no doubt that Contract No. 16/97 of 24 March 1997 stipulated the purchase price for electric power from the Bauska plant to be the double tariff for a period of eight years from the time when Windau was ready to start production and had been commissioned.

b) However, the Respondent has contended that the force majeure clause in Contract No. 16/97 expressly makes reservations for new laws or regulations, which may alter the parties' rights or obligations under the contract. The Claimant denies that the clause can be read to this effect.

The Arbitral Tribunal considers that it would not be an evident conclusion of the unspecific reference to new legislation in the force majeure clause in Contract No. 16/97 that the legislator should be free to revoke the double tariff commitment, leaving the investor with no protection against a reduction or abolishment of this investment incentive. In particular, the structure of Contract No. 16/97, setting out in Article V a general reservation for changes in the legislation, immediately followed by a specific reservation in Article VI for changes of the "average sale price of electric power" (but thus not in the multiplier), strongly supports that changes affecting the price setting were not meant to be included in the force majeure clause. The Latvian Supreme Court decision in the Latelektro-Gulbene case, pronouncing that the purchase price (except for changes in the average tariff) is to be the one following from laws and regulations in force at the time of signing the contract, also gives strong support to the conclusion that the contractually stipulated multiplier may not be changed by means of the general reservation in the force majeure clause in Contract No. 16/97, even if the Gulbene letter of intent did not contain a similar general reservation against changes in the legislation. – As will be seen from the quotations above, the Latvenergo – Windau contract of 10 March 2000 does not contain any definition of force majeure which includes later changes in the legislation.

c) Further, the Respondent contends that Contract No. 16/97, including its agreement on the purchase price, was replaced by the agreement of 10 March 2000 (see section 3.6.7 above), fixing the multiplier at 0.75 after the Constitutional Court's decision. The Claimant contends that the 10 March 2000 agreement was a purely interim agreement, entered into under a certain degree of duress and in order to get out of the loss-producing standstill situation while waiting for the Constitutional Court's decision.

The Arbitral Tribunal notes that, after Windau was ready to start production on 17 September 1999 and the price dispute had emerged in full, Latvenergo sent Windau the following letter dated 27 September 1999:

"Subject: On signing the interim agreement

During the negotiations in the Privatization Agency Latvenergo orally expressed you an offer to sign an interim agreement until our disagreement in the matters related to the purchase of the produced surplus power is solved.

Taking into account the tense course of the negotiations, the oral offer as if did not receive the necessary attention.

Therefore we repeatedly offer you to sign an interim agreement on purchasing surplus power from the station and on supplying power to the station from Latvenergo, determining the precise term for such an agreement. ...

We understand that a station, which has been launched, has to start operating as soon as possible and this is exactly the reason for our proposal. Understanding your concern, we can include in the agreement the provision that the agreement shall not be in any way related to the previous or future relationship between Latvenergo and 'Windau Ltd'."

The Tribunal further notes that the agreement of 10 March 2000 itself does not state whether it is an interim agreement, or whether it constitutes a replacement of or a supplement to Contract No. 16/97. But the agreement states in clause 10.1 that its term of validity shall not be limited, and in clause 10.2 that the validity of the agreement shall depend on the validity of the licenses issued to the parties.

With regard to the clauses regarding the purchase price to be paid, the agreement stands out as an interim agreement concerning what payments shall be made in the period until the price dispute has been settled. The parties agree (see section 2.1 of the agreement) that up to the time of the Constitutional Court's decision payment shall be made at 0.75 of the tariff, with an immediate correction of the payment up to the double tariff if the Constitutional Court decides the issue before it in favour of the Claimant. And for the time after the Constitutional Court's decision, payments shall be at the double tariff if confirmed by the Constitutional Court but otherwise be based on the 0.75 multiplier, in both cases until such time as the price dispute is settled "in the manner prescribed by law". See section 2.2.

Section 2.2 of the agreement expressly stipulates that either party shall be entitled to submit its objections or claims in respect of the prices payable under the payment arrangement in section 2.1, irrespective of the adoption of any judgement of the Constitutional Court. This must reasonably be interpreted to mean that the price and payment clauses in the agreement constitute no change in the parties' claims and material basis with regard to the long-term price to be paid. In the Tribunal's opinion this confirms that Contract No. 16/97 was not revoked or replaced by the new agreement.

As mentioned above, for the period up to the decision of the Constitutional Court, the agreement makes it clear that the payment at 0.75 is an interim payment arrangement, with the payments to be corrected up to the double tariff if that would follow from the Court's decision. For the period from the Constitutional Court's decision up to the time when the dispute is settled "in the manner prescribed by the law", the interim payment is also to be at 0.75 of the tariff (unless otherwise determined by the Constitutional Court), but the agreement does not state expressly whether the interim payments are to be corrected, provided that the subsequent legal decision concludes that the correct payment according to Contract No. 16/97 is the double tariff. The Tribunal has considered whether the agreement must be interpreted as establishing that the interim payments shall be final. In other words, whether a legal decision establishing that Contract No. 16/97 determines the price to be the double tariff is only to take effect from the time of the legal decision, in the present case only from the time of this arbitration award. However, the agreement's clear stipulation that the parties maintain their rights to pursue their claims under Contract No. 16/97 and obtain a legal decision without any limitation created by the agreement of 10 March 2000, leads the Arbitral Tribunal to the conclusion that also the agreement for the period after the Constitutional Court's decision is only an interim payment arrangement, with the payments to be corrected in accordance with the subsequent legal decision.

The Arbitral Tribunal therefore concludes that the agreement of 10 March 2000 is an interim agreement for the payments to be made during an unspecified period until the price dispute can be finally settled, making no changes with regard to the purchase price ultimately payable under Contract No. 16/97.

d) The conclusion must consequently be that the contractually agreed purchase price between Latvenergo and Windau for electric power from the Bauska plant shall be the double tariff for a period of eight years from the time when Windau was ready to start production and the plant had been commissioned.

4 The legal basis for the claims against the Republic

4.1 Introduction

The Claimant's claims are based on the undisputed fact that the start-up of production at the Bauska plant was delayed from 17 September 1999 until 28 February 2000, apparently due to Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff for electric power from the Bauska plant, and due to the undisputed fact that all electric power delivered after the start-up on 28 February 2000 has only been paid at 0.75 of the average tariff.

The Arbitral Tribunal holds, and the parties seem to agree, that for the Republic to be held responsible in this arbitration the following conditions must be satisfied:

- a) The non-payment must be caused directly by the Republic or a state organ, or Latvenergo's actions in the contractual relationship with Windau must be attributable to the Republic;
- b) The non-payment and the circumstances around such non-payment must constitute a violation of an obligation under Part III of the Treaty; and
- c) The non-payment of the double tariff must have caused loss or damage to the Claimant's investment.

The condition under lit. c) will be dealt with under section 5 below.

4.2 The Republic's responsibility for the non-payment

As concluded in sections 3.5.10 and 3.8.d above, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that Windau originally had both a statutory and a contractually established right to the double tariff for an eight year period.

It is conceded by the Respondent that the Entrepreneurial Law in force at the time of Latvenergo and Windau entering into Contract No. 16/97 on 24 March 1997 gave Windau a statutory right to the double tariff during the first eight years of production. The Respondent has also conceded that Windau's acquired statutory right to the double tariff was taken away by successive legislative acts, first, possibly, with the amendment to the Entrepreneurial Law of 11 June 1997 (see section 3.5.4), then definitely by the repeal of the Entrepreneurial Law by the Energy Law with effect from 6 October 1998 and the Cabinet of Ministers' Regulation No. 425 of 31 October 1998 (see sections 3.5.5 and 3.5.6 above). These are acts for which the Republic is directly responsible.

With regard to a contractually established right to the double tariff the Arbitral Tribunal concludes that by entering into Contract No. 16/97 Latvenergo also gave Windau a contractual right to the double tariff for eight years, see section 3.8.d above. It is not contested that Latvenergo has never paid the double tariff for electricity delivered by Windau.

No explicit explanation or documentation has been given as to the reasons for Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff, but apparently the immediate reason for Latvenergo's refusal to pay was the repeal of the statutory right to the double tariff. It is in evidence that Latvenergo had no authority of its own to decide or negotiate purchase prices for electric power produced in Latvia. The average price tariff at any time was determined by regulatory authorities, and the so called multipliers were determined by law, or according to law, with an obligation for Latvenergo to apply the relevant tariff and the multipliers determined by the public authorities. Failing any indication to the contrary, it may be assumed that Latvenergo felt it to be its duty to deny Windau the double tariff after the legislators' decision to repeal Windau's established statutory right to the double tariff.

However, Latvenergo must have been aware that Windau in all likelihood had a contractual right to the double tariff. As mentioned above, the Latvian Supreme Court in a judgement of 30 June 1999 decided, in the quite parallel case of Latelektro-Gulbene, that Latvenergo had a contractual obligation to pay according to the multiplier in force at the time of entering into the agreement, regardless of later changes in the legislation. Latvenergo also signed a new contract with Latelektro-Gulbene confirming payment of the double tariff during the eight year period.

The central government of Latvia was also fully aware of Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff. After a meeting with the Prime Minister on 29 October 1999 the Cabinet of Ministers on 30 November 1999 issued a Resolution ordering the double tariff to be paid to Windau (see section 3.5.7 above). As explained, the Resolution was later invalidated by the Constitutional Court for constitutional reasons, but the incident is evidence of the central government's full knowledge of Latvenergo's failure to pay the double tariff. There is no evidence of the government taking any further steps to protect Windau's rights under the contract, or to reinstate Windau's statutory right to the double tariff, for instance in accordance with the Republic's obligations to protect foreign investments under the Energy Charter Treaty, see section 4.3.2 below.

It must therefore be concluded that the breach of Windau's contractual rights was allowed to continue, and in that sense was caused, by the government's failure to act in order to correct the situation.

The Arbitral Tribunal is also of the view that in the circumstances of this case, the Republic must be considered responsible for Latvenergo's actions under the rules of attribution in international law.

Latvenergo was established in 1991 as a state enterprise, and was in 1993 transformed into a joint stock company with the Republic as a 100 per cent owner. For a while the plans were to privatize the company, and the company was administered by the Latvian Agency for Privatization. But by a change in the Energy Law on 3 August 2000 it was decreed that:

“As a national economy object of the State importance, the Joint Stock Company “Latvenergo” shall not be privatized. All shares in the Joint Stock Company “Latvenergo” are owned by the State.”

By order of the Cabinet of Ministers of 9 August 2000 the supervision of the company was transferred to the Ministry of Economy.

Both before and after these organizational changes Latvenergo held a dominant position as a major domestic producer of electric power and as sole distributor of electricity over the national grid. It was clearly an instrument of the State in a highly regulated electricity market. In the market segment where Windau operated, Latvenergo had no commercial freedom. It had no freedom to negotiate electricity prices but was bound, and considered itself to be bound, by the legislation and the regulatory bodies' determination of the purchase prices to be paid for electric power produced by cogeneration plants. Latvenergo cannot be considered to be, or to have been, an independent commercial enterprise, but clearly a constituent part of the Republic's organization of the electricity market and a vehicle to implement the Republic's decisions concerning the price setting for electric power.

For this reason, whether Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff was based on a misunderstanding of the legal situation, or whether it for other reasons ignored the legal framework under which it was operating, its actions concerning the purchase price are attributable to the Republic. Consequently, the Republic must be found responsible for Latvenergo's failure to pay the double tariff. – The Tribunal will add that for this finding it is not necessary to rely on the supplemental rule in Article 22 (1) of the Treaty contended by the Claimant (see section 4.3.1 below).

4.3 Violations of Treaty obligations

The Claimant alleges that the non-payment of the double tariff constitutes violation of several of the provisions of Article 10 of the Treaty, and also amounts to expropriation, or having an effect equivalent to an expropriation, as defined in Article 13 of the Treaty. It also relies on Article 22 (1) of the Treaty.

These Articles read in part:

“ARTICLE 10 PROMOTION, PROTECTION AND TREATMENT OF INVESTMENTS

(1) Each Contracting Party shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty, encourage and create stable, equitable, favorable and transparent conditions for Investors of other Contracting Parties to make Investments in its Area. Such conditions shall include a commitment to accord at all times to Investments of Investors of other Contracting Parties fair and equitable treatment. Such Investments shall also enjoy the most constant protection and security and no Contracting Party shall in any way impair by unreasonable or discriminatory measures their management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal. In no case shall such Investments be accorded treatment less favorable than that required by international law, including treaty obligations. Each Contracting Party shall observe any obligations it has entered into with an Investor or an Investment of an Investor of any other Contracting Party.

(3) For the purposes of this Article, "Treatment" means treatment accorded by a Contracting Party which is no less favourable than that which it accords to its own Investors or to Investors of any other Contracting Party or any third state, whichever is the most favourable.

(7) Each Contracting Party shall accord to Investments in its Area of Investors of other Contracting Parties, and their related activities including management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal, treatment no less favourable than that which it accords to Investments of its own Investors or of the Investors of any other Contracting Party or any third state and their related activities including management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal, whichever is the most favourable.

“ARTICLE 13 EXPROPRIATION

(1) Investments of Investors of a Contracting Party in the Area of any other Contracting Party shall not be nationalized, expropriated or subjected to a measure or measures having effect equivalent to nationalization or expropriation (hereinafter referred to as "Expropriation") except where such Expropriation is:

- (a) for a purpose which is in the public interest;
- (b) not discriminatory;
- (c) carried out under due process of law; and
- (d) accompanied by the payment of prompt, adequate and effective compensation.

Such compensation shall amount to the fair market value of the Investment expropriated at the time immediately before the Expropriation or impending Expropriation became known in such a way as to affect the value of the Investment (hereinafter referred to as the "Valuation Date"). - - -“

“ARTICLE 22 STATE AND PRIVILEGED ENTERPRISES

(1) Each Contracting Party shall ensure that any state enterprise which it maintains or establishes shall conduct its activities in relation to the sale or provision of goods and services in its Area in a manner consistent with the Contracting Party's obligations under Part III of this Treaty..

- - -”

With reference to these Treaty provisions the Claimant mainly contends that:

- Windau is subject to a treatment having an effect equivalent to expropriation;
- The Republic fails to accord fair and equitable treatment of investments and constant protection and security of such investments;
- The failure to pay the double tariff represents discrimination, and a violation of the obligation to most-favoured nation's treatment; and
- Latvenergo is under both statutory and contractual obligation to purchase electric power from the Bauska plant at the double tariff, and the Republic is, pursuant to Article 10 (1), under a duty to observe obligations that it has entered into, including obligations entered into by Latvenergo.

The Respondent denies for a number of reasons that the Respondent is in breach of any obligations under the Treaty, mainly contending that Latvenergo is a separate legal entity for which the Republic is not responsible, and that the scope of the asserted Treaty provisions are limited as set out in section 2.5 above.

4.3.1 Expropriation

The Claimant does not contend that the non-payment of the double tariff amounts to a direct and formal expropriation meeting the requirements of Article 13 (1) (a)-(c), but rather that it constitutes an “indirect” or “creeping” expropriation. By taking away a substantial part of Windau's income from sales it makes the enterprise not economically viable and the Claimant's investment worthless.

The Respondent denies that Latvenergo’s non-payment amounts to the equivalent of an expropriation even in the wider sense developed under recent international treaty law and practice. First, no public authority is involved in Latvenergo’s action under the contract, second, there is no taking of possession or control over the enterprise, and third, the payment of 0.75 rather than 2.00 of the tariff does not result in the investment becoming worthless. The Claimant itself admits that the pay-back time is only lengthened, but that does not amount to expropriation.

The Arbitral Tribunal has considered the expert legal opinions and arbitral awards rendered under similar treaties presented in this case by the parties. The Tribunal finds that “regulatory takings” may under the circumstances amount to expropriation or the equivalent of an expropriation. The decisive factor for drawing the border line towards expropriation must primarily be the degree of possession taking or control over the enterprise the disputed measures entail. In the present case, there is no possession taking of Windau or its assets, no interference with the shareholder’s rights or with the management’s control over and running of the enterprise – apart from ordinary regulatory provisions laid down in the production licence, the off-take agreement, etc.

The Tribunal therefore concludes that the withholding of payment at the double tariff does not qualify as an expropriation or the equivalent of an expropriation under the Treaty.

4.3.2 Fair and equitable treatment, discrimination etc.

The Claimant contends that Latvenergo’s actions, and the Republic's responsibility for such actions, constitutes violations of several of the Republic's obligations contained in or made operative by Article 10 of the Treaty, and has submitted evidence of circumstances upon which it bases its contentions.

The Respondent denies any violation of any international obligations contained in or referred to in Article 10, and has submitted evidence and explanations to counter the Claimant's contentions.

The Arbitral Tribunal notes in general that the actions for which the Republic is asserted to be responsible may qualify as a violation of various Treaty provisions. The Tribunal further notes that the damage or loss caused by the non-payment of the double tariff is the same. Thus, in order to establish liability for the Republic it is strictly speaking sufficient to find that one of the relevant provisions has been violated.

a) Unreasonable or discriminatory measures

Article 10 (1) provides inter alia that

“...no Contracting Party shall in any way impair by ...unreasonable or discriminatory measures their [the Investor’s Investments] ...use, enjoyment or disposal”.

The Claimant contends that Windau has been subject to discriminatory measures by Latvenergo’s refusal to pay the double tariff. Latvenergo has been, and still is, paying SIA “Latelektro-Gulbene” and Joint Stock Company “Liepājas Siltums” the double tariff for its surplus electric power. There is no legitimate reason to treat Windau differently from the two aforementioned enterprises.

The Respondent does not deny the fact of the double tariff being paid to the two companies mentioned, but contends that the situations are not comparable. The Respondent has provided lists and some details concerning the 28 cogeneration power plants existing in Latvia, and asserted that they are in many respects different and therefore have been awarded different multipliers. An evaluation must take place in each case. No discrimination is demonstrated by the fact that the two above-mentioned plants have been granted the double tariff, whereas Bauska has not.

The Arbitral Tribunal accepts that in evaluating whether there is discrimination in the sense of the Treaty one should only “compare like with like”. However, little if anything has been documented by the Respondent to show the criteria or methodology used in fixing the multiplier, or to what extent Latvenergo is authorized to apply multipliers other than those documented in this arbitration. On the other hand, all of the information available to the Tribunal suggests that the three companies are comparable, and subject to the same laws and regulations. In particular, this appears to be the situation with respect to Latelektro-Gulbene and Windau. In such a situation, and in accordance with established international law, the burden of proof lies with the Respondent to prove that no discrimination has taken or is taking place. The Arbitral Tribunal finds that such burden of proof has not been satisfied, and therefore concludes that Windau has been subject to a discriminatory measure in violation of Article 10 (1).

b) Other asserted Treaty violations

For the reason stated above, the Arbitral Tribunal does not find it necessary to adjudge the other Treaty violations asserted in this arbitration.

4.3.3 Limited scope of the Treaty provisions allegedly breached

As mentioned in section 2.5 above, the Respondent has asserted several limitations to the scope of the Treaty provisions relied on by the Claimant:

a) The Treaty does not apply retroactively to contracts entered into before the Treaty entered into force:

It is undisputed that Contract No. 16/97 was entered into on 24 March 1997 and that the Energy Charter Treaty only came into force on 17 March 1998. However, none of the Claimant's claims are based on the date of the signing of the Contract. The claims are built on the repeal of Windau's statutory right to the double tariff, which took place in September/October 1998, and on the breach of the contractual obligation to pay the double tariff, which materialized in September 1999 when the Bauska plant was ready to go into operation, and which has been maintained since then, albeit in accordance with the interim agreement of 10 March 2000. Both the changes in the law and the breach of contract occurred after the entry into force of the Treaty. There is therefore no question of retroactive effects of the Treaty in this situation.

b) The Treaty does not apply retroactively to a withdrawal of the right to the double tariff which was effected before Nykomb's investment took place:

It is undisputed that the Claimant's first investment in Windau occurred by the contract of 11 March 1999, registered on 25 March 1999, for the purchase of 51 per cent of the shares in Windau. The withdrawal of Windau's statutory right to the double tariff took place in September/October 1998, which was before Nykomb's investment. But as pointed out in lit. a) above, the claims for losses or damages are also based on the breach of the Contract which occurred from September 1999, which is after Nykomb's first investment was made. At least in the latter situation there is no question of the retroactive effects of the Treaty.

c) Nykomb was aware of the price dispute, or ought to have been aware of it, and took a commercial risk not protected by the Treaty:

The Respondent also contends that Nykomb was aware of the price dispute, or ought to have been aware of it, before it bought the shares in Windau. Nykomb took a purely business or commercial risk when investing in Windau. The Treaty only protects against political risks and not against commercial or business risks.

This contention raises the question of what Nykomb knew, or ought to have known, about Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff at the time of its investment. It also invites the question of whether a Contracting State to the Treaty can free itself from its Treaty obligations simply by informing a prospective foreign investor that it has established and intends to continue a discrimination of the foreign investment which would otherwise be a violation of the Treaty.

The Tribunal will first deal with the dispute between Latvenergo and Windau concerning the validity of Contract No. 16/97. The relevant sequence of events in connection with this can be summarized as follows:

24 Mar 1997	Contract Nos. 16/97 and 17/97 entered into
26 Mar 1997	Contract No. 18/97 entered into
11 June 1997	The Entrepreneurial Law was amended, excluding contracts after 31 May 1999
25 Sep 1997	Latvenergo board decision: No further contracts with Windau
2 Oct. 1997	Latvenergo declared Contract Nos. 16/97 and 17/97 invalid
24 Oct. 1997	Dupont Aldrich Inc. and Jonathan Moseley became shareholders

19 Feb 1998	Noell turnkey and supply contract with Windau
6 Mar 1998	Windau compromise proposal to Latvenergo on invalidity dispute
20 Mar 1998	Latvenergo rejected any compromise, referring to being "bound by law"
Spring 1998	Noell invited Nykomb to take over as equity investor
8 May 1998	Windau asks for an off-take contract for Bauska
21 May 1998	Latvenergo refused, referring to board decision of 25 September 1997
29 Jun 1997	Windau letter to Council concerning the double tariff
30 Jun 1998	Council's letter to Windau confirming the double tariff
July 1998	Nykomb involved itself in project investigations
30 Oct. 1998	PriceWaterhouseCooper's financial proposal
16 Dec 1998	First instance Court decision in the Latelektro-Gulbene case
12 Feb 1999	Loan agreement between Vereinsbank and Windau
11 Mar 1999	Nykomb's purchase agreement for 51 per cent of the shares in Windau
30 Jun 1999	The Latvian Supreme Court ruling in the Latelektro-Gulbene case
11 Sep 1999	Bauska ready to start operation. Latvenergo refuses to pay double tariff
28 Feb 2000	Bauska started operation
10 Mar 2000	Windau –Latvenergo interim agreement
About Jan 2002	Latvenergo's court action against Windau on validity of Contract 16/97
11 Feb 2002	Nykomb Request for Arbitration
January 2003	Latvenergo's court action withdrawn, according to Claimant.

As will be seen, there was an ongoing dispute between Latvenergo and Windau almost from the beginning concerning the validity of Contract No. 16/97. As early as 2 October 1997 Latvenergo proclaimed that it considered the Contract invalid. As late as at the turn of the year 2001/2002, according to the Claimant, Latvenergo brought an action in the Latvian courts against Windau, claiming the invalidity of the Contract.

A similar court action had earlier been brought by the company Latelektro-Gulbene against Latvenergo. In both cases Latvenergo appears to have argued that the purchase agreements were invalid, because they were signed on behalf of Latvenergo by a person unauthorized to do so, because the price clauses (see section 3.6.3 and 3.6.6 above) were unclear and therefore not legally binding, and because the purchase price agreement had been superseded by subsequent legislation.

Latelektro-Gulbene won its case in three Latvian court instances, which culminated in the decision of the Latvian Supreme Court in June 1999 (see section 3.6.8 above). Latvenergo's court action against Windau was initiated after the Latelektro-Gulbene case had been decided and Latvenergo had entered into a new contract with Latelektro-Gulbene accepting the double tariff, see section 3.6.8 above. The case against Windau was only withdrawn in January 2003. It has not been explained why Latvenergo gave up the court case.

In the present arbitration the Respondent does not challenge the general validity of Contract No. 16/97, but contends that it does not establish a right to the double tariff for eight years. As further developed above, the Arbitral Tribunal finds and concludes to the contrary.

But it remains to be considered whether it is of any legal significance whether Nykomb was aware of, or ought to have been aware of, Latvenergo's contentions that Contract No. 16/97 was invalid and that therefore the right to the double tariff was contended to be ineffective.

The representatives of Nykomb must clearly have been aware of the dispute between Latvenergo and Windau over the validity of Contract No. 16/97, and therefore aware of an uncertainty as to whether the whole contract would fall away, and with it Windau's right to the double tariff. This uncertainty is reflected in the PriceWaterhouseCoopers financial analysis of 30 October 1998, where calculations were made alternatively on the basis of a 1.00 multiplier (that is, ordinary tariff price for electric power) and the 2.00 multiplier according to the Contract.

The double tariff was also treated as a condition for the repurchase of shares in the agreement of 11 March 1999 whereby Nykomb bought 51 per cent of the shares in Windau. According to Clause 5.1 of the agreement the sellers were secured the right to repurchase 21 per cent of the shares, subject to several conditions, mainly,

- that Windau shall have sold all generated electricity to Latvenergo at the double tariff provided for by the Latvenergo agreements (defined in clause 2.2.9 as Contract Nos. 16/97, 17/97 and 18/97);
- that three years had expired after the commissioning of the Bauska plant; and
- that Windau had fulfilled all its liabilities and repaid all loans and covered all expenses connected with the purchase, construction and commissioning of (the 16) co-generation plants.

By clause 2.2.9 of the agreement the sellers represented and warranted that “[T]he Latvenergo Agreements are in full force and effect and enforceable in accordance with its terms”, compare in relation to this the Council's letter of 30 June 1998 confirming the double tariff.

It must therefore be concluded that Nykomb was fully aware of the uncertainty and risk deriving from Latvenergo's position, but took its precautions in the share purchase agreement and took the risk that the Contract was valid and invested in the Windau shares.

Whether or not one would characterize the risk Nykomb was taking as a commercial risk, is in the Tribunal's view immaterial. It is the Tribunal's conclusion that Windau had entered into a purchase contract for the delivery of electric power that was, and is, legally valid and binding and gave Windau the right to the double tariff for eight years. Nykomb made its share investment relying on this contract. Latvenergo's contentions that Contract No. 16/97 was invalid and did not establish the right to the double tariff were legally unfounded. Nykomb's awareness of Latvenergo's contentions does not relieve the Republic of its obligations under the Treaty resulting from Latvenergo's refusal to pay the double tariff. Generally, a Contracting Party to the Treaty cannot be relieved of its obligations under the Treaty simply by letting it be announced that legally binding commitments, upon which the foreign investor is relying, will not be honored.

d) The Claimant's claims are based on a commercial contract not protected by the Treaty

Finally, the Respondent contends that the Contract between Latvenergo and Windau for the purchase of electric power, upon which all the Claimant's claims are based, is a commercial contract and as such not protected by the Treaty. The Treaty protection only applies to investment contracts within the meaning of the Treaty.

It follows from the remarks above that the Arbitral Tribunal cannot regard the purchase contract as purely commercial, nor can the action to refuse payment of the double tariff under the contract be considered as purely commercial.

As for the objection that the purchase contract is not an investment contract within the meaning of the Treaty, it suffices to note that such a contract clearly falls within the definition of investments in Article 1 of the Treaty.

4.3.4 Conclusion

In consequence of the above findings the Arbitral Tribunal concludes that the Respondent is found to be liable under the Treaty for the losses or damages incurred by the Claimant.

5 Assessment of losses or damages

5.1 Legal principles of assessment

Article 13 (1) of the Treaty spells out the principles of compensation in the special case of investments being nationalized, expropriated or subjected to measures having effect equivalent to nationalization or expropriation. As concluded in section 4.3.1 above, the Tribunal does not find that the refusal to pay the double tariff amounts to expropriation or the equivalent of an expropriation within the meaning of Article 13 (1). The Tribunal considers that the principles of compensation provided for in Article 13 (1) are not applicable to the assessment of damages or losses found to be caused by violations of Article 10, as in the present case.

Another assessment rule is contained in Article 26 (8), which provides that the awards of arbitration according to Article 26 may include an award of interest. The question of interest will be dealt with below.

The Arbitral Tribunal holds, and it seems to be agreed between the parties, that the question of remedies to compensate for losses or damages caused by the Respondent's violation of its obligations under Article 10 of the Treaty must primarily find its solution in accordance with established principles of customary international law. Such principles have authoritatively been restated in The International Law Commission's Draft Articles on State Responsibility adopted in November 2001 (hereinafter referred to as the "Articles ILC").

According to Articles 34 and 35 ILC restitution is considered to be the primary remedy for reparation. Article 35 states:

“A State responsible for an internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to make restitution, that is, to re-establish the situation which existed before the wrongful act was committed, provided and to the extent that restitution:

- (a) is not materially impossible;
- (b) does not involve a burden out of all proportion to the benefit deriving from restitution instead of compensation.”

Restitution in the present case is conceivable, either through a juridical restitution of provisions of Latvian law ensuring Windau’s right to the double tariff as it was ensured under the Entrepreneurial Law, or through a monetary restitution to Windau of the missing payments of the difference between the contractually established double tariff and 0.75 of the tariff actually paid. But even if damage or losses to an investment may be inflicted indirectly through loss-creating actions towards a subsidiary in the country of a Contracting State, restitution must primarily be seen as an appropriate remedy in a situation where the Contracting State has instituted actions directly against the investor. An award obliging the Republic to make payments to Windau in accordance with the Contract would also in effect be equivalent to ordering payment under Contract No. 16/07 in the present Treaty arbitration. The Arbitral Tribunal therefore finds the appropriate approach, for the time up to the time of this award, to be an assessment of compensation for the losses or damages inflicted on the Claimant's investments. For the time after this award see section 5.2, last paragraph, below.

5.2 Assessment of losses or damages suffered by the Claimant

a) As already pointed out (see section 1.2.2 above) the Claimant requests a relief equal to Windau's alleged loss of net income on heat and electric power in the “dead-lock” period 16 September 1999 – 28 February 2000 and Windau’s alleged loss of sales income on electric power for the rest of the eight years’ period to 16 September 2007, namely the difference between the double tariff and the 0.75 of the tariff actually paid, or expected to be paid.

The Respondent has argued, and the Arbitral Tribunal must agree, that the reduced flow of income into Windau obviously does not cause an identical loss for Nykomb as an investor. If one compares this with a situation where Latvenergo would have paid the double tariff to Windau, it is clear that the higher payments for electric power would not have flowed fully and directly through to Nykomb. The money would have been subject to Latvian taxes etc., would have been used to cover Windau's costs and down payments on Windau's loans etc., and disbursements to the shareholder would be subject to restrictions in Latvian company law on payment of dividends. An assessment of the Claimant's loss on or damage to its investment based directly on the reduced income flow into Windau is unfounded and must be rejected.

b) However, there can be no doubt that the non-payment of the double tariff to Windau has caused a substantial reduction of the economic value and security of the Claimant's investments in the Windau enterprise.

A primary measurement of an investment is the capitalized earnings value. A substantial reduction of Windau's earnings as demonstrated in this case must be considered as convincing evidence that a substantial damage to or loss on the Claimant's investment has been suffered. A reduction of the tariff multiplier from 2.00 to 0.75 represents a 62.5 per cent reduction of the sales income from electric power. Furthermore, if one takes as illustrative the relationship between Windau's gross income on electricity and heat sales suggested by the Claimant's calculation for the "dead-lock" period, the reduction of the tariff multiplier results in a reduction of the total income from sales by about 57 per cent, more than half of Windau's total income as compared with a situation where the double tariff would be paid.

It is also clear that the higher income flow would have served to consolidate Windau's financial position, provided means for paying back bank loans and other credits, and ensured a quicker pay-back on the investments in the cogeneration plant. For Nykomb as an investor the effect would be increased security for its investments in credits, shares and subordinated loans. From another perspective, the Claimant has pointed out that the reduced liquidity caused by the refusal to pay the double tariff may lead to the consequence that Windau shall not be able to pay back the loan to Vereinsbank that is due for payment in January 2004.

But the loss or damage suffered by Nykomb as an investor is difficult to quantify. The difficulty is also increased by the fact that the Claimant has submitted rather limited documentation concerning the financial and economic situation of Windau and the circumstances concerning its own investment, for instance the relationship between Nykomb and Noell and the Noell group.

At the hearing the Claimant submitted a list of "capital requirements" for the Bauska plant 1999-2003, including the situation at the end of 2000 (for illustration, SEK at 15/- is added here):

NYKOMB
	Shares	250 000	3 750 000
	Loans	380 000	5 700 000
	Owner costs	439 000	6 585 000
		1 069 000	16 035 000
NOELL/BBP	1 495 000	22 425 000
VEREINSBANK	622 000	9 330 000
SUM TOTAL		3 186 000	47 790 000

This statement concerning the Claimant's total investment would appear to suggest a maximum of what the Claimant stands to lose on account of Latvenergo's non-payment of the double tariff. But the loss of Windau's future earning potential, and the conceivable consequential loss for Nykomb as a 100 per cent owner of the enterprise, must also be considered. As for this last element the Tribunal has little material upon which to base an assessment, apart from various submitted financial analyses and Windau's accounts for the last few years.

Faced with the lack of further specifics, together with the undeniable finding that Nykomb as an investor has suffered economic loss or damage on its investment, the Arbitral Tribunal is compelled to make an assessment, taking into regard the requirements under applicable customary international law of causation, foreseeability and the reasonableness of the result.

The Tribunal finds that the best available basis for such an assessment is the calculated loss of electricity production in the “dead-lock” period and the actual production of electric energy up to the time of this award. The Tribunal does not consider the asserted loss of heat production in the “dead-lock” period to be helpful in connection with this, nor is it substantiated in any sufficient degree what net loss has been suffered on the non-production of heat. The only cost deducted in the Claimant's calculation of the net loss is the cost of natural gas required for the production.

The Tribunal considers that in the circumstances a discretionary award of one third of the estimated loss in purchase prices of electricity up to the time of this award may serve as a reasonable basis for quantification of the Claimant's assumed losses up to the time of this award, due to the Respondent's violations of its Treaty obligations.

To develop the chosen basis for the Arbitral Tribunal's assessment the Tribunal has added, to the Claimant's figures for electricity production up to 30 April 2003, an estimated figure for power production from 1 May 2003 up to the time of the award, based on the figures for power production up to 30 April 2003. It has also been found reasonable to include in the estimate a 6 per cent simple interest, reckoned for practical reasons for each of the periods in question from the mid point of the respective periods up to the time of the award.

On this basis the Arbitral Tribunal assesses a reasonable compensation in the sum of Lats 1.600.000. In view of the Claimant's use of the Latvian currency in its requests for relief the same currency is used in this assessment.

As specifically regards the asserted losses on delivery of electric power to Latvenergo for the remainder of the eight year period, the Tribunal considers this potential loss to be too uncertain and speculative to form the basis for an award of monetary compensation. But the Tribunal considers it to be a continuing obligation upon the Republic to ensure the payment at the double tariff for electric power delivered under the Contract for the rest of the eight year period, and therefore gives an order for the Republic to fulfill its obligation under the Treaty to protect the Claimant's investment.

5.3 Payment of interest

The Claimant has claimed interest on the claimed amounts in the various periods, from the beginning of each of the designated periods until payment. In its first requests for relief, and in its calculations of net present values of future losses on the sale of electric power, the Claimant claimed for an annual interest rate of six per cent, stating that this is the prevailing interest rate in Latvia. In its Brief No. III of 9 September 2003 (see section 1.2.1 above) the Claimant claimed for an annual interest rate of six per cent up to the date of the award, and 18 per cent from that date until payment. The Claimant contends that it has the right to claim 18 per cent which is the stipulated interest rate in the Contract between Windau and Latvenergo in the event of late payment.

The Respondent has not objected to the statement regarding the prevailing interest rate in Latvia of six per cent per annum, but has objected to the Claimant's asserting a right to the interest rate in the Windau – Latvenergo contract.

According to Article 26 (8) of the Treaty an arbitration award may include the award of interest. The Arbitral Tribunal finds it appropriate in the present case to award interest.

As mentioned above, the Tribunal has, for the periods up to the time of the award, included an interest element at six per cent per annum as a basis for the assessment of the Claimant's accumulated losses by the time of the award.

As for the time after the award the Tribunal finds it appropriate to award six per cent per annum on the awarded amounts, from the time of the award until payment is effected. This interest rate must be seen as accepted by the parties to be the prevailing rate in Latvia.

The Claimant has no right to claim in this arbitration the interest rate agreed between Windau and Latvenergo. The interest to be considered under the Treaty is a compensation related to the compensation to the Claimant for its own damages or losses. The interest clause in the Windau – Latvenergo contract is related to late payments under the contract and clearly includes a penalty element not applicable in the present case.

6 Allocation and allowability of costs

6.1 The Parties' arguments

The Claimant claims compensation for its own costs, which amount to SEK 8.354.000. The Claimant also requests the Arbitral Tribunal to order the Respondent to pay all the costs and expenses of this arbitration.

The Respondent claims compensation for its own costs, which amounts to SEK 6.435.270 and LAT 229.174. The Respondent also requests the Arbitral Tribunal to order the Claimant to pay all the costs and expenses of this arbitration.

The only comment from the parties in relation to costs is from the Respondent saying that it is not reasonable that the Republic should bear the increase in the Claimant's costs which must have been the result of a new counsel for the Claimant coming in at a late stage in the proceedings.

6.2 In general

According to Article 41 of the Rules of the Arbitration Institute of the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce, the Arbitral Tribunal may, unless the parties have agreed otherwise, at the request of a party in the Award, order the losing party to compensate the other party for legal representation and other expenses for presenting its case. An arbitral tribunal may apportion such costs between the parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable, taking into account the circumstances of the case.

The Claimant has to a certain extent been successful in its claim and is therefore, in principle, entitled to an award ordering the Respondent to bear part of the costs for this arbitration.

6.3 The fees and costs of the Arbitral Tribunal and the Arbitration Institute

The fees and costs of the arbitrators amount to the following.

The fee of the chairman of the Arbitral Tribunal, Mr. Bjørn Haug, amounts to € 90.000. His costs amount to € 7.677.

The fee of Mr. Rolf A. Schütze amounts to € 49.500. His costs amount to € 10.475.

The fee of Mr. Johan Gernandt amounts to € 49.500. His costs amount to € 2.763.

Value Added Tax (“VAT”) at a rate of 25 per cent for Mr. Johan Gernandt (Swedish VAT) and 16 per cent for Mr. Rolf A. Schütze (German VAT) is to be imposed on charges for legal services.

The fee of The Stockholm Chamber of Commerce Arbitration Institute amounts to € 20.946. Value Added Tax (“VAT”) at a rate of 25 per cent is to be imposed on the part of the administrative fee payable by the Swedish party.

As follows from section 6.1 and 6.2 above, and considering the other circumstances of the case, the Arbitral Tribunal concludes that it is reasonable to apportion the costs of the arbitration (except for the parties’ own costs) equally between the parties.

Consequently, the costs of the arbitration, notably the fees, charges and disbursements of the Arbitral Tribunal and the Arbitration Institute shall be paid by the Claimant with 50 per cent and by the Respondent with 50 per cent. The Arbitral Tribunal will so award.

6.4 The costs for legal representations and expenses

The Claimant has, as also stated above, to a certain extent been successful in its claim and is therefore, in principle, entitled to an award ordering the Respondent to bear some part of the Claimant’s costs for this arbitration.

The Arbitral Tribunal notes that the major part of the work involved in presenting the Claimant’s claim has, in the opinion of the Arbitral Tribunal, been devoted to the difficult legal issue of whether or not the Respondent is liable for the claim, in which the Claimant has been successful. However, the Arbitral Tribunal finds reason to make some adjustment of the Claimant’s monetary claim. The Arbitral Tribunal concludes that the amount requested by the Claimant, i.e. SEK 8.354.000, is high, that the Claimant has changed its counsel, which normally leads to additional costs, and that a reasonable sum to be awarded in favour of the Claimant to be paid by the Respondent, considering the circumstances and the outcome of the case, is SEK 2,000,000. The Arbitral Tribunal will so award.

7 Arbitral Award

For the reasons stated above, the Arbitral Tribunal unanimously renders the following

Arbitral Award

1. a) The Republic of Latvia is ordered to pay to Nykomb Synergetics Technology Holding AB, Stockholm, Lats 1,600,000 –onemillionsixhundredthousand Lats – plus interest at the rate of 6 (six) per cent per annum from the date of the award until full payment is effective.
b) The Republic of Latvia is ordered to ensure the payment of the double tariff to Windau SIA, Riga, for electric power delivered from Windau's cogeneration plant at Bauska in accordance with Contract No. 16/97 for the period from the date of this award until 16 September 2007.
2. The Republic of Latvia is ordered to pay to Nykomb Synergetics Technology Holding AB, Stockholm, as compensation for its costs incurred in connection with this arbitration SEK 2,000,000 –twomillion SEK.
3. In accordance with the decision of the Arbitration Institute of the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce, the arbitrators and the said Arbitration Institute shall be entitled to fees and compensation for expenses in the following amounts:

a) Bjørn Haug, chairman,
fees	€ 90.000
costs	€ 7.677
	€ 97.677
b) Rolf A. Schütze, arbitrator,
fees	€ 49.500
costs	€ 10.475
16 per cent VAT on fees and costs	€ 9.596
	€ 69.571
c) Johan Gernandt, arbitrator,
fees	€ 49.500
costs	€ 2.763
25 per cent VAT on fees and costs	€ 13.066
	€ 65.329
d) The Arbitration Institute, administrative fee	€ 20.946
Sum total	€ 253.523

As between the parties, Nykomb Synergetics Technology Holding AB shall be responsible for 50 per cent and the Republic of Latvia for 50 per cent of the amounts due in this arbitration to the arbitrators and the Arbitration Institute.

In relation to the arbitrators and the Arbitration Institute the parties shall be jointly and severally liable for the payment of the amounts due to the arbitrators and the Arbitration Institute.

- Nykomb Synergetics Technology Holding AB shall also pay 25 per cent VAT on its part of the administrative fee to the Arbitration Institute, i.e. (25 per cent of €20.946/2) = € 2.618.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Commencement of the Arbitration

1. This arbitration arises out of events consequent upon the reorganisation and privatisation of the Czech banking sector as it had formerly existed under the centralised banking system of the Communist period, which ended in 1990. The Czech Government privatised one of the major Czech banks, known as IPB (see below, paragraph 33), by selling the State's shareholding to a company within the Nomura group of companies. The Nomura Group (see below, paragraph 42) is a major Japanese merchant banking and financial services group of companies, which typically operates also through subsidiaries set up in various countries. The Nomura company which bought the shares in IPB transferred them to another Nomura subsidiary, Saluka Investments BV ("Saluka"), a legal person constituted under the laws of The Netherlands.

2. By a Notice of Arbitration dated 18 July 2001 Saluka initiated arbitration proceedings against the Czech Republic as the Respondent, under Article 8 of the Agreement on Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investments Between the Kingdom of The Netherlands and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, signed on 29 April 1991 ("the Treaty"). The Czech and Slovak Federal Republic was dissolved on 31 December 1992, and its two constituent parts became independent States as the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic. The Czech Republic confirmed to the Kingdom of The Netherlands that, upon the separation of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic into two separate Republics, the Treaty remained in force between the Czech Republic and the Kingdom of The Netherlands.

3. In accordance with Article 8(5) of the Treaty, the arbitration tribunal ("the Tribunal"), in determining its own procedure, has to apply the arbitration rules of the United Nations Commission for International Trade Law ("the UNCITRAL Rules"). Although, inevitably, at the time when the Notice of Arbitration was served the Tribunal had not been constituted, the Claimant's Notice of Arbitration was, as is usual in these circumstances, given to the Respondent pursuant to Article 3.1 of those Rules.

B. Constitution of the Tribunal

4. Article 8 of the Treaty provides that the Tribunal will consist of three persons, each party appointing one member and those two members appointing a third person as Chairman of the Tribunal. Within the time-limits set out in that Article the three appointments were made, Mr Daniel Price being appointed by the Claimant, Professor Dr Peter Behrens being appointed by the Respondent, and Professor Sir Elihu Lauterpacht CBE QC being appointed as Chairman by agreement between the two previously-appointed members.

5. On 5 June 2002 Mr Price tendered his resignation. On 20 June 2002 the Claimant appointed in his place Maître L. Yves Fortier CC QC as a member of the Tribunal.

6. On 24 February 2003 Professor Sir Elihu Lauterpacht tendered his resignation. The two party-appointed members of the Tribunal agreed upon the appointment of Sir Arthur Watts KCMG QC in his place as Chairman of the Tribunal, and the parties were notified of this on 25 March 2003.

C. Procedural Timetable

7. At a Procedural Meeting held in London on 2 November 2001:

a. it was agreed that the UNCITRAL Rules were the applicable rules of procedure in this arbitration;

b. the parties accepted the Tribunal's proposal that registry services for the arbitration should be provided by the Permanent Court of Arbitration ("PCA"), and the PCA agreed to provide such services;

c. Geneva, Switzerland, was selected as the place of arbitration, although this did not preclude the Tribunal from holding meetings at any other place, including The Hague, for the sake of convenience;

d. English was agreed as the language of the arbitration;

e. arrangements were made for the discovery of certain documents;

f. the following timetable for the submission of written pleadings by the parties was laid down (it being agreed that it would be more appropriate to use the international nomenclature for the parties' written submissions rather than the terms used in the UNCITRAL Rules):

Claimant's Memorial – 5 March 2002, and Respondent's Counter-Memorial – 17 May 2002;

g. the possibility of there being a second round of written submissions was reserved for future decision by the Tribunal, but tentative deadlines were set as follows:

Claimant's Reply – 19 July 2002, and Respondent's Rejoinder – 13 September 2002; and

h. arrangements were made regarding questions of confidentiality.

8. The timetable laid down for the first round of written pleadings was subsequently amended from time to time, by agreement of the parties.

D. The Written Pleadings

9. Two days before the amended date fixed for the submission of the Claimant's Memorial, the Respondent on 13 August 2002 filed a Notice to Dismiss, by which it requested that the Tribunal dismiss the Claimant's claims.

10. At a Procedural Meeting in London on 10 September 2002 to consider this request, the Tribunal ruled that because the facts alleged in the Respondent's Notice to Dismiss were so closely related to the facts involved in the principal claim, the dismissal issue should be joined to the merits and ruled upon in the Tribunal's final award.

11. Meanwhile, in accordance with the amended timetable, the Claimant filed its Memorial on 15 August 2002.

E. The Respondent's Counterclaim

12. Before the amended deadline set for the filing of its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent submitted on 4 December 2002 a Notice of Counterclaim, setting forth a counterclaim against the Claimant in which it stated that it would elaborate in its Counter-Memorial.

13. By a letter dated 16 December 2002 the Claimant informed the Respondent of its view that the Tribunal lacked jurisdiction under the Treaty to hear a Counterclaim by the Czech Republic. In a subsequent exchange of correspondence, the Claimant proposed that the Tribunal hear its objections to jurisdiction prior to the filing of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, while the Respondent suggested that any objections to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal to consider the Counterclaim be raised, and resolved by the Tribunal, after the filing of the Counter-Memorial.

14. In a "Direction by the Tribunal" ("Direction") issued on 15 January 2003 the Tribunal permitted the Respondent to proceed in the manner set out in its Notice of Counterclaim, by elaborating such claims within its Counter-Memorial (then due to be filed by 21 February 2003), and ordered the Claimant to respond by 31 March 2003 to the parts of the Counter-Memorial dealing with the Counterclaim by Objections limited to the question of the Tribunal's jurisdiction in that respect.

15. The Tribunal added that it expected the Respondent's elaboration to cover comprehensively the questions of the Tribunal's jurisdiction over the Counterclaim, and whether any connection is required between the Counterclaim and the Claimant's claim as submitted in its Memorial of 15 August 2002 and, if so, the nature and extent of such connection. The Direction reserved the question whether oral proceedings would be necessary on this issue, and suspended the proceedings in respect of the rest of the case until the question of the Tribunal's jurisdiction over the Counterclaim had been decided.

16. The Tribunal set, and at the request of the parties varied from time to time, a timetable for the submission by the parties of their pleadings on the issue of jurisdiction, and the parties duly complied with that timetable as amended.

17. In its Counter-Memorial, submitted on 7 March 2003, the Respondent both set out its response to the Claimant's claims and dealt with the question of counterclaims.

18. As regards its Counterclaim, the Respondent set out the various heads of its Counterclaim in the Counter-Memorial, and addressed separately the question of the Tribunal's jurisdiction over the Counterclaim. On 15 May 2003 the Claimant filed its "Objections to Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaims" ("the Objections"). This was followed, on 29 September 2003, by the Respondent's "Response to the Claimant's Objections to Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaims" ("the Response"), and on 10 November 2003 by the Claimant's "Reply to the Czech Republic's Response to the Claimant's Objections to Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaims" ("the Reply").

19. On 11 November 2003 the Respondent requested a hearing on the issue of the Tribunal's jurisdiction over its Counterclaim. The Tribunal fixed 6 March 2004 for the hearing, and the Tribunal and the parties met in London on that date for the purpose of hearing oral argument on this issue.

20. On 7 May 2004 the Tribunal handed down its Decision on Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaim ("Decision on Jurisdiction over Counterclaims"). For the reasons set out in that Decision, the Tribunal decided

- a. that it was without jurisdiction to hear and determine the Counterclaim put forward by the Respondent in its Counter-Memorial;
- b. that that Decision was without prejudice to the issue raised by the Respondent's Notice to Dismiss of 15 August 2002, which had been joined to the merits by the Tribunal's ruling of 10 September 2002;
- c. that questions of costs arising as a result of the presentation by the Respondent of the Counterclaim set out in its Counter-Memorial were reserved until final consideration could be given to questions of costs in this arbitration as a whole; and
- d. that the Tribunal would separately set out a revised timetable for the remaining written pleadings of the parties.

21. In a letter dated 9 June 2004 the Claimant subsequently raised a question as to the effect of the Tribunal's Decision on Jurisdiction over Counterclaims, contending that Part IV of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial (in which the Respondent had set out its arguments on its counterclaims) was to be treated as struck out and that in consequence the Claimant need not in its Reply deal with the matters contained in that Part IV. After obtaining the views of the parties the Tribunal on 26 July 2004 conveyed to the parties its view that its Decision on Jurisdiction over Counterclaims had the consequence that Part IV of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial was no longer relevant to the arbitration in so far as it concerned the question of counterclaims, but that it did not necessarily follow that Part IV was also irrelevant to other questions which might still arise in the arbitration. Since the possible relevance of Part IV to such other questions was a matter to be argued by the parties as part of the further proceedings on the merits, the Tribunal was unable to agree to the Claimant's request that the Tribunal should now order that Part IV be struck out of the pleadings altogether.

F. Subsequent Procedural Timetable

22. Having already received the Claimant's Memorial and the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, the Tribunal on 9 June 2004 endorsed the parties' agreement to the following timetable for the submission of further written pleadings:

Claimant's Reply – 24 September 2004; and Respondent's Rejoinder – 4 February 2005.

Those further written pleadings were submitted by the parties within the time allowed for them.

G. Oral Hearings

23. In subsequent discussion with the parties, it was agreed that oral hearings would be held in London, at the International Dispute Resolution Centre, from Friday, 8 April 2005 to Wednesday, 20 April 2005. The hearings duly took place between those dates.

24. At those hearings, the Tribunal was addressed by:

On behalf of the Claimant: Mr Jan Paulsson
Mr Peter Turner
Professor James Crawford SC

On behalf of the Respondent: Mr George von Mehren

In addition, the Tribunal heard the following witnesses:

Called by the Claimant: Mr Randall Dillard
Professor Hyun Song Shin

Called by the Respondent: Mr Michael Descheneaux
Mr Pavel Racoča
Mr Luděk Niedermayer
Mr Jan Mládek
Mr Pavel Mertlík
Mr Kamil Rudolecký
Mr Ivan Pilip
Mr Pavel Kavánek
Professor Joseph J. Norton
Mr Brent Kaczmarek

25. After the conclusion of the oral hearings, the Tribunal allowed the parties, if they so wished, to file post-hearing briefs by 30 June 2005. Both parties filed post-hearing briefs within that deadline.

II. THE FACTS

26. Saluka claims in this arbitration that the Czech Republic acted in relation to Saluka and its investment in a manner inconsistent with the Czech Republic's obligations under the bilateral investment treaty ("BIT") between The Netherlands and the Czech Republic. In particular, Saluka claims that it was deprived of its investment contrary to Article 5 of that treaty, and that, contrary to Article 3, its investment was not treated fairly and equitably.

27. While the parties differed as to some of the facts and as to the interpretation to be made of the facts (those differences will emerge later in this Award), it appears to the Tribunal that the essential facts underlying this dispute were as follows.

A. The Banking System in Czechoslovakia during the Period of Communist Rule

28. As was the case in many sectors of the economy, the banking sector in Communist Czechoslovakia – more formally, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic – was highly centralised: it was an integral part of central State economic planning. That Communist era came to an end in 1990.

B. The Agreement on Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investments Between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic 1991

29. As a step towards encouraging the development of a market economy in this former Communist State, a number of Western States concluded BITs with the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic. One such treaty was the Agreement on Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investments Between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic 1991 concluded with The Netherlands on 29 April 1991. The Treaty entered into force on 1 October 1992.

C. The Separation of the Czech Republic and Slovakia

30. Following the end of the Communist era, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic separated into its two constituent parts on 31 December 1992, and in its place the two independent States of the Czech Republic and Slovakia were created.

31. The Treaty had been concluded with the former State, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic. By letter of 8 December 1994, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Czech Republic confirmed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Kingdom of The Netherlands that the Treaty remained in force between the two States. No question of State succession in relation to the Treaty has been raised by the parties in this arbitration. The Tribunal, and the parties, have therefore proceeded on the basis that the Treaty applies to the situation which has given rise to the present dispute.

D. The Reorganisation and Privatisation of the Banking System in the Czech Republic

32. With the end of the period of Communist rule in 1990 and the subsequent establishment of the Czech Republic, the Czech authorities also took various steps to transform the economy into a more market-based system. This involved amongst other things attracting investment from abroad in order to provide the expertise to assist with this transformation. In particular it was necessary to reorganise the previously centralised banking sector.

33. By about 1994, the distinct segments of the former centralised banking system which revolved around the State Bank of Czechoslovakia had separated into four large State-owned commercial banks which dominated the banking sector in the Czech Republic. These “Big Four” banks were Česká spořitelna, a.s. (“CS”), Komerční banka, a.s. (“KB”), Československá obchodní banka a.s. (“CSOB”), and Investiční a Poštovní banka a.s. (later known as IP banka a.s., or “IPB”). The Czech banking sector was administered and regulated by the Czech National Bank (“CNB”).

34. IPB was the result of a merger in December 1993 between a bank known as “IB” (which had been formed in 1990 from part of the State Bank of Czechoslovakia) and the Post Office Bank: this merger gave IPB a right to provide banking services at 3,500 branches of Czech Post Offices until 2008 – the country’s largest retail banking network. IPB, however, did not just conduct a banking operation. By early 1996 it also managed a varied industrial portfolio, which included a substantial (83%) holding of shares in Plzeňský Prazdroj, the company that produces Pilsner Urquell beer. IPB’s corporate structure involved a Management Board of Directors (responsible for the day-to-day management of the bank) and a Supervisory Board (appointed and/or elected by IPB’s shareholders and employees, and responsible for general supervision and control), together with a General Assembly of shareholders. There was also a Chief Executive Officer.

35. With the end of the Communist period of control, the Czech Republic sought to transfer large parts of its hitherto State-owned economy into private ownership. It wanted to do this as rapidly as possible, and embarked upon a system of “mass voucher” privatisation – a system whereby State-owned firms were converted into joint stock companies, the shares in which were sold to Czech citizens for vouchers which they purchased for a nominal price. This process was substantially completed in two waves, and was concluded by 1995. In the case of larger and more strategic enterprises, however, only part of the share ownership was distributed through this mass privatisation procedure. A State agency known as the National Property Fund (“NPF”) retained a significant stake in these strategic enterprises, which included the Big Four banks – IPB, CSOB, CS and KB. The Czech State retained (directly or indirectly) a significant minority stake in and control over these banks: while the precise degree of the State’s shareholdings varied over time, at the times relevant to these proceedings, the State’s stake in CS amounted approximately to 45%, in KB to 48.75%, in IPB to 36%, and in CSOB to 46%. The final sale of the State’s remaining stakes in the banks and their privatisation was to follow in the period 1998-2001.

E. The Czech Banking Sector's "Bad Debt" Problem

36. One of the legacies from the Communist era was a large level of outstanding debt, much of which included non-performing loans granted to large State enterprises which were insolvent. A large proportion of this bad debt problem found its way to the balance sheets of the Big Four banks. From them it was passed to the State-owned debt consolidation agency, Konsolidační banka, s.p. ú v likvidaci ("KoB"), which bought specific loans from the banks, whereby the purchase price exceeded the value of the loans. By 1995 most Communist-era bad debts had fed through the system.

37. However, economic practices in the post-Communist period created a substantial further bad debt problem in relation to new loans. It was government policy to continue the supply of credit to newly privatised firms, not necessarily on commercial terms, in order to keep the firms operating while they undertook the necessary restructuring; this liberal credit policy was applied even when, in truth, the firms being assisted were floundering and had ceased to service their loans. The Big Four banks (in which the State retained a significant stake) assisted in the carrying out of this policy. The balance sheets of the Big Four banks were once again seriously affected. By the end of 1999 the stock of non-performing loans in the portfolios of commercial and special institutions associated with the transformation of the economy amounted to one third of total loans or the equivalent of 26% of the Czech Republic's gross domestic product ("GDP"): a World Bank study in 2000 noted that this was one of the highest ratios in the new market economies of Central and Eastern Europe.

38. The problem was exacerbated by the absence at the time in the Czech legal system of an effective procedure to enable creditors to enforce payment of debts owing to them: moreover, collateral security for loans could not be sold without the debtor's consent. The CNB reported in 1997 that "[t]he balance between the rights and obligations of debtors and creditors is, on the long-term basis, tilted in favour of the debtors."<sup>1</sup> Some improvements in the legal regime regarding creditors' rights were made by new legislation, but this only entered into force on 1 May 2000.

39. This combination of relatively liberal credit policies and inadequate creditors' rights created a new "bad debts" or "bad loans" problem for the Czech banking system. By 1998 the Big Four banks again had a large non-performing loan problem, estimated at 34% for KB, 23.3% for CS, 16.6% for CSOB, and 21.75% for IPB.

40. A new Social Democratic Government which came to power in June 1998 sought to address these problems by action directed at business enterprises, through what was referred to as a "Revitalisation Programme"; both the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance expressly rejected the provision of further State aid directly to the banks. The new Government also claimed that it would improve creditors' rights, thereby helping creditor banks to recover their loans, but these promises either were not fulfilled, or were only fulfilled belatedly.

41. Given the continuing inadequacies in the legal regime of creditors' rights, the CNB felt obliged to take tough regulatory action in mid-1998 to protect the stability of the banking system. This action seriously affected the performance of the major banks, which had to allocate a substantial part of their operating profits to additional provisions and reserves, causing some to return substantial losses for 1998.

F. Nomura's Acquisition of Control over IPB on 8 March 1998

42. Meanwhile, from mid-1996, Nomura began negotiations for the purchase of the State's shares in IPB. At this point the Tribunal must observe that "Nomura" is, in these proceedings, something of a portmanteau term. The Nomura Group, as a major international provider of banking and financial services, operates through a complex of associated and subsidiary companies, and it is not always easy to distinguish the separate capacities in which they act. For present purposes, it is convenient to distinguish between (1) the overall Nomura enterprise (which will be referred to as "the Nomura Group", "Nomura International" or sometimes simply "Nomura"), (2) an English-incorporated Nomura subsidiary known as Nomura Europe plc ("Nomura Europe" or sometimes simply "Nomura"), and (3) the Dutch-incorporated Nomura subsidiary known as Saluka Investments BV ("Saluka") and the Claimant in these arbitration proceedings. It is not, however, always possible to distinguish between these various emanations of Nomura, particularly since neither party has consistently made the necessary distinctions, much of the correspondence tendered in evidence is on writing paper headed "Nomura International PLC" even when dealing with the consequences of the Nomura/Saluka shareholding in IPB, and the Respondent indeed avowedly uses the term "Nomura" and "Saluka" interchangeably, in keeping with its view that as a practical matter Saluka is a mere shell used by Nomura for its own purposes.

43. The Nomura Group had had considerable direct experience of the Czech economy since about 1990, including advising the Czech Government on the privatisation of Czech breweries, and experience of the Czech banking sector, having previously advised both the Government and the Big Four banks in general as well as IPB in particular (with whom it had a long-standing relationship); it had also invested in Czech enterprises, and had an office in Prague since 1992.

44. In April 1996 IPB appointed Nomura to manage an equity offering, but ultimately this offering was abandoned. On 26 September 1996 Nomura offered to purchase the Government's shareholding in IPB at the price of CZK 300 per share, and to provide CZK 9 billion of new capital to the bank. The Government's shareholding consisted of 31.5% of IPB's shares held through the NPF, and a further 4.8% through other sources, in particular Czech Post – a total Government holding of some 36.3%.

45. A Nomura delegation led by Mr Yoshihisa Tabuchi (a Director and Counsellor at Nomura) met Mr Václav Klaus (Prime Minister), Mr Ivan Kočárník (Minister of Finance), Mr Josef Tošovský (Governor of the CNB) and others, including the management of IPB, at the end of October 1996 to discuss Nomura's offer. By about that time, Nomura reached an understanding with IPB's management that control over IPB would be exercised through shareholders agreements between Nomura and the management of IPB.

46. On 27 November 1996 the Government announced its intention to sell its shareholding in IPB through a public tender process, and therefore rejected Nomura's offer to buy the shares.

47. An internal Nomura analysis of December 1996 concluded that the viability of IPB as an investment depended on State support. Even so, on 23 December 1996, Nomura, through various subsidiaries, purchased approximately 5% of IPB shares (and by April 1997 had acquired almost 10% of IPB's shares). In or about December 1996 Nomura retained the firm later known as Price Waterhouse Coopers (after the merger of Price Waterhouse and Coopers & Lybrand in July 1998) to conduct due diligence of IPB: previously Nomura, as an "insider" working for IPB's management, had conducted extensive due diligence in connection with the abandoned equity offering of April 1996.

48. On 24 March 1997 the tender for the sale of up to 36% of the shares in IPB was announced by the NPF. The next day, Nomura International wrote to the Vice-Chairman of the NPF to declare its interest (the only other bidder to respond was ING Financial Services International). On 17 April 1997 Nomura presented a proposal to the Government for the purchase of the NPF's minority stake at CZK 300 per share (subject to due diligence and documentation).

49. As it was already a (minority) shareholder in IPB, Nomura then on 16 April 1997 entered into a shareholders agreement with other IPB shareholders whereby Nomura affiliates would offer to purchase the State's interest in IPB, and Nomura and the IPB management would jointly exercise control of IPB. On the same day, a second shareholders agreement which gave certain employment benefits to some of IPB's senior officials was also concluded.

50. On the next day, 17 April 1997, Nomura presented the NPF with a proposal to purchase its IPB shares and strengthen IPB's capital, and it informed the NPF that it had entered into shareholders agreements which gave it a strong position in IPB.

51. On 29 April 1997 Mr Jiří Tesař and Mr Libor Procházka, two senior members of IPB's Managing Board, were detained on charges of embezzlement. They were subsequently released, but nevertheless (and against a background of generally low public confidence in the banking sector) IPB's share price fell and clients began withdrawing funds. The NPF suggested to Nomura that, as a mark of confidence in IPB, a Nomura employee should join IPB's Management Board. Accordingly, in May 1997, Mr Eduard Onderka, a Director within Nomura's Merchant Banking Group, was appointed to IPB's Management Board; Nomura also provided a CZK 5 billion liquidity line to IPB following the drain on its liquidity caused by the outflow of deposits.

52. After receiving a provisional report on IPB from Price Waterhouse Coopers in June 1997, and a further Nomura internal analysis, both of which drew attention to IPB's poor financial position, Nomura International submitted a further proposal to the Government on 16-17 June 1997 whereby Nomura and the NPF would together have a controlling majority of IPB's shares. The Government rejected this proposal as not being consistent with Government policy, and requested Nomura to submit a further proposal on the lines of an outright purchase of the NPF's shareholding.

53. On 7 July 1997 Nomura submitted a new proposal for the purchase of up to 36.29% of IPB's share capital at CZK 285 per share (subject to due diligence and documentation); Nomura also proposed to subscribe a new issue of not more than 60,000,000 shares in IPB

(totalling CZK 6 billion), and an issue of 10-year subordinated bonds with a total face value not exceeding CZK 6 billion, with another similar issue if needed; and Nomura required a 10-year extension of IPB's franchise agreement with the Czech Post Office.

54. On 23 July 1997 this proposal was accepted by the Government. The purchase price was subject to adjustment based on IPB's net asset value (with the transaction capable of being unwound if the adjusted share price was below CZK 100 per share).

55. Matters appear to have rested there for several months. During that time (and particularly in July and August 1997) Nomura conducted further studies of IPB's financial position. These forecast that Nomura's anticipated profit from its IPB transaction would be US$50-88 million, but also made it clear that IPB was in a serious financial state and without a large and immediate injection of capital, IPB could face forced administration, and that there were serious risks to investing in IPB.

56. In September-October 1997 Nomura sought an assurance from Mr Ivan Pilip (then Minister of Finance) that others of the Big Four banks would not be privatised under conditions more favourable to their investors than the conditions being offered to Nomura. Mr Pilip said that if he remained Finance Minister he would privatise other large banks in the same way as IPB, i.e. sell them in the condition they were in and without helping them to solve their debt problems prior to their sale, but added that he could not give Nomura any assurance that the privatisation of the other banks would proceed in the same way as the privatisation of IPB, since he could not bind a different future government which might adopt a different policy. Nor was any such assurance included in the eventual Share Purchase Agreement.

57. On 18-19 January 1998 Nomura and the NPF agreed to submit two alternative versions of their prospective share purchase agreement to the Government for approval, each based on different valuations of IPB's shares. The first provided for a share price of CZK 117 plus a commitment by Nomura to subscribe to CZK 6 billion of new share capital in IPB and an underwriting commitment for CZK 6 billion of subordinated debt; the second provided for a share price of CZK 147 and the same commitment to subscribe to CZK 6 billion of new share capital but only a "reasonable efforts" commitment for the issue of the CZK 6 billion of subordinated capital for the bank. On 2 February 1998 IPB's auditors Ernst & Young (on the basis of whose audit the Government insisted on working) confirmed that the net asset value of IPB shares was (as at 31 July 1997) CZK 147 per share. Price Waterhouse Coopers were unable to finalise a parallel audit of IPB on behalf of Nomura. The Government, in choosing between the two alternative versions of the prospective share purchase agreement, selected the alternative with the higher purchase price, namely CZK 147 per share.

58. From 3-4 February 1998, a Nomura International representative, Mr David Thirsk, met with a representative of IPB's senior managers to discuss Nomura's plans for IPB, which linked Nomura's purchase of IPB shares with Nomura's purchase of a shell company to hold IPB's Pilsner Urquell shares (as to which, see below, paragraphs 68-69). On 6 February 1998 Nomura wrote to the NPF emphasizing that Nomura was not entering into IPB as a strategic partner (i.e. an investor who acquires a company with a view to integrating the acquisition into its operations), but rather that it intended its role to be that of a limited recourse equity investor in IPB, or portfolio investor (i.e. an investor who acquires shares in a company as an investment, with a view to their eventual sale at, it would be hoped, a profit). Consistent with this view of its position, Nomura Europe limited its shareholding in IPB to less than 50%, holding most (and eventually all) of its shares through Saluka, and allowing Nomura personnel to act only as shareholder representatives on IPB's Supervisory Board, and not as executive directors on IPB's Management Board.

59. At about this time, Nomura had agreed with certain significant counterparties an option – the so-called “Put Option” – whereby Nomura Europe could put its shares in IPB (at an initial price of CZK 115 per share) towards the purchase of other assets (notably IPB's holding of Pilsner Urquell shares), clearing the way for Nomura Europe's eventual acquisition in March 1998 of the NPF's shares in IPB. During this period the complex series of transactions regarding the acquisition and sale of Pilsner Urquell shares taking place (see below, paragraphs 68-69).

60. On 16 February 1998 and 2 March 1998 Nomura Europe submitted to the Czech authorities a paper on a “Strategy of Nomura Europe plc for IPB” in support of its application for CNB approval for its purchase of IPB shares: that approval was required by section 16 of the Czech Banking Act 1998. Nomura Europe did not disclose in this paper the Put Option which it had negotiated, nor its objectives in relation to the Pilsner Urquell shares. On 20 February 1998 Nomura filed for approval by the Office for the Protection of Economic Competition (“OPC”) of its acquisition of IPB shares; it did not inform the OPC that Nomura indirectly controlled the Radegast brewery and that IPB indirectly controlled the Pilsner Urquell brewery (the OPC's approval was given on 13 May 1998).

61. On 4 March 1998 the Government approved the sale of the IPB shares held by the NPF to Nomura Europe. On 7 March 1998 Nomura entered into a new shareholders agreement with the other parties to the shareholders agreement of 16 April 1997.

62. On 8 March 1998 Nomura Europe signed a Share Purchase Agreement with the NPF for the purchase of its approximately 36% holding of 20,620,083 IPB shares for about CZK 3 billion. The Agreement contemplated that Nomura Europe could transfer its shares to any special purpose company, trust, foundation, Anstalt or other entity, and provided also for a capital increase in IPB by a subscription of 60,000,000 further shares at CZK 100 per share, and for Nomura to reasonably endeavour to procure the underwriting of CZK 6,000,000 of subordinated debt. The total strengthening of IPB's balance sheet was thus some CZK 12 billion (about US$348 million). The Agreement also gave the NPF pre-emption rights for a period of 5 years over the shares sold to Nomura Europe. The issue of the 60,000,000 shares was approved the next day at an extraordinary general meeting of IPB. Nomura Europe subscribed to all of those shares, at CZK 100 per share.

63. Certain important personnel changes were also made at the same time: Mr Randall Dillard and Mr Eduard Onderka were appointed to the Supervisory Board of IPB, Mr Jiří Tesař resigned as Chairman of the Board of Directors and moved to the advisory level of the Supervisory Board, Mr Libor Procházka resigned as Chief Executive Officer and became Deputy Chief Executive responsible for investment banking, and Mr Jan Klacek was appointed Chairman and Chief Executive Officer. Later, on 12 June 1998, Mr Daniel Jackson was appointed to the Supervisory Board of IPB.

64. On 10 July 1998 Nomura provided IPB with access to a US$70 million revolving credit facility.

65. With its existing holding of about 10%, Nomura Europe now held, as a result of these transactions and the acquisition of the further 36%, some 46% of IPB's shares, thus giving Nomura Europe effective (although still minority) control over IPB.

66. The sale to Nomura Europe of the NPF's shareholding in IPB was the first situation in which the Czech Republic had fully disposed of its holding in a major bank. To some extent, therefore, it was a precedent for the projected privatisation of the whole banking sector.

G. Acquisition and Sale of Pilsner Urquell Brewery

67. In September 1997 IPB filed a merger notification with the OPC regarding Radegast and Pilsner Urquell breweries, but the merger was disapproved by the OPC on 10 December 1997 – a decision against which IPB appealed on 17 December 1997, and in which Nomura itself intervened on 19 January 1998 in support of IPB's appeal. That 10 December decision was cancelled on 5 June 1998. Further enquiries were ordered, but the merger was again disapproved on 12 August 1998, and again Nomura appealed but the merger notification was withdrawn on 22 November 1998, and the OPC closed the proceeding on 23 December 1998.

68. An internal "Transaction Structure" paper was prepared on 3 February 1998 by Nomura for its proposed purchase of IPB shares. In that paper IPB's shareholding in the company producing Pilsner Urquell beer was identified as IPB's most valuable strategic holding, and the paper indicated an intention, first, to buy 62.8 million shares in IPB for an amount which would be equal to the purchase price of the Pilsner Urquell shares, and, second, to sell those shares later to an international brewery company for a much greater price. On 3-4 February 1998, a Nomura International representative, Mr David Thirsk, met with a representative of IPB's senior managers to discuss Nomura's plans for IPB, which linked Nomura's purchase of IPB shares with Nomura's purchases of a shell company to hold IPB's Pilsner Urquell shares. On 5 February 1998 Nomura concluded a Cooperation Agreement with IPB's management. Under this agreement IPB would contribute its Pilsner Urquell shares, and Nomura would contribute its substantial (59.22%) interest in Radegast Brewery (which a Nomura affiliate had purchased from IPB on 19 September 1997) to a new entity. As already noted (above, paragraph 60), in its paper on a "Strategy of Nomura Europe plc for IPB" which Nomura Europe submitted to the Czech authorities in support of its application for CNB approval for its purchase of IPB shares, Nomura Europe did not disclose the Put Option which it had negotiated, nor its objectives in relation to the Pilsner Urquell shares. Similarly, in filing on 20 February 1998 for the OPC's approval of its acquisition of IPB shares, Nomura did not inform the OPC that Nomura indirectly controlled Radegast and that IPB indirectly controlled Pilsner Urquell. The OPC's approval was given on 13 May 1998. On 25 February 1998 Bankovní Holding a.s. ("Bankovní" – an affiliate of and controlled by IPB) purchased Bivalence, renamed the next day České pivo, a special purpose company whose only shareholder was Bankovní and whose only assets proved to be the Pilsner Urquell shares it purchased (with deferred payment) from IPB on 26 February 1998 and which it was to administer (Nomura appears never to have transferred its Radegast brewery shares to České pivo as originally planned). On 26 February 1998 České pivo signed an agreement with IPB to buy the bank's majority shareholding in Pilsner Urquell brewery.

69. On about 4 March 1998 Nomura set in motion a complex series of transactions which by June 1998 resulted in Pembridge Investments BV (“Pembridge”), a Nomura controlled entity, having the right to pay for the České pivo shares (i.e. holding Pilsner Urquell) with IPB shares. A further series of complex transactions between 31 May 1999 and 3 June 1999 involving three Cayman Islands companies – referred to as Torkmain, Levitan and Tritton – led to Nomura acquiring 84% of the shares of the Pilsner Urquell brewery with the right to pay for them by the delivery of IPB shares. These various transactions successfully operated the Put Option which Nomura had negotiated earlier (above, paragraph 59). In December 1999 Nomura International entered into an agreement which combined the Pilsner Urquell shares and Radegast shares, and then transferred all of those shares to a Dutch company, Pilsner Urquell Investments BV, and then sold that company to South African Breweries for a sum greatly in excess of the amount originally paid by Nomura for the Pilsner Urquell shares.

H. The Transfer of Nomura Europe’s IPB Shares to Saluka

70. Meanwhile, Saluka Investments BV (“Saluka”) had been established on 3 February 1998 as a special-purpose vehicle for the express purpose of holding the shares in IPB the purchase of which Nomura Europe was contemplating at the time. Saluka was incorporated in The Netherlands on 3 February 1988, and was owned by a Dutch charitable trust, Stichting Saluka Investments, and was managed by Nationwide Management Services BV

71. With its purchase of IPB shares completed, Nomura Europe, pursuant to the Share Purchase Agreement and with the approval of the CNB, transferred its IPB shares to Saluka in two tranches. In this way Saluka acquired ownership of 51,315,283 shares of Nomura Europe’s IPB shareholding on 2 October 1998, and Nomura Europe’s remaining 10,465,421 shares on 24 February 2000. Saluka bought these shares by issuing promissory notes to Nomura Europe, those notes being secured by a pledge over the shares; that pledge provided that Nomura Europe had the right to vote on the IPB shares. At the same time, Saluka entered into an agreement with Nomura International plc whereby the latter became Saluka’s sole sales agent for the IPB shares.

72. Saluka thus became the registered holder of the 61,780,704 shares in IPB which are the subject matter of this arbitration. Saluka subsequently agreed with Nomura Europe in June 2000 to sell the shares in return for the cancellation of the promissory notes which had been issued to pay for them. However, by the time of the hearings in this arbitration and still, so far as the Tribunal is aware, at the date of this Award, Saluka continues to hold the shares pending an instruction from Nomura Europe as to whom to transfer them: no such instruction has been given because of certain unresolved disputes. Consequently, at the time this arbitration was initiated, Saluka continued to be the registered holder of the IPB shares.

73. It is thus apparent that ownership of the controlling shares in IPB – and with it control over IPB’s other assets – vested in Saluka. In reality and in substance, however, it is equally apparent that Saluka’s rights of ownership seem to have been exercised in accordance with directions given by Nomura Europe or other elements of the Nomura Group. This duality of ownership and control is reflected in the parties’ pleadings, which in general do not distinguish carefully or consistently between Saluka and Nomura (whether Nomura Europe or other elements of the Nomura Group).

74. Upon acquiring effective control of IPB, Nomura set about various reorganizations of IPB's senior personnel, its banking strategy, its portfolio activities, its customer relations, its loan and loan recovery strategies, and its operational arrangements – all in the interests of strengthening IPB's market position in the Czech banking sector. These measures had considerable success, and IPB's position improved markedly.

I. The Government's Assistance to the Banking Sector (1998-2000)

75. While IPB is the Czech bank of principal importance for this arbitration, it was, as already noted, just one of the Big Four Czech banks, together with CSOB, CS and KB. In addition was the State-owned bad debt agency, KoB.

76. By mid-1998 the Czech banking sector was in serious difficulties, mainly as a combined result of the existence of a large bad debt problem, inadequate provision for creditors to enforce the rights to recover their loans, and the tough new regulatory steps taken by the CNB. One of the banks' particular problems was their ability or otherwise to maintain a capital adequacy ratio above the 8% minimum limit fixed by the CNB; if the ratio fell below that level, the CNB would have to take remedial measures, possibly involving revocation of a bank's banking licence.

77. The Czech Government embarked on a process of finally privatizing the Big Four banks which had previously only been partially privatised (above, paragraph 35). From early 1998 onwards the Government took a number of steps to assist one or other of the Big Four banks to overcome the difficulties with which they were faced. These varied forms of assistance mainly included, but were not necessarily limited to, those types mentioned hereunder.

78. As regards KB, the CNB at first saw no need for State participation in efforts to resolve KB's bad debt problem. However, in October 1998, the CNB itself proposed State participation in the light of recent developments in the financial markets. State participation in strengthening KB's capital participation was seen as necessary, especially given KB's dominant position in the Czech banking sector and the wider economic destabilisation to which serious weakening in its position could lead. The Czech Government decided by Resolution No. 820 of 28 July 1999 to arrange the purchase of major stocks of non-performing loans which were on KB's balance sheet. Accordingly, in August 1999, KoB purchased CZK 23.1 billion of KB's non-performing loans (at 60% of their face value) amounting to a capital injection into KB of CZK 9.5 billion. From December 1999-January 2000 the NPF subscribed to an increase of CZK 6.77 billion in the share capital of KB, thereby increasing the NPF's shareholding in KB from 48.74% to 60%. Despite these injections of State funds, KB reported a loss of CZK 9.2 billion for 1999. On 16 February 2000 the Government resolved to transfer a further CZK 60 billion of KB's non-performing loans, this time to a subsidiary of KoB but again at 60% of face value, amounting to a capital injection into KB of CZK 36 billion. By 2000 its share price had nearly trebled compared with its low point in 1999. The Government renewed its attempt fully to privatise KB by selling its now-majority stake in the bank. To facilitate a sale, KoB guaranteed a portfolio of KB's classified loans up to CZK 20 billion: this guarantee was signed on 29 December 2000, thereby avoiding the need for approval by the Czech Parliament under a new law which came into force on 1 January 2001. The net value of State assistance to KB in the period 1998-2000 thus amounted to some CZK 75 billion (with a further tax break to KB of CZK 4 billion which only recently came to light). On 28 June 2001 the Czech Republic sold its 60% share in KB to Société Générale S.A. for CZK 40 billion (or EUR 1.19 billion).

79. CS, too, had a major bad debt problem. Its significance as a major element in the Czech banking sector made its continued viability important to the Czech Government. Its ability on its own to maintain the required 8% capital ratio was in doubt, but its private investors were unwilling to participate in any capital injections. The Government stepped into the breach. On 27 May 1998 the Government resolved to transfer CZK 4.1 billion to CS to cover losses of CS related to its deposits in the failed “AB banka.” On 9 December 1998 the Government resolved that CZK 10.5 billion of CS’ classified loans should be transferred to KoB at a price of CZK 4 billion (although their security value was much less). In December 1998 CS and KoB concluded an agreement for a ten-year loan for subordinated debt amounting to CZK 5.5 billion, which was fully funded by KoB on 23 December 1998. On 10 March 1999 the Government resolved to double CS’ share capital from CZK 7.6 billion to CZK 15.2 billion. On 8 November 1999 the Government approved the purchase of CZK 33 billion of CS’ non-performing loans by KoB at 60% of their face value, up to a maximum of CZK 20 billion. Meanwhile, in October 1999, the Government had embarked on the privatisation of CS by way of a sale of the NPF’s substantial stake in CS to Erste Bank of Austria, to whom the Government gave an exclusive negotiating position. To facilitate the conclusion of this sale the Government gave on 2 February 2000 a State guarantee until 2005 against losses from non-performing loans which were on the balance sheet of CS at the end of 1999 (the guarantee covered a portfolio of loans with a book value of CZK 88 million) and sold its (the NPF’s) shares in CS to Erste Bank for CZK 19 billion.

80. In relation to CSOB, the situation was for various largely historical reasons somewhat different from that at the other Big Four banks; in particular it did not suffer in quite the same way from the bad debt problem which afflicted the other banks. CSOB’s ability to ride out the economic crisis which affected the other banks was in considerable part due to various Government guarantees which had earlier been given to CSOB in relation to Česká inkasní, s.r.o. (“CI”), and then, on 14 April 1998, in relation to Slovenská Inkasna, spol. s.r.o. (“SI”), for which the Government indemnified CSOB from any liability resulting from Slovakia’s refusal to continue to fund that company. On 24 February 1999 the Government resolved to compensate CSOB for loans to industrial borrowers worth CZK 2.3 billion. On 31 May 1999 the Government resolved to assume CSOB’s liability on a loan made to failed Banka Bohemia in 1994. CSOB was privatised by virtue of the Government’s approval on 31 May 1999 of the sale, for CZK 40 billion, of the State’s 65.69% shareholding in CSOB (held through the NPF, the CNB, and the Ministry of Finance) to KBC Bank of Belgium NV (“KBC”) (which would eventually come to acquire 80% of CSOB).

81. In addition to these various forms of State assistance to CSOB, the relationship between CSOB and IPB gave rise to a special series of events involving further assistance to CSOB. In circumstances which will become apparent below (paragraph 143 and following), and which lie at the heart of the Claimant’s claims in this arbitration, IPB was sold to CSOB in June 2000. That transaction was complex, but a major element of it was the need for CSOB to be “held harmless” for any negative value associated with its purchase of IPB. The Tribunal sees no need for present purposes to set out the relevant provisions in all their complexity, since the main elements are clear and uncontested. These are that (1) CSOB had to pay a symbolic CZK 1 for its purchase of IPB; (2) CSOB benefited from arrangements which enabled it to avoid any downside risks arising from its purchase of any particular assets of IPB; and (3) a substantial element of State aid was involved in the transaction, estimated at CZK 160-200 billion by the Ministry of Finance in June 2000 and audited by KPMG on 1 June 2001 at 159.9 billion. The acquisition of IPB made CSOB the leading bank in the Czech Republic.

82. Various measures of State assistance to KB, CS and CSOB have been described in the preceding paragraphs. With respect to IPB, assistance given to it by the State appears to have involved certain loss-producing loans worth CZK 16.1 billion being transferred to KoB in early 1998 (before Nomura Europe's purchase of IPB shares in March 1998), and the extension of IPB's past post office franchise when Nomura Europe bought the IPB shares, thereby giving it exclusive access to over 1,000 sales counters across the country. However, when the Government's Revitalization Programme (above, paragraph 40) for industrial enterprises finally received formal approval by the Government on 14 April 1999, its terms excluded IPB from the Programme, and IPB was excluded as a beneficiary.

83. The Big Four banks were of comparable strategic importance for the Czech economy as a whole; they also shared exposure to the bad debt problem, and to the inadequacies of the legal regime relating to creditors' rights. Collectively, these problems threatened the collapse of the Big Four banks, but they were too big to be allowed to fail: State assistance to avert collapse was necessary. The State assistance provided to KB, CS and CSOB amounted to 19% of the Czech Republic's GDP for 1999. It appears from various statements made by the banks and by the Government and the NPF in April-May 1998 that State assistance was given to KB, CS and CSOB on the basis that they were banks in which the State had a major shareholding interest, while IPB was not given such assistance as (after Nomura's investment in March 1998) it was regarded as a private institution whose fate was a matter for its private shareholders.

J. Developments in Respect of IPB (August 1999-end May 2000)

84. Following growing concerns at the CNB during 1998 with regard to IPB's banking practices, and CNB information-finding visits to IPB from mid-April 1999 to end-June 1999, the CNB began a regulatory inspection of IPB on 30 August 1999 which lasted until 5 November 1999. Serious financial deficiencies and irregularities were apparent.

85. In October 1999 Nomura began the search for a strategic partner for IPB. The involvement of the Czech Government was needed in this connection, in order to ensure the necessary level of State support for IPB's financial position (without which private sector investors would not find IPB an attractive proposition). In any event, the Czech Government would need to be involved since the approval of the Czech regulatory authorities would be required for any strategic partnership, and in the event of a merger with any other of the Big Four banks, the Government, as (directly or indirectly) a shareholder in those banks, would also have to give its consent.

86. During the autumn of 1999 it was clear that IPB needed an increase of capital to provide for its bad loans. In October, the CNB requested a significant increase in IPB's equity capital.

87. On 16 November 1999 IPB's General Assembly resolved to increase IPB's share capital, but this resolution was subsequently blocked by a minority shareholder on technical grounds. Another General Meeting was called for 19 February 2000 to seek approval for a capital increase of CZK 2.6 billion, to CZK 13.3 billion.

88. As a result of the CNB's August-November 1999 inspection of IPB, the CNB concluded both that IPB was not performing prudently, and that IPB needed to create at least CZK 40 billion of provisions – an amount the size of which made it clear that a major crisis was possible.

89. Discussions subsequently took place between representatives of the CNB and Ministry of Finance and representatives of IPB and Nomura to seek to identify possible solutions.

90. Meanwhile, IPB's management focussed on securing State aid, while Nomura concentrated on seeking a foreign strategic partner for IPB. A number of institutions showed interest, including in particular Allianz AG ("Allianz") and Hypo-und Vereinsbank AG ("Hypo-Vereinsbank"), with which Nomura signed a confidentiality agreement on 24 November 1999. However, on 26 January 2000 Hypo-Vereinsbank pulled out of the consortium with Allianz, and was later replaced by the UniCredito Italiano Group ("UniCredito").

91. In December 1999 Nomura (with reservations on the part of IPB's management) proposed a merger with CS. Nomura was able to make progress with an offer from Allianz for both IPB and CS, and the parties agreed on a framework for the transaction by 21 January 2000. These arrangements, however, came to nothing: the State had already issued a public tender for its interest in CS, the deadline for bids had passed, the proposal to merge IPB with CS was not specific enough in any event to comply with the rules of the tender, and the State was in the final stages of negotiations with Erste Bank of Austria (to which CS was eventually sold) (above, paragraph 79).

92. IPB's bid for CS attracted some media publicity and in January 2000 this led in turn to media criticism of the CNB, its Governor (Mr Josef Tošovský), and the Minister of Finance (Mr Pavel Mertlík). Mr Tošovský and Mr Mertlík blamed IPB's management for instigating these criticisms, which IPB's management strongly denied. On 4 January 2000 Mr Tošovský informed Mr Mertlík of the gravity of the situation at IPB.

93. On 10 January 2000 Mr Pavel Kavánek of CSOB met Mr Mertlík and expressed CSOB's interest in an acquisition to expand its share of the retail banking market, with IPB amongst possible targets.

94. On 20 January 2000 media reports of a statement by a CNB official, Mr Pavel Racoča, relating to the CNB's investigation of IPB, raised speculation as to the possibility of IPB being subjected to forced administration. Ten days later, on 30 January 2000, the CNB issued a press release stating that the inspection was a routine regulatory matter and had not yet been completed, and that suggestions that IPB's forced administration was under discussion were unfounded.

95. During February and March 2000 IPB and Nomura developed a proposal for a merger between IPB and KB, and later made presentations regarding it to the Government and the CNB, but this proposal came to nothing and was rejected.

96. In mid-February 2000 representatives of Nomura had several meetings with officials from the CNB. During these meetings, the CNB is said to have requested the resignation of two people from their senior positions on IPB's Supervisory and Management Boards – respectively, Mr Jiří Tesař (Chairman of the Supervisory Board) and Mr Libor Procházka (Deputy CEO of the Management Board) (they both resigned on 25 April 2000) – and also asked Nomura to provide the additional capital which IPB needed (i.e. for Nomura to take on the role of a strategic investor at IPB), failing which the CNB would seek to denigrate Nomura internationally. For his part, Mr Randall Dillard (Nomura's representative on IPB's Supervisory Board, and Vice-Chairman of that Board) and his colleagues claimed that, in the Share Purchase Agreement, the Czech Republic had agreed not to sell the State's interest in the other major banks on more favourable terms than its sale of IPB shares (a claim denied by the Respondent) (above, paragraph 56), and consequently that Nomura would not act to rescue IPB (i.e. provide the necessary additional capital) without State assistance (a position repeated in April 2000) – assistance which the Czech Republic was in the circumstances unwilling to provide.

97. Also during February 2000 Mr Daniel Jackson (Deputy Managing Director, Nomura, and member of the IPB Supervisory Board) began negotiations with Mr Luděk Niedermayer (Vicegovernor of the CNB) for a Memorandum of Understanding intended to establish a framework for their future. Although by the first week in March agreement had seemed close, ultimately the initiative came to nothing.

98. On 19 February 2000 IPB's General Assembly approved a capital increase of CZK 2.6 billion to CZK 13.3 billion.

99. On 25 February 2000 the CNB delivered its formal report regarding its previous year's inspection of IPB and, in March and April 2000, IPB, in accordance with the law, submitted written objections to specific parts of the report. Subsequent legal procedures could not be concluded because IPB's financial condition deteriorated too quickly.

100. In late February 2000 there was renewed and sustained media speculation about the CNB's review of IPB. The earlier rumours of IPB's possible forced administration (above, paragraph 94) persisted. In the week of 28 February 2000 IPB suffered a run on the bank (which was to prove to be the first of two major runs on IPB), and customers withdrew CZK 30 billion in deposits. Banks cut their credit lines to IPB, and froze or restricted their dealings with it. Meetings with high-level official Czech personnel during the week of the bank run led to a statement by IPB denying rumours of forced administration and emphasizing the strength of the bank, and the Minister of Finance, Mr Pavel Mertlík, and a senior official of the CNB, Mr Pavel Racoča, also made public statements seeking to calm depositors. The bank run stopped.

101. It seems that, at about this time, the course of the discussions between Czech officials and Nomura led to the Ministry of Finance and the CNB asserting their loss of trust in Nomura. The Minister of Finance refused to meet Nomura representatives. In mid-March 2000 the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the CNB appointed deputies (respectively, Mr Jan Mládek and Mr Luděk Niedermayer) to deal with Saluka/IPB. Thereafter, it appears that Czech officials had only a “soft mandate” in dealing with Saluka/IPB, and Mr Randall Dillard (then Head of the Merchant Banking Group at Nomura International, and who would later become Chairman of IPB’s Supervisory Board upon the resignation of Mr Jiří Tesař) could only have unofficial meetings off Ministry premises with the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek.

102. On 6 March 2000 the CNB obtained an expert study which showed that the macroeconomic costs which would be associated with IPB’s collapse (if it were to occur) would directly lead to a fall of about 4% in nominal GDP, and would probably cause a systemic crisis in the Czech financial sector.

103. On 14 March 2000 Mr Miloš Zeman, the Prime Minister of the Czech Republic, told Mr Dillard that discussions on the provision of State aid to IPB and on a merger between IPB and KB were conditional on Nomura injecting new capital into IPB.

104. Also in March 2000 CSOB approached Nomura for discussions with respect to IPB.

105. On 22 March 2000 Ernst & Young (IPB’s auditors) informed the CNB of the possibility that IPB might not comply with the required capital adequacy requirements, as a result of which the CNB formally asked IPB to prepare alternative methods for strengthening its capital should the minority shareholders block an increase in equity capital.

106. On 25 April 2000 the personnel changes at IPB requested by the CNB in February 2000 were made (above, paragraph 96). Mr Jiří Tesař resigned as Chairman of the IPB Supervisory Board and became instead Vice-Chairman, and Mr Libor Procházka resigned from his position as Deputy CEO of the IPB Board of Directors. Mr Randall Dillard took over as Chairman of the Supervisory Board.

107. In mid-April 2000 IPB submitted to the CNB some draft proposals to stabilise IPB, and submitted a further draft to the Government in May 2000, but the proposals were not acceptable as they did not give the State sufficient control over the restructuring process.

108. Nomura continued its attempts to find a strategic partner for IPB. Progress was made with the Allianz/UniCredito consortium. On 4 April 2000 a term sheet was signed providing for a capital increase for IPB and UniCredito’s entry as a strategic partner for the bank. By the middle of May active steps were being taken to follow through with this arrangement and on 22 May 2000 UniCredito began its due diligence enquiries on IPB. On 26 May 2000 UniCredito was in a position to propose the purchase of IPB at an opening bid of CZK 25-30 billion (twice its book value, subject to agreement on that book value) with a possibility of paying more.

109. At the same time as these discussions were taking place, Nomura’s representatives had since March 2000 also been meeting with representatives of CSOB to discuss CSOB’s potential entry into IPB as a Czech domestic partner. These discussions did not proceed smoothly, with CSOB, for example, refusing to sign a confidentiality agreement as a condition for access to IPB’s commercially-sensitive information, and insisting on taking over IPB first and only thereafter negotiating the acquisition. CSOB's attitude by 5 May 2000 was that if IPB wanted Government support, then IPB needed CSOB.

110. The Government had also in April 2000 begun discussions with the potential investors in IPB which had been identified by Nomura, namely Allianz/UniCredito and CSOB. Both wanted to purchase IPB's assets rather than its shares, and both were unwilling to take over IPB without a guarantee and promise of indemnity from the State. Allianz/UniCredito moreover wanted several months to conduct due diligence, so only CSOB was able to take over IPB and continue its banking operations immediately.

111. Discussions between the Government and CSOB led to the preparation of a written presentation of CSOB's plans for IPB, dated 26 April 2000.

112. In May 2000 IPB, at the CNB's request, submitted a revised draft document to the CNB entitled "Measures for the stabilisation of IPB, a.s." This document became available to the press, leading ultimately to a second bank run in June 2000 (below, paragraph 126 and following).

113. On 2 May 2000 the Governor of the CNB, Mr Josef Tošovský, wrote to the Minister of Finance, Mr Pavel Mertlík, indicating the seriousness of IPB's capital position, its need for new capital, the impossibility of finding a strategic investor without State support, IPB's inability (as set out in the "Measures for the stabilisation of IPB, a.s.") to address the problem of capital adequacy without State assistance, and the imminence of the bank's collapse. The Governor saw the options as either stabilising the bank with a private investor and with State support, or nationalising the bank, or imposing forced administration, or revoking the bank's licence.

114. On 5 May 2000 (with follow-up letters on 8 and 9 May), and at the request of the CNB, Nomura wrote to the Ministry of Finance requesting discussions on the entry of a strategic partner into IPB, and stated its willingness to arrange for up to CZK 13.2 billion of new capital on reasonable commercial terms. No reply to these letters was received.

115. On 18 May 2000 Mr Jan Mládek, the Deputy Finance Minister, informed Mr Randall Dillard that the Ministry of Finance wanted to nationalise IPB, and proposed to buy Nomura's shares (i.e. by this time, Saluka's shares) at a symbolic price of 1 euro: to this end Mr Mládek wanted Nomura to obtain an additional 5% in IPB.

116. On 24 May 2000 Nomura informed the CNB that, because of the timing of IPB's auditor's statement and the IPB's General Assembly in late June 2000, the deadline for finding a solution was mid-June. Mr Pavel Racoča, for the CNB, explained that if neither IPB nor IPB's shareholders resolved IPB's problems, the CNB would have to impose forced administration on IPB. On 26 May 2000 Ernst & Young, IPB's auditors, informed the CNB that IPB needed provisions of CZK 21 billion.

117. Also on 24 May 2000 Mr Dillard submitted to the Prime Minister a further proposal entitled "Securing future for IPB", involving Nomura assuring a CZK 20 billion capital increase, a sale of 51% of IPB shares to Allianz/UniCredito and CSOB/KBC, and a KoB guarantee of IPB's balance sheet; on 25 May 2000 he gave the same presentation to the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek. On 29 May 2000 Mr Mládek replied, rejecting that proposal (because it involved direct aid to IPB without the State having any control over the use of the funds), and reiterating the Government's offer to buy Nomura/Saluka's shares in IPB for a symbolic price of 1 euro. Nomura responded by asking how its proposal might be made acceptable. By 31 May the Ministry of Finance had refused to meet officially with Nomura or to consider any solution relating to IPB.

118. While those various developments were taking place, and despite the Government's appearance of co-operation with Nomura and IPB, the discussions between the Government and CSOB which began earlier in the year (above, paragraphs 109-111) to explore the possibility of CSOB gaining control of IPB should IPB run into serious difficulties, continued. These discussions were to lead to important developments at a meeting at which Mr Mertlík (Minister of Finance) and Mr Tošovský (Governor of the CNB) agreed to meet Mr Pavel Kavánek (CEO and Chairman of the Board of CSOB, aided by Mr Zdeněk Bakala, a well-known political lobbyist) and Mr Remi Vermeiren (President/CEO of KBC, a Belgian bank which was CSOB's largest shareholder): this meeting was to be held on 30 May 2000 in Paris where those concerned would be attending a banking conference.

K. Developments in Respect of IPB (end May 2000-7 June 2000)

119. In anticipation of that Paris meeting on 26 May 2000 Mr Kavánek wrote to Mr Tošovský and Mr Mertlík with certain proposals regarding the future of IPB, describing CSOB's proposed takeover of IPB and CSOB's readiness to act immediately. He enclosed two documents which emphasised the potential advantages of a merger between IPB and CSOB, and setting out CSOB's plan for the integration of IPB and CSOB. Further documents were to be delivered personally on the evening of 29 May 2000. These various documents have been together referred to by the Claimant as "the Paris Plan". It envisaged two possible alternatives for CSOB's takeover of IPB – a negotiated solution, or forced administration. The forced administration solution was presented as having fewer risks (although it appears that later the CNB would have preferred the more co-operative, negotiated solution, while also preparing for forced administration in case of an emergency). A detailed proposal for the carrying out of the forced administration solution was set out in the documents provided by Mr Kavánek, involving only a limited role for the Forced Administrator over the business activities of IPB and a transfer of IPB's day-to-day business to CSOB as quickly as possible.

120. On 30 May 2000 that meeting took place in Paris, to discuss CSOB's entry into IPB, or at least to allow the Government representatives the opportunity to listen to CSOB's proposals as part of their efforts to explore possible solutions to the IPB crisis. Mr Mertlík denied at the time that he participated in the meeting, and denied it also to the Czech Parliamentary Commission which subsequently investigated these matters. He also denied that KBC's entry into IPB was on the agenda of the Paris talks, and stated that, at the meeting, issues related to CSOB were primarily discussed.

121. On 1 June 2000 Ernst & Young, IPB's auditor, informed Mr Dillard that IPB was not a going concern because it was not meeting the CNB's capital adequacy requirements, and this triggered the CNB's obligation to revoke IPB's banking licence. On the same day the Government informed Nomura that State assistance would only be forthcoming if Nomura acquired a 51% stake in IPB (i.e. if it acquired a further 5%, since, as already explained, Nomura, through Saluka, already owned 46% of IPB's shares).

122. On 2 June 2000 the Government again repeated its 1 euro proposal. Nomura investigated ways of accommodating that proposal and, on 4 or 5 June 2000, presented three alternative proposals for the sale of IPB to the Government. None of these proposals was acceptable to the Government.

123. By about 6 June 2000 Nomura was focussing on asset sale as a solution.

124. On 7 June IPB's auditor informed the CNB that IPB needed to create provisions of at least CZK 20 or 21 billion, and possibly as much as CZK 40 billion. This meant that IPB could not meet capital adequacy requirements without external support. On 7 June 2000 Mr Mládek told Mr Dillard that IPB would be "toast" if it did not accept the 1 euro offer.

125. At about this time, Mr Mertlík met representatives of Allianz and UniCredito, who made proposals which, in their basic principles, were similar to that made by CSOB. Both banks wished to purchase IPB's assets, and both required a guarantee.

L. The Second Bank Run on IPB and its Aftermath

126. Statements apparently made by CNB officials and reported in the media on 8 June 2000, and a statement on 9 June 2000 by Mr Ladislav Zelinka, Deputy Finance Minister, raised speculation that IPB might be put into forced administration, and media speculation increased the following day (10 June 2000 – a Saturday). On Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, 12-14 June 2000, there were mass withdrawals from IPB, amounting to CZK 17 billion. Reassuring statements by Government officials that were reported on 15 June had little or no effect.

127. The Parliamentary Commission which later enquired into these matters (below, paragraphs 144-147) found that by Monday, 12 June, documents before the CNB already set out a detailed time schedule of the steps to be taken to sell the enterprise, and that the Friday to Sunday period was essential to avoid the risk of legal actions being filed against the Forced Administrator. The Commission also noted that the CNB had already indicated the need to identify an individual to accept the appointment as Forced Administrator, and to ensure that he was familiar with the proposed measures and the proposed timetable as well as his contemplated role.

128. On 14 June 2000 Mr Kavánek (CSOB) wrote to Mr Niedermayer (CNB) with a detailed proposal for accepting the operations of IPB, which he had been asked to submit at a meeting held the previous day. A written proposal was also received on the same day from Allianz/UniCredito.

129. During the run on IPB, Nomura (on behalf of Saluka) had been involved in intensive negotiations regarding the stabilisation of IPB with strategic investors, officials at the CNB and Ministry of Finance, and the Prime Minister. On 14 June 2000 IPB submitted a proposal to the Ministry of Finance, the CNB and the Prime Minister. The proposal involved a transfer of IPB's banking business to KoB for CZK 1 for on-sale to a long-term commercial banking partner acceptable to the Government (with arrangements for the distribution of such sale proceeds), accompanied by an expressed readiness on IPB's part to execute the proposal on or before Friday, 16 June 2000.

130. Representatives of the CNB and Ministry of Finance met on 15 June 2000 to discuss the 14 June proposal. Discussions lasted into the evening and, after the meeting closed, there was an e-mail exchange. The final e-mail (to IPB's lawyer, Mr Tomáš Brzobohatý) concluded by saying that the Ministry of Finance team was "now leaving for home and will continue tomorrow in the morning". With that e-mail, Nomura's representatives were under the impression (which proved to be mistaken) that the detailed heads of terms to implement their proposal had been substantially agreed and that negotiations would continue the following day. IPB notified both the Ministry of Finance and the CNB that its Supervisory Board had approved, and had recommended the Management Board to approve, this transaction. However, the proposal was seen by the Czech authorities to involve serious economic, legal and organizational risks for the Czech Republic.

131. After the bank run had started the Government and CNB held meetings with Allianz/UniCredito and CSOB on proposals for the takeover of IPB. Allianz/UniCredito's proposal was such that it was not in a position to take over IPB's enterprise quickly.

132. On Wednesday, 14 June 2000, the CNB prepared a report for the Government on IPB's situation and possible solutions, which included forced administration and, in that eventuality, the need for any subsequent sale to a strategic investor to be accompanied by a State guarantee, since otherwise no investor would be interested.

133. Also on that day, IPB wrote to the CNB (the letter being received on 15 June) stating that IPB's liquidity had seriously deteriorated and that its solvency was threatened. On Thursday, 15 June, withdrawals from IPB continued. Representatives of the Government and CNB met those from IPB and Nomura, who were told that, if IPB did not immediately get CZK 10 billion from the State, it would revoke IPB's banking licence. That afternoon Mr Petr Staněk – the prospective Forced Administrator (i.e. a sort of trustee in bankruptcy) – was approached by the CNB.

134. On the night of Thursday, 15 June 2000, the Government met to consider the IPB situation. The Governor of the CNB and the Minister of Finance explained the gravity of the situation, with Nomura unwilling to invest the necessary capital and unable to identify a strategic partner and with IPB's failure to comply with capital adequacy requirements leading to the withdrawal of its banking licence with consequential threat to the stability of the banking sector. They presented as solutions either a cooperative solution involving IPB's shareholders, or forced administration coupled with a quick sale accompanied by State guarantees. The Government decided not to adopt the IPB proposal but instead to impose forced administration coupled with a quick sale to a strategic investor, with CSOB as the only bank which could quickly take over IPB. Resolution No. 622 of 15 June 2000 approved the forced administration of IPB with the objective of a subsequent sale to CSOB as the strategic investor, the provision of a government guarantee for the assets of IPB in favour of CSOB, and the issue of guarantees by the CNB to CSOB.

135. Also on 15 June, the Czech Securities Commission ("CSC") applied a preliminary injunction which imposed an immediate suspension of trading in IPB shares.

M. The Forced Administration of IPB and its Aftermath

136. On Friday, 16 June 2000, the CNB put IPB into forced administration. Although IPB considered that it had sufficient liquidity to survive a bank run, the CNB's stated reasons for imposing forced administration were that there was a considerable risk of the bank not being able to make payments (i.e. to survive a bank run) and that the CNB had to avoid a situation where panic among the bank's depositors permanently destabilised its operations. Moreover, the CNB explained that IPB's financial situation threatened the stability of the Czech banking system, and that the CNB was entitled to impose forced administration to remedy the bank's shortcomings which the bank's shareholders had failed to take the necessary measures to correct.

137. Late on the morning of Friday, 16 June 2000, the CNB informed IPB of its decision to introduce forced administration upon IPB and appointed Mr Petr Staněk as the Forced Administrator of IPB. The Forced Administrator thereupon assumed the powers of IPB's Board of Directors (i.e. took over the management of IPB), and all the powers of all corporate governing bodies of IPB were immediately suspended. The Forced Administrator was to do what was necessary to secure its unproblematic operations and to achieve an accelerated sale of IPB to CSOB, being its strategic partner. His monthly remuneration was also specified, with mention of a special bonus ("extraordinary reward") for the implementation of the sale to CSOB (the figures for the remuneration and the bonus were, however, removed by the Respondent from the copy of the document submitted in evidence). The CNB issued an irrevocable guarantee for all IPB creditors on that day, to prevent any panic.

138. Also on Friday, 16 June, IPB requested a short-term loan of CZK 10 billion from the CNB to maintain its liquidity – a request which was received after the appointment of the Forced Administrator. On that same day, CSOB also informed the Forced Administrator of its interest in purchasing IPB's enterprise.

139. Armed police entered IPB's headquarters and effected the physical removal from the premises of all bank managers.

140. On Saturday, 17 June 2000, and Sunday, 18 June 2000, the Forced Administrator discussed IPB's financial situation with Ernst & Young, IPB's auditor, who, on 18 June, told the CNB that IPB's capital adequacy ratio was in fact negative. The Forced Administrator informed the CNB of this (as required by the Czech Banking Act), whereupon the CNB (also as required by that Act) began the process of revoking IPB's banking licence.

141. In response to an expression of interest by CSOB in purchasing IPB's enterprise, the Forced Administrator engaged in extensive discussions with CSOB and its majority shareholder, KBC (a Belgian bank), on 17-18 June 2000; CSOB and KBC also had discussions with the CNB and the Ministry of Finance. The Forced Administrator, who had only limited options, decided to pursue the sale of IPB's enterprise to CSOB, for which on 18 June 2000 he sought the CNB's approval, which was granted. CSOB, however, had insisted on receiving a State guarantee from the Ministry of Finance, and a promise of indemnity from the CNB.

142. As the State guarantee and the CNB's promise of indemnity to CSOB involved State aid, the approval of the OPC was required. The OPC was accordingly involved in the final stages of the transaction, and reached a preliminary conclusion that State aid under the Sale Agreement and State Guarantee should be exempted from the general prohibition against State aid, characterised as restructuring aid and aid to remedy a serious disturbance in the Czech economy. On around 14 June Mr Kamil Rudolecký (Director of State Aid Department of the OPC) was first officially informed by his superior, Dr Jiří Buchta, of the plans to offer financial assistance to IPB, and, on Sunday, 18 June, he and Dr Buchta met with representatives of CSOB, including Mr Kavánek, to discuss the aid package about to be given to IPB. Subsequently, on the evening of Sunday, 18 June 2000, the OPC informed the Ministry of Finance of its approval of the aid packages under certain conditions, and delivered its formal decision to that effect on Monday, 19 June 2000. This decision (which was in some respects in terms identical with elements in the Paris Plan) had the appearance of retrospectively granting an exemption for the aid given to CSOB in the sale agreed over the weekend.

143. IPB was transferred to CSOB on Monday, 19 June 2000, and the Ministry of Finance signed the State guarantee to CSOB while the CNB signed its promise of indemnity to CSOB.

144. On 3 July 2000 the Ministry of Finance and the CNB prepared a report which was submitted to the Czech Parliament (Chamber of Deputies) to inform the public about the circumstances leading to the forced administration of IPB and its sale to CSOB. The next day the Chamber, at the instigation of the opposition parties, set up an Investigation Commission to clarify the State's decisions. The opposition parties had eight of the ten seats on the Commission. Its findings were summarised in a report submitted to the Chamber of Deputies on 11 August 2001.

145. The circumstances in which the sale of IPB to CSOB was effected were such as to raise questions as to its lawfulness under Czech law. The Parliamentary Investigation Commission appointed a legal expert to consider the matter who, in his report of 10 May 2001, concluded that the CNB was not entitled to put IPB into forced administration, that the Forced Administrator had not (particularly at the speed with which he disposed of IPB) fulfilled his responsibilities correctly, that the CNB's irrevocable guarantee for all IPB creditors of 16 June 2000 was null and void, and that CSOB had provided no consideration for IPB's banking business and accompanying State aid. The Commission itself found that by instructing the Forced Administrator to sell IPB's business to CSOB as quickly as possible the CNB had exceeded its legal powers, and that the way in which the strategic partner had been selected between 16 and 19 June was "unprecedented and non-transparent". The Commission also found that the CSOB Transaction Document signed on 19 June 2000 gave IPB to CSOB "effectively as a gift", that CSOB "obtained an undeserved benefit of many tens of billions of Czech crowns to the detriment of the state budget", and that the Minister of Finance, had he acted as he should have done, would have ensured that CSOB paid an appropriate price.

146. The Commission further found that the CNB had issued instructions to the Forced Administrator and in so doing had acted unlawfully, and that his testimony, in denying that he was acting under the instructions of the CNB, was false. In mid-September 2000 the Chairman of the Parliamentary Commission filed a criminal complaint against Mr Mertlík and the Forced Administrator in respect of false testimony. The Commission concluded that the Forced Administrator “did not administer the bank. He only fulfilled his task to take over and sell the bank without having an idea of what he was actually selling”. In several respects it appears that the Forced Administrator, in selling IPB to CSOB as quickly as possible, may have acted inconsistently with his statutory and fiduciary duties under Czech law. The Commission did not, however, conclude that the Ministry of Finance or the CNB had done anything illegal. Its findings, in the view of the Respondent, were largely speculative and a politically motivated attempt to discredit the Government.

147. Apart from raising questions as to the lawfulness of the transaction under Czech law relating to aspects of the forced administration, the circumstances also raised similar questions as regards the granting of State aid in connection with the transaction. Under Czech law the Public Assistance Act generally prohibited the grant of State aid unless the aid had been notified to the OPC and granted a formal exemption by it: that Act came into force on 1 January 2000, and brought Czech domestic law on State aid into line with the Czech Republic’s international obligations under the Agreement of 4 October 1993 establishing an Association between the European Communities and their Member States, of the one part, and the Czech Republic, of the other (“the Europe Agreement”).<sup>2</sup> The various guarantees and indemnities which formed part of the transaction whereby CSOB acquired IPB could be regarded as State aid, under both the relevant Articles of the Treaty Establishing the European Community (“EC”) (“EC Treaty”)<sup>3</sup> and the parallel provisions of the Public Assistance Act.

148. In various respects, it was questionable whether the legal requirements for the granting of State aid were complied with in respect of, in particular, the guarantee announced on 19 June 2000, the Ministry of Finance’s non-compliance by the stipulated deadline with certain conditions imposed by the OPC in relation to the exemption granted for that guarantee, the indemnity given by the CNB to CSOB, the agreement of 19 June 2000 between the Ministry of Finance and CSOB whereby the Ministry undertook to compensate CSOB for all of the purchase price which CSOB would become obligated to pay to IPB for the IPB enterprise, and the conclusion, without the OPC’s approval, of a restructuring agreement of 31 August 2001 granting to CSOB an asset management contract over IPB’s former assets.

149. Nevertheless, the sale of IPB to CSOB went ahead on the basis of the Forced Administrator’s actions.

150. On 21 June 2000 the Government approved the provision of a State guarantee to CSOB for the assets of IPB provided that that guarantee would be replaced by a restructuring agreement whereby KoB would assume the security for IPB’s assets, and also approved the Ministry of Finance’s guarantee to the CNB to cover losses ensuing from the CNB’s promise to indemnify CSOB.

151. On 23 June 2000 Ernst & Young, IPB’s auditor, reported to the CNB that it had been unable to complete IPB’s audit for 1999 because IPB had failed to provide the auditor with necessary information.

152. On 30 June 2000 Saluka transferred 61,780,694 IPB shares back to Nomura. On 7 July 2000 Saluka submitted a Transfer Notice to the NPF, but on 21 July 2000 the NPF informed Saluka that it did not consider the document served to have been a proper Transfer Notice.

153. On 24 August 2000 the OPC approved the exemption of the State aid arising from the indemnity given to CSOB by the CNB.

154. On 6 September 2000 the CSC made a decision on the merits of the suspension of trading in IPB shares which hitherto had been based only on a preliminary injunction (above, paragraph 135). This decision became binding on 25 September 2000 and extended the suspension in trading which had previously been based on the preliminary injunction. The reasons given by the CSC for the actions it took were in the Claimant's view of questionable accuracy but, in the Respondent's view, were in no way improper. So far as the Tribunal is aware, the suspension of trading in IPB's shares still continues, as a result of further successive "temporary" injunctions issued by the CSC. Saluka's appeal to the Presidium of the CSC against the CSC's decision of 6 September 2000 and its imposition of a "new" temporary suspension on 11 October 2000 were rejected by two decisions of 18 January 2001.

155. On 16 January 2001 the CSC, acting under a new amendment to the Czech Securities Act, issued a Notice of Loss of Position as a Participant against Saluka, having the effect that Saluka was no longer considered a party to the "new" suspension proceedings commenced on 11 October 2000, or any other suspension proceedings commenced after 1 January 2001. Shareholders were thereby excluded from challenging suspensions of trading in shares owned by them.

156. On 26 October 2000 a Police Order was issued, at the request of CSOB, which required the CSC permanently to suspend Saluka's right to dispose of its shares in IPB. Saluka appealed against this Police Order to the State Prosecutor and this challenge was upheld on 5 February 2001. However, the Czech police issued a new suspension Order over IPB's shares, which the Securities Centre registered on 31 January 2001. Following a request from Saluka on 1 November 2001 (i.e. after the present arbitration had been initiated) for the removal of the suspension Order, and the police's refusal to do so, the Public Prosecutor's Office in Prague ruled on 23 April 2002 that there was no legal basis for the suspension Order against the shares, but ordered that Saluka's IPB shares be held in the custody of the District Court of Prague. On appeal to the Supreme Public Prosecutor's Office on 16 May 2002 the Public Prosecutor's custodial order over Saluka's shares was quashed. The Supreme Public Prosecutor's Office, however, also held – on a point which was not part of Saluka's appeal, and on which Saluka had not been heard – that it was still justifiable to secure Saluka's shares in IPB by suspending trading in them. Since the Supreme Public Prosecutor's Office was the final appellate instance, Saluka lodged a petition with the Czech Constitutional Court on 18 July 2002 seeking an appropriate remedy.

157. On 30 January 2001, the Czech police carried out a search of Nomura's Prague Representative Office and seized documents belonging to Nomura. This police search was subsequently held by the Constitutional Court on 10 October 2001 (i.e. after the present arbitration had been initiated) to have violated Nomura's fundamental rights, and the Court ordered the return of the documents seized during the search.

158. On 19 March 2001, the OPC reopened the proceedings which led to its decision of 19 June 2000 (above, paragraph 142) approving the Agreement for the sale of IPB to CSOB and the associated State Guarantee Agreement. On 23 August 2001, i.e. after the present arbitration had been initiated, the OPC disapproved the payment to CSOB for the costs of the forced administration, but, in a further decision of 15 December 2003, the OPC approved that item and approved the Sale Agreement and State Guarantee.

159. On 18 July 2001 Saluka filed its Notice of Arbitration initiating the present arbitration against the Czech Republic. All subsequent events (to some of which attention has already been drawn) therefore post-date the commencement of this arbitration.

160. On 16 June 2002 the forced administration of IPB ended and Nomura resumed control over IPB. IPB subsequently filed several claims against the Czech Republic, CSOB and JP Morgan. On 4 December 2002 the Czech Republic and the NPF initiated the NPF arbitration against Saluka and Nomura, and later that month an arbitration tribunal ordered Nomura to transfer the IPB shares to CSOB.

161. On 16 December 2003 and in January 2004 the European Commission (“EC”) made decisions which had the effect of establishing that it would not review the compatibility of all State measures towards KB and CS with EC State aid rules.

162. At the end of January 2004 the Board of Directors of IPB (controlled by Nomura) and Mr Petr Beneš (former director of IPB) separately filed for IPB’s bankruptcy. On 5 February 2004 IPB was declared bankrupt.

163. On 16 February 2004 the CSC registered CSOB as the new owner of Saluka’s IPB shares.

III. THE PARTIES’ ARGUMENTS AND SUBMISSIONS

164. On the basis of the facts and the law as it saw them, the Claimant considered that the Czech Republic had acted in a way which was discriminatory, unfair, inequitable and expropriatory, and was thus in breach of its obligations under the Treaty, in particular those arising under Articles 3 and 5.

165. In its Memorial, the Claimant requested the following relief:

- (a) a declaration that the Czech Republic has breached Article 3 of the Treaty by failing to accord Saluka’s investment fair and equitable treatment;
- (b) a declaration that the Czech Republic has breached Article 5 of the Treaty by depriving Saluka of its investment unlawfully and without just compensation equal to the genuine value of the investment;
- (c) an order that the Czech Republic pay Saluka compensation for the damages that it has suffered as a result of the breaches of the Treaty, such damages to be determined by the Tribunal based on further submissions;

- (d) interest on the compensation to be awarded to Saluka, in an amount to be determined by the Tribunal; and
- (e) an order that the Czech Republic pay the costs of these arbitration proceedings, including the costs of the Tribunal and the legal and other costs incurred by Saluka, on a full indemnity basis.

166. The Claimant's subsequent pleadings, both written and oral, did not vary those requests.

167. For its part, the Respondent, on the basis of the facts and the law as it saw them, denied that there had been any breach of its obligations under the Treaty and, in any event, challenged the entitlement of Saluka to invoke the arbitration provisions of the Treaty.

168. In its pleadings, the Respondent requested the following relief:

- (a) In its Notice to Dismiss, "that the Tribunal dismiss with prejudice the arbitration filed by Saluka and award the Czech Republic its attorneys' fees and costs";
- (b) In its Counter-Memorial,
  - (i) a declaration that Saluka breached the Agreement and engaged in other unlawful acts;
  - (ii) an order that Saluka pay the Czech Republic compensation for the damages suffered as a result of Saluka's unlawful acts presently estimated to be approximately CZK 100 billion to CZK 260 billion (approximately US$3.22 billion to US$8.38 billion);
  - (iii) interest on the compensation awarded to the Czech Republic, in an amount to be determined by the Tribunal; and
  - (iv) an order that Saluka pay the costs of these arbitration proceedings, including the costs of the Tribunal and the legal and other costs incurred by the Czech Republic, on a full indemnity basis;
- (c) In its Rejoinder (i.e. after the Tribunal's Decision on Jurisdiction over the Respondent's Counterclaims), "that the Tribunal render a final Award determining that the Czech Republic has not violated Articles 3 and 5 of the Treaty"; and
- (d) At the conclusion of its oral submissions, the Respondent asked that the Tribunal "render an award determining that there was no violation of either Article 3 or Article 5 of the Treaty" and, in its Post-Hearing Brief, "that the Tribunal issue a Final Award determining that the Treaty was not violated".

169. The Claimant in its Memorial stated that it was “appropriate and efficient to postpone precise issues of the quantification of Saluka’s loss to a separate phase of the proceedings when the Tribunal’s decision on liability is known”. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent stated that “[l]ike Saluka, the Czech Republic concludes that it is appropriate and efficient to postpone precise issues of the quantification of the Czech Republic’s loss to a separate phase of the proceedings”.

170. The parties developed their respective arguments fully in their written pleadings, which were submitted in the manner set out in Part I of this Award, the Introduction. They also refined their positions and put forward further arguments in support of their respective cases in the course of the oral hearings which were held in April 2005, as also set out in Part I of this Award.

171. The Tribunal considers that it will be more convenient if, rather than attempting to summarise the parties’ arguments as a whole, it instead summarises their contentions separately in the course of its consideration of each of the various particular issues which it is called upon to determine, and so far as they may be relevant to those issues.

IV. THE TRIBUNAL’S JURISDICTION

172. The Tribunal must first address the issue of its jurisdiction to hear and decide the dispute which Saluka has submitted to it.

A. The Parties’ Arguments

173. The Claimant’s Memorial was due to be filed on 15 August 2002. Two days earlier, on 13 August 2003, the Respondent filed a Notice to Dismiss, by which it requested that the Tribunal dismiss the Claimant’s claims.

174. By its Notice to Dismiss, the Respondent argued that (a) Nomura did not buy IPB shares in order to invest in IPB’s banking operations, but instead its true purpose was to facilitate its acquisition of Czech breweries in which IPB held a controlling shareholding; (b) Nomura did not disclose that true purpose to the Czech authorities at the time of its purchase of IPB shares; (c) Nomura had thus not acted in good faith and had violated the principle of non-abuse of rights, and was therefore not a bona fide investor; and (d) therefore Saluka, to whom Nomura had transferred its IPB shareholding, was precluded from having recourse to arbitration under the Treaty.

175. The filing of such a Notice had not been envisaged in the timetable fixed by the Tribunal, nor is it envisaged in the UNCITRAL Rules.

176. Article 21.3 of those Rules provides:

A plea that the arbitral tribunal does not have jurisdiction shall be raised not later than in the statement of defence or, with respect to a counter-claim, in the reply to the counter-claim.

177. Article 21.4 of the UNCITRAL Rules provides:

In general, the arbitral tribunal should rule on a plea concerning its jurisdiction as a preliminary question. However, the arbitral tribunal may proceed with the arbitration and rule on such a plea in their final award.

178. At a Procedural Meeting in London on 10 September 2002 to consider the Respondent's request, the Tribunal ruled that, because the facts alleged in the Respondent's Notice to Dismiss were so closely related to the facts involved in the principal claim, the dismissal issue should be joined to the merits and ruled upon in the Tribunal's final award (above, paragraph 20, Part I.E. of the Decision on Jurisdiction over Counterclaims).

179. Nevertheless, the issue surfaced again in the context of the Respondent's Counterclaims. In the Notice of Counterclaim which the Respondent volunteered on 4 December 2002 the Respondent set out its proposed "counterclaim against Saluka" and stated that it would elaborate on such claims when it filed its Counter-Memorial. The Respondent stated in paragraph 380 of its Counter-Memorial that by its Counterclaim the Czech Republic sought relief on account of the manner in which Saluka (sic) handled its "purported investment". Although it thus appeared that the Counterclaim was intended to be directed against the Claimant, under each of the more specific heads of its Counterclaim, the Respondent's Counter-Memorial identified Nomura as the defendant (essentially Nomura Europe, which is a legal person constituted under the laws of England), whereas the Claimant in this arbitration is Saluka (which is a legal person constituted under the laws of The Netherlands).

180. The Claimant attached overriding weight to the fact that Nomura Europe on the one hand and Saluka on the other were separate legal persons constituted under the laws of different States, that only Saluka was the Claimant in this arbitration and within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, that Nomura Europe could not be brought within the scope of the Czech-Netherlands Treaty, and that a counterclaim against Nomura Europe could not therefore be brought in these arbitration proceedings instituted by Saluka. The Respondent, however, maintained that, in the context of the circumstances which gave rise to this arbitration, the relationship between Nomura and Saluka was so close that they were in effect interchangeable as parties in these proceedings; indeed, in the Respondent's submission, such was the closeness of the relationship that the real party in interest was Nomura, and that Saluka was not a bona fide "investor" under the Treaty, for which reason the Respondent requested that the proceedings initiated by Saluka be dismissed.

181. The Tribunal did not, however, find it necessary to touch on those issues for the immediate purpose of reaching a decision on its jurisdiction to hear and determine the counterclaim advanced in this case by the Respondent. For that purpose, the Tribunal found it appropriate to proceed in the first place on the basis that the question of the relationship between Saluka and Nomura was assumed to be determined on the basis most favourable to the Respondent (see Decision on Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaim, paragraphs 41-44 and 81-82). Accordingly, the Tribunal initially proceeded on the assumption, but without deciding, that the relationship between Saluka and Nomura Europe was sufficiently close to enable the Tribunal's jurisdiction in proceedings instituted by Saluka to extend to claims against Nomura. The Tribunal then on that hypothetical basis addressed the several heads of the Counterclaim put forward by the Respondent, and concluded that the disputes which had given rise to the Respondent's Counterclaim were not sufficiently closely connected with the subject-matter of the original claim put forward by Saluka to fall within the Tribunal's jurisdiction under Article 8 of the Treaty.

182. It followed from that conclusion that the Tribunal did not find it necessary in the context of its decision on its jurisdiction over counterclaims to reach any decision as to the nature of the relationship between Saluka and Nomura Europe and the consequences of that relationship, whatever it may be. Accordingly, the Tribunal's decision that it was without jurisdiction to hear and determine any of the heads of counterclaim put forward by the Respondent was without prejudice to the eventual consideration of that issue, involving in particular Saluka's standing as an "investor" under the Treaty. That issue remained to be considered at the merits phase of these proceedings, as originally decided by the Tribunal in its ruling of 10 September 2002.

183. In its Counter-Memorial and in subsequent pleadings, the Respondent elaborated its "dismissal" arguments, and added further arguments contesting the Tribunal's jurisdiction. In particular:

(a) The Respondent repeated its contention that Nomura had not made its investment in IPB in order to keep IPB viable but to facilitate the acquisition of two valuable Czech breweries through control of IPB's stake in them: Nomura's real objective was not to invest in IPB's banking operations but, by way of a Put Option scheme which in effect eliminated all downside risk from Nomura's purchase of the IPB shares, to acquire and then sell on IPB's shareholding in the brewery companies, which made Nomura's real objective something other than a bona fide investment in IPB. The investment had not been lawfully made (as was generally required for investment protection), but was part of a "dishonest scheme to secure enormous benefits". Czech law required Nomura to file a business plan for its investment in IPB, and a false filing was a breach of that legal requirement. Nomura's failure, in its filed business plan, to disclose its true objectives to the Czech authorities had led them to approve the purchase of IPB's shares, which they would not otherwise have done. Nomura had not acted in good faith and had violated the principle of non-abuse of rights, for which reason Saluka was precluded from relying on the international arbitral process provided by the Treaty.

(b) In any event, the Respondent contended that Saluka did not have any real and continuous bona fide social or economic factual links to The Netherlands, and should therefore be disqualified from being considered as an "investor".

(c) Moreover, the Respondent maintained that, in the context of the circumstances which gave rise to this arbitration, the relationship between Nomura and Saluka was so close that they were in effect interchangeable as parties in these proceedings and that the terms "Nomura" and "Saluka" could be used interchangeably, Saluka being nothing more than a shell used by Nomura for its own purposes. Indeed, in the Respondent's submission, such was the closeness of the relationship that the real party in interest was Nomura, and Nomura was not an eligible claimant under the Treaty.

(d) Saluka was not, so the Respondent contended, a bona fide “investor” as defined in the Treaty and was thus unable to have recourse to arbitration under it. The Respondent accordingly requested that the proceedings initiated by Saluka be dismissed.

184. In its subsequent pleadings (Rejoinder, oral argument, and Post-Hearing Brief), the Respondent contended principally that:

(a) Saluka had not made an investment in the Czech Republic since it had invested nothing, acting merely as a conduit for Nomura’s investment: Nomura retained the voting rights associated with the IPB shares, participated in the management of IPB, and conducted all the dealings with the Czech authorities. Saluka was a mere surrogate for Nomura, and a claim under an investment treaty could not be brought by an entity which was a surrogate for another entity which, like Nomura, was not covered by the Treaty. Saluka was an agent for Nomura, not a true investor.

(b) While a simplistic or literal view of Article 1 of the Treaty might suggest that Saluka was a qualified investor, the Treaty had to be interpreted in light of the realities of the situation, and they showed that Nomura and Saluka had not conducted themselves as true investors.

(c) “Piercing the corporate veil” was permissible as an equitable remedy where corporate structures had been utilised to perpetrate fraud or other malfeasance. Nomura had used corporate structures to realise profit and put the banking sector at risk, and to perpetrate fraud against the Czech Republic. The corporate veil should therefore be pierced, the real interest at stake should be recognised to be Nomura’s, and, as Nomura was not within the Treaty definition of an “investor”, the Tribunal was without jurisdiction.

(d) The Nomura Group had acted fraudulently and dishonestly throughout the events to which the case related. Nomura’s circular financing arrangements, the Czech beer deal, the Put Option and the establishment of the “Tritton Fund” (in the Cayman Islands) had all been conducted contrary to international bonos mores. This continuing failure to act in good faith and the abuse of process required that Saluka – which had never even been a bona fide holder of an investment which might have been injured – should be denied protection under the Treaty. Allegations of harm suffered by Nomura (rather than Saluka), and allegations based on the period before October 1998 when Saluka acquired its IPB shares, were outside the Tribunal’s jurisdiction.

(e) Moreover, the Claimant was acting in abuse of rights in instituting the arbitration since its purpose in doing so was to take advantage of the delay which would thereby be occasioned so that Nomura might gain advantage from the running of statutes of limitation in relation to civil or criminal proceedings which might be instituted by the Czech Republic in other fora.

185. In the Claimant’s Memorial, the Claimant simply relied on the fact that the Claimant was established under Dutch law for the express purpose of holding the IPB shares which Nomura had purchased, and that consequently it was an “investor” as defined in the Treaty and its shareholding was an “investment” as also so defined. The facts surrounding the purchase of the IPB shares showed that Saluka had fulfilled the requirement of Article 2 of the Treaty that investments be lawfully made, and this was borne out by the approval given to the share purchase agreement by the Czech authorities. In its more specific written responses to the Respondent's more detailed exposition of its arguments on the question of the Tribunal's jurisdiction over counterclaims (i.e. in its Objections to Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaims and its Reply to the Czech Republic's Response to the Claimant's Objections to Jurisdiction over the Czech Republic's Counterclaims), the Claimant attached overriding weight to the fact that Nomura Europe on the one hand and Saluka on the other were separate legal persons constituted under the laws of different States, that only Saluka was the Claimant in this arbitration and within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, and that Nomura Europe, as an English company, could not be brought within the scope of the Czech-Netherlands Treaty.

186. In its subsequent pleadings (Reply, oral argument, and Post-Hearing Brief), the Claimant repeated its view that Saluka was a Dutch legal entity and thus an "investor" and that its ownership of IPB shares was an "investment". The Claimant added further argument, in particular:

(a) Saluka's shareholding was not negated by allegedly not being "lawfully made" and therefore not bona fide; the only illegality which had been alleged concerned the Put Option, for which there was no basis and which in any event had already been held to be valid in an associated arbitration. In connection with obtaining the CNB's approval for the Share Purchase Agreement, Nomura had duly filed its business plan, which had only to relate to its intentions regarding the future conduct of IPB's banking operations.

(b) There was no need to consider whether or not Saluka had any factual links with The Netherlands, since the Treaty adopted the place-of-incorporation test and there was no basis for adding a "factual link" test.

(c) Saluka's investment in IPB was a real investment.

(d) Nomura did not mislead the Czech authorities as to the nature of its investment in IPB, having made clear its role as a portfolio investor all along.

(e) Nomura's acquisition of the brewery shares was a commercial and financial transaction which was not tainted by any impropriety.

(f) Nomura was a bona fide investor.

187. At the close of the oral hearings, the Tribunal asked the parties to address, in their post-hearing briefs, the following question:

[T]o what extent, if at all, (1) can the Tribunal consider and make findings about the conduct of Nomura? (2) is Nomura a necessary party to these proceedings in relation to that conduct?

188. The Claimant's response was that the Tribunal had jurisdiction to consider and make factual findings about the conduct of Nomura in so far as such findings might be relevant to Saluka's positive case or the Czech Republic's defence, and that the possibility that the Tribunal had to make findings of fact with respect to Nomura's conduct did not require Nomura to be joined as a party to the proceedings.

189. The Respondent's answer to the Tribunal's question was that (1) the Tribunal might make findings of fact regarding Nomura's conduct without considering Nomura to be a "necessary party" to the proceedings, such an approach being typical in BIT arbitrations, and (2) although the Tribunal might make findings of fact regarding Nomura's conduct, Saluka could not recover any damages on the basis of Nomura's alleged loss – and since Saluka's alleged claims for damages were in fact Nomura's claims, Saluka's claims could be dismissed because Saluka is not seeking to recover for any losses that it had itself sustained.

190. In considering the various issues of jurisdiction and admissibility which have been raised, the Tribunal first notes that the Respondent's Notice to Dismiss in substance argues that the Tribunal should decline to entertain the proceedings initiated by the Claimant on the ground that the Claimant is not qualified to bring arbitration proceedings under the Treaty.

191. Accordingly, although the Notice to Dismiss is not worded as an objection to the Tribunal's jurisdiction, it may be assimilated to an objection that the Tribunal is without jurisdiction. As such, it was permissible (although perhaps procedurally unorthodox) for the Respondent to file its Notice making that objection. Doing so by way of the Notice to Dismiss filed on 13 August 2003 was within the time limit prescribed by Article 21.3 of the UNCITRAL Rules. So too was the further elaboration of the Respondent's arguments in its Counter-Memorial.

192. The Tribunal will now address the substantive arguments advanced by the Respondent by which it sought to show that the Tribunal was without jurisdiction to entertain the present proceedings.

B. Relevant Terms of the Treaty

193. The Tribunal's jurisdiction is governed by the terms of the Treaty. The immediately relevant terms of the Treaty are Article 8.1 and Article 1.

194. In relevant part, Article 8.1, to which Article 8.2 refers back, relates to "[a]ll disputes between one Contracting Party and an investor of the other Contracting Party concerning an investment of the latter . . .".

195. In these proceedings, the Czech Republic is the relevant "Contracting Party" with which the Claimant claims a dispute exists.

196. In accordance with Article 8, the competence to make use of the arbitral process provided for in Article 8 of the Treaty is possessed by "investors" in respect of their "investments". Those terms are defined in Article 1 of the Treaty.

197. An investor of the "other" Contracting Party (in these proceedings, The Netherlands) must in the first place satisfy the definition of "investors" in Article 1(b)(ii) of the Treaty.

Under that definition, for the purposes of the present proceedings, that term comprises “legal persons constituted under the laws of [The Netherlands]”.

198. In the second place, the dispute between the Czech Republic and such an investor must be one “concerning an investment of [the investor]”. The term “investments” is defined in Article 1(a) as follows:

The term “investments” shall comprise every kind of asset invested either directly or through an investor of a third State and more particularly, though not exclusively:

- (i) movable and immovable property and all related property rights;
- (ii) shares, bonds and other kinds of interests in companies and joint ventures, as well as rights derived therefrom;
- (iii) title to money and other assets and to any performance having an economic value;
- (iv) rights in the field of intellectual property, also including technical processes, goodwill and know-how;
- (v) concessions conferred by law or under contract, including concessions to prospect, explore, extract and win natural resources.

C. The Respondent’s Challenges to the Tribunal’s Jurisdiction

199. Although the Respondent did not always articulate the various grounds on which it challenged the Tribunal’s jurisdiction with the utmost clarity or consistency, and given its contention that Nomura and Saluka were interchangeable, the principal jurisdictional contentions put forward by the Respondent may be considered under the following headings:

- (a) the purchase of IPB shares was not an investment since Nomura/Saluka had invested nothing in IPB;
- (b) in so far as the purchase of IPB shares was an investment, it had not been lawfully made;
- (c) the real party in interest in the arbitration was not the Claimant, Saluka, but Nomura, which was not an eligible claimant under the Treaty;
- (d) the relationship between Nomura and Saluka was so close as to make them interchangeable;
- (e) Nomura/Saluka was not a bona fide investor in IPB;
- (f) Nomura/Saluka did not act in good faith in purchasing the IPB shares;

- (g) Nomura/Saluka acted in abuse of rights in the purchase of IPB shares;
- (h) Saluka had no real and continuous social and economic links with The Netherlands.

200. The Tribunal has concluded that the Claimant's shareholding of IPB shares is an "investment" within the meaning of the Treaty, that the Claimant is in respect of that investment an "investor" within the meaning of the Treaty, and that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to hear claims brought before it by the Claimant.

201. The Tribunal will now address each of the Respondent's contentions.

D. The Purchase of IPB Shares as an Investment and Compliance with Legal Requirements

202. Under a Share Purchase Agreement of 8 March 1998, Nomura Europe bought a controlling (but not majority) holding of shares in the Czech bank IPB. Most of Nomura Europe's shareholding in IPB was transferred to Saluka on 2 October 1998, with the balance being transferred on 24 February 2000. Saluka instituted these present proceedings by a Notice of Arbitration dated 18 July 2001, at a time when it was still the registered owner of the shares, alleging various Treaty breaches in respect of its holding of IPB shares.

203. The first question to be addressed is whether Saluka's holding of IPB shares is an "investment" for purposes of the Treaty. "Investments" are defined in the Treaty very widely. They comprise "every kind of asset invested directly or through an investor of a third State", certain of the more usual kinds of investments then being identified by way of illustration. These illustratively identified assets include in particular "shares, bonds and other kinds of interests in companies and joint ventures, as well as rights derived therefrom".

204. The Tribunal notes in passing that, although not in terms part of the definition of an "investment", it is necessarily implicit in Article 2 of the Treaty that an investment must have been made in accordance with the provisions of the host State's laws. In relevant part, Article 2 stipulates that "[e]ach Contracting Party . . . shall admit such investments in accordance with its provisions of law". Accordingly, and as both parties acknowledge, the obligation upon the host State to admit an investment by a foreign investor (i.e. in the present context, to allow the purchase of shares in a local company) only arises if the purchase is made in compliance with its laws.

205. There seems no room for doubt that a qualified investor's holding of shares in a Czech company such as IPB constitutes an investment within the scope of the definition.

206. The Respondent challenges that conclusion on a variety of grounds, notably on the basis that it was not an investment since Saluka had in reality invested nothing in IPB, and that, in so far as the purchase of IPB shares was an investment, it had not been lawfully made.

207. The argument that Saluka had invested nothing in IPB and for that reason the purchase of IPB shares could not be considered an "investment" seems to be based on two considerations. The first is that Nomura, in making the original purchase of IPB's shares, and Saluka, in subsequently acquiring them, had no intention to make any true investment in the Czech Republic or in IPB's banking operations. The acquisition of IPB shares was never intended, so it is said, to be anything more than a short-term holding of shares with a view to the making of a large profit from the sale of major assets controlled by IPB, to be followed by the sale of the shares at an appropriate moment; Nomura and Saluka, so it is said, showed by their conduct throughout the events to which this case relates that they were not true investors.

208. The Tribunal first notes that the original purchase of IPB shares in March 1998 was not the act of Saluka but of Nomura Europe. Until 2 October 1998 only Nomura Europe held those IPB shares. It is consequently only the subsequent acquisition and holding of those shares by Saluka, from 2 October onwards, in respect of which the Respondent's arguments are relevant.

209. The Tribunal does not believe that it would be correct to interpret Article 1 as excluding from the definition of "investor" those who purchase shares as part of what might be termed bare profit-making or profit-taking transactions. Most purchases of shares are made with the hope that, in one way or another, the result will in due course be a degree of profit on the transaction. It is relevant in this context that, throughout the many discussions which took place between Nomura and the Czech authorities, Nomura insisted that it was only a portfolio investor in IPB and not a strategic investor. Even if it were possible to know an investor's true motivation in making its investment, nothing in Article 1 makes the investor's motivation part of the definition of an "investment".

210. The second consideration which is said by the Respondent to undermine any determination that the purchase of IPB's shares was an "investment" appears to be that Saluka itself invested nothing in IPB but was merely a conduit for the investment made by Nomura, which retained the voting rights associated with the IPB shares, participated in the management of IPB, and conducted all the dealings with the Czech authorities. Saluka was a mere surrogate for Nomura, being no more than an agent for Nomura and not itself a true investor.

211. To a considerable extent, this argument seeks to replace the definition of an "investment" in Article 2 of the Treaty with a definition which looks more to the economic processes involved in the making of investments. However, the Tribunal's jurisdiction is governed by Article 1 of the Treaty, and nothing in that Article has the effect of importing into the definition of "investment" the meaning which that term might bear as an economic process, in the sense of making a substantial contribution to the local economy or to the well-being of a company operating within it. Although the chapeau of Article 2 refers to "every kind of asset invested", the use of that term in that place does not require, in addition to the very broad terms in which "investments" are defined in the Article, the satisfaction of a requirement based on the meaning of "investing" as an economic process: the chapeau needs to contain a verb which is apt for the various specific kinds of investments which are listed, and since all of them are being defined as various kinds of investment it is in the context appropriate to use the verb "invested" without thereby adding further substantive conditions.

212. So far as concerns the lawfulness of the original purchase of IPB shares by Nomura Europe, the Respondent has argued that that shareholding cannot be regarded as a capital investment through the purchase of IPB shares. These were that Nomura was not investing in IPB in order to support IPB's banking operations and keep IPB viable but to facilitate the acquisition of two valuable Czech breweries through control of IPB's stake in them: this was to be achieved by way of a Put Option scheme which in effect eliminated all downside risk from Nomura's purchase of the IPB shares, so enabling Nomura to acquire and then sell on IPB's shareholding in the brewery companies. This, so it was contended, made Nomura's real objective something other than a bona fide investment in IPB: the purchase of IPB's shares was part of a "dishonest scheme to secure enormous benefits". Czech law required a prospective purchaser of controlling shares in a bank to obtain the consent of the Czech authorities for that purchase, which meant that Nomura was required to file a business plan for its investment in IPB, and a false filing was a breach of that legal requirement. Nomura's failure, in its filed business plan, to disclose its true objectives to the Czech authorities had led them to approve the purchase of IPB's shares, which they would not otherwise have done.

213. In this context, the Respondent has invoked the requirements of Section 16(1)(a) and (e) of the Czech Banking Act. This provides (in the translation submitted by the Respondent):

Prior approval of the Czech National Bank shall be required

(a) for the establishment of an ownership interest by foreign a person in an existing bank,<sup>4</sup>

(e) acquisitions or transfers of registered capital amounting to more than 15% of a bank's registered capital, in the course of one or more transactions, by/to an individual or several persons acting in concert, unless due to inheritance.

While that provision of the Czech Banking Act establishes the need to obtain the CNB's approval, it says nothing about the investor's obligation to disclose its long-term plans and ultimate objectives.

214. The Respondent has in that respect invoked the provisions of the CNB's Official Communication 23/1995, Article III(2)(c) of which provides:

The investor shall submit the application to the CNB together with the following documents:

2. if the investor is a legal entity

(c) a business plan (in the event that the required volume of shares represents 10% and more of the registered capital of the bank).

While that provision requires the submission of a business plan, the Tribunal has seen nothing to suggest that it imposes a legal obligation upon an investor to disclose its future long-term plans and objectives going far beyond the immediate purposes of its investment in the bank whose shares are being purchased. A “business plan” is inherently a label of considerable generality, and a Tribunal such as this must hesitate before reading into that label such a particular and far-reaching content.

215. The Respondent has not identified any other specific legal requirements relating to the filing obligation which have allegedly been violated. And although Mr Pavel Racoča (Executive Director of the Banking Supervision Department at the CNB) has testified that, had he been aware of the full story, he would not have approved Nomura’s share purchase, the Tribunal does not see in that statement anything to transform full disclosure of future long-term plans and objectives into a legal obligation for the investor.

216. So far as concerns any alleged illegality involved in the creation or operation of the Put Option, the Tribunal notes, and sees no reason to dissent from, the decision of the tribunal in the first arbitration under the Put Option agreement in Torkmain Investments Ltd et al. v. Pembridge Investments BV et al.,<sup>5</sup> in its second interim award, that the Put Option agreement was valid, as was the Put Option itself. Moreover, the Tribunal notes that, in the second such arbitration, it was accepted by CSOB (apparently acting on behalf of the Czech Republic) that those two matters were res judicata as a matter of Czech law.

217. The Tribunal is accordingly unable to conclude that the circumstances surrounding the original purchase of the shares by Nomura Europe have been shown to involve any breach of the law by Nomura Europe such as to warrant its purchase of IPB shares being considered an unlawful investment and so not entitled to protection under the Treaty. In this connection, the Tribunal notes that, throughout the events giving rise to this arbitration, the Czech authorities have never questioned either the legality of the original transaction by which Nomura acquired the IPB shares, or the legality of Saluka’s subsequent ownership of them: on the contrary, the Czech authorities took many steps explicitly acknowledging Saluka’s status as properly the owner of those shares after October 1998.

218. In any event, the Tribunal again observes that any illegality allegedly involved in Nomura Europe’s conduct at the time of its purchase of the IPB shares would be a failing by Nomura, not by the Claimant in these proceedings, Saluka. To be relevant to the present proceedings, Nomura’s failings (if any) at the time of purchasing the IPB shares in March 1998 need also to be in some way attributable to Saluka in relation to its acquisition and subsequent holding of the shares after October 1998.

219. So far as concerns the subsequent transactions by which those shares were transferred to Saluka, the Respondent appears to address this aspect of the matter by arguing that since, as it submitted, Nomura had not lawfully acquired any investment in IPB shares, therefore Saluka, which subsequently acquired the IPB shares from Nomura, was precluded from having recourse to arbitration under the Treaty, possibly (although this is not specified by the Respondent) either on the ground that the original purchase being unlawful, that illegality taints the subsequent holder’s title to the shares, or on the ground that since Nomura and Saluka are in effect interchangeable (as to which, see below), Nomura’s unlawful conduct is at the same time Saluka’s unlawful conduct.

220. Given the Tribunal's finding in paragraph 42 above, the Tribunal has no need to consider these arguments further.

221. The Tribunal accordingly concludes that there are no good reasons for declining to consider the Claimant's holding of IPB shares in issue in this case to be an "investment" within the meaning of the definition of that term in Article 1 of the Treaty.

E. Saluka's Qualification as an "Investor" Entitled to Initiate the Arbitration Procedures under the Treaty

222. The question which must next be considered is whether Saluka is a qualified "investor" for purposes of the Treaty.

223. There is no doubt that Saluka meets the only requirements expressly stipulated in Article 1 of the Treaty for qualification as an investor, namely that it be a "legal person", and be "constituted under the law of [The Netherlands]".

224. The Respondent, however, advances several arguments why Saluka should nevertheless not be considered an "investor" entitled to invoke the arbitration provisions of the Treaty in respect of Saluka's holding of IPB shares. These have been summarised in paragraph 199(c-h) above:

225. The six separate grounds there summarised amount, in substance, to three main arguments involving, first, the closeness of the relationship between Nomura and Saluka, second, the lack of good faith involved in the acquisition of IPB shares, and third, Saluka's lack of real links with The Netherlands.

1. The Corporate Relationship between Saluka and Nomura

226. As regards the first of these main lines of argument, the essential facts regarding the relationship between Saluka and Nomura have already been set out. In brief, "Nomura" or "the Nomura Group" is the convenient group name of a major Japanese merchant banking and financial services group of companies. It typically operates through subsidiaries set up in various countries. One element of the Nomura Group was Nomura Europe plc, a company constituted under the laws of England. (For convenience, where this company needs to be separately identified, it is referred to as "Nomura Europe".) Another part of the Nomura Group was Saluka, the Claimant in this arbitration. Saluka was constituted under the laws of The Netherlands for the sole and express purpose of holding the shares in IPB which Nomura Europe was at the time in the process of purchasing. Saluka was wholly controlled by Nomura Europe.

227. In those circumstances, the Respondent contended that, in the context of the circumstances which gave rise to this arbitration, the relationship between Nomura and Saluka was so close that they were in effect interchangeable as parties in these proceedings, Saluka being nothing more than a shell used by Nomura for its own purposes. Indeed, in the Respondent's submission, such was the closeness of the relationship that the real party in interest was Nomura (which was not eligible to present claims under the Treaty), and that therefore Saluka was not a bona fide “investor” under the Treaty (a use of “bona fide” which, in this context, the Tribunal takes to mean something like “genuine” or “real”) and was therefore not entitled to have recourse to arbitration under it: Saluka was, in effect, a mere surrogate for Nomura, and a claim under an investment treaty could not be brought by an entity which was a surrogate for another entity which, like Nomura, was not covered by the Treaty. Although this involved looking behind the formal corporate structures of Nomura and Saluka, such “piercing the corporate veil” was permissible as an equitable remedy where corporate structures had been utilised to perpetrate fraud or other malfeasance. Nomura had used corporate structures to realise profit and put the banking sector at risk, and to perpetrate fraud against the Czech Republic. The corporate veil should therefore be pierced, the real interest at stake should be recognised to be Nomura’s, and as Nomura was not within the Treaty definition of an “investor”, the Tribunal was without jurisdiction.

228. The Tribunal accepts – and the parties have made no attempt to conceal, either from the Tribunal or, in the Claimant’s case, from the Czech authorities – the closeness of the relationship between Nomura and Saluka. In that respect, the companies concerned have simply acted in a manner which is commonplace in the world of commerce.

229. In dealing with the consequences of that way of acting, the Tribunal must always bear in mind the terms of the Treaty under which it operates. Those terms expressly give a legal person constituted under the laws of The Netherlands – such as, in this case, Saluka – the right to invoke the protection of the Treaty. To depart from that conclusion requires clear language in the Treaty, but there is none. The parties to the Treaty could have included in their agreed definition of “investor” some words which would have served, for example, to exclude wholly-owned subsidiaries of companies constituted under the laws of third States, but they did not do so. The parties having agreed that any legal person constituted under their laws is entitled to invoke the protection of the Treaty, and having so agreed without reference to any question of their relationship to some other third State corporation, it is beyond the powers of this Tribunal to import into the definition of “investor” some requirement relating to such a relationship having the effect of excluding from the Treaty’s protection a company which the language agreed by the parties included within it.

230. While it might in some circumstances be permissible for a tribunal to look behind the corporate structures of companies involved in proceedings before it, the Tribunal is of the view that the circumstances of the present case are not such as to allow it to act in that way. The Respondent acknowledges that this possibility presents itself as an equitable remedy where corporate structures had been utilised to perpetrate fraud or other malfeasance, but, in the present case, the Tribunal finds that the alleged fraud and malfeasance have been insufficiently made out to justify recourse to a remedy which, being equitable, is discretionary.

2. The Alleged Lack of Good Faith and Abuse of Rights

231. As regards the bundle of arguments which are said to involve in one way or another considerations of the alleged lack of good faith shown by Nomura/Saluka in the acquisition of the IPB shares, it seems that the Respondent relies on a variety of circumstances in support of its contention. Principal among these is that Nomura Europe did not, at the time of purchasing the IPB shares, disclose to the Czech authorities that its true purpose in doing so was not to invest in IPB’s banking operations, but rather, by way of the Put Option, to facilitate its acquisition of Czech breweries in which IPB had a controlling interest, and that, by such non-disclosure, Nomura had not acted in good faith and had violated the principle of abuse of rights and was therefore not a bona fide investor. Expressed more generally (as set out above in paragraph 184), the Respondent maintained that the Nomura Group had acted fraudulently and dishonestly throughout the events to which the case related. Nomura's circular financing arrangements, the Czech beer deal, the Put Option and the establishment of the Tritton Fund had all been conduct contrary to international bonos mores. This continuing failure to act in good faith and the abuse of process required that Saluka – which had never even been a bona fide holder of an investment which might have been injured – should be denied protection under the Treaty.

232. The Tribunal does not consider that an investor – and particularly a portfolio investor – shows a lack of good faith in failing to disclose to the seller of shares, or to the host State's regulatory authorities, its ultimate objectives in entering into a share purchase transaction. The seller of shares, and the regulatory authorities, must be taken to be aware that a portfolio investor, particularly one forming part of a very large international financial group, will be making investments as part of a much wider corporate strategy than is involved in the purchase of shares in one particular company. In the Tribunal's view, it is both unreasonable and unrealistic to posit an obligation upon an investor to disclose its ultimate objectives in making a particular investment, whether through the purchase of shares or otherwise. Ultimate objectives will, in any event, often be highly speculative and not susceptible to precise articulation, and will be subject to change over time. An investor may choose to make its long-term plans known to a greater or (in the absence of a clearly legal requirement to the contrary) lesser degree, but that is quite different from establishing an obligation to that effect such as to make non-disclosure a head of "bad faith".

233. The Tribunal has already addressed the Respondent's further argument that Nomura's non-disclosure of its long-term intentions regarding its plans for the acquisition of Czech breweries and the construction of the Put Option involved a breach of the Czech law.

234. So far as specifically concerns the alleged abuse of rights by the Claimant, the right allegedly being abused could be either the right to acquire the shares in IPB, or the right to be regarded as an investor entitled to invoke the Treaty's arbitration provisions: the Respondent appears to assert that the circumstances are in either case sufficient to deprive the Claimant of its standing as an investor entitled to avail itself of those provisions. Those circumstances on which the Respondent relies appear to be Nomura's non-disclosure of its true long-term intentions with regard to its investment in IPB, and its alleged wish to use the delays which would be occasioned by recourse to arbitration so that Nomura might gain advantage from the running of statutes of limitation in relation to civil or criminal proceedings which might be instituted by the Czech Republic in other fora.

235. The Tribunal has already addressed the argument based on non-disclosure, and concluded that an investor – and particularly a portfolio investor – shows no lack of good faith in failing to disclose to the seller of shares, or to the host State's regulatory authorities, its ultimate objectives in entering into a share purchase transaction. Similarly, the Tribunal cannot see in such non-disclosure any circumstance which it could regard as an abuse of the right to acquire the shares or of the right to initiate the Treaty's arbitration procedures.

236. As regards the Respondent's allegation that the Claimant had in mind ulterior litigation motives in instituting the arbitration procedures provided by the Treaty, the Tribunal has to observe that, even if such an ulterior motive could be such as to involve an abuse of the right to invoke the arbitration procedures, that allegation is unsubstantiated and cannot be the basis for a decision by the Tribunal which would deprive it of jurisdiction to proceed with the arbitration which the Claimant has initiated.

237. In any event, the Tribunal again observes that the illegality, lack of good faith, or abuse of rights allegedly involved in Nomura Europe's conduct at the time of its purchase of the IPB shares would be a failing by Nomura, not by the Claimant in these proceedings, Saluka. To be relevant to the present proceedings, Nomura's failings (if any) at the time of purchasing the IPB shares in March 1998 need also to be in some way attributable to Saluka in relation to its acquisition and subsequent holding of the shares after October 1998.

238. The Respondent addresses this aspect of the matter by arguing that since, as it submitted, Nomura was not a bona fide or lawful investor, therefore Saluka, which subsequently acquired the IPB shares from Nomura, was precluded from having recourse to arbitration under the Treaty. Since the Tribunal is not persuaded that the original conduct of Nomura involved any illegality, lack of good faith, or abuse of rights, the Tribunal does not find it necessary to examine further the extent to which, had it made any findings of that kind, they might have affected Saluka's right to initiate arbitration proceedings under the Treaty.

3. Saluka's Lack of Factual Links with The Netherlands

239. The Respondent also argues that Saluka did not have bona fide (which term again seems to connote genuineness rather than any issue of bad faith), real and continuous links to The Netherlands, and for that reason did not satisfy the requirements which are necessary to qualify as an "investor" able to benefit from the provisions of the Treaty.

240. The Tribunal has some sympathy for the argument that a company which has no real connection with a State party to a BIT, and which is in reality a mere shell company controlled by another company which is not constituted under the laws of that State, should not be entitled to invoke the provisions of that treaty. Such a possibility lends itself to abuses of the arbitral procedure, and to practices of "treaty shopping" which can share many of the disadvantages of the widely criticised practice of "forum shopping."

241. However that may be, the predominant factor which must guide the Tribunal's exercise of its functions is the terms in which the parties to the Treaty now in question have agreed to establish the Tribunal's jurisdiction. In the present context, that means the terms in which they have agreed upon who is an investor who may become a claimant entitled to invoke the Treaty's arbitration procedures. The parties had complete freedom of choice in this matter, and they chose to limit entitled "investors" to those satisfying the definition set out in Article 1 of the Treaty. The Tribunal cannot in effect impose upon the parties a definition of "investor" other than that which they themselves agreed. That agreed definition required only that the claimant-investor should be constituted under the laws of (in the present case) The Netherlands, and it is not open to the Tribunal to add other requirements which the parties could themselves have added but which they omitted to add.

242. The Tribunal is confirmed in the appropriateness of the view which it has taken by the consideration, in the particular circumstances of the present case, that it was always apparent to the Czech authorities that it was Nomura's intention to transfer the IPB shares it was purchasing to another company within the Nomura Group, and that that other company would be a special-purpose vehicle set up for the specific and sole purpose of holding those shares. The Share Purchase Agreement contained express provision to that effect. By applying the provisions of the Treaty in conformity with their express terms, no violence is done to the positions knowingly adopted by the parties at all relevant times.

F. The Tribunal's Conclusions as to Jurisdiction

243. Having thus considered the various challenges to its jurisdiction which the Respondent has advanced, the Tribunal concludes that the Claimant's shareholding of IPB shares is an "investment" within the meaning of the Treaty, and that the Claimant is in respect of that investment an "investor" within the meaning of the Treaty. Accordingly, the Tribunal is satisfied that it has jurisdiction to hear the claims brought before it by the Claimant under the arbitration procedure provided for in Article 8 of the Treaty.

244. In reaching that conclusion, however, the Tribunal wishes to emphasise that, in accordance with the Treaty, its jurisdiction is limited to claims brought by the Claimant, Saluka, in respect of damage suffered by itself in respect of the investment represented by its holding of IPB shares. It follows, therefore, that the Tribunal does not have jurisdiction in respect of any claims of Nomura, or any claims in respect of damage suffered by Nomura and not by Saluka, or any claims in respect of damage suffered in respect of the IPB shares before October 1998 when the bulk of those shares became vested in the Claimant. Although Nomura is not a party to these proceedings, the Tribunal nevertheless has jurisdiction to consider and make factual findings about the conduct of Nomura in so far as such findings might be relevant to the Tribunal's consideration of arguments advanced by the Claimant or the Respondent.

V. SALUKA'S CLAIMS UNDER ARTICLE 5 OF THE TREATY

A. The Treaty

245. Article 5 of the Treaty reads as follows:

Neither Contracting Party shall take any measures depriving, directly or indirectly, investors of the other Contracting Party of their investments unless the following conditions are complied with:

- a. the measures are taken in the public interest and under due process of law;
- b. the measures are not discriminatory;
- c. the measures are accompanied by provision for the payment of just compensation. Such compensation shall represent the genuine value of the investments affected and shall, in order to be effective for the claimants, be paid and made transferable, without undue delay, to the country designated by the claimants concerned and in any freely convertible currency accepted by the claimants.

B. The Parties' Principal Submissions

246. The Claimant asserts that Saluka has been deprived of the value of its shares in IPB by the Czech Republic's intervention which culminated in the forced administration of IPB.

247. The Claimant further maintains that, in this context, the only issue before the Tribunal is whether this deprivation was unlawful in accordance with the criteria of Article 5.

248. The Claimant concludes that the Czech Republic is liable under Article 5 if it can establish that one or more of the conditions set out in Article 5 has not been complied with, i.e. that:

- (a) the measures depriving Saluka of its investment were not taken in the public interest and under due process of law; or that
- (b) the measures were discriminatory; or that
- (c) the measures were not accompanied by payment of just compensation.

249. In support of its main contention, Saluka, in brief, maintains that the evidence before the Tribunal demonstrates the following:

- (a) The IPB proposal, rejected by the Czech Government, would have cost Czech taxpayers far less than the forced administration option. That option, says Saluka, was thus not in the public interest;
- (b) The Respondent's fact and expert witnesses were unable to point to a precise regulation with respect to a bank's liquidity requirements which had been breached by IPB. There was thus, argues Saluka, no due process;
- (c) The Forced Administrator never exercised truly independent judgment. Again, says Saluka, the forced administration measure was not taken under due process and was discriminatory;
- (d) The Czech Government granted State aid to IPB's competitors, thus infringing, says Saluka, the non-discrimination provision of Article 5;
- (e) The Czech Government resorted to its regulatory power unlawfully for the sole purpose of transferring IPB's business to CSOB. The measure, argues Saluka, was thus clearly discriminatory;
- (f) The Czech Government never paid any compensation to Saluka after having deprived Saluka of its investment.

250. The Czech Republic denies that it has violated Article 5 of the Treaty. In essence, it submits that the measures which it resorted to in order to address the IPB situation in the spring of 2000 and which culminated in the decision by the CNB to put IPB into forced administration were “permissible regulatory actions” which cannot be considered as expropriatory.

251. In support of its principal defense, the Czech Republic also avers that each of the measures cited by Saluka in its attempt to demonstrate that the Czech Republic’s actions were not genuine regulatory measures were indeed authorised by Czech law.

252. Subsidiarily, the Czech Republic argues that, since Saluka sold its IPB shares back to Nomura after June 2000 for the same amount as it purchased them, Saluka “has failed to establish a deprivation of sufficient magnitude to form the basis of an expropriation claim”.

C. The Law

253. The Tribunal agrees with Saluka that the principal, if not the sole, issue which it must determine in the present chapter of its Award is whether the actions by the Czech Republic complained of by the Claimant are lawful or unlawful measures.

254. The Tribunal acknowledges that Article 5 of the Treaty in the present case is drafted very broadly and does not contain any exception for the exercise of regulatory power. However, in using the concept of deprivation, Article 5 imports into the Treaty the customary international law notion that a deprivation can be justified if it results from the exercise of regulatory actions aimed at the maintenance of public order. In interpreting a treaty, account has to be taken of “any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties”<sup>6</sup> – a requirement which the International Court of Justice (“ICJ”) has held includes relevant rules of general customary international law.<sup>7</sup>

255. It is now established in international law that States are not liable to pay compensation to a foreign investor when, in the normal exercise of their regulatory powers, they adopt in a non-discriminatory manner bona fide regulations that are aimed at the general welfare.

256. Nearly forty-five years ago, the Harvard Draft Convention on the International Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens (“Harvard Draft Convention”),<sup>8</sup> which instrument is relied upon by the Czech Republic, recognised the following categories of non-compensable takings:

An uncompensated taking of an alien property or a deprivation of the use or enjoyment of property of an alien which results from the execution of tax laws; from a general change in the value of currency; from the action of the competent authorities of the State in the maintenance of public order, health or morality; or from the valid exercise of belligerent rights or otherwise incidental to the normal operation of the laws of the State shall not be considered wrongful.

257. As Saluka correctly reminded the Tribunal, the above-quoted passage in the Harvard Draft Convention is subject to four important exceptions. An uncompensated taking of the sort referred to shall not be considered unlawful provided that:

- (a) it is not a clear and discriminatory violation of the law of the State concerned;
- (b) it is not the result of a violation of any provision of Articles 6 to 8 [of the draft Convention];
- (c) it is not an unreasonable departure from the principles of justice recognised by the principal legal systems of the world;
- (d) it is not an abuse of the powers specified in this paragraph for the purpose of depriving an alien of his property.

258. These exceptions do not, in any way, weaken the principle that certain takings or deprivations are non-compensable. They merely remind the legislator or, indeed, the adjudicator, that the so-called “police power exception” is not absolute.

259. The Tribunal further recalls that, in an accompanying note to the 1967 OECD Draft Convention on the Protection of Foreign Property,<sup>9</sup> it is provided that measures taken in the pursuit of a State’s “political, social or economic ends” do not constitute compensable expropriation.

260. Similarly, the United States Third Restatement of the Law of Foreign Relations in 1987<sup>10</sup> includes bona fide regulations and “other action of the kind that is commonly accepted as within the police power of State” in the list of permissible – that is, non-compensable – regulatory actions.

261. It is clear that the notion of deprivation, as that word is used in the context of Article 5 of the Treaty, is to be understood in the meaning it has acquired in customary international law.<sup>11</sup>

262. In the opinion of the Tribunal, the principle that a State does not commit an expropriation and is thus not liable to pay compensation to a dispossessed alien investor when it adopts general regulations that are “commonly accepted as within the police power of States” forms part of customary international law today. There is ample case law in support of this proposition. As the tribunal in Methanex Corp. v. USA said recently in its final award, “[i]t is a principle of customary international law that, where economic injury results from a bona fide regulation within the police powers of a State, compensation is not required”.<sup>12</sup>

263. That being said, international law has yet to identify in a comprehensive and definitive fashion precisely what regulations are considered “permissible” and “commonly accepted” as falling within the police or regulatory power of States and, thus, non-compensable. In other words, it has yet to draw a bright and easily distinguishable line between non-compensable regulations on the one hand and, on the other, measures that have the effect of depriving foreign investors of their investment and are thus unlawful and compensable in international law.

264. It thus inevitably falls to the adjudicator to determine whether particular conduct by a state “crosses the line” that separates valid regulatory activity from expropriation. Faced with the question of when, how and at what point an otherwise valid regulation becomes, in fact and effect, an unlawful expropriation, international tribunals must consider the circumstances in which the question arises. The context within which an impugned measure is adopted and applied is critical to the determination of its validity.<sup>13</sup>

265. In the present case, the Tribunal finds that the Czech Republic has not “crossed that line” and did not breach Article 5 of the Treaty, since the measures at issue can be justified as permissible regulatory actions.

D. Analysis and Findings

266. Saluka’s shares in IPB were assets entitled to protection under the Treaty. Pursuant to Article 5 of the Treaty, the Czech Republic was prohibited from taking any measures depriving, directly or indirectly, Saluka of its investment in IPB unless one or more of the cumulative conditions set out in that Article were complied with. If the Tribunal finds that the Czech Republic has adopted such measures without having complied with one or more of these conditions, the conclusion will inevitably follow that the Respondent has breached Article 5 of the Treaty.

267. There can be no doubt, and the Tribunal so finds, that Saluka has been deprived of its investment in IPB as a result of the imposition of the forced administration of the bank by the CNB on 16 June 2000.

268. In Part III of the present Award, the Tribunal has reviewed in considerable detail the facts which led the CNB, on 16 June 2000, to “introduce forced administration” of IPB pursuant to Section 26(1)(d) of the Czech Banking Act.<sup>14</sup>

269. A translation of the CNB decision of 16 June 2000 has been produced as an exhibit before the Tribunal. It sets forth the many reasons which convinced the CNB, as the Czech banking regulator, to decide that the time had come to impose forced administration of IPB and appoint an administrator to exercise the forced administration. The decision also refers to the Czech legislation on which the CNB relied.

270. Rather than attempting to summarise the CNB’s decision, the Tribunal reproduces it here in extenso, in translation supplied by the Respondent:

Decision

On the basis of the establishment that INVESTIČNÍ A POŠTOVNÍ BANKA, akciová společnost, with its registered office in Praha 1, Senovážné nam. 32, IČO (Identification No.): 45 31 66 19 (the “Bank”) continually fails to maintain payment ability both in Czech currency and in foreign currencies and, accordingly, fails to comply with its obligation under Section 14 of Act No. 21/1992 Coll., the Banking Act, as amended (the “Banking Act”), the Czech National Bank has decided, pursuant to the provision of Section 26(1)(d), in accordance with the provisions of Section 30, Section 26(2), Section 26(6) and Section 26(3)(b) and with regard to the provisions of Section 27(1)(a) and (b) of the Banking Act, as follows:

- I. Forced administration shall be introduced in the Bank as of June 16, 2000.

- II. The administrator exercising the forced administration shall be Mr. Petr Staněk, birth number 670725/0847.

Reasoning

Under the provisions of Section 14, of the Banking Act, banks are obligated to continually maintain payment ability both in Czech currency and in foreign currencies. The Czech National Bank has evaluated, on the basis of the findings set forth below, the state of matters as of the date of issue of this Decision with the result that the Bank is in breach of said provision.

In its letter Ref. No. 277/520, dated March 2, 2000, the Czech National Bank requested data on liquidity condition and payment ability of the Bank to be provided by the Bank on a daily basis. In accordance with the Czech National Bank's requirement, the Bank provided, on a daily basis, tables showing the development of primary deposits (deposits from clients) in the preceding two weeks, the development of monitored items of financial market (the so-called liquidity cushion securing the Bank's payment ability) in the preceding two weeks and a summary of the development of primary deposits (deposits from clients) since February 20, 2000. On the basis of the documents provided, the Czech National Bank regularly monitored the development of the Bank's payment ability whose deterioration is shown by the data for the period from February 20, 2000, to June 11, 2000, and further from June 12, 2000 to June 14, 2000.

From the table "Development of primary deposits in the past two weeks in millions of CZK" provided by the Bank in its letter dated June 12, 2000, Ref. No. 1107/00/3-1, the Czech National Bank ascertained that in the period from February 20, 2000, to June 11, 2000, the amount of primary deposits (deposits from clients) decreased in the aggregate from CZK 237,966 million to CZK 204,155 million, i.e., by CZK 33,811 million. At the same time, the Czech National Bank ascertained from the table "Development of monitored items of the financial market in the past two weeks in millions of CZK" provided by the Bank in its letter dated March 6, 2000, Ref. No. 451/2000/3-1 and its letter dated June 12, 2000, Ref. No. 1107/00/3-1 that due to the decrease in the primary deposits (deposits from clients), the financial market balance (the so-called liquidity cushion) decreased from CZK 64,452 million to CZK 38,658 million in that same period.

From the table "Development of primary deposits in the past two weeks in millions of CZK" provided by the Bank in its letter dated June 15, 2000, Ref. No. 1143/00/3-1, the Czech National Bank ascertained that on June 12, 2000, the amount of primary deposits (deposits from clients) decreased in the aggregate from CZK 204,153 million to CZK 199,628 million, i.e., by CZK 4,525 million, on June 13, 2000, it decreased from CZK 199,628 million to CZK 193,664 million, i.e., by CZK 5,964 million, and on June 14, 2000, from CZK 193,664 million to CZK 187,173 million, i.e., by CZK 6,491 million. At the same time, the Czech National Bank ascertained from the table "Development of monitored items of the financial market in the past two weeks in millions of CZK" provided by the Bank in its letter dated June 15, 2000, Ref. No. 1143/00/3-1 that due to the decrease in the primary deposits (deposits from clients) in that period, the financial market balance (the so-called liquidity cushion) decreased on June 12, 2000, from CZK 39,385 million to CZK 34,926 million, i.e., by CZK 4,459 million, on June 13, 2000, it decreased from CZK 34,926 million to CZK 25,446 million, i.e., by CZK 9,480 million, and on June 14, 2000, from CZK 25,446 million to CZK 16,625 million, i.e., by CZK 8,821 million.

The Bank's Board of Directors addressed, in accordance with Section 26b of the Banking Act, a letter dated June 14, 2000, Ref. No. GR 202/2000 to the Czech National Bank stating that as a result of intensified cash and cash-free withdrawals in the last days, the Bank's liquidity condition had significantly deteriorated and a risk existed that if the current trend continued, the Bank could get into a situation where it would no longer be able to maintain the amount of the mandatory minimum reserves and consequently to comply with its obligations under debit clearing transactions, i.e., it would not be able to perform its clients' payment instructions.

The development in the deposits and liquidity cushion at the Bank constitutes a considerable risk from the point of view of a threat to its payment ability since, as established by the Czech National Bank, the current amount of the liquidity cushion that is constantly decreasing is not adequate for the current and constantly increasing requirements of the clients for deposit withdrawals. All factual findings made as of the date of issue of this Decision evidence that the current trend is continuing.

The Czech National Bank is entitled to introduce forced administration pursuant to Section 26(1)(d) of the Banking Act only after it has established deficiencies in a bank's operation. Under the provisions of Section 26(3)(b) of the Banking Act, "deficiencies in a bank's operation" means, among other things, a breach of the Banking Act. It has been unambiguously established on the basis of the aforementioned findings that the Bank has failed to comply with its obligation under Section 14 of the Banking Act. Accordingly it is in breach of that law, and a fundamental deficiency has been ascertained in its operation which deficiency continues.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 30 of the Banking Act, the Czech National Bank is entitled to introduce forced administration in a bank if the deficiencies in such bank's operation endanger the stability of the banking system. According to the findings made by the Czech National Bank, this legal condition is fulfilled on the following grounds.

In 1999, the Bank ranked second within the interbank payment system of the Czech Republic in terms of the amount of payments processed – the Bank received and dispatched 2.3 million transactions totaling CZK 2,000 billion.

Second, according to the data stated in the statement "Bil 1-12. Monthly statement of assets and liabilities" as at April 30, 2000, the Bank's share in the amount of deposits from the public within the banking sector of the Czech Republic is 22% while its shares in the aggregate amount of assets within the banking sector of the Czech Republic amounts to 13.2% and the number of its clients is over 2.9 million.

In addition, the Bank is a major shareholder of two other banks operating in the Czech Republic, namely Českomoravská stavební spořitelna, akciová společnost, the leading building and loan association in the building loan market in the Czech Republic, and Českomoravská hypoteční banka, a.s., the leading bank in the mortgage-backed loan market in the Czech Republic. The severe financial condition of the Bank contests its position as the major shareholder or shareholder with the decisive controlling influence of these banks and is a threat to these banks' position.

On the basis of the above, the Czech National Bank holds as evidenced that the Bank directly endangers the stability of the banking system of the Czech Republic.

The Bank is a significant debtor of other banks, consequently its lower payment ability is liable to adversely affect the payment ability of the banks that are its creditors. In addition, the Bank administers funds of many entities whose inability to pay caused by the Bank (the Bank's low liquidity) would result in serious consequences, whether direct or indirect, for the creditors of such entities including, without limitation, other banks constituting the banking system. Given the above, the Bank participates to a significant extent in the functioning of the entire banking system. The fact that, according to the notice given by its own statutory bodies, it may not be able to maintain its payment ability endangers the stability of the banking system in its entirety.

All the above facts with respect to the Bank's share in the interbank payment system, in the amount of deposits from the public within the banking sector, in the aggregate amount of assets within the banking sector, the number of its clients and its significant position as a shareholder evidence that the serious difficulties in the Bank's payment ability endanger the stability of the banking system in the Czech Republic to a considerable extent.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 30 of the Banking Act, the Czech National Bank is entitled to introduce forced administration in a bank if such bank's shareholders have failed to take necessary measures to correct deficiencies. The effect of such measures may be measured only by the result, i.e., improvement in such bank's payment ability. According to the data ascertained with respect to the Bank's payment ability, it is evident that the situation of the Bank necessitates an immediate solution. The constant deterioration of the Bank's payment ability demonstrates that either the Bank's shareholders have failed to take appropriate measures securing the permanent payment ability of the Bank or such measures have been insufficient and ineffective as the Bank's payment ability is markedly deteriorating. The foregoing is implied both by the Czech National Bank's own findings and by the information contained in the letter from the Bank's Board of Directors, dated June 14, 2000, delivered to the Czech National Bank on June 15, 2000.

Based on the above, the Czech National Bank holds as evidenced that the conditions for the introduction of forced administration in the Bank, as set forth in the provisions of Section 26(1)(d) and Section 30 of the Banking Act with respect to the introduction of forced administration in a bank, are fulfilled.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 2 of Act No. 6/1993 Coll., the Czech National Bank Act, as amended (the "Czech National Bank Act"), the responsibilities of the Czech National Bank include the management of monetary circulation and payments including banking clearance, maintaining the continuity and efficiency thereof, exercise of supervision over banking activities and maintaining the safe functioning and purposeful development of the banking system in the Czech Republic.

In addition, the Czech National Bank is responsible, under the provisions of Section 44(1)(a) of the Czech National Bank Act, for the exercise of supervision over banking activities and the safe functioning of the banking system. Given the critical financial condition of the Bank and with regard to the threat to the stability of the banking system constituted by the aforementioned deficiency in the Bank's operations as well as the failure of the Bank's shareholders to take necessary measures to correct such deficiencies, the Czech National Bank must avoid a situation where a panic among the Bank's depositors would result in a permanent destabilization of its operations and consequently in undermined confidence in the banking system in its entirety. By the introduction of forced administration, the Czech National Bank prevents further gradation of the Bank's critical situation.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 26(2) of the Banking Act, the Czech National Bank is obligated to decide on the introduction of forced administration upon a bank's failure to correct deficiencies on the Czech National Bank's demand made pursuant to Section 26(1)(a) of the Banking Act. However, pursuant to Section 26(2) of the Banking Act, the Czech National Bank may introduce forced administration without a demand for correcting measures under Section 26(1)(a) of the Banking Act if the matter cannot withstand delay.

On the basis of the information ascertained by the Czech National Bank, it is incontestable that the Bank's payment ability is rapidly and significantly deteriorating and, consequently, the Czech National Bank considers the introduction of forced administration to be a matter that cannot withstand delay.

The Czech National Bank has requested, in accordance with the provisions of Section 30 of the Banking Act, the standpoint of the Ministry of Finance with respect to the introduction of forced administration. In its standpoint dated June 16, 2000, the Ministry of Finance consented to the introduction of forced administration.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 28(1) of the Banking Act, the Banking Board has the obligation to appoint the administrator charged with the exercise of forced administration and determine the amount of his remuneration. However, pursuant to the provision of Section 27(1)(b) of the Banking Act, the decision on the introduction of forced administration must include, in addition to the grounds for the introduction of forced administration, also the name, surname and birth code of the administrator.

Advice on Appeal

An appeal may be lodged against this Decision pursuant to Section 61(1) of Act No. 71/1967 Coll., the Administrative Procedural Code (the Administrative Code), as amended, with the Czech National Bank, Na Příkopě 28, Praha 1, PSČ 115 03, within 15 days of the delivery hereof. In accordance with the provisions of Section 41(1) of the Banking Act, the Banking Board of the Czech National Bank decides on the appeal. An appeal lodged has no suspensive effect.

This Decision is addressed to:
INVESTIČNÍ A POŠTOVNÍ BANKA, akciová společnost
Senovazné nam. 32
Praha 1

271. As will be seen, the CNB's decision is fully motivated. Having reviewed the totality of the evidence which the CNB invoked in support of its decision, the Tribunal is of the view that the CNB was justified, under Czech law, in imposing the forced administration of IPB and appointing an administrator to exercise the forced administration.

272. The Czech State, in the person of its banking regulator, the CNB, had the responsibility to take a decision on 16 June 2000. It enjoyed a margin of discretion in the exercise of that responsibility. In reaching its decision, it took into consideration facts which, in the opinion of the Tribunal, it was very reasonable for it to consider. It then applied the pertinent Czech legislation to those facts – again, in a manner that the Tribunal considers reasonable.

273. In the absence of clear and compelling evidence that the CNB erred or acted otherwise improperly in reaching its decision, which evidence has not been presented to the Tribunal, the Tribunal must in the circumstances accept the justification given by the Czech banking regulator for its decision.

274. The Tribunal notes, additionally, that the decision of the CNB was confirmed by the CNB Appellant Board and subsequently upheld by the City Court in Prague on two occasions, firstly on an appeal lodged by three members of IPB's Board of Directors and later on an appeal lodged by Saluka itself.

275. The CNB's decision is, in the opinion of the Tribunal, a lawful and permissible regulatory action by the Czech Republic aimed at the general welfare of the State, and does not fall within the ambit of any of the exceptions to the permissibility of regulatory action which are recognised by customary international law. Accordingly, the CNB's decision did not, fall within the notion of a "deprivation" referred to in Article 5 of the Treaty, and thus did not involve a breach of the Respondent's obligations under that Article.

E. Conclusion

276. In summary, the Tribunal finds, based on the totality of the evidence which has been presented to it, that in imposing the forced administration of IPB on 16 June 2000 the Czech Republic adopted a measure which was valid and permissible as within its regulatory powers, notwithstanding that the measure had the effect of eviscerating Saluka's investment in IPB.

277. Having so determined, it is not necessary for the Tribunal to address the Respondent's subsidiary argument that, because Saluka sold its IPB shares back to Nomura after June 2000 for the same amount as it purchased those shares, the Claimant has failed to establish a deprivation of sufficient magnitude to form the basis of an expropriation claim.<sup>15</sup>

278. The Tribunal, in this Chapter of the present Award dealing with Saluka's claim that the Czech Republic breached Article 5 of the Treaty, does not consider the Claimant's allegations that the Czech Republic was an accessory to CSOB's alleged plan to take over IPB, that the Forced Administrator did not exercise truly independent judgment or that the Czech Government discriminated against IPB by granting State aid to Saluka's competitors. In the view of the Tribunal, these allegations, even if proven, would not rise to the level of a breach of Article 5. They will in any event be considered in the next Chapter of this Award that addresses the alleged breach by the Respondent of Article 3 of the Treaty.

VI. SALUKA'S CLAIMS UNDER ARTICLE 3 OF THE TREATY

279. The way in which events unfolded with respect to Saluka's shareholding in IPB amounted, in the Claimant's view, to a breach by the Czech Republic of its obligation under Article 3 of the Treaty. The Respondent has denied that it breached Article 3 of the Treaty.

280. Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Treaty provided that:

1. Each Contracting Party shall ensure fair and equitable treatment to the investments of investors of the other Contracting Party and shall not impair, by unreasonable or discriminatory measures, the operation, management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal thereof by those investors.
2. More particularly, each Contracting Party shall accord to such investments full security and protection which in any case shall not be less than that accorded either to investments of its own investors or to investments of investors of any third States, whichever is more favourable to the investor concerned.

281. For reasons set out below, the Tribunal finds that the treatment accorded to Saluka's investment by the Czech Republic

- (a) was in some respects unfair and inequitable, and
- (b) impaired, by certain unreasonable and discriminatory measures, the enjoyment of such investment by Saluka, and that the Czech Republic has therefore violated Article 3 of the Treaty.

A. The Content of the Czech Republic's Obligations under Article 3 of the Treaty

282. Article 3.1 of the Treaty requires the signatory governments to treat investments of investors of the other Contracting Party according to the standards of "fairness" and "equity" and to avoid impairment of such investments by measures which are not in compliance with the standards of "reasonableness" and "non-discrimination". It is common ground that such general standards represent principles that cannot be reduced to precise statements of rules.

283. Even though Article 3.2 sets out, "more particularly", obligations to accord "full security and protection" as well as national and most-favoured-nation treatment, these formulations are merely indicative and are not exhaustive of the scope of the general standards laid down in Article 3.1. Furthermore, a violation of the national and most-favoured-nation treatment obligations is not at issue here, and "full security and protection" is not less general a formulation than the standards set out in Article 3.1.

284. This does not imply, however, that such standards as laid down in Article 3 of the Treaty would invite the Tribunal to decide the dispute in a way that resembles a decision ex aequo et bono. This Tribunal is bound by Article 6 of the Treaty to decide the dispute on the basis of the law, including the provisions of the Treaty. Even though Article 3 obviously leaves room for judgment and appreciation by the Tribunal, it does not set out totally subjective standards which would allow the Tribunal to substitute, with regard to the Czech Republic's conduct to be assessed in the present case, its judgment on the choice of solutions for the Czech Republic's.<sup>16</sup> As the tribunal in S.D. Myers has said, the "fair and equitable treatment" standard does not create an "open-ended mandate to second-guess government decision-making".<sup>17</sup> The standards formulated in Article 3 of the Treaty, vague as they may be, are susceptible of specification through judicial practice and do in fact have sufficient legal content to allow the case to be decided on the basis of law. Over the last few years, a number of awards have dealt with such standards yielding a fair amount of practice that sheds light on their legal meaning.<sup>18</sup>

B. Fair and Equitable Treatment

1. Meaning of the Standard

a) The Parties' Arguments

285. There is agreement between the parties that the determination of the legal meaning of the "fair and equitable treatment" standard is a matter of appreciation by the Tribunal in light of all relevant circumstances. As the tribunal in Mondev has stated, "[a] judgment of what is fair and equitable cannot be reached in the abstract; it must depend on the facts of the particular case".<sup>19</sup> There is disagreement between the parties, however, about the limits of such appreciation. These limits are reflected in the threshold that is relevant for the determination of the unlawfulness of the Czech Republic's conduct in the present case.

286. The Claimant argues that the standard is a specific and autonomous Treaty standard. Since it is not in any way qualified, it should be interpreted broadly. The Claimant relies, inter alia, on Pope & Talbot, Inc. v. The Government of Canada, where the arbitral tribunal stated that guarantees similar to those contained in Article 3 of the Treaty do not limit an investor's recourse to protection only against conduct that is "egregiously unfair", but rather are meant to ensure "the kind of hospitable climate that would insulate them from political risks or incidents of unfair treatment".<sup>20</sup>

287. According to the Claimant, Article 3.1 does not refer to any high threshold of unreasonableness or flagrancy of the conduct constituting a breach and it must be interpreted broadly enough to translate into real and effective protection of the type that would encourage investors to participate in the economy of the host State.

288. The Claimant endorses, however, and commends as a useful guide, even in the present context, the threshold defined by the Tribunal in Waste Management, Inc. v. United Mexican States, which held that the fair and equitable treatment standard in Article 1105(1) of the North American Free Trade Agreement ("NAFTA")<sup>21</sup> is infringed if the conduct of the State is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice, or involves a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety – as might be the case with a manifest failure of natural justice in judicial proceedings or a complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process.<sup>22</sup>

289. The Respondent argues that the standard laid down in Article 3.1 conforms in effect to the “minimum standard” which forms part of customary international law. The Respondent relies, inter alia, on the Genin award where the tribunal interpreted the “fair and equitable treatment” standard indeed as “a minimum standard”. The Genin tribunal held that:

acts that would violate this minimum standard would include acts showing a wilful neglect of duty, an insufficiency of action falling far below international standards, or even subjective bad faith.<sup>23</sup>

290. For the determination of the relevant threshold, the Respondent also refers the Tribunal to the historical development of the customary minimum standard and, in particular, to the Neer case where it was held that the treatment of aliens, in order to constitute an international delinquency, should amount to an outrage, to bad faith, to willful neglect of duty, or to an insufficiency of governmental action so far short of international standards that every reasonable and impartial man would recognize its insufficiency.<sup>24</sup>

the governmental action in question was willfully wrong, actually malicious, or so far beyond the pale that it cannot be defended among reasonable members of the international community.

291. Whatever the merits of this controversy between the parties may be, it appears that the difference between the Treaty standard laid down in Article 3.1 and the customary minimum standard, when applied to the specific facts of a case, may well be more apparent than real. To the extent that the case law reveals different formulations of the relevant thresholds, an in-depth analysis may well demonstrate that they could be explained by the contextual and factual differences of the cases to which the standards have been applied.

292. Also, it should be kept in mind that the customary minimum standard is in any case binding upon a State and provides a minimum guarantee to foreign investors, even where the State follows a policy that is in principle opposed to foreign investment; in that context, the minimum standard of “fair and equitable treatment” may in fact provide no more than “minimal” protection. Consequently, in order to violate that standard, States’ conduct may have to display a relatively higher degree of inappropriateness.

293. Bilateral investment treaties, however, are designed to promote foreign direct investment as between the Contracting Parties; in this context, investors’ protection by the “fair and equitable treatment” standard is meant to be a guarantee providing a positive incentive for foreign investors. Consequently, in order to violate the standard, it may be sufficient that States’ conduct displays a relatively lower degree of inappropriateness.

294. Whichever the difference between the customary and the treaty standards may be, this Tribunal has to limit itself to the interpretation of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard as embodied in Article 3.1 of the Treaty. That Article omits any express reference to the customary minimum standard. The interpretation of Article 3.1 does not therefore share the difficulties that may arise under treaties (such as the NAFTA) which expressly tie the “fair and equitable treatment” standard to the customary minimum standard.<sup>25</sup> Avoidance of these difficulties may even be regarded as the very purpose of the lack of a reference to an international standard in the Treaty.<sup>26</sup> This clearly points to the autonomous character of a “fair and equitable treatment” standard such as the one laid down in Article 3.1 of the Treaty.

295. Moreover, the Tribunal is not convinced that, as the Respondent suggests, Article 3.1 at least implicitly incorporates the customary minimum standard. The Genin case on which the Respondent relies does not support this suggestion. The Genin tribunal merely held that a BIT standard of “fair and equitable” treatment provides “a basic and general standard which is detached from the host States’ domestic law”.<sup>27</sup> This standard is characterised by the Genin tribunal as “an” international minimum standard, not as “the” international minimum standard. Far from equating the BIT’s standard with the customary minimum standard, the Genin tribunal merely emphasised that the “fair and equitable treatment” standard requires the Contracting States to accord to foreign investors treatment which does not fall below a certain minimum, this minimum being in any case detached from any lower minimum standard of treatment that may prevail in the domestic laws of the Contracting States. Also, the way the Genin tribunal defined the threshold for the finding of a violation of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard<sup>28</sup> does not incorporate the traditional Neer formula<sup>29</sup> which reflects the traditional, and not necessarily the contemporary, definition of the customary minimum standard, at least in certain non-investment fields.

b) The Tribunal’s Interpretation

296. In order to give specific content of the Czech Republic’s general obligation to accord “fair and equitable treatment” to Saluka’s investment in IPB shares, this Tribunal, being established under the Treaty, has to interpret Article 3 in accordance with the rules of interpretation laid down in the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (the “Vienna Convention”).<sup>30</sup> These rules are binding upon the Contracting Parties to the Treaty,<sup>31</sup> and also represent customary international law. Article 31.1 of the Vienna Convention requires that a treaty is interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.

i) The Ordinary Meaning

297. The “ordinary meaning” of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard can only be defined by terms of almost equal vagueness. In MTD, the tribunal stated that:

In their ordinary meaning, the terms “fair” and “equitable” [...] mean “just”, “even-handed”, “unbiased”, “legitimate”.<sup>32</sup>

On the basis of such and similar definitions, one cannot say much more than the tribunal did in S.D. Myers by stating that an infringement of the standard requires treatment in such an unjust or arbitrary manner that the treatment rises to the level that is unacceptable from the international perspective.<sup>33</sup>

This is probably as far as one can get by looking at the “ordinary meaning” of the terms of Article 3.1 of the Treaty.

ii) The Context

298. The immediate “context” in which the “fair and equitable” language of Article 3.1 is used relates to the level of treatment to be accorded by each of the Contracting Parties to the investments of investors of the other Contracting Party. The broader “context” in which the terms of Article 3.1 must be seen includes the other provisions of the Treaty. In the preamble of the Treaty, the Contracting Parties recognize[d] that agreement upon the treatment to be accorded to such investments will stimulate the flow of capital and technology and the economic development of the Contracting Parties and that fair and equitable treatment is desirable.

The preamble thus links the “fair and equitable treatment” standard directly to the stimulation of foreign investments and to the economic development of both Contracting Parties.

iii) The Object and Purpose of the Treaty

299. The “object and purpose” of the Treaty may be discerned from its title and preamble. These read:

Agreement on encouragement and reciprocal protection of investments between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic

The Government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands

And

The Government of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, hereinafter referred to as the Contracting Parties,

Desiring to extend and intensify the economic relations between them particularly with respect to investments by the investor of one Contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party,

Recognizing that agreement upon the treatment to be accorded to such investments will stimulate the flow of capital and technology and the economic development of the Contracting Parties and that fair and equitable treatment is desirable.

Taking note of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, signed on August, 1st 1975 in Helsinki.

300. This is a more subtle and balanced statement of the Treaty's aims than is sometimes appreciated. The protection of foreign investments is not the sole aim of the Treaty, but rather a necessary element alongside the overall aim of encouraging foreign investment and extending and intensifying the parties' economic relations. That in turn calls for a balanced approach to the interpretation of the Treaty's substantive provisions for the protection of investments, since an interpretation which exaggerates the protection to be accorded to foreign investments may serve to dissuade host States from admitting foreign investments and so undermine the overall aim of extending and intensifying the parties' mutual economic relations.

301. Seen in this light, the "fair and equitable treatment" standard prescribed in the Treaty should therefore be understood to be treatment which, if not proactively stimulating the inflow of foreign investment capital, does at least not deter foreign capital by providing disincentives to foreign investors. An investor's decision to make an investment is based on an assessment of the state of the law and the totality of the business environment at the time of the investment as well as on the investor's expectation that the conduct of the host State subsequent to the investment will be fair and equitable.

302. The standard of "fair and equitable treatment" is therefore closely tied to the notion of legitimate expectations<sup>34</sup> which is the dominant element of that standard. By virtue of the "fair and equitable treatment" standard included in Article 3.1 the Czech Republic must therefore be regarded as having assumed an obligation to treat foreign investors so as to avoid the frustration of investors' legitimate and reasonable expectations. As the tribunal in Tecmed stated, the obligation to provide "fair and equitable treatment" means:

to provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment.<sup>35</sup>

Also, in CME, the tribunal concluded that the Czech authority breached its obligation of fair and equitable treatment by evisceration of the arrangements in reliance upon which the foreign investor was induced to invest.<sup>36</sup>

The tribunal in Waste Management equally stated that:

In applying [the "fair and equitable treatment"] standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.<sup>37</sup>

303. The expectations of foreign investors certainly include the observation by the host State of such well-established fundamental standards as good faith, due process, and non-discrimination.<sup>38</sup> And the tribunal in OEPC went even as far as stating that

304. This Tribunal would observe, however, that while it subscribes to the general thrust of these and similar statements, it may be that, if their terms were to be taken too literally, they would impose upon host States' obligations which would be inappropriate and unrealistic. Moreover, the scope of the Treaty's protection of foreign investment against unfair and inequitable treatment cannot exclusively be determined by foreign investors' subjective motivations and considerations. Their expectations, in order for them to be protected, must rise to the level of legitimacy and reasonableness in light of the circumstances.

305. No investor may reasonably expect that the circumstances prevailing at the time the investment is made remain totally unchanged. In order to determine whether frustration of the foreign investor's expectations was justified and reasonable, the host State's legitimate right subsequently to regulate domestic matters in the public interest must be taken into consideration as well. As the S.D. Myers tribunal has stated, the determination of a breach of the obligation of "fair and equitable treatment" by the host State must be made in the light of the high measure of deference that international law generally extends to the right of domestic authorities to regulate matters within their own borders.<sup>40</sup>

306. The determination of a breach of Article 3.1 by the Czech Republic therefore requires a weighing of the Claimant's legitimate and reasonable expectations on the one hand and the Respondent's legitimate regulatory interests on the other.

307. A foreign investor protected by the Treaty may in any case properly expect that the Czech Republic implements its policies bona fide by conduct that is, as far as it affects the investors' investment, reasonably justifiable by public policies and that such conduct does not manifestly violate the requirements of consistency, transparency, even-handedness and non-discrimination. In particular, any differential treatment of a foreign investor must not be based on unreasonable distinctions and demands, and must be justified by showing that it bears a reasonable relationship to rational policies not motivated by a preference for other investments over the foreign-owned investment.

308. Finally, it transpires from arbitral practice that, according to the "fair and equitable treatment" standard, the host State must never disregard the principles of procedural propriety and due process<sup>41</sup> and must grant the investor freedom from coercion or harassment by its own regulatory authorities.

iv) Conclusion

309. The "fair and equitable treatment" standard in Article 3.1 of the Treaty is an autonomous Treaty standard and must be interpreted, in light of the object and purpose of the Treaty, so as to avoid conduct of the Czech Republic that clearly provides disincentives to foreign investors. The Czech Republic, without undermining its legitimate right to take measures for the protection of the public interest, has therefore assumed an obligation to treat a foreign investor's investment in a way that does not frustrate the investor's underlying legitimate and reasonable expectations. A foreign investor whose interests are protected under the Treaty is entitled to expect that the Czech Republic will not act in a way that is manifestly inconsistent, non-transparent, unreasonable (i.e. unrelated to some rational policy), or discriminatory (i.e. based on unjustifiable distinctions). In applying this standard, the Tribunal will have due regard to all relevant circumstances.

2. Application of the Standard

310. In applying Article 3 of the Treaty to the present case, the Claimant contends that the Czech Republic has violated the “fair and equitable treatment” standard in Article 3.1 of the Treaty in a number of ways. The Claimant principally contends that

(a) the Czech Republic gave a discriminatory response to the systemic bad debt problem in the Czech banking sector, especially by providing State financial assistance to the other Big Four banks to the exclusion of IPB, and thereby created an environment impossible for the survival of IPB;

(b) the Czech Republic failed to ensure a predictable and transparent framework for Saluka’s investment;

(c) the Czech Republic’s refusal to negotiate with IPB and its shareholders in good faith prior to the forced administration was unreasonable and discriminatory;

(d) the provision by the Czech Republic of massive financial assistance to IPB’s business, once the beneficiary of such assistance had become CSOB following the forced administration, was unfair and inequitable; and

(e) the Czech Republic’s failure to prevent the unjust enrichment of CSOB at the expense of the IPB shareholders, including Saluka, upon the transfer of IPB’s business to CSOB and the aforementioned State aid following the forced administration was equally unfair and inequitable.

311. The Tribunal will examine each of these claims separately.

a) The Czech Republic’s Discriminatory Response to the Bad Debt Problem

312. The Claimant contends that, whereas the “systemic” bad debt problem which contributed to the serious difficulties of the Czech banking sector from 1998 to 2000 equally affected the Big Four banks (i.e. IPB, KB, CS and CSOB), the Czech Republic, in assisting these banks to overcome the problem, treated IPB differently in an unreasonable way which made it impossible for IPB to survive, especially by excluding IPB from the state assistance that was granted to its competitors, and which resulted in Saluka’s loss of its investment.

313. State conduct is discriminatory, if (i) similar cases are (ii) treated differently (iii) and without reasonable justification.

i) Comparable Position of the Big Four Banks regarding the Bad Debt Problem

314. According to the Claimant, the Big Four banks were in a comparable position in terms of their macroeconomic significance in the transitional period of the Czech Republic and their resulting share of the systemic bad debt problem.

315. By 1998 all of them had large non-performing loan portfolios and they were equally suffering from inadequacies of the legal regime for the enforcement of collateral rights. The impact of these bad debts was felt by all of the Big Four banks, although to different degrees. IPB, KB and CS suffered heavily, and only CSOB was relatively better off.

316. Another factor that the Big Four banks had in common was that they were all equally exposed to the increasingly rigorous banking supervision by the CNB and to the prudential standards that were drastically tightened by the CNB in order to bring them into line with the norms of the European Union. These measures resulted in major increases in loan loss provisions which caused losses that, in the longer term, none of these banks was able to absorb by drawing upon shareholder equity. Beyond a certain point the survival of all the banks was dependent upon some form of assistance from the Czech State.

317. The Claimant has put much emphasis on the “systemic” nature of the bad loan problem that affected the Big Four banks from 1998 to 2000. The Claimant has referred in this context to an International Monetary Fund (“IMF”) Report, defining a problem as “systemic” where the affected banks hold, in the aggregate, at least 20% of the total deposits of the banking system.<sup>42</sup>

318. The Respondent has denied that IPB’s position was comparable with the position of the other three of the Big Four banks. Much emphasis is put by the Respondent on the fact that IPB had already been privatised, whereas the State still held large blocks of shares in KB, CS and CSOB. Furthermore, the financial difficulties with which IPB was faced are said to have been caused by mismanagement and irresponsible lending practices. The Respondent has, inter alia, referred to a CNB inspection report of 25 February 2000 which had identified serious deficiencies regarding IPB’s internal organisation and operation.

319. The Tribunal is not convinced that the increasing financial difficulties with which IPB was faced and that finally resulted in its forced administration were predominantly due to bad banking management and organisational deficiencies. Even though the irregularities identified in the CNB inspection report of 25 February 2000 were serious and must have to some extent contributed to IPB’s problems, it can hardly be disputed that the bad debt problem still lay at the heart of IPB’s difficulties. In the autumn of 1999 it became abundantly clear that IPB needed more than a correction of the irregularities identified by the CNB. The CNB itself requested a significant increase in IPB’s equity capital. It is therefore not plausible that, had IPB solved the organisational problems identified by the CNB, it would no longer have suffered from its large non-performing loan portfolio and from the insufficiency of its regulatory capital.

320. The expert witnesses introduced by the Respondent have reported a number of differences between IPB and its competitors as far as liquidity, credit rating and business strategies are concerned. The expert witnesses introduced by the Claimant have, however, questioned the validity of these findings and have arrived at the opposite conclusions. The Tribunal does not find that the evidence placed before it enables it to conclude that IPB differed sufficiently drastically from the other Big Four banks with regard to the risks involved in its lending policies so as to warrant a finding that the financial problems with which IPB was faced could not be attributed predominantly to the bad debt problem that plagued all the Big Four banks equally.

321. The Respondent also disagrees with the Claimant's characterisation of the bad debt problem as being "systemic". According to the Respondent, a "systemic" crisis is one affecting the entire commercial banking industry. The Claimant had not shown, however, that this had been the case. More than fifty of the other Czech commercial banks holding more than 30% of the country's banking assets had not at all been taken into consideration by the Claimant.

322. The Tribunal finds that, irrespective of whether the bad debt problem with which the Big Four banks were faced from 1998 to 2000 may properly be characterised as "systemic" or not, these banks were in a sufficiently comparable situation: All of them had large non-performing loan portfolios resulting in increased provisions and consequently in insufficient regulatory capital. None of them was able to absorb the losses by calling on shareholder equity. The survival of all of them was sooner or later seriously threatened unless the Czech State was willing to provide financial assistance. On the other hand, due to the macroeconomic significance of the Big Four banks, the Czech State apparently could not afford to let any one of these banks fail. And, as set out below, the Czech State did in fact sooner or later provide such assistance to all of them, including IPB after it had been acquired by CSOB. The Czech Government therefore has implicitly recognised that all the Big Four banks were in a comparable situation.

323. Consequently, as far as the Claimant is concerned, Nomura (and subsequently Saluka) was justified in expecting that the Czech Republic, should it consider and provide financial assistance to the Big Four banks, would do so in an even-handed and consistent manner so as to include rather than exclude IPB.

ii) Differential Treatment of IPB Regarding State Assistance

324. In 1997 and 1998 the Czech Government began to develop a strategy of dealing with the bad debt problem at the enterprise level. According to this strategy, the Government would directly finance the forgiveness of the indebted companies and provide guarantees for new loans (the so-called "Revitalisation Programme"). Consequently, the Government took a negative position towards financial assistance for the banking sector. This approach was clearly stated by the Czech Government at the time IPB was privatised (by way of the sale of the State's 36% shareholding to Nomura on 8 March 1998). The Czech Government was, however, careful not to give Nomura any assurance that this policy would never be changed by future Governments with regard to the privatisation of one or other of IPB's competitors.

325. Since the bad debt problem became worse, however, the Czech Government changed its policy and did in fact take a number of steps to assist the other of the Big Four banks to overcome the financial difficulties with which they were faced. These measures were also deliberately taken in order to prepare IPB's competitors for privatisation. CSOB was privatised in 1999 (by way of a sale of the State's 65.69% shareholding to KBC of Belgium), CS was privatised in 2000 (by way of a sale of the State's 53.07% shareholding to Erste Bank of Austria), and KB was privatised in 2001 (by way of a sale of the State's 60% shareholding to Société Générale S.A.). All three banks had received considerable financial assistance from the Czech Republic before privatisation took place. Without such assistance, privatisation would clearly not have been possible.

326. IPB had also received some financial assistance before its privatisation. After Nomura had acquired its IPB shareholding, however, IPB was excluded as a beneficiary from the Revitalisation Programme as well as from the Czech Government's strategy to solve the bad debt problem of IPB's competitors by the provision of direct financial assistance to the banks. Only in the course of CSOB's acquisition of IPB's business during IPB's forced administration was considerable financial assistance from the Czech Government forthcoming. It follows that IPB has clearly been treated differently.

iii) Lack of a Reasonable Justification

327. The Respondent has argued that this differential treatment of IPB was justified for a number reasons.

328. Firstly, the Respondent argues that Nomura was not given any assurance that its competitors would be privatised in the same way as IPB, i.e. without previous support allowing them to get rid of the problems involved in the non-performing loan portfolios.

329. The Tribunal finds that the Claimant's reasonable expectations to be entitled to protection under the Treaty need not be based on an explicit assurance from the Czech Government. It is sufficient that Nomura (and subsequently Saluka), when making its investment, could reasonably expect that, should serious financial problems arise in the future for all of the Big Four banks equally and in case the Czech Government should consider and provide financial support to overcome these problems, it would do so in a consistent and even-handed way.

330. Secondly, the Respondent argues that Nomura (and subsequently Saluka) had no reason to expect that the Czech Government would be willing to alleviate IPB's future problems by providing State financial assistance, since Nomura, having gone through an extensive due diligence, had been aware of the risks involved in acquiring the shareholding in IPB. Nomura is even said to have known before it made its investment that the Czech Government planned to give aid to the other three of the Big Four banks during their privatisation. Nomura had therefore voluntarily assumed these risks and they were reflected in the share price paid by Nomura. Once these risks had materialised, Nomura (and subsequently Saluka) should not be allowed to ask for assistance.

331. On the basis of the available evidence, the Tribunal finds that the Czech Government changed its policy of non-assistance only after Nomura had acquired the shareholding in IPB on March 8, 1998. The earliest hint of such policy change was contained in a letter from the head of the NPF, Mr Ceska, to the chairmen of the boards of directors of KB, CS and CSOB dated 21 April 1998 which contained the following statement:

We further confirm that, during the period prior to the full privatisation of the banks as aforesaid, we are ready to take such steps within our authority and power as shareholder of each of the banks [to ensure that the banks] comply with all regulatory requirements applicable to them, including capital adequacy and liquidity.

On 27 May 1998 the Government passed the following resolution:

The Government states that it is aware of its responsibility for the financial stability of the joint stock companies CSOB, KB and CS and that it is ready to secure such financial stability until the completion of the privatisation of those joint-stock companies.<sup>43</sup>

332. Furthermore, whatever the scope of Nomura's due diligence may have been, it could not possibly lead to a reliable forecast as to which policies future governments would adopt should an aggravation of the bad debt problem occur as it did after Nomura had made its investment. Therefore, the Claimant cannot be said to have assumed the risk of being treated differently when the Czech Government in fact decided to step in with financial assistance.

333. Thirdly, the Respondent argues that the Claimant was the dominant shareholder of IPB and should therefore itself have rescued IPB by providing the necessary additional capital. The Czech Republic therefore considers itself justified in expecting that the Claimant would have acted as a responsible strategic investor. Also, by providing the necessary financial support to IPB's competitors, the Czech Republic considers itself to have in fact done no more than act as a responsible shareholder. In doing so, the Czech Republic considers itself to have been justified in limiting its assistance to its own banks.

334. The Tribunal finds that Nomura cannot be said to have entered IPB as a strategic investor. Nomura has made it sufficiently clear from the beginning that it came as a portfolio investor acquiring a considerable block of shares with a view to selling it once IPB had improved and the value of its shares had appreciated. The Claimant as a private investor could not reasonably be expected to provide new capital unless this could be done on commercial terms. In this respect the Claimant was in a position similar to an investor acquiring a shareholding in IPB's still-to-be-privatised competitors: unless the bad debt problem was taken care of by financial assistance from the State, no new (or additional) private investment could reasonably be expected in any of the Big Four banks. The Czech Government implicitly recognised this when it provided considerable support to IPB's business upon the acquisition of IPB's business by CSOB.

335. Furthermore, it is less than plausible that, by granting State aid to one or other of the Big Four banks, the Czech Republic acted exclusively as a shareholder. Even though the Government may have expected to secure a better price for the shares when the other banks were privatised, this would not have been a commercially rational conduct. If that had been the motivation, the Czech Republic could just as well have saved the financial resources used for the provision of State aid and sold the shares at a lower price. Recovering the State aid by selling the shares at a higher price would have merely caused additional transaction costs. Anyway, even when acting in its role as a shareholder of IPB's competitors, the Czech Republic could not at the same time disregard its role as the regulator of the banking sector who was responsible for somehow resolving the bad debt problem with which all the Big Four banks were faced. Consequently, by insisting on its role as shareholder in the other three banks the Czech Republic cannot reasonably justify the differential treatment of IPB. Also, once IPB's business was acquired by CSOB in the course of IPB's forced administration, the Czech Government abandoned its position and did in fact provide considerable financial assistance for IPB's business.

336. Fourthly, the Respondent argues that the financial assistance granted to IPB's competitors was closely linked to the Czech Government's privatisation strategy. The Czech State still held large blocks of shares in KB, CS and CSOB which could have been privatised either on an "as is" basis or after clearing of the non-performing loan portfolios. It is said to have been in the discretion of the Czech State to make this policy choice.

337. It is clearly not for this Tribunal to second-guess the Czech Government's privatisation policies. It was perfectly legitimate for the Government to sell its stakes in the remaining banks only after they had been relieved from the bad debt problem. This, however, did not at the same time relieve the Czech Government from complying with its obligation of non-discriminatory treatment of IPB. The Czech Republic, once it had decided to bind itself by the Treaty to accord "fair and equitable treatment" to investors of the other Contracting Party, was bound to implement its policies, including its privatisation strategies, in a way that did not lead to unjustified differential treatment unlawful under the Treaty.

338. Fifthly, the Respondent argues that, had IPB also received financial assistance, the benefits from clearing the non-performing loan portfolio would have accrued to IPB's private shareholders, whereas in case of the other three of the Big Four banks the benefits accrued to the Czech State itself which at the time was their dominant shareholder. This position is belied by the fact that at the time the Czech Republic granted financial assistance to CSOB after its acquisition of IPB's business, CSOB had already been privatised (by way of a sale of the State's 65.69% shareholding to KBC of Belgium). The policy on which the Respondent relies was therefore at least not consistently implemented and cannot therefore justify IPB's differential treatment.

339. Sixthly, the Respondent has asserted that IPB did not disclose its desire to receive State financial assistance until April 2000. Consequently, Saluka, and indeed IPB, could not now claim that it has been negatively affected by the Czech Republic's failure to provide such assistance.

340. It is undisputed, however, that at least during the autumn of 1999 it was clear that IPB needed an increase of capital to provide for its bad loans and that the CNB expressly requested a significant increase in IPB's equity capital. Also, in the context of the negotiations that took place during the spring of 2000 in order find a solution for IPB, the Czech Government made it known to Nomura on 14 March 2000 that the provision of State aid to IPB was conditional on Nomura injecting new capital into IPB. Nomura, on the other hand, made it known in the course of these negotiations that it was unwilling to provide such capital unless at the same time the Czech State provided adequate financial assistance to IPB. The parties were, however, unable to bridge this gap in their approaches.

341. The Tribunal therefore finds that the Czech Government was fully aware of IPB's need for State assistance at a time when it was still feasible to prevent IPB from failing.

342. Finally, the Respondent argues that IPB's financial problems that ultimately led to its failure and forced administration were due to IPB's own irresponsible business strategy, especially its lending policy. The Respondent therefore denies that the Claimant could legitimately expect a government bailout.

343. The Claimant denies that IPB differed in any significant way from the other Big Four banks, especially CS and KB: neither in terms of the size and the impact of its non-performing loan portfolio or in terms of its credit rating, nor in terms of its liquidity or in terms of the management of its loan portfolio could IPB be said to have been uniquely bad.

344. The Tribunal finds that the size of the non-performing loan portfolios and their impact on the balance sheet was in fact comparable for all the Big Four banks, with the exception, to some degree, of CSOB. Accordingly, the credit ratings of all these banks were equally downgraded in 1998 and the relative improvement of IPB's competitors in 2000 was due to the State aid they had received in the meantime.

345. As far as the Big Four banks' liquidity position until 1999 is concerned, the parties disagree on the criteria that are relevant for a comparison between IPB and its competitors. In principle, liquidity is defined as the sum of assets that can be easily turned into assets that may be used for the payment of debts in relation to total assets. In order to prove that IPB's liquidity position was worse than its competitors', the Respondent relies on the "liquid asset ratio" and the "cash asset ratio". The Claimant, in order to prove that IPB's liquidity position was even relatively better than its competitors', relies on the "quick asset ratio". The Tribunal finds, however, that "quick assets" are not much different from "liquid assets". Consequently, the parties' diverging calculations are less due to the criteria, but rather to their statistical foundations. Whatever the correct liquidity ratios of the Big Four banks from 1998 to early 2000 may have been, the Tribunal is not convinced that different liquidity ratios warranted different treatment with regard to the provision of State financial assistance in order to overcome the bad debt problem.

346. As far as the Respondent's contention relating to IPB's allegedly flawed business strategy and imprudent loan portfolio management is concerned, the Tribunal notes that IPB's competitors (especially CS and KB) proved not to be able to overcome the bad loan problem without financial assistance from the Czech State, even though they allegedly followed a less flawed business strategy and had a more prudent loan management.

347. The Tribunal therefore finds that the Respondent has not offered a reasonable justification for IPB's differential treatment. Consequently, the Czech Republic is found to have given a discriminatory response to the bad debt problem in the Czech banking sector, especially by providing state financial assistance to three of the Big Four banks to the exclusion of IPB, and thereby created an environment impossible for the survival of IPB.

b) Failure to Ensure a Predictable and Transparent Framework

348. The Czech Republic has failed to ensure a predictable and transparent framework for Saluka's investment, if it has frustrated Saluka's legitimate expectations regarding the treatment of IPB without reasonable justifications.

349. The Claimant argues that the Czech Republic has frustrated Saluka's expectations

(a) by contradictory and misleading declarations about its policy towards the banking sector in crisis and by justifying IPB's exclusion from the State aid granted to save the other banks on the grounds that it had already been fully privatised;

(b) by the unpredictable increase of the provisioning burden for non-performing loans; and

(c) by leaving the banks with no effective mechanisms to enforce loan security.

350. The Tribunal will assess the legitimacy and reasonableness of these expectations and, if they were legitimate and reasonable, whether they have been frustrated by the Czech Republic without reasonable justification.

i) Nomura's Expectation that IPB would not be Treated Differently

351. Firstly, Nomura's expectation that the Government would not address the bad loan problem by support to the banks was initially said to have been based on an express assurance to that effect given by the then Minister of Finance. The Claimant has also argued that this was consistent with the obligations undertaken by the Czech Government in their pre-accession agreement with the European Commission (the Europe Agreement) to adhere to European Union norms on State aid. The Claimant has admitted, however, that whatever assurance the Minister of Finance may have given, he could not bind future Governments. Especially, he could not give any assurance that the privatisation of the other banks would proceed in the same way as the privatisation of IPB, i.e. without any State financial assistance. Nomura therefore had no basis for expecting that there would be no future change in the Government's policy towards the banking sector's bad loan problem or in the Government's willingness to adhere during the pre-accession period to the rules on State aid in the Europe Agreement.

352. The Claimant insists, however, that Nomura was justified in expecting that, should the Czech Government change its policy and provide State financial assistance to the banks in order for them to overcome the "systemic" problem of bad loans, that solution would itself be "systemic" and thus non-discriminatory. The Claimant contends that the Czech Government has frustrated this expectation by excluding IPB from the financial assistance provided to IPB's competitors. This discriminatory treatment is said to have been unpredictable.

353. The Tribunal notes that this claim is in substance identical with the Claimant's previous claim according to which the Czech Republic has violated the "fair and equitable treatment” standard by the discriminatory response of the Czech Republic to the bad debt problem in the Czech banking sector. It has therefore already been dealt with in the context of the Claimant’s first claim.

ii) The Unpredictable Increase of the Provisioning Burden for Non-Performing Loans

354. Secondly, the Claimant argues that Nomura’s legitimate expectations have been frustrated by the CNB’s introduction of more stringent prudential rules for the banks. The CNB should rather have taken a “gradualist” approach so that the banks had time to adjust.

355. The Respondent argues that Nomura was aware of some of the CNB’s regulatory amendments at the time the shareholding in IPB was acquired, and others were clearly foreseeable.

356. The Tribunal notes that the increased stringency of the CNB’s prudential rules contributed to the distress suffered by the Czech banking system by forcing the banks to increase provisioning. Consequently, it became even more difficult for the banks to meet the regulatory capital requirements than it had been before due to the bad loan problem.

357. However, the CNB’s policy of tightening the regulatory regime must be seen in the context of the Czech Republic’s preparation for accession to the European Union. It was the CNB’s declared intention to bring its regulatory regime into line with the norms in the European Union. In 1999 a “Twinning Programme” for banking supervision had been launched which was deliberately designed to adjust the Czech regulatory methodology and the practical implementation of banking supervision to European Union standards.<sup>44</sup>

358. It can hardly be disputed that these developments could have been anticipated in 1998. Nomura was, therefore, not justified to expect that the CNB would not introduce a more rigid system of prudential regulation and thereby change the framework for Nomura’s investment in IPB shares. However, Nomura was unable to anticipate the discriminatory way in which the Czech Government responded to the distress suffered by the Czech banking sector, i.e. the exclusion of IPB from any State assistance that was granted to the other three of the Big Four banks in order for them to overcome their inability to meet the regulatory capital requirements. This aspect of the Czech Government’s attitude towards the banking sector has, however, already been dealt with in the context of the Claimant’s first claim.

iii) Nomura’s Expectation regarding the Legal Framework for the Enforcement of Loan Security

359. It is undisputed between the parties that Czech Law failed to provide effective mechanisms to enforce loan security. The CNB expressly acknowledged that its tightening of the prudential regulations and the increase of the provisioning requirements were in fact a response to the shortcomings in the legislation to protect creditors in recovering receivables and exercising liens as well as to other institutional shortcomings that were preventing banks in practice from realising real estate pledged as collateral.

360. The Tribunal finds that the aforementioned legal shortcomings must have been known to Nomura when it made its investment. An expectation that such shortcomings would quickly be fixed by the Czech legislature would have been unfounded. Consequently, even though the lack of adequate protection of creditors' rights will most certainly have contributed to the aggravation of the bad debt problem, the Tribunal is unable to find that the Czech Republic has frustrated Nomura's legitimate and reasonable expectations and violated the "fair and equitable treatment" standard by its failure to improve the legal framework within a timescale of help to Nomura.

c) Refusal to Negotiate in Good Faith

361. The Claimant contends that, whereas Saluka and Nomura as well as IPB were actively engaged in seeking a solution to IPB's financial problems, the Czech Government refused to negotiate in good faith on the proposals made by IPB and its shareholders. The Czech Ministry of Finance and the CNB are said to have instead conspired and taken sides with CSOB, which was interested in acquiring IPB's business. While purporting to negotiate with IPB and its shareholders, the Czech Government is said to have acted as an accessory to CSOB's plan to take over IPB's business. According to this plan (the Paris Plan), IPB's business would be transferred to CSOB upon the pretence of forced administration. The Claimant argues that this conduct of the Czech Government was unreasonable and discriminatory.

362. The Respondent argues that the Claimant's proposition is unfounded. The Czech Government had neither engaged in a conspiracy nor taken sides with CSOB to the detriment of IPB and its shareholders. The Respondent denies that there was a premeditated plan (the Paris Plan) to oust IPB from control over its enterprise by transferring it to CSOB by way of IPB's forced administration. The CNB is rather said to have been compelled to impose forced administration because IPB was no longer meeting the regulatory requirements for its banking business. Also, IPB's banking business had to be transferred to CSOB since there was no other strategic investor capable of saving IPB's business and prepared to step in immediately. The Respondent therefore argues that the Czech Government's conduct was reasonable under the circumstances and that it did not in any way imply an unjustifiable discrimination against IPB and its shareholders.

363. The Tribunal's assessment starts from the proposition that the Czech Republic's conduct was unfair and inequitable if it unreasonably frustrated IPB's and its shareholders' good faith efforts to resolve the bank's crisis. A host State's government is not under an obligation to accept whatever proposal an investor makes in order to overcome a critical financial situation like that faced by IPB. Neither is a host State under an obligation to give preference to an investor's proposal over similar proposals from other parties. An investor is, however, entitled to expect that the host State takes seriously a proposal that has sufficient potential to solve the problem and deal with it in an objective, transparent, unbiased and even-handed way.

364. The Claimant has identified a number of elements of the factual record which are said to support the Claimant's proposition that the Czech Government used its power to unilaterally support CSOB in implementing its strategy to acquire the business of IPB to the detriment of IPB and Saluka. The factual details and especially the inferences and conclusions that may be derived therefrom are, however, highly disputed between the parties.

365. In light of the evidence before it, the Tribunal considers it helpful to contrast two intertwined but distinguishable developments during the first half of 2000: the unfolding of CSOB's acquisition of IPB, on the one hand, and the unfolding of the negotiations between IPB and Saluka/Nomura and the Czech Government, on the other.

i) The Developments during the First Half of 2000

(a) The Government's Role in CSOB's Acquisition of IPB

366. By January 2000 it became clear to CSOB that it could implement its strategic objective of expanding into the retail banking sector only by acquiring IPB. CSOB's interest in this acquisition was, if not "discussed" as the Claimant contends, then at least expressed at a meeting of the CEO and Chairman of the Board of CSOB, Mr Kavánek, with the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, as early as 10 January 2000. It is not clear whether further meetings took place in January and February 2000.

367. In March 2000 CSOB retained Consilium Rothchilds and Boston Consulting Group to start preparing a deal structure for acquiring IPB.

368. On 26 April 2000 CSOB prepared a presentation to the Czech Government about its acquisition plans for IPB. This presentation entitled "Discussion Materials" provided an analysis of IPB's situation, CNB's objectives and the "main options" available to the Czech Government, including "do nothing", "self-help" of IPB, "broker a deal with a third party" and "full intervention". The two last options clearly referred to the entry of a strategic partner into IPB, on the one hand, and to forced administration (which was, however, characterised as being generally seen as the last resort) on the other. Since "self-help" was no longer considered a viable option in IPB's circumstances, "broker a deal" was seen as the next best option in persuading the CNB, whereas "full intervention" should remain a "credible potential stick" for IPB/Nomura to facilitate the process.

369. On 30 May 2000 the CEO and Chairman of the Board of CSOB, Mr Kavánek, presented several documents at a meeting held in Paris by the Czech Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, the Governor of the CNB, Mr Tošovský, and the President of CSOB's parent company KBC, Mr Remi Vermeiren, who on that day were attending a banking conference. The documents presented by Mr Kavánek, together referred to by the Claimant as "the Paris Plan", set out a "Preliminary approach to the Carthago-India business case"<sup>45</sup> (in which CSOB explained the potential synergies to be expected from a combination of CSOB and IPB), CSOB's "Readiness to act" (in terms of CSOB's readiness and capability to manage the integration of IPB into CSOB) and a "Summary Transaction Structure" (explaining the procedural steps to be taken for the integration of IPB into CSOB).

370. In the two appendices to the latter document, CSOB explained in more detail two alternative strategies for a takeover of IPB: firstly, the "transaction structure to be used in negotiated transaction with India"; secondly, the "transaction structure to be used in forced administration of India". The first "transaction structure" was characterised as not being without legal, political and implementation risk; but it was emphasised that it would "present a potential (and perhaps only [sic]) structure which, in light of the options available under current Czech law, addresses the goal of a rapid transfer of the India business to Carthago”. The second “transaction structure” was characterised as being novel and as not being without legal, political and implementation risk either; it was also emphasised, however, that it would “present a potential (and perhaps only [sic]) structure which, in light of the options available under current Czech law, addresses the goals of minimal involvement of the Forced Administrator and of a rapid transfer of the India business to Carthago”.

371. In anticipation of the Paris meeting, the Chairman of the Board of CSOB, Mr Kavánek, had written a letter dated 26 May 2000 to the Minister of Finance expressing his expectation that the Paris meeting would “contribute to additional positive progress in the subject matter”. Nevertheless, the precise nature and content of the talks at the Paris meeting are a matter of dispute between the parties and remain unclear.

372. On 13 June 2000, after the second run on IPB had already set in, the Vicegovernor of the CNB, Mr Niedermayer, acting on behalf of an ad hoc working group whose mission was to determine a solution for IPB including a transfer of IPB’s business to a strategic investor, requested CSOB to submit by 9:00 a.m. the next day a “co-operative” proposal for a takeover of IPB.

373. On 14 June 2000 the CEO and Chairman of the Board of CSOB, Mr Kavánek, wrote a letter to the Vicegovernor of the CNB, Mr Niedermayer, setting out a detailed proposal for a takeover of IPB to be negotiated with Nomura. It was clearly stated that State participation in the risks and losses linked with the operation had to be anticipated. The letter stated at the same time, however, that Nomura had declared its lack of interest in the proposal. The Claimant has denied that Nomura had in fact been contacted to discuss the proposal.

374. Also on 14 June 2000 the Director of the State Aid Department of the OPC, Mr Rudolecký, was informed by his superior, Dr Buchta, of the State aid envisaged for IPB/CSOB in case of CSOB’s takeover of IPB’s business. It was anticipated that an exemption from the prohibition of State aid would be necessary.

375. On 15 June 2000 the Czech Government met to assess the situation of IPB. The Cabinet’s deliberations were based on “Materials for the Talks of the Czech Republic’s Government” prepared and submitted by the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, and the Governor of the CNB, Mr Tošovský. The “Materials” took two alternative solutions into consideration: a cooperative solution involving IPB’s shareholders and a non-cooperative solution involving forced administration coupled with a quick sale to a strategic investor. In Appendix No. 3 to the “Materials” the strategic investor was clearly identified as being CSOB. Also, the “Materials” expressly stated that any solution “necessitates a support on the side of the state”.

376. The Claimant contends that only the non-cooperative solution was seriously presented to the Cabinet with CSOB being the only candidate taken into consideration as a strategic investor of IPB. The Respondent insists that the Cabinet was fully briefed on both alternative solutions, including the cooperative solution. In any event the Government, by Resolution No. 622 of 15 June 2000, consented to and recommended the imposition of forced administration upon IPB with the objective of a subsequent sale to CSOB as the strategic investor, the provision of a government guarantee for the assets of IPB in favour of CSOB and the issuing of government guarantees in favour of the CNB in order to cover the losses resulting from the indemnity to be issued by the CNB in favour of CSOB for the debts assumed from IPB and the losses suffered from the takeover of IPB's business.

377. On 16 June 2000 the CNB decided to introduce forced administration of IPB and appointed Mr Staněk as administrator (i.e. a sort of trustee in bankruptcy). Mr Staněk was expressly instructed to “perform all required steps that would result in accelerated sale of the company to [CSOB], being its strategic partner”. He was also promised a “special bonus” for the implementation of this instruction.

378. On 19 June 2000 IPB's business was transferred to CSOB. The Ministry of Finance granted the guarantee envisaged in such Resolution No. 622 of the Government and the CNB signed its promise of compensation for any risk and loss that CSOB had requested. Also, on the same day, the OPC (to which the Government's guarantee and indemnity in favour of IPB/CSOB had been formally notified the day before) issued a decision exempting the State's financial assistance from the legal prohibition of State aid provided by the Public Assistance Act.

(b) The Government's Role in IPB's and Saluka's/Nomura's Attempts to Negotiate a Cooperative Solution

379. Nomura began searching for a strategic partner for IPB in October 1999. It was clear from the beginning that the involvement of the Czech Government would be needed, not only in terms of the various approvals required from the Czech regulatory authorities, but especially in terms of State financial assistance without which private investors would find an investment in IPB unattractive given the finding of the CNB that IPB was massively under-provisioned and had insufficient regulatory capital.

380. Discussions began between representatives of the CNB and the Ministry of Finance, on the one hand, and representatives of IPB and Saluka/Nomura on the other.

381. It appears that the CNB and the Ministry of Finance initially expected a Nomura-led solution, because they assumed that Nomura as IPB's largest shareholder (through Saluka) would try to preserve its investment in IPB and lead the effort to solve IPB's problems either by injecting additional capital into IPB or by identifying a strategic investor for IPB. It transpires from the evidence before the Tribunal that some representatives of the Government and the CNB regarded Saluka/Nomura itself as a de facto strategic investor whose responsibility it was to assist IPB in overcoming its difficulties.<sup>46</sup> Nomura has, however, always insisted on its role as a portfolio investor and has made its willingness to rescue IPB dependent upon State financial assistance which the Czech Republic was unwilling to provide in the circumstances.

382. It soon turned out that some foreign financial institutions began to show an interest in becoming a strategic partner of IPB, especially a consortium formed by Allianz and Hypo-Vereinsbank which was later replaced by the UniCredito.

383. In December 1999 Nomura proposed a merger of IPB and CS, since Allianz considered an offer for both IPB and CS. This proposal was rejected by the State, because a public tender for the State's shareholding in CS was already underway and negotiations with Erste Bank of Austria (to which CS was eventually sold) were in their final stages.

384. In February and March 2000 IPB and Nomura developed a proposal for a merger of IPB and KB. This proposal was also rejected by the Government, because it would have led to a combination of two banks both of which required consolidation and substantial assistance.

385. Also in February and March 2000 the Deputy Managing Director of Nomura, Mr Jackson, entered into negotiations with the Vicegovernor of the CNB, Mr Niedermayer, on the draft of a "Memorandum of Understanding on the restructuring of IPB by Nomura in cooperation with shareholders of IPB and with the Czech Republic" ("MOU"). The purpose of the cooperation was said "to combine private sector and public sector resources". Nomura expressly declared its willingness to invest in IPB "on commercial terms applicable to comparable investments by private sector investors", including Nomura's participation in an increase of IPB's capital. It was made equally clear, however, that the CNB and the Ministry of Finance were required to assure State measures of support for IPB, including the purchase of subordinated debt and potentially participating in the capital increase. The Memorandum was finally rejected by the Czech side on the ground that it did not specify any concrete steps that Nomura would take to address IPB's problem and that there was no assurance for the State that its financial input would be spent effectively or would not wind up in the hands of IPB's shareholders or management.

386. On 14 March the Prime Minister of the Czech Republic expressed the view that the provision of State aid to IPB was conditional on Nomura injecting new capital into IPB. Nomura for its part reiterated on 3 April 2000 its unwillingness to address IPB's capital adequacy problems without State support.

387. Sometime in mid-March 2000 the Minister of Finance and the CNB are said to have lost trust in Nomura, i.e. confidence that Nomura would be able to come up with a viable solution for IPB. The Minister of Finance refused to meet personally with representatives of Nomura any longer. Instead, he and the Governor of the CNB appointed deputies (Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek, and Vicegovernor of the CNB, Mr Niedermayer) to deal with Saluka/IPB. They were merely provided with a "soft mandate" and could only have unofficial meetings off Ministry premises.

388. On 14 April 2000 IPB submitted to the CNB a draft proposal of "Measures for the Stabilisation of IPB". A revised draft of this proposal was submitted to the CNB in May 2000. It explored various possibilities of rescuing IPB from its untenable situation by "bridging measures" as well as by "stabilisation measures" which included again the idea of merging IPB and KB as well as the search for a strategic partner. In any case, all the solutions explored in the proposal required the State's financial assistance. The proposal envisaged, however, that "as for the principal solution related to the entry of a strategic partner, the requested government assistance should focus on that part of [the] loan and asset portfolio which was created before the IPB privatisation and is comparable with portfolios of KB and CS where the government assistance is being provided". The proposal was rejected as unacceptable, because it did not give the State sufficient control over the restructuring process.

389. In April and May 2000 Nomura's attempt to find a strategic partner for IPB made some progress. The Allianz/UniCredito consortium's interest became more and more concrete. Finance Minister Mertlík met with representatives of the Allianz/UniCredito consortium who made proposals similar to those made by CSOB, i.e. they wished to purchase IPB's assets. On 22 May 2000 UniCredito began due diligence enquiries on IPB and on 26 May 2000 UniCredito in fact proposed to purchase IPB's assets at an opening bid for IPB of CZK 25-30 billion (twice its book value, subject to agreement on the book value) with a possibility of paying more. Allianz/UniCredito made it clear, however, that their willingness to acquire IPB's assets was dependent upon a guarantee and promise of indemnity from the Czech State. Also, Allianz/UniCredito wanted several months to conduct due diligence.

390. At the same time representatives of CSOB also had meetings with Nomura's representatives to discuss CSOB's potential entry into IPB as a strategic partner. CSOB made it clear to Nomura that if IPB wanted Government support, it needed CSOB. However, these discussions led nowhere, because CSOB wanted to take over IPB first and negotiate the terms of the acquisition later. This was (perhaps not surprisingly) unacceptable to Nomura.

391. On 2 May 2000 the Governor of the CNB, Mr Tošovský, expressed in a letter to the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, some dissatisfaction with the negotiations between the Czech Government and Saluka/Nomura. He wrote:

As is well-known to you from a number of working meetings, the CNB, apart from the performance of its legal obligation of banking supervision, has also acted on the grounds of care in regard of the stability of the financial system and together with representatives of the Ministry of Finance and the National Property Fund it entered the talks with the main shareholder of the bank [i.e. Saluka/Nomura] and is contributing to the work of a working group whose establishment it initiated some time ago.

The aforesaid work brought about a widening of the awareness of the situation, clarified some opinions and priorities, but has not led as yet to a sufficiently expedite and clear course of action. The problem is not only the slow communication with the main shareholder [i.e. Saluka/Nomura], his unclear position at the bank and a certain unwillingness to discuss a specific course of action, but also certain "half-officiality" of communication between the state, the shareholder and the bank at a level other than supervisory.

However, Governor Tošovský also stated in the following terms the basic conditions for a satisfactory solution:

I believe the most necessary is to expedite and refine the works and prevent thereby the creation of still greater costs. For this reason allow me to acquaint you with the foundation and conclusions which I made together with my colleagues in regard to the situation:

- a) regardless of the specific results of the audit or supervision of the CNB at IPB it is possible to believe that without the substantial strengthening of the capital of the bank or a clean-up of assets, the bank will not be able to further exist,
- b) from this point of view it appears to be unlikely that the planned sale of the bank to a new strategic investor is realizable as a commercial transaction without the support of the state.

The letter concluded by setting out three options for action: the stabilisation of IPB by a private entity with the support of the State (the option favoured by the Governor, provided the State would retain a certain control over the whole process), the nationalisation of the bank (an option that was said to involve considerable risk), liquidation or bankruptcy (an option that was characterised as totally undesirable).

392. Shortly thereafter the CNB requested Nomura to approach the Minister of Finance and engage in formal dialogue about the future of IPB. However, letters addressed by Nomura to the Minister of Finance on 5, 8 and 9 May 2000, setting out its willingness to meet the CNB's request for an injection of fresh capital in IPB and to arrange for up to CZK 13.2 billion of new capital for a capital increase, remained without any response from the Minister.

393. Nomura continued its efforts to meet government officials in order to find a solution for IPB. Further letters dated 9, 18 and 24 May 2000 were sent to representatives of the Ministry of Finance and the CNB.

394. On 18 May 2000 Nomura was informed by the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek, that the Ministry of Finance intended to nationalise IPB and proposed that Nomura should sell Saluka's IPB shares at a symbolic price of 1 euro. Moreover, Mr Racoča for the CNB explained that, if neither IPB nor its shareholders resolved IPB's problems, the CNB would impose forced administration on IPB. Both propositions were not the ones that had been favoured by Governor Tošovský in his aforementioned letter of 2 May 2000 to the Minister of Finance.

395. On 24 May 2000 Nomura submitted to the Prime Minister a further proposal ("Securing future for IPB"). It involved a capital injection by Nomura of CZK 20 billion for a capital increase, a sale of 51% of IPB shares to the Allianz/UniCredito consortium and to CSOB/KBC, and a KoB guarantee of IPB's balance sheet. The same presentation was given to the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek, on 25 May 2000. On 29 May 2000 Mr Mládek rejected the proposal, the major concern being again that it involved direct aid to IPB without the State having any control over the use of the funds. More precisely, Mr Mládek declared the proposal regarding the guarantee of IPB's balance sheet by KoB to a new commercial bank unacceptable. Instead, Mr Mládek reiterated his proposal that Nomura should sell Saluka's IPB shares at a symbolic price of 1 euro.

396. Nomura subsequently wrote to Mr Mládek suggesting that the Ministry of Finance propose an amendment to Nomura's proposal that would make it acceptable to the Ministry. However, by 31 May 2000, the Ministry had refused to communicate officially with Nomura in order to consider any solution relating to IPB.

397. On 1 June 2000 the Government informed Nomura that State assistance would only be forthcoming if Nomura acquired a 51% stake in IPB (i.e. an additional 5%, since Saluka already held 46%).

398. On 2 June 2000 the Government repeated its 1 euro proposal. On 4 and 5 June, Nomura attempted to accommodate that proposal by presenting to the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek, and the Vicegovernor of the CNB, Mr Niedermayer, three alternative solutions to enable the entry of a strategic investor:

(1) Nomura would procure the transfer of 51% of the shares of IPB to the Government in return for acceptable financial assistance. The purchasing price should be 1 euro for 46.16% (i.e. the stake that Saluka already held in IPB) and market price for the remaining shares (which Saluka would have to acquire first). The IPB shares would then be sold for their purchase price to a commercial banking investor that was agreed in advance among the Government, CNB and Nomura. The commercial banking shareholder would recapitalise IPB and take management control on terms agreed in advance.

(2) Nomura would procure the recapitalisation of IPB with CZK 20 billion of new capital in return for acceptable financial assistance. The current and new shares of IPB would then be sold to a commercial banking shareholder who would become a controlling shareholder in IPB. The commercial shareholder would then recapitalise IPB and take management control.

(3) Nomura would procure the sale of 51% shareholder ownership of IPB to the CNB or the Government at fair market value defined as CZK 116 per share, representing the average purchase price of the seller.

None of these proposals was considered acceptable to the Government, mainly because they were seen to involve direct financial assistance by the State in favour of Nomura, or the State's assumption of all of IPB's losses and of the costs of IPB's restructuring.

399. Subsequently, by about 6 June 2000, Nomura was focussing on an asset sale as a solution.

400. On 7 June 2000 the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek, urged Nomura again to accept the 1 euro proposal, otherwise IPB would be "toast".

401. On Friday, 9 June 2000, the Czech news agency CTK reported the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Zelinka, to have said that

[c]ompulsory administration makes sense, because talks with a potential investor are at an advanced stage and there is a danger that the bank will go bankrupt in the meantime.

Even though by law compulsory administration does not mean freezing the deposits, Zelinka does not see any other way of protecting the bank from being invaded by its customers.

402. During the run on IPB, which started the following Monday, 12 June 2000, Nomura, on behalf of Saluka, continued to search for a solution. On 14 June 2000 Nomura submitted a new proposal to the Ministry of Finance, the CNB and the Prime Minister (the “IPB Proposal”) that also received the approval of IPB’s Board of Directors and of IPB’s Supervisory Board. According to this proposal, IPB would transfer its banking business to KoB for CZK 1 for on-sale to a long-term commercial banking partner acceptable to the Government (i.e. Allianz/UniCredito or CSOB/KBC). The proposal also stated IPB’s readiness to execute the transaction before 16 June 2000.

403. Under this proposal KoB would have provided limited State assistance to accomplish the sale to a strategic partner. The sale proceeds would have been distributed to the Government as reimbursement for the costs of any financial assistance, and any excess would have been shared by IPB and the Government.

404. On 15 June 2000 Nomura’s representatives met with representatives of the CNB and of the Ministry of Finance, including the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Mládek, to discuss the IPB Proposal. From the Czech side the IPB Proposal was seen to involve serious economic, legal and organisational risks. The Czech Republic’s main concern was the uncertain scope of the IPB assets that would not be covered by the proposed transfer to KoB but rather retained by IPB, especially the assets belonging to IPB’s Tritton Fund. Negotiations continued into the evening and, after their closure, continued by e-mail. The final e-mail concluded by saying that the Ministry of Finance team was “now leaving for home and will continue tomorrow morning”. This left Nomura’s representatives with the impression that the IPB Proposal had been substantially agreed and that the negotiations would continue the next day. That impression proved to be mistaken.

405. On the evening of 15 June 2000 the Government (i.e. the Cabinet Presidium) convened and considered IPB’s situation. The materials on which the Cabinet Presidium based its deliberations referred to both cooperative solutions and forced administration. However, the two cooperative solutions (the one relating to Saluka’s sale of its shareholding in IPB to the State and the other relating to IPB’s partial sale of its assets to KoB) were only briefly mentioned. The focus was on the CSOB proposal for forced administration followed by a quick sale to itself as a strategic investor. The Government preferred anyway the imposition of forced administration upon IPB with the objective of a subsequent sale of IPB’s business to CSOB on the terms mentioned before.

406. The Claimant argues that the IPB proposal would have been by far the better deal and the Government has therefore failed to choose the solution with the least cost for the State’s budget. The Respondent insists that after the run on IPB had started and IPB’s liquidity had deteriorated dramatically, forced administration was unavoidable and CSOB was the only bank that was prepared and able in terms of management capacity to step in immediately to rescue IPB’s banking business.

ii) The Tribunal’s Finding

407. In light of all the factual elements relating to the Czech Government’s role in CSOB’s successful acquisition of IPB’s business, and IPB’s as well as Saluka’s/Nomura’s unsuccessful attempts to find a cooperative solution, the Tribunal finds, for the reasons set out below, that the Czech Republic's conduct towards IPB and Saluka/Nomura in respect of Saluka's investment in IPB shares was unfair and inequitable. In particular, the Ministry of Finance and the CNB unreasonably frustrated IPB's and its shareholders' good faith efforts to resolve the bank's crisis. The Czech Government failed to deal with IPB's as well as Saluka's/Nomura's proposals in an unbiased, even-handed, transparent and consistent way and it unreasonably refused to communicate with IPB and Saluka/Nomura in an adequate manner.

(a) The Lack of Even-Handedness

408. The Czech Government failed to deal with IPB and its shareholder Saluka/Nomura, on the one hand, and CSOB, on the other hand, in an unbiased and even-handed way.

409. It transpires from the evidence before the Tribunal that both CSOB as well as IPB and its shareholder Saluka/Nomura clearly needed the cooperation of the Czech Government in order to implement their plans to acquire IPB's business or find a strategic investor for IPB. The involvement of the Czech Government was indispensable in terms of the various approvals needed from the Czech regulatory authorities as well as in terms of State financial assistance without which neither CSOB nor any other private investor, including Saluka/Nomura, would find an injection of new capital, a strategic investment or a takeover of IPB's business attractive given IPB's financial distress. Moreover, the Allianz/UniCredito consortium had made this point sufficiently clear.

410. It is, however, equally clear that only CSOB met with the degree of responsiveness on the part of the Czech Government which was a prerequisite for a successful search for a strategic investment or a takeover of IPB's business. In particular, the Ministry of Finance and the CNB were always open to receive information about CSOB's plan to acquire IPB, to discuss CSOB's strategy and finally to contribute to its implementation both in terms of granting the necessary regulatory approvals and in terms of massive State financial assistance.

411. In principle, there is nothing wrong with a Government deciding in favour of an investor which is determined, ready and capable of maintaining the business of an important bank suffering serious financial problems such as IPB. It is also very doubtful whether a Government can be said to be under an international legal obligation always to choose the least cost alternative and not to waste taxpayers' money. A Government that is bound by the standard of fair and equitable treatment of foreign investors, however, cannot avoid paying due regard to the good faith efforts of a foreign investor holding a considerable block of shares in the bank to solve the bank's problems.

412. In the case before the Tribunal, the Czech Government was determined at a rather early stage to give preference to CSOB. Since mid-March 2000 – three months before IPB had to be put into forced administration – the Minister of Finance refused further meetings with representatives of Saluka/Nomura thereby indicating that he no longer considered proposals from Saluka/Nomura helpful in solving IPB's problems. The seriousness of any negotiations with IPB or Saluka/Nomura on alternative solutions was thereby undermined relatively early on when there was still time for alternative cooperative solutions. The failure to develop a workable cooperative solution in good time led to a situation where the forced administration of IPB could be regarded as unavoidable and CSOB could appear as the only choice available for an immediate rescue of IPB's banking business whose failure was imminent.

413. An even-handed dealing with the situation would have required that the Government (i.e. the Cabinet Presidium) in its meeting on the evening of 15 June 2000 had paid the same attention to the two cooperative solutions proposed by Nomura (the one relating to Saluka's sale of its shareholding in IPB to the State and the other relating to IPB's partial sale of its assets to KoB) as was paid to the non-cooperative solution favoured in the meantime by CSOB. The Tribunal is sufficiently satisfied that in fact the contrary had happened: the cooperative solutions involving Nomura and IPB were not seriously considered because at this point they appeared to the Cabinet Presidium not satisfactory for whatever reasons, whereas it had already been decided that the forced administration and the subsequent transfer of IPB's business to CSOB was the Government's first choice. The Tribunal notes that, the day before the Cabinet meeting (i.e. on 14 June 2000), the Director of the State Aid Department of the OPC, Mr Rudolecký, had already been informed by his superior, Dr Buchta, of the financial assistance envisaged for IPB/CSOB in the event of CSOB's takeover of IPB's business, because the Government anticipated that an exemption from the prohibition of State aid would be necessary.

414. Furthermore, the Forced Administrator was not left with his usual discretion to find the most appropriate solution for IPB's future based on an objective and unbiased assessment of all relevant factors. Instead he was instructed by the Government to implement immediately the transfer of IPB's business to CSOB and he was even provided a financial incentive to follow exclusively the Government's instruction.

415. A crucial element in the Czech Republic's preferential treatment of CSOB was once again the Government's willingness to support CSOB's acquisition of IPB's business by granting massive State aid while at the same time refusing to provide similar support for the implementation of the proposals originating from IPB or its shareholder Saluka/Nomura.

416. The justifications offered by the Government for its uneven treatment of IPB and Saluka/Nomura, on the one hand, and CSOB, on the other hand, are unconvincing. The Government's position was largely based on the misconception that Saluka/Nomura was a de facto strategic investor in IPB and was therefore itself responsible for solving IPB's problem by injecting new capital. Nomura, however, had always made it clear that this was not so, that Nomura had entered IPB rather as a portfolio investor and that the Government was not justified in imposing upon Nomura a shareholder's responsibility that was unfounded. Furthermore, when CSOB planned its takeover of IPB's business, it did not consider entering IPB as a strategic investor either, but nevertheless successfully relied on the Government's willingness to provide financial assistance to overcome IPB's financial problem.

(b) The Lack of Consistency

417. The Czech Government's conduct was also characterised by inconsistencies which made it difficult or even impossible for IPB and Saluka/Nomura to accommodate their proposals to the Government's position.

418. IPB's and Saluka's/Nomura's requests for State assistance were always part of their various proposals. Yet, the Czech Government took varying, sometimes even contradictory positions. Basically, the Government's position was that it was Saluka's/Nomura's own responsibility to rescue IPB without any State aid. The MOU on which Nomura had negotiated with the Vicegovernor of the CNB, Mr Niedermayer, in February and March 2000 was, however, aborted on the grounds that there was no assurance for the State that its financial input would be spent effectively or would not wind up in the hands of IPB's shareholders or management. This reasoning implicitly acknowledged at least in principle that State aid was needed for the rescue of IPB, an acknowledgement that was later even expressly stated in the letter from the Governor of the CNB, Mr Tošovský, addressed to the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, on 2 May 2000. On 14 March 2000 the Prime Minister expressed the view that the provision of State aid to IPB was conditional on Nomura injecting new capital: not only was this a suggestion that had in principle always been part of Saluka's/Nomura's own proposals, but it demonstrated that the provision of State aid for IPB was by no means excluded in principle. IPB's draft proposal of "Measures for the Stabilisation of IPB" submitted to the CNB on 14 April 2000 made an attempt to accommodate the request for State financial assistance to the Government's concern that the State would bail out IPB for losses caused after its privatisation by its own imprudent loan policy: the proposal limited the request for State aid to that part of the bad loan portfolio which was created before the privatisation. The proposal was nevertheless rejected. On 1 June 2000 the Government took another turn and informed Nomura that State assistance would be forthcoming, if Nomura acquired a 51% stake in IPB (i.e. an additional 5%, since Saluka already held 46%).

419. Moreover, the Czech Republic acted rather inconsistently in its overall communications with IPB and Saluka/Nomura. The MOU on which Nomura had negotiated with the Vicegovernor of the CNB in February and March 2000 was designed to lead to a mutually satisfactory solution still to be determined in detail. Before that could be achieved, however, the "Memorandum" was already aborted on the grounds that it did not specify any concrete steps that Nomura would take to address IPB's problem. Furthermore, since mid-March 2000, the Minister of Finance had refused to meet Saluka's/Nomura's representatives because he had lost confidence in Nomura's ability to develop a solution for IPB, but at the same time he kept the channel for communication formally open by appointing deputies to deal with Saluka/Nomura and IPB on the basis of a "soft mandate" off the Ministry's premises.

(c) The Lack of Transparency

420. The Czech Government's exchange of views with Saluka/Nomura and IPB on possible solutions for IPB also lacked sufficient transparency to allow Saluka/Nomura and IPB to understand exactly what the Government's preconditions for an acceptable solution were.

421. Saluka/Nomura and/or IPB made various proposals all of which the Czech Government simply rejected with varying reasons.

422. Some of the reasons, however, were not totally unfounded. Thus, Nomura's December 1999 proposal of a merger of IPB and CS as well as IPB's and Nomura's proposal for a merger of IPB and KB were rejected on acceptable grounds.

423. The MOU, however, which Nomura had negotiated with the Vicegovernor of the CNB in February and March 2000, was said to lack specific steps that Nomura would take to address IPB's problem, even though the specification of such steps was the very objective of the ongoing negotiations. The Government failed to respond in any constructive way. IPB's proposal of 14 April 2000 submitted to the CNB was refused because it allegedly did not give the State sufficient control over the restructuring process. The proposal submitted on 24 May 2000 to the Prime Minister was rejected on the grounds that it involved direct aid to IPB without the State having any control over the use of the funds.

424. Nomura's proposals of 4 and 5 June 2000, which were designed to lead to the entry of a strategic investor, attempted to accommodate the Government's proposal of 1 June 2000 as well as its 1 euro proposal. They were nevertheless rejected on the grounds that they involved direct financial assistance from the State in favour of Nomura or the State's assumption of all of IPB's losses and of the costs of IPB's restructuring, even though the Governor of the CNB, Mr Tošovský, had already stated in his letter of 2 June 2000 to the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, that a sale of IPB to a new strategic investor was not realizable without the support of the State.

425. Nomura's last proposal of 14 June 2000 also sought to accommodate the 1 euro proposal by offering a partial sale of IPB's assets to KoB for 1 CZK (for on-sale to a strategic investor such as Allianz/UniCredito or CSOB/KBC). The next day representatives of the CNB and of the Ministry of Finance began even to negotiate this proposal with Nomura's representatives and led them to believe that negotiations would be continued the next day, the main point for further clarification being the specification of IPB's assets that would not be covered by the transfer to KoB. This proposal was aborted by the supervening imposition of forced administration upon IPB.

(d) The Refusal of Adequate Communication

426. In light of the serious difficulties IPB was in and the urgency of finding a solution that would rescue IPB, the Czech Government's refusal to actively engage in constructive and direct negotiations with IPB and its major shareholder Saluka/Nomura was unreasonable. There could not have been any doubt that any cooperative solution necessarily made Saluka's/Nomura's involvement indispensable.

427. From mid-March onwards – three months before forced administration was imposed upon IPB – the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, simply gave up communicating directly with IPB's major shareholder Saluka/Nomura. He downgraded the Ministry's communication with Saluka/Nomura to the Deputy level while at the same time he continued communicating personally with the CEO and Chairman of the Board of Directors of CSOB, Mr Kavánek.

428. Even on the Deputy level, communication with Saluka's/Nomura's representatives was not allowed on the premises of the Ministry of Finance.

429. Letters addressed by Nomura to the Minister of Finance on 5, 8 and 9 May 2000, setting out Nomura's willingness to meet the CNB's request for an injection of fresh capital and to arrange for up to CZK 13.2 billion of new capital for a capital increase in IPB simply remained without any response from the Minister.

430. Nomura nevertheless continued its efforts to meet Government officials, although with only limited success. Instead of engaging in meaningful negotiations, Nomura was confronted with the possibility of IPB's nationalisation or forced administration and with the 1 euro proposal.

431. On 31 May 2000, one day after the Minister of Finance, Mr Mertlík, had met with the CEO and Chairman of the Board of Directors of CSOB, Mr Kavánek, in Paris, official communication with Saluka/Nomura was discontinued even on the Deputy level. Saluka's representative, Mr Dillard, had to meet informally with Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr Mládek, in a wine bar.

432. Official communication was resumed on 15 June 2000 in order to discuss Nomura's last proposal. The Tribunal is very doubtful whether these discussions between Nomura's representatives and representatives of the CNB and of the Ministry of Finance were seriously meant as a last-minute effort of the Czech Government to find a cooperative solution. The OPC had already been informed the day before of the imminent takeover of IPB's business by CSOB. Already on 9 June 2000 the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr Zelinka, had indicated to the Czech news agency CTK that forced administration of IPB was unavoidable.

d) Provision of Financial Assistance to IPB after Acquisition by CSOB

433. The Claimant argues that the Czech Republic acted in violation of the "fair and equitable treatment" standard by illegally granting massive financial assistance to IPB's business, once the beneficiary of such assistance had become CSOB following the forced administration.

434. On 19 June 2000 the Ministry of Finance, following the Government's Resolution No. 622 of 15 June 2000, issued an unlimited and unconditional guarantee of all on- and off-balance sheet assets transferred to CSOB, and the CNB entered into an agreement with CSOB under which the CNB promised to indemnify CSOB for certain other potential risks in connection with the acquisition of IPB's business. The transaction implemented by the Forced Administrator therefore conveyed to CSOB a fully guaranteed bank without requiring any substantial payment for its franchise value.

435. The Claimant, relying on the expert evidence of Professor Piet Jan Slot, contends that the Government Guarantee and the CNB indemnity were State aids provided in contravention of the Czech Public Assistance Act and in breach of the Czech Republic's obligations under the Europe Agreement, concluded between the European Communities and the Czech Republic on 4 October 1993.<sup>47</sup> Article 64 of that Agreement provided:

- (1) The following are incompatible with the proper functioning of the Agreement, in so far as they may affect trade between the Community and the Czech Republic:

- (iii) any public aid which distorts or threatens to distort competition by favouring certain undertakings or the production of certain goods.

436. The OPC's decision of 19 June 2000 exempted the Government's financial assistance for CSOB/IPB from the legal prohibition of State aid, on the grounds that it was "restructuring aid" and especially aid to remedy a "serious disturbance" in the Czech economy consistent with the Europe Agreement as interpreted by the EC Commission in its Guidelines on Rescue and Restructuring Aid. The validity of that decision is questioned by the Claimant, in particular, on the grounds that the assistance did not properly qualify as "restructuring aid" or aid to remedy a "serious disturbance", and that the OPC lacked independence and had also violated the procedural rules of the Public Assistance Act. Furthermore, the Government is said to have illegally implemented its aid for CSOB/IPB before the OPC's exemption decision came into effect.

437. The Claimant has also emphasised that the exemption decision was in any case conditional upon the Ministry of Finance subsequently submitting to the OPC (i) by 19 September 2000 a restructuring plan for IPB; (ii) by 19 September 2000 preliminary information concerning the amount of assistance provided under the Government Guarantee; and (iii) by 19 December 2000 final information concerning the assistance. The Ministry of Finance is said to have failed to comply with the last of these Conditions and to have thereby committed another breach of the Public Assistance Act which was not adequately penalised by the OPC.

438. The Claimant argues that the Czech Republic, by providing illegal State aid and by failing to implement procedural rules giving effect to violations of the prohibition of State aid, violated its international Treaty obligation under the Europe Agreement thereby establishing a prima facie violation of the "fair and equitable treatment" standard in Article 3.1 of the Treaty.

439. The Respondent, relying on the expert testimony of Professor Dr Jürgen Basedow, contested the subject matter jurisdiction of the Tribunal as far as the application of the substantive rules on State aid of the Europe Agreement are concerned. Since the Europe Agreement's substantive provisions are not "directly applicable" (self-executing), it is said to be not for this Tribunal to assess the legality of the Czech Government's financial assistance for CSOB/IPB under the Europe Agreement. The Tribunal is said to be only competent to assess the procedural legality of that assistance.

440. In any case, the OPC is said to have been justified in exempting the Government's financial assistance as "restructuring aid" and as a remedy for a "serious disturbance". Also, the State aid could have been exempted as indirect investment aid or operating aid in accordance with the EC Commission's Guidelines on national regional aid. The Claimant's criticism is therefore said to be unfounded.

441. The Tribunal finds, for the reasons set out below, that the Claimant's claim is without merit. The Czech Government's provision of State financial assistance to CSOB/IPB, i.e. upon the acquisition of IPB's business by CSOB subsequent to the imposition of forced administration upon IPB, did not amount to a breach of Article 3.1 of the Treaty.

442. The unlawfulness of a host State's measures under its own legislation or under another international agreement by which the host State may be bound, is neither necessary nor sufficient for a breach of Article 3.1 of the Treaty. The Treaty cannot be interpreted so as to penalise each and every breach by the Government of the rules or regulations to which it is subject and for which the investor may normally seek redress before the courts of the host State.

443. As the tribunal in ADF Group Inc. has stated with regard to the "fair and equitable treatment" standard contained in Article 1105(1) NAFTA:

something more than simple illegality or lack of authority under the domestic law of a State is necessary to render an act or measure inconsistent with the customary international law requirements....<sup>48</sup>

Quite similarly, the Loewen tribunal stated in the same legal context that whether the conduct [of the host State] amounted to a breach of municipal law as well as international law is not for us to determine. A NAFTA claim cannot be converted into an appeal against decisions of [the host State].<sup>49</sup>

444. The Czech Government's conduct of which the Claimant is complaining must therefore be assessed in light of the Treaty's own "fair and equitable treatment" standard. Consequently, the Tribunal does not find it necessary to determine the legality of the financial assistance given to CSOB/IPB under Czech national law or under the Europe Agreement. The only relevant question is whether the Czech Government's provision of financial assistance to CSOB/IPB constituted unfair and inequitable treatment of Saluka irrespective of whether it was in compliance with the Czech Public Assistance Act or the Europe Agreement.

445. The "fair and equitable treatment" standard cannot easily be assumed to include a general prohibition of State aid. Financial assistance is a tool used by States to implement their commercial policies. Even though it tends to distort competition and to undermine the level playing field for competitors, States cannot be said to be generally bound by international law to refrain from using this tool. According to States' treaty practice, prohibitions of State aid are explicitly stated and defined in international agreements such as the Europe Agreement. A similar prohibition cannot be read into general principles such as the "fair and equitable treatment" standard. Consequently, an investor cannot claim to be generally protected against the host State providing State aid to its competitors.

446. Having said this, the Tribunal also emphasises that the host State, in providing State aid, is clearly bound not to frustrate an investor's legitimate and reasonable expectation to be treated fairly and equitably. The host State is therefore obliged to provide financial assistance to firms or industries in a way that does not amount to an unfair or inequitable treatment of a foreign investor. In particular, the provision of State aid to specific firms or industries must not be discriminatory or unreasonably harmful for the foreign investor.

447. In the case before the Tribunal, the Czech Government's guarantees and indemnities in favour of CSOB/IPB were part of the overall transaction whereby IPB's banking business was transferred to CSOB subsequent to the imposition of forced administration upon IPB. At the time the financial assistance was implemented, IPB had already lost its banking business to CSOB. It is therefore not conceivable that, due to the State aid provided for CSOB/IPB, IPB and its shareholders could have suffered harm in addition to the harm that had already been caused by the forced administration and the subsequent loss of the banking business. After the takeover of IPB's banking business by CSOB, IPB was no longer a competitor of CSOB whose competitive position could be undermined by the State aid provided by the Czech Government.

e) Unjust Enrichment of CSOB at the Expense of Saluka

448. The Claimant contends that the Czech Republic failed to prevent the unjust enrichment of CSOB at the expense of the IPB shareholders including Saluka upon the transfer of IPB's business to CSOB and the provision of the aforementioned State aid following the forced administration.

449. The concept of unjust enrichment is recognised as a general principle of international law.<sup>50</sup> It gives one party a right of restitution of anything of value that has been taken or received by the other party without a legal justification. As the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal has stated more specifically:

There must have been an enrichment of one party to the detriment of the other, and both must arise as a consequence of the same act or event. There must be no justification for the enrichment, and no contractual or other remedy available to the injured party whereby he might seek compensation from the party enriched.<sup>51</sup>

450. If it is assumed that the "fair and equitable treatment" standard also includes the general principle of unjust enrichment, an investor would therefore also be protected by this standard against unjust enrichment by the host State.

451. In the case before the Tribunal, the question would be whether the Czech State has, by means of the transfer of IPB's business to CSOB and the provision of the aforementioned State aid following the forced administration, taken or received anything of value at the expense of Saluka. For the reasons set out below, the Tribunal would answer this question in the negative.

452. Firstly, it was not the Respondent which received the banking business from IPB, but CSOB. Even though the Czech State was still a (minority) shareholder of CSOB, CSOB cannot be equated with the Czech State. It is a general principle of company law that a company is a legal entity separate from its shareholders. The corporate assets are owned by the company itself, not by the shareholders. The concept of piercing the company's veil would be totally inapposite in this context. Anything acquired by CSOB from IPB was therefore not acquired by the Respondent.

453. Secondly, it was IPB's and not the Claimant's banking business that was transferred to CSOB. IPB's assets were owned by IPB itself, not by its shareholders. Again, the concept of the separateness of the company from its shareholders prevents the Tribunal from equating IPB and Saluka. Consequently, CSOB did not receive anything at the expense of Saluka.

454. The Claimant has in fact acknowledged that the transfer of IPB's business to CSOB resulted in the enrichment, if any, of one private entity at the expense of another. The Claimant has also argued, however, that in order for the Czech Republic to become liable towards Saluka it is sufficient to establish that the Czech Republic actively participated in a conspiracy to enrich one private party at the expense of another by using regulatory powers to effect an illegal transfer of ownership in IPB's business.

455. The Tribunal finds that the Claimant's argument is legally not well founded. It stretches the principle of unjust enrichment beyond its proper scope. The notion of one party being an accessory to an unjustified transfer between two other parties is not part of the concept of unjust enrichment. Even though, according to the Claimant, it is well established in the general international law of State responsibility for wrongful acts, especially in case of unlawful expropriation, that the ultimate beneficiary of the wrongful act of the State need not be the State itself, the Tribunal has not been convinced that this holds true for the principle of unjust enrichment.

456. Since there was no enrichment of the Respondent to the detriment of the Claimant, the Tribunal does not consider it necessary to assess the legal justification of the transfer of IPB's business to CSOB at any length. Suffice it to say that the transfer was based on the Sale Agreement between the Forced Administrator of IPB, and CSOB. It cannot be for this Tribunal to question the validity of this agreement as long as it has not been invalidated by a competent court or tribunal. Questionable as the circumstances surrounding the Sale Agreement may be, it provides, within the context of the principle of unjust enrichment, a sufficient legal justification for the transfer of IPB's banking business to CSOB.

C. Non-Impairment

457. The legal basis of the Claimant's claims is not limited to the "fair and equitable treatment" standard contained in Article 3.1 of the Treaty but includes the non-impairment obligation contained in the same provision. Article 3.1 of the Treaty provides that:

[W]ith reference to the investments of investors of the other Contracting Party, each Contracting Party . . . shall not impair, by unreasonable or discriminatory measures, the operation, management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal thereof by those investors.

It is for the Tribunal therefore, to determine whether the Czech Republic has, by certain measures, violated this obligation.

1. Meaning of the Standard

458. "Impairment" means, according to its ordinary meaning (Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties), any negative impact or effect caused by "measures" taken by the Czech Republic.

459. The term "measures" covers any action or omission of the Czech Republic. As the ICJ has stated in the Fisheries Jurisdiction Case (Spain v. Canada)

[I]n its ordinary sense the word is wide enough to cover any act, step or proceeding, and imposes no particular limit on their material content or on the aim pursued thereby.<sup>52</sup>

460. The standard of “reasonableness” has no different meaning in this context than in the context of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard with which it is associated; and the same is true with regard to the standard of “non-discrimination”. The standard of “reasonableness” therefore requires, in this context as well, a showing that the State’s conduct bears a reasonable relationship to some rational policy, whereas the standard of “non-discrimination” requires a rational justification of any differential treatment of a foreign investor.

461. Insofar as the standard of conduct is concerned, a violation of the non-impairment requirement does not therefore differ substantially from a violation of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard. The non-impairment requirement merely identifies more specific effects of any such violation, namely with regard to the operation, management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal of the investment by the investor.

462. The term “investment” is defined in Article 1 of the Treaty so as to include, inter alia, shares, bonds and other kinds of interests in companies [...], as well as rights derived therefrom.

As the Tribunal has already stated earlier, Saluka’s shareholding in IPB clearly is an “investment” in this sense.

463. It will transpire from the application of the non-impairment standard to the facts of this case that among the various objects of a potential impairment listed in Article 3.1 of the Treaty only Saluka’s “enjoyment” of its investment appears to be relevant in the present context. “Enjoyment” means, inter alia,

[t]he exercise of a right [...] [which] includes the beneficial use, interest and purpose to which property may be put, and implies right to profits and income therefrom.<sup>53</sup>

2. Application of the Standard

464. Three different sets of facts need to be assessed in light of the non-impairment obligation:

(a) first, the facts that have given rise to the Tribunal’s findings of violations of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard contained in Article 3.1 of the Treaty;

(b) second, the facts on which the Claimant has based its deprivation claim under Article 5 of the Treaty;

(c) third, the facts relating to the second run on IPB which subsequently led to the forced administration of IPB.

The Tribunal will assess these three sets of facts separately.

a) The Facts Underlying the Violations of the “Fair and Equitable Treatment” Standard (Article 3.1 of the Treaty)

465. The Tribunal finds that the Czech Republic, by violating the “fair and equitable treatment” standard of Article 3.1 of the Treaty, at the same time violated its non-impairment obligation under the same provision.

466. The Czech Republic, by

(i) giving a discriminatory response to the bad debt problem in the Czech banking sector, especially by providing State financial assistance to three of the Big Four banks to the exclusion of IPB and thereby creating an environment impossible for the survival of IPB, and

(ii) by refusing to negotiate in good faith on the proposals made by IPB and its shareholders, impaired the “enjoyment” of Saluka’s investment, i.e. the shareholding in IPB.

467. There can be no doubt that the Czech Republic’s discriminatory response to the bad debt problem in the Czech banking sector and its unfair and inequitable treatment of IPB regarding the provision of State aid as well as its refusal to negotiate in good faith on the proposals made by IPB and its shareholders for the rescue of IPB had a detrimental impact upon IPB and Saluka’s shareholding in IPB. The unlawful conduct of the Czech Government contributed to the aggravation of IPB’s financial distress and to its subsequent failure and thereby impaired Saluka’s beneficial use of and interest in its shareholding in IPB.

b) The Facts Underlying the Deprivation Claim (Article 5 of the Treaty)

468. The Claimant’s allegation that the Czech Republic has, by certain measures, unlawfully deprived Saluka of its investment in IPB also includes the allegation that the Czech Republic has, by the same measures, impaired the operation, management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal of Saluka’s investment in IPB. A “deprivation” is most certainly at the same time an “impairment”.

469. In order for the Tribunal to find in favour of the Claimant, the “measures” assessed in light of Article 5 of the Treaty must be shown, in the context of Article 3.1 of the Treaty, to have been “unreasonable or discriminatory”.

470. As far as the Claimant’s allegation of an unlawful impairment of Saluka’s investment by the Czech Government’s imposition of forced administration upon IPB is concerned, the reasons which led the Tribunal, in the preceding Chapter of this Award, to find that the “deprivation” of Saluka’s investment caused by the forced administration was lawful and that the Czech Republic did not violate Article 5 of the Treaty also lead the Tribunal to find that the “impairment” of Saluka’s investment by the same measure was lawful as well and that the Czech Republic did not violate Article 3.1 of the Treaty in this respect either. Since in the context of Article 5, the “deprivation” of Saluka’s investment by the imposition of forced administration upon IPB was justified on reasonable regulatory grounds, the same applies a majore ad minus to the “impairment” of Saluka’s investment in the context of Article 3.1. In other words: to the extent that the concepts of “deprivation” and “impairment” overlap, because a “deprivation” is just one variety of possible “impairments”, the regulatory power exception (or “police power exception”) explained in the previous Chapter of this Award applies to both.

c) The Czech Government’s Alleged Triggering of the Second Run on IPB

471. The Claimant contends that the second run on IPB, which began on 12 June 2000 and which led directly to the imposition of forced administration upon IPB, was triggered by the Czech Government’s leaks of information. The Respondent has denied any such leaks. The details are highly controversial.

472. The Tribunal finds, for the reasons set out below, that the Government did in fact unreasonably spread negative information on IPB to the public and that this contributed to the aggravation of IPB’s financial distress and to its subsequent failure.

473. According to the evidence before the Tribunal, the following appears to be undisputed: In May 2000 IPB submitted to the CNB its revised draft proposal of “Measures for the Stabilisation of IPB”. Shortly thereafter, the Czech newspaper Mladá Fronta DNES reported that:

According to a highly reliable source, the central bank received a document titled “Measures for stabilisation of IPB” where the managers of the bank, among others things, propose the transfer of bad debts to the State-owned Konsolidacni banka.

The source quoted in the newspaper was the CNB.

474. On 8 June 2000 Dow Jones Newswires reported that a source in the central bank [has told] [there was] a “fifty-fifty” chance forced administration will occur [at IPB].

475. According to the Claimant, on 9 June 2000 the Czech news agency CTK reported the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Zelinka, as having said that

[c]ompulsory administration makes sense, because talks with a potential investor are at an advanced stage and there is a danger that the bank will go bankrupt in the meantime.

Even though by law compulsory administration does not mean freezing the deposits, Zelinka does not see any other way of protecting the bank from being invaded by its customers.

476. On 10 June 2000 Mladá Fronta DNES wrote:

According to reliable sources at the central bank, IPB does not have adequate reserves to cover losses from bad loans ... in such a case, the current status of IPB may lead to the withdrawal of its banking licence.

An undisclosed source from the ministry [of Finance] ... said that the intent is to cut off the existing shareholders from any influence on the operations of the bank.

The State has two possibilities for nationalisation of the bank and continuation of operations. It either acquires the majority share from Nomura, or takes over control of the bank via imposing forced administration.

...

“Both variants are possible”, said a source from the ministry that is a party to the negotiations. After the taking over control of the bank and an expensive cleaning up of its portfolio, it is to be sold to a strategic partner. Among the interested parties are, for example, CSOB or Italian Unicredito.

However, Nomura for the present does not want to accept the proposal to assign the shares to the State at a symbolic price of 1.- CZK, since it doesn't want to participate in the stabilisation of the bank.

477. As will be recalled, on 12 June 2000 the second run on IPB began.

478. None of the aforementioned press reports was in any way misstating the situation. Almost all of them contained a clear indication that forced administration of IPB was imminent. All of the reported information was said to have been received from Government sources.

479. The Respondent, by contending that there had been numerous press articles about the bank, some reporting publicly available information in ways that could easily create public panic or cause depositors to begin to make withdrawals, implicitly admits that there have also been press articles reporting confidential information that was not publicly available. There is even reason to believe that certain information was deliberately leaked to the press by “sources” in the CNB and the Ministry of Finance.

480. The crucial question for the Tribunal to determine relates to causation: was the publication of the information referred to a conditio sine qua non for IPB's forced administration? The nature of the information was such that IPB's customers could become seriously concerned about the safety of their savings deposited with IPB and start to withdraw their deposits. On the other hand, it is inconceivable that the public was not already to some degree aware that IPB had problems with its bad loan portfolio. It was one thing, however, for the public to have known of IPB's distress in general terms; it was quite another for the public to have been informed that the failure of IPB was imminent and forced administration unavoidable, as stated by the Deputy Finance Minister, Mr Zelinka, on 9 June 2000 (i.e. on the Friday before the Monday when the second bank run set in).

481. Furthermore, there is some indication that the Government “sources” deliberately engineered the circulation of negative information about IPB in order to precipitate IPB’s failure. Mr Zelinka’s statement of 9 June 2000 may well be interpreted in this sense. Once forced administration was publicly stated to be unavoidable, that statement became a self-fulfilling prophecy, because the bank run was certain to set in the following Monday. This conduct of the Government was unjustifiable and unreasonable and contributed in all probability to the unsustainability of IPB’s situation. The Respondent has provided no convincing evidence to the contrary.

D. Full Security and Protection

482. The Claimant has argued that the Czech Republic has also violated its obligation under Article 3.2 of the Treaty which “more particularly” provides that each Contracting Party shall accord to the investments of investors covered by the Treaty “full security and protection”.

1. Meaning of the Standard

483. The “full protection and security” standard applies essentially when the foreign investment has been affected by civil strife and physical violence.<sup>54</sup> In the AMT arbitration, it was held that the host State “must show that it has taken all measures of precaution to protect the investments of [the investor] in its territory”.<sup>55</sup>

484. The standard does not imply strict liability of the host State however. The Tecmed tribunal held that “the guarantee of full protection and security is not absolute and does not impose strict liability upon the State that grants it”.<sup>56</sup> The host State is, however, obliged to exercise due diligence.<sup>57</sup> As the tribunal in Wena, quoting from American Manufacturing and Trading,<sup>58</sup> stated,

The obligation incumbent on the [host State] is an obligation of vigilance, in the sense that the [host State] shall take all measures necessary to ensure the full enjoyment of protection and security of its investments and should not be permitted to invoke its own legislation to detract from any such obligation.<sup>59</sup>

Accordingly, the standard obliges the host State to adopt all reasonable measures to protect assets and property from threats or attacks which may target particularly foreigners or certain groups of foreigners.<sup>60</sup> The practice of arbitral tribunals seems to indicate, however, that the “full security and protection” clause is not meant to cover just any kind of impairment of an investor’s investment, but to protect more specifically the physical integrity of an investment against interference by use of force. In light of the following findings, it appears not to be necessary for the Tribunal to precisely define the scope of the “full security and protection” clause in this case.

2. Application of the Standard

485. The Claimant contends that the Czech Republic has failed to accord Saluka's investment full protection and security by its oppressive use of public powers, post-forced administration, with a view to depriving Saluka of any residual economic benefit or use of its investment and by harassing its officers and employees. The measures complained of by the Claimant relate more specifically to

- (a) the suspension of trading of IPB shares;
- (b) the prohibition of transfers of Saluka's shares; and
- (c) the police searches of premises occupied by Nomura and its employees.

The Tribunal will assess these three groups of measures separately.

a) The Suspension of Trading in IPB Shares

486. According to the Claimant, the CSC's preliminary injunction of 15 June 2000 imposing an immediate suspension of trading in IPB shares as well as the subsequent successive extensions thereof were unjustified. The Respondent argues that there was nothing improper with the suspension decisions.

487. Saluka has lodged appeals against the CSC's suspension decisions. The appeals were rejected, however, by the competent Presidium of the CSC.

488. On 1 January 2001, the Czech Securities Act was amended to the effect that shareholders no longer had standing to appeal a CSC's suspension of trading in the shares held by the shareholders. Consequently, after 1 January 2001 Saluka was excluded from challenging suspensions of trading in its IPB shares.

489. The Respondent argues that the amendment to the Czech Securities Act was of general application and was not specifically targeted against Saluka.

490. Even assuming that the suspension of trading of shares may be State conduct within the scope of the "full security and protection" clause, the Tribunal, without deciding that question, finds that this claim of the Claimant is without merit. On this account, the Czech Republic cannot be said to have failed to provide "full protection and security" to Saluka's investment. The reasoning behind the CSC's suspension decisions cannot be said to have been totally devoid of legitimate concerns relating to the securities market. The suspensions of trading in IPB shares were at least justifiable on regulatory grounds. Also, the elimination of shareholders' right of appeal does not per se transcend the limits of a legislator's discretion. Shareholder's rights vary greatly in different jurisdictions. The amendment of the Czech Securities Act cannot be said to be totally unreasonable and unjustifiable by some rational legal policy.

b) The Prohibition of Transfers of Saluka's Shares

491. The Claimant also argues that the Police Order issued at the request of CSOB by the Public Investigator's Office on 26 October 2000 as well as subsequent decisions of the police authorities, freezing specifically Saluka's shareholding in IPB, were unjustified.

492. Saluka, however, appealed, with some success, against the freezing orders. Even the Public Prosecutor's Office's order of 23 April 2002 which upheld the freezing order on different grounds was quashed, upon Saluka's appeal, by the Supreme Public Prosecutor's Office. The Claimant still feels aggrieved by a procedural denial of justice due to the fact that the latter office, which was the last instance for appeals, upheld the freezing of Saluka's shares in IPB on still different grounds on which Saluka had not been heard. No further appeal being possible, on 18 July 2002 Saluka lodged a petition with the Constitutional Court seeking an appropriate remedy.

493. Even assuming that the freezing of the IPB shares held by Saluka may be State conduct within the scope of the "full security and protection" clause, the Tribunal, without deciding that question, fails to see a procedural denial of justice that would violate the Czech Republic's Treaty obligations. The absence of further appeals against decisions of the last instance for appeals is not per se a denial of justice. The alleged denial of Saluka's right to be heard is the basis for the petition lodged with the Constitutional Court. Nothing therefore emerges from the facts before the Tribunal that would amount to a manifest lack of due process leading to a breach of international justice and to a failure of the Czech Republic to provide "full protection and security" to Saluka's investment.

c) The Police Searches

494. The Claimant furthermore complains of the search of Nomura's (not Saluka's) Prague Representative Office and the seizure of Nomura's documents. According to the Claimant, these police actions were illegal and violated Nomura's fundamental rights to the inviolability of privacy and home, to the protection against unauthorised interference with its privacy and unauthorised gathering of data, and to the protection of ownership rights.

495. Saluka (not Nomura), however, successfully lodged a petition with the Czech Constitutional Court which in a decision of 10 October 2001 held in favour of Saluka.

496. Consequently, having been granted the relief petitioned for, the Claimant can no longer be aggrieved. The Tribunal, without going into the relevance of the distinction between Nomura and Saluka in this context, therefore finds that, on this account also, the Czech Republic cannot be found to have violated its Treaty obligation to accord "full protection and security" to Saluka's investment.

E. Conclusion

497. In summary, the Tribunal finds, based on the totality of the evidence which has been presented to it, that the Respondent's treatment of Saluka's investment was in some respects unfair and inequitable and violated the “fair and equitable treatment” obligation as well as the “non-impairment” obligation under Article 3.1 of the Treaty.

498. The Respondent has violated the “fair and equitable treatment” obligation by responding to the bad debt problem in the Czech banking sector in a way which accorded IPB differential treatment without a reasonable justification. The Big Four banks were in a comparable position regarding the bad debt problem. Nevertheless, the Czech Republic excluded IPB from the provisioning of financial assistance. Only in the course of CSOB’s acquisition of IPB’s business during IPB’s forced administration was considerable financial assistance from the Czech Government forthcoming. Nomura (and subsequently Saluka) was justified, however, in expecting that the Czech Republic would provide financial assistance in an even-handed and consistent manner so as to include rather than exclude IPB. That expectation was frustrated by the Respondent. The Tribunal finds that the Respondent has not offered a reasonable justification for IPB’s differential treatment.

499. The Czech Republic has furthermore violated its “fair and equitable treatment” obligation by unreasonably frustrating IPB’s and its shareholders’ good faith efforts to resolve the bank’s crisis. Saluka was entitled to expect that the Czech Republic took seriously the various proposals that may have had the potential of solving the bank’s problem and that these proposals were dealt with in an objective, transparent, unbiased and even-handed way. The fundamentally different approach of the Czech Government towards CSOB’s acquisition of IPB, on the one hand, and towards IPB’s and Saluka’s/Nomura’s attempts to negotiate a cooperative solution, on the other, frustrated Saluka’s legitimate expectations. The Czech Government’s conduct lacked even-handedness, consistency and transparency and the Czech Government has refused adequate communication with IPB and its major shareholder, Saluka/Nomura. This made it difficult and even impossible for IPB and Saluka/Nomura to identify the Czech Government’s position and to accommodate it. The Respondent has not offered a reasonable justification for its treatment of Saluka.

500. The Tribunal does not find, however, that the Respondent has violated its “fair and equitable treatment” obligation by a failure to ensure a predictable and transparent framework for Saluka’s investment. Neither was the increase of the provisioning burden for non-performing loans unpredictable for Saluka/Nomura, nor could Saluka/Nomura legitimately expect that the Czech Republic would fix the legal shortcomings regarding the protection of creditor’s rights and the enforcement of loan security within a timescale of help to Nomura.

501. Nor does the Tribunal find that the Respondent has violated its “fair and equitable treatment” obligation by providing financial assistance to CSOB after its acquisition of IPB. At the time the financial assistance was implemented, IPB had already lost its banking business to CSOB. Therefore, IPB and its shareholders could no longer have suffered harm in addition to the harm that had already been caused by the forced administration and the subsequent loss of the banking business. After the takeover of IPB’s banking business by CSOB, IPB was no longer a competitor of CSOB whose competitive position could be undermined by the State aid provided by the Czech Government.

502. The Tribunal also cannot find that the Respondent has violated its “fair and equitable treatment” obligation by a failure to prevent the unjust enrichment of CSOB at the expense of the IPB shareholders, including Saluka, upon the transfer of IPB’s business to CSOB and the provision of State aid following forced administration. For there to be an actionable, unjust enrichment as between the parties, the Respondent must have received something at the expense of the Claimant. It was not the Respondent which received the banking business from IPB, but rather CSOB, nor was it the Claimant's banking business that was transferred to CSOB, but rather IPB's.

503. The Tribunal does find a violation by the Respondent of its "non-impairment" obligation under Article 3.1 of the Treaty. This violation is based firstly on the same grounds which have led the Tribunal to find a violation of the "fair and equitable treatment" standard. The unjustified differential treatment of IPB regarding the Czech Republic's response to the bad debt problem in the banking sector as well as the Czech Government's refusal to negotiate in good faith on the proposals made by IPB and its shareholders were measures that impaired the enjoyment of Saluka's investment, i.e. the shareholding in IPB.

504. The violation of the "non-impairment" obligation is based secondly on the Czech Government's unjustifiable and unreasonable conduct regarding the circulation of negative information about IPB during the week before the second run on IPB that led to its failure. This conduct contributed in all probability to the unsustainability of IPB's situation.

505. The Tribunal fails to find a breach by the Respondent of its "full security and protection" obligation under Article 3.2 of the Treaty. Neither the suspension of trading of IPB shares, which was justifiable by legitimate concerns relating to the securities market, nor the prohibition of transfers of Saluka's IPB shares or the police searches of Nomura's Prague Representative Office and the seizure of Nomura's documents, against which Saluka has lodged appeals or petitions to the competent authorities or courts, amount to a breach of that obligation.

VII. OTHER MATTERS

506. The Claimant, in its Memorial, considered it appropriate and efficient to postpone precise issues of the loss it had suffered to a separate phase of the proceedings when the Tribunal's decision on liability would be known. The Respondent, in its Counter-Memorial, was of the same view in relation to losses which were the subject to its counterclaims. Accordingly, neither party pursued questions of quantum in any detail in their various pleadings on the merits of the dispute submitted to arbitration.

507. Now that the Tribunal's conclusions of the question of liability are known, and include its finding that there has been a breach by the Respondent of its obligations under Article 3 of the Treaty, it is necessary to address the question of the appropriate redress for that breach, including questions of quantum which arise in that context.

508. The Tribunal, pursuant to Article 32.1 of the UNCITRAL Rules, accordingly renders its present Award as only a partial Award. The Tribunal retains its jurisdiction in order to decide the outstanding question of redress, including questions of quantum, in a second phase of this arbitration.

509. The Tribunal, bearing in mind Article 23 of the UNCITRAL Rules, will communicate with the parties about appropriate periods of time for the filing by the parties of written statements on the question of redress, including questions of quantum.

510. The Tribunal, bearing in mind Article 38 of the UNCITRAL Rules, will address questions of costs within the framework of its eventual decision at the conclusion of the second phase of this arbitration.

VIII. DECISIONS

511. For the foregoing reasons, the Tribunal unanimously renders the following decisions as its Partial Award in the present arbitration:

- a. The Tribunal has jurisdiction to hear and decide the dispute which the Claimant, Saluka Investments BV, has submitted to it;
- b. the Respondent, the Czech Republic, has not acted in breach of Article 5 of the Treaty;
- c. the Respondent has acted in breach of Article 3 of the Treaty;
- d. the question of the appropriate redress for that breach, including questions of quantum, will be addressed in a second phase of this arbitration, for which the Tribunal retains jurisdiction;
- e. the Tribunal will separately determine the timetable for the second phase of this arbitration; and
- f. the Tribunal reserves questions of costs until final consideration can be given to the costs of this arbitration as a whole.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

THIRD SECTION

CASE OF KELLY AND OTHERS v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 30054/96)

STRASBOURG

4 May 2001

04/08/2001

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

In the case of Kelly and Others v. the United Kingdom,

The European Court of Human Rights (Third Section), sitting as a Chamber composed of:

Mr J.-P. COSTA, President,

Mr W. FUHRMANN,

Mr L. LOUCAIDES,

Mrs F. TULKENS,

Mr K. JUNGWIERT,

Sir Nicolas BRATZA,

Mr K. TRAJA, judges, and Mrs S. DOLLÉ, Section Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 4 April 2000 and on 11 April 2001,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 30054/96) against the United Kingdom lodged with the European Commission of Human Rights (“the Commission”) under former Article 25 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (“the Convention”) by Irish nationals, Vincent Kelly, Kevin McKearney, Amelia Arthurs, Letitia Donnelly, Mary Kelly, Annie Gormley, Patrick O’Callaghan, Carmel Lynagh and Brigid Hughes (“the applicants”), on 5 October 1995.

2. The applicants, who had been granted legal aid, were represented by Mr P. Mageean and Mr D. Korff, lawyers practising in Belfast and London, respectively. The United Kingdom Government (“the Government”) were represented by their Agent, Mr C. Whomersley of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, London.

3. The applicants, next-of-kin of nine men killed during a security force operation at Loughgall on 8 May 1987 – Patrick Kelly, Patrick McKearney, Declan Arthurs, Seamus Donnelly, Eugene Kelly, Michael Gormley, Gerard O’Callaghan, James Lynagh and Antony Hughes – alleged that their relatives had been kill unjustifiably, without any attempt being made to bring them before a court, that this disclosed discrimination and that there was no effective remedy available to them in respect of their complaints. They invoked Articles 2, 6, 14 and 13 of the Convention.

4. The application was transmitted to the Court on 1 November 1998, when Protocol No. 11 to the Convention came into force (Article 5 § 2 of Protocol No. 11).

5. The application was allocated to the Third Section of the Court (Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court). Within that Section, the Chamber that would consider the case (Article 27 § 1 of the Convention) was constituted as provided in Rule 26 § 1 of the Rules of Court.

6. Having consulted the parties, the President of the Chamber decided that in the interests of the proper administration of justice, the proceedings in the present case should be conducted simultaneously with those in the cases of Jordan v. the United Kingdom (no. 24746/94), McKerr v. the United Kingdom (no. 28883/95) and Shanaghan v. the United Kingdom (no. 37715/97).

7. Third-party comments were received from the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission on 23 March 2000, which had been given leave by the President to intervene in the written procedure (Article 36 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 61 § 3).

8. A hearing took place in public in the Human Rights Building on 4 April 2000.

There appeared before the Court:

(a) for the Government

Mr C. WHOMERSLEY,	Agent,
Mr R. WEATHERUP, QC,
Mr P. SALES,
Mr J. EADIE,
Mr N. LAVENDER,	Counsel,
Mr O. PAULIN,
Ms S. McCLELLAND,
Ms K. PEARSON,
Mr D. McILROY,
Ms S. BRODERICK,
Ms L. McALPINE,
Ms J. DONNELLY,
Mr T. TAYLOR,	Advisers;

(b) for the applicants

Mr D. KORFF,
Ms F. DOHERTY,	Counsel,
Mr P. MAGEEAN,	Solicitor.

The Court heard addresses by Mr Weatherup and Mr Korff.

9. By a decision of 4 April 2000, the Chamber declared the application admissible.

10. The applicant and the Government each filed observations on the merits (Rule 59 § 1).

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

11. The facts of the case, as submitted by the parties and which may be deduced from the documents, may be summarised as follows. The applicants accepted that the summaries below are an accurate reflection of the written statements made by the official personnel involved, without making any admission as to the credibility, consistency and veracity of these statements.

A. Background to the operation at Loughgall

12. Following a briefing that there was likely to be a terrorist attack on Loughgall station of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (the RUC) in County Armagh on 8 May 1987, twenty four soldiers and three RUC officers arrived at the station in the early hours of that day. Under the command of Soldier A, the soldiers positioned themselves in six locations surrounding the RUC station. Soldiers A, B, C, D, E and F were dressed in plain clothes and remained inside the RUC station (Position 1). All the other soldiers wore military uniform. Soldiers G, H, I and J were positioned in a wooded area to the south of the Loughgall Road, near the junction with a road which is the first on the right from the police station going towards Armagh (Position 2). Soldiers K, L, M and N were positioned in a wooded area to the south of the Loughgall road, generally opposite No. 202 Loughgall Road (Position 3). Soldiers O, P, Q and R were instructed to position themselves in a wooded area to the south of the Loughgall Road, near what is known as Ballygasey Cottage (Position 4). Soldiers S, T and U were positioned in a wooded area to the rear of St Luke's Church, on the south side of the Loughgall Road and to the east of the RUC station (Position 5). Soldiers V, W and X occupied a position in a wooded area to the north of the Loughgall Road, about 300 to 400 yards to the rear of the RUC station (Position 6).

13. Three members of the RUC, Constables A, B and C, were positioned inside the RUC station. The RUC station, which operated on a part-time basis only, was opened as normal at 9 a.m. on 8 May 1987. Police Constable A was in charge of the station, with B and C assisting him in the running of the station. The station was closed at 11 a.m., re-opened at 5 p.m. and closed again at 7 p.m.

14. At about 2.30 p.m. two hooded men hijacked a blue Toyota Hiace van from a Mr Corr, who was carrying out some work at the Snooker Club, Mountjoy Road, Dungannon, Co Tyrone. He was warned not to report the incident to the police for four hours. When the men left, Mr Corr phoned his employer, the van's owner, and told him about the incident. The owner,

Mr McGrath, waited four hours and reported the incident to Coalisland RUC at approximately 6.50 p.m.

15. At about 6 p.m., three armed men who said they were from the IRA entered the house of the Mackle family in Aghinlig Upper, Dungannon. The men said they wanted to borrow the digger and one of the sons was brought outside to fill it with diesel. At about 6.30 p.m., a vehicle pulled up outside and a fourth man arrived. It appears that a bomb containing 300 to 400 pounds of explosives was prepared in the yard of the house and placed in the bucket of the digger. At about 6.50 p.m. the digger was driven out of the yard and the other vehicle left shortly afterwards. At about 7.10 p.m. the remaining two gunmen left the house. Attempts by the family to phone the police failed as their phone and that of their neighbour were out of order. However, two of the sons eventually alerted a police patrol.

B. The incident at Loughgall

16. The soldiers reported a number of sightings of the blue Hiace van passing in front of the RUC station in both directions. Reports that the van had been hijacked, and that a digger was acting suspiciously in the area, were also received. Given this information and the knowledge that diggers had been used in previous terrorist attacks, the soldiers were on full alert when, between 7.15 and 7.30 p.m., the blue van came from the Loughgall direction and parked outside the station on the far side of the road facing Armagh.

17. A man, dressed in blue overalls and wearing a balaclava, emerged from the rear of the van and began to walk into the roadway. He raised his rifle and began to shoot at the RUC station. Soldiers A to E, who had positioned themselves at windows on the first floor of the station began to return fire without warning. Soldier F had set up the radio equipment in the rear ground floor room, and he remained there during the shooting. The driver then got out of the van and began to fire at the station. At least four more men emerged from the rear of the van and commenced firing at the station. Following continuous fire from the direction of the RUC station and from other soldiers, some of the IRA men began to take cover behind the van and others went to get into the back of the van. Soldiers A to E fired into the side of the van. Soldier B received a facial injury from flying glass after a window by which he was standing was broken by gunfire.

18. During this time, one of the IRA men drove the digger through the front gate of the station and Soldier B, having spotted this, fired a short burst at the driver. The digger stopped and shortly afterwards there was an explosion which caused masonry and dust to fly everywhere. Soldiers A to F and Constable A were unhurt by the blast, which damaged a large part of the station. Constable C was later treated for a fractured skull, damage to his left sinus, broken facial bone, a broken finger, a broken toe and bruising.

Constable B also received some injuries. Constables B and C were led outside by Constable A and Soldier C, who administered first aid to them. Soldier F also left the station by the rear and did not take any part in the shooting.

19. Soldiers A, B, D and E moved towards the front of the RUC station and continued to fire at the men near the van, firing through the sides of the van when the men took cover inside, until there was no further movement from the gunmen. In his statement to the police, Soldier B stated that he approached the van to clear it of further danger to his life and those of his colleagues. As he looked into the back of the van, he saw two men and a number of weapons. One of the men made a sudden movement and Soldier B fired one round into him as it was his belief that it was the man's intention to get one of the weapons. Soldier V stated that he approached the van with Soldier B, carrying out a visual check of the bodies. As he moved alongside the van, there was a movement in the area of a body that caught his eye. He took this as an immediate threat and fired one burst into the body.

20. Soldiers positioned in other areas also fired at the various gunmen once they had begun to shoot at the RUC station. Some of the soldiers stated that they came under fire. Shortly after the bomb exploded, Soldiers K and R observed what they thought was a gunman lying in the grass behind the police station. He failed to stand up when challenged to do so, and both soldiers fired several rounds at what turned out to be a large lump of wood. Moving down along the back of the houses towards the police station, Soldier K saw a man whom he apprehended, tied his hands and feet and handed him over to the RUC who arrested him. This man was a Mr Tennyson who was not involved in the attack. He happened on the shooting, and had left his car to seek cover when he was detained.

21. Soldier V fired at a man in a blue boiler suit crossing the road in a crouched manner. The man fell. He saw another man behind a wall and shouted to him to stand up. The man moved away quickly, then turned fully towards Soldier V who saw something in his hand which he regarded as an immediate threat and fired two bursts from his rifle until the man fell. Soldier S passing the body saw no weapon near it.

22. When the blue van and the digger arrived at the RUC station, there had been a white Citroen car right behind them. After shooting started but before the bomb went off, this car began to reverse towards the soldiers in position 5. Soldiers S, T and U opened automatic fire on the car and when they stopped firing the vehicle was about 20 metres away. The front seat passenger got out of the car despite a warning from Soldier U not to move. He was wearing blue coveralls. Almost immediately, he was hit by gunfire from Soldier U and he fell to the ground. Later realising that he was still alive, Soldiers S and U moved him onto the pavement and put two field dressings on his wounds. The driver of the car was dead at the wheel of the car.

23. Soldier W approaching the police station noticed ten feet away in the driveway a person lying on his back still moving. He saw that the man's right hand was clenched and that something metallic was protruding. Believing the man to be a threat to himself and Soldier V, he fired two shots at him. Soldier X checking the body found that the man was holding a cigarette lighter.

24. Other vehicles near the scene of the attack included a red Sierra 15 metres from position 6, occupied by a woman and her daughter, a blue Escort about 70 metres from the scene which was empty and a white Sierra, with three female occupants. These cars, or their occupants, were directed to positions of safety by soldiers as soon as the opportunity arose.

25. When the shooting ceased the soldiers and members of the RUC were airlifted back to their barracks.

C. Police investigation of the incident

26. From 7.35 p.m., officers from the RUC Criminal Investigation Department, the Scenes of Crime Department and the Northern Ireland Forensic Laboratory began arriving to survey the crime scene and identify items of forensic interest. Photographs were taken of the scene and of the bodies. The scene can be described as follows:

27. There were two significantly bullet damaged vehicles, a blue Toyota Hiace van (with approximately 125 bullet holes in the bodywork) and a white Citroen car (with approximately 34 bullet holes in the front, rear and side of the car). In the vicinity of the junction of Clovenden Road/Ballygasey Road there were bullet damaged Vauxhall Cavalier and Ford estate cars.

28. The bodies were wearing blue boiler suits except where specified otherwise.

The first body (Patrick Kelly) was found lying at the front of the van with a radio lying on the ground beside the body and a rifle lying on the body. There was debris on the rifle suggesting that this person was lying on the ground before the explosion. The pathologist noted that his right upper canine tooth had recently been torn out.

The second body (Michael Gormley) was lying on the pavement at the north side of the van near the open side door with a rifle nearby. The body was lying on top of the right leg of body 3, strongly suggesting that body 3 was lying on the ground before body 2 fell.

The third body (Seamus Donnelly) was lying on the pavement towards the north side of the Toyota van. There was ammunition and a cigarette lighter near the body. The pathologist observed at least twenty separate missile wounds (i.e. bullet and fragment) and found that discharge abrasion on an entry wound on the front of the neck indicated that when the gun was discharged the muzzle was within several feet of the body, probably while it was lying on the ground.

The fourth body (Patrick McKearney) was lying face down along the outside panel inside the rear of the van with the head towards the rear door. There was ammunition in the pocket of the boiler suit (he was also wearing a flak jacket) and in the jeans pocket. The post mortem examination revealed at least a dozen wounds to the torso and head.

The fifth body (James Lynagh) was lying diagonally across the interior of the van with the feet towards the rear door. There was ammunition in the pocket of the boiler suit and in the anorak and jeans pockets. Material on the body suggested that it was on the floor before the explosion occurred. He had received multiple bullet and fragment injuries.

There were four loaded rifles and one shotgun found in the van. Three of the stocks were folded.

The sixth body (Eugene Kelly), which had massive head damage and multiple injuries elsewhere, was seated in the driver seat of the van. There was a revolver lying between the driver's seat and his door.

The seventh body (Declan Arthurs) was lying in a lane-way opposite the premises of the Loughgall Football Club. This body was not wearing a boiler suit and there was a cigarette lighter close to the right hand.

The eighth body (Gerald O'Callaghan) was lying on its right side on the pavement at the Loughgall side of the lane-way. Twelve wounds were noted by the pathologist.

The ninth body (Antony Hughes) was seated with the seat belt on in the driver's seat of the white Citroen car. The body was not wearing a boiler suit. The post mortem examination showed twenty-nine wounds (bullet and shrapnel).

29. At 10.35 p.m. on 8 May 1987, the police took possession of the firearms used by Soldiers A to X which were delivered the following day to the Northern Ireland Forensic Science Laboratory for examination.

30. On the morning of 9 May 1987, a scene of crimes officer and forensic experts from the Northern Ireland Forensic Science Laboratory conducted an examination of the scene and took possession of a large number of exhibits. The cars were removed for expert examination.

31. Spent cartridge cases were recovered from all over the crime scene which stretched from the junction of Cloveneden Road/Ballygasey Road to the Church/Church Hall in the vicinity of the start of Main Street, Loughgall. In total, 678 spent cartridge cases were recovered, 78 of which were from IRA weapons.

32. On 9 and 10 May 1987, two forensic doctors carried out post mortem examinations of the bodies.

33. Between 9 and 12 May 1987, police officers conducted lengthy interviews with soldiers A to X, each of whom made a written statement.

On 16 March 1988, soldier L was asked by the police to clarify his statement.

34. On 21 July 1988, the RUC forwarded a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland (the DPP) on the outcome of their RUC investigation. On 22 September 1988, he concluded that the evidence did not warrant the prosecution of any person involved in the shootings. The Government stated that this decision was notified to the next-of-kin of the deceased. The applicants stated that only the family of Antony Hughes was informed.

D. The inquests

35. On 9 May 1990, the statements taken during the RUC investigation were forwarded to the Coroner.

36. On 6 September 1990, the Coroner held a preliminary meeting attended by the lawyers representing the relatives of the deceased. At their request, he adjourned the inquest which he had intended to hold on 24 September 1990, pending the determination of the Devine case, before the Court of Appeal (and subsequently the House of Lords), which concerned the powers of Coroners and the procedure at inquests. Judgments were given by the Court of Appeal on 6 December 1990 and by the House of Lords on 6 February 1992, pursuant to which it was established that rule 17 of the Coroners' Rules did not prevent coroners admitting written statements in evidence.

37. The inquests were further adjourned pending the outcome of proceedings relating to the inquests into the deaths of Gervaise McKerr, Eugene Toman and Sean Burns (see application no. 28883/95 brought by Jonathan McKerr). These proceedings involved decisions by the High Court on 2 June 1992 and 21 December 1992 and by the Court of Appeal on 28 May 1993, by which it was held that relatives' counsel was entitled to see a document used by a witness to refresh his memory. There were further proceedings before the High Court on 20 April 1994, when the writs of subpoena, by which the Coroner had attempted to obtain, inter alia, copies of the Stalker and Sampson Reports, were set aside. The McKerr, Toman and Burns inquests terminated on 8 September 1994.

38. An inquest into the deaths of the men in the present case was opened on 30 May 1995 in public before a Coroner and a jury of 10 members. It lasted four days. The RUC and Ministry of Defence were represented. On the first day of the inquest, counsel representing the families of six out of the nine deceased (Patrick Kelly, Declan Arthurs, Eugene Kelly, Michael Gormley, Seamus Donnell and Gerard O'Callaghan) sought for the statements of prospective witnesses to be made available to them at the commencement of the proceedings together with the maps and photographs. The Coroner made available the maps and photographs but did not permit counsel (other than those instructed on the Coroner's behalf) to see witness statements until the witness was giving evidence.

39. On the same day of the inquest, counsel for the six families asked for the proceedings to be adjourned to allow them to seek judicial review of the decision to refuse access to the witness statements. This adjournment was refused and, following the rejection of a second application, counsel was instructed by the six families to withdraw from the hearing to seek a remedy by way of judicial review. This step was taken on 31 May 1995 following consultation with the families and because it was felt "utterly impossible for the applicants' interests to be fairly or adequately represented given the rulings of the Coroner".

40. The hearing of the inquest proceeded without representation for any of the nine families. The Coroner heard 45 witnesses, including the brother of Antony Hughes who had been shot and injured, civilian and police eye-witnesses, including Constables A and B and the police officers involved in the investigation. None of the soldiers appeared but their statements were lodged. It was concluded on 2 June 1995 that all nine men had died from serious and multiple gun shot wounds.

41. The family of Declan Arthurs sought judicial review of the Coroner's decisions not to allow the legal representatives to see witness statements before they gave evidence, not to allow additional time to their advisers to consider expert and controversial evidence, and the refusal of the application for an adjournment. Leave was granted on 1 June 1995. In his judgment of 24 May 1996, Mr Justice McCollum in the High Court refused to quash the Coroner's decisions or the jury verdict. In doing so, the judge placed considerable emphasis on the character of an inquest as a fact finding exercise and not a method of apportioning guilt.

E. Civil proceedings

42. Seven of the families (the relatives of Antony Hughes, Kevin Antony McKearney, Michael Gormley, Seamus Donnelly, Declan Arthurs, Gerard O'Callaghan and Eugene Kelly) issued civil proceedings against the Ministry of Defence on 2 December 1988, 20 March 1990 and 4 May 1990 respectively.

43. On 25 April 1991, the Hughes family settled proceedings for 100,000 pounds sterling (GBP) in respect of Antony Hughes, who was a civilian unconnected with the IRA gunmen.

44. No further steps were taken to pursue the proceedings by the family of Kevin Antony McKearney. Regarding the remaining five families, who are represented by the same lawyer, statements of claim were issued in October 1993, alleging that the shooting of the deceased represented excessive force and was unnecessary and unlawful or, alternatively, that there was negligence, inter alia, in failing to give warnings or an opportunity to submit to lawful arrest and using excessive force.

45. On 13 January 1994, the five families issued notice of their intention to proceed with their claims.

46. On 3 March 1994, the Ministry of Defence served their defence, stating inter alia that the force used was necessary to prevent the deceased committing unlawful acts and to protect lives and personal safety. They also served a notice requesting further and better particulars of the statement of claim.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

A. Use of lethal force

47. Section 3 of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 provides inter alia:

“1. A person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime, or in effecting the arrest or assisting in the lawful arrest of offenders or suspected offenders or persons unlawfully at large.”

Self-defence or the defence of others is contained within the concept of the prevention of crime (see e.g. Smith and Hogan on Criminal Law).

B. Inquests

1. Statutory provisions and rules

48. The conduct of inquests in Northern Ireland is governed by the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959 and the Coroners (Practice and Procedure) Rules (Northern Ireland) 1963. These provide the framework for a procedure within which deaths by violence or in suspicious circumstances are notified to the Coroner, who then has the power to hold an inquest, with or without a jury, for the purpose of ascertaining, with the assistance as appropriate of the evidence of witnesses and reports, inter alia, of post mortem and forensic examinations, who the deceased was and how, when and where he died.

49. Pursuant to the Coroners Act, every medical practitioner, registrar of deaths or funeral undertaker who has reason to believe a person died directly or indirectly by violence is under an obligation to inform the Coroner (section 7). Every medical practitioner who performs a post mortem examination has to notify the Coroner of the result in writing (section 29). Whenever a dead body is found, or an unexplained death or death in suspicious circumstances occurs, the police of that district are required to give notice to the Coroner (section 8).

50. Rules 12 and 13 of the Coroners Rules give power to the Coroner to adjourn an inquest where a person may be or has been charged with murder or other specified criminal offences in relation to the deceased.

51. Where the Coroner decides to hold an inquest with a jury, persons are called from the Jury List, compiled by random computer selection from the electoral register for the district on the same basis as in criminal trials.

52. The matters in issue at an inquest are governed by Rules 15 and 16 of the Coroners Rules:

“15. The proceedings and evidence at an inquest shall be directed solely to ascertaining the following matters, namely: -

(a) who the deceased was;

(b) how, when and where the deceased came by his death;

(c) the particulars for the time being required by the Births and Deaths Registration (Northern Ireland) Order 1976 to be registered concerning his death.

16. Neither the coroner nor the jury shall express any opinion on questions of criminal or civil liability or on any matters other than those referred to in the last foregoing Rule.”

53. The forms of verdict used in Northern Ireland accord with this recommendation, recording the name and other particulars of the deceased, a statement of the cause of death (e.g. bullet wounds) and findings as to when and where the deceased met his death. In England and Wales, the form of verdict appended to the English Coroners Rules contains a section marked “conclusions of the jury/coroner as to the death” in which conclusions such as “lawfully killed” or “killed unlawfully” are inserted. These findings involve expressing an opinion on criminal liability in that they involve a finding as to whether the death resulted from a criminal act, but no finding is made that any identified person was criminally liable. The jury in England and Wales may also append recommendations to their verdict.

54. However, in Northern Ireland, the Coroner is under a duty (section 6(2) of the Prosecution of Offences Order (Northern Ireland) 1972) to furnish a written report to the DPP where the circumstances of any death appear to disclose that a criminal offence may have been committed.

55. Until recently, legal aid was not available for inquests as they did not involve the determination of civil liabilities or criminal charges. Legislation which would have provided for legal aid at the hearing of inquests (the Legal Aid, Advice and Assistance (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, Schedule 1 paragraph 5) has not been brought into force. However, on 25 July 2000, the Lord Chancellor announced the establishment of an Extra-Statutory Ex

Gratia Scheme to make public funding available for representation for proceedings before Coroners in exceptional inquests in Northern Ireland. In March 2001, he published for consultation the criteria to be used in deciding whether applications for representation at inquests should receive public funding. This included inter alia consideration of financial eligibility, whether an effective investigation by the State was needed and whether the inquest was the only way to conduct it, whether the applicant required representation to be able to participate effectively in the inquest and whether the applicant had a sufficiently close relationship to the deceased.

56. The Coroner enjoys the power to summon witnesses who he thinks it necessary to attend the inquest (section 17 of the Coroners Act) and he may allow any interested person to examine a witness (Rule 7). In both England and Wales and Northern Ireland, a witness is entitled to rely on the privilege against self-incrimination. In Northern Ireland, this privilege is reinforced by Rule 9(2) which provides that a person suspected of causing the death may not be compelled to give evidence at the inquest.

57. In relation to both documentary evidence and the oral evidence of witnesses, inquests, like criminal trials, are subject to the law of public interest immunity, which recognises and gives effect to the public interest, such as national security, in the non-disclosure of certain information or certain documents or classes of document. A claim of public interest immunity must be supported by a certificate.

2. The scope of inquests

58. Rules 15 and 16 (see above) follow from the recommendation of the Brodrick Committee on Death Certification and Coroners:

“... the function of an inquest should be simply to seek out and record as many of the facts concerning the death as the public interest requires, without deducing from those facts any determination of blame... In many cases, perhaps the majority, the facts themselves will demonstrate quite clearly whether anyone bears any responsibility for the death; there is a difference between a form of proceeding which affords to others the opportunity to judge an issue and one which appears to judge the issue itself.”

59. Domestic courts have made, inter alia, the following comments:

“... It is noteworthy that the task is not to ascertain how the deceased died, which might raise general and far-reaching issues, but ‘how...the deceased came by his death’, a far more limited question directed to the means by which the deceased came by his death.

... [previous judgments] make it clear that when the Brodrick Committee stated that one of the purposes of an inquest is ‘To allay rumours or suspicions’ this purpose should be confined to allaying rumours and suspicions of how the deceased came by his death and not to allaying rumours or suspicions about the broad circumstances in which the deceased came by his death.” (Sir Thomas Bingham, MR, Court of Appeal, R. v the Coroner for North Humberside and Scunthorpe ex parte Roy Jamieson, April 1994, unreported)

“The cases establish that although the word ‘how’ is to be widely interpreted, it means ‘by what means’ rather than in what broad circumstances ... In short, the inquiry must focus on matters directly causative of death and must, indeed, be confined to those matters alone ...” (Simon Brown LJ, Court of Appeal, R. v. Coroner for Western District of East Sussex, ex parte Homberg and others, (1994) 158 JP 357)

“... it should not be forgotten that an inquest is a fact finding exercise and not a method of apportioning guilt. The procedure and rules of evidence which are suitable for one are unsuitable for the other. In an inquest it should never be forgotten that there are no parties, no indictment, there is no prosecution, there is no defence, there is no trial, simply an attempt to establish the facts. It is an inquisitorial process, a process of investigation quite unlike a trial...

It is well recognised that a purpose of an inquest is that rumour may be allayed. But that does not mean it is the duty of the Coroner to investigate at an inquest every rumour or allegation that may be brought to his attention. It is ... his duty to discharge his statutory role - the scope of his enquiry must not be allowed to drift into the uncharted seas of rumour and allegation. He will proceed safely and properly if he investigates the facts which it appears are relevant to the statutory issues before him.” (Lord Lane, Court of Appeal, R v. South London Coroner ex parte Thompson (1982) 126 SJ 625)

3. Disclosure of documents

60. There was no requirement prior to 1999 for the families at inquests to receive copies of the written statements or documents submitted to the Coroner during the inquest. Coroners generally adopted the practice of disclosing the statements or documents during the inquest proceedings, as the relevant witness came forward to give evidence.

61. Following the recommendation of the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry, Home Office Circular No. 20/99 (concerning deaths in custody or deaths resulting from the actions of a police officer in purported execution of his duty) advised Chief Constables of police forces in England and Wales to make arrangements in such cases for the pre-inquest disclosure of documentary evidence to interested parties. This was to “help provide reassurance to the family of the deceased and other interested persons that a full and open police investigation has been conducted, and that they and their legal representatives will not be disadvantaged at the inquest”. Such disclosure was recommended to take place 28 days before the inquest.

62. Paragraph 7 of the Circular stated:

“The courts have established that statements taken by the police and other documentary material produced by the police during the investigation of a death in police custody are the property of the force commissioning the investigation. The Coroner has no power to order the pre-inquest disclosure of such material... Disclosure will therefore be on a voluntary basis..”

Paragraph 9 listed some kinds of material which require particular consideration before being disclosed, for example:

- where disclosure of documents might have a prejudicial effect on possible subsequent proceedings (criminal, civil or disciplinary);
- where the material concerns sensitive or personal information about the deceased or unsubstantiated allegations which might cause distress to the family; and
- personal information about third parties not material to the inquest.

Paragraph 11 envisaged that there would be non-disclosure of the investigating officer's report although it might be possible to disclose it in those cases which the Chief Constable considered appropriate.

C. Police Complaints Procedures

63. The police complaints procedure was governed at the relevant time by the Police (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 (the 1987 Order). This replaced the Police Complaints Board, which had been set up in 1977, by the Independent Commission for Police Complaints (the ICPC). The ICPC has been replaced from 1 October 2000 with the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland appointed under the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 1998.

64. The ICPC was an independent body, consisting of a chairman, two deputy chairmen and at least four other members. Where a complaint against the police was being investigated by a police officer or where the Chief Constable or Secretary of State considered that a criminal offence might have been committed by a police officer, the case was referred to the ICPC.

65. The ICPC was required under Article 9(1)(a) of the 1987 Order to supervise the investigation of any complaint alleging that the conduct of a RUC officer had resulted in death or serious injury. Its approval was required of the appointment of the police officer to conduct the investigation and it could require the investigating officer to be replaced (Article 9(5)(b)). A report by the investigating officer was submitted to the ICPC concerning supervised investigations at the same time as to the Chief Constable. Pursuant to Article 9(8) of the 1987 Order, the ICPC issued a statement whether the investigation had been conducted to its satisfaction and, if not, specifying any respect in which it had not been so conducted.

66. The Chief Constable was required under Article 10 of the 1987 Order to determine whether the report indicated that a criminal offence had been committed by a member of the police force. If he so decided and considered that the officer ought to be charged, he was required to send a copy of the report to the DPP. If the DPP decided not to prefer criminal charges, the Chief Constable was required to send a memorandum to the ICPC indicating whether he intended to bring disciplinary proceedings against the officer (Article 10(5)) save where disciplinary proceedings had been brought and the police officer had admitted the charges (Article 11(1)). Where the Chief Constable considered that a criminal offence had been committed but that the offence was not such that the police officer should be charged or where he considered that no criminal offence had been committed, he was required to send a memorandum indicating whether he intended to bring disciplinary charges and, if not, his reasons for not proposing to do so (Article 11(6) and (7)).

67. If the ICPC considered that a police officer subject to investigation ought to be charged with a criminal offence, it could direct the Chief Constable to send the DPP a copy of the report on that investigation (Article 12(2)). It could also recommend or direct the Chief Constable to prefer such disciplinary charges as the ICPC specified (Article 13(1) and (3)).

D. The Director of Public Prosecutions

68. The Director of Public Prosecutions (the DPP), appointed pursuant to the Prosecution of Offences (Northern Ireland) 1972 (the 1972 Order) is an independent officer with at least 10 years' experience of the practice of law in Northern Ireland who is appointed by the Attorney General and who holds office until retirement, subject only to dismissal for misconduct. His duties under Article 5 of the 1972 Order are inter alia:

“(a) to consider, or cause to be considered, with a view to his initiating or continuing in Northern Ireland any criminal proceedings or the bringing of any appeal or other proceedings in or in connection with any criminal cause or matter in Northern Ireland, any facts or information brought to his notice, whether by the Chief Constable acting in pursuance of Article 6(3) of this Order or by the Attorney General or by any other authority or person;

(b) to examine or cause to be examined all documents that are required under Article 6 of this Order to be transmitted or furnished to him and where it appears to him to be necessary or appropriate to do so to cause any matter arising thereon to be further investigated;

(c) where he thinks proper to initiate, undertake and carry on, on behalf of the Crown, proceedings for indictable offences and for such summary offences or classes of summary offences as he considers should be dealt with by him.”

69. Article 6 of the 1972 Order requires inter alia Coroners and the Chief Constable of the RUC to provide information to the DPP as follows:

“(2) Where the circumstances of any death investigated or being investigated by a coroner appear to him to disclose that a criminal offence may have been committed he shall as soon as practicable furnish to the [DPP] a written report of those circumstances.

(3) It shall be the duty of the Chief Constable, from time to time, to furnish to the [DPP] facts and information with respect to –

(a) indictable offences [such as murder] alleged to have been committed against the law of Northern Ireland; ...

and at the request of the [DPP], to ascertain and furnish to the [DPP] information regarding any matter which may appear to the [DPP] to require investigation on the ground that it may involve an offence against the law of Northern Ireland or information which may appear to the [DPP] to be necessary for the discharge of his functions under this Order.”

70. According to the Government’s observations submitted on 18 June 1998, it had been the practice of successive DPPs to refrain from giving reasons for decisions not to institute or proceed with criminal prosecutions other than in the most general terms. This practice was based upon the consideration that

- (1) if reason were given in one or more cases, they would be required to be given in all. Otherwise, erroneous conclusions might be drawn in relation to those cases where reasons were refused, involving either unjust implications regarding the guilt of some individuals or suspicions of malpractice;
- (2) the reason not to prosecute might often be the unavailability of a particular item of evidence essential to establish the case (e.g. sudden death or flight of a witness or intimidation). To indicate such a factor as the sole reason for not prosecuting might lead to assumptions of guilt in the public estimation;
- (3) the publication of the reasons might cause pain or damage to persons other than the suspect (e.g. the assessment of the credibility or mental condition of the victim or other witnesses);
- (4) in a substantial category of cases decisions not to prosecute were based on the DPP’s assessment of the public interest. Where the sole reason not to prosecute was the age, mental or physical health of the suspect, publication would not be appropriate and could lead to unjust implications;
- (5) there might be considerations of national security which affected the safety of individuals (e.g. where no prosecution could safely or fairly be brought without disclosing information which would be of assistance to terrorist organisations, would impair the effectiveness of the counter-terrorist operations of the security forces or endanger the lives of such personnel and their families or informants).

71. Decisions of the DPP not to prosecute have been subject to applications for judicial review in the High Court.

In R. v. DPP ex parte C (1995) 1 CAR, p. 141, Lord Justice Kennedy held, concerning a decision of the DPP not to prosecute in an alleged case of buggery:

“From all of those decisions it seems to me that in the context of the present case this court can be persuaded to act if and only if it is demonstrated to us that the Director of Public Prosecutions acting through the Crown Prosecution Service arrived at the decision not to prosecute:

(1) because of some unlawful policy (such as the hypothetical decision in Blackburn not to prosecute where the value of goods stolen was below £100);

(2) because the Director of Public Prosecutions failed to act in accordance with his own settled policy as set out in the code; or

(3) because the decision was perverse. It was a decision at which no reasonable prosecutor could have arrived.”

72. In the case of R. v. the DPP and Others ex parte Timothy Jones the Divisional Court on 22 March 2000 quashed a decision not to prosecute for alleged gross negligence causing a death in dock unloading on the basis that the reasons given by the DPP – that the evidence was not sufficient to provide a realistic prospect of satisfying a jury - required further explanation.

73. R. v. DPP ex parte Patricia Manning and Elizabeth Manning (decision of the Divisional Court of 17 May 2000) concerned the DPP’s decision not to prosecute any prison officer for manslaughter in respect of the death of a prisoner, although the inquest jury had reached a verdict of unlawful death - there was evidence that prison officers had used a neck lock which was forbidden and dangerous. The DPP reviewing the case still concluded that the Crown would be unable to establish manslaughter from gross negligence. The Lord Chief Justice noted:

“Authority makes clear that a decision by the Director not to prosecute is susceptible to judicial review: see, for example, R. v. Director of Public Prosecutions, ex parte C [1995] 1 Cr. App. R. 136. But, as the decided cases also make clear, the power of review is one to be sparingly exercised. The reasons for this are clear. The primary decision to prosecute or not to prosecute is entrusted by Parliament to the Director as head of an independent, professional prosecuting service, answerable to the Attorney General in his role as guardian of the public interest, and to no-one else. It makes no difference that in practice the decision will ordinarily be taken by a senior member of the CPS, as it was here, and not by the Director personally. In any borderline case the decision may be one of acute difficulty, since while a defendant whom a jury would be likely to convict should properly be brought to justice and tried, a defendant whom a jury would be likely to acquit should not be subjected to the trauma inherent in a criminal trial. If, in a case such as the present, the Director’s provisional decision is not to prosecute, that decision will be subject to review by Senior Treasury Counsel who will exercise an independent professional judgment. The Director and his officials (and Senior Treasury Counsel when consulted) will bring to their task of deciding whether to prosecute an experience and expertise which most courts called upon to review their decisions could not match. In most cases the decision will turn not on an analysis of the relevant legal principles but on the exercise of an informed judgment of how a case against a particular defendant, if brought, would be likely to fare in the context of a criminal trial before (in a serious case such as this) a jury. This exercise of judgment involves an assessment of the strength, by the end of the trial, of the evidence against the defendant and of the likely defences. It will often be impossible to stigmatise a judgment on such matters as wrong even if one disagrees with it. So the courts will not easily find that a decision not to prosecute is bad in law, on which basis alone the court is entitled to interfere. At the same time, the standard of review should not be set too high, since judicial review is the only means by which the citizen can seek redress against a decision not to prosecute and if the test were too exacting an effective remedy would be denied.”

As regards whether the DPP had a duty to give reasons, the Lord Chief Justice said:

“It is not contended that the Director is subject to an obligation to give reasons in every case in which he decides not to prosecute. Even in the small and very narrowly defined cases which meet Mr Blake’s conditions set out above, we do not understand domestic law or the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights to impose an absolute and unqualified obligation to give reasons for a decision not to prosecute. But the right to life is the most fundamental of all human rights. It is put at the forefront of the Convention. The power to derogate from it is very limited. The death of a person in the custody of the State must always arouse concern, as recognised by section 8(1)(c), (3)(b) and (6) of the Coroner’s Act 1988, and if the death resulted from violence inflicted by agents of the State that concern must be profound. The holding of an inquest in public by an independent judicial official, the coroner, in which interested parties are able to participate must in our view be regarded as a full and effective inquiry (see McCann v. United Kingdom [1996] 21 EHRR 97, paragraphs 159 to 164). Where such an inquest following a proper direction to the jury culminates in a lawful verdict of unlawful killing implicating a person who, although not named in the verdict, is clearly identified, who is living and whose whereabouts are known, the ordinary expectation would naturally be that a prosecution would follow. In the absence of compelling grounds for not giving reasons, we would expect the Director to give reasons in such a case: to meet the reasonable expectation of interested parties that either a prosecution would follow or a reasonable explanation for not prosecuting be given, to vindicate the Director’s decision by showing that solid grounds exist for what might otherwise appear to be a surprising or even inexplicable decision and to meet the European Court’s expectation that if a prosecution is not to follow a plausible explanation will be given. We would be very surprised if such a general practice were not welcome to Members of Parliament whose constituents have died in such circumstances. We readily accept that such reasons would have to be drawn with care and skill so as to respect third party and public interests and avoid undue prejudice to those who would have no opportunity to defend themselves. We also accept that time and skill would be needed to prepare a summary which was reasonably brief but did not distort the true basis of the decision. But the number of cases which meet Mr Blake’s conditions is very small (we were told that since 1981, including deaths in police custody, there have been seven such cases), and the time and expense involved could scarcely be greater than that involved in resisting an application for judicial review. In any event it would seem to be wrong in principle to require the citizen to make a complaint of unlawfulness against the Director in order to obtain a response which good administrative practice would in the ordinary course require.”

On this basis, the court reviewed whether the reasons given by the DPP in that case were in accordance with the Code for Crown Prosecutors and capable of supporting a decision not to prosecute. It found that the decision had failed to take relevant matters into account and that this vitiated the decision not to prosecute. The decision was quashed and the DPP was required to reconsider his decision whether or not to prosecute.

74. In the Matter of an Application by David Adams for Judicial Review, the High Court in Northern Ireland on 7 June 2000 considered the applicant's claim that the DPP had failed to give adequate and intelligible reasons for his decision not to prosecute any police officer concerned in the arrest during which he had suffered serious injuries and for which in civil proceedings he had obtained an award of damages against the police. It noted that there was no statutory obligation on the DPP under the 1972 Order to give reasons and considered that not duty to give reasons could be implied. The fact that the DPP in England and Wales had in a number of cases furnished detailed reasons, whether from increasing concern for transparency or in the interests of the victim's families, was a matter for his discretion. It concluded on the basis of authorities that only in exceptional cases such as the Manning case (paragraph 73 above) would the DPP be required to furnish reasons to a victim for failing to prosecute and that review should be limited to where the principles identified by Lord Justice Kennedy (paragraph 71 above) were infringed. Notwithstanding the findings in the civil case, they were not persuaded that the DPP had acted in such an aberrant, inexplicable or irrational manner that the case cried out for reasons to be furnished as to why he had so acted.

III. RELEVANT INTERNATIONAL LAW AND PRACTICE

A. The United Nations

75. The United Nations Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials (UN Force and Firearms Principles) were adopted on 7 September 1990 by the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders.

76. Paragraph 9 of the UN Force and Firearms Principles provides, inter alia, that the "intentional lethal use of firearms may only be made when strictly unavoidable in order to protect life".

77. Other relevant provisions read as follows:

Paragraph 10

"... law enforcement officials shall identify themselves as such and shall give a clear warning of their intent to use firearms, with sufficient time for the warnings to be observed, unless to do so would unduly place the law enforcement officials at risk or would create a risk of death or serious harm to other persons, or would be clearly inappropriate or pointless in the circumstances of the incident."

Paragraph 22

"... Governments and law enforcement agencies shall ensure that an effective review process is available and that independent administrative or prosecutorial authorities are in a position to exercise jurisdiction in appropriate circumstances. In cases of death and serious injury or other grave consequences, a detailed report shall be sent promptly to the competent authorities responsible for administrative review and judicial control."

Paragraph 23

“Persons affected by the use of force and firearms or their legal representatives shall have access to an independent process, including a judicial process. In the event of the death of such persons, this provision shall apply to their dependants accordingly.”

78. Paragraph 9 of the United Nations Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, adopted on 24 May 1989 by the Economic and Social Council Resolution 1989/65, (UN Principles on Extra-Legal Executions) provides, inter alia, that:

“There shall be a thorough, prompt and impartial investigation of all suspected cases of extra legal, arbitrary and summary executions, including cases where complaints by relatives or other reliable reports suggest unnatural death in the above circumstances ...”

79. Paragraphs 10 to 17 of the UN Principles on Extra-Legal Executions contain a series of detailed requirements that should be observed by investigative procedures into such deaths.

Paragraph 10 states, inter alia:

“The investigative authority shall have the power to obtain all the information necessary to the inquiry. Those persons conducting the inquiry ... shall also have the authority to oblige officials allegedly involved in any such executions to appear and testify ...”

Paragraph 11 specifies:

“In cases in which the established investigative procedures are inadequate because of a lack of expertise or impartiality, because of the importance of the matter or because of the apparent existence of a pattern of abuse, and in cases where there are complaints from the family of the victim about these inadequacies or other substantial reasons, Governments shall pursue investigations through an independent commission of inquiry or similar procedure. Members of such a commission shall be chosen for their recognised impartiality, competence and independence as individuals. In particular, they shall be independent of any institution, agency or person that may be the subject of the inquiry. The commission shall have the authority to obtain all information necessary to the inquiry and shall conduct the inquiry as provided in these principles.”

Paragraph 16 provides, inter alia:

“Families of the deceased and their legal representatives shall be informed of, and have access to, any hearing as well as all information relevant to the investigation and shall be entitled to present other evidence ...”

Paragraph 17 provides, inter alia:

“A written report shall be made within a reasonable time on the methods and findings of such investigations. The report shall be made public immediately and shall include the scope of the inquiry, procedures, methods used to evaluate evidence as well as conclusions and recommendations based on findings of fact and on applicable law ...”

80. The “Minnesota Protocol” (Model Protocol for a legal investigation of extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions, contained in the UN Manual on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions) provides, inter alia, in section B on the “Purposes of an inquiry”:

“As set out in paragraph 9 of the Principles, the broad purpose of an inquiry is to discover the truth about the events leading to the suspicious death of a victim. To fulfil that purpose, those conducting the inquiry shall, at a minimum, seek:

- (a) to identify the victim;
- (b) to recover and preserve evidentiary material related to the death to aid in any potential prosecution of those responsible;
- (c) to identify possible witnesses and obtain statements from them concerning the death;
- (d) to determine the cause, manner, location and time of death, as well as any pattern or practice that may have brought about the death;
- (e) to distinguish between natural death, accidental death, suicide and homicide;
- (f) to identify and apprehend the person(s) involved in the death;
- (g) to bring the suspected perpetrator(s) before a competent court established by law.”

In section D, it is stated that “In cases where government involvement is suspected, an objective and impartial investigation may not be possible unless a special commission of inquiry is established ...”

B. The European Committee for the Prevention of Torture

81. In the report on its visit to the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man from 8 to 17 September 1999, published on 13 January 2000, the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture (the CPT) reviewed the system of preferring criminal and disciplinary charges against police officers accused of ill-treating persons. It commented, inter alia, on the statistically few criminal prosecutions and disciplinary proceedings which were brought, and identified certain aspects of the procedures which cast doubt on their effectiveness:

The chief officers appointed officers from the same force to conduct the investigations, save in exceptional cases where they appointed an officer from another force, and the majority of investigations were unsupervised by the Police Complaints Authority.

It stated at paragraph 55:

“As already indicated, the CPT itself entertains reservations about whether the PCA [the Police Complaints Authority], even equipped with the enhanced powers which have been proposed, will be capable of persuading public opinion that complaints against the police are vigorously investigated. In the view of the CPT, the creation of a fully-fledged independent investigating agency would be a most welcome development. Such a body should certainly, like the PCA, have the power to direct that disciplinary proceedings be instigated against police officers. Further, in the interests of bolstering public confidence, it might also be thought appropriate that such a body be invested with the power to remit a case directly to the CPS for consideration of whether or not criminal proceedings should be brought.

In any event, the CPT recommends that the role of the ‘chief officer’ within the existing system be reviewed. To take the example of one Metropolitan Police officer to whom certain of the chief officer’s functions have been delegated (the Director of the CIB [Criminal Investigations Bureau]), he is currently expected to: seek dispensations from the PCA; appoint investigating police officers and assume managerial responsibility for their work; determine whether an investigating officer’s report indicates that a criminal offence may have been committed; decide whether to bring disciplinary proceedings against a police officer on the basis of an investigating officer’s report, and liaise with the PCA on this question; determine which disciplinary charges should be brought against an officer who is to face charges; in civil cases, negotiate settlement strategies and authorise payments into court. It is doubtful whether it is realistic to expect any single official to be able to perform all of these functions in an entirely independent and impartial way.

57. ...Reference should also be made to the high degree of public interest in CPS [Crown Prosecution Service] decisions regarding the prosecution of police officers (especially in cases involving allegations of serious misconduct). Confidence about the manner in which such decisions are reached would certainly be strengthened were the CPS to be obliged to give detailed reasons in cases where it was decided that no criminal proceedings should be brought. The CPT recommends that such a requirement be introduced.”

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 2 OF THE CONVENTION

82. The applicants submitted that their relatives had been unjustifiably killed and that there had been no effective investigation into the circumstances of their death. They invoked Article 2 of the Convention which provides:

“1. Everyone’s right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

2. Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this Article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:

- (a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
- (b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
- (c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.”

A. The submissions made to the Court

1. The applicant

83. The applicants submitted that the death of their relatives was the result of the unnecessary and disproportionate use of force by SAS soldiers and that their relatives were the victims of a shoot-to-kill policy operated by the United Kingdom Government in Northern Ireland. They argued that in this case the planning and conduct of the operation were such as to suggest that its object was to kill all those involved or that it was negligent as to whether deaths would occur. They referred to the context in which the authorities were applying a more aggressive security response, to the prior knowledge which the security forces had of the operation, including the members of the IRA involved, the fact that no steps were taken to arrest or intercept the IRA members before the incident and that the operation was run as an ambush intended to kill those walking into it. There was no attempt to warn or arrest the IRA members when they arrived on the scene. Instead, there was a heavy concentration of fire which also placed civilians at risk of death and injury. No attempt was made to stop civilian cars from entering the location of the ambush. Having regard to the number and type of bullets fired (600 bullets were recovered out of a possible 2585 used and a mixture of ball tracer and armour piercing ammunition employed), the fact that at least three of the dead men were unarmed, the way in which the soldiers acted to neutralise any perceived threat and the evidence that at least one man (Seamus Donnelly) had been shot at close range while on the ground, the operation could not be regarded as employing minimum or proportionate force.

84. The inadequate investigations into this and other cases were also evidence of official tolerance on the part of the State of the use of unlawful lethal force. Here, none of the soldiers were arrested although there were grounds for doing so. They were allowed to leave the scene and not questioned for up to three days later. They had not been isolated from each other and their statements bore remarkable similarity in language, structure and content.

85. The applicants submitted that, while they had been denied any effective resolution to their claims, there was sufficient evidence to justify the Court in ruling that there had been a substantive violation of Article 2. They pointed out that the Government had not presented any arguments that the authorities had done their best to minimise the risk to life during the operation. To the extent that the Court felt unable to reach any conclusions on the facts, they argued that the Court should hear evidence from the soldiers and police officers involved in the incident and the investigation.

86. The applicants further submitted that there had been no effective official investigation carried out into the killings, relying on the international standards set out in the Minnesota Protocol. They argued that the RUC investigation was inadequate and flawed by its lack of independence from the security forces involved in the operation, as well as a lack of publicity or input from the family. The DPP's own role was limited by the RUC investigation and he did not make public his reasons for not prosecuting. The inquest procedure was flawed by the delays, the limited scope of the enquiry which could not deal with issues of training or planning or control of the operation, a lack of legal aid for relatives, a lack of access to documents and witness statements, the non-compellability of security force or police witnesses and the use of public interest immunity certificates. The Government could not rely on civil proceedings either, as this depended on the initiative of the deceased's family.

2. The Government

87. While the Government did not accept the applicants' claims under Article 2 that their relatives were killed by any excessive or unjustified use of force, they considered that it would be wholly inappropriate for the Court to seek itself to determine the issues of fact arising on the substantive issues of Article 2. This might involve the Court seeking to resolve issues, and perhaps examining witnesses and conducting hearings, at the same time as the High Court in Northern Ireland, with a real risk of inconsistent findings. It would also allow the applicants to forum-shop and would thus undermine the principle of exhaustion of domestic remedies. They submitted that there were in any event considerable practical difficulties for the Court to pursue an examination of the substantive aspects of Article 2 as the factual issues would be numerous and complex, involving live evidence with a substantial number of witnesses. This primary fact finding exercise should not be performed twice, in parallel, such an undertaking wasting court time and costs and giving rise to a real risk of prejudice in having to defend two sets of proceedings simultaneously.

88. Insofar as the applicants invited the Court to find a practice of killing rather than arresting terrorist suspects, this allegation was emphatically denied. The Government submitted that such a wide ranging allegation calling into question every anti-terrorist operation over the last thirty years went far beyond the scope of this application and referred to matters not before this Court. They denied that there had been any inadequacy in the investigation in this case. The police officers who investigated had no prior knowledge of, or involvement in the operation, and their independence and integrity were not compromised by the fact that they were stationed in Armagh. The soldiers were interviewed as soon as the interviewing officers were ready to do so and the number of soldiers involved resulted in the process taking several days. They were entitled to have their legal advisers present and were instructed not to discuss the incident beforehand or to bring statements ready prepared. There was no evidence of collusion in the statements given.

89. The Government further denied that domestic law in any way failed to comply with the requirements of this provision. They argued that the procedural aspect of Article 2 was satisfied by the combination of procedures available in Northern Ireland, namely, the police investigation, which was supervised by the ICPC and by the DPP, the inquest proceedings and civil proceedings. These secured the fundamental purpose of the procedural obligation, in that they provided for effective accountability for the use of lethal force by State agents. This did not require that a criminal prosecution be brought but that the investigation was capable of leading to a prosecution, which was the case in this application. They also pointed out that each case had to be judged on its facts since the effectiveness of any procedural ingredient may vary with the circumstances. In the present case, they submitted that the available procedures together provided the necessary effectiveness, independence and transparency by way of safeguards against abuse.

3. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission

90. Referring to relevant international standards concerning the right to life (e.g. the Inter-American Court's case-law and the findings of the UN Human Rights Committee), the Commission submitted that the State had to carry out an effective official investigation when an agent of the State was involved or implicated in the use of lethal force. Internal accountability procedures had to satisfy the standards of effectiveness, independence, transparency and promptness, and facilitate punitive sanctions. It was however, in their view, not sufficient for a State to declare that while certain mechanisms were inadequate, a number of such mechanisms regarded cumulatively could provide the necessary protection. They submitted that the investigative mechanisms relied on in this case, singly or combined, failed to do so. They referred, inter alia, to the problematic role of the RUC in Northern Ireland, the allegedly serious deficiencies in the mechanisms of police accountability, the limited scope of and delays in inquests, and the lack of compellability of the members of the security forces who have used lethal force to appear at inquests. They drew the Court's attention to the form of enquiry carried out in Scotland under the Sheriff, a judge of criminal and civil jurisdiction, where the next of kin have a right to appear. They urged the Court to take the opportunity to give precise guidance as to the form which investigations into the use of lethal force by State agents should take.

B. The Court's assessment

1. General principles

91. Article 2, which safeguards the right to life and sets out the circumstances when deprivation of life may be justified, ranks as one of the most fundamental provisions in the Convention, to which in peacetime no derogation is permitted under Article 15. Together with Article 3, it also enshrines one of the basic values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe. The circumstances in which deprivation of life may be justified must therefore be strictly construed. The object and purpose of the Convention as an instrument for the protection of individual human beings also requires that Article 2 be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective (see the McCann and Others v. the United Kingdom judgment of 27 September 1995, Series A no. 324, pp. 45-46, §§ 146-147).

92. In the light of the importance of the protection afforded by Article 2, the Court must subject deprivations of life to the most careful scrutiny, taking into consideration not only the actions of State agents but also all the surrounding circumstances. Where the events in issue lie wholly, or in large part, within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities, as for example in the case of persons within their control in custody, strong presumptions of fact will arise in respect of injuries and death which occur. Indeed, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation (see Salman v. Turkey [GC] no. 21986/93, ECHR 2000-VII, § 100, and also Çakıcı v. Turkey, [GC] ECHR 1999- IV, § 85, Ertak v. Turkey no. 20764/92 [Section 1] ECHR 2000-V, § 32 and Timurtaş v. Turkey, no; 23531/94 [Section 1] ECHR 2000-VI, § 82).

93. The text of Article 2, read as a whole, demonstrates that it covers not only intentional killing but also the situations where it is permitted to “use force” which may result, as an unintended outcome, in the deprivation of life. The deliberate or intended use of lethal force is only one factor however to be taken into account in assessing its necessity. Any use of force must be no more than “absolutely necessary” for the achievement of one or more of the purposes set out in sub-paragraphs (a) to (c). This term indicates that a stricter and more compelling test of necessity must be employed from that normally applicable when determining whether State action is “necessary in a democratic society” under paragraphs 2 of Articles 8 to 11 of the Convention. Consequently, the force used must be strictly proportionate to the achievement of the permitted aims (the McCann judgment, cited above, §§ 148-149).

94. The obligation to protect the right to life under Article 2 of the Convention, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under Article 1 of the Convention to "secure to everyone within [its] jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in [the] Convention", also requires by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force (see, mutatis mutandis, the McCann judgment, cited above, p. 49, § 161, and the Kaya v. Turkey judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-I, p. 329, § 105). The essential purpose of such investigation is to secure the effective implementation of the domestic laws which protect the right to life and, in those cases involving State agents or bodies, to ensure their accountability for deaths occurring under their responsibility. What form of investigation will achieve those purposes may vary in different circumstances. However, whatever mode is employed, the authorities must act of their own motion, once the matter has come to their attention. They cannot leave it to the initiative of the next of kin either to lodge a formal complaint or to take responsibility for the conduct of any investigative procedures (see, for example, mutatis mutandis, İlhan v. Turkey [GC] no. 22277/93, ECHR 2000-VII, § 63).

95. For an investigation into alleged unlawful killing by State agents to be effective, it may generally be regarded as necessary for the persons responsible for and carrying out the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events (see e.g. Güleç v. Turkey judgment of 27 July 1998, Reports 1998-IV, §§ 81-82; Öğür v. Turkey, [GC] no. 21954/93, ECHR 1999-III, §§ 91-92). This means not only a lack of hierarchical or institutional connection but also a practical independence (see for example the case of Ergi v. Turkey judgment of 28 July 1998, Reports 1998-IV, §§ 83-84 where the public prosecutor investigating the death of a girl during an alleged clash showed a lack of independence through his heavy reliance on the information provided by the gendarmes implicated in the incident).

96. The investigation must also be effective in the sense that it is capable of leading to a determination of whether the force used in such cases was or was not justified in the circumstances (e.g. Kaya v. Turkey judgment, cited above, p. 324, § 87) and to the identification and punishment of those responsible. This is not an obligation of result, but of means. The authorities must have taken the reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including inter alia eye witness testimony, forensic evidence and, where appropriate, an autopsy which provides a complete and accurate record of injury and an objective analysis of clinical findings, including the cause of death (see concerning autopsies, e.g. Salman v. Turkey cited above, § 106; concerning witnesses e.g.

Tanrikulu v. Turkey [GC], no. 23763/94, ECHR 199-IV, § 109; concerning forensic evidence e.g. Gül v. Turkey, 22676/93, [Section 4], § 89). Any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the cause of death or the person responsible will risk falling foul of this standard.

97. A requirement of promptness and reasonable expedition is implicit in this context (see Yaşa v. Turkey judgment of 2 September 1998, Reports 1998-IV, pp. 2439-2440, §§ 102-104; Cakıcı v. Turkey cited above, §§ 80, 87 and 106; Tanrikulu v. Turkey, cited above, § 109; Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, no. 22535/93, [Section I] ECHR 2000-III, §§ 106-107). It must be accepted that there may be obstacles or difficulties which prevent progress in an investigation in a particular situation. However, a prompt response by the authorities in investigating a use of lethal force may generally be regarded as essential in maintaining public confidence in their adherence to the rule of law and in preventing any appearance of collusion in or tolerance of unlawful acts.

98. For the same reasons, there must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny of the investigation or its results to secure accountability in practice as well as in theory. The degree of public scrutiny required may well vary from case to case. In all cases, however, the next of kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests (see Güleç v. Turkey, cited above, p. 1733, § 82, where the father of the victim was not informed of the decisions not to prosecute; Öğür v. Turkey, cited above, § 92, where the family of the victim had no access to the investigation and court documents; Gül v. Turkey judgment, cited above, § 93).

2. Application in the present case

a. Concerning alleged responsibility of the State for the death of the nine men at Loughgall

99. It is undisputed that the nine men at Loughgall were shot and killed by SAS soldiers. Three of the men at least were unarmed: Antony Hughes who was a civilian unconnected with the IRA, as well as the IRA members Declan Arthurs and Gerard O'Callaghan. This use of lethal force falls squarely within the ambit of Article 2, which requires any such action to pursue one of the purposes set out in second paragraph and to be no more than absolutely necessary for that purpose. A number of key factual issues arise in this case, in particular whether any warnings could have been given; whether the soldiers acted on an honest belief perceived for good reasons to be valid at the time but which turned out subsequently to be mistaken, namely, that they were at risk from the men who were shot, and whether any of the deceased were shot when they were already injured and on the ground in circumstances where it would have been possible to carry out an arrest.

Determining these issues would involve inter alia careful scrutiny of the accounts of the soldiers as to the circumstances in which they fired their weapons during the operation. Assessment of the credibility and reliability of the various witnesses would play a crucial role.

100. These are matters which were raised in the civil proceedings lodged by seven of the families. The action in negligence brought by the family of Antony Hughes was settled, the family of Kevin McKearney have dropped their proceedings, whilst the claims of five other families are still pending (see paragraphs 42-46 above).

(i) Concerning the five families involved in pending civil proceedings

101. The Court considers that in the circumstances of this case it would be inappropriate and contrary to its subsidiary role under the Convention to attempt to establish the facts of this case by embarking on a fact finding exercise of its own by summoning witnesses. Such an exercise would duplicate the proceedings before the civil courts which are better placed and equipped as fact finding tribunals. While the European Commission of Human Rights has previously embarked on fact finding missions in cases from Turkey where there were pending proceedings against the alleged security force perpetrators of unlawful killings, it may be noted that these proceedings were criminal and had terminated, at first instance at least, by the time the Court was examining the applications. In those cases, it was an essential part of the applicants' allegations that the defects in the investigation were such as to render those criminal proceedings ineffective (see e.g. Salman v. Turkey, cited above, § 107, where the police officers were acquitted of torture due to the lack of evidence resulting principally from a defective autopsy procedure; Gül v. Turkey, cited above, § 89, where inter alia the forensic investigation at the scene and autopsy procedures hampered any effective reconstruction of events).

102. In the present case, the Court does not consider that there are any elements established which would deprive the civil courts of their ability to establish the facts and determine the lawfulness or otherwise of the deaths (see further below concerning the applicants' allegations about the defects in the police investigation, §§ 112-113).

103. Nor is the Court persuaded that it is appropriate to rely on the documentary material provided by the parties to reach any conclusions as to responsibility for the death of the applicants' relatives. The written accounts provided have not been tested in examination or cross-examination and would provide an incomplete and potentially misleading basis for any such attempt. The situation cannot be equated to a death in custody where the burden may be regarded as resting on the State to provide a satisfactory and plausible explanation.

104. The Court is also not prepared to conduct, on the basis largely of statistical information and selective evidence, an analysis of incidents over the past thirty years with a view to establishing whether they disclose a practice by security forces of using disproportionate force. This would go far beyond the scope of the present application.

105. Conversely, as regards the Government's argument that the availability of civil proceedings provided the applicants with a remedy which they have not exhausted as regards Article 35 § 1 of the Convention and, therefore, that no further examination of the case is required under the Article 2, the Court recalls that the obligations of the State under Article 2 cannot be satisfied merely by awarding damages (see e.g. Kaya v. Turkey, p. 329, § 105; Yaşa v. Turkey, p. 2431, § 74). The investigations required under Articles 2 and 13 of the Convention must be able to lead to the identification and punishment of those responsible. The Court therefore examines below whether there has been compliance with this procedural aspect of Article 2 of the Convention.

106. The Court considers that in bringing civil proceedings for aggravated damages in respect of her husband Antony Hughes the applicant, Bridget Hughes, has used the local remedies available. It has not been shown that the state of domestic law per se fails to comply with the Convention standards or that there has been an administrative practice which would render civil procedures ineffective as a remedy for her complaints. Nor has it been shown that the applicant had no alternative to accepting the settlement offered by the authorities in those proceedings and therefore that the civil courts offered no prospect to the applicant of obtaining a finding of liability in her favour.

107. The Court therefore finds that in settling her claims in civil proceedings concerning the death of her husband, and in accepting and receiving compensation, the applicant has effectively renounced further use of these remedies. She may no longer, in these circumstances, claim to be a victim of a violation of the Convention as regards the alleged excessive or disproportionate force used in killing her husband. Her complaints concerning the procedural obligations under Article 2 will be considered below, with those of the other applicants.

(iii) Concerning the families who did not pursue or lodge any civil proceedings

108. The Court has noted above that civil proceedings offered the possibility of obtaining a determination of the issues of lawfulness of the use of force, including its proportionality, as well as providing the possibility of compensation. The applicants have stated that it was not worthwhile to embark on such proceedings as the practice of the State in offering settlements prevented any admissions of liability being issued by the courts, which was what they wanted rather than money as such.

109. The Court observes that in only one of the seven cases introduced by the applicants was a settlement offered by the authorities. In the previous case of Caraheer v. the United Kingdom, (no. 24520/94, decision [Section 3] 11.01.00), where the applicant accepted a settlement of her action in respect of the killing of her husband by two soldiers, the Court did not find that the civil proceedings had been shown to be ineffective as a means of redress for the applicant's complaints. It finds nothing in the submissions of the applicants in this case to persuade it to reach another conclusion.

110. Consequently, as regards those applicants who did not take or pursue civil proceedings regarding the alleged unlawfulness of the deaths of their relatives, the Court finds that they have failed to make use of the available domestic remedies. It is therefore precluded from examining the applicants' complaints of a substantive violation of Article 2 due to the alleged excessive use of force or negligence in the planning or control of the operation. Their complaints concerning the procedural obligations under Article 2 will be considered below, with those of the other applicants.

b. Concerning the procedural obligation under Article 2 of the Convention

111. Following the deaths of the nine men at Loughgall, an investigation was commenced by the RUC. On the basis of that investigation, there was a decision by the DPP not to prosecute any soldier. An inquest was opened on 30 May 1995 and terminated on 2 June 1995 with verdicts that the nine men had died from serious and multiple gun shot wounds.

112. The applicants have made numerous complaints about these procedures, while the Government have contended that even if one part of the procedure failed to provide a particular safeguard, taken as a whole, the system ensured the requisite accountability of the police for any unlawful act.

(i) The police investigation

113. Firstly, concerning the police investigation, the Court finds little substance in the applicants' criticisms. It appears that the investigation started immediately after the operation ended. The necessary scene of the incident procedures were carried out and evidence secured. The appropriate forensic examinations were conducted. While the soldiers were not interviewed immediately, the interviews were concluded within three days, a not unreasonable period of time considering the numbers involved. While the applicants alleged that the soldiers were not kept apart from their colleagues and their statements showed similarities, the Court does not find any striking signs of stereotyping which would support a finding that the investigators had colluded in, or facilitated, the production of co-ordinated statements.

114. The applicants also complained that the RUC officers involved in the investigation could not be regarded as independent or impartial. While the investigating officers did not appear to be connected structurally or factually with the soldiers under investigation, the operation at Loughgall was nonetheless conducted jointly with local police officers, some of whom were injured, and with the co-operation and knowledge of the RUC in that area. Even though it also appears that, as required by law, this investigation was supervised by the ICPC, an independent police monitoring authority, this cannot provide a sufficient safeguard where the investigation itself has been for all practical purposes conducted by police officers connected, albeit indirectly, with the operation under investigation. The Court notes the recommendation of the CPT that a fully independent investigating agency would help to overcome the lack of confidence in the system which exists in England and Wales and is in some respects similar (see paragraph 81 above).

115. It is furthermore the case that the investigation was not open to the public and did not involve the applicants or the families. Investigation files are not accessible in this way in the United Kingdom, the Government submitting that the efficiency of procedures requires that the contents be kept confidential until the later stages of a prosecution. The Court considers that disclosure or publication of police reports and investigative materials may involve sensitive issues with possible prejudicial effects to private individuals or other investigations and, therefore, cannot be regarded as an automatic requirement under Article 2. The requisite access of the public, or the victim's relatives may be provided for in other stages of the available procedures.

(ii) The role of the DPP

116. The Court recalls that the DPP is an independent legal officer charged with the responsibility to decide whether to bring prosecutions in respect of any possible criminal offences carried out by a police officer. He is not required to give reasons for any decision not to prosecute and in this case he did not do so. No challenge by way of judicial review exists to require him to give reasons in Northern Ireland, though it may be noted that in England and Wales, where the inquest jury may still reach verdicts of unlawful death, the courts have required the DPP to reconsider a decision not to prosecute in the light of such a verdict, and will review whether those reasons are sufficient. This possibility does not exist in Northern Ireland where the inquest jury is no longer permitted to issue verdicts concerning the lawfulness or otherwise of a death.

117. The Court does not doubt the independence of the DPP. However, where the police investigation procedure is itself open to doubts of a lack of independence and is not amenable to public scrutiny, it is of increased importance that the officer who decides whether or not to prosecute also gives an appearance of independence in his decision-making. Where no reasons are given in a controversial incident involving the use of lethal force, this may in itself not be conducive to public confidence. It also denies the family of the victim access to information about a matter of crucial importance to them and prevents any legal challenge of the decision.

118. In this case, nine men were shot and killed, of whom one was unconnected with the IRA and two others at least were unarmed. It is a situation which, to borrow the words of the domestic courts, cries out for an explanation. The applicants however were not informed of why the shootings were regarded as not disclosing a criminal offence or as not meriting a prosecution of the soldiers concerned. There was no reasoned decision available to reassure a concerned public that the rule of law had been respected. This cannot be regarded as compatible with the requirements of Article 2, unless that information was forthcoming in some other way. This however is not the case.

(iii) The inquest

119. In Northern Ireland, as in England and Wales, investigations into deaths may also be conducted by inquests. Inquests are public hearings conducted by coroners, independent judicial officers, normally sitting with a jury, to determine the facts surrounding a suspicious death. Judicial review lies from procedural decisions by coroners and in respect of any mistaken directions given to the jury. There are thus strong safeguards as to the lawfulness and propriety of the proceedings. In the case of McCann and Others v. the United Kingdom (cited above, p. 49, § 162), the Court found that the inquest held into the deaths of the three IRA suspects shot by the SAS on Gibraltar satisfied the procedural obligation contained in Article 2, as it provided a detailed review of the events surrounding the killings and provided the relatives of the deceased with the opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses involved in the operation.

120. There are however a number of differences between the inquest as held in the McCann case and those in Northern Ireland.

121. In inquests in Northern Ireland, any person suspected of causing the death may not be compelled to give evidence (Rule 9(2) of the 1963 Coroners Rules, see paragraph 56 above). In practice, in inquests involving the use of lethal force by members of the security forces in Northern Ireland, the police officers or soldiers concerned do not attend. Instead, written statements or transcripts of interviews are admitted in evidence. At the inquest in this case, none of the soldiers A to X appeared. They have therefore not been subject to examination concerning their account of events. The records of their statements taken in interviews with investigating police officers were made available to the Coroner instead (see paragraphs 16 to 23 above). This does not enable any satisfactory assessment to be made of either their reliability or credibility on crucial factual issues. It detracts from the inquest's capacity to establish the facts immediately relevant to the death, in particular the lawfulness of the use of force and thereby to achieve one of the purposes required by Article 2 of the Convention (see also paragraph 10 of the United Nations Principles on Extra-Legal Executions cited at paragraph 79 above).

122. It is also alleged that the inquest in this case is restricted in the scope of its examination. According to the case-law of the national courts, the Coroner is required to confine his investigation to the matters directly causative of the death and not extend his inquiry into the broader circumstances. This was the standard applicable in the McCann inquest also and did not prevent examination of those aspects of the planning and conduct of the operation relevant to the killings of the three IRA suspects. The Court is not persuaded therefore that the approach to inquests taken by the domestic courts necessarily contradicts the requirements of Article 2. The domestic courts accept that an essential purpose of the inquest is to allay rumours and suspicions of how a death came about. The Court agrees that a detailed investigation into policy issues or alleged conspiracies may not be justifiable or necessary. Whether an inquest fails to address necessary factual issues will depend on the particular circumstances of the case. It has not been shown in the present application that the scope of the inquest as conducted prevented any particular matters relevant to the death being examined. The inability to address issues of the planning, control and execution of the operation resulted primarily from the absence of the soldiers concerned.

123. Nonetheless, unlike the McCann inquest, the jury's verdict in this case could only give the identity of the deceased and the date, place and cause of death (see paragraph 53 above). In England and Wales, as in Gibraltar, the jury is able to reach a number of verdicts, including "unlawful death". As already noted, where an inquest jury gives such a verdict in England and Wales, the DPP is required to reconsider any decision not to prosecute and to give reasons which are amenable to challenge in the courts. In this case, the only relevance the inquest may have to a possible prosecution is that the Coroner may send a written report to the DPP if he considers that a criminal offence may have been committed. It is not apparent however that the DPP is required to take any decision in response to this notification or to provide detailed reasons for not directing a prosecution as recommended.

124. Notwithstanding the useful fact finding function that an inquest may provide in some cases, the Court considers that in this case it could play no effective role in the identification or prosecution of any criminal offences which may have occurred and, in that respect, falls short of the requirements of Article 2.

125. The public nature of the inquest proceedings is not in dispute. Indeed the inquest appears perhaps for that reason to have become the most popular legal forum in Northern Ireland for attempts to challenge the conduct of the police and security forces in the use of lethal force. The applicants complained however that their ability to participate in the proceedings as the next of kin to the deceased was significantly prejudiced as legal aid was not available in inquests and documents were not disclosed in advance of the proceedings.

126. The Court notes that six of the families were represented by counsel at the inquest. Legal aid was also available for a judicial review application concerning the Coroner's procedural decisions. It has not been explained why the others were not represented by the same, or by another, counsel or indeed whether they wished to be represented at the inquest. It has not been established therefore that the applicants have been prevented, by the lack of legal aid, from obtaining any necessary legal assistance at the inquest.

127. As regards access to documents, the applicants were not able to obtain copies of any witness statements until the witness concerned was giving evidence. This was also the position in the McCann case, where the Court considered that this had not substantially hampered the ability of the families' lawyers to question the witnesses (cited above, p. 49, § 62). However it must be noted that the inquest in that case was to some extent exceptional when compared with the proceedings in a number of cases in Northern Ireland (see also the cases of Jordan v. the United Kingdom, no. 24746/94, McKerr v. the United Kingdom, no. 28883/95, and Shanaghan v. the United Kingdom, no. 37715/97). The promptness and thoroughness of the inquest in the McCann case left the Court in no doubt that the important facts relating to the events had been examined with the active participation of the applicants' experienced legal representative. The non-access by the next-of-kin to the documents did not, in that context, disclose any significant handicap. However, since that case, the Court has laid more emphasis on the importance of involving the next of kin of a deceased in the procedure and providing them with information (see Öğür v. Turkey, cited above, § 92).

Further, the Court notes that the practice of non-disclosure has changed in the United Kingdom in the light of the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry and that it is now recommended that the police disclose witness statements 28 days in advance (see paragraph 61 above).

128. In this case, it may be observed that problems of lack of access to the witness statements was the reason for several long adjournments before the inquest opened. This contributed significantly to prolonging the proceedings. The Court considers this further below in the context of the delay (see paragraphs 130-134). Once the inquest opened, the applicants who were represented requested an adjournment to apply for judicial review of the Coroner's decision not to give them prior access to witness statements. When this was refused, they instructed their lawyer to withdraw from the inquest. The inability of the families to have access to witness statements before the appearance of the witness must be regarded as having placed them at a disadvantage in terms of preparation and ability to participate in questioning. This contrasts strikingly with the position of the RUC and army (Ministry of Defence) who had the resources to provide for legal representation and had access to information about the incident from their own records and personnel. The Court considers that the right of the family of the deceased whose death is under investigation to participate in the proceedings requires that the procedures adopted ensure the requisite protection of their interests, which may be in direct conflict with those of the police or security forces implicated in the events. The Court is not persuaded that the interests of the applicants as next-of-kin were fairly or adequately protected in this respect.

129. Reference has also been made to the allegedly frequent use of public interest immunity certificates in inquests to prevent certain questions or the disclosure of certain documents. However, no certificate in fact issued in the inquest in this case. There is therefore no basis for finding that the use of these certificates prevented examination of any circumstances relevant to the deaths of the applicants' relatives.

130. Finally, the Court has had regard to the delay in the proceedings. The inquest opened on 30 May 1995, more than eight years after the deaths occurred. Although the DPP's decision not to prosecute issued on 22 September 1988, the RUC did not forward the papers to the Coroner until 9 May 1990. No explanation has been forthcoming for this delay. There were then a series of adjournments before the inquest opened. Once it opened, it concluded within a matter of days, on 2 June 1995. The adjournments were as follows:

- The inquest was due to open on 24 September 1990. The Coroner agreed to an adjournment on 6 September 1990 at the request of the applicants pending the determination of the Devine case concerning access of relatives to witness statements. The Devine case concluded on 6 February 1992, some sixteen months later.
- The Coroner agreed to an adjournment pending the judicial review proceedings in the McKerr, Toman and Burns inquests concerning access to documents used by witnesses to refresh their memories. These concluded on 28 May 1993, fifteen months later.
- The adjournment continued pending the court proceedings in the McKerr, Toman and Burns inquests concerning access to the Stalker and Sampson Reports which allegedly concerned issues of a shoot-to-kill policy. These concluded on 20 April 1994, eleven months further on. The inquest however only resumed on 30 May 1995 more than a year later.

131. The Court observes that these adjournments were requested by, or consented to, by the applicants. They related principally to legal challenges to procedural aspects of the inquest which they considered essential to their ability to participate - in particular as regards their access to the documents. It may be noted that the judicial review proceedings which resulted in an adjournment from 6 September 1990 to 6 February 1992 (over one year and four months) concerned access to witness statements which are now being disclosed voluntarily due to developments in what is perceived as a desirable practice vis-à-vis a victim's relatives. The second set of judicial proceedings also concluded in favour of the families, since the courts held that Coroners should make available statements used by witnesses to refresh their memories. Nor can it be regarded as unreasonable that the applicants agreed to an adjournment to await the possible disclosure of an independent police enquiry which was alleged to concern issues of a deliberate policy of the security forces in using lethal force.

132. While it is therefore the case that the applicants contributed significantly to the delay in the inquest being opened, this has to some extent resulted from the difficulties facing relatives in participating in inquest procedures (see paragraphs 127-128 above concerning the non-disclosure of witness statements). It cannot be regarded as unreasonable that the applicants had regard to the legal remedies being used to challenge these aspects of inquest procedure. The Court observes that the Coroner, who was responsible for the conduct of the proceedings, acceded to these adjournments. The fact that they were requested by the applicants do not dispense the authorities from ensuring compliance with the requirement for reasonable expedition (see mutatis mutandis concerning speed requirements under Article 6 § 1 of the Convention, Scopelliti v. Italy judgment of 23 November 1993, Series A no. 278, p. 9, § 25). If long adjournments are regarded as justified in the interests of procedural fairness to the deceaseds' families, it calls into question whether the inquest system was at the relevant time structurally capable of providing for both speed and effective access for the families concerned.

133. Nor did the inquest progress with diligence in the periods unrelated to the adjournments. The Court refers to the delay in commencing the inquest and the lapse of time in scheduling the resumption of the inquest after the adjournments.

134. Having regard to these considerations, the time taken in this inquest cannot be regarded as compatible with the State's obligation under Article 2 of the Convention to ensure that investigations into suspicious deaths are carried out promptly and with reasonable expedition.

(iv) Civil proceedings

135. As found above (see paragraph 102), civil proceedings would provide a judicial fact finding forum, with the attendant safeguards and the ability to reach findings of unlawfulness, with the possibility of damages. It is however a procedure undertaken on the initiative of the applicant, not the authorities, and it does not involve the identification or punishment of any alleged perpetrator. As such, it cannot be taken into account in the assessment of the State's compliance with its procedural obligations under Article 2 of the Convention.

(v) Conclusion

136. The Court finds that the proceedings for investigating the use of lethal force by the security forces have been shown in this case to disclose the following shortcomings:

- a lack of independence of the investigating police officers from the security forces involved in the incident;
- a lack of public scrutiny, and information to the victims' families of the reasons for the decision of the DPP not to prosecute any soldier;
- the inquest procedure did not allow for any verdict or findings which could play an effective role in securing a prosecution in respect of any criminal offence which might have been disclosed;
- the soldiers who shot the deceased could not be required to attend the inquest as witnesses;
- the non-disclosure of witness statements prior to the witnesses' appearance at the inquest prejudiced the ability of the applicants to participate in the inquest and contributed to long adjournments in the proceedings;
- the inquest proceedings did not commence promptly and were not pursued with reasonable expedition.

137. It is not for this Court to specify in any detail which procedures the authorities should adopt in providing for the proper examination of the circumstances of a killing by State agents. While reference has been made for example to the Scottish model of enquiry conducted by a judge of criminal jurisdiction, there is no reason to assume that this may be the only method available. Nor can it be said that there should be one unified procedure providing all requirements. If the aims of fact finding, criminal investigation and prosecution are carried out or shared between several authorities, as in Northern Ireland, the Court considers that the requirements of Article 2 may nonetheless be satisfied if, while seeking to take into account other legitimate interests such as national security or the protection of the material relevant to other investigations, they provide for the necessary safeguards in an accessible and effective manner. In the present case, the available procedures have not struck the right balance.

138. The Court would observe that the shortcomings in transparency and effectiveness identified above run counter to the purpose identified by the domestic courts of allaying suspicions and rumours. Proper procedures for ensuring the accountability of agents of the State are indispensable in maintaining public confidence and meeting the legitimate concerns that might arise from the use of lethal force. Lack of such procedures will only add fuel to fears of sinister motivations, as is illustrated inter alia by the submissions made by the applicants concerning the alleged shoot-to-kill policy.

139. The Court finds that there has been a failure to comply with the procedural obligation imposed by Article 2 of the Convention and that there has been, in this respect, a violation of that provision.

III. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 § 1 OF THE CONVENTION

140. The applicants invoked Article 6 § 1 which provides as relevant:

“1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. ...”

141. The applicants claimed that their relatives were arbitrarily killed in circumstances where an arrest could have been effected by the soldiers and that the soldiers deliberately killed their relatives as an alternative to arresting them. They referred to concerns expressed, for example, by Amnesty International that killings by the security forces in Northern Ireland reflected a deliberate policy to eliminate individuals rather than arrest them and bring them before a court for any determination of a criminal charge.

142. The Government submitted that the shooting of the applicants' relatives could not be regarded as a summary punishment for a crime. Nor could the alleged failure to prosecute raise any issues under Article 6 § 1 of the Convention.

143. The Court recalls that the lawfulness of the shooting of the nine men at Loughgall is pending consideration in the civil proceedings instituted by five of the applicants' families. The Hughes family have settled their civil claims, while three families have not considered it worthwhile to lodge or pursue proceedings (see paragraphs 42-46 above). In these circumstances and in the light of the scope of the present application, the Court finds no basis for reaching any findings as to the alleged improper motivation behind the incident. Any issues concerning the effectiveness of criminal investigation procedures fall to be considered under Articles 2 and 13 of the Convention.

144. There has, accordingly, been no violation of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention.

IV. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 OF THE CONVENTION

145. The applicants invoked Article 14 of the Convention, which provides:

“The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.”

146. The applicants submitted that the circumstances of the killing of their relatives disclosed discrimination. They alleged that, between 1969 and March 1994, 357 people had been killed by members of the security forces, the overwhelming majority of whom were young men from the Catholic or nationalist community. When compared with the numbers of those killed from the Protestant community and having regard to the fact that there have been relatively few prosecutions (31) and only a few convictions (four, at the date of this application), this showed that there was a discriminatory use of lethal force and a lack of legal protection vis-à-vis a section of the community on grounds of national origin or association with a national minority.

147. The Government replied that there was no evidence that any of the deaths which occurred in Northern Ireland were analogous or that they disclosed any difference in treatment. Bald statistics (the accuracy of which was not accepted) were not enough to establish broad allegations of discrimination against Catholics or nationalists.

148. Where a general policy or measure has disproportionately prejudicial effects on a particular group, it is not excluded that this may be considered as discriminatory notwithstanding that it is not specifically aimed or directed at that group. However, even though statistically it appears that the majority of people shot by the security forces were from the Catholic or nationalist community, the Court does not consider that statistics can in themselves disclose a practice which could be classified as discriminatory within the meaning of Article 14. There is no evidence before the Court which would entitle it to conclude that any of those killings, save the four which resulted in convictions, involved the unlawful or excessive use of force by members of the security forces.

149. The Court finds that there has been no violation of Article 14 of the Convention.

V. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONVENTION

150. The applicants complained that they had no effective remedy in respect of their complaints, invoking Article 13 which provides:

“Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity.”

151. The applicants referred to their submissions concerning the procedural aspects of Article 2 of the Convention, claiming that in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate Article 13 required a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and including effective access for the complainant to the investigatory procedure.

152. The Government submitted that the complaints raised under Article 13 were either premature or ill-founded. They claimed that the combination of available procedures, which included the pending civil proceedings and the inquest, provided effective remedies.

153. The Court's case-law indicates that Article 13 of the Convention guarantees the availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. The effect of Article 13 is thus to require the provision of a domestic remedy to deal with the substance of an "arguable complaint" under the Convention and to grant appropriate relief, although Contracting States are afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conform to their Convention obligations under this provision. The scope of the obligation under Article 13 varies depending on the nature of the applicant's complaint under the Convention. Nevertheless, the remedy required by Article 13 must be "effective" in practice as well as in law (see the Aksoy v. Turkey judgment of 18 December 1996, Reports 1996-IV, p. 2286, § 95; the Aydın v. Turkey judgment of 25 September 1997, Reports 1997-VI, pp. 1895-96, § 103; the Kaya v. Turkey judgment cited above, pp. 329-30, § 106).

154. In cases of the use of lethal force or suspicious deaths, the Court has also stated that, given the fundamental importance of the right to the protection of life, Article 13 requires, in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible for the deprivation of life, including effective access for the complainant to the investigation procedure (see the Kaya v. Turkey judgment cited above, pp. 330-31, § 107). In a number of cases it has found that there has been a violation of Article 13 where no effective criminal investigation had been carried out, noting that the requirements of Article 13 were broader than the obligation to investigate imposed by Article 2 of the Convention (see also Ergi v. Turkey, cited above, p.1782, § 98; Salman v. Turkey cited above, § 123).

155. It must be observed that these cases derived from the situation pertaining in south-east Turkey, where applicants were in a vulnerable position due to the ongoing conflict between the security forces and the PKK and where the most accessible means of redress open to applicants was to complain to the public prosecutor, who was under a duty to investigate alleged crimes. In the Turkish system, the complainant was able to join any criminal proceedings as an intervenor and apply for damages at the conclusion of any successful prosecution. The public prosecutor's fact-finding function was also essential to any attempt to take civil proceedings.

In those cases, therefore, it was sufficient for the purposes of former Article 26 (now Article 35 § 1) of the Convention, that an applicant complaining of unlawful killing raised the matter with the public prosecutor. There was accordingly a close procedural and practical relationship between the criminal investigation and the remedies available to the applicant in the legal system as a whole.

156. The legal system pertaining in Northern Ireland is different and any application of Article 13 to the factual circumstances of any case from that jurisdiction must take this into account. An applicant who claims the unlawful use of force by soldiers or police officers in the United Kingdom must as a general rule exhaust the domestic remedies open to him or her by taking civil proceedings by which the courts will examine the facts, determine liability and if appropriate award compensation. These civil proceedings are wholly independent of any criminal investigation and their efficacy has not been shown to rely on the proper conduct of criminal investigations or prosecutions (see e.g. Caraheer v. the United Kingdom, no. 24520/94, decision of inadmissibility [Section 3] 11.01.00).

157. In the present case, seven of the applicants lodged civil proceedings, of which five are still pending, the Hughes family having settled their claims and another family having ceased to pursue their claims. Two families did not consider that it was worthwhile bringing such proceedings. The Court has found no elements which would prevent civil proceedings providing the redress identified above in respect of the alleged excessive use of force (see paragraph 102 above).

158. As regards the applicants' complaints concerning the investigation into the death carried out by the authorities, these have been examined above under the procedural aspect of Article 2 (see paragraphs 111-139 above). The Court finds that no separate issue arises in the present case.

159. The Court concludes that there has been no violation of Article 13 of the Convention.

VI. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

160. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

“If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party.”

A. Damage

161. The applicants submitted that though their primary goal was to obtain a judgment from the Court to the effect that the respondent

Government had violated the Convention, they considered that an award of damages should be made. They argued that, where there was a finding of a violation of a fundamental right, the Court should impose the only penalty it can on the offending State. Not to do so sent the wrong signal and appeared to penalise the victims rather than those responsible for the violation. This was particularly the case concerning Antony Hughes who was unconnected with the IRA though it was accepted that an amount of compensation had been given domestically in that case.

162. The Government disputed that any award of damages would be appropriate in the present case. They considered that the applicant, Mrs Bridget Hughes, had been fully compensated for the loss suffered as a result of the death of Antony Hughes as she had accepted the settlement in the civil proceedings. In their view, no loss flowed from any violation of the procedural elements of Article 2 of the Convention and a finding of violation in that context would in itself constitute just satisfaction.

163. The Court recalls that in the case of McCann and others (cited above, p. 63, § 219) it found a substantive breach of Article 2 of the Convention, concluding that it had not been shown that the killing of the three IRA suspects constituted the use of force which was no more than absolutely necessary in defence of persons from unlawful violence. However, the Court considered it inappropriate to make any award to the applicants, as personal representatives of the deceased, in respect of pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage, “having regard to the fact that the three terrorist suspects who were killed had been intending to plant a bomb in Gibraltar”.

164. In contrast to the McCann case, the Court in the present case has made no finding as to the lawfulness or proportionality of the use of lethal force which killed the nine men at Loughgall, or as to the factual circumstances, including the activities of the deceased which led up to the killing, which issues are pending in the civil proceedings. Accordingly, no award of compensation falls to be made in this respect. On the other hand, the Court has found that the national authorities failed in their obligation to carry out a prompt and effective investigation into the circumstances of the death. The applicants must thereby have suffered feelings of frustration, distress and anxiety. The Court considers that the applicants sustained some non-pecuniary damage which is not sufficiently compensated by the finding of a violation as a result of the Convention. It has not taken into account the settlement in the Hughes case, which related to the substantive claims of that applicant and not to the lack of procedural efficacy in the investigation.

165. Making an assessment on an equitable basis, the Court awards each applicant the sum of 10,000 pounds sterling (GBP).

B. Costs and expenses

166. The applicant claimed a total of GBP 54,594.20. This included GBP 5,218.20 and GBP 20,000 respectively for two counsel and GBP 29,276 for solicitors' fees, exclusive of VAT.

167. The Government submitted that these claims were excessive, noting that the issues in this case overlapped significantly with the other cases examined at the same time.

168. The Court recalls that this case has involved several rounds of written submissions and an oral hearing, and may be regarded as factually and legally complex. Nonetheless, it finds the fees claimed to be on the high side when compared with other cases from the United Kingdom and is not persuaded that they are reasonable as to quantum. Having regard to equitable considerations, it awards the global sum of GBP 30,000, plus any value added tax which may be payable. It has taken into account the sums paid to the applicants by way of legal aid from the Council of Europe.

C. Default interest

169. According to the information available to the Court, the statutory rate of interest applicable in the United Kingdom at the date of adoption of the present judgment is 7,5% per annum.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 2 of the Convention in respect of failings in the investigative procedures concerning the deaths of the applicants' relatives;
2. Holds that there has been no violation of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention;
3. Holds that there has been no violation of Article 14 of the Convention;
4. Holds that there has been no violation of Article 13 of the Convention;
5. Holds
  - (a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicants, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final according to Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, the following amounts, plus any value-added tax that may be chargeable;
    - (i) 10,000 (ten thousand) pounds sterling to each applicant in respect of non-pecuniary damage;

- (ii) a global sum of 30,000 (thirty thousand) pounds sterling in respect of all their costs and expenses;
- (b) that simple interest at an annual rate of 7,5% shall be payable from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement;

6. Dismisses the remainder of the applicants' claims for just satisfaction.

Done in English, and notified in writing on 4 May 2001, pursuant to Rule 77 §§ 2 and 3 of the Rules of Court.

Pablo Saavedra Alessandri, Deputy Secretary.

THE COURT

composed as above,

renders the following Advisory Opinion:

I*PRESENTATION OF THE REQUEST

1. On May 10, 2002, the State of the United Mexican States (hereinafter "Mexico" or "the requesting State"), based on Article 64(1) of the American Convention on Human Rights (hereinafter "the American Convention", "the Convention" or "the Pact of San José"), submitted to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (hereinafter "the Inter-American Court" or "the Court") a request for an advisory opinion (hereinafter also "the request") on the "[...] deprivation of the enjoyment and exercise of certain labor rights [of migrant workers,] and its compatibility with the obligation of the American States to ensure the principles of legal equality, non-discrimination and the equal and effective protection of the law embodied in international instruments for the protection of human rights; and also with the subordination or conditioning of the observance of the obligations imposed by international human rights law, including those of an erga omnes nature, with a view to attaining certain domestic policy objectives of an American State.” In addition, the request dealt with “the meaning that the principles of legal equality, non-discrimination and the equal and effective protection of the law have come to signify in the context of the progressive development of international human rights law and its codification.”

2. Likewise, Mexico stated the considerations that gave rise to the request and, among these, it indicated that:

Migrant workers, as all other persons, must be ensured the enjoyment and exercise of human rights in the States where they reside. However, their vulnerability makes them an easy target for violations of their human rights, based, above all, on criteria of discrimination and, consequently, places them in a situation of inequality before the law as regards the effective enjoyment and exercise of these rights

In this context, the Government of Mexico is profoundly concerned by the incompatibility with the OAS human rights system of the interpretations, practices and enactment of laws by some States in the region. The Government of Mexico considers that such interpretations, practices and laws imply the negation of labor rights based on discriminatory criteria derived from the migratory status of the undocumented workers, among other matters. This could encourage employers to use those laws or interpretations to justify a progressive loss of other labor rights; for example: payment of overtime, seniority, outstanding wages and maternity leave, thus abusing the vulnerable status of undocumented migrant workers. In this context, the violations of the international instruments that protect the human rights of migrant workers in the region are a real threat to the exercise of the rights protected by such instruments.

3. Mexico requested the Court to interpret the following norms: Articles 3(1) and 17 of the Charter of the Organization of American States (hereinafter “the OAS”); Article II (Right to Equality before the Law) of the American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man (hereinafter “the American Declaration”); Articles 1(1) (Obligation to Respect Rights), 2 (Domestic Legal Effects), and 24 (Equality before the Law) of the American Convention; Articles 1, 2(1) and 7 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (hereinafter “the Universal Declaration”), and Articles 2(1), 2(2), 5(2) and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

4. Based on the preceding provisions, Mexico requested the Court’s opinion on the following issues:

In the context of the principle of equality before the law embodied in Article II of the American Declaration, Article 24 of the American Convention, Article 7 of the Universal Declaration and Article 26 of the [International] Covenant [of Civil and Political Rights ...]:

1) Can an American State establish in its labor legislation a distinct treatment from that accorded legal residents or citizens that prejudices undocumented migrant workers in the enjoyment of their labor rights, so that the migratory status of the workers impedes per se the enjoyment of such rights?

2.1) Should Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Universal Declaration, Article II of the American Declaration, Articles 2 and 26 of the [International] Covenant [of Civil and Political Rights], and Articles 1 and 24 of the American Convention be interpreted in the sense that an individual’s legal residence in the territory of an American State is a necessary condition for that State to respect and ensure the rights and freedoms recognized in these provisions to those persons subject to its jurisdiction?

2.2) In the light of the provisions cited in the preceding question, can it be considered that the denial of one or more labor right, based on the undocumented status of a migrant worker, is compatible with the obligations of an American State to ensure non-discrimination and the equal, effective protection of the law imposed by the above-mentioned provisions?

Based on Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 2, and Article 5, paragraph 2, of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,

3) What would be the validity of an interpretation by any American State which, in any way, subordinates or conditions the observance of fundamental human rights, including the right to equality before the law and to the equal and effective protection of the law without discrimination, to achieving migration policy goals contained in its laws, notwithstanding the ranking that domestic law attributes to such laws in relation to the international obligations arising from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and other obligations of international human rights law that have an erga omnes character?

In view of the progressive development of international human rights law and its codification, particularly through the provisions invoked in the instruments mentioned in this request,

4) What is the nature today of the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law in the hierarchy of norms established by general international law and, in this context, can they be considered to be the expression of norms of ius cogens? If the answer to the second question is affirmative, what are the legal effects for the OAS Member States, individually and collectively, in the context of the general obligation to respect and ensure, pursuant to Article 2, paragraph 1, of the [International] Covenant [on Civil and Political Rights], compliance with the human rights referred to in Articles 3 (l) and 17 of the OAS Charter?

5. Juan Manuel Gómez-Robledo Verduzco was appointed as the Agent and the Ambassador of Mexico to Costa Rica, Carlos Pujalte Piñeiro, as the Deputy Agent.

II PROCEEDING BEFORE THE COURT

6. In notes of July 10, 2002, the Secretariat of the Court (hereinafter "the Secretariat"), in compliance with the provisions of Article 62(1) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court (hereinafter "the Rules of Procedure"), transmitted the request for an advisory opinion to all the member States, to the Secretary General of the OAS, to the President of the OAS Permanent Council and to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. It also advised them of the period established by the President of the Court (hereinafter "the President"), in consultation with the other judges of the Court, for submission of written comments or other relevant documents with regard to this request.

7. On November 12, 2002, Mexico presented a communication, with which it forwarded a copy of a communication from its Ministry of Foreign Affairs providing information about an opinion of the International Labour Organization (ILO) related to labor rights for migrant workers.

8. On November 14, 2002, the State of Honduras presented its written comments. Some pages were illegible. On November 1, 2002, the complete version of the brief with comments was received.

9. On November 15, 2002, Mexico presented a communication in which it forwarded information that was complementary to the request, and included the English version of a formal opinion that it had requested from the International Labor Office of the International Labor Organization (ILO) and which, according to Mexico, "was of particular relevance for the [...] request procedure."

10. On November 26, 2002, the State of Nicaragua presented its written comments.
11. On November 27, 2002, the Legal Aid Clinic of the College of Jurisprudence of the Universidad San Francisco de Quito presented an amicus curiae brief.
12. On December 3, 2002, Mexico presented a communication, with which it forwarded the Spanish version of the formal opinion that it had requested from the International Labor Office of the International Labor Organization (ILO) (supra para. 9).
13. On December 12, 2002, the Delgado Law Firm presented an amicus curiae brief.
14. On January 8, 2003, Liliana Ivonne González Morales, Gail Aguilar Castañón, Karla Micheel Salas Ramírez and Itzel Magali Pérez Zagal, students of the Faculty of Law of the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM), presented an amici curiae brief by e-mail. The original of this communication was submitted on January 10, 2003.
15. On January 13, 2003, the States of El Salvador and Canada presented their written comments.
16. On January 13, 2003, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights presented its written comments.
17. On January 13, 2003, the United States of America presented a note in which it informed the Court that it would not present comments on the request for an advisory opinion.
18. On January 13, 2003, the Harvard Immigration and Refugee Clinic of the Greater Boston Legal Services and the Harvard Law School, the Working Group on Human Rights in the Americas of the Harvard and Boston College Law Schools, and the Global Justice Center presented an amici curiae brief.
19. On January 16, 2003, the President issued an Order in which he convened "a public hearing on the request for Advisory Opinion OC-18, on February 24, 2002, at 9 a.m." so that "the member States and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights [could] present their oral arguments."
20. On January 17, 2003, the State of Costa Rica presented its written comments.
21. On January 29, 2003, the Secretariat, on the instructions of the President, and in communication CDH-S/067, invited Gabriela Rodríguez, United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Human Rights of Migrants to attend the public hearing convened for February 24, 2003 (supra para. 19), as an observer.
22. On February 3, 2003, the Secretariat transmitted a copy of the complementary information to its request for an advisory opinion forwarded by Mexico (supra paras. 9 and 12), the written comments submitted by the States of Honduras, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Canada and Costa Rica (supra paras. 8, 10, 15 and 20), and by the Inter-American Commission (supra para. 16), to all the foregoing.

23. On February 6, 2003, Mario G. Obledo, President of the National Coalition of Hispanic Organizations, presented a brief supporting the request for an advisory opinion.

24. On February 6, 2003, Thomas A. Brill of the Law Office of Sayre & Chavez, presented an amicus curiae brief.

25. On February 6, 2003, Javier Juárez of the Law Office of Sayre & Chavez, presented an amicus curiae brief.

26. On February 7, 2003, Mexico presented a brief in which it substituted the Deputy Agent, Ambassador Carlos Pujalte Piñero, by Ricardo García Cervantes, actual Ambassador of Mexico to Costa Rica (supra para. 5).

27. On February 10, 2003, Beth Lyon forwarded, via e-mail, an amici curiae brief presented by the Labor, Civil Rights and Immigrants' Rights Organizations in the United States.

28. On February 13, 2003, the Harvard Immigration and Refugee Clinic of the Greater Boston Legal Services and the Harvard Law School, the Working Group on Human Rights in the Americas of the Harvard and Boston College Law Schools and the Global Justice Center forwarded the final, corrected version of the amici curiae brief that they had presented previously (supra para. 18).

29. On February 13, 2003, Rebecca Smith forwarded another copy of the amici curiae brief presented by the Labor, Civil Rights and Immigrants' Rights Organizations in the United States (supra para. 27).

30. On February 21, 2003, the Academy of Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law of the American University, Washington College of Law, and the Human Rights Program of the Universidad Iberoamericana of Mexico submitted an amici curiae brief.

31. On February 21, 2003, the Center for International Human Rights of the School of Law of Northwestern University submitted an amicus curiae brief. The original of this brief was presented on February 24, 2003.

32. On February 24, 2003, a public hearing was held at the seat of the Court, in which the oral arguments of the participating States and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights were heard.

47. The Court will now summarize the written and oral comments of the requesting State, the participating States and the Inter-American Commission, and also the briefs and oral arguments presented by different individuals, universities, institutions and non-governmental organizations as amici curiae:

The requesting State:            Regarding the admissibility of the request, Mexico stated in its brief that:

By clarifying the scope of the State's international obligations with regard to the protection of the labor rights of undocumented migrant workers, irrespective of their nationality, the opinion of the Court would be of considerable relevance for effective compliance with such obligations by the authorities of States that receive those migrants.

The request submitted by Mexico does not expect the Court to rule in the abstract, "but to consider concrete situations in which it is called on to examine the acts of the organs of any American State, inasmuch as the implementation of such acts may lead to the violation of some of the rights protected in the treaties and instruments mentioned in the [...] request." Nor does it expect the Court to interpret the domestic law of any State.

In addition to the considerations that gave rise to the request and that have been described above (supra para. 2), the requesting State indicated that:

The protection of the human rights of migrant workers is also an issue of particular interest to Mexico, because approximately 5,998,500 (five million nine hundred and ninety-eight thousand five hundred) Mexican workers reside outside national territory. Of these, it is estimated that 2,490,000 (two million four hundred and ninety thousand) are undocumented migrant workers who, lacking regular migratory status, "become a natural target for exploitation, as individuals and as workers, owing to their particularly vulnerable situation."

In less than five months (from January 1 to May 7, 2002), the Mexican Government had to intervene, through its consular representatives, in approximately 383 cases to defend the human rights of Mexican migrant workers, owing to issues such as discrimination in employment-related matters, unpaid wages, and compensation for occupational illnesses and accidents.

The efforts made by Mexico and other States in the region to protect the human rights of migrant workers have been unable to avoid a resurgence of discriminatory legislation and practices against aliens seeking employment in a foreign country, or the regulation of the labor market based on discriminatory criteria, accompanied by xenophobia in the name of national security, nationalism or national preference.

With regard to the merits of the request, Mexico indicated in its brief:

Regarding the first question of the request (supra para. 4):

In the context of the principle of equality before the law embodied in Article II of the American Declaration, Article 24 of the American Convention, Article 7 of the Universal Declaration and Article 26 of the Covenant, any measures that promotes a harmfully different treatment for persons or groups of persons who are in the territory of an American State and subject to its jurisdiction, are contrary to the acknowledgment of equality before the law that prohibits any discriminatory treatment established by law.

Workers whose situation is irregular are subjected to harsh treatment owing to their migratory status and, consequently, are considered an inferior group in relation to the legal or national workers of the State in question.

An organ of a State party to the international instruments mentioned above which, when interpreting domestic legislation, establishes a different treatment in the enjoyment of a labor right, based solely on the migratory status of a worker, would be making an interpretation contrary to the principle of legal equality.

This interpretation could provide justification for employers to dismiss undocumented workers, under the protection of a prior decision entailing the suppression of certain labor rights because of an irregular migratory status.

The circumstance described above is particularly critical when we consider that this irregular situation of the undocumented worker leads to the latter being afraid to have recourse to the government bodies responsible for monitoring compliance with labor standards; consequently, employers who utilize such practices are not punished. It is more advantageous from a financial point of view to dismiss an undocumented worked because, contrary to what happens when national or legal resident workers are dismissed, the employer is not obliged to compensate such dismissals in any way; and this is in "evident contradiction with the principle of equality before the law."

The right to equality before the law is not applicable only with regard to the enjoyment and exercise of labor rights, it also extends to all rights recognized in domestic legislation; thus it covers "a much broader universe of rights that the fundamental rights and freedoms embodied in international law." The scope of the right to equality "has important applications in the jurisdiction of human rights bodies." For example, the United Nations Human Rights Committee has examined complaints concerning discrimination of rights that are not expressly included in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and rejected the argument that it lacks the competence to hear complaints about discrimination in the enjoyment of rights protected by the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

Mexico referred to the contents of General Comment 18 of the Human Rights Committee on Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

Regarding the second question of the request (supra para. 4):

The provisions of Articles 2(1) of the Universal Declaration, II of the American Declaration, 2 and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 1 and 24 of the American Convention, underscore the obligation of States to ensure the effective exercise and enjoyment of the rights encompassed by those provisions, and also the prohibition to discriminate for any reason whatever.

The obligation of the American States to comply with their international human rights commitments "goes beyond the mere fact of having laws that ensures compliance with such rights." The acts of all the organs of an American State must strictly respect such rights, so that "the conduct of the State organs leads to real compliance with and exercise of the human rights guaranteed in international instruments."

Any acts of an organ of an American State resulting in situations contrary to the effective enjoyment of the fundamental human rights, would be contrary to that State's obligation to adapt its conduct to the standards established in international human rights instruments.

Regarding the third question of the request (supra para. 4):

It is “unacceptable” for an American State to subordinate or condition in any way respect for fundamental human rights to the attainment of migratory policy objectives contained in its laws, evading international obligations arising from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and other obligations of international human rights law of an erga omnes nature. This is so, even when domestic policy objectives are cited, which are provided for in domestic legislation and considered legitimate for attaining certain ends from the Government’s point of view, “including, for example, the implementation of a migratory control policy based on discouraging the employment of undocumented aliens.”

Even in the interests of public order – which is the ultimate goal of the rule of law – it is unacceptable to restrict the enjoyment and exercise of a right. And, it would be much less acceptable to seek to do so by citing domestic policy objectives contrary to the public welfare.

“Although [...] in some cases and in very specific circumstances, an American State may restrict or condition the enjoyment of a particular right, in the situation brought to the attention of the Court [...] the requirements for these circumstances are not met.”

Article 5(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights enshrines the pre-eminence of the norm most favorable to the victim; “this establishes the obligation to seek, in the corpus iuris gentium, the norm intended to benefit the human being as the ultimate owner of the rights protected in international human rights law.”

This is similar to transferring to international human rights law the Martens clause, which is part of international humanitarian law, and which confirms the principle of the applicability of international humanitarian law to all circumstances, even when existing treaties do not regulate certain situations.

The legal effects of obligations erga omnes lato sensu are not established only between the contracting parties to the respective instrument. These effects “are produced as rights in favor of third parties (stipulation pour autrui), thus recognizing the right, and even the obligation, for other States – whether or not they are parties to the instrument in question – to guarantee their fulfillment.” In this respect, Mexico invoked the decisions of the International Court of Justice in the Barcelona Traction (1970), East Timor (1995) and Implementation of the Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (1996) cases.

International case law, with the exception of that related to war crimes, “has not interpreted [...] fully the legal regime applicable to obligations erga omnes, or, at best, it has done so cautiously and perhaps with a certain trepidation. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights is hereby called on to play an essential role in establishing the applicable law and affirming the collective guarantee that is evident in Article 1 of its Statute.”

Abundant “teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations (Article 38, paragraph (d), of the Statute of the International Court of Justice)[,] have stated that the fundamental human rights belong ab initio to the domain of norms of ius cogens.” Judges have also rendered individual opinions about the legal effect of recognition that a provision enjoys the attributes of a norm of jus cogens, in accordance with Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

Mexico referred to the commentary of the International Law Commission on Articles 40 and 41 of the then draft articles on State responsibility.

As in the case of obligations erga omnes, “case law has acted cautiously and even lagged behind the opinio iuris communis (the latter as a manifestation of the principle of universal morality) to establish the norms of jus cogens concerning the protection of the fundamental human rights definitively and to clarify the applicable legal norms.”

Furthermore, in the brief submitted on November 15, 2002 (supra paras. 9 and 12), Mexico added that:

Regarding the first question of the request (supra para. 4):

This question “is intended to clarify the existence of fundamental labor rights which all workers should enjoy[,], and which are internationally recognized in different instrument [,] and to determine whether denying those rights to workers because of their migratory status would signify according a harmful treatment, contrary to the principles of legal equality and non-discrimination.”

States may accord a distinct treatment to documented migrant workers and to undocumented migrant workers, or to aliens with regard to nationals. For example, political rights are only recognized to nationals. However, in the case of internationally recognized human rights, all persons are equal before the law and have the right to equal protection in accordance with Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

A harmfully distinct treatment may not be accorded in the implementation of the fundamental labor rights, “even though, except as provided for in this basic body of laws, States are empowered to accord a distinct treatment.” Harmfully distinct treatment of undocumented migrant workers would violate fundamental labor rights.

Several international instruments permit us to identify the fundamental labor rights of migrant workers. For example, Articles 25 and 26 of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families recognize fundamental labor rights to all migrant workers, irrespective of their migratory status.

In addition, on November 1, 2002, the International Labor Office of the International Labor Organization issued a formal opinion on the scope and content of ILO Convention No. 143 concerning Migrations in Abusive Conditions and the Promotion of Equality of Opportunity and Treatment of Migrant Workers and Recommendation No. 151 on Migrant Workers. This opinion elaborates on other fundamental labor rights of all migrant workers. Mexico agrees with the International Labor Office that there is a basic level of protection that is applicable to documented and undocumented workers.

States may accord a different treatment to migrant workers, whose situation is irregular; however, under no circumstance are they authorized to take discriminatory measures as regards the enjoyment and protection of internationally recognized human rights.

Even though it is possible to identify fundamental labor rights based on the international instruments, “this concept is evolving. As new norms arise and are incorporated into the body of fundamental labor rights, they should benefit all workers, irrespective of their migratory status.”

In response to the questions of some of the judges of the Court, Mexico added that:

The fundamental labor rights that may not be restricted are those that are established in international human rights instruments with regard to all workers, including migrants, irrespective of their regular or irregular situation. In this respect, there appears to be consensus, deriving from these international instruments, that there are “a series of rights that, by their very nature, are so essential to safeguard the principle of equality before the law and the principle of non-discrimination, that their restriction or suspension, for any reason, entails the violation of these two cardinal principles of international human rights law.” Some examples of these fundamental rights are: the right to equal remuneration for work of equal value; the right to fair and satisfactory remuneration, including social security and other benefits derived from past employment; the right to form and join trade unions to defend one’s interests; the right to judicial and administrative guarantees to determine one’s rights; the prohibition of obligatory or forced labor, and the prohibition of child labor.

Any restriction of the enjoyment of the fundamental rights derived from the principles of equality before the law and non-discrimination violates the obligation erga omnes to respect the attributes inherent in the dignity of the human being, and the principal attribute is equality of rights. Specific forms of discrimination can range from denying access to justice to defend violated rights to denying rights derived from a labor relationship. When such discrimination is made by means of administrative or judicial decisions, it is based on the thesis that the enjoyment of fundamental rights may be conditioned to the attainment of migratory policy objectives.

The individual has acquired the status of a real active and passive subject of international law. The individual may be an active subject of obligations as regards human rights, and also individually responsible for non-compliance with them. This aspect has been developed in international criminal law and in international humanitarian law. On other issues, such as the one covered by this request for an advisory opinion, it can be established that “in the case of fundamental norms, revealed by objective manifestations and provided there is no doubt concerning their validity, the individual, such as an employer, may be obliged to respect them, irrespective of the domestic measures taken by the State to ensure or even violate, compliance with them."

The "transfer" of the Martens clause to the protection of the rights of migrant workers would imply that such persons had been granted an additional threshold of protection, according to which, in situations in which substantive law does not recognize certain fundamental rights or considers them less important, such rights would be justiciable. The safeguard of such fundamental human rights as those evident from the principles of equality before the law and non-discrimination, is protected by "the principles of universal morality," referred to in Article 17 of the OAS Charter, even in the absence of provisions of substantive law that are immediately binding for those responsible for ensuring that such rights are respected.

Honduras:

In its written and oral comments, Honduras stated that:

Regarding the first question of the request (supra para. 4):

Not every legal treatment establishing differences violates per se the enjoyment and exercise of the right to equality and to non-discrimination. The State is empowered to include objective and reasonable restrictions in its legislation in order to harmonize labor relations, provided it does not establish illegal or arbitrary differences or distinctions. "Legality is intended to guarantee the right to fair, equitable and satisfactory conditions."

The State may regulate the exercise of rights and establish State policies by legislation, without this being incompatible with the purpose and goal of the Convention.

Regarding the second question of the request (supra para. 4):

The legal residence of a person who is in an American State cannot be considered conditio sine qua non to ensure the right to equality and non-discrimination, as regards the obligation established in Article 1(1) of the American Convention and in relation to the rights and freedoms recognized to all persons in this treaty.

Article 22 of the American Convention guarantees freedom of movement and residence, so that every person lawfully in the territory of another State has the right to move about in it and to reside in it subject to the provisions of the law. The American Convention and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights grant "States the right that those subject to their jurisdiction must observe the provisions of the law."

The regulation concerning legal residence established in the laws of the State does not violate the international obligations of the State if it has been established by a law – strictu sensu and including the requirements that are established – which does not violate the intent and purpose of the American Convention.

"[I]t cannot be understood that legislation establishes a harmfully distinct treatment for undocumented migrant workers, when the Convention determines that the movement and residence of an alien in the territory of a State party should be legal and is not incompatible with the intent and purpose of the Convention."

Regarding the third question of the request (supra para. 4):

Determining migratory policies is a decision for the State. The central element of such policies should be respect for the fundamental rights arising from the obligations assumed before the international community. An interpretation that violates or restricts human rights "subordinating them to the attainment of any objective[,] violates the obligation to protect such rights." The interpretation must not deviate from the provisions of the American Convention, or its intent and purpose.

The purpose of compliance with the provisions of the law is to protect national security, public order, public health or morality, and the rights and freedoms of others.

The General Study on Migrant Workers conducted by the International Labour Organization concluded that "it is permissible" to restrict an alien's access to employment, when two conditions are met: a) in the case of "limited categories of employment or functions"; and b) when the restriction is necessary in "the interests of the State." These conditions may refer to situations in which the protection of the State's interest justifies certain employments or functions being reserved to its citizens, owing to their nature.

Regarding the fourth question of the request (supra para. 4):

In certain cases, inequality in treatment by the law may be a way of promoting equality or protecting those who appear to be weak from a legal standpoint.

The fact that there are no discriminatory laws or that the legislation of Honduras prohibits discrimination is not sufficient to ensure equality of treatment or equality before the law in practice.

The American States must guarantee a decorous treatment to the migrant population in general, in order to avoid violations and abuse of this extremely vulnerable sector.

Nicaragua:

In its written and oral comments, Nicaragua indicated that:

The request for an advisory opinion submitted by Mexico "is one more measure that can assist States, and national and international organizations, define the scope of their peremptory obligations[,] established in human rights treaties, and apply and comply with them, in particular, with regard to strengthening and protecting the human rights of migratory workers."

Article 27 of the Constitution of Nicaragua establishes that, in national territory, all persons enjoy State protection and recognition of the rights inherent in the human being, the respect, promotion and protection of human rights, and the full exercise of the rights embodied in the international human rights instruments acceded to and ratified by Nicaragua.

El Salvador:

In its written and oral comments, El Salvador indicated that:

It considers that the request should take into account provisions of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ("Protocol of San Salvador") and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, "because these treaties are relevant to the opinion requested on the protection of human rights in the American States."

"[T]he implementation and interpretation of secondary legislation cannot subordinate the international obligations of the American States embodied in international human rights treaties and instruments."

When an employment relationship is established between a migrant worker and an employer in an American State, the latter is obliged to recognize and guarantee to the worker the human rights embodied in international human rights instruments, including those relating to the right to employment and to social security, without any discrimination.

Canada:

In its written comments, Canada stated that:

Three elements of Canadian legislation and policy relate to the subject of the request for an advisory opinion: first, the international support that Canada provides to matters concerning migrants; second, the categories of migrants and temporary residents (visitors) that are established in the Canadian Immigration and Refugee Protection Act; and, third, the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms in Canada.

Canada is concerned about the violations of the rights of migrants throughout the world. Canada supported the United Nations resolution establishing the Office of the Special Rapporteur on the Human Rights of Migrants and collaborated in drafting the mandate of this Office in order to make it strong and balanced.

Immigration is a key component of Canadian society. Attracting and selecting migrants can contribute to the social and economic interests of Canada, reuniting families and protecting the health, security and stability of Canadians.

The term "migrant" is not generally used in Canada. However, the term "migrants," as understood in the international context, covers three categories of person.

The first category corresponds to permanent residents. It includes migrants, refugees who come to live in Canada and asylum seekers who obtained this status through the corresponding procedure. All these persons have the right to reside permanently in Canada and to request citizenship after three years' residence.

The second category refers to persons who have requested refugee status, as defined in the 1951 United Nations Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol, and who have not obtained the corresponding response. If it is established that the person fulfills the conditions to request refugee status, he has the right to represent himself or to be represented by a lawyer in the proceeding to determine his refugee status. Any person who represents a serious danger to Canada or to Canadian society may not proceed with a request for refugee status. In most cases, those who request refugee status have access to provincial social services, medical care and the labor market. They and their minor children have access to public education (from pre-school to secondary). Once they are granted refugee status, they may request permanent residence and include their immediate family in their request, even if the latter are outside Canada.

The third category corresponds to temporary residents who arrive in Canada for a temporary stay. There are several categories of temporary residents according to the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act: visitors (tourists), foreign students and temporary workers.

Although temporary workers do not enjoy the same degree of freedom as Canadian citizens and permanent residents on the labor market, their fundamental human rights are protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, enacted in 1982 as part of the 1982 Constitution Act. This Charter applies to all government legislation, programs and initiatives (federal, provincial, territorial and municipal). Most of the fundamental rights and freedoms protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are guaranteed to all individuals who are in Canadian territory, irrespective of their migratory status or citizenship. Some of these rights are: freedom of association, the right to due process, the right to equality before the law, and the right to equal protection without discrimination of any kind owing to race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. There are some exceptions, because the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees some rights only to Canadian citizens, such as: the right to vote, and the right to enter, remain in and depart from Canada. The right to travel between the provinces, and the right to work in any province is guaranteed to citizens and permanent residents. Many of these guarantees reflect the right of sovereign States to control the movement of persons across international borders.

The right to equality guaranteed by section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is of particular importance in the context of this request for an advisory opinion. In 1989, in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, the Supreme Court of Canada established that the right to equality includes substantive rather than merely formal equality. Substantive equality usually refers to equal treatment of all individuals and, on some occasions, requires that the differences that exist be acknowledged in a non-discriminatory manner. For example, giving equal treatment to the disabled involves taking the necessary measures to adapt to such differences and to promote the access and inclusion of such individuals in government programs.

In order to demonstrate that section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms has been violated, a person alleging discrimination must prove: 1) that the law has imposed on him a different treatment from that imposed on others, based on one or more personal characteristics; 2) that the differential treatment is due to discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability, or nationality; and 3) that discrimination in the substantive sense exists, because the person is treated with less concern, respect and consideration, so that his human dignity is offended.

For example, in Lavoie v. Canada, most members of the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the preference given to Canadian citizens in competitions for employment in the federal public service discriminates on the grounds of citizenship, and therefore violates section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In addition to constitutional protection, the federal provincial and territorial governments have enacted human rights legislation to promote equality and prohibit discrimination in employment and services. This legislation applies to the private sector acting as an employer and provider of services, and to the governments.

The Supreme Court of Canada has established that the courts must interpret human rights legislation so as to advance towards the goal of ensuring equal opportunities to all. Following this interpretation, the Supreme Court has reached a series of conclusions on the scope of human rights codes, including the principle of their precedence over regular legislation, unless the latter establishes a clear exception. Discriminatory practices can be contested, even when they are legal. Although the Canadian jurisdictions have different human rights legislation, they are subject to these general principles and must provide the same fundamental protections.

Inter-American Commission on Human Rights: In its written and oral comments, the Commission stated that:

Human Rights:

In international human rights law, the principle of non-discrimination enshrines equality between persons and imposes certain prohibitions on States. Distinctions based on gender, race, religion or national origin are specifically prohibited in relation to the enjoyment and exercise of the substantive rights embodied in international instruments. Regarding these categories, any distinction that States make in the application of benefits or privileges must be carefully justified on the grounds of a legitimate interest of the State and of society, "which cannot be satisfied by non-discriminatory means."

International human rights law prohibits not only deliberately discriminatory policies and practices, but also policies and practices with a discriminatory impact on certain categories of persons, even though a discriminatory intention cannot be proved.

The principle of equality does not exclude consideration of migratory status. States are empowered to determine which aliens may enter their territory and under what conditions. However, the possibility of identifying forms of discrimination that are not specifically intended, but which constitute violations of the principle of equality must be preserved.

States may establish distinctions in the enjoyment of certain benefits between its citizens, aliens (with regular status) and aliens whose situation is irregular. Nevertheless, pursuant to the progressive development of norms of international human rights law, this requires detailed examination of the following factors: 1) the content and scope of the norm that discriminates between categories of persons; 2) the consequences that this discriminatory treatment will have on the persons prejudiced by the State's policy or practice; 3) the possible justifications for this differentiated treatment, particularly its relationship to the legitimate interest of the State; 4) the logical relationship between the legitimate interest and the discriminatory practice or policies; and 5) whether or not there are means or methods that are less prejudicial for the individual and allow the same legitimate ends to be attained.

The international community is unanimous in considering that the prohibition of racial discrimination and of practices directly associated with it is an obligation erga omnes. The jus cogens nature of the principle of non-discrimination implies that, owing to their peremptory nature, all States must observe these fundamental rules, whether or not they have ratified the conventions establishing them, because it is an obligatory principle of international common law. "Even though the international community has not yet reached consensus on prohibiting discrimination based on motives other than racial discrimination, this does not lessen its fundamental importance in all international laws.”

To underscore the importance of the principle of equality and non-discrimination, human rights treaties expressly establish this principle in articles related to determined categories of human rights. In this respect, we should mention Article 8.1 of the American Convention, owing to its particular relevance for this request for an advisory opinion. Equality is an essential element of due process.

Any distinction based on one of the elements indicated in Article 1 of the American Convention entails “a strong presumption of incompatibility with the treaty.”

Basic human rights must be respected without any distinction. Any differences established with regard to the respect and guarantee of the fundamental rights must have limited application and comply with the conditions indicated in the American Convention. Some international instruments explicitly establish certain distinctions.

At times the principle of equality requires States to adopt positive measures to reduce or eliminate the conditions that cause or facilitate the perpetuation of the discrimination prohibited by the treaties.

The American States are obliged to guarantee the basic protection of the human rights established in the human rights treaties to all persons subject to their authority, “and [this] does not depend[...] for its application on factors such as citizenship, nationality or any other aspect of the person, including his migratory status.”

The rights embodied in the human rights treaties may be regulated reasonably and the exercise of some of them may be subject to legitimate restrictions. The establishment of such restrictions must respect the relevant formal and substantive limits; in other words, it must be accomplished by law and satisfy an urgent public interest. Restrictions may not be imposed for discriminatory purposes, nor may they be applied in a discriminatory manner. Furthermore, “any permissible restriction of rights may never imply the total negation of the right.”

The elaboration and execution of migratory policies and the regulation of the labor market are legitimate objectives of the State. To achieve such objectives, States may adopt measures that restrict or limit some rights, provided they respect the following criteria: 1) some rights are non-derogable; 2) some rights are reserved exclusively for citizens; 3) some rights are conditioned to the status of documented migrant, such as those relating to freedom of movement and residence; and 4) some rights may be restricted, provided the following requirements are met: a) the restriction must be established by law; b) the restriction must respond to a legitimate interest of the State, which has been explicitly stated; c) the restriction must have a "reasonable relationship to the legitimate objective", and d) there must not be "other means to achieve these objectives that are less onerous for those affected."

It is the State's responsibility to prove that it is "permissible" to restrict or exclude a specific category of persons, such as aliens, from the application of some provision of the international instrument. "Migratory status can never be grounds for excluding a person from the basic protections granted to him by international human rights law."

In addition, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights indicated that labor rights are protected in international human rights instruments and, in this respect, referred to the Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work of the International Labor Organization (ILO) and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families.

Bearing in mind the development of international human rights law and international labor law, it can be said that "there are a series of fundamental labor laws that derive from the right to work and are at the very center of it."

Lastly, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights requested the Court to systematize the rights related to employment "ranking them in order to show that some of these labor rights are considered fundamental" and that, consequently, such rights would "comprise the category of rights regarding which no discrimination is allowed, not even owing to migratory status."

Costa Rica:

In its written and oral comments, Costa Rica stated that it would not refer to the last question formulated by the requesting State. Before making its comments on the other three questions, it set out the following considerations on the "protection of the human rights of migrants in Costa Rica" and on the "principle of reasonableness in the differential treatment of nationals and aliens."

The Costa Rican Constitution establishes a situation of equality in the exercise of rights and obligations between nationals and aliens, with certain exceptions, such as the prohibition to intervene in the country's political affairs, and others established in legal norms. Those exceptions may not violate the other rights enshrined in the Constitution.

"Despite legal measures and executive actions, some situations of a less favorable treatment for illegal immigrant workers unfortunately occur in the area of employment." The General Law on Migration and Aliens prohibits the employment of aliens residing in the country illegally; however, it also establishes that those who do employ such persons are not exempt from the obligation to provide workers with the wages and social security benefits stipulated by law. In this respect, the Legal Department of the Directorate of Migration and Aliens has established that all workers, irrespective of their migratory status, have the right to social security.

The principles of equality and non-discrimination do not imply that all aspects of the rights of aliens must be equated with the rights of nationals. Each State exercises its sovereignty by defining the legal status of aliens within its territory. To this end, "the principle of reasonableness should be used to define the scope of the activities of aliens in a country."

The Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice of Costa Rica has established that reasonableness is a fundamental requirement for an exclusion or restriction to the rights of aliens compared to nationals to be constitutional. Exclusion is when a right is not recognized to aliens, denying them the possibility of performing some activity. Examples of constitutional exclusions relating to aliens are the prohibition to intervene in political affairs and to occupy certain public offices. To the contrary, restrictions recognize a right to the alien, but restrict or limit it reasonably, taking into account the protection of a group of nationals or a specific activity, or the fulfillment of a social function. Restrictions based exclusively on nationality should not be imposed because xenophobic factors, unrelated to parameters of reasonableness, could exist.

The Constitutional Chamber also indicated that "[e]vidently, the equality of aliens and nationals declared in Article 19 of the Constitution is related to that core of human rights regarding which no distinctions are admissible for any reason whatsoever, particularly owing to nationality. However, the Constitution reserves the exercise of political rights to nationals, because such rights are an intrinsic consequence of the exercise of the sovereignty of the people[...].”

The Constitutional Court has emphasized that any exception or restriction to the exercise of a fundamental rights affecting an alien must have constitutional or legal rank, and that the measures should be reasonable and proportional and should not be contrary to human dignity.

The Constitutional Court has declared some norms unconstitutional because it considered them irrational or illogical. They include: legal restrictions for aliens to take part as merchants in a “bonded warehouse”; the prohibition for aliens to be notaries, for advertisements recorded by aliens to be broadcast, and for aliens to act as private security agents; and the exclusion of foreign children as possible beneficiaries of the basic education allowance.

No human right is absolute and, therefore, the enjoyment of human rights is subject to certain restrictions. The legislator may establish logical exceptions arising from the natural difference between nationals and aliens, but may not establish distinctions that imply a void in the principle of equality. “It should be recalled that, in all countries, there are differences of treatment – which do not conflict with international standards of protection – for reasons such as age and gender.”

There can be no differences as regards salary, and working conditions or benefits.

As in most countries, Costa Rican law establishes that aliens who reside illegally in the country may not work or carry out paid or lucrative tasks, either for their own or someone else’s account with or without a relation of dependency. Accordingly, the irregular situation of a person in a State of which he is not a national results per se in a considerable limitation in his conditions of access to many workers’ rights. Many social benefits for health and employment security and those that are strictly related to employment “entail a series of bureaucratic procedures which cannot be carried out when a person is undocumented.”

When the domestic legislation of a State establishes essential requirements that a persons must fulfill to be eligible for a specific service, this cannot be considered to signify a harmfully distinct treatment for undocumented migrant workers. "Moreover, if an employer includes the names of his undocumented workers in certain records, it would imply that he is violating migratory legislation, which would make him liable to punishment."

Owing to the way in which States organize their administrative structure, in practice, there are a series of provisions that indirectly prevent undocumented migrant workers from enjoying their labor rights.

Notwithstanding the above, an employer who has engaged undocumented workers is obliged to pay them wages and other remunerations. Furthermore, "the irregular status of a person does not prevent him from having recourse to the courts of justice to claim his rights"; in other words, "as regards access to judicial bodies, irregular immigrant workers and members of their families have the right to judicial guarantees and judicial protection in the same conditions as nationals."

Regarding question 2(1) of the request (supra para. 4): Respect for the principles of equality and non-discrimination does not mean that some restrictions or requirements for the enjoyment of a specific right cannot be established, using a criterion of reasonableness. The classic example is the exercise of political rights, which is reserved for nationals of a country.

There are other rights that may not be restricted or limited in any way and must be respected to all persons without distinction. In Costa Rica, the right to life is one of these rights. This implies, for example, that a directive ordering border guards to fire on those who try and enter national territory through a non-authorized border post would be a flagrant violation of human rights.

Regarding question 2(2) of the request (supra para. 4): The legal residence of an alien in a recipient State is not a necessary condition for his human and labor rights to be respected. All persons, regardless of whether or not they are authorized to enter or remain in Costa Rica, may have recourse to the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice to uphold or re-establish their constitutional and other fundamental rights.

Regarding the third question of the request (supra para. 4):

To answer this question, we must refer to the rank of human rights in domestic law. The human rights instruments in force in Costa Rica "are not only of similar weight to the Constitution, but, to the extent that they grant greater rights or guarantees to individuals, they have prevalence over the Constitution." The Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice has taken international human rights legislation as the benchmark for interpreting the Constitution or as a parameter of the constitutionality of other lesser legal norms.

Any migratory norm or policy contrary to the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights would be totally null and void, even if adopted as law by the Legislature.

The Legal Clinics of the College of In their brief of November 27, 2002, indicated that:

*Jurisprudence of the Universidad
San Francisco de Quito:*

Regarding the first question of the request (supra para. 4):

Undocumented migrant workers should not lack protection before the State; migratory status does not deprive them of their human condition. The violation of domestic legislation cannot be considered grounds to deprive a person of the protection of his human rights; in other words, it does not exempt States from complying with the obligations imposed by international law. "To affirm the contrary would be to create an indirect means of discriminating against undocumented migrant workers by, to a certain extent, denying them legal personality and creating legal inequality between persons."

There is no provision of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights or the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights that allows the right to work to be restricted owing to migratory status. Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is explicit when referring to national origin as grounds that may not be used to discriminate against a person; moreover, it adds that neither can "other status" be cited to deny a person equal treatment by the law. "The norm is clear: the documented or undocumented status may not be used as grounds to deny the exercise of any human right and, consequently, to be treated unequally by the law." Moreover, no interpretation of Article 24 of the American Convention allows equality to be subordinated to a person's legal residence or citizenship.

Nowadays, migrants are faced with discriminatory State legislation and labor practices and, what is worse, they are constantly denied access to governmental bodies and guarantees of due process; "this is a serious situation for migrants who are documented, but even more so for those who have been unable to legitimize their legal status in the country in which they reside."

The United Nations and the International Labour Organization (ILO) have drawn up norms to guard against the lack of legal protection for migrants. For example, when referring to migrant workers, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families does not establish any difference on the basis of their legal status, "in other words, it recognizes to migrant workers all the human, civil, political, social, cultural or labor rights, whether or not they are documented." Furthermore, in a previous effort to improve the human rights situation of migrants, ILO Convention No. 143 concerning Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) of 1975, contains important provisions in this respect.

The General Conference of the International Labor Organization has issued two relevant recommendations. However, Recommendation No. 86 on Migrant Workers (revised in 1949) "is discriminatory, inasmuch as it only applies to workers who are accepted as migrant workers. It appears that it does not apply to undocumented migrant workers. In 1975, the International Labor Organization issued Recommendation No. 151 on Migrant Workers, which also only refers to documented migrants. "In other words, although there is concern for migrant workers, they are recognized rights only because of their legal status, and not because of their status as human beings."

In this respect, the route followed by the United Nations in the field of international law has been more coherent. For example, resolution 1999/44 of the Commission on Human Rights recognizes that the principles and standards embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights apply to everyone, including migrants, without making any reference to their legal status.

The International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families refers to the migrant worker without differentiating between the documented and the undocumented migrant worker.

States may not provide different treatment to migrants who are in their territory, whatever their migratory status. “[T]he Court must respond to the first question by affirming that[,] in accordance with the international norms in force, a harmfully different treatment may not be established for undocumented migratory workers.”

States may not establish discrimination because a person’s residence has not been regularized, and it may not disregard the guarantees necessary for the protection of universal fundamental rights. “It is unacceptable for a State not to guarantee and protect the human rights of all persons in its territory.”

The articles mentioned in the questions at issue establish categorically that all persons are equal before the law. An individual does not acquire the status of person when he is admitted legally into a certain territory; it is an intrinsic quality of the human being. Furthermore, the provisions referred to contain a list of grounds on which a person may not be discriminated against and conclude with phrases such as “nor any other” or “any other condition.” The rights and freedoms proclaimed in international instruments “belong to all individuals, because they are persons, and not because of the recognition a State grants them, owing to their migratory status.” “[I]nternational law does not permit any grounds for distinction that would allow human rights to be impaired or restricted.”

The State may not deny any person the labor rights embodied in many international norms. The denial of one or more labor rights, based on the undocumented status of a migrant workers is entirely incompatible with the obligations of the American States to ensure non-discrimination and the equal and effective protection of the law, to which the said provisions commit them.

According to Article 5 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 29 of the American Convention, “it cannot be alleged that a State has the right to accept or not a certain individual into its territory and to limit the right to equality before the law, or any of the rights established in the said instrument.”

Regarding the third question of the request (supra para. 4):

“[I]t is unacceptable to restrict the enjoyment and exercise of a human right citing domestic policy objectives, even when public order (ordre public), the ultimate goal of any State, is involved.”

Human rights cannot be subordinated to domestic laws, whether these relate to migratory or any other policy. The right to non-discrimination cannot be conditioned to compliance with migratory policy objectives, even when such objectives are established in domestic legislation. “In accordance with international obligations, laws that restrict the equal enjoyment of human rights of any person are inadmissible and the State is obliged to abolish them.” Moreover, since they are of an erga omnes nature, these obligations may be applied to third parties that are not a party to the Convention recognizing them.

In addition to convention-related obligations concerning the prohibition to discriminate, all States have the obligation erga omnes, namely, to the international community, to prevent any form of discrimination, including discrimination derived from their migratory policy. The prohibition to discriminate is of fundamental importance to the international community; “consequently, no domestic policy may be aimed at tolerating or permitting discrimination in any form that affects the enjoyment and exercise of human rights.”

“[T]he Court must answer this question by indicating that any subordination of the enjoyment and exercise of human rights to the existence of migratory policies and the achievement of the objectives established in those policies is unacceptable.”

Regarding the fourth question of the request (supra para. 4):

International human rights law establishes limits to the exercise of power by States. These limits are determined in conventions and in customary law provisions and peremptory or jus cogens norms.

“Like obligations erga omnes, jus cogens contains elements of fundamental importance for the international community, elements that are so essential that they are more important than State consent, which, in international law, determines the validity of norms.”

There is little disagreement about the existence of these peremptory norms in international law. In this respect, the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties does not set limits to the content of jus cogens; that is, it does not determine what these peremptory norms are, but merely cites some examples. Article 53 of the Convention establishes four requisites for determining whether a norm is of a jus cogens character. They are: it must be a norm of general international law, it must be accepted and recognized by the international community, it must be non-derogable, and it may only be modified by a subsequent norm having the same character.

"Therefore, we must ask ourselves whether it would offend the human conscience and public morality if a State [should reject] the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law. The answer is evidently in the affirmative."

"The Court must evaluate whether the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law fulfill the four requirements of a jus cogens norm."

If the Court accepts that both the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law are jus cogens norms, this would have several legal effects. In this regard, the European Court of Human Rights has indicated that such effects include: recognition that the norm ranks higher than any norm of international law, except other jus cogens norms; should there be a dispute, the jus cogens norm would prevail over any other norm of international law and any provision contrary to the peremptory norm would be null or lack legal effect.

The legal effects derived, individually and collectively, from the norms contained in Article 3(1) and 17 of the OAS Charter must be determined. According to these norms, the States parties assume a commitment, both individually and collectively, to "prevent, protect and punish" any violation of human rights. The spirit of Article 17 of the OAS Charter is to create binding principles for the States, even if they have not accepted the competence of the Court, so that they respect the fundamental rights of the individual. The Charter proclaims that human rights should be enjoyed without any distinction. Both the States parties and the OAS organs have the obligation to prevent any violation of human rights and to allow them to be enjoyed fully and absolutely.

"If the Court decides that the principle of non-discrimination is a rule of jus cogens[,] then we may infer that these norms are binding for States, whether or not the international conventions have been ratified; since [...] the principles [of] jus cogens create obligations erga omnes." If this principle were to be considered a norm of jus cogens it would form part of the fundamental rights of the human being and of universal morality.

The Court must answer this question by stating that the principle of non-discrimination is a peremptory international norm, "therefore, the provisions of Articles 3(1) and 17 of the OAS Charter must be interpreted similarly."

The Delgado Law Firm:

In its brief of December 12, 2002, stated that:

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in Hoffman Plastic Compounds Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board has given rise to uncertainty with regard to the rights of migrants in that country – a situation which could have serious implications for migrants.

In the area of labor law, the United States does not treat irregular migrants with equality before the law. The United States Supreme Court decided that a United States employer could violate the labor rights of an irregular migrant worker without having to give him back pay. In the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case, the United States Supreme Court did not impose a fine on the employer who violated the labor rights of an irregular migrant worker and did not order any compensation for the worker.

According to the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case, a migrant worker incurs in "serious misconduct" when he obtains employment in breach of the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA). However, in this case, the United States Supreme Court did not deny that the employer had dismissed the worker for trying to organize a union, which entailed the responsibility of the employer for having committed an evident violation of the labor laws. Even though the employer committed this violation, he was not treated equally by the Supreme Court.

Although the United States affirms that its domestic policy discourages illegal immigration, in practice, it continues to take measures that make it less expensive and therefore more attractive for United States employers to engage irregular migrant workers. For example, even in the United States, it is agreed that the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case will result in an increase in discrimination against undocumented workers, because employers can allege that they did not know that the worker was undocumented so as to avoid any responsibility for violating the rights of their workers.

This discriminatory treatment of irregular migrants is contrary to international law. Using cheap labor without ensuring workers their basic human rights is not a legitimate immigration policy.

The effects of the Immigration Reform and Control Act and the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case indicate that there is an increase in discrimination against undocumented migrant workers. Indeed, the reasoning of the United States Supreme Court suggests that allowing irregular workers to file actions or complaints would only "encourage illegal immigration."

In the United States, irregular workers are exposed to "dangerous" working conditions. Domestic immigration policy should not be distorted in order to use it to exonerate employers who expose irregular migrant workers to unreasonable risk of death.

The United States continue to benefit daily from the presence in its workforce of a significant number of irregular migrant workers. Conservative estimates suggest that there are at least 5.3 million irregular migrants working in the United States and that three million of them are Mexicans. No State should be allowed to benefit knowingly and continuously from the labor of millions of migrant workers, while pretending it does not want such workers and, hence, does not have to guarantee them even the most basic rights. Migrant workers have the right to equal protection of the law, including the protection of their human rights.

Undocumented workers who have filed complaints about remuneration and working conditions in the United States have been intimidated by their employers, who usually threaten to call the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Moreover, in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case, the United States Supreme Court stated that, owing to his migratory status, no individual whose situation in the country was irregular could require his former employer to pay back wages.

The principle of equality before the law embodied in Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights obliges States not to enact legislation that creates differences between workers based on their ethnic or national origin.

The principle of equality before the law applies to the enjoyment of civil, political, economic and social rights, without any distinction.

All workers have the right to recognition of their basic human rights, including the right to earn their living and to be represented by a lawyer, despite their migratory status.

The International Labor Organization has drafted important treaties, such as Convention No. 143 concerning Migrations in Abusive Conditions and the Promotion of Equal Opportunity and Treatment of Migrant Workers. This Convention establishes equal treatment between migrants and nationals as regards security of employment, rehabilitation, social security, employment-related rights and other benefits.

Many of the rights included in the International Labor Organization conventions are considered international customary law. These rights are also included in the most important human rights conventions, such as the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

Lastly, it should be stressed that human rights extend to all migrant workers, whether their situation in a State is regular or irregular.

*Students of the Law Faculty of the Universidad Nacional
Autónoma de México (UNAM):*

In their written and oral statements, indicated that:

Regarding the admissibility of the consultation:

The advisory opinion requested is clearly important, "not only for Mexico, but also for all Latin America, owing to the number of migrants in an irregular situation in other countries and because they are considered a vulnerable group, prone to systematic violation of their human rights."

Regarding the first question of the consultation (supra para. 4):

Even though labor rights have been included among the economic, social and cultural rights, in reality, they form part of an indissoluble whole of all human rights, with no hierarchy, because they are inherent to human dignity.

"The problem of discrimination occurs particularly in labor-related matters." Undocumented migrants endure several disadvantages; for example, they are paid low wages, receive few or no social benefits or health expenses, are not allowed to join unions and are under constant threat of dismissal or being reported to the migration authorities. "This is confirmed institutionally." Some United States laws and decisions establish a distinction between undocumented migrants, nationals and residents "that is neither objective nor reasonable and, consequently, results in evident discrimination."

The principle of non-discrimination applies to all rights and freedoms, pursuant to domestic law and international law, in accordance with the provisions of Article II of the American Declaration and Articles 1(1) and 24 of the American Convention.

Obviously, States have the sovereign authority to enact labor laws and regulations and establish the requirements they consider appropriate for aliens who become part of their workforce. However, this authority may not be exercised disregarding the international human rights corpus juris.

"Human rights do not depend on the nationality of an individual, on the territory where he is, or on his legal status, because they are inherent in him. Upholding the contrary would be akin to denying human dignity. If the exercise of authority is limited by human rights, State sovereignty cannot be cited to violate them or prevent their international protection."

Regarding the second question of the consultation (supra para. 4):

Human rights treaties are based on a notion of collective guarantee; consequently, they do not establish mutual obligations between States; rather, they determine the State obligation to respect and guarantee the rights contained in such instruments to all persons.

Any interpretation of the international human rights instruments must take into account the pro homine principle; in other words, they must be interpreted so as to give preference to the individual, "it is therefore unacceptable that Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Universal Declaration, Article II of the American Declaration, and Articles 2 and 26 of the Covenant, as well as Articles 1 and 24 of the American Convention should be interpreted as limiting the human rights of a group of persons, merely because of their undocumented status."

An interpretation of any international instrument that leads to the restriction of a right or freedom of an individual, who is not legally resident in the country where he resides, is contrary to the object and purpose of all international human rights instruments.

Regarding the third question of the consultation (supra para. 4):

States have the sovereign authority to issue migratory laws and regulations and to establish differences between nationals and aliens, provided that such domestic norms are compatible with their international human rights obligations. These differences must have an objective, reasonable justification; consequently, they should have a legitimate objective and there must be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means used and the aim sought.

A State party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which enacts a law that clearly violates this instrument or takes measures that limit the rights and freedoms embodied in this treaty to the detriment of a group of persons incurs international responsibility, Equality before the law and non-discrimination are essential principles that apply to all matters. Therefore, any act of the State, including an act in keeping with its domestic laws, which subordinates or conditions the fundamental human rights of a group of persons, entails the State's non-compliance with its obligations erga omnes to respect and guarantee those rights. Consequently, it results in the increased international responsibility of the State and any subject of international law may legitimately cite this.

Regarding the fourth question of the consultation (supra para. 4):

The 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties has recognized the existence of norms of jus cogens, by establishing them as peremptory norms of international law. However, it did not define them clearly.

Norms of jus cogens respond to the need to establish an international public order (ordre public), because a community ruled by law requires norms that are superior to the will of those who form part of it.

The international community has repudiated violations of the principle of non-discrimination and the right to the equal and effective protection of the law.

The principle of non-discrimination and the right to equality before the law are of transcendental importance in relation to the situation of undocumented migrant workers, because their violation involves the systematic violation of other rights.

The principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal protection of the law, "which are the essence of human rights, are norms of ius cogens." Norms of ius cogens are enforceable erga omnes, because they contain elemental values and concerns of mankind based on universal consensus, owing to the special nature of the prerogative they protect.

Javier Juárez, of the Law Office of Sayre & Chavez: In his brief of February 6, 2003, stated that:

On March 27, 2002, the United States Supreme Court decided that undocumented migrant workers, who had been unduly dismissed because they had organized unions, did not have the right to back pay under the National Labor Relations Act.

For undocumented workers, this decision creates a clear legal exception to the guarantees granted to other workers; therefore, it contravenes the provisions of the international agreements that seek to ensure equal protection for migrant workers and it increases the vulnerability that distinguishes them from other groups in the general population.

The case cited involves Mr. Castro, a worker employed in the plant of the Hoffman Plastic Compounds company in Los Angeles, California. In 1989, when Mr. Castro helped organize a union to improve working conditions in the plant, he was dismissed. In January 1992, the National Labor Relations Board decided that Mr. Castro's dismissal was illegal and ordered payment of back pay and his reinstatement.

In June 1993, during the hearing held before an administrative judge of the National Labor Relations Board to determine the amount of back pay, Mr. Castro indicated that he had never been legally admitted or authorized to work in the United States. As a result of this statement, the administrative judge decided that he could not grant payment of back pay, because this would conflict with the 1986 Immigration Control and Reform Act, which prohibits employers from knowingly employing undocumented workers, and employees from using false documents in order to seek employment.

In September 1998, the National Labor Relations Board revoked the decision of the administrative judge and indicated that the most effective way to promote immigration policies was to provide undocumented workers with the same guarantees and remedies as those granted to other employees under the National Labor Relations Act.

The National Labor Relations Board decided that, even though the undocumented worker did not have the right to be reinstated, he should receive back pay and the interest accrued for the three years' lost work.

The United States Court of Appeal denied the request for review filed by Hoffman Plastic Compounds and reaffirmed the decision of the National Labor Relations Board.

On March 27, 2002, the United States Supreme Court considered the case and annulled the payment that was to be made to the worker.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court rejecting the payment to the worker stated that allowing the National Labor Relations Board to allow payment of back pay to illegal aliens would prejudice statutory prohibitions that were essential to the federal immigration policy. This would help individuals avoid the migratory authorities, pardon violations of immigration laws and encourage future violations.

The minority opinion of the United States Supreme Court indicated that the decision adopted in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case would undermine labor legislation and encourage employers to hire undocumented workers. The dissenting opinion in the case established that payment of back pay is not contrary to the national immigration policy.

This dissenting opinion also indicated that, by failing to apply the labor legislation, those persons who most needed protection were left open to exploitation by employers. It added that the immigration law did not weaken or reduce legal protection, or limit the power to remedy unfair practices carried out against undocumented workers.

In its broadest sense, the decision of the United States Supreme Court implies that undocumented workers do not have the right to file proceedings to obtain payment of overtime, or to claim violations of the minimum wage or discrimination.

However, in two different cases related to violations of the minimum wage, a district court and a superior court decided that the migratory status of workers was not relevant in order to request payment of the minimum wage for the period of employment.

Several state authorities were mentioned which consider that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case has a negative impact on the labor rights of migrant workers.

Most migrant workers are unwilling to exercise their rights and, on many occasions, do not report the abuses to which they are subjected.

Corporate associations also confirm the legal, social and economic vulnerability of undocumented workers. Recently, the Center for Labor Market Studies of Northwestern University conducted a study on the impact of migrants in the United States. The study director indicated that, over the last 100 years, the economy of the United States has become more dependent on migrant labor. He added that many of these new migrant workers, possibly half of them, are in the United States without legal documents, which means that the economy depends on individuals who are in a "legal no-man's land."

In summary, the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case may be seen as one of the latest additions to the legal structure that, directly or indirectly, has denied migrants the basic guarantees required to alleviate their social and economic vulnerability.

Many differences in treatment are derived directly from the undocumented status of workers and, at times, these differences also extend to documented migrants.

Harvard Immigration and Refugee Clinic of Greater Boston Legal Services and the Harvard Law School, the Working Group on Human Rights in the Americas of Harvard and Boston College Law Schools, and the Global Justice Center:

In their written and oral statements, indicated that:

They are interested in this case and, in particular, in the labor rights of migrant workers in the Americas.

They endorse Mexico's argument that the facts show that migrant workers do not enjoy universal human rights in fair and equitable conditions. The disparity between existing international norms that protect migrant workers and national discriminatory practices and legislation is the greatest challenge faced by migrant workers.

They proceeded to review the laws and practice of some American States in order to understand the disparity that exists between the rights of migrant workers and the relevant public policy.

Regarding laws and practices in Argentina:

According to the Argentine General Migration Act only migrants admitted as permanent residents enjoy all the civil rights guaranteed in the Constitution, including the right to work. The right to work granted to temporary or transitory migrants is more limited, while migrants who are in breach of the General Migrations Act do not have the right to work and may be detained and expelled.

It is almost impossible for many undocumented migrants to comply with the requirements for obtaining legal residence in Argentina established in Decree No. 1434/87, which stipulates that the Migrations Department may deny legal residence to migrants who: 1) entered the country avoiding migratory control; 2) remained in the country for more than 30 days, in violation of the law; or 3) work without the legal authorization of the Migrations Department. Likewise, the Ministry of the Interior has extensive discretionary powers to deny legal residence to migrants.

In the practice, because most migrants in Argentina have few resources, are not professionals and do not have Argentine relatives, the best way to regularize their migratory status is to present an employment contract entered into with an Argentine employer. However, as the regulations are very complex, many migrants are obliged to maintain their illegal status. Consequently, they have to accept precarious working conditions and very low salaries, and endure other abuse from their employers.

Regarding laws and practice in Brazil:

The 1988 Federal Constitution of Brazil guarantees the legitimacy of the rights embodied in the international treaties to which Brazil is a party. The Federal Constitution also establishes equal treatment for nationals and aliens.

Brazilian labor laws make no distinction between nationals and aliens. Undocumented workers have the right to receive wages and social benefits for work performed. Moreover, there are no provisions that limit access to justice because of the complainant's nationality.

In practice, irregular workers in Brazil endure many difficulties, including long working hours and lower than minimum wages. Many irregular migrants never report abuses for fear of being deported. This fear also means that irregular migrants do not send their children to school, request driving licenses, buy goods, or visit their countries of origin.

Likewise, these workers have little information about their rights and can only claim them when they receive help from non-governmental organizations working with migrants.

Regarding laws and practice in Chile:

According to Chilean laws and regulations, national and foreign workers have equal labor rights.

Under Chilean labor legislation, an employment contract does not have to be in writing; however, the migratory law requires migrant workers to have a written contract drawn up before a public notary, in which the employer commits himself to paying the migrant's transport back to his country of origin on termination of the contract.

Migrant workers working in Chile without a written contract often receive very low wages, do not have access to social security benefits and can be dismissed at any time without monetary compensation. This situation is especially difficult for irregular migrant workers, because they fear being identified by the immigration authorities.

Likewise, given that irregular workers often do not possess national identity documents, they do not have access to many public services, including medical care and public housing.

The labor legislation does not expressly regulate the rights of workers without a contract, so the Labor Department and the Inspections Unit regulate their situation. Information on how these labor authorities interpret the law is not readily available to migrant workers. Chilean legislation on foreign workers has not been updated and provides them with very little protection, particularly in labor disputes.

Regarding laws and practice in the Dominican Republic:
The greatest obstacle to the protection of the rights of migrant workers in the Dominican Republic is the difficulty that Haitians face in establishing legal residence there. Once they have obtained their legal status, the law guarantees migrants the same civil rights as Dominicans. The law does not distinguish between citizens and documented aliens as regards their economic, social and cultural rights. Basic labor rights are guaranteed to all workers, regardless of whether or not they are legally resident in the country.

There are diverse problems in the workplace. For example, the minimum wage is insufficient to enjoy a decent life; the requirements for collective negotiation are unattainable; the fines imposed on employers are insufficient to prevent the violation of workers' rights, and many health and security inspectors are corrupt.

Most Haitian migrant workers in the Dominican Republic face long working hours, low wages and lack of employment security. Their living conditions are inadequate. Most workers do not have drinking water, latrines, medical care or social services.

Haitian migrant workers have a very limited possibility of combating these unfair working conditions. They have to face political and social attitudes that are generally hostile. At the same time, most of these workers do not have access to legal aid and, consequently, to the labor courts.

The way that the migratory and citizenship laws are applied in the Dominican Republic contributes to perpetuating the permanent illegality of Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian descent. Moreover, given their poverty and illiteracy, it is very difficult for migrant workers to comply with the requirements to obtain temporary employment permits. The status of Haitian workers as irregular migrants affects their children, even those born in the Dominican Republic. The children of Haitians, who are born in the Dominican Republic, are not considered citizens, because Haitians are classified as aliens in transit. This situation has meant that Haitians are subject to deportation at any time and mass expulsions have been carried out in violation of due process.

For decades, the Dominican Republic has benefited from the cheap labor of Haitians and the State has developed a system that maintains this flow of migrant workers without taking the minimum measures to ensure their fundamental rights.

Regarding laws and practice in the United Mexican States:

Pursuant to Articles 1 and 33 of the Constitution, which refer to equal protection, constitutional labor rights must be guaranteed to all migrants.

According to its Constitution, Mexico is obliged to implement the bilateral and multilateral treaties on the labor rights of migrant workers to which it has acceded. These treaties ensure equal protection and non-discrimination, as well as other more specific guarantees.

The Federal Labor Act allows migrants to work legally in Mexico as visitors. However, there are professional restrictions on certain categories of visitors; these categories include most migrant workers from Central America, who are usually less qualified. Therefore, workers from Central America can only enter Mexico legally under the "Migratory Form for Agricultural Visitors" or under the "Migratory Form for Local Border Visitors." Some provisions of the Federal Labor Act allow preferential treatment in contracting Mexican workers in relation to migrant workers.

The most common violations of the rights of migrant workers are: long working hours; inadequate living, health and transport conditions; below minimum wages; deductions from wages for food and housing; retention of wages and employment documents and racial discrimination. Owing to the bleak social and economic conditions in their countries of origin, many migratory agricultural workers are obliged to accept these abuses.

Although the "Migratory Form for Agricultural Visitors" and the "Migratory Form for Local Border Visitors" programs exist, and measures have been taken to protect the rights of migrant workers, these programs have been managed inadequately and have not prevented the abuse of workers. For example, the Local Arbitration and Conciliation Committees settle disputes between workers and employers, but the process is often slow. Also, many workers resort to the Committees without any legal representation and are summarily deported, even when their cases are pending.

Regarding laws and practice in the United States of America:

As a State party to the OAS Charter, the United States are subject to the obligations established by the American Declaration, which guarantee the right to work and to fair wages, as well as the right to organize unions and to receive equal treatment before the law. The Universal Declaration also guarantees the right to form trade unions and to equal remuneration for work of equal value. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which the United States is a party, guarantees the right to equality before the law, without discrimination, and establishes the right to form trade unions. Lastly, the International Labor Organization conventions protect the labor rights of irregular workers.

Under existing labor legislation in the United States, irregular workers are recognized as "employees," which gives them the right to the protection indicated in the principal federal labor laws. However, in practice they are not treated equally.

The National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) authorizes the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) to establish remedies for employees who are victims of unfair labor practices. For example, in cases of unjustified dismissal, the remedy might consist of reinstatement and payment of back pay. In Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. National Labor Relations Board (2002), the United States Supreme Court decided that an irregular worker did not have the right to back pay, even when he had been dismissed for taking part in the organization of a union to obtain fair pay. In this case, the Supreme Court determined that "migratory policy had precedence over labor policy." According to the Supreme Court's decision in Sure-Tan v. National Labor Relations Board (1984), workers can be handed over to the Immigration and Naturalization Service even when the employer's reason for doing so is unlawful retaliation against a worker who is carrying out an activity protected by the National Labor Relations Act. With these decisions, the Supreme Court has created inequality in the labor laws of the United States, based on migratory status.

Many irregular workers in the United States face serious problems owing to poor health and security conditions in the workplace, because they are paid less than the legal minimum. Migrant workers are also the target of discrimination and violence by third parties. Several States deny irregular workers access to education and medical care. Also, irregular workers who defend their rights run the risk of being reported to the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Undocumented migrants do not have access to legal aid, which makes it more difficult for workers to insist on their rights.

The difficult situation faced by irregular workers also affects migrant workers who are covered by the "H2A" and "H2B" visa programs. The rights of such workers are extremely restricted; for example, they are not covered by the law that establishes payment for overtime. In addition, the permit to be in the country legally is conditioned to remaining in a job with one employer, which restricts the worker's possibility of insisting on his rights.

Lastly, approximately 32 million workers, including many migrants who provide domestic services or work on farms, are not protected by the provision of the National Labor Relations Act establishing the right to organize unions or by any state legislation.

Thomas Brill, of the Law Office of Sayre & Chavez: In his written and oral statements, indicated that:

In March 2002, the United States Supreme Court decided, in Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. National Labor Relations Board, that an undocumented worker did not have the right to the payment of lost wages, after being illegally dismissed for trying to exercise rights granted by the National Labor Relations Act.

Hoffman Plastic Compounds engaged José Castro in May 1988. In December 1988, Mr. Castro and other workers began a campaign to organize a union. In January 1989, the company dismissed Mr. Castro and three other workers for trying to create and join a union. In January 1992, the National Labor Relations Board ordered Hoffman Plastic Compounds to reinstate Mr. Castro and to give him the back pay he would have received, had it not been for the company's decision to dismiss him because he was involved in union activities. The company refused to give Mr. Castro the back pay, because he admitted that he did not have an employment permit.

In September 1998, the National Labor Relations Board decided that Hoffman Plastic Compounds must pay Mr. Castro back pay corresponding to the period from his dismissal up until the date on which he admitted that he did not have the documentation corresponding to the employment permit. In its decision, the National Labor Relations Board said that "[t]he most effective way to adapt and promote the United States immigration policies [...] is to provide the guarantees and remedies of the National Labor Relations Act to undocumented workers in the same way as to other workers." The National Labor Relations Board ordered Hoffman Plastic Compounds to pay Mr. Castro the amount of US$66,951 (sixty-six thousand nine hundred and fifty-one United States dollars) for the concept of back pay. Hoffman Plastic Compounds refused to pay

Mr. Castro and filed an appeal. In 2001, the Federal Appeals Court confirmed the decision of the National Labor Relations Board and Hoffman Plastic Compounds filed an appeal before the United States Supreme Court.

In its decision of March 2002, the Supreme Court revoked the decisions of the Appeals Court and the National Labor Relations Board. It denied Mr. Castro's request for back pay and stated that, in the case of irregular workers who are dismissed for carrying out union-related activities, the prohibition to work without an authorization contained in the immigration legislation prevailed over the right to establish and join a union.

The National Employment Law Project, an American non-profit agency that examined the effect of the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case, determined that, as of that decision, employers have tried to deteriorate further the rights of irregular workers in the United States.

Many employers have infringed the rights of their employees since the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case was published. Indeed, employers can argue that irregular workers cannot file a complaint with the justice system when they are discriminated against or when their right to the minimum salary is violated. Clearly, the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case has led employers to discriminate against their irregular workers, arguing that the latter have no right to take legal action when their labor rights are violated. Thus, engaging irregular workers has been encouraged, because they are cheaper for the employer, and so as not to employ citizens or residents who can demand the protection of their rights before the courts.

However, it is important to note that the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case was not adopted unanimously by the United States Supreme Court, but by a majority of 5 votes to 4; the author of the dissenting opinion was Judge Breyer. He indicated that allowing irregular migrants access to the same legal remedies as citizens was the only way to ensure that migrants' rights were protected. Judge Breyer carefully examined the possible impact of the decision on irregular workers and stated that if undocumented workers could not receive back pay when they were illegally dismissed, employers would dismiss such workers when they tried to establish trade unions, because there would be no consequences for the employer, at least the first time he used this method.

Likewise, as Judge Breyer stated, there is no provision in the United States immigration legislation that prohibits the National Labor Relations Board from allowing irregular workers to file remedies or actions when their rights are violated. However, the majority opinion of the United States Supreme Court eliminated the possibility that an irregular worker could file a claim for back pay before the courts, based on the alleged conflict between the National Labor Relations Act and the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act.

Both the National Labor Relations Board and the Supreme Court approached the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case as one that required a balance between labor legislation and immigration legislation. The National Labor Relations Board and the four judges of the Supreme Court in the minority gave priority to labor laws, while the five judges who comprised the majority granted priority to immigration laws.

In their decisions, the National Labor Relations Board and the Supreme Court did not take international human rights law and the norms of international labor law into consideration. Nor did they consider the obligations of the United States, pursuant to international law, to "ensure, in cooperation with the United Nations, the universal and effective respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms of man."

In summary, the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case denies a group of workers their inherent labor rights that have been recognized by the international community.

One of the principal entities that has referred to the topic of human rights is the Organization of American States (OAS). The United States and Mexico are two of the 35 States parties actively involved in the OAS administration and, in theory, they adhere to the general principles and standards established by this international organization.

In this respect, it is important to cite Articles 3(I) and 17 of the OAS Charter, which refer to equality and non-discrimination. These principles are also mentioned in the American Declaration.

However, Mexico has not requested the Court to examine the United States immigration legislation. The right of each State to establish immigration rules is not questioned. Nevertheless, when the legislators of any specific State establish policies that discriminate against certain categories of workers in the labor market, it can have a devastating result on the protection of human rights. Fundamental human rights must prevail over the objective of preventing certain workers from enjoying the benefits granted by law.

For the above reasons, it is considered that the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. National Labor Relations Board creates a system that violates international law.

Labor, Civil Rights and Immigrants' Rights Organizations in the United States of America:

In their written and oral statements, they stated that:

The brief was prepared in representation of 50 civil rights, labor and immigrant organizations in the United States.

Migrant workers in the United States are among those workers who receive the lowest wages and most unfair treatment. Attempts by organizations to protect the rights of migrants, including "unauthorized" workers, have been obstructed by United States laws that discriminate based on the status of alien and migrant and, above all, owing to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. National Labor Relations Board. Moreover, federal and state labor legislation violate international human rights law, which is obligatory for the United States. There is an urgent need for strong regional standards for the protection of migrant workers.

The expression "unauthorized worker" is used to describe migrant workers who are not authorized to be employed legally in the United States. This group includes workers who, for different reasons, are legally in the United States but are not authorized to work. The expression "undocumented" migrant is used to describe migrants whose presence in the United States is illegal. These workers form a subgroup of the migrant population that is not authorized to work. Most decisions taken by the courts are based on the authorization to work.

The United States has the largest migrant population in the world. For the purposes of this brief, the figure of 5.3 million persons (an approximate calculation of the total number of undocumented workers in the United States), will be sufficient to establish that this population represents a sizeable economic factor and an issue of political and human concern. Undocumented workers perform most of their work in sectors characterized by low salaries and high risk.

The practice of threatening migrant workers with reporting them to the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS), in order to limit the exercise of their labor rights, has been common for many years and has not decreased since the decision in Hoffman Plastic Compounds v. National Labor Relations Board.

Penalties for employers who hire "unauthorized" workers are ineffective in the United States. The 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) establishes that an employer must verify the identity and eligibility of the personnel he engages. However, the law allows employers to review the documents superficially. Employers have very little reason to fear that the Immigration and Naturalization Service will penalize them for engaging undocumented migrants; rather, they see this as a legitimate decision that saves them money. Even when employers break the law, the penalties and fines they receive are low and infrequent. Therefore, under current legislation, employers can engage "unauthorized" workers, benefit from them and threaten to report them to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, without fear of possible Government action.

Some migrant workers, particularly those who are "unauthorized", are expressly excluded from the possibility of receiving certain reparations that are available to United States citizens. For examples in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case, the United States Supreme Court decided that "unauthorized" workers could not receive back pay following a dismissal in reprisal for union activities, which is illegal under by the National Labor Relations Act that protects the right to organize unions and negotiate collectively. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), the governmental agency that applies most of the federal labor laws on discrimination, has indicated that it is reviewing the practice of ordering payment of back pay to undocumented workers in light of the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case.

Lastly, the decision in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case leaves intact the right to a minimum wage and the payment of overtime, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, because it referred only to the payment of back pay for work that had not been performed. However, the US Department of Labor, the federal agency responsible for applying the Fair Labor Standards Act, has not defined its opinion on the right of "unauthorized" migrants to payment of back pay arising from dismissals for reprisals, and has said that "it is still considering the effect of the Hoffman [Plastic Compounds] case on this reparation."

Even before the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case, some United States laws discriminated explicitly against workers in certain migratory categories, including "unauthorized" workers and those who held specific types of visas. In most states, "unauthorized" workers have the right to receive compensation for occupational accidents or incapacity. In general, such compensation is regulated by state legislation and this varies in each state. Workers usually receive medical expenses, a partial reimbursement of their salaries, pensions, benefits in case of death and, at times, training for new employment. While the legislation on compensations in almost all the states applies to "unauthorized" workers, the laws of the state of Wyoming explicitly exclude them from the benefits of compensation, while other judicial decisions and provisions restrict payment of compensation for factors such as rehabilitation, death and back pay.

Workers included in the H-2A visa program (for agricultural employment), who are mostly from Mexico, are denied many basic federal labor measures protection. They are excluded from the protection of the Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act (MSAWPA), the principal labor act regulating agricultural workers. Therefore, their employer is not controlled by the United States Labor Department. In addition, the permit for H-2A workers to remain legally in the United States is linked to a single employer. Consequently, these workers are not at liberty to change employment.

The right of migrant workers to legal representation is also seriously restricted. The 1974 Legal Services Corporation Act created the Legal Services Corporation, and its programs are prohibited from providing legal aid for, or in representation of, most migrants who are not legal permanent residents.

Once an alien is physically in the territory of a country and has found employment, the refusal to provide him with labor protection measures violates the human right to non-discrimination. Numerous international instruments that are obligatory for the United States establish a universal norm of non-discrimination that protects all persons within the jurisdiction of a State. Differences in treatment based on nationality or migratory status, such as those established in the above-mentioned United States labor laws, violate Articles 2 and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and Article II of the American Declaration. The wording of these provisions and that of the conventions of the International Labor Organization indicate that the guarantee of equality and non-discrimination, as well as others related to work, are universal and apply "to all persons."

States may not discriminate on the basis of nationality or any other condition, according to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, but only to establish distinctions based on reasonable and objective criteria. The argument that some United States labor laws establish discriminations that violate Articles 2 and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is supported by the interpretation of the United Nations Committee on Human Rights. In Gueye et al. v. France, the Committee reasserted its position that the provisions of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights are applicable to non-nationals, provided that the contrary is not expressly established. It was also shown that distinctions based on being an alien violate Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, even though this treaty does not expressly guarantee the substantive benefit in dispute (in this case, the right to a pension or, for example, the right to fair wages, adequate working conditions and an effective remedy with legal assistance). The decision in this case states that a distinction based on a person's status as an alien is inadmissible, when it lacks reasonable and objective grounds, even though the substantive rights, in themselves, are not fundamental and are not recognized by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Finally, the decision establishes that if the distinction in the employment benefit is reasonable and objective and, therefore, permissible, a court must examine the implicit purpose of the labor law in order to determine whether the distinction is relevant for attaining the proposed objective. United States labor rights laws that discriminate on the basis of alien or migratory status do not resist this examination. Once an alien has been engaged, his nationality and his legal status are irrelevant for the purpose of protecting an individual in his place of employment and preventing his exploitation. Migratory control cannot be considered the principal aim of labor protection legislation, and restrictions imposed by the United States on the labor protection of aliens does not contribute objectively or reasonably to this end.

The language and the arguments expresio unius established in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights also apply to the American Declaration and Convention. The language of the inter-American instruments is universal and does not establish express distinctions based on alien or migratory status. The case law of the inter-American system on non-discrimination agrees substantially with case law relating to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and helps us conclude that the United States labor laws discriminate unduly against migrant workers.

Other international treaties and declarations applicable to the United States, including the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and Convention No. 111 of the International Labour Organization, confirm that the basic principles of non-discrimination apply to labor protection without distinction owing to nationality or migratory status.

In addition to violating the principle of international law of non-discrimination, United States labor legislation does not protect the freedom of association of "unauthorized" workers and other migrant workers and violates the fundamental international principle of freedom of association. The International Labor Organization has expressly recognized freedom of association as one of the four fundamental human rights that protect all workers, including "unauthorized" and undocumented workers. Other international instruments (such as the American Declaration, the American Convention, the OAS Charter and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights), applicable to the United States, allow exceptions to the right to freedom of association only in limited circumstances, which do not justify the failure to guarantee this right to aliens and "unauthorized" migrants.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Hoffman Plastic Compounds case that back pay cannot be paid to "unauthorized" workers when they are improperly dismissed for taking part in union activities, affects the right to freedom of association of such workers. Since these workers do not have the right to reinstatement when they are improperly dismissed, payment of back pay is the only available effective reparation for violations of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Academy of Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law of the American University,

In their brief of February 21, 2003, indicated that:

This request for an advisory opinion should take into consideration the "autonomous clauses" of the international treaties and instruments cited by the requesting State; that is, Articles II of the American Declaration, 24 of the American Convention, 7 of the Universal Declaration and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Regarding the norms that embody the principle of non-discrimination subordinated to the existence of a violation of one of the rights protected in these instruments, "there is no doubt that Articles 1(1) of the American Convention and 2(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights should be excluded from the analysis, because these instruments do not guarantee labor rights. The situation concerning Article 2 of the Universal Declaration is different, because this instrument effectively guarantees such rights, including, in particular, what could be considered minimum standards of protection in this area."

The human rights norms cited by the requesting State do not expressly forbid making distinctions based on the nationality or migratory status of an alien. However, the provisions being examined do not establish a specific or exhaustive list of reasons for which distinctions may not be established; to the contrary, "they appear to admit that, in principle, a distinction on some specific grounds may result in discriminatory treatment."

The provisions applicable to this request have all been interpreted under international human rights law, in the sense that a measure is discriminatory only when the distinction in treatment is not based on objective and reasonable grounds; in other words, when it does not pursue a legitimate goal or when the relationship between the means used and the goal that the measure is intended to achieve is not proportionate. However, States enjoy a certain margin of maneuver to evaluate whether a difference in treatment between persons who are in a similar situation is justified.

This analysis makes no specific reference to Mexico's two final questions, because the answer to those questions is subsumed in the analysis of the other questions.

Although the requesting State referred to "labor rights" in their broadest sense in its questions, this analysis focuses specifically on the "right of all persons to wages and benefits for work performed"; therefore, there is no doubt that, in international human rights law applicable to the American States, this minimum labor protection must be guaranteed to every individual, including undocumented workers. In this respect, it is important to clarify that, for the purposes of this amici curiae, the definition of "remuneration and benefits for work performed" includes not only the so-called back pay, but also other accessory labor rights such as the right to join a union or the right to strike.

In different international instruments, international human rights law enshrines a wide variety of norms on workers' rights. The labor rights provisions contained in instruments adopted or ratified by OAS Member States are: Article 23 of the Universal Declaration; Articles 34(g), 45(b) and 45(c) of the OAS Charter, and Article XIV of the American Declaration. Other relevant international instruments also determine the scope of regional human rights obligations with regard to workers' rights, they include: Articles 6, 7 and 8 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; the American Convention; the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; Convention No. 97 of the International Labour Organization concerning Migrant Workers; the Constitution of the International Labour Organization; and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and their Families.

The right of all persons to receive remuneration for work performed is one of a group of rights that "are closer to civil and political rights, either because they have a direct impact on rights such as the right to property or the right to legal personality [...] or because of their immediate and urgent nature, which is implicitly or explicitly reiterated in many [...] instruments".

Articles 34(g) and 45(b) of the OAS Charter presume the existence of the worker's right to receive remuneration for work performed, a right that is so obvious that it was not necessary to enshrine it explicitly. The right is explicitly protected in Article XIV of the American Declaration. The OAS Charter and the American Declaration do not differentiate between a citizen and an alien whose status is irregular, but refer in general to "person" or "worker."

Article 23 of the Universal Declaration reflects implicitly and explicitly the general principle that if a person has worked, he should receive the corresponding remuneration.

Mexico did not cite the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in its request for an advisory opinion; however, this treaty also contains relevant references to the right to receive remuneration for work performed. In the same way, Article 7 of the Additional Protocol of the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights "Protocol of San Salvador" guarantees the right to a "fair and equal wages for equal work, without distinction." The International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families explicitly embodies minimum guarantees, including the right of undocumented migrant workers to the remuneration for which they have already worked.

As irregular migrant workers and the members of their families are a particularly vulnerable sector of society, the State has the special obligation "to grant particular protection or, in this case, to abstain from taking excessively oppressive measures that restrict the labor rights of such persons and that, evidently, are not only unnecessary to achieve the legitimate goal sought, but also have the contrary effect."

In addition to any legal construct relating to international instruments, "the most elemental sense of justice requires that a person who has worked should be guaranteed that he will receive his remuneration"; the contrary would mean the acceptance of a modern form of slave labor.

The general practice of States, reflected in international instruments, and the perception of those States that it is a legal norm sustaining the notion of opinio juris, suggest the existence of an international norm of customary law concerning the right of the worker to receive remuneration for work performed. Moreover, it appears that States do not oppose recognizing this right, which excludes the possibility of arguing that there has been a persistent objection to this norm.

Human rights, such as the right to equality or the right to remuneration may be restricted, but limitations must respond to criteria of necessity and proportionality in order to attain a legitimate objective. Implementing measures to control irregular immigration into a State's territory is a legitimate objective. However, if such measures are intended to strip irregular migrant workers of the right to receive remuneration for work performed, it is urgent to examine the proportionality and the need and, to do this, we must consider whether there are other measures that are less restrictive of the said right.

There are other mechanisms that can be adopted to control irregular immigration into a State's territory. They include the possibility of penalizing those who employ undocumented workers administratively or criminally, reinforcing border immigration controls, establishing mechanisms to verify legal status in order to avoid the falsification of documents, deporting undocumented persons, and investigating and punishing those who commit offences. It does not appear proportionate or necessary to adopt measures aimed at stripping migrant workers of the remuneration for which they have already worked. Such measures "appear to be a 'punishment' that excessively affects not only the worker but also the members of his family." The International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families can serve as a guide to confirm that some restrictions to the right to receive remuneration for work performed are neither necessary nor proportionate.

Likewise, the right to receive remuneration for work performed cannot be limited by indirect measures, such as the adoption of measures restricting the right of the worker whose situation is irregular to take legal action to claim his wages; for example, by demanding that he should be physically present in the jurisdiction of the recipient State in order to be able to make this claim, after he has been deported and will not be granted authorization to enter the said State again.

Regarding question 2(1) of the request (supra para. 4): Regarding the provisions of the Universal Declaration – except for Articles 21 and 13 – there is agreement that, under norms of customary law, States have the obligation to respect and guarantee fundamental human rights to aliens under their jurisdiction, including those whose resident status is irregular.

International customary law obliges States to guarantee the principle of equality before the law and non-discrimination to all aliens resident in their jurisdiction and to prohibit differences in treatment between citizens and aliens that could be considered unreasonable. However, the rights and freedoms are not absolute and certain restrictions regulated in Article 29(2) of the Universal Declaration may be established.

In conclusion, the international instruments cited by Mexico in the request guarantee the right to equality before the law to all persons subject to the jurisdiction of a State, irrespective of their nationality or migratory status. However, this right is not absolute; consequently, it may be subject to reasonable restrictions. Moreover, under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the American Convention, the right to equality before the law is not considered a non-derogable norm; in other words, it may be suspended under certain circumstances.

Regarding question 2(2) of the request (supra para. 4): We must bear in mind that the existence of discrimination is not determined in the abstract, but because of the concrete circumstances of each case. In the specific context of the request made by Mexico, the grounds for distinguishing between irregular migrant workers and other workers, for the recognition of minimum labor rights, is the migratory status of the former and not their nationality.

The different treatment that certain States afford irregular workers, owing to their migratory status, does not imply discrimination per se. Pursuant to constant international case law, a difference in treatment will be discriminatory when it is not based on objective and reasonable grounds; that is, when it does not have a legitimate objective or when there is no proportionality between the means used and the end sought with the questioned measure or practice. Likewise, the right to equality is not absolute; consequently, it may be subject to permissible restrictions and its exercise may be suspended in states of emergency. When examining the proportionality of the difference in treatment, the fact that labor rights are in question and that they would be denied to a vulnerable population should be taken into consideration.

Also, even though States enjoy a margin of discretion to establish differences in treatment between nationals and aliens in the application of immigration laws, this margin is considerably reduced when the rights at stake are so fundamental that their restriction or deprivation affects the minimum principles of respect for human dignity.

In circumstances when denying rights could place a person in a situation similar to forced labor, “[the] Honorable Court should restrict to a minimum the State’s freedom to decide and exercise strict control on the justifications put forward by the latter as the basis for its policies.”

Only in exceptional situations, with characteristics such as those of a state of emergency, and in the case of measures strictly limited to the requirements of the situation, can a different treatment be justified as regards the enjoyment of the minimum labor rights previously indicated, between aliens in an irregular migratory situation and nationals or legal residents.

The practice of some American States to subordinate recognition of the right to remuneration, understood in its broadest sense, to compliance with norms of immigration law, is unreasonable and incompatible with the obligation to respect and guarantee the right to equality before the law.

Denying minimum labor standards to undocumented workers does not help restrict the entry of irregular migrants into States. To the contrary, it encourages unscrupulous employers to hire more workers whose situation is irregular, owing to the possibility of subjecting them to extreme working conditions without any penalty from the State. If undocumented workers unite to claim their rights, employers can report their irregular situation and thus avoid complying with minimum labor standards.

A more appropriate policy to control immigration would be to apply severe penalties to those who employ irregular migrants, despite knowing or having the obligation to know their migratory status, so as to benefit from being able to offer inferior labor guarantees. Several American States do not have legislation penalizing this type of conduct and, in the States that have established fines, it is recognized that these are not sufficiently severe to discourage the employment of workers whose situation is irregular.

The standard of interpretation proposed does not restrict the right of States to apply the corresponding penalties, such as the deportation of those who fail to comply with the provisions of immigration legislation or who violate in any way the criminal provisions of domestic law. Nevertheless, even when an individual is subject to deportation for having been found to be in the territory of a State illegally, the latter must fulfill its obligations to respect the fundamental rights embodied in international human rights instruments.

In conclusion, denying undocumented workers minimum labor standards, understood as the right to remuneration in the broadest sense, based on their migratory status, is contrary to the right to equality before the law, because it is a disproportionate measure to achieve the immigration policy objectives of the States who adopt this practice.

The Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL):

In its written and oral statements, indicated that:

Mexico's request is directly related to a very serious concrete situation; it will therefore be very useful for the region.

This amicus curiae focuses on questions 1(1), 2(1) and 2(2) of the request for an advisory opinion.

In law, the principle of equality is considered a fundamental right and the obligation not to discriminate is one of the essential prohibitions of international human rights law. This principle "is a basic rule, applicable to all rights."

In practice, the right to equality may be violated in different ways; for example, by the issue or implementation of discriminatory norms, the establishment or implementation of rules that are prima facie neutral, but have a negative differentiated effect on an individual or a group of individuals, and the establishment of measures or practices that are directly harmful to an individual or a group.

Although no instrument of the inter-American system is exclusively devoted to protecting migrant workers from discrimination, the American Convention and the American Declaration contain provisions that establish a commitment for States to ensure equality before the law and the exercise of the rights enshrined in the different conventions, without any discrimination. The inter-American system extends protection from non-discrimination to rights protected at the national level by means of the article on equality before the law. Therefore, Member States must ensure that their legislation does not contain discriminatory provisions and that there are no measures, practices, acts or omissions that cause harm to a group or to an individual.

Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights does not simply reiterate the provisions of Article 2(1) of this instrument, but "extends autonomous protection because it prohibits any discrimination on any grounds as well as protection before the public authorities." This principle is directly applicable to economic, social and cultural rights because it is included in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

The rights embodied in the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families must be guaranteed to all migrant workers, regardless of their migratory status.

The principle of equality and non-discrimination is recognized in the American Declaration, the American Convention and other international treaties, which coincide in ensuring to all persons the rights embodied in these instruments, without any discrimination based on sex, language, religion, national or social origin, or other status.

The potential grounds for discrimination are not limited to those expressly included in the inter-American instruments. The texts of the American Convention, the American Declaration and other international instruments presume the existence of other possible grounds for discrimination. The United Nations Committee on Human Rights has indicated that the non-discrimination clause applies to cases that are not specifically set out in the international covenants. In this respect, the European Court has examined discriminatory treatment on the grounds of sexual orientation and age.

Likewise, the grounds that can create a "suspect category" are not exhausted in the list that appears in the inter-American instruments. The establishment of these categories "relates to the characteristics of discrimination at a specific time in a country or region." The relevance of the identification of a "suspect category" will depend largely on examination of the specific situation that is being regulated. Hence, in the case of migrant workers, it is essential to examine the concrete issues regulated by labor law.

To establish whether an act arising from the differentiation of two actual situations is discriminatory under the inter-American system, we must first evaluate whether we are faced with a situation that is truly and objectively unequal; then, we must assess whether the norm or measure that has made the distinction seeks a legitimate goal; and, finally, we must establish whether there is a relationship of proportionality between the differences established by the norm or measure and its aims.

Many States have become originators or recipients of persons who emigrate in search of work. A study of 152 States by the International Labor Organization found that, from 1979 to 1990, the number of States classified as major recipients of migrants in search of employment increased from 39 to 67, and the number of States considered major originators of migrants for economic reasons/employment increased from 29 to 55. In recent decades, the principal reason for which individuals have abandoned their country of origin has been to find better employment opportunities or to have access to better wages.

Irregular immigration has been growing as a result of extreme poverty and lack of opportunities in the States of origin. This has encouraged the appearance of the "migration industry." Employers opt to employ undocumented migrants, so as not to pay adequate salaries or make an effort to provide suitable working conditions. "The recipient States are not unaware of the exploitation, since they also benefit from that 'industry', since their economy grows by dint of this irregular situation."

On the American continent, migrant workers, whose status is irregular, are subject to many discriminatory and abusive practices, which may be observed in their traumatic entry into the recipient State, in the discrimination and the xenophobic attacks they endure in their daily life, in the ill-treatment they receive at work, and in the way in which they are expelled from the recipient State.

The inequality of conditions between the employer and the undocumented migrant worker is more critical than in other labor relations, because of the latter's irregular situation. Owing to their precarious economic situation, undocumented migrant workers are ready to accept inferior working conditions to those of other persons who are legally resident in the country. The occupations to which migrant workers have access vary according to each country; however, "as regards wages, the employment they obtain is always the least attractive and, as regards hygiene and health, it is always the most dangerous."

Migrant workers whose situation is irregular have limited possibilities (de facto and de jure) of obtaining the protection of their rights when confronted by precarious situations or exploitation. In general, there is a system of immunity for those who abuse the vulnerability of these workers and a system of punishment for the latter.

All these conditions which undocumented migrant workers are subjected to convert them into a disadvantaged group that is the victim of systematic discriminatory practices throughout the region. Furthermore, the situation of migrant women merits special mention because they are victims of double discrimination: first as women and then as migrants.

Frequently, the departure of migrants from recipient States takes place in the context of arbitrary procedures. Deportation procedures are not always conducted in accordance with the required minimum guarantees.

"In conclusion, studies by supranational and non-governmental organizations describe the precarious situation of irregular migrants workers, both men and women, as regards the enjoyment and exercise of their human rights in the countries which receive them. In particular, they stress the systematic discrimination to which such migrant workers are subject in the workplace."

Owing to the vulnerability of irregular migrant workers, it is essential to pay special attention to any distinction in treatment based on their migratory status, because such a situation creates a "suspect category." Identification of a "suspect category" requires a presumption that the distinction is illegal.

The definition of situations that create a "suspect category" should include those that depict the realities of actual systematic discrimination and abuse in the region.

The first justification for recognizing that irregular migrant workers comprise a "suspect category" is that discrimination against this group is closely linked to its nationality, ethnic origin or race, which is always different from the majority in the State of employment. In this respect, nationality, race or ethnic origin are explicitly prohibited as grounds for distinction. In its decision in Trimble v. Gordon, the United States Supreme Court considered that classifications based on national origin were "first cousin" to those based on race; accordingly, they related to areas where it was necessary to apply the principle of equality and equal protection.

The second justification for recognizing that irregular migrant workers comprise a "suspect category" is the special vulnerability of this group, particularly because of the systematic discrimination they suffer in the workplace in recipient States. Undocumented migrant workers are discriminated against in several areas of their lives. However, discrimination is most clearly visible in the workplace.

Human rights treaties refer to the rights of "all persons" and treaties that establish workers' rights speak of the rights of "all workers," without making distinctions as to their migratory status. Similarly, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and their Families recognizes the rights of migrant workers irrespective of whether they are documented or undocumented.

Distinctions in treatment owing to national or ethnic origin or race are explicitly prohibited in the American Convention, the American Declaration and other international instruments. The European Court of Human Rights has considered that cases of discrimination based on nationality should be closely examined and that, in the case of rights to social security, national origin should be considered a "suspect category." In Gaygusuz v. Austria, the European Court indicated that very powerful reasons must be alleged for difference in treatment, based solely on nationality, to be considered compatible with the European Convention and decided that Article 14 of the Convention had been violated by denying unemployment insurance to a Turkish worker based on his nationality.

The prohibition to afford a different treatment based on nationality, added to the systematic discrimination to which irregular migrant workers are subjected in the workplace, requires that any distinction between undocumented migrant workers and legal migrant workers or citizens in the workplace "must bear a relationship to the aim sought."

The elaboration and implementation of migratory policies and the regulation of the labor market can justify restrictions to the labor rights of migrants, provided such restrictions are necessary. "[A] legal or practical distinction between undocumented migrants on the one hand and documented residents and citizens on the other hand, which denies the former the right to enjoy dignified and equitable working conditions, limited working days, paid vacations, fair wages and promotion, or any other labor right recognized in the recipient country's legislation, or which disregards their right to join unions to defend their interests or denies their right to social security, can never be necessary for the regulation of migratory or labor market policies."

In principle, there is no "relationship of necessity" between, on the one hand, the elaboration and implementation of migratory policies and the regulation of the labor market and, on the other hand, possible restrictions of labor rights while a contract is in force, which would allow those restrictions to be defined as proportionate to the aims sought. "Such restrictions are not the kind that clearly seek an essential social interest, or the kind that restrict the protected right to a lesser degree."

The labor rights contained in international covenants correspond to workers because they are workers, irrespective of their nationality or migratory status. The unprotected situation in which undocumented migrant workers find themselves cannot be aggravated or perpetuated, citing as an aim, "the formulation and implementation of migratory policies or the regulation of the labor market."

Restricting the enjoyment of labor rights by irregular migrant workers is unreasonable and unnecessary. Such restrictions encourage the employment of undocumented migrants and increase the vulnerability of a sector of the population that faces a situation of systematic discrimination and serious defenselessness.

The aims of migratory policies and labor market regulation can be achieved through measures that are less onerous for the protection of the rights of irregular migrant workers. For example, increased control, through migrant entry policies or monetary penalties for employers.

The International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and their Families shows that the aim of regulating the labor market can be achieved by measures that are less onerous for migrant workers, when it establishes that "[t]he recourse of the employment of migrant workers who are in an irregular situation will be discouraged if the fundamental human rights of all migrant workers are more widely recognized."

The costs of a policy that does not protect the labor rights of irregular migrant workers, but provides economic benefits by exploiting their work should be identified. "If international law is intended to strengthen democratic societies, States should be encouraged to provide generous protection to undocumented migrant workers, both men and women, based on labor law, international law and human rights law, instead of permitting the continuation of situations of exclusion, which are merely another means of penalizing migrants."

In conclusion, no difference should be established in the scope of labor law protection with regard to undocumented migrants. The actual conditions of irregular migrant workers engender a "suspect category," so that any potential restriction of their labor rights should be strictly monitored. Irregular migrant workers who are employed to perform a task should enjoy all labor rights.

The State can respond to the special vulnerability of irregular migrant workers in different ways, but their special situation of systematic discrimination and defenselessness cannot be ignored. “[I]n the face of this reality, special or differentiated measures should be taken in order to ensure equality.”

During the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Forms of Intolerance, held in Durban in 2001, the need to eliminate discrimination against migrant workers was reaffirmed. Likewise, it was recommended that all possible measures should be adopted to ensure that migrants can enjoy human rights, in particular the rights related to: fair wages and equal remuneration for work of equal value, without any distinction; the right to insurance in case of unemployment, illness, disability, death of a spouse, old age, or any other lack of means of subsistence owing to circumstances beyond their control; and to social benefits, including social security.

Among the measures tending to eliminate such discriminations, States must modify discriminatory conduct and examine their legislation and practices in order to repeal all provisions that restrict the rights of migrant workers. Nevertheless, States may “promote public policies to foment respect for diversity, discourage discrimination and encourage public institutions to adopt concrete measures to promote equality.” The State may also organize educational and awareness-raising campaigns aimed at its officials and the general public.

The existence of conditions of genuine inequality makes it necessary to adopt compensatory measures that help reduce or eliminate the obstacles and restrictions that impede or reduce the effective defense of the interests of migrant workers.

In addition, a fundamental measure to ensure the effective protection of the labor rights of irregular migrant workers is “to establish procedures for the justice system to listen to their complaints,” because the mere existence of substantive rights is not enough to guarantee their exercise. Likewise, when migrants have returned to their State of origin, the recipient State must also guarantee access to justice. If employers treat migrants in a manner contrary to the norms of international human rights law, the latter can demand the corresponding reparation, irrespective of their migratory status. “Therefore, the State should provide irregular migrant workers with free or low-cost legal assistance so that they may file complaints using a simple and prompt remedy.” This principle is included in Article 18 of the International Convention on the ### Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families.

Reforms established by the State to improve the situation of irregular migrants should have effect in both the public and the private sector, because violations of rights "that occur in the private sector, insofar as they have been perpetrated with the consent or complicity of the State[,] may be attributed to the State." In this respect, the United Nations Committee on Human Rights, in its General Comment 28, has stated that States must eliminate discriminatory activities in both the public and the private sector.

The migratory status of migrant workers cannot be a variable that is taken into consideration to recognize them their labor rights while they are employed. They must be guaranteed not only the fundamental labor rights, but also all the labor rights recognized in the international covenants applicable in the Americas.

Human rights are interrelated, not only as regards different categories of rights, but also "all the rights that are included in a single category of rights, such as labor rights, in this case." In particular, the International Convention on the Rights of All Migrant Workers and the Members of Their Families establishes that the labor rights of migrant workers, whether they are documented or undocumented, cannot be restricted in any way.

For the purposes of this amicus curiae, the rights included in the international covenants include: 1) labor rights in the context of the employment contract; 2) rights of association, and 3) rights to social security.

The Center for Legal and Social Studies (CELS), Ecumenical Service for the Support and Orientation of Immigrants and Refugees (CAREF) and the Legal Clinic for the Rights of Immigrants and Refugees of the School of Law of the Universidad de Buenos Aires:

In its written and oral statements, indicated that:

This amici curiae merely answers questions 2(1) and 3.

Migratory status has been and continues to be an obstacle for the access of all migrants to their fundamental human rights. There are a series of legal and non-legal norms, which are contrary to the provisions of the American Convention and the American Declaration and other international instruments, and which deprive individuals of their human rights because of their migratory status.

Regarding the second question (supra para. 4):

The preamble to the American Convention recognizes the universal and essential nature of human rights, which are based upon attributes of the human personality and not on nationality. Consequently, the protection of the individual encompasses all persons; in other words, it is universal in nature.

When acceding to and ratifying international human rights treaties, States assume a series of mandatory obligations towards all persons subject to their jurisdiction. These obligations have been extensively clarified by the different treaty-monitoring bodies, "either generically, with regard to a particular social group, or with reference to each specific right."

When interpreting the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights recently, the Human Rights Committee, in its General Comment 15, emphasized that the enjoyment of the rights recognized by the Covenant is not limited to the citizens of States parties but should also be accessible to all individuals irrespective of their nationality or statelessness, including those requesting asylum, refugees, migrant workers and other persons who are within the territory or subject to the jurisdiction of the State party.

According to international human rights instruments, and their interpretation by monitoring bodies and legal writings, all persons who are within the territory of a State may require the State to protect their rights. The principle of non-discrimination is an essential element of international human rights law and is embodied in all international human rights instruments.

The millions of migrants throughout the world, who do not have regular residence in the country they live in, constitute a group in a particular "social condition." The principle of non-discrimination should be considered intimately and inseparably linked to the concept of a group in an extremely vulnerable situation that requires special protection. Therefore, the situation of vulnerability and the "social condition" of migrants, particularly those whose status is irregular, could determine the existence of grounds on which discrimination is prohibited, according to the principle of non-discrimination.

The United Nations has organized three world conferences against racism and discrimination and, at all of them, extensive reference has been made to discrimination against migrants, with express mention of their residence status. Moreover, special rapporteurs have been appointed at the regional and global level to verify the human rights situation of migrants and the discrimination they suffer owing to their status as aliens or their residence status.

Likewise, national legislation has included the concept of "migratory status" as a social condition that should be considered grounds that are prohibited, according to the principle of non-discrimination.

State obligations arising from international instruments cannot be bypassed because of the nationality, migratory status or residence status of a person. On this question, the bodies created by virtue of the Charter of the United Nations or the human rights treaties have conclusively stated that migrants, irrespective of their migratory status, are protected by all the international human rights instruments ratified by the State where they live.

The United Nations Inter-governmental Working Group of Experts on the Human Rights of Migrants has stated that "[a]ll persons, regardless of their place of residence, have a right to the full enjoyment of all the rights established in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. States must respect the fundamental human rights of migrants, irrespective of their legal status." It has also emphasized that "[a] basic principle of human rights is the fact of entering a foreign country, violating the immigration laws of that country, does not lead to losing the human rights of an 'immigrant with an irregular status.' Nor does it eliminate the obligation of a Member State to protect them."

In conclusion, the response to question 2(1) may be summarized as "[t]he obligations and responsibility of States within the framework of international human rights law are not altered in any way by the residence status of an individual in the State in which he resides. The rights arising from international human rights law apply to all persons because they are human beings and should be respected, protected and guaranteed, without any discrimination on prohibited grounds (including, the migratory status of the person). In addition [...], all persons are subject to the jurisdiction of the State on whose territory they reside, irrespective of their migratory status. Consequently, the monitoring bodies of the human rights treaties – and also those deriving from the Charter of the United Nations – have repeatedly stressed that human rights must be respected and guaranteed to all persons, irrespective of their migratory status."

Regarding the third question (supra para. 4):

Each State has the authority – based on the principle of sovereignty – to formulate its own migratory policy and, consequently, to establish criteria for the admission and residence of migrants. However, this does not mean that the said policy is exempt from the obligations of each State under international human rights law.

Migratory policy and legislation should respect all the provisions of the international human rights instruments recognized by each State. According to the provisions of international human rights law and their interpretation by the competent bodies, the sovereign authority to establish migratory policy – and also other policies emanating from State sovereignty – “does not in any way exempt or restrict the obligations of respect, protection and guarantee to all persons subject to the jurisdiction of each State.”

With regard to migratory legislation, as in any other area of State policy, each law or policy defined by the State or its absence could constitute the violation of rights embodied in the international instruments to which that State is a party. To avoid this situation, international human rights law establishes a series of principles, standards and limits that each State must respect when it institutes any policy, including migratory policy and legislation.

At the Durban Conference, the States committed themselves to “revising, when necessary, their immigration laws, policies and practices, to ensure that they are free of all racial discrimination and that they are compatible with the obligations of the States under international human rights instruments.” Similarly, at the regional conference for the Americas, the Governments committed themselves to “reviewing their immigration policies and practices in order to eliminate those that discriminate against migrants in a way that is not coherent with the obligations assumed under international human rights instruments.”

Each international human rights instrument has been careful to establish expressly the criteria and requirements that each State party must respect when regulating and restricting the rights recognized in such instruments.

Any restrictions to the exercise of human rights must be established in accordance with certain formal requirements and substantive conditions.

Article 30 of the American Convention indicates the formal requirements for such restrictions. The need for a formal law implies that States have the obligation to adopt all necessary measures to ensure that any norm that does not originate from “democratically elected and constitutionally empowered bodies” should not establish any illegal restriction or violation or affect a right recognized in the Convention.

In order to comply with this obligation in the case of the rights of migrants, States must first examine the norms issued by agencies specializing in migratory matters. Then they must analyze the different decisions (resolutions, decrees, etc.) issued in all sectors and policies of the State that have or may have a serious and indisputable influence on the violation of the rights of migrants, as a result of their migratory status.

The fact that the restriction must be promulgated by law "supposes a norm of general application that should be compatible with respect for the principle of equality and not be arbitrary, meaningless or discriminatory."

To be legitimate, in addition to complying with the formal requirement, the restriction of a human right must be addressed at attaining a specific valid objective.

According to the provisions of the international instruments, the objectives that justify or legitimize a restriction of human rights – in other words the basic requirements – are concepts such as "democratic necessity", "public order (ordre public)", "national security", "the common good", "public health" and "morality." Each of these concepts was then examined.

The questions posed by Mexico can only have one answer: "international human rights law is intended for the universal protection of all persons, without any discrimination on prohibited grounds (including a person's migratory status)."

In conclusion, any migratory policy or legislation must conform to the international and regional standards in force with regard to legitimate restrictions to human rights. First, rights may only be limited to the extent that the restriction is aimed at achieving a legitimate end provided for in international human rights instruments. Second, the restriction must be established by a formal law, which must respect the principle of equality and be neither arbitrary nor discriminatory. Third, there should be no alternative that would be less restrictive of the rights in question. Lastly, in each specific case, the State must justify not only the reasonableness of the measure, but also examine rigorously whether it damages the principle of illegitimacy that affects all measures that restrict a right based on grounds that are prohibited by the principle of non-discrimination.

"[P]eople who migrate for reasons related to poverty have previously been deprived of their rights (including the right to employment, education, housing, health, etc.). Confronted by this lack of protection by their own State (or rather the human rights violations committed by the State), the person decides to migrate to another country, in which he hopes to be able to enjoy the rights guaranteed in international instruments [...]. Consequently, it is particularly inadmissible that millions of persons can be excluded from the international system for the protection of human rights, this time owing to their migratory status in the country to which they have migrated."

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR):

In its oral statement UNHCR indicated that:

Nowadays it is meaningless to trace a strict line between voluntary and enforced displacement of persons, because the motives for migration are complex and imply a combination of political, economic and social factors. The nature and complexity of current displacements make it difficult to draw a clear line between migrants and refugees. As of the 1990s, UNHCR has been studying the link between asylum and migration and, in particular, the need to protect refugees within the migratory flows. However, there is still no international mechanism that deals exclusively with migration.

Although migratory policies fall within the sphere of State sovereignty, human rights instruments establish limits to the adoption and implementation of such policies. These limits include those stipulated in the American Convention, the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1966 Protocol, and the International Convention for the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families. These instruments should also guide the decision of the Court in this request for an advisory opinion, pursuant to Article 29 of the American Convention and the pro homine principle.

Regarding the connection between asylum and migration, it is worth mentioning that, in the current circumstances, migrants and other persons who seek protection, such as asylum seekers and refugees, are all part of the same migratory flows and all require protection. Although not all these persons qualify as refugees under the international instruments, safeguards should be established that allow different migratory categories to be identified and granted protection. Since there are limited legal options for the entry into and residence in determined territories,

"asylum systems are increasingly being used to give certain migratory categories the possibility of remaining in a country.

Nowadays, it is presumed not only that aliens who enter a territory are migrants, but also that, when they are categorized as such, "what is meant is that they do not have rights and, therefore, that the State, in exercise of its sovereignty, may expel or deport them, or violate their basic rights." Likewise, the lack of legal options for migration and the restrictive policies on asylum and migration mean that refugees and migrants "face inhuman conditions, with an uncertain legal status and, in many cases, with their rights openly restricted," are more vulnerable to the problem of trafficking in persons, and are subject to greater discrimination and xenophobia in most recipient States.

The irregular status of a migrant should not deprive him of the enjoyment and exercise of the fundamental rights established in the American Convention and other human rights instruments. The State must protect all persons subject to its jurisdiction, whether or not they are nationals.

The vulnerability of migrants should be underscored and this is exacerbated not only by the limited number of countries that have ratified the international instruments protecting them, but also by the absence of an international organization with the specific mandate of protecting the fundamental rights of such persons. In this respect, it is important to point out that the Statute of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) refers to the management and administration of migration, which does not necessarily correspond to the protection of the fundamental rights of migrants.

In a context where most American States are parties to the international conventions on refugees, it should be stressed that most of them do not have appropriate instruments to identify those persons who require protection. This does not refer only to asylum seekers and refugees, but also to migrants who do not have the necessary safeguards to guarantee the minimum respect for their fundamental rights, embodied in the American Convention.

Also, the implementation of increased migratory controls and interception policies means that, in most cases, anonymity and irregular residence are chosen; thus, contrary to what occurred in the past, today we can speak of "de facto refugees", because most do not wish to be recognized by the States or are being returned.

Moreover, although a refugee's right to work is embodied in the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, unfortunately this international instrument, which establishes minimum rights for that migratory category, does not refer to asylum seekers. In this respect, a simplistic interpretation could even say that asylum seekers and migrants have no labor rights. This interpretation is not only contrary to the spirit of the international instruments; it is also an evident step backward as regards the progressive nature of human rights.

Consequently, the protection parameters established by this request for an advisory opinion may be applicable, by analogy, to the protection of the labor rights of asylum seekers.

Migratory status "is and must be prohibited grounds for discrimination in our hemisphere, based on the American Declaration and the American Convention on Human Rights". The principle of non-discrimination is embodied in all human rights instruments.

The United Nations Committee on Human Rights has expanded the grounds for non-discrimination, based on Article 2(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It has established that any differentiation must be reasonable, objective and aimed at achieving a legitimate goal. In the case of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights has established the grounds of discrimination for "other status," which would be equivalent to "other condition"; in other words, there could be cases of discrimination for grounds that are not explicitly set out in that Covenant.

That line of reasoning is relevant for the present advisory opinion, because the American Declaration establishes that there may be discrimination for "other" distinctions, in addition to race, sex, language and religion. In the case of the American Convention on Human Rights, this treaty prohibits any kind of discrimination of rights and freedoms, establishing twelve grounds, including nationality and "any other social status."

Since the principle of non-discrimination is a basic rule of international human rights law and in light of statements made by the monitoring bodies of the United Nations international treaties, we must conclude that "the grounds for non-discrimination established in the inter-American instruments are equally indicative and illustrative and never exhaustive or restrictive, as that would distort the object and purpose of the American Convention on Human Rights, which is the protection of the fundamental rights and freedoms in our hemisphere."

In particular, based on the exceptionally vulnerable situation of asylum seekers, refugees and migrants, it may validly be inferred that, according to the American Declaration and the American Convention, any other social condition or "any other factor" would provide sufficient grounds to indicate that, in our hemisphere, there is a specific prohibition to discriminate.

We should point out that, in the Americas, the vulnerability of migrants, asylum seekers and refugees has been explicitly recognized in the Inter-American Convention on the Prevention, Punishment, and Eradication of Violence against Women, the Convention of Belém do Pará, which stipulated that, "with respect to the adoption of the measures in this chapter, the States Parties shall take special account of the vulnerability of women to violence by reason of, among others, their race or ethnic background or their status as migrants, refugees or displaced persons."

In view of the above, we must conclude that the prohibited discriminations include "any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on any grounds such as nationality" aimed at invalidating the recognition, enjoyment or exercise of the rights established in the international instruments, in equal conditions.

Likewise, the judicial and legal guarantees established in Articles 8 and 25 of the American Convention are equally applicable when determining a situation that affects the rights of asylum seekers or refugees, but they should also guide the protection of migrants in the hemisphere.

The Central American Council of Ombudsmen with the support of its Technical Secretariat (the Inter-American Institute of Human Rights):

In its written and oral statements, indicated that:

Regarding the first question (supra para. 4):

It is necessary to recognize the distinction between the human right not to be subjected to discriminatory treatments (in either the formulation of the law or its implementation) and the obligation of States not to make any discrimination in the enjoyment and exercise of human rights with regard to persons subject to their jurisdiction.

In international human rights law, the principle of equality has two dimensions: a) equality in the enjoyment and exercise of human rights; and b) the right of all persons to be treated equally before the law. The importance of these two dimensions is not merely their recognition in a constitutional text, but also that the State should implement all pertinent measures to ensure that the obstacles to equality among persons are removed in practice, in accordance with Article 1 of the American Convention and Article 2(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The State must not only abstain from generating de jure discriminations, but must also eliminate the factors that give rise to de facto discrimination in relation to civil and political rights and also to economic, social and cultural rights.

The answer to the first question alludes to labor-related human rights that are regulated in an extensive series of norms in the inter-American system, which has two levels of recognition: one applicable to OAS member States which are not parties to the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; and a second applicable to OAS member States who are also parties to the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, "Protocol of San Salvador." These two levels entail two distinct legal situations regarding the protection of labor rights: the States who belong to the first group are obliged by Articles 30, 34 and 45 of the OAS Charter and Articles XIV, XV and XVI of the American Declaration; while the States parties to the Protocol, in addition to being obliged by the preceding provisions, have obligations arising from Articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 of the Protocol.

To understand the expression "labor legislation" in Mexico's request, we should mention that, in the legal systems of all OAS member States, the international obligations they have assumed arising from conventions, "may be classified as legislation; in other words, as an integral part of their domestic law." Thus, the expression "labor legislation" included in the requesting State's first question refers to the domestic law of the States. The norms of international law indicated above do not admit a restrictive or discriminatory interpretation or implementation, in particular because they are based on a specific migratory status. "From the legal perspective of migration, the regular or irregular situation does not alter or affect the scope of the State obligation" to respect and ensure human rights. Domestic labor legislation includes more rights than those protected in the international norms cited above. States have the right to exercise control on migratory matters and to adopt measures to protect their national security and public order; but States must exercise this control, respecting human rights.

A detailed answer to Mexico's first question would require a specific examination of each State. Nevertheless, we can say that, like human rights, labor rights correspond to all persons and are required in the context of labor relations. Consequently, the ability to perform a productive activity depends exclusively on professional training and skill, and is never related to the migratory status of a person.

The causes of migration, particularly irregular migration, are different from the conditions of persecution that give rise to the existence of refugees, who are protected by refugee law. Irregular migration is associated with socio-economic conditions and the search for better opportunities and means of subsistence than those the person has in his State of origin. In practice, high levels of irregular migrants increase the offer of manpower and affect how it is valued. Since the irregular migrant does not want to be discovered by the State authorities, he refuses to have recourse to the courts, and this encourages the violation of his human rights in the workplace.

A person who migrates to another State and enters into an employment relationship "activates his human rights" in that context, irrespective of his migratory status. He also "activates" the obligations of the recipient State contained in the OAS Charter, the American Declaration (in the case of an OAS member State) and the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (where the State is also a party to the latter). This "activation" of rights implies that a measure taken by the State with the aim of producing a denial of the enjoyment and exercise of labor human rights based on the migratory status of a person "would lead to a differentiated treatment that would give rise to arbitrariness, and consequently discrimination."

Accordingly, we consider that the answer to Mexico's first question is: OAS member States and States parties to the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, "may not apply a distinct treatment that is harmful to undocumented migrant workers as regards the enjoyment of their labor rights," understanding such rights to be those contained in Articles 30, 34(g) and 45 of the OAS Charter; Articles XIV, XV and XVI of the American Declaration; and Articles 6, 7, 8 and 9 of the said Protocol, as well as those recognized in the domestic legislation of the States, using the migratory status of the said workers as a basis for this distinct treatment. Those human rights are enjoyed as soon as an employment relationship is established and do not depend on migratory status.

Regarding the second question (supra para. 4):

The obligations to respect and guarantee human rights do not arise from Article 1(1) of the American Convention or from Article 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, but from the nature of human rights and human dignity, which does not depend on a classification based on some positive act of the State. Thus, the enforceability of these obligations does not depend on a State's accession to or ratification of the American Convention; it depends only on its justiciability before the organs of the inter-American system. In this respect, the obligations of respect and guarantee are not conditional obligations because they derive from human dignity.

Consequently, we consider that the answer to the first part of the second question is that the State obligations to respect and guarantee human rights, in general, and the human right not to be subjected to discriminatory treatment or unequal treatment before the law, in particular, cannot be interpreted as conditioning the content of such obligations to a person's regular migratory status in the territory of a State. Migratory status is not a necessary condition for a State to respect and guarantee the human rights contained in Articles 2(1) of the Universal Declaration, II of the American Declaration, 2 and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and 1 and 24 of the American Convention.

The second part of the second question should be answered bearing in mind the human right not to be subjected to discriminatory treatment or unequal treatment before the law, which the State is obliged to respect and guarantee. Accordingly, the State may not deny a worker one or more of his labor rights based on his irregular migratory status, since if it did so, it would be failing to comply with its obligation to guarantee those rights and could be attributed with this act of denial under international law.

Regarding the third question (supra para. 4):

The source of the obligation to respect and guarantee human rights is international law; consequently, in accordance with the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, domestic norms cannot be alleged to try and justify non-compliance with this obligation. Moreover, this generic obligation is enforceable with regard to all human rights.

Notwithstanding the generalized practice of most States, the pre-eminence of international law over domestic law is not determined by the latter. In application of the pro homine principle, international human rights law accords prevalence to the norm intended to protect human dignity (the one that provides a more comprehensive recognition of human rights), regardless of the source of the obligation in question. Hence, the laws of a State are valid insofar as they are congruent with human rights.

The answer to the third question is that no State is authorized to use its domestic law to interpret the human rights resulting from a source of international law, when this will diminish the degree to which such rights are recognized. An interpretation of this type is not valid and cannot produce legal effects. However, a State may develop an interpretation of the human rights deriving from a source of international law using its domestic law, when the result of this interpretation will give preference to the option that provides the most extensive degree of recognition.

Regarding the fourth question (supra para. 4):

There is no finite list of jus cogens norms, because, there appear to be no criteria that allow them to be identified. It is the courts that determine whether a norm can be considered jus cogens, "for the purposes of invalidating a treaty." Such norms establish limits to the will of States; consequently, they create an international public order (ordre public), and thus become norms of enforceability erga omnes. Owing to their transcendence, human rights norms are norms of jus cogens and, consequently, a source of the legitimacy of the international legal system. All human rights must be respected equally, because they are rooted in human dignity; therefore, they must be recognized and protected based on the prohibition of discrimination and the need for equality before the law.

The answer to the first part of the fourth question is that, owing to the progressive development of international human rights law, the principle of non-discrimination and the right to the equal and effective protection of the law must be considered norms of jus cogens. They are norms of peremptory international law, which create an international public order that cannot be opposed validly by other norms of international law, and particularly by the domestic legislation of States. Norms of jus cogens rank higher than other legal norms, so that the validity of the latter depends on their congruency with the former.

An OAS member State which is a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is obliged to respect and guarantee the rights recognized therein and also in the American Declaration, because "human rights form a single, indivisible, interrelated and interdependent corpus iuris."

The answer to the second part of the fourth question is that, in the case of the American States, the legal effect of the recognition of the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law as norms of jus cogens is that any act of the State that conflicts with this principle and right has no legal effect or validity.

*Jorge A. Bustamante,
Juridical Research Institute, Universidad
Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM):*

In his written and oral statements, indicated that:

The legal framework for evaluating the actual situation of Mexican migrants in both their own country and the United States, as the recipient State of almost all international Mexican migrants, should be considered in two different analytical contexts: the international context, deriving from the international nature of migration (analysis of the State which receives immigration and the relationship of the migrants with the State and the society that receives them); and the national context (analysis of the migrants as subjects of human rights in their State of origin).

The vulnerability that affects the human rights of international migrants is of a structural nature and arises from the way in which most States define nationals and aliens in their Constitutions. Most States afford nationals a certain priority in their legislation with regard to aliens, so that the structural situation of the vulnerability of migrants as subjects of human rights is equal to the social inequality between them and the nationals of the recipient State.

The vulnerability of migrants as subjects of human rights in their national context arises from the ideological association that the members of civil society in their State of origin make between the social definition of a migrant and any other socially undervalued condition (woman, girl/boy child, indigenous person, disabled person, member of a religious order, etc.) or any other condition which society in the State of origin considers inferior to the rest of the non-migrants in that society. This association has an ideological dimension and a historical context that is different for each State, in the same way as the degree to which this situation of inferiority is assigned to migrants varies.

There is an objective dimension of vulnerability, according to which the greater the distance between a migrant and his home, the greater his vulnerability as a subject of human rights. Although this hypothesis may be valid for all migrants, it is more so in the national context of internal migrants than for the international context of migration.

There is an asymmetry of power that is transformed into a context of social relations between nationals and aliens-migrants, that is confirmed by the State through the establishment of differential access to public resources for the two categories; this gives rise to a legal framework of social relations that enters into contradiction with the more extensive concept of human rights.

In this asymmetry of power, it is probable that the alien will find himself in a position of subordination to the national. This results in a situation of structural vulnerability for aliens.

The position of subordination imposed on aliens/migrants is something that the recipient State "confirms." Here, the vulnerability is potentially supplemented by the role of the State, either by act or omission, but always in the context of this differential treatment that the recipient State grants to nationals compared to aliens.

The asymmetries of power between the States of origin and the States that receive international migrants may be clearly seen by the limited number of recipient States that have ratified the International Convention on the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families.

"[T]he integration of migrants/aliens as equals of nationals before the law and the State implies a legal authorization or empowerment of aliens/migrants, which would result in the disappearance of the vulnerability of the migrants as subjects of human rights." This "empowerment" is associated with the pre-eminence of human rights in the domestic law of the recipient State, based on which aliens/migrants may defend themselves from discrimination and the abuse of their human rights, by acquiring conditions of equality with nationals before the law and the State.

The death of almost two thousand Mexican and some Central American migrants is the strongest evidence that the United States has violated and continues to violate human rights by maintaining the so-called "Operation Guardian." This thesis is strengthened by the fact that a report of the United States General Accounting Office expressly recognized the link between "Operation Guardian" and the deaths of migrants. The State has the obligation to repair the harm caused by the acts that it has planned, implemented and maintained, by the payment that corresponds to the next of kin for the loss of life of a productive member of their family. "It is very strange that the Government of Mexico has not filed any claim," establishing the relationship between: the planning, implementation and continuity of "Operation Guardian" and State responsibility arising from these governmental acts.

One factor that prevents Mexico from being able to formulate this claim against the United States for the latter's responsibility in the deaths of Mexican migrants on its border, is the absence of Mexico's express recognition of its co-responsibility in those deaths, arising from the fact that its economic policy has caused Mexicans to migrate in search of employment in the United States. This migratory phenomenon is the result of the interaction of factors on both sides of the border; namely, the interaction between a demand for migrant manpower in the United States and an offer of manpower from Mexico. The causal relationship between Mexico's economic policy and the generation of the factors that produce this supply of manpower, give rise to "State responsibility" with regard to migration and, hence, to the co-responsibility of Mexico in the deaths of migrants on the border with the United States.

The recognition of responsibility by Mexico should be considered an element in the bilateral negotiation of an agreement on migrant workers between the two Governments. In this context, negotiations could be based on Mexico's express recognition of co-responsibility for the deaths of the migrants and co-participation in the payment of compensation to repair the harm arising from those deaths and the agreement of the United States to suspend "Operation Guardian."

III COMPETENCE

48. This request for an advisory opinion was submitted to the Court by Mexico, in exercise of the faculty granted to it by article 64(1) of the Convention, which establishes that:

[t]he member states of the Organization may consult the Court regarding the interpretation of this Convention or of other treaties concerning the protection of human rights in the American states. Within their spheres of competence, the organs listed in Chapter X of the Charter of the Organization of American States, as amended by the Protocol of Buenos Aires, may in like manner consult the Court.

49. This faculty has been exercised in compliance with the following requirements established in the Court's Rules of Procedure: precise formulation of the questions on which the Court's opinion is sought; identification of the norms to be interpreted; presentation of the considerations giving rise to the request; name and address of the Agent (Article 59 of the Rules of Procedure), and indication of the international treaties other than the American Convention to be interpreted (Article 60(1) of the Rules of Procedure).

50. Compliance with the regulatory requirements for formulating a request does not imply that the Court is obliged to respond to it. In this respect, the Court must bear in mind considerations that go beyond the merely formal aspects related to the generic limits that the Court has recognized to the exercise of its advisory function<sup>1</sup>. These considerations will be examined in the following paragraphs.

51. The application submits four questions to the consideration of the Court regarding the "[...] deprivation of the enjoyment and exercise of certain labor rights [of migrant workers,] and its compatibility with the obligation of the American States to guarantee the principles of legal equality, non-discrimination and equal and effective protection of the law embodied in international instruments for the protection of human rights; and also with the subordination or conditioning of the observance of the obligations imposed by international human rights law, including those of an erga omnes nature, to the attainment of certain domestic policy objectives of an American State." The request also deals with "the status that the principles of legal equality, non-discrimination and equal and effective protection of the law have achieved in the context of the progressive development of international human rights law and its codification."

52. Specifically, Mexico has asked the following questions:

In the context of the principle of equality before the law embodied in Article II of the American Declaration, Article 24 of the American Convention, Article 7 of the Universal Declaration and Article 26 of the [International] Covenant [on Civil and Political Rights],

1) Can an American State establish in its labor legislation a distinct treatment from that accorded legal residents or citizens that prejudices undocumented migrant workers in the enjoyment of their labor rights, so that the migratory status of the workers impedes per se the enjoyment of such rights?

2.1) Should Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Universal Declaration, Article II of the American Declaration, Articles 2 and 26 of the [International] Covenant [on Civil and Political Rights] and Articles 1 and 24 of the American Convention be interpreted in the sense that an individual's legal residence in the territory of an American State is a necessary condition for that State to respect and ensure the rights and freedoms recognized in these provisions to those persons subject to its jurisdiction?

2.2) In the light of the provisions cited in the preceding question, can it be considered that the denial of one or more labor right, based on the undocumented status of a migrant worker, is compatible with the obligations of an American State to ensure non-discrimination and the equal, effective protection of the law imposed by the above-mentioned provisions?

Based on Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 2, and Article 5, paragraph 2, of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,

3) What would be the validity of an interpretation by any American State which, in any way, subordinates or conditions the observance of fundamental human rights, including the right to equality before the law and to the equal and effective protection of the law without discrimination, to achieving migration policy goals contained in its laws, notwithstanding the ranking that domestic law attributes to such laws in relation to the international obligations arising from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and other obligations of international human rights law that have an erga omnes character?

In view of the progressive development of international human rights law and its codification, particularly through the provisions invoked in the instruments mentioned in this request,

4) What is the nature today of the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law in the hierarchy of norms established by general international law and, in this context, can they be considered to be the expression of norms of ius cogens? If the answer to the second question is affirmative, what are the legal effects for the OAS Member States, individually and collectively, in the context of the general obligation to respect and ensure, pursuant to Article 2, paragraph 1, of the [International] Covenant [on Civil and Political Rights], compliance with the human rights referred to in Articles 3 (l) and 17 of the OAS Charter?

53. From these questions, it is evident that the requesting State requires an interpretation of the American Convention, as well as of other international treaties and declarations. The Court has established some guidelines on the interpretation of international norms other than the American Convention. Principally, it has considered that Article 64(1) of the Convention, when referring to the authority of the Court to provide an opinion on "other treaties concerning the protection of human rights in the American States," is broad and non-restrictive. In other words:

[...] the advisory jurisdiction of the Court can be exercised, in general, with regard to any provision dealing with the protection of human rights set forth in any international treaty applicable in the American States, regardless of whether it be bilateral or multilateral, whatever be the principal purpose of such a treaty, and whether or not non-Member States of the inter-American system are or have the right to become parties thereto.<sup>2</sup>

54. In this respect, the Court has established that it can "examine the interpretation of a treaty provided that the protection of human rights in a member State of the inter-American system is directly involved"<sup>3</sup>, even though the said instrument does not belong to the regional system of protection<sup>4</sup>, and that:

<sup>3</sup> Legal Status and Human Rights of the Child, supra note 1, para. 22; and cf. The Right to Information on Consular Assistance in the Framework of the Guarantees of Due Process of Law, supra note 1, para. 36; International Responsibility for the Promulgation and Enforcement of Laws in violation of the Convention (Arts. 1 and 2, American Convention on Human Rights). Advisory Opinion OC-14/94 of

[n]o good reason exists to hold, in advance and in the abstract, that the Court lacks the power to receive a request for, or to issue, an advisory opinion, about a human rights treaty applicable to an American State merely because non-American States are also parties to the treaty or because the treaty has not been adopted within the framework or under the auspices of the inter-American system.<sup>5</sup>

55. Therefore, the Court considers that it is competent to rule on the questions posed by Mexico which also requests the interpretation of the American Declaration, the American Convention, the Universal Declaration and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, all of them instruments that protect human rights and that are applicable to the American States.

56. With regard to the Charter of the Organization of American States, in another opinion, the Court indicated, referring to the American Declaration, that:

[...]Article 64(1) of the American Convention authorizes [it], at the request of a member state of the OAS [...] to render advisory opinions interpreting the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, provided that in doing so the Court is acting within the scope and framework of its jurisdiction in relation to the Charter and Convention or other treaties concerning the protection of human rights in the American States.<sup>6</sup>

Moreover, at the same time, the Court has indicated that "the Charter of the [OAS] cannot be interpreted and applied, as far as human rights are concerned, without relating its norms, consistent with the practice of the organs of the OAS, to the corresponding provisions of the [American] Declaration."<sup>7</sup>

57. This means that the Court has competence to render advisory opinions on the interpretation of the OAS Charter, taking into consideration the relationship of the Charter to the inter-American system for the protection of human rights, specifically within the framework of the American Declaration, the American Convention, or other treaties on the protection of human rights in the American States.

58. Nevertheless, should the Court restrict its ruling to those States that have ratified the American Convention, it would be difficult to separate this Advisory Opinion from a specific ruling on the legislation and practices of States that have not ratified the Convention with regard to the questions posed. The Court considers that this would restrict the purpose of the advisory proceeding, which, as has been mentioned, "is designed [...] to enable OAS Member States and OAS organs to obtain a judicial interpretation of a provision embodied in the Convention or other human rights treaties in the American States."<sup>8</sup>

59. Likewise, if the opinion only encompassed those OAS Member States that are parties to the American Convention, the Court would be providing its advisory services to a limited number of American States, which would not be in the general interest of the request.

60. Consequently, the Court decides that everything indicated in this Advisory Opinion applies to the OAS Member States that have signed either the OAS Charter, the American Declaration, or the Universal Declaration, or have ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, regardless of whether or not they have ratified the American Convention or any of its optional protocols.

61. Following its practice in advisory matters, the Court must determine whether rendering the opinion might "have the effect of altering or weakening the system established by the Convention in a manner detrimental to the individual human being."<sup>9</sup>

62. The Court may use various factors when considering this matter. One of them, which coincides with much of the international jurisprudence in this area,<sup>10</sup> refers to the problem that, a ruling on an issue or matter that might eventually be submitted to the Court in the context of a contentious case could be obtained prematurely, using a request for an opinion.<sup>11</sup> However, this Court has noted subsequently that the existence of a difference concerning the interpretation of a provision does not, per se, constitute an impediment for exercise of the advisory function.<sup>12</sup>

63. In the exercise of its advisory function, the Court is not called on to resolve questions of fact, but to determine the meaning, purpose and reason of international human rights norms. In this context, the Court fulfills an advisory function<sup>13</sup>. On several occasions, the Court has upheld the distinction between its advisory and contentious competence. In Advisory Opinion OC-15/97 on Reports of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, it indicated that:

[t]he advisory jurisdiction of the Court differs from its contentious jurisdiction in that there are no "parties" involved in the advisory procedure nor is there any dispute to be settled. The sole purpose of the advisory function is "the interpretation of this Convention or of other treaties concerning the protection of human rights in the American states." The fact that the Court's advisory jurisdiction may be invoked by all the Member States of the OAS and its main organs defines the distinction between its advisory and contentious jurisdictions.

[...] The Court therefore observes that the exercise of the advisory function assigned to it by the American Convention is multilateral rather than litigious in nature, a fact faithfully reflected in the Rules of Procedure of the Court, Article 62(1) of which establishes that a request for an advisory opinion shall be transmitted to all the "Member States", which may submit their comments on the request and participate in the public hearing on the matter. Furthermore, while an advisory opinion of the Court does not have the binding character of a judgment in a contentious case, it does have undeniable legal effects. Hence, it is evident that the State or organ requesting an advisory opinion of the Court is not the only one with a legitimate interest in the outcome of the procedure.<sup>14</sup>

64. When affirming its competence in this matter, the Court recalls the broad scope of its advisory function, unique in contemporary international law, which "enables the Court to perform a service to all the members of the inter-American system, and is designed to assist them in fulfilling their international human rights commitments,"<sup>15</sup> and to assist states and organs to comply with and to apply human rights treaties without subjecting them to the formalism and the sanctions associated with the contentious judicial process.<sup>16</sup>

65. The Court observes that the use of examples serves the purpose of referring to a specific context and illustrates the different interpretations that could be given to the legal issue raised in the advisory opinion in question, without implying that the Court is rendering a legal ruling on the situation described in such examples<sup>17</sup>. Likewise, the latter allow the Court to show that its advisory opinion is not mere academic speculation and is justified by its potential benefit for the international protection of human rights and for strengthening the universal juridical conscience<sup>18</sup>. When tackling the respective issue, the Court acts as a human rights tribunal, guided by the international instruments that regulate its advisory competence and makes a strictly juridical analysis of the questions submitted to it.

66. In view of the foregoing, the Court considers that it should examine the matters set out in the request and issue the corresponding opinion.

IV STRUCTURE OF THE OPINION

67. The Court is empowered to structure its rulings as it considers best suited to the interests of justice and the purposes of an advisory opinion. Accordingly, the Court takes into account the basic issues that underlie the questions posed in the request for an opinion and examines them in order to reach general conclusions that can, in turn, be extended to the specific points mentioned in the request itself and related issues<sup>19</sup>. On this occasion, the Court has decided to start by drawing up a glossary in order to define the conceptual scope of the words used in this Opinion. Once this conceptual framework has been established, the Court will proceed to examine the specific matters submitted to its consideration and, to this end, will reply to the questions it has been asked in the order it considers most appropriate, with a view to the coherence of the Opinion. Pursuant to the power inherent in all courts to give their rulings the logical structure they consider most adequate to the interest of justice,<sup>20</sup> the Court will consider the questions raised as follows:

- a) Obligation to respect and guarantee the human rights and fundamental nature of the principle of equality and non-discrimination (Questions 2(1) and 4);
- b) Application of the principle of equality and non-discrimination to migrants (Question 2(1));
- c) Rights of undocumented migrant workers (Questions 2(2) and 1); and
- d) State obligations in the determination of migratory policies in light of the international instruments for the protection of human rights (Question 3).

68. The Court will now consider each of the points mentioned above in the sequence indicated.

V GLOSSARY

69. For the purposes of this Advisory Opinion, the Court will use the following words with the meaning indicated:

- a) to emigrate or migrate or To leave a State in order to transfer to another and establish oneself there.

VI
OBLIGATION TO RESPECT AND GUARANTEE HUMAN RIGHTS
AND THE FUNDAMENTAL NATURE OF THE PRINCIPLE OF EQUALITY AND NON-DISCRIMINATION

70. With regard to the general obligation to respect and guarantee human rights, the following norms are cited in the request:

- a) Article 1 of the American Convention, which states that:
  - 1. The States Parties to this Convention undertake to respect the rights and freedoms recognized herein and to ensure to all persons subject to their jurisdiction the free and full exercise of those rights and freedoms, without any discrimination for reasons of race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, economic status, birth, or any other social condition.
  - 2. For the purposes of this Convention, "person" means every human being.
- b) Article 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which stipulates that:
  - 1. Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in the present Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.
  - 2. Where not already provided for by existing legislative or other measures, each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes to take the necessary steps, in accordance with its constitutional processes and with the provisions of the present Covenant, to adopt such legislative or other measures as may be necessary to give effect to the rights recognized in the present Covenant.
  - 3. Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes:
    - a) To ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity;
    - b) To ensure that any persons claiming such a remedy shall have his right thereto determined by competent judicial, administrative or legislative authorities, or by any other competent authority, provided for by the legal system of the State, and to develop the possibilities of judicial remedy;
    - c) To ensure that the competent authorities shall enforce such remedies when granted.

71. With regard to the principle of equality and non-discrimination, the norms mentioned in the request are:

- a) Articles 3(l) and 17 of the OAS Charter, which indicate that:

---

<sup>25</sup> Cf. U.N., International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families of 18 December 1990. Article 6(b) indicates that "[t]he term 'State of employment' means a State where the migrant worker is to be engaged, is engaged or has been engaged in a remunerated activity, as the case may be."

The American States proclaim the fundamental rights of the individual without distinction as to race, nationality, creed, or sex.

Each State has the right to develop its cultural, political, and economic life freely and naturally. In this free development, the State shall respect the rights of the individual and the principles of universal morality.

- b) Article 24 of the American Convention, which determines that:

All persons are equal before the law. Consequently, they are entitled, without discrimination, to equal protection of the law.

- c) Article II of the American Declaration, which states that:

All persons are equal before the law and have the rights and duties established in this Declaration, without distinction as to race, sex, language, creed or any other factor.

- d) Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which stipulates that:

All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

- e) Article 2(1) of the Universal Declaration, which indicates that:

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Obligation to Respect and Guarantee Human Rights

72. The Court now considers it pertinent to refer to the general State obligation to respect and guarantee human rights, which is of the highest importance, and will then examine the principle of equality and non-discrimination.

73. Human rights must be respected and guaranteed by all States. All persons have attributes inherent to their human dignity that may not be harmed; these attributes make them possessors of fundamental rights that may not be disregarded and which are, consequently, superior to the power of the State, whatever its political structure.

74. The general obligation to respect and ensure human rights is enshrined in various international instruments<sup>26</sup>.

<sup>26</sup> Some of these international instruments are: American Convention on Human Rights (Articles 1 and 2), Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights "Protocol of San Salvador" (Article 1), Charter of the United Nations (Article 55(c)), Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Preamble), International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 2(1) and 2(2)), International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (Article 2(2)), International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (Article 7), International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (Preamble), European Convention for the Protection of the Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Article 1), European Social Charter (Preamble), African Charter of Human and People's Rights "Banjul Charter" (Article 1), and the Arab Charter of Human Rights (Article 2).

75. The supervisory bodies of the American Convention and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the instruments indicated by Mexico in the questions of the request for an advisory opinion examined in this chapter, have ruled on the said obligation.

76. In this respect, the Inter-American Court has indicated that:

Article 1(1) is essential in determining whether a violation of the human rights recognized by the Convention can be imputed to a State Party. In effect, that article charges the States Parties with the fundamental duty to respect and guarantee, the rights recognized in the Convention. Any impairment of those rights which can be attributed to the action or omission of any public authority constitutes an act imputable to the State, which assumes responsibility in the terms provided by the Convention.

According to Article 1(1), any exercise of public power that violates the rights recognized by the Convention, is illegal. Whenever a State organ, official or public entity violates one of those rights, this constitutes a failure of the duty to respect the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention.

This conclusion is independent of whether the organ or official has contravened provisions of domestic law or overstepped the limits of his authority. Under international law, a State is responsible for the acts of its agents undertaken in their official capacity and for their omissions, even when those agents act outside the sphere of their authority or violate domestic law.<sup>27</sup>

77. The Inter-American Court has also stated that:

In international law, a customary norm establishes that a State which has ratified a human rights treaty must introduce the necessary modifications to its domestic law to ensure the proper compliance with the obligations it has assumed. This law is universally accepted, and is supported by jurisprudence. The American Convention establishes the general obligation of each State Party to adapt its domestic law to the provisions of this Convention, in order to guarantee the rights that it embodies. This general obligation of the State Party implies that the measures of domestic law must be effective (the principle of effet utile). This means that the State must adopt all measures so that the provisions of the Convention are effectively fulfilled in its domestic legal system, as Article 2 of the Convention requires. Such measures are only effective when the State adjusts its actions to the Convention's rules on protection.<sup>28</sup>

78. Likewise, the Court has declared that:

[t]he general duty set forth in Article 2 of the American Convention implies the adoption of measures on two fronts. On the one hand, the suppression of rules and practices of any kind that entail the violation of the guarantees set forth in the Convention. On the other hand, the issuance of rules and the development of practices leading to the effective observation of the said guarantees<sup>29</sup>.

79. With regard to the provisions of Article 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Human Rights Committee has observed that:

[...] article 2 of the Covenant generally leaves it to the States parties concerned to choose their method of implementation in their territories within the framework set out in that article. It recognizes, in particular, that the implementation does not depend solely on constitutional or legislative enactments, which in themselves are often not per se sufficient. The Committee considers it necessary to draw the attention of States parties to the fact that the obligation under the Covenant is not confined to the respect of human rights, but that States parties have also undertaken to ensure the enjoyment of these rights to all individuals under their jurisdiction. This aspect calls for specific activities by the States parties to enable individuals to enjoy their rights. [...]

In this connection, it is very important that individuals should know what their rights under the Covenant (and the Optional Protocol, as the case may be) are and also that all administrative and judicial authorities should be aware of the obligations which the State party has assumed under the Covenant<sup>30</sup>.

80. Likewise, the European Court of Human Rights has indicated that:

The Convention does not merely oblige the higher authorities of the Contracting States to respect for their own part the rights and freedoms it embodies; as is shown by Article 14 (art. 14) and the English text of Article 1 (art. 1) ("shall secure"), the Convention also has the consequence that, in order to secure the enjoyment of those rights and freedoms, those authorities must prevent or remedy any breach at subordinate levels.<sup>31</sup>

81. As can be seen from the above, both the international instruments and the respective international case law establish clearly that States have the general obligation to respect and ensure the fundamental rights. To this end, they should take affirmative action, avoid taking measures that restrict or infringe a fundamental right, and eliminate measures and practices that restrict or violate a fundamental right.

The principle of equality and non-discrimination

82. Having established the State obligation to respect and guarantee human rights, the Court will now refer to the elements of the principle of equality and non-discrimination.

83. Non-discrimination, together with equality before the law and equal protection of the law, are elements of a general basic principle related to the protection of human rights. The element of equality is difficult to separate from non-discrimination. Indeed, when referring to equality before the law, the instruments cited above (supra para. 71) indicate that this principle must be guaranteed with no discrimination. This Court has indicated that "[r]ecognizing equality before the law, [...] prohibits all discriminatory treatment."<sup>32</sup>

84. This Advisory Opinion will differentiate by using the terms distinction and discrimination. The term distinction will be used to indicate what is admissible, because it is reasonable, proportionate and objective. Discrimination will be used to refer to what is inadmissible, because it violates human rights. Therefore, the term "discrimination" will be used to refer to any exclusion, restriction or privilege that is not objective and reasonable, and which adversely affects human rights.

85. There is an inseparable connection between the obligation to respect and guarantee human rights and the principle of equality and non-discrimination. States are obliged to respect and guarantee the full and free exercise of rights and freedoms without any discrimination. Non-compliance by the State with the general obligation to respect and guarantee human rights, owing to any discriminatory treatment, gives rise to its international responsibility.

86. The principle of the equal and effective protection of the law and of non-discrimination is embodied in many international instruments.<sup>33</sup> The fact that the principle of equality and non-discrimination is regulated in so many international instruments is evidence that there is a universal obligation to respect and guarantee the human rights arising from that general basic principle.

87. The principle of equality before the law and non-discrimination has been developed in international case law and legal writings. The Inter-American Court has understood that:

[t]he notion of equality springs directly from the oneness of the human family and is linked to the essential dignity of the individual. That principle cannot be reconciled with the notion that a given group has the right to privileged treatment because of its perceived superiority. It is equally irreconcilable with that notion to characterize a group as inferior and treat it with hostility or otherwise subject it to discrimination in the enjoyment of rights that are accorded to others not so classified. It is impermissible to subject human beings to differences in treatment that are inconsistent with their unique and congenerous character.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>33</sup> Some of these international instruments are: OAS Charter (Article 3(1)); American Convention on Human Rights (Articles 1 and 24); American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man (Article 2); Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights "Protocol of San Salvador" (Article 3); Charter of the United Nations (Article 1(3)); Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Articles 2 and 7); International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (Articles 2(2) and 3); International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Articles 2 and 26); International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (Article 2); Convention on the Rights of the Child (Article 2); Declaration on the Rights of the Child (Principle 1); International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (Articles 1, 7, 18(1), 25, 27, 28, 43, 45(1), 48, 55 and 70); Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (Articles 2, 3, 5 to 16); Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and Discrimination Based on Religion or Beliefs (Articles 2 and 4); Declaration of the International Labor Organization (ILO) concerning the Fundamental Principles and Rights in Work and their Monitoring (2(d)); Convention No. 97 of the International Labor Organization (ILO) concerning Migrant Workers (revised) (Article 6); Convention No. 111 of the International Labor Organization (ILO) concerning Discrimination with regard to Employment and Occupation (Articles 1 to 3); Convention No. 143 of the International Labor Organization (ILO) concerning Migrant Workers (supplementary provisions) (Articles 8 and 10); Convention No. 168 of the International Labor Organization (ILO) concerning Promotion of Employment and Protection against Unemployment (Article 6); Proclamation of Teheran, the Teheran International Conference on Human Rights, May 13, 1968 (paras. 1, 2, 5, 8 and 11); Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, World Conference on Human Rights, 14 to 25 June 1993 (I.15; I.19; I.27; I.30; II.B.1, Articles 19 to 24; II.B.2, Articles 25 to 27); Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (Articles 2, 3, 4(1) and 5); World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Forms of Intolerance, Programme of Action (paragraphs 1, 2, 7, 9, 10, 16, 25, 38, 47, 48, 51, 66 and 104 of the Declaration); Convention against Discrimination in Education (Article 3); Declaration on Race and Racial Prejudice (Articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9); Declaration on the Human Rights of Individuals Who are not Nationals of the Country in which They Live (Article 5(1)(b) and 5(1)(c)); Charter of the Fundamental Rights of the European Union (Articles 20 and 21); European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Articles 1 and 14); European Social Charter (Article 19(4), 19(5) and 19(7)); Protocol No.12 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Article 1); African Charter of Human and People's Rights "Banjul Charter"(Articles 2 and 3); Arab Charter of Human Rights (Article 2); and Cairo Declaration of Human Rights in Islam (Article 1).

88. The principle of equality and non-discrimination is fundamental for the safeguard of human rights in both international and domestic law. Consequently, States have the obligation to combat discriminatory practices and not to introduce discriminatory regulations into their laws.

89. Nevertheless, when examining the implications of the differentiated treatment that some norms may give to the persons they affect, it is important to refer to the words of this Court declaring that "not all differences in treatment are in themselves offensive to human dignity."<sup>35</sup> In the same way, the European Court of Human Rights, following "the principles which may be extracted from the legal practice of a large number of democratic States," has held that a difference in treatment is only discriminatory when "it has no objective and reasonable justification."<sup>36</sup> Distinctions based on de facto inequalities may be established; such distinctions constitute an instrument for the protection of those who should be protected, considering their situation of greater or lesser weakness or helplessness.<sup>37</sup> For example, the fact that minors who are detained in a prison may not be imprisoned together with adults who are also detained is an inequality permitted by law. Another example of these inequalities is the limitation to the exercise of specific political rights owing to nationality or citizenship.

90. In this respect, the European Court has also indicated that:

"It is important, then, to look for the criteria which enable a determination to be made as to whether or not a given difference in treatment, concerning of course the exercise of one of the rights and freedoms set forth, contravenes Article 14 (art. 14). On this question the Court, following the principles which may be extracted from the legal practice of a large number of democratic States, holds that the principle of equality of treatment is violated if the distinction has no objective and reasonable justification. The existence of such a justification must be assessed in relation to the aim and effects of the measure under consideration, regard being had to the principles which normally prevail in democratic societies. A difference of treatment in the exercise of a right laid down in the Convention must not only pursue a legitimate aim: Article 14 (art. 14) is likewise violated when it is clearly established that there is no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised.

In attempting to find out in a given case, whether or not there has been an arbitrary distinction, the Court cannot disregard those legal and factual features which characterise the life of the society in the State which, as a Contracting Party, has to answer for the measure in dispute. In so doing it cannot assume the rôle of the competent national authorities, for it would thereby lose sight of the subsidiary nature of the international machinery of collective enforcement established by the Convention. The national authorities remain free to choose the measures which they consider appropriate in those matters which are governed by the Convention. Review by the Court concerns only the conformity of these measures with the requirements of the Convention."<sup>38</sup>

91. Likewise, the Inter-American Court has established that:

[n]o discrimination exists if the difference in treatment has a legitimate purpose and if it does not lead to situations which are contrary to justice, to reason or to the nature of things. It follows that there would be no discrimination in differences in treatment of individuals by a state when the classifications selected are based on substantial factual differences and there exists a reasonable relationship of proportionality between these differences and the aims of the legal rule under review. These aims may not be unjust or unreasonable, that is, they may not be arbitrary, capricious, despotic or in conflict with the essential oneness and dignity of humankind.<sup>39</sup>

92. The United Nations Committee on Human Rights has defined discrimination as:

[...] any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference which is based on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status, and which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by all persons, on an equal footing, of all rights and freedoms.<sup>40</sup>

93. Likewise, this Committee has indicated that:

[...] the enjoyment of rights and freedoms on an equal footing, however, does not mean identical treatment in every instance.<sup>41</sup>

94. The Human Rights Committee has also stated that:

[...] each State party must ensure the rights in the Covenant to "all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction" [...]. In general, the rights set forth in the Covenant apply to everyone, irrespective of reciprocity, and irrespective of his or her nationality or statelessness. [...]

Thus, the general rule is that each one of the rights of the Covenant must be guaranteed without discrimination between citizens and aliens. Aliens receive the benefit of the general requirement of non-discrimination in respect of the rights guaranteed in the Covenant, as provided for in article 2 thereof. This guarantee applies to aliens and citizens alike. Exceptionally, some of the rights recognized in the Covenant are expressly applicable only to citizens (art. 25), while article 13 applies only to aliens. However, the Committee's experience in examining reports shows that in a number of countries other rights that aliens should enjoy under the Covenant are denied to them or are subject to limitations that cannot always be justified under the Covenant. [...]

The Covenant gives aliens all the protection regarding rights guaranteed therein, and its requirements should be observed by States parties in their legislation and in practice as appropriate. [...]

Aliens are entitled to equal protection by the law. There shall be no discrimination between aliens and citizens in the application of these rights. These rights of aliens may be qualified only by such limitations as may be lawfully imposed under the Covenant.<sup>42</sup>

95. With regard to the principle of equality and non-discrimination, the African Commission of Human and Peoples' Rights has established that this:

[m]eans that citizens should expect to be treated fairly and justly within the legal system and be assured of equal treatment before the law and equal enjoyment of the rights available to all other citizens. The right to equality is important for a second reason. Equality or lack of it affects the capacity of one to enjoy many other rights.<sup>43</sup>

96. In accordance with the foregoing, States must respect and ensure human rights in light of the general basic principle of equality and non-discrimination. Any discriminatory treatment with regard to the protection and exercise of human rights entails the international responsibility of the State.

* * *

The fundamental nature of the principle of equality and non-discrimination

97. The Court now proceeds to consider whether this is a jus cogens principle.

98. Originally, the concept of jus cogens was linked specifically to the law of treaties. As jus cogens is formulated in Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, "[a] treaty is void if, at the time of its conclusion, it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law." Likewise, Article 64 of the Convention refers to jus cogens superviniente, when it indicates that "[i]f a new peremptory norm of general international law emerges, any existing treaty which is in conflict with that norm becomes void and terminates." Jus cogens has been developed by international case law and legal writings.<sup>44</sup>

99. In its development and by its definition, jus cogens is not limited to treaty law. The sphere of jus cogens has expanded to encompass general international law, including all legal acts. Jus cogens has also emerged in the law of the international responsibility of States and, finally, has had an influence on the basic principles of the international legal order.

<sup>42</sup> U.N., Human Rights Committee, General Comment 15, The situation of aliens in accordance with the Covenant, 11/04/86, CCPR/C/27, paras. 1, 2, 4, 7, 8 and 9.

100. In particular, when referring to the obligation to respect and ensure human rights, regardless of which of those rights are recognized by each State in domestic or international norms, the Court considers it clear that all States, as members of the international community, must comply with these obligations without any discrimination; this is intrinsically related to the right to equal protection before the law, which, in turn, derives "directly from the oneness of the human family and is linked to the essential dignity of the individual."<sup>45</sup> The principle of equality before the law and non-discrimination permeates every act of the powers of the State, in all their manifestations, related to respecting and ensuring human rights. Indeed, this principle may be considered peremptory under general international law, inasmuch as it applies to all States, whether or not they are party to a specific international treaty, and gives rise to effects with regard to third parties, including individuals. This implies that the State, both internationally and in its domestic legal system, and by means of the acts of any of its powers or of third parties who act under its tolerance, acquiescence or negligence, cannot behave in a way that is contrary to the principle of equality and non-discrimination, to the detriment of a determined group of persons.

101. Accordingly, this Court considers that the principle of equality before the law, equal protection before the law and non-discrimination belongs to jus cogens, because the whole legal structure of national and international public order rests on it and it is a fundamental principle that permeates all laws. Nowadays, no legal act that is in conflict with this fundamental principle is acceptable, and discriminatory treatment of any person, owing to gender, race, color, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, nationality, age, economic situation, property, civil status, birth or any other status is unacceptable. This principle (equality and non-discrimination) forms part of general international law. At the existing stage of the development of international law, the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination has entered the realm of jus cogens.

Effects of the principle of equality and non-discrimination

102. This general obligation to respect and guarantee human rights, without any discrimination and on an equal footing, has various consequences and effects that are defined in specific obligations. The Court will now refer to the effects derived from this obligation.

103. In compliance with this obligation, States must abstain from carrying out any action that, in any way, directly or indirectly, is aimed at creating situations of de jure or de facto discrimination. This translates, for example, into the prohibition to enact laws, in the broadest sense, formulate civil, administrative or any other measures, or encourage acts or practices of their officials, in implementation or interpretation of the law that discriminate against a specific group of persons because of their race, gender, color or other reasons.

104. In addition, States are obliged to take affirmative action to reverse or change discriminatory situations that exist in their societies to the detriment of a specific group of persons. This implies the special obligation to protect that the State must exercise with regard to acts and practices of third parties who, with its tolerance or acquiescence, create, maintain or promote discriminatory situations.

<sup>45</sup> Legal Status and Human Rights of the Child, supra note 1, para. 45; Proposed Amendments to the Naturalization Provisions of the Constitution of Costa Rica, supra note 32, para. 55.

105. Because of the effects derived from this general obligation, States may only establish objective and reasonable distinctions when these are made with due respect for human rights and in accordance with the principle of applying the norm that grants protection to the individual.

106. Non-compliance with these obligations gives rise to the international responsibility of the State, and this is exacerbated insofar as non-compliance violates peremptory norms of international human rights law. Hence, the general obligation to respect and ensure human rights binds States, regardless of any circumstance or consideration, including a person's migratory status.

107. One of the results of the foregoing is that, in their domestic laws, States must ensure that all persons have access, without any restriction, to a simple and effective recourse that protects them in determining their rights, irrespective of their migratory status.

108. In this respect, the Inter-American Court has indicated that:

[...] the absence of an effective remedy to violations of the rights recognized by the Convention is itself a violation of the Convention by the State Party in which the remedy is lacking. In that sense, it should be emphasized that, for such a remedy to exist, it is not sufficient that it be provided for by the Constitution or by law or that it be formally recognized, but rather it must be truly effective in establishing whether there has been a violation of human rights and in providing redress. A remedy which proves illusory because of the general conditions prevailing in the country, or even in the particular circumstances of a given case, cannot be considered effective. That could be the case, for example, when practice has shown its ineffectiveness: when the Judicial Power lacks the necessary independence to render impartial decisions or the means to carry out its judgments; or in any other situation that constitutes a denial of justice, as when there is an unjustified delay in the decision; or when, for any reason, the alleged victim is denied access to a judicial remedy<sup>46</sup>.

109. This general obligation to respect and ensure the exercise of rights has an erga omnes character. The obligation is imposed on States to benefit the persons under their respective jurisdictions, irrespective of the migratory status of the protected persons. This obligation encompasses all the rights included in the American Convention and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, including the right to judicial guarantees. In this way, the right of access to justice for all persons is preserved, understood as the right to effective jurisdictional protection.

110. Finally, as regards the second part of the fourth question of the request for an advisory opinion (supra para. 4), the contents of the preceding paragraphs are applicable to all the OAS Member States. The effects of the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination encompass all States, precisely because this principle, which belongs to the realm of jus cogens and is of a peremptory character, entails obligations erga omnes of protection that bind all States and give rise to effects with regard to third parties, including individuals.

VII APPLICATION OF THE PRINCIPLE OF EQUALITY AND NON-DISCRIMINATION TO MIGRANTS

111. Now that the jus cogens character of the principle of equality and non-discrimination and the effects that derive from the obligation of States to respect and guarantee this principle have been established, the Court will refer to migration in general and to the application of this principle to undocumented migrants.

112. Migrants are generally in a vulnerable situation as subjects of human rights; they are in an individual situation of absence or difference of power with regard to non-migrants (nationals or residents). This situation of vulnerability has an ideological dimension and occurs in a historical context that is distinct for each State and is maintained by de jure (inequalities between nationals and aliens in the laws) and de facto (structural inequalities) situations. This leads to the establishment of differences in their access to the public resources administered by the State.

113. Cultural prejudices about migrants also exist that lead to reproduction of the situation of vulnerability; these include ethnic prejudices, xenophobia and racism, which make it difficult for migrants to integrate into society and lead to their human rights being violated with impunity.

114. In this respect, the resolution on "Protection of migrants" of the General Assembly of the United Nations is pertinent, when it indicates that it is necessary to recall "the situation of vulnerability in which migrants frequently find themselves, owing, inter alia, to their absence from their State of origin and to the difficulties they encounter because of differences of language, custom and culture, as well as the economic and social difficulties and obstacles for the return to their States of origin of migrants who are non-documented or in an irregular situation."<sup>47</sup> The General Assembly also expressed its concern "at the manifestations of violence, racism, xenophobia and other forms of discrimination and inhuman and degrading treatment against migrants, especially women and children, in different parts of the world."<sup>48</sup> Based on these considerations, the General Assembly reiterated:

the need for all States to protect fully the universally recognized human rights of migrants, especially women and children, regardless of their legal status, and to provide humane treatment, particularly with regard to assistance and protection [...].<sup>49</sup>

115. The Court is aware that, as the General Assembly of the United Nations also observed, "among other factors, the process of globalization and liberalization, including the widening economic and social gap between and among many countries and the marginalization of some countries in the global economy, has contributed to large flows of peoples between and among countries and to the intensification of the complex phenomenon of international migration.”<sup>50</sup>

116. With regard to the foregoing, the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development held in Cairo in 1994 indicated that:

International economic imbalances, poverty and environmental degradation, combined with the absence of peace and security, human rights violations and the varying degrees of development of judicial and democratic institutions are all factors affecting international migration. Although most international migration flows occur between neighbouring countries, interregional migration, particularly that directed to developed countries, has been growing.<sup>51</sup>

117. In accordance with the foregoing, the international community has recognized the need to adopt special measures to ensure the protection of the human rights of migrants.<sup>52</sup>

118. We should mention that the regular situation of a person in a State is not a prerequisite for that State to respect and ensure the principle of equality and non-discrimination, because, as mentioned above, this principle is of a fundamental nature and all States must guarantee it to their citizens and to all aliens who are in their territory. This does not mean that they cannot take any action against migrants who do not comply with national laws. However, it is important that, when taking the corresponding measures, States should respect human rights and ensure their exercise and enjoyment to all persons who are in their territory, without any discrimination owing to their regular or irregular residence, or their nationality, race, gender or any other reason.

119. Consequently, States may not discriminate or tolerate discriminatory situations that prejudice migrants. However, the State may grant a distinct treatment to documented migrants with respect to undocumented migrants, or between migrants and nationals, provided that this differential treatment is reasonable, objective, proportionate and does not harm human rights. For example, distinctions may be made between migrants and nationals regarding ownership of some political rights. States may also establish mechanisms to control the entry into and departure from their territory of undocumented migrants, which must always be applied with strict regard for the guarantees of due process and respect for human dignity. In this respect, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights has indicated that it:

does not wish to call into question nor is it calling into question the right of any State to take legal action against illegal immigrants and deport them to their countries of origin, if the competent courts so decide. It is however of the view that it is unacceptable to deport individuals without giving them the possibility to plead their case before the competent national courts as this is contrary to the spirit and letter of the Charter [the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights] and international law.<sup>53</sup>

120. When dealing with the principle of equality and non-discrimination, the continuing development of international law should be borne in mind. In this respect, the Inter-American Court has indicated, in its Advisory Opinion OC-16/99 on The Right to Information on Consular Assistance within the Framework of the Guarantees of Due Process of Law, that:

The corpus juris of international human rights law comprises a set of international instruments of varied content and juridical effects (treaties, conventions, resolutions and declarations). Its dynamic evolution has had a positive impact on international law in affirming and building up the latter's faculty for regulating relations between States and the human beings within their respective jurisdictions. This Court, therefore, must adopt the proper approach to consider this question in the context of the evolution of the fundamental rights of the human person in contemporary international law.<sup>54</sup>

121. Due process of law is a right that must be ensured to all persons, irrespective of their migratory status. In this respect, in the above-mentioned Advisory Opinion on The Right to Information on Consular Assistance within the Framework of the Guarantees of Due Process of Law, this Court indicated that:

[...] for "the due process of law" a defendant must be able to exercise his rights and defend his interests effectively and in full procedural equality with other defendants. It is important to recall that the judicial process is a means to ensure, insofar as possible, an equitable resolution of a difference. The body of procedures, of diverse character and generally grouped under the heading of the due process, is all calculated to serve that end. To protect the individual and see justice done, the historical development of the judicial process has introduced new procedural rights. An example of the evolutive nature of judicial process are the rights not to incriminate oneself and to have an attorney present when one speaks. These two rights are already part of the laws and jurisprudence of the more advanced legal systems. And so, the body of judicial guarantees given in Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights has evolved gradually. It is a body of judicial guarantees to which others of the same character, conferred by various instruments of international law, can and should be added.

and that:

To accomplish its objectives, the judicial process must recognize and correct any real disadvantages that those brought before the bar might have, thus observing the principle of equality before the law and the courts and the corollary principle prohibiting discrimination. The presence of real disadvantages necessitates countervailing measures that help to reduce or eliminate the obstacles and deficiencies that impair or diminish an effective defense of one's interests. Absent those countervailing measures, widely recognized in various stages of the proceeding, one could hardly say that those who have the disadvantages enjoy a true opportunity for justice and the benefit of the due process of law equal to those who do not have those disadvantages.<sup>55</sup>

Legal Status and Human Rights of the Child, supra note 1, paras. 97 and 115; and Hilaire, Constantine and Benjamin et al. case, supra note 28, para. 146.*

122. The Court considers that the right to due process of law should be recognized within the framework of the minimum guarantees that should be provided to all migrants, irrespective of their migratory status. The broad scope of the preservation of due process applies not only ratione materiae but also ratione personae, without any discrimination.

123. As this Court has already indicated, due legal process refers to the:

all the requirement that must be observed in the procedural stages in order for an individual to be able to defend his rights adequately vis-à-vis any [...] act of the State that could affect them. That it to say, due process of law must be respected in any act or omission on the part of the State bodies in a proceeding, whether of an administrative, punitive or jurisdictional nature.<sup>56</sup>

124. Likewise, the Court has observed<sup>57</sup> that the list of minimum guarantees of due legal process applies when determining rights and obligations of "civil, labor, fiscal or any other nature."<sup>58</sup> This shows that due process affects all these areas and not only criminal matters.

125. In addition, it is important to establish, as the Court has already done, that "[i]t is a human right to obtain all the guarantees which make it possible to arrive at fair decisions, and the administration is not exempt from its duty to comply with this obligation. The minimum guarantees must be observed in administrative processes whose decision may affect the rights of persons."<sup>59</sup>

126. The right to judicial protection and judicial guarantees is violated for several reasons: owing to the risk a person runs, when he resorts to the administrative or judicial instances, of being deported, expelled or deprived of his freedom, and by the negative to provide him with a free public legal aid service, which prevents him from asserting the rights in question. In this respect, the State must guarantee that access to justice is genuine and not merely formal. The rights derived from the employment relation subsist, despite the measures adopted.

127. Now that the Court has established what is applicable for all migrants, it will examine the rights of migrant workers, in particular those who are undocumented.

VIII RIGHTS OF UNDOCUMENTED MIGRANT WORKERS

128. As established in the glossary (supra para. 69), a migrant worker is any persons who is to be engaged, is engaged or has been engaged in a remunerated activity in a State of which he or she is not a national. This definition is embodied in the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (Article 2(1)).

129. Migrant workers who are documented or in a regular situation are those who have been "authorized to enter, stay and engage in a remunerated activity in the State of employment"<sup>60</sup> pursuant to the law of the State and to international agreements to which that State is a party."<sup>61</sup> Workers who are undocumented or in an irregular situation do not comply with the conditions that documented workers do; in other words, they are not authorized to enter, stay and engage in a remunerated activity in a State of which they are not nationals.

130. In continuation, the Court will rule on undocumented migrant workers and their rights.

131. The vulnerability of migrant workers as compared to national workers must be underscored. In this respect, the preamble to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families refers to "the situation of vulnerability in which migrant workers and members of their families frequently find themselves owing, among other things, to their absence from their State of origin and to the difficulties they may encounter arising from their presence in the State of employment."

132. Nowadays, the rights of migrant workers "have not been sufficiently recognized everywhere"<sup>62</sup> and, furthermore, undocumented workers "are frequently employed under less favorable conditions of work than other workers and [...] certain employers find this an inducement to seek such labor in order to reap the benefits of unfair competition."<sup>63</sup>

133. Labor rights necessarily arise from the circumstance of being a worker, understood in the broadest sense. A person who is to be engaged, is engaged or has been engaged in a remunerated activity, immediately becomes a worker and, consequently, acquires the rights inherent in that condition. The right to work, whether regulated at the national or international level, is a protective system for workers; that is, it regulates the rights and obligations of the employee and the employer, regardless of any other consideration of an economic and social nature. A person who enters a State and assumes an employment relationship, acquires his labor human rights in the State of employment, irrespective of his migratory status, because respect and guarantee of the enjoyment and exercise of those rights must be made without any discrimination.

134. In this way, the migratory status of a person can never be a justification for depriving him of the enjoyment and exercise of his human rights, including those related to employment. On assuming an employment relationship, the migrant acquires rights as a worker, which must be recognized and guaranteed, irrespective of his regular or irregular status in the State of employment. These rights are a consequence of the employment relationship.

135. It is important to clarify that the State and the individuals in a State are not obliged to offer employment to undocumented migrants. The States and individuals, such as employers, can abstain from establishing an employment relationship with migrants in an irregular situation.

136. However, if undocumented migrants are engaged, they immediately become possessors of the labor rights corresponding to workers and may not be discriminated against because of their irregular situation. This is very important, because one of the principal problems that occurs in the context of immigration is that migrant workers who lack permission to work are engaged in unfavorable conditions compared to other workers.

137. It is not enough merely to refer to the obligations to respect and ensure the labor human rights of all migrant workers, but it should be noted that these obligations have different scopes and effects for States and third parties.

138. Employment relationships are established under both public law and private law and, in both spheres, the State plays an important part.

139. In the context of an employment relationship in which the State is the employer, the latter must evidently guarantee and respect the labor human rights of all its public officials, whether nationals or migrants, documented or undocumented, because non-observance of this obligation gives rise to State responsibility at the national and the international level.

140. In an employment relationship regulated by private law, the obligation to respect human rights between individuals should be taken into consideration. That is, the positive obligation of the State to ensure the effectiveness of the protected human rights gives rise to effects in relation to third parties (erga omnes). This obligation has been developed in legal writings, and particularly by the Drittwirkung theory, according to which fundamental rights must be respected by both the public authorities and by individuals with regard to other individuals.

141. As of the first contentious cases on which it ruled, the Inter-American Court has outlined the application of the effects of the American Convention in relation to third parties (erga omnes), having indicated that:

Thus, in principle, any violation of rights recognized by the Convention carried out by an act of public authority or by persons who use their position of authority is imputable to the State. However, this does not define all the circumstances in which a State is obligated to prevent, investigate and punish human rights violations, or all the cases in which the State might be found responsible for an infringement of those rights. An illegal act which violates human rights and which is initially not directly imputable to a State (for example, because it is the act of a private person or because the person responsible has not been identified ) can lead to international responsibility of the State, not because of the act itself, but because of the lack of due diligence to prevent the violation or to respond to it as required by the Convention.<sup>64</sup>

142. Likewise, by means of provisional measures, this Court has ordered the protection of members of communities and persons that provide services to them, from threats of death and harm to personal safety allegedly caused by the State and third parties.<sup>65</sup> Likewise, on another occasion, it ordered the protection of persons detained in prison, owing to deaths and threats in that prison, many of which were allegedly perpetrated by the prisoners themselves.<sup>66</sup>

143. The European Court of Human Rights recognized the applicability of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms to relationships between individuals, when it declared that the State had violated this Convention because it had restricted freedom of association, by establishing that membership in determined trade unions was a necessary condition for the petitioners in the case to be able to continue their employment in a company, since the restriction imposed was not "necessary in a democratic society."<sup>67</sup> In another case, the European Court considered that, although the object of Article 8 of this Convention (the right to respect of private and family life) was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, the State must abstain from such interference; in addition to this obligation to abstain, there are positive obligations inherent in effective respect for private or family life that may involve the adoption of measures designed to secure respect for private life even in the sphere of the relations of individuals among themselves. In this case, the European Court found that the State had violated the right to private and family life of a young mentally disabled woman who had been sexually assaulted, because she could not file criminal proceedings against her aggressor due to a vacuum in the criminal legislation.<sup>68</sup>

144. The United Nations Committee on Human Rights has considered that the right to freedom and personal safety, embodied in article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, imposes on the State the obligation to take adequate steps to ensure the protection of an individual threatened with death. In other words, an interpretation of this article that authorized States parties to ignore threats against the life of persons subject to their jurisdiction, even though they have not been detained or arrested by State agents, would deprive the guarantees established in the Covenant of any effectiveness.<sup>69</sup> The Committee also considered that the State has the obligation to protect the rights of members of minorities against attacks by individuals. Likewise, in its General Comments Nos. 18 and 20 on non-discrimination and article 7 of the said Covenant, the Committee has indicated that States parties must punish public officials, other persons acting in the name of the State, and individuals, who carry out torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, and should also “take affirmative action in order to diminish or eliminate conditions which cause or help to perpetuate discrimination prohibited by the Covenant.”

145. In addition, in a decision on the obligation to investigate acts of racial discrimination and violence against persons of another color or ethnic origin committed by individuals, the Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination indicated that “when threats of racial violence are made, and especially when they are made in public and by a group, it is incumbent upon the State to investigate with due diligence and expedition.”<sup>70</sup>

146. In this way, the obligation to respect and ensure human rights, which normally has effects on the relations between the State and the individuals subject to its jurisdiction, also has effects on relations between individuals. As regards this Advisory Opinion, the said effects of the obligation to respect human rights in relations between individuals is defined in the context of the private employment relationship, under which the employer must respect the human rights of his workers.

147. The obligation to respect and guarantee the human rights of third parties is also based on the fact that it is the State that determines the laws that regulate the relations between individuals and, thus, private law; hence, it must also ensure that human rights are respected in these private relationships between third parties; to the contrary, the State may be responsible for the violation of those rights.

148. The State is obliged to respect and ensure the labor human rights of all workers, irrespective of their status as nationals or aliens, and not to tolerate situations of discrimination that prejudice the latter in the employment relationships established between individuals (employer-worker). The State should not allow private employers to violate the rights of workers, or the contractual relationship to violate minimum international standards.

149. This State obligation arises from legislation that protects workers – legislation based on the unequal relationship between both parties – which therefore protects the workers as the more vulnerable party. In this way, States must ensure strict compliance with the labor legislation that provides the best protection for workers, irrespective of their nationality, social, ethnic or racial origin, and their migratory status; therefore they have the obligation to take any necessary administrative, legislative or judicial measures to correct de jure discriminatory situations and to eradicate discriminatory practices against migrant workers by a specific employer or group of employers at the local, regional, national or international level.

150. On many occasions migrant workers must resort to State mechanisms for the protection of their rights. Thus, for example, workers in private companies have recourse to the Judiciary to claim the payment of wages, compensation, etc. Also, these workers often use State health services or contribute to the State pension system. In all these cases, the State is involved in the relationship between individuals as a guarantor of fundamental rights, because it is required to provide a specific service.

151. In labor relations, employers must protect and respect the rights of workers, whether these relations occur in the public or private sector. The obligation to respect the human rights of migrant workers has a direct effect on any type of employment relationship, when the State is the employer, when the employer is a third party, and when the employer is a natural or legal person.

152. The State is thus responsible for itself, when it acts as an employer, and for the acts of third parties who act with its tolerance, acquiescence or negligence, or with the support of some State policy or directive that encourages the creation or maintenance of situations of discrimination.

153. In summary, employment relationships between migrant workers and third party employers may give rise to the international responsibility of the State in different ways. First, States are obliged to ensure that, within their territory, all the labor rights stipulated in its laws – rights deriving from international instruments or domestic legislation – are recognized and applied. Likewise, States are internationally responsible when they tolerate actions and practices of third parties that prejudice migrant workers, either because they do not recognize the same rights to them as to national workers or because they recognize the same rights to them but with some type of discrimination.

154. Furthermore, there are cases in which it is the State that violates the human rights of the workers directly. For example, when it denies the right to a pension to a migrant worker who has made the necessary contributions and fulfilled all the conditions that were legally required of workers, or when a worker resorts to the corresponding judicial body to claim his rights and this body does not provide him with due judicial protection or guarantees.

155. The Court observes that labor rights are the rights recognized to workers by national and international legislation. In other words, the State of employment must respect and guarantee to every worker the rights embodied in the Constitution, labor legislation, collective agreements, agreements established by law (convenios-ley), decrees and even specific and local practices, at the national level; and, at the international level, in any international treaty to which the State is a party.

156. This Court notes that, since there are many legal instruments that regulate labor rights at the domestic and the international level, these regulations must be interpreted according to the principle of the application of the norm that best protects the individual, in this case, the worker. This is of great importance, because there is not always agreement either between the different norms or between the norms and their application, and this could prejudice the worker. Thus, if a domestic practice or norm is more favorable to the worker than an international norm, domestic law should be applied. To the contrary, if an international instrument benefits the worker, granting him rights that are not guaranteed or recognized by the State, such rights should be respected and guaranteed to him.

157. In the case of migrant workers, there are certain rights that assume a fundamental importance and yet are frequently violated, such as: the prohibition of obligatory or forced labor; the prohibition and abolition of child labor; special care for women workers, and the rights corresponding to: freedom of association and to organize and join a trade union, collective negotiation, fair wages for work performed, social security, judicial and administrative guarantees, a working day of reasonable length with adequate working conditions (safety and health), rest and compensation. The safeguard of these rights for migrants has great importance based on the principle of the inalienable nature of such rights, which all workers possess, irrespective of their migratory status, and also the fundamental principle of human dignity embodied in Article 1 of the Universal Declaration, according to which "[a]ll human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood."

158. This Court considers that the exercise of these fundamental labor rights guarantees the enjoyment of a dignified life to the worker and to the members of his family. Workers have the right to engage in a work activity under decent, fair conditions and to receive a remuneration that allows them and the members of their family to enjoy a decent standard of living in return for their labor. Likewise, work should be a means of realization and an opportunity for the worker to develop his aptitudes, capacities and potential, and to realize his ambitions, in order to develop fully as a human being.

159. On many occasions, undocumented migrant workers are not recognized the said labor rights. For example, many employers engage them to provide a specific service for less than the regular remuneration, dismiss them because they join unions, and threaten to deport them. Likewise, at times, undocumented migrant workers cannot even resort to the courts of justice to claim their rights owing to their irregular situation. This should not occur; because, even though an undocumented migrant worker could face deportation, he should always have the right to be represented before a competent body so that he is recognized all the labor rights he has acquired as a worker.

160. The Court considers that undocumented migrant workers, who are in a situation of vulnerability and discrimination with regard to national workers, possess the same labor rights as those that correspond to other workers of the State of employment, and the latter must take all necessary measures to ensure that such rights are recognized and guaranteed in practice. Workers, as possessors of labor rights, must have the appropriate means of exercising them.

IX STATE OBLIGATIONS WHEN DETERMINING MIGRATORY POLICIES IN LIGHT OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS FOR THE PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

161. The Court will now refer to State obligations when determining migratory policies solely in light of international instruments for the protection of human rights.

162. In this section of the Advisory Opinion, the Court will consider whether the fact that the American States subordinate and condition the observance of human rights to their migratory policies is compatible with international human rights law; it will do so in light of the international obligations arising from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and other obligations of an erga omnes nature.

163. The migratory policy of a State includes any institutional act, measure or omission (laws, decrees, resolutions, directives, administrative acts, etc.) that refers to the entry, departure or residence of national or foreign persons in its territory.

164. In this respect, the Durban Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance urged all States to “[t]o review and, where necessary, revise their immigration laws, policies and procedures with a view to eliminating any element of racial discrimination and make them consistent with State obligations by virtue of international human rights instruments.”<sup>71</sup> Likewise, in paragraph 9 of the Commission on Human Rights resolution 2001/5 on racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance, “States were asked to review and, where necessary, revise any immigration policies which are inconsistent with international human rights instruments, with a view to eliminating all discriminatory policies and practices against migrants.”

165. This Court considers it essential to mention the provisions of Article 27 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which, when referring to domestic law and the observance of treaties, provides that: “[a] party may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty.”

166. In other words, when ratifying or acceding to an international treaty, States manifest their commitment in good faith to guarantee and respect the rights recognized therein. In addition, the States must adapt their domestic law to the applicable international law.

167. In this regard, the Inter-American Court has indicated that the general obligation set forth in Article 2 of the American Convention implies the adoption of measures to eliminate norms and practices of any nature that entail the violation of the guarantees set forth in the Convention, and the issuance of norms and the development of practices leading to the effective observance of the said guarantees.<sup>72</sup> In this respect, the Court has indicated that:

Under the law of nations, a customary rule prescribes that a State that has concluded an international agreement must introduce in its domestic laws whatever changes are needed to ensure execution of the obligations it has undertaken. This principle has been accepted universally, and is supported by case law. The American Convention establishes the general obligation of each State Party to adapt its domestic laws to the provisions of the said Convention, so as to guarantee the rights embodied therein. This general obligation of the State Party implies that measures of domestic law must be effective (the “effet utile” principle). This means that the State must adopt all necessary measures to ensure that the provisions of the Convention are complied with effectively in its domestic laws, as required by Article 2 of the Convention. Such measures are only effective when the State adapts its actions to the protective norms of the Convention.<sup>73</sup>

168. The goals of migratory policies should take into account respect for human rights. Likewise, migratory policies should be implemented respecting and guaranteeing human rights. As indicated above (supra paras. 84, 89, 105 and 119), the distinctions that the States establish must be objective, proportionate and reasonable.

169. Considering that this Opinion applies to questions related to the legal aspects of migration, the Court deems it appropriate to indicate that, in the exercise of their power to establish migratory policies, it is licit for States to establish measures relating to the entry, residence or departure of migrants who will be engaged as workers in a specific productive sector of the State, provided this is in accordance with measures to protect the human rights of all persons and, in particular, the human rights of the workers. In order to comply with this requirement, States may take different measures, such as granting or denying general work permits or permits for certain specific work, but they must establish mechanisms to ensure that this is done without any discrimination, taking into account only the characteristics of the productive activity and the individual capability of the workers. In this way, the migrant worker is guaranteed a decent life, he is protected from the situation of vulnerability and uncertainty in which he usually finds himself, and the local or national productive process is organized efficiently and adequately.

170. Therefore, it is not admissible for a State of employment to protect its national production, in one or several sectors by encouraging or tolerating the employment of undocumented migrant workers in order to exploit them, taking advantage of their condition of vulnerability in relation to the employer in the State or considering them an offer of cheaper labor, either by paying them lower wages, denying or limiting their enjoyment or exercise of one or more of their labor rights, or denying them the possibility of filing a complaint about the violation of their rights before the competent authority.

171. The Inter-American Court has established the obligation of States to comply with every international instrument applicable to them. However, when referring to this State obligation, it is important to note that this Court considers that not only should all domestic legislation be adapted to the respective treaty, but also State practice regarding its application should be adapted to international law. In other words, it is not enough that domestic laws are adapted to international law, but the organs or officials of all State powers, whether the Executive, the Legislature or the Judiciary, must exercise their functions and issue or implement acts, resolutions and judgments in a way that is genuinely in accordance with the applicable international law.

172. The Court considers that the State may not subordinate or condition the observance of the principle of equality before the law and non-discrimination to achieving the goals of its public policies, whatever these may be, including those of a migratory nature. This general principle must be respected and guaranteed always. Any act or omission to the contrary is inconsistent with the international human rights instruments.

X OPINION

173. For the foregoing reasons,

THE COURT,*DECIDES

unanimously, that it is competent to issue this Advisory Opinion.

AND IS OF THE OPINION

unanimously,

1. That States have the general obligation to respect and ensure the fundamental rights. To this end, they must take affirmative action, avoid taking measures that limit or infringe a fundamental right, and eliminate measures and practices that restrict or violate a fundamental right.

2. That non-compliance by the State with the general obligation to respect and ensure human rights, owing to any discriminatory treatment, gives rise to international responsibility.

3. That the principle of equality and non-discrimination is fundamental for the safeguard of human rights in both international law and domestic law.

4. That the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination forms part of general international law, because it is applicable to all States, regardless of whether or not they are a party to a specific international treaty. At the current stage of the development of international law, the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination has entered the domain of jus cogens.

5. That the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination, which is of a peremptory nature, entails obligations erga omnes of protection that bind all States and generate effects with regard to third parties, including individuals.

6. That the general obligation to respect and guarantee human rights binds States, regardless of any circumstance or consideration, including the migratory status of a person.

7. That the right to due process of law must be recognized as one of the minimum guarantees that should be offered to any migrant, irrespective of his migratory status. The broad scope of the preservation of due process encompasses all matters and all persons, without any discrimination.

8. That the migratory status of a person cannot constitute a justification to deprive him of the enjoyment and exercise of human rights, including those of a labor-related nature. When assuming an employment relationship, the migrant acquires rights that must be recognized and ensured because he is an employee, irrespective of his regular or irregular status in the State where he is employed. These rights are a result of the employment relationship.

9. That the State has the obligation to respect and guarantee the labor human rights of all workers, irrespective of their status as nationals or aliens, and not to tolerate situations of discrimination that are harmful to the latter in the employment relationships established between private individuals (employer-worker). The State must not allow private employers to violate the rights of workers, or the contractual relationship to violate minimum international standards.

10. That workers, being possessors of labor rights, must have all the appropriate means to exercise them. Undocumented migrant workers possess the same labor rights as other workers in the State where they are employed, and the latter must take the necessary measures to ensure that this is recognized and complied with in practice.

11. That States may not subordinate or condition observance of the principle of equality before the law and non-discrimination to achieving their public policy goals, whatever these may be, including those of a migratory character.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE A.A. CANÇADO TRINDADE

1. I vote in favour of the adoption of the present Advisory Opinion of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, which in my view constitutes a significant contribution to the evolution of the International Law of Human Rights. Four years ago, the Inter-American Court delivered the historical Advisory Opinion n. 16, on The Right to Information on Consular Assistance in the Framework of the Guarantees of the Due Process of Law (of 01.10.1999), truly pioneering, which has served as inspiration for the international case-law in statu nascendi on the matter<sup>74</sup>. Today, in the same line of reasoning oriented to the needs and imperatives of protection of the human person, and at the end of an advisory procedure which has generated the greatest mobilization of all its history<sup>75</sup>, the Inter-American Court adopts another Advisory Opinion, of great transcendence and again pioneering, on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, becoming the first international tribunal to pronounce on this matter as a central theme.

2. Even more significant is the fact that the matter dealt with in the present Advisory Opinion, requested by Mexico and adopted by the Court by unanimity, is of direct interest of wide segments of the population in distinct latitudes, - in reality, of millions of human beings<sup>76</sup>, - and constitutes in our days a legitimate preoccupation of the whole international community, and - I would not hesitate to add, - of the humanity as a whole. Given the transcendental importance of the points examined by the Inter-American Court in the present Advisory Opinion, I feel obliged to leave on the records, as the juridical foundation of my position on the matter, the reflections which I allow myself to develop in this Concurring Opinion, particularly in relation with the aspects which appear to me to deserve special attention.

3. Such aspects correspond to those which I see it fit to name as follows: a) the civitas maxima gentium and the universality of the human kind; b) the disparities of the contemporary world and the vulnerability of the migrants; c) the reaction of the universal juridical conscience; d) the construction of the individual subjective right of asylum; e) the position and the role of the general principles of Law; f) the fundamental principles as substratum of the legal order itself; g) the principle of equality and non-discrimination in the International Law of Human Rights; h) the emergence, the content and the scope of the jus cogens; e i) the emergence and the scope of the obligations erga omnes of protection (their horizontal and vertical dimensions). I proceed to present my reflections on each of those aspects.

<sup>74</sup>. The Inter-American Court, by means of its Advisory Opinion n. 16 referred to, - delivered at the end of an advisory procedure which generated a wide mobilization (with eight intervening States, besides the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights and several non-governmental organizations and individuals), - was in fact the first international tribunal to warn that non-compliance with Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 1963 took place to the detriment not only of a State Party to such Convention but also to the affected human beings.

<sup>75</sup>. Besides a considerable volume of written documents, such procedure counted on two public hearings, the first one having taken place at the headquarters of the Inter-American Court in San José of Costa Rica, in February 2003, and the second one having been held for the first time in its history outside its headquarters, in Santiago of Chile, in June 2003. The procedure counted on the participation of twelve accredited States (among which five intervening States in the public hearings), the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, one agency of the United Nations (the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees - UNHCR), and nine entities of civil society and of the Academy of several countries in the region, besides the Central American Council of Attorneys-General (Procuradores) of Human Rights.

<sup>76</sup>. According to the International Organization for Migrations (I.O.M.), from 1965 to 2000 the total of migrants in the world more than doubled, raising from 75 millions to 175 millions of persons; and the projections for the future are in the sense that this total will increase even much further in the following years; I.O.M., World Migration 2003 - Managing Migration: Challenges and Responses for People on the Move, Geneva, I.O.M., 2003, pp. 4-5; and cf. also, in general, P. Stalker, Workers without Frontiers, Geneva/London, International Labour Organization (I.L.O.)/L. Rienner Pubs., 2000, pp. 26-33.

I. The Civitas Maxima Gentium and the Universality of the Human Kind.

4. The consideration of a question such as the one with which the present Advisory Opinion is concerned cannot make abstraction of the teachings of the so-called founding fathers of International Law, in whose thinking one can find reflections which remain remarkably up-to-date, and are of importance to the legal settlement also of contemporary problems. Francisco de Vitoria, for example, in his pioneering and decisive contribution to the notion of prevalence of the rule of law, upheld, in his acclaimed Relecciones Teológicas (1538-1539), that the legal order binds everyone - both the rulers as well as the ruled ones, and that the international community (totus orbis) has primacy over the will of each individual State<sup>77</sup>. In the conception of Vitoria, the great preacher of Salamanca, the droit des gens rules an international community constituted of human beings organized socially in States and coextensive with humanity itself<sup>78</sup>; the reparation of the violations of (human) rights reflects an international necessity fulfilled by the droit des gens, with the same principles of justice applying both to the States and to the individuals or peoples who form them<sup>79</sup>.

5. In the outlook of Francisco Suárez (author of the treatise De Legibus ac Deo Legislatore, 1612), the droit des gens reveals the unity and universality of the human kind; the States have necessity of a legal system which regulates their relations, as members of the universal society<sup>80</sup>. To Suárez, the droit des gens comprised, besides the nations and the peoples, the human kind as a whole, and the law fulfilled the needs of regulation of all the peoples and human beings. Both Suárez and Vitoria formulated the bases of the international duties of the States vis-à-vis also the foreigners, in the framework of the general principle of the freedom of circulation and of communications, in the light of the universality of the human kind<sup>81</sup>. The human sociability and solidarity were present in the whole doctrinal construction and the contribution of the Spanish theologians to the formation of the droit des gens.

6. In its turn, the conception of the jus gentium of Hugo Grotius - whose work, above all the De Jure Belli ac Pacis (1625), lies in the origins of the international law, as the discipline came to be known, - was always attentive to the role of civil society. To Grotius, the State is not an end in itself, but rather a means to secure the social order in conformity with human intelligence, so as to improve the "common society which embraces all mankind"<sup>82</sup>. In Grotian thinking, every legal norm - whether of domestic law or of the law of nations - creates rights and obligations for the persons to whom they are directed; the forerunning work of Grotius, already in the first half of the XVIIth century, thus admits the possibility of the international protection of human rights against the State itself<sup>83</sup>.

7. Pursuant to the Grotian outlook, the human being and his welfare occupy a central position in the system of international relations; the standards of justice apply vis-à-vis both the States and the individuals<sup>84</sup>. To Grotius, natural law derives from human reason, is a "dictate of the recta ratio", and imposes limits to the "unrestricted conduct of the rulers of the States"<sup>85</sup>. The States are subjected to Law, and International Law has "an objective, independent foundation, and above the will of the States"<sup>86</sup>. The considerations of justice thus permeate the legal rules and foster their evolution<sup>87</sup>.

8. Even before Grotius, Alberico Gentili (author of De Jure Belli, 1598) sustained, by the end of the XVIth century, that it is Law that governs the relationship among the members of the universal societas gentium<sup>88</sup>. Samuel Pufendorf (author of De Jure

The subjects have rights vis-à-vis the sovereign State, which cannot demand obedience from its citizens in an absolute way (imperative of the common good); thus, in the vision of Grotius, the raison d'État has limits, and the absolute conception of this latter becomes applicable in the international as well as internal relations of the State. Ibid., pp. 219-220 and 217.

<sup>83</sup>. Ibid., pp. 243 and 221. One has, thus, to bear always in mind the true legacy of the Grotian tradition of international law. The international community cannot pretend to base itself on the voluntas of each State individually. In face of the historical necessity to regulate the relations of the emerging States, Grotius sustained that international relations are subject to legal norms, and not to the "raison d'État", which is incompatible with the very existence of the international community: this latter cannot do without Law. (Cf., in this respect, the classical study by Hersch Lauterpacht, "The Grotian Tradition in International Law", 23 British Year Book of International Law (1946) pp. 1-53).

Naturae et Gentium, 1672), in his turn, defended "the subjection of the legislator to the higher law of human nature and of reason"<sup>89</sup>. On his part, Christian Wolff (author of Jus Gentium Methodo Scientifica Pertractatum, 1749), pondered that just as the individuals ought, in their association in the State, promote the common good, in its turn the State has the correlative duty to seek its perfection<sup>90</sup>.

9. Regrettably, the reflections and the vision of the so-called founding fathers of international law, which conceived it as a truly universal system<sup>91</sup>, were to be overtaken by the emergence of legal positivism, which, above all as from the XIXth century, personified the State conferring upon it a "will of its own", reducing the rights of the human beings to those that the State "granted" to them. The consent or the "will" of the States (voluntarist positivism) became the criterion predominant in international law, denying jus standi to the individuals, to the human beings<sup>92</sup>. This rendered difficult the understanding of the international society, and debilitated the International Law itself, reducing it to an inter-State law, no more above but between sovereign States<sup>93</sup>. The disastrous consequences of this distortion are widely known.

10. The great legacy of the juridical thinking of the second half of the XXth century, in my view, has been, by means of the emergence and evolution of the International Law of Human Rights, the rescue of the human being as subject of both domestic and international law, endowed with international juridical capacity<sup>94</sup>. But this advance comes together with new needs of protection, to require new answers on the part of the corpus juris of protection itself. This is the case, in our days, of the persons affected by the problems raised in the present advisory procedure before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

11. To face these problems, one has, in my understanding, to keep in mind the most valuable legacy of the founding fathers of International Law. Already in the epoch of the elaboration and dissemination of the classic works by F. Vitoria and F. Suárez (supra), the jus gentium had liberated itself from its origins of private law (of Roman law), so as to apply universally to all human beings: the societas gentium was expression of the fundamental unity of the human kind, forming a true societas ac communicatio, as no

State was self-sufficient<sup>95</sup>. The new jus gentium, thus conceived also to fulfil human needs, paved the way to the conception of a universal international law<sup>96</sup>.

12. The belief came to prevail - expressed in the work of H. Grotius - that it was possible to capture the content of this law by means of reason: natural law, from which the law of nations derived, was a dictate of reason<sup>97</sup>. In the framework of the new universalist conception the jus communicationis was affirmed, as from F. Vitoria, erecting the freedom of movement and of commercial exchange as one of the pillars of the international community itself<sup>98</sup>. The controls of the ingress of aliens were to become manifest only in a much more recent historical epoch (cf. par. 35, infra), pari passu with the great migratory fluxes and the development of the law of refugees and displaced persons<sup>99</sup>.

II. The Disparities of the So-Called "Globalized" World, the Forced Displacements and the Vulnerability of the Migrants.

13. Nowadays, in an era of great migrations, an increasingly greater distance from the universalist ideal of the societas gentium of the founding fathers of International Law can regrettably be found. The migrations and the forced displacements, intensified in the decade of the nineties<sup>100</sup>, have been characterized particularly by the disparities in the conditions of living between the place of origin and that of destiny of the migrants. Their causes are multiple: economic collapse and unemployment, collapse in the public services (education, health, among others), natural disasters, armed conflicts, repression and persecution, systematic violations of human rights, ethnic rivalries and xenophobia, violence of distinct forms, personal insecurity<sup>101</sup>.

14. The migrations and forced displacements, with the consequent uprootedness of so many human beings, bring about traumas: suffering of the abandonment of home (at times with family separation or disruption), loss of the profession and of personal goods, arbitrarinesses and humiliations imposed by frontier authorities and security officers, loss of the mother tongue and of the cultural roots, cultural shock and permanent feeling of injustice<sup>102</sup>. The so-called "globalization" of the economy has been accompanied by the persistence (and in various parts of the world of the aggravation) of the disparities within nations and in the relations among them, it being found, e.g., a remarkable contrast between the poverty of the countries of origin of the migrations (at times clandestine ones) and the incomparably greater resources of the countries sought by the migrants.

15. Migrants, - particularly the undocumented ones, - as pointed out by the Inter-American Court in the present Advisory Opinion n. 18 (pars. 112-113 and 131-132), - are often in a situation of great vulnerability, in face of the risk of precarious employment (in the so-called "informal economy"), of labour exploitation, of unemployment itself and the perpetuation in poverty (also in the receiving country)<sup>103</sup>. The "administrative fault" of indocumentation has been "criminalized" in intolerant and repressive societies, aggravating even further the social problems which they suffer. The drama of the refugees and the undocumented migrants can only be effectively dealt with amidst a spirit of true human solidarity towards the victimized<sup>104</sup>. Definitively, only the firm determination of the reconstruction of the international community on the basis of human solidarity can lead to the overcoming of all those traumas.

16. In times of the so-called "globalization" (the misleading and false neologism which is en vogue in our days), the frontiers have been opened to the capitals, goods and services, but have sadly closed themselves to human beings. The neologism which suggests the existence of a process which would comprise everyone and in which everyone would participate, in reality hides the fragmentation of the contemporary world, and the social exclusion and marginalization of increasingly greater segments of the population. The material progress of some has been accompanied by the contemporary (and clandestine) forms of labour exploitation of many (the exploitation of undocumented migrants, forced prostitution, traffic of children, forced and slave labour), amidst the proven increase of poverty and social exclusion and marginalization<sup>105</sup>.

17. As aggravating circumstances, the State abdicates from its ineluctable social function, and irresponsibly handles to the "market" the essential public services (education and health, among others), transforming them in merchandises to which the access becomes increasingly more difficult for the majority of the individuals. These latter come to be regarded as mere agents of economic production<sup>106</sup>, amidst the sad mercantilization of human relations. Moreover, one detects today, together with an aggravation of the intolerance and xenophobia, a regrettable erosion of the right of asylum<sup>107</sup> (cf. infra, pars. 36-42). All these dangerous developments point towards a new world without values, which adheres to, without further reflection, to an unsustainable model.

<sup>106</sup>. Already in the mid-XXth century, distinct trends of the philosophical thinking of the time rebelled themselves against the dehumanization of social relations and the depersonalization of the human being,

18. Within the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, in my Concurring Opinion in the case of the Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Provisional Measures of Protection, Resolution of 18.08.2000) I pointed out that, in this beginning of the XXIst century, "the human being has been placed by himself in a scale of priority inferior to that attributed to the capitals and goods, - in spite of all the struggles of the past, and of all the sacrifices of the previous generations" (par. 4). With the uprootedness, - I proceeded, - one loses his spontaneous means of expression and of communication with the outside world, as well as the possibility of developing a project of life: "it is, thus, a problem which concerns the whole human kind, which encompasses the totality of human rights, and, above all, which has a spiritual dimension which cannot be forgotten, with all more reason in the dehumanized world of our days" (par. 6).

19. And, on this first aspect of the problem, I concluded that "the problem of uprootedness ought to be considered in a framework of action oriented towards the eradication of social exclusion and extreme poverty, - if one indeed wishes to reach its causes and not only to fight its symptoms. One ought to develop responses to the new needs of protection, even if they are not literally contemplated in the international instruments in force of protection of the human being" (par. 7). I added my understanding to the effect that "the question of the uprootedness ought to be dealt with not in the light of State sovereignty, but rather as a problem of a truly global dimension that it is (requiring a concert at universal level), bearing in mind the obligations erga omnes of protection" (par. 10).

20. In spite of the uprootedness being "a problem which affects the whole international community", - I kept on warning, -

"continues to be treated in an atomized way by the States, with the outlook of a legal order of a purely inter-State character, without apparently realizing that the Westphalian model of such international order is, already for a long time, definitively exhausted. It is precisely for this reason that the States cannot exempt themselves from responsibility in view of the global character of the uprootedness, since they continue to apply to this latter their own criteria of domestic legal order. (...) The State ought, thus, to respond for the consequences of the practical application of the norms and public policies that it adopts in the matter of migration, and in particular of the procedures of deportations and expulsions" (pars. 11-12).

III. The Reaction of the Universal Juridical Conscience (Opinio Juris Communis).

generated by the technocratic society, which treats the individual as a simple agent of material production; cf., e.g., inter alia, Roger Garaudy, Perspectivas do Homem, 3rd. ed., Rio de Janeiro, Ed. Civilização Brasileira, 1968, pp. 141-143 and 163-165.

21. On this last point, it may be recalled that, in 1986, the International Law Association adopted (in its 62nd. session, in Seoul), by consensus, the Declaration of Principles of International Law on Mass Expulsion, in which, inter alia, it expressed its "deep concern" with "the vulnerabilidad and precarious position of many minorities", including migrant workers (preamble). It sustained that the principle of non-refoulement, as the "cornerstone of the protection of refugees", is applicable, even if these latter have been legally admitted in the receiving State, and independently of having arrived individually or massively (principle 12). And it urged the States to put an end to any expulsion of a massive character and to establish systems of "early warning" (principle 19)<sup>108</sup>. Four years later, the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (1990) came to prohibit measures of collective expulsion, and to determine that each case of expulsion should be "examined and decided individually", in accordance with the law (Article 22).

22. Moreover, one ought to underline that the common denominator of the cycle of the World Conferences of the United Nations of the end of the XXth century<sup>109</sup> has been precisely the special attention dedicated to the conditions of living of the population (particularly of the vulnerable groups, in special necessity of protection, which certainly include the undocumented migrants), it resulting therefrom the universal recognition of the necessity to place human beings, definitively, in the centre of all process of development<sup>110</sup>. In the present Advisory Opinion n. 18, the Inter-American Court has taken into account the final documents of two of those Conferences (pars. 116 and 164), namely, the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development (Cairo, 1994), and the Declaration and Programme of Action of the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance (Durban, 2001).

23. The final documents of the recent World Conferences of the United Nations (held in the period from 1992 until 2001) reflect the reaction of the universal juridical conscience to the attempts against, and affronts to, the dignity of the human person all over the world. In reality, the aforementioned cycle of World Conferences has consolidated the recognition of "the legitimacy of the concern of the whole international community with the violations of human rights everywhere and at any moment"<sup>111</sup>. As I saw it fit to point out in my Concurring Opinion in the Advisory Opinion n. 16 of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights on The Right to Information on Consular Assistance in the Framework of the Guarantees of the Due Process of Law (1999), <sup>108</sup>. The Declaration referred to was to relate mass expulsion in given circumstances to the concept of "international crime" (principle 9).

To these followed, more recently, the Rome Conference on the Statute of the International Criminal Court, 1998; and the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance, Durban, 2001.

"the very emergence and consolidation of the corpus juris of the International Law of Human Rights are due to the reaction of the universal juridical conscience to the recurrent abuses committed against human beings, often warranted by positive law: with that, the Law (el Derecho) came to the encounter of the human being, the ultimate addressee of its norms of protection" (pars. 3-4).

24. Further on, in the aforementioned Concurring Opinion in the Advisory Opinion n. 16, I mentioned the recognition, in our days, of the necessity to reconstitute to the human being the central position, "as subject of domestic as well as international law" (par. 12), and added:

- "With the dismythification of the postulates of voluntarist positivism, it became evident that one can only find an answer to the problem of the foundations and the validity of general international law in the universal juridical conscience, starting with the assertion of the idea of an objective justice. As a manifestation of this latter, the rights of the human being have been affirmed, emanating directly from international law, and not subjected, thereby, to the vicissitudes of domestic law" (par. 14).

25. In fact, the atrocities and abuses which have victimized in the last decades millions of human beings everywhere, increasing the contingents of refugees, displaced persons and undocumented migrants in search of survival, have definitively awakened the universal juridical conscience for the pressing need to reconceptualize the very bases of the international legal order. But it is urgently necessary, in our days, to stimulate this awakening of the universal juridical conscience to intensify the process of humanization of contemporary international law<sup>112</sup>. Also in the case Bámaca Velásquez versus Guatemala (Judgment as to the merits, of 25 November 2000), I saw it fit to insist on the point; in my Separate Opinion, I reaffirmed that:

"(..) the existence of a universal juridical conscience (corresponding to the opinio juris comunis) (...) constitutes, in my understanding, the material source par excellence (beyond the formal sources) of the whole law of nations (droit des gens), responsible for the advances of the human kind not only at the juridical level but also at the spiritual one" (par. 16, and cf. par. 28).

26. There is pressing need to seek, therefrom, the reconstruction of the law of nations, in this beginning of the XXIst century, on the basis of a new paradigm, no longer State-centered, but rather placing the human being in a central position<sup>113</sup> and bearing in mind the problems which affect the humanity as a whole. The existence of the human person, which has its root in the spirit, was the point of departure, e.g., of the reflections of Jacques Maritain, to whom the true progress meant the ascent of conscience, of the equality and communion of all in human nature, thus accomplishing the common good and justice<sup>114</sup>. The conceptual evolution examined herein gradually moved, as from the sixties, from the international to the universal dimension, under the great influence of the development of the International Law of Human Rights itself. The recognition of certain fundamental values, on the basis of a sense of objective justice, has much contributed to the formation of the opinio juris communis<sup>115</sup> in the last decades of the XXth century, which one ought to keep on developing in our days in order to face the new necessities of protection of the human being.

<sup>112</sup>. As I stressed in my already mentioned Concurring Opinion in the case of the Haitians and Dominicans of Haitian Origin in the Dominican Republic (Provisional Measures of Protection, 2000) before the Inter-American Court (par. 12).

<sup>113</sup>. It is a true reconstruction; more than half a century ago, Maurice Bourquin warned that "ni au point de vue de son objet, ni même au point de vue de sa structure, le droit des gens ne peut se définir comme un droit inter-étatique. (...) L'être humain (...) y occupe une place de plus en plus considérable"; M. Bourquin, "L'humanisation du droit des gens", in La technique et les principes du Droit public - Études en l'honneur de Georges Scelle, vol. I, Paris, LGDJ, 1950, pp. 53-54.

27. Despite the fact that the international legal order of this beginning of the XXIst century is, in fact, far too distant from the ideals of the founding fathers of the droit des gens (supra), instead of capitulating before this reality, one has rather to face it. It could be argued that the contemporary world is entirely distinct from that of the epoch of F. Vitoria, F. Suárez and H. Grotius, who supported a civitas maxima ruled by the droit des gens, the new jus gentium reconstructed by them. But even if one is before two different world scenarios (no one would deny it), the human aspiration is the same, that is, that of the construction of an international order applicable both to the States (and international organizations) and to human beings (the droit des gentes), in conformity with certain universal standards of justice, without whose observance there cannot be social peace. One has, thus, to endeavour in a true return to the origins of the law of nations, whereby the current historical process of humanization of International Law will be fostered.

28. If it is certain that the drama of the numerous refugees, displaced persons and undocumented migrants presents today an enormous challenge to the labour of international protection of the rights of the human person, it is also certain that the reactions to the violations of their fundamental rights are today immediate and forceful, by virtue precisely of the awakening of the universal juridical conscience for the necessity of prevalence of the dignity of the human person in any circumstances. The emergence and assertion of jus cogens in contemporary International Law (cf. infra) constitute, in my view, an unequivocal manifestation of this awakening of the universal juridical conscience.

29. In the course of the procedure before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights pertaining to the present Advisory Opinion, the requesting State, Mexico, singled out with pertinence the importance of the so-called Martens clause as an element of interpretation of Law (above all humanitarian), which could also provide support to the migrants. In this respect, I believe it possible to go even further: at least one trend of the contemporary legal doctrine has come to characterize the Martens clause as source of general international law itself<sup>116</sup>; and no one would dare today to deny that the

The liberation from material servitudes was necessary, for the development above all of the life of the spirit; in his vision, humankind only progresses when it advances towards human emancipation (ibid., pp. 50 and 105-108). In affirming that "the human person transcends the State", as it has "a destiny superior to time", he added that "each human person has the right to decide by herself as to what concerns her personal destiny (...)" (ibid., pp. 79-82, and cf. p. 104).

"laws of humanity" and the "dictates of the public conscience" invoked by the Martens clause belong to the domain of jus cogens<sup>117</sup>. The aforementioned clause, as a whole, has been conceived and reiteratedly affirmed, ultimately, to the benefit of the whole human kind, remaining thus quite up-to-date. It can be considered, - as I have affirmed in a recent work, - as expression of the raison de l'humanité imposing limits to the raison d'État<sup>118</sup>.

30. One of the significant contributions of the present Advisory Opinion n. 18 on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants lies in its determination of the wide scope of the due process of law (par. 124). In its earlier Advisory Opinion n. 16 on The Rights to Information on Consular Assistance in the Framework of the Guarantees of the Due Process of Law, the Inter-American Court underlined the historical evolution of the due process of law in the sense of its expansion ratione materiae (pars. 117 and 119), whilst, in the present Advisory Opinion n. 18, it examines such expansion ratione personae, and determines that "the right to the due process ought to be recognized in the framework of the minimal guarantees which ought to be granted to every migrant, irrespective of its migratory status" (par. 122). The correct conclusion of the Court, in the sense that "the wide scope of the intangibility of the due process comprises all matters and all persons, without any discrimination" (resolatory point n. 7), fulfills effectively the exigencies and the imperatives of the common good.

III. The Construction of the Individual Subjective Right to Asylum.

31. The very notion of the common good ought to be considered not in relation to a social milieu in abstracto, but rather to the totality of human beings who compose it, irrespectively of the political or migratory status of each one. Human rights much transcend the so-called "rights of the citizenship", "granted" by the State. The common good, as Jacques Maritain used to rightly sustain, is erected upon the human person herself (rather than individuals or citizens), and the concept of personality encompasses the deepest dimension of the being or of the spirit<sup>119</sup>. The common good is "common" because it projects and reflects itself in the human persons<sup>120</sup>. If it were require of certain individuals to capitulate before the social whole, to deprive themselves of the rights which are inherent to them (as a result, e.g., of their political or migratory status), to entrust their destiny entirely to the artificial social whole, in such circumstances the very notion of common good would completely disappear<sup>121</sup>.

32. In spite of the recognition nowadays of the right to emigrate, as a corollary of the right to freedom of movement, the States have not yet recognized the correlative right to immigrate, creating thus a situation which has generated incongruencies and arbitrarinesses, very often affecting negatively the due process of law<sup>122</sup>. In perpetuating, in this way, the uncertainties and inconsistencies, the States responsible for this situation have failed to act at the level of their responsibilities as subjects of International Law, the droit des gens. And have created more problems not only for numerous individuals directly affected but also, ultimately, for themselves, in contributing indirectly to the formation of the fluxes of "illegal" immigrants.

33. On the other hand, there are also the States which have sought solutions to the problem. The fact that 12 accredited States participated in the advisory procedure before the Inter-American Court which preceded the adoption of the present Advisory Opinion on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants is symptomatic of the common purpose of the search for such solutions. From the analysis of the arguments presented, throughout the procedure referred to, by Mexico, Honduras, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Costa Rica and Canada, one detects, in a reassuring way, as common denominator, the recognition that the States have the obligation to respect and to ensure respect for the human rights of all persons under their respective jurisdictions, in the light of the principle of equality and non-discrimination, irrespectively of whether such persons are nationals or foreigners.

34. Moreover, in the same procedure before the Inter-American Court pertaining to the present Advisory Opinion, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), in emphasizing the situation of vulnerability of the migrants, referred to the existing link between migration and asylum, and added with lucidity that the nature and complexity of the contemporary displacements render it difficult to establish a clear line of distinction between refugees and migrants. This situation, encompassing millions of human beings<sup>123</sup>, reveals a new dimension of the protection of the human being in certain circumstances, and underlines the capital importance of the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination, to which I shall refer further on (cf. pars. 58-63, infra).

35. It is, in reality, a great challenge to the safeguard of the rights of the human person in our days, at this beginning of the XXIst century. In this respect, it is not to pass unnoticed that, as already pointed out, the jus communicationis and the freedom of movement, proclaimed since the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, lasted for a long time, and only in a much more recent historical epoch restrictions to them began to manifest themselves (cf. par. 9, supra). In fact, only in the second half of the XIXth century, when immigration definitively penetrated in the sphere of domestic law, it came to suffer successive and systematic restrictions<sup>124</sup>. Hence the growing importance of the prevalence of certain rights, as the right of access to justice (the right to justice lato sensu), the right to private and family life (comprising family unity), the right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment; this is a theme which transcends the purely State or inter-State dimension<sup>125</sup>, and that has to be approached in the light of the fundamental human rights of the migrant workers, including the undocumented ones.

36. Nor is it to pass unnoticed, in the present context, the more lucid doctrine which led, in the past, to the configuration of the institute of the territorial asylum. In fact, the historia juris of the institute of asylum has been marked by the tension between its characterization as a discretionary faculty of the State, or rather as a subjective individual right. It is not my purpose to begin to examine in depth this institute in the present Concurring Opinion, but rather to refer to a pertinent aspect of the matter object of the present Advisory Opinion of the Inter-American Court. In recent years, with the growing restrictions in the use by the States of the self-attributed faculty of migratory control, it is the first trend which seems de facto to prevail<sup>126</sup>, to the detriment of the thesis of the subjective individual right.

37. One may recall that the frustrated Conference of the United Nations on Territorial Asylum, held in Geneva in 1977, did not succeed to obtain a universal consensus as to the asylum as an individual right, and, ever since, State unilateralism has become synonymous of the precariousness of asylum<sup>127</sup>. The "protectionist" measures of the industrialized States (in relation to "undesirable" migratory fluxes) have moved away from the best legal doctrine and generated distortions in the practice relating to the institute of asylum<sup>128</sup>.

38. Nevertheless, the International Law of Human Rights has reacted to respond to the new necessities of protection. And it is perfectly possible that we are witnessing the beginnings of formation of a true human right to the humanitarian assistance<sup>129</sup>. We are before two distinct approaches to the international legal order, one centered in the State, the other (which I firmly sustain) centred in the human person. It would be in conformity with this latter the characterization of the right of asylum as a subjective individual right. The corpus juris of the International Law of Human Rights contains, in fact, elements which can lead to the construction (or rather the reconstruction) of a true individual right to asylum<sup>130</sup>.

<sup>126</sup>. In this, as in other areas of the international legal order, an underlying and recurring tension has persisted between the conventional obligations in force, undertaken by the States and the insistence of these latter on keeping on searching for themselves the satisfaction of their own interests, as perceived by them. Cf., e.g., J.-G. Kim and J.M. Howell, Conflict of International Obligations and State Interests, The Hague, Nijhoff, 1972, pp. 68 and 112.

39. It ought to be kept in mind that the institute of asylum is much wider than the meaning attributed to asylum in the ambit of Refugee Law (i.e., amounting to refuge). Furthermore, the institute of asylum (general kind to which belongs the type of territorial asylum, in particular) precedes historically for a long time the corpus juris itself of Refugee Law. The aggiornamento and a more integral comprehension of territorial asylum, - which could be achieved as from Article 22 of the American Convention on Human Rights, - could come in aid of the undocumented migrant workers, putting an end to their clandestine and vulnerable situation. To that end, it would have to be (or again to become) recognized precisely as a subjective individual right<sup>131</sup>, and not as a discretionary faculty of the State.

40. Likewise, as to the refugees, one "recognizes", rather than "grants", their statute; it is not a simple "concession" on the part of the States. Nevertheless, the terminology nowadays commonly employed is a reflection of the steps backwards which we regrettably witness. For example, there are terms, like "temporary protection", which seem to imply a relativization of the integral protection granted in the past. Other terms (e.g., "refugees in orbit", "displaced persons in transit", "safe havens", "convention plus") seem to be endowed with a certain degree of surrealism, appearing frankly open to all sorts of interpretation (including the retrograde one), instead of attaching to that which is essentially juridical and to the conquests of law in the past. It is perhaps symptomatic of our days that one has to invoke the conquests of the past in order to stop or avoid even greater steps backwards in the present and in the future. At this moment - of shadows, rather than light - in which we live, one has at least to preserve the advances achieved by past generations in order to avoid a greater evil.

41. It is not to be forgotten, thus, that there have been doctrinal manifestations which sustain the process of gradual formation of the individual right of asylum, at the same time that they affirm the character of jus cogens of the principle of non-refoulement<sup>132</sup>. This posture appears in accordance with the thinking of the founding fathers of International Law: while Francisco de Vitoria sustained the jus communicationis, Francisco Suárez, in the same line of thinking, visualized a "subjective natural right", proper of the jus gentium, in a sense comparable to that utilized in our days<sup>133</sup> in the conceptual universe of the International Law of Human Rights.

<sup>131</sup>. In the same year of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, whilst discussions within the Institut de Droit International were taking place as to whether asylum was a right of the State or of the individual (cf. Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International (1948) pp. 199-201 and 204-205), in face of the uncertainties manifested G. Scelle commented that "asylum had become a question of universal ordre public" (ibid., p. 202). Two years later, the theme was again discussed in the same Institut (in the debates of 07-08.09.1950): on the basis of the impact of human rights in International Law (cf. Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International (1950)-II, p. 228), the possibility was raised of the establishment de lege ferenda of an obligation of the States to grant asylum. Despite a certain opposition to the idea, fortunately there were those jurists who supported the establishment of such State obligation, or at least who took it seriously; cf. ibid., pp. 204 and 221 (F. Castberg), p. 200 (H. Lauterpacht), pp. 204-205 (P. Guggenheim), and p. 225 (A. de La Pradelle).

42. There will of course always be the "realists" who will object that the subjective individual right of asylum is an utopia. To them I would retort that the alternative to utopia is desperation. More than three decades ago (and the situation of the millions of uprooted persons has only aggravated ever since) L. Legaz y Lacambra warned that:

"The existence of 'proletarian peoples' amounts to a nonsense if the idea of an international community is affirmed; and, above all, it constitutes an injustice when there already are peoples who have achieved a phase of maximum development and economic, social and cultural level, which sharply contrasts with the situation of misery of so many others. [...There is an] obligation of the international community towards their more destitute and needed members who, in this dimension, embody also the idea of the humanity as subject of Law.

Thus, in the evolution of Law, a human - humanist and humanitarian (...) - sense becomes evident: it ceases to be a coercive order of the State and it incorporates more and more some forms of social life open to the growing communication between all men (...). All that, and only that, is what gives meaning to the juridical personalization and subjectivization of humankind"<sup>134</sup>.

43. In his biography of Erasmus of Rotterdam (1467-1536), Stefan Zweig, one of the more lucid writers of the XXth century, singled out, in the precious legacy of the great humanist, the tolerance, to put and end, without violence, to the conflicts which divide the human beings and the peoples. Erasmus, pacifist and defender of the freedom of conscience, identified in the intolerance the hereditary evil of human society, which should be eradicated. Although the ideal of Erasmus has not been accomplished until now, it was not thereby devoid of value. In the penetrating words of S. Zweig,

"An idea which does not come to be materialized is, for that reason, invincible, since it is no longer possible to prove its falseness; that which is necessary, even though its realization is delayed, not therefore is less necessary; quite on the contrary, only the ideals which have not become worn-out and committed by the realization continue acting in each generation as an element of moral impulse. Only the ideas which have not been complied with return eternally. (...) What Erasmus, the disillusioned old man, and, notwithstanding, not excessively disillusioned, left to us as legacy (...) was not anything else but the renewed and dreamed of very old wish of all the religions and myths of a future and continued humanization of humanity and of a triumph of the reason (...). And even if the cautious and cold calculating persons can turn to demonstrate always the lack of future of erasmism, and even if the reality seems to give them each time the reason, those spirits will always be necessary who point out that which links among themselves the peoples beyond that which separates them and that renews faithfully, in the heart of humankind, the idea of a future age of a higher human feeling"<sup>135</sup>.

IV. The Position and Role of the General Principles of Law.

44. Every legal system has fundamental principles, which inspire, inform and conform their norms. It is the principles (derived etymologically from the Latin principium) that, evoking the first causes, sources or origins of the norms and rules, confer cohesion, coherence and legitimacy upon the legal norms and the legal system as a whole. It is the general principles of law (prima principia) which confer to the legal order (both national and international) its ineluctable axiological dimension; it is they that reveal the values which inspire the whole legal order and which, ultimately, provide its foundations themselves. This is how I conceive the presence and the position of the principles in any legal order, and their role in the conceptual universe of Law.

45. The general principles of law entered into the legal culture, with historical roots which go back, e.g., to Roman law, and came to be linked to the very conception of the democratic State under the rule of law (Estado democrático de Derecho), above all as from the influence of the enlightenment thinking (pensée illuministe). Despite the apparent indifference with which they were treated by legal positivism (always seeking to demonstrate a "recognition" of such principles in the positive legal order), and despite the lesser attention dispensed to them by the shallow and reductionist legal doctrine of our days, nevertheless we will never be able to prescind from them.

46. From the prima principia the norms and rules emanate, which in them find their meaning. The principles are thus present in the origins of Law itself. The principles show us the legitimate ends to seek: the common good (of all human beings, and not of an abstract collectivity), the realization of justice (at both national and international levels), the necessary primacy of law over force, the preservation of peace. Contrary to those who attempt - in my view in vain - minimize them, I understand that, if there are no principles, nor is there truly a legal system. Without the principles, the "legal order" simply is not accomplished, and ceases to exist as such.

47. The identification of the basic principles has accompanied pari passu the emergence and consolidation of all the domains of Law, and all its branches (civil, civil procedural, criminal, criminal procedural, administrative, constitutional, and so forth). This is so with Public International Law<sup>136</sup>, with the International Law of Human Rights, with International Humanitarian Law<sup>137</sup>, with the International Law of Refugees<sup>138</sup>, with International Criminal Law<sup>139</sup>. However circumscribed or specialized a legal regime may

E.g., principle of the prohibition of the use or threat of force, principle of the peaceful settlement of international disputes, principle of non-intervention in inter-State relations, principle of the juridical equality of the States, principle of the equality of rights and the self-determination of peoples, principle of good faith in the compliance with the international obligations, principle of international cooperation. be, its basic principles can there be found, as, e.g., in International Environmental Law<sup>140</sup>, in the Law of the Sea<sup>141</sup>, in the Law of Outer Space<sup>142</sup>, among many others. As pointed out before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights during the procedure pertaining to the present Advisory Opinion on The Legal Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, the International Labour Organization (ILO) itself has sought to identify the "fundamental principles and rights in work", by means of a Declaration adopted in June 1998.

48. Some of the basic principles are proper of certain areas of Law, others permeate all areas. The corpus of legal norms (national or international) operates moved by the principles, some of them ruling the relations themselves between human beings and the public power (as the principles of natural justice, of the rule of law [Estado del Derecho], of the rights of the defence, of the right to the natural judge, of the independence of justice, of the equality of all before the law, of the separation of powers, among others). The principles enlighten the path of the legality and the legitimacy. Hence the continuous and eternal "rebirth" of natural law, which has never disappeared.

49. It is no longer a return to the classic natural law, but rather the affirmation or restoration of a standard of justice, heralded by the general principles of law, whereby positive law is evaluated<sup>143</sup>. In sustaining that opinio juris is above the will of the State, F. Castberg has correctly pondered that:

"the experiences of our own age, with its repellent cruelties and injustice under cover of positive law, have in fact confirmed the conviction that something - even though it is only certain fundamental norms - must be objectively valid. This may consist of principles which appear to be valid for every human community at any time (...). The law can and should itself move forward in the direction of greater expedience and justice, and to a higher level of humanity"<sup>144</sup>.

E.g., principle of the common heritage of mankind (ocean floors), principle of the peaceful uses of the sea, principle of the equality of rights (in the high seas), principle of the peaceful settlement of disputes, principles of the freedom of navigation and of innocent passage, principles of equidistance and of special circumstances (delimitation of maritime spaces).

This "eternal return" to jusnaturalism has been, thus, recognized by the jusinternationalists themselves<sup>145</sup>, much contributing to the affirmation and consolidation of the primacy, in the order of the values, of the obligations pertaining to human rights, vis-à-vis the international community as a whole<sup>146</sup>. What is certain is that there is no Law without principles, which inform and conform the legal norms and rules.

50. To the extent that a new corpus juris is formed, one ought to fulfill the pressing need of identification of its principles. Once identified, these principles ought to be observed, as otherwise the application of the norms would be replaced by a simple rhetoric of "justification" of the "reality" of the facts; if there is truly a legal system, it ought to operate on the basis of its fundamental principles, as otherwise we would be before a legal vacuum, before the simple absence of a legal system<sup>147</sup>.

51. The general principles of law have contributed to the formation of normative systems of protection of the human being. The recourse to such principles has taken place, at the substantive level, as a response to the new necessities of protection of the human being. No one would dare to deny their relevance, e.g., in the historical formation of the International Law of Refugees, or, more recently, in the emergence, in recent years, of the international normative framework pertaining to the (internally) displaced persons<sup>148</sup>. No one would dare to deny their incidence - to quote another example - in the legal regime applicable to foreigners. In this respect, it has been suggested that certain general principles of law apply specifically or predominantly to foreigners, e.g., the principle of the unity of the family, and the principle of the prohibition of extradition whenever this latter presents risks of violations of human rights<sup>149</sup>.

V. The Fundamental Principles as Substratum of the Legal Order Itself.

52. The general principles of law have thus inspired not only the interpretation and the application of the legal norms, but also the law-making process itself of its elaboration. They reflect the opinio juris, which, in its turn, lies on the basis of the formation of Law<sup>150</sup>, and is decisive for the configuration of the jus cogens<sup>151</sup> (cf. infra). Such principles mark presence at both national and international levels. If, in the framework of this latter, one has insisted, in the chapter of the (formal) "sources" of international law on the general principles "recognized" in foro domestico, this was due to an endeavour to proceed with juridical security<sup>152</sup>, as such principles are present in every and any legal system (cf. supra), at national or international levels. In sum, in every legal system (of domestic or international law) the general principles mark presence, assuring its coherence and disclosing its axiological dimension. When one moves away from the principles, one incurs into distortions, and grave violations of the legal order including the positive one.

53. There are general principles of law which appear truly fundamental, to the point of identifying themselves with the very foundations of the legal system<sup>153</sup>. Such fundamental principles reveal the values and ultimate ends of the international legal order, guide it and protect it against the incongruencies of the practice of States, and fulfill the necessities of the international community<sup>154</sup>. Such principles, as expression of the "idea of justice", have a universal scope; they do not emanate from the "will" of the States, but are endowed with an objective character which impose them to the observance of all the States<sup>155</sup>. In this way, - as lucidly points out A. Favre, - they secure the unity of Law, as from the idea of justice, to the benefit of the whole humanity<sup>156</sup>.

54. It is evident that these principles of law do not depend on the "will", nor on the "agreement", nor on the consent, of the subjects of law; the fundamental rights of the human person being the "necessary foundation of every legal order", which knows no frontiers, the human being is titulaire of inalienable rights, which do not depend on his statute of citizenship or any other circumstance<sup>157</sup>. In the domain of the International Law of Human Rights, an example of general principles of law lies in the principle of the dignity of the human being; another lies in that of the inalienability of the rights inherent to the human being. In the present Advisory Opinion on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, the Inter-American Court has expressly referred to both principles (par. 157).

55. Moreover, in its jurisprudence constante, the Inter-American Court, in interpreting and applying the American Convention, has also always resorted to the general principles of law<sup>158</sup>. Among these principles, those which are endowed with a truly fundamental character, which I here refer to, in reality form the substratum of the legal order itself, revealing the right to the Law of which are titulaires all human beings<sup>159</sup>, independently of their statute of citizenship or any other circumstance. And it could not be otherwise, as human rights are universal and inherent to all human beings, while the rights of citizenship vary from country to country and encompass only those which the positive law of the State considers citizens, not protecting, thus, the undocumented migrants. As vehemently proclaimed, in a rare moment of enlightenment, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 (Article 1),

- "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood".

56. The safeguard and prevalence of the principle of respect of the dignity of the human person human are identified with the end itself of Law, of the legal order both national and international. By virtue of this fundamental principle, every person ought to be respected by the simple fact of belonging to the human kind, independently of her condition, of her statute of citizenship, or any other circumstance<sup>160</sup>. The principle of the inalienability of the rights inherent to the human being, in its turn, is identified with a basic premise of the construction of the whole corpus juris of the International Law of Human Rights.

57. There can be no doubts as to the extent of the fundamental principles referred to, and, if by chance there were doubts, it is the function of the jurist to clarify them and not to perpetuate them, so that Law may accomplish its fundamental function of giving justice<sup>161</sup>. It is here that the ineluctable recourse to the general principles of Law can help to dispel any doubt which may be raised as to the scope of the individual rights. It is certain that the norms are the ones juridically binding, but when they move away from the principles, their application leads to breaches of individual rights and to serious injustices (e.g., the discrimination de jure).

58. In reality, when we recognize the fundamental principles which conform the substratum of the legal order itself, we enter into the domain of the jus cogens, of the peremptory law (cf. infra). In fact, it is perfectly possible to visualize the peremptory law (the jus cogens) as identified with the general principles of law of material order which are guarantors of the legal order itself, of its unity, integrity and cohesion<sup>162</sup>. Such principles are indispensable (the jus necessarium), are prior and superior to the will; in expressing an "idea of objective justice" (the natural law), they are consubstantial to the international legal order itself<sup>163</sup>.

VI. The Principle of Equality and Non-Discrimination in the International Law of Human Rights.

59. In the ambit of the International Law of Human Rights, another of the fundamental principles, although not sufficiently developed by doctrine to date, but which permeates its whole corpus juris, is precisely the principle of equality and non-discrimination. Such principle, set forth, as recalled by the Inter-American Court in the present Advisory Opinion (par. 86), in numerous international instruments of human rights, assumes special importance in relation with the protection of the rights of the migrants in general, and of the undocumented migrant workers in particular. Besides the constitutive element of equality, - essential to the rule of law (Estado de Derecho) itself<sup>164</sup>, - the other constitutive element, that of non-discrimination, set forth in so many international instruments<sup>165</sup>, assumes capital importance in the exercise of the protected rights. The discrimination is defined, in the sectorial Conventions aiming at its elimination, essentially as any distinction, exclusion, restriction or limitation, or privilege, to the detriment of the human rights enshrined therein<sup>166</sup>. The prohibition of discrimination comprises both the totality of those rights, at substantive level, as well as the conditions of their exercise, at procedural level.

60. On this point the contemporary doctrine is settled, in considering the principle of equality and non-discrimination as one of the pillars of the International Law of Human Rights<sup>167</sup>, and also as an element integrating general or customary international law<sup>168</sup>. Ultimately, the corpus juris of International Law, "must, by definition, be the same for all subjects of the international community"<sup>169</sup>. It is not my intention to dwell into greater depth, in this Concurring Opinion, upon the international case-law on the matter, as it is already analyzed in details in one of my works<sup>170</sup>. I here limit myself, thus, to point out, in sum, that the case-law of the organs of international supervision of human rights has oriented itself, in a general way, - like the present Advisory Opinion n. 18 of the Inter-American Court (pars. 84 and 168), - in the sense of considering discriminatory any distinction which does not have a legitimate purpose, or an objective and reasonable justification, and which does not keep a relation of proportionality between its purpose and the means employed.

61. Under the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of the United Nations, the Human Rights Committee has effectively pointed out the wide scope of Article 26 of the Covenant, which sets forth the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination: in its general comment n. 18 (of 1989), the Committee sustained, on that principle, the understanding in the sense Article 26 of the Covenant provides for an "autonomous right", and the application of that principle contained in it is not limited to the rights stipulated in the Covenant<sup>171</sup>. This posture advanced by the Human Rights Committee, added to the determination by the European Court of Human Rights of a violation of Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights in the Gaygusuz versus Austria case (1996), as well as the requisites established in the legal doctrine that the "distinctions" ought to be reasonable and in accordance with justice (so as not to incur into discriminations), have led to the suggestion to the emergence and evolution of a true right to equality<sup>172</sup>.

62. But despite the search, by international doctrine and case-law, of the identification of illegitimate bases of discrimination, this does not appear sufficient to me; one ought to go beyond that, as discrimination hardly occurs on the basis of a sole element (e.g., race, national or social origin, religion, sex, among others), being rather a complex mixture of several of them (and there also being cases of discrimination de jure). Moreover, when the clauses of non-discrimination of the international instruments of human rights contain a list illegitimate bases referred to, what they really aim at thereby is to eliminate a whole discriminatory social structure, having in mind the distinct component elements<sup>173</sup>.

63. It is perfectly possible, besides being desirable, to turn the attentions to all the areas of discriminatory human behaviour, including those which have so far been ignored or neglected at international level (e.g., inter alia, social status, income, medical state, age, sexual orientation, among others)<sup>174</sup>. In reality, the causes of forced migrations (in search of survival, work and better conditions of living - cf. supra) are not fundamentally distinct from those of population displacement, and it is not merely casual that the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination occupies a central position in the document adopted by the United Nations in 1998 containing the Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement<sup>175</sup>.

64. The basic idea of the whole document is in the sense that the internally displaced persons do not lose the rights which are inherent to them as human beings as a result of their displacement, and are protected by the norms of the International Law of Human Rights and of International Humanitarian Law<sup>176</sup>. In the same line of reasoning, the basic idea underlying the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (1990) is in the sense that all the workers qualified as migrants under their provisions ought to enjoy their human rights irrespectively of their juridical situation; hence the central position occupied, also in this context, by the principle of non-discrimination<sup>177</sup>. In sum, the migrant workers, including the undocumented ones, are titulaires of the fundamental human rights, which are not conditioned by their legal situation (irregular or not)<sup>178</sup>. In conclusion on this point, to the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination is reserved, from the Universal Declaration of 1948, a truly central position in the ambit of the International Law of Human Rights.

VII. Emergence, Content and Scope of the Jus Cogens.

65. In the present Advisory Opinion on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, the Inter-American Court has significantly recognized that the aforementioned fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination, in the present stage of evolution of International Law, "has entered into the domain of the jus cogens"; on such principle, which "permeates every legal order", - has correctly added the Court, - "rests the whole juridical structure of the national and international public order" (par. 101, and cf. resolatory points ns. 2 and 4). The Court, moreover, has not abstained itself from referring to the evolution of the concept of jus cogens, transcending the ambit of both the law of treaties and of the law of the international responsibility of the States, so as to reach general international law and the very foundations of the international legal order (pars. 98-99). In support of this important pronouncement of the Court I see it fit to add some reflections.

66. The emergence and assertion of jus cogens in contemporary International Law fulfill the necessity of a minimum of verticalization in the international legal order, erected upon pillars in which the juridical and the ethical are merged. The jus cogens was definitively incorporated to the conceptual universe of contemporary international law as from the inclusion, among the bases of invalidity and termination of treaties, of the peremptory norms of general international law, in Articles 53 and 64 of the Vienna Convention of 1969 on the Law of Treaties<sup>179</sup>. The Convention set forth the concept of jus cogens, without thereby adopting the thesis - defended in the past by A. McNair<sup>180</sup> - that a treaty could generate a regime of objective character erga omnes in derogation

More than three decades earlier, the expression "jus cogens" was utilized by Judge Schücking, in his well-known Separate Opinion in the Oscar Chinn case (United Kingdom versus Belgium); Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ), Series A/B, n. 63, 1934, pp. 148-150, esp. p. 149. of the classic principle pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt<sup>181</sup>. The concept seems to have been recognized by the Vienna Convention of 1969 as a whole; if this latter did not adopt the notion of treaties establishing "legal regimes of objective character", on the other hand it set forth the concept of jus cogens<sup>182</sup>, i.e., of peremptory norms of general international law<sup>183</sup>. The provisions on jus cogens became the object of analysis of a wide specialized bibliography<sup>184</sup>.

67. One and a half decades later, the concept of jus cogens was again set forth in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organizations or between International Organizations (1986); in my intervention in the United Nations Conference which adopted it, I saw it fit to warn for the manifest incompatibility with the concept of jus cogens of the voluntarist conception of International Law<sup>185</sup>, which appeared incapable to explain even the formation of rules of general international law and the incidence in the process of formation and evolution of contemporary International Law of elements independent of the free will of the States<sup>186</sup>. With the assertion of jus cogens in the two Vienna Conventions on the Law of Treaties (1969 and 1986), the next step consisted in determining its incidence beyond the law of treaties.

68. On my part, I have always sustained that it is an ineluctable consequence of the affirmation and the very existence of peremptory norms of International Law their not being limited to the conventional norms, to the law of treaties, and their being extended to every and any juridical act<sup>187</sup>. Recent developments point out in the same sense, that is, that the domain of the jus cogens, beyond the law of treaties, encompasses likewise general international law<sup>188</sup>. Moreover, the jus cogens, in my understanding, is an open category, which expands itself to the extent that the universal juridical conscience (material source of all Law) awakens for the necessity to protect the rights inherent to each human being in every and any situation.

69. The evolution of the International Law of Human Rights has emphasized the absolute character of the non-derogable fundamental rights. The absolute prohibition of the practices of torture, of forced disappearance of persons, and of summary and extra-legal executions, leads us decidedly into the terra nova of the international jus cogens<sup>189</sup>. In the case A. Furundzija (Judgment of 10.12.1998), the ad hoc International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (Trial Chamber) sustained that the prohibition of torture, established in an absolute way by International Law, both conventional (under certain human rights treaties) as well as customary, had the character of a norm of jus cogens (pars. 137-139, 144 and 160)<sup>190</sup>. This occurred by virtue of the importance of the protected values (par. 153). Such absolute prohibition of torture, - added the Tribunal, - imposes on the States obligations erga omnes (par. 151); the jus cogens nature of this prohibition renders it "one of the most fundamental standards of the international community", incorporating "an absolute value from which no one should divert himself" (par. 154).

70. The concept of jus cogens in fact is not limited to the law of treaties, and is likewise proper to the law of the international responsibility of the States. The Articles on the Responsibility of the States, adopted by the International Law Commission of the United Nations in 2001, bear witness of this fact. Among the passages of such Articles and their comments which refer expressly to jus cogens, there is one in which it is affirmed that "various tribunals, national and international, have affirmed the idea of peremptory norms in contexts not limited to the validity of treaties"<sup>191</sup>. In my understanding, it is in this central chapter of International Law, that of the international responsibility (perhaps more than in the chapter on the law of treaties), that the jus cogens reveals its real, wide and profound dimension, encompassing all juridical acts (including the unilateral ones), and having an incidence (including beyond the domain of State responsibility) on the very foundations of an international law truly universal.

71. To the international objective responsibility of the States corresponds necessarily the notion of objective illegality<sup>192</sup> (one of the elements underlying the concept of jus cogens). In our days, no one would dare to deny the objective illegality of acts of genocide<sup>193</sup>, of systematic practices of torture, of summary and extra-legal executions, and of forced disappearance of persons, - practices which represent crimes against humanity, - condemned by the universal juridical conscience<sup>194</sup>, parallel to the application of treaties. Already in its Advisory Opinion of 1951 on the Reservations to the Convention against Genocide, the International Court of Justice pointed out that the humanitarian principles underlying that Convention were recognizedly "binding on States, even without any conventional obligation"<sup>195</sup>.

72. Just as, in the ambit of the International Law of Refugees, the basic principle of non-refoulement was recognized as being of jus cogens<sup>196</sup>, in the domain of the International Law of Human Rights the character of jus cogens of the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination was likewise recognized (cf. supra). The objective illegality is not limited to the aforementioned acts and practices. As the jus cogens is not a closed category (supra), I understand that no one either would dare to deny that the slave work, and the persistent denial of the most elementary guarantees of the due process of law would likewise affront the universal juridical conscience, and effectively collide with the peremptory norms of the jus cogens. This is particularly significant for the safeguard of the rights of the undocumented migrant workers. All this doctrinal evolution points to the direction of the crystallization of the obligations erga omnes of protection (cf. infra). Without the consolidation of such obligations one will advance very little in the struggle against the violations of human rights.

73. The manifestations of international jus cogens mark presence in the very manner whereby human rights treaties have been interpreted and applied: the restrictions, foreseen in them, to the human rights they set forth, are restrictively interpreted, safeguarding the État de Droit (Estado de Derecho), and demonstrating that human rights do not belong to the domain of jus dispositivum, and cannot be considered as simply "negotiable"<sup>197</sup>; on the contrary, they permeate the (national and international) legal order itself. In sum and conclusion on the point under examination, the emergence and assertion of jus cogens evoke the notions of international public order and of a hierarchy of legal norms, as well as the prevalence of the jus necessarium over the jus voluntarium; jus cogens presents itself as the juridical expression of the very international community as a whole, which, at last, takes conscience of itself, and of the fundamental principles and values which guide it<sup>198</sup>.

VIII. Emergence and Scope of the Obligations Erga Omnes of Protection: Their Horizontal and Vertical Dimensions.

74. In the present Advisory Opinion on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, the Inter-American Court has pointed out that the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination, for belonging to the domain of jus cogens, "brings about obligations erga omnes of protection which bind all States and generate effects with regard to third parties, including individuals (private persons)" (par. 110, and cf. resolutive point n. 5)<sup>199</sup>. Also on this particular point I see it fit to present some reflections, in support of what was determined by the Inter-American Court. It is widely recognized, in our days, that the peremptory norms of jus cogens effectively bring about obligations erga omnes.

75. In a well-known obiter dictum in its Judgment in the case of the Barcelona Traction (Second Phase, 1970), the International Court of Justice determined that there are certain international obligations erga omnes, obligations of a State vis-à-vis the international community as a whole, which are of the interest of all the States; "such obligations derive, for example, in contemporary International Law, from the outlawing of acts of aggression, and of genocide, and also from the principles and rules concerning the basic rights of the human person, including protection from slavery and racial discrimination. Some of the corresponding rights of protection have entered into the body of general international law (...); others are conferred by international instruments of a universal or quasi-universal character<sup>200</sup>. The prohibitions mentioned in this obiter dictum are not exhaustive: to them new prohibitions are added, such as the ones referred to in paragraphs 71-72 of the present Concurring Opinion, precisely for not being the jus cogens a closed category (supra).

76. In the construction of the international legal order of the new century, we witness, with the gradual erosion of reciprocity, the emergence pari passu of superior considerations of ordre public, reflected in the conceptions of the peremptory norms of general international law (the jus cogens) and of the obligations erga omnes of protection (owed to everyone, and to the international community as a whole). The jus cogens, in bringing about obligations erga omnes, characterizes them as being endowed with a necessarily objective character, and thereby encompassing all the addressees of the legal norms (omnes), both those who integrate the organs of the public power as well as the individuals.

77. In my view, we can consider such obligations erga omnes from two dimensions, one horizontal and the other vertical, which complement each other. Thus, the obligations erga omnes of protection, in a horizontal dimension, are obligations pertaining to the protection of the human beings due to the international community as a whole<sup>201</sup>. In the framework of conventional international law, they bind all the States Parties to human rights treaties (obligations erga omnes partes), and, in the ambit of general international law, they bind all the States which compose the organized international community, whether or not they are Parties to those treaties (obligations erga omnes lato sensu). In a vertical dimension, the obligations erga omnes of protection bind both the organs and agents of (State) public power, and the individuals themselves (in the inter-individual relations).

78. For the conformation of this vertical dimension have decisively contributed the advent and the evolution of the International Law of Human Rights. But it is surprising that, until now, these horizontal and vertical dimensions of the obligations erga omnes of protection have passed entirely unnoticed from contemporary legal doctrine. Nevertheless, I see them clearly shaped in the legal regime itself of the American Convention on Human Rights. Thus, for example, as to the vertical dimension, the general obligation, set forth in Article 1(1) of the American Convention, to respect and to ensure respect for the free exercise of the rights protected by it, generates effects

ICJ, Judgment of 05 February 1970, ICJ Reports (1970) p. 32, pars. 33-34 (emphasis added). - The same Court had a unique opportunity to develop these considerations years later, in the East Timor case, but wasted it: in the Judgment of 30.06.1995, in which it reaffirmed the existence of the obligations erga omnes (in relation to the right of self-determination of peoples), it nevertheless related such obligations which something which is its antithesis, the consent of a third State (Indonesia); from a bilateralist and voluntarist perspective, it thus failed, unfortunately, to extract the consequences of the existence of such obligations erga omnes; cf. ICJ, East Timor case (Portugal versus Australia), ICJ Reports (1995) pp. 90-106.

erga omnes, encompassing the relations of the individual both with the public (State) power as well as with other individuals (particuliers)<sup>202</sup>.

79. In their turn, the obligations erga omnes partes, in their horizontal dimension, find expression also in Article 45 of the American Convention, which foresees the mechanism (not yet utilized in the practice of the inter-American system of human rights), of inter-State complaints or petitions. This mechanism, - as I pointed out in my Concurring Opinion (par. 3) in the case of the Community of Peace of San José of Apartadó (Provisional Measures of Protection of 18.06.2002), - constitutes not only a mechanism par excellence of action of collective guarantee, but also a true embryo actio popularis in International Law, in the framework of the American Convention. In any case, these dimensions, both horizontal and vertical, reveal the wide scope of the obligations erga omnes of protection.

80. The crystallization of the obligations erga omnes of protection of the human person represents, in reality, the overcoming of a pattern of conduct erected on the alleged autonomy of the will of the State, from which International Law itself sought gradually to liberate itself in giving expression to the concept of jus cogens<sup>203</sup>. By definition, all the norms of jus cogens generate necessarily obligations erga omnes. While jus cogens is a concept of material law, the obligations erga omnes refer to the structure of their performance on the part of all the entities and all the individuals bound by them. In their turn, not all the obligations erga omnes necessarily refer to norms of jus cogens.

81. One ought to secure a follow-up to the endeavours of greater doctrinal and jurisprudential development of the peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens) and of the corresponding obligations erga omnes of protection of the human being<sup>204</sup>, moved above all by the opinio juris as a manifestation of the universal juridical conscience, to the benefit of all human beings<sup>205</sup>. By means of this conceptual development one will advance in the overcoming of the obstacles of the dogmas of the past and in the creation of a true international ordre public based upon the respect for, and observance of, human rights. Such development will contribute, thus, to a greater cohesion of the organized international community (the civitas maxima gentium), centred on the human person.

82. As I saw it fit to point out in my Separate Opinion in the case Las Palmeras (Preliminary Objections, 2000, pars. 13-14) and in my Concurring Opinions in the case of the Community of Peace of San José of Apartadó (Provisional Measures of Protection, 18.06.2002, pars. 2-9) and in the case of the Communities of the Jiguamiandó and of the Curbaradó (Provisional Measures of Protection, 06.03.2003, pars. 4-6), at a more circumscribed level, the American Convention on Human Rights itself contains mechanisms for application of the conventional obligations of protection erga omnes partes. This is endowed with particular relevance at both conceptual and operative levels. The general obligation, set forth in Article 1(1) of the American Convention, to respect and to ensure respect for the free exercise of the rights protected by it, has a character erga omnes<sup>206</sup>.

83. In my understanding, the obligations erga omnes partes are not to be minimized, nor at the conceptual level, as, by means of the exercise of collective guarantee, such obligations can serve as guide, or pave the way, for the crystallization, in the future, of the obligations erga omnes lato sensu, due to the international community as a whole. And, at the operative level, the obligations erga omnes partes under a human rights treaty such as the American Convention also assume special importance, in face of the current diversification of the sources of violations of the rights enshrined into the Convention, which requires the clear recognition of the effects of the conventional obligations vis-à-vis third parties (the Drittwirkung), including individuals (e.g., in labour relations).

84. A minimum of conventional protection can thereby be promptly secured, for example, to the undocumented migrant workers, in their relations not only with the public power but also with other individuals, in particular their employers. One can, thus, sustain that migrant workers, including the undocumented ones, are titulaires of fundamental rights erga omnes. Ultimately, the State has the obligation to take positive measures to impede the unscrupulous labour exploitation, and to put an end to it. The State has the duty to secure the prevalence of the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination, which, as rightly establishes the present Advisory Opinion of the Inter-American Court, is a principle of jus cogens (par. 101, and resolutive point n. 4). To have clarified this basic point constitutes a valuable contribution of the present Advisory Opinion n. 18 of the Court.

85. The State is bound by the corpus juris of the international protection of human rights, which protects every human person erga omnes, independently of her statute of citizenship, or of migration, or any other condition or circumstance. The fundamental rights of the migrant workers, including the undocumented ones, are opposable to the public power and likewise to the private persons or individuals (e.g., employers), in the inter-individual relations. The State cannot prevail itself of the fact of not being a Party to a given treaty of human rights to evade the obligation to respect the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination, for being this latter a principle of general international law, and of jus cogens, which thus transcends the domain of the law of treaties.

IX. Epilogue.

86. The fact that the concepts both of the jus cogens and of the obligations (and rights) erga omnes already integrate the conceptual universe of International Law discloses the reassuring and necessary opening of this latter, in the last decades, to certain superior and fundamental values. This significant evolution of the recognition and assertion of norms of jus cogens and erga omnes obligations of protection ought to be fostered, seeking to secure its full practical application, to the benefit of all human beings. Only thus shall we rescue the universalist vision of the founding fathers of the droit des gens, and shall we move closer to the plenitude of the international protection of the rights inherent to the human person. These new conceptions impose themselves in our days, and, of their faithful observance, in my view, will depend in great part the future evolution of the present domain of protection of the human person, as well as, ultimately, of the International Law itself as a whole.

87. It is not function of the jurist simply to take note of what the States do, particularly the most powerful ones, which do not hesitate to seek formulas to impose their "will", including in relation to the treatment to be dispensed to the persons under its jurisdiction. The function of the jurist is to show and to tell what the Law is. In the present Advisory Opinion n. 18 on The Juridical Condition and the Rights of the Undocumented Migrants, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights has determined, firmly and with clarity, what the Law is. This latter does not emanate from the inscrutable "will" of the States, but rather from human conscience. General or customary international law emanates not so much from the practice of States (not devoid of ambiguities and contradictions), but rather from the opinio juris communis of all the subjects of International Law (the States, the international organizations, and the human beings). Above the will is the conscience.

88. The fact that, despite all the sufferings of past generations, persist in our days new forms of exploitation of man by man, - such as the exploitation of the labour force of the undocumented migrants, forced prostitution, the traffic of children, forced and slave labour, amidst a proved increase of poverty and social exclusion and marginalization, the uprootedness and family disruption, - does not mean that "regulation is lacking" or that Law does not exist. It rather means that Law is being ostensibly and flagrantly violated, from day to day, to the detriment of millions of human beings, among whom the undocumented migrants all over the world. In reacting against these generalized violations of the rights of the undocumented migrants, which affront the juridical conscience of humankind, the present Advisory Opinion of the Inter-American Court contributes to the current process of the necessary humanization of International Law.

89. In so doing, the Inter-American Court bears in mind the universality and unity of the human kind, which inspired, more than four and a half centuries ago, the historical process of formation of the droit des gens. In rescuing, in the present Advisory Opinion, the universalist vision which marked the origins of the best doctrine of International Law, the Inter-American Court contributes to the construction of the new jus gentium of the XXIst century, oriented by the general principles of law (among which the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination), characterized by the intangibility of the due process of law in its wide scope, crystallized in the recognition of jus cogens and instrumentalized by the consequent obligations erga omnes of protection, and erected, ultimately, on the full respect for, and guarantee of, the rights inherent to the human person.

REASONED CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE SERGIO GARCÍA RAMÍREZ
IN RELATION TO ADVISORY OPINION OC-18/03 ON "LEGAL STATUS AND RIGHTS OF UNDOCUMENTED MIGRANTS"
OF SEPTEMBER 17, 2003
ISSUED BY THE INTER-AMERICAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

1. The Inter-American Court rendered Advisory Opinion OC-18/03 on September 17, 2003, under the heading "Legal Status and Rights of Undocumented Migrants." Consequently, it covers a wide spectrum of situations regarding undocumented migrants in general; that is, those persons who leave a State to migrate to another State and stay there, but who do not have authorization to do so from the State in which they seek to reside. This description is clear from the "Glossary" in Chapter V of the Advisory Opinion (para. 69). Many individuals are in this situation, regardless of the motive for their move, their particular conditions, and the activity they perform or wish to perform.

2. One specific category within this spectrum corresponds to undocumented migrant workers; that is, persons who are not authorized to enter the State of employment and engage in a remunerated activity there, according to the laws of the State and the international agreements to which that State is a party, but who, nevertheless, engage in that activity, as the 1990 International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families has understood, and as is recognized in the "Glossary" cited in the preceding paragraph. It is with regard to the latter, working in urban and rural areas, that the request submitted by the United Mexican States to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights refers principally – although not exclusively. It is necessary to examine the rights of millions of human beings, women and men, who have migrated or who migrate in all parts of the world – and especially in the countries of the Americas – moved by different factors, but all driven by the same expectation: to earn their living outside the country in which they were born.

3. This issue is extremely important and, consequently, has merited prominent mention in the request for the opinion and in the briefs of the States and individuals who intervened in the consultation process – the latter as amici curiae. It is also underscored in the answers of the Inter-American Court, which could have been grouped under another heading emphasizing the universe that concerns the requesting State and the participants and is being examined by the Inter-American Court: "Legal status and rights of undocumented migrant workers".

4. The issue to which this Advisory Opinion refers is of fundamental importance today. The increasing interrelation between nations, the process of globalization that has an impact in diverse areas, and the different conditions of the national, regional and global economies have been determining factors in the appearance and growth of migratory flows that have particular characteristics and require coherent solutions. In its resolution on "International migration and development" (A/RES/54/212, of 1 February 2000) – mentioned in OC-18, the General Assembly of the United Nations indicated that "among other factors, the process of globalization and liberalization, including the widening economic and social gap between and among many countries and the marginalization of some countries in the global economy, has contributed to large flows of peoples between and among countries and to the intensification of the complex phenomenon of international migration."

5. In a recent publication, it is recalled that “most individuals migrate in order to improve their living conditions, seek new opportunities or escape poverty”; although we should not overlook other reasons, such as: family reunion, war and other conflicts, human rights violations, expulsion, and discrimination. At the “end of the 20th century, there were an estimated 175 million international migrants, nearly 3% of the world’s people and twice the number in 1975. Some 60% of the international migrants, about 104 million, are in developing countries” (Commission on Human Security, Human Security, New York, 2003, p. 41).

6. The new migratory flows, which are the focal point of Advisory Opinion OC-18/2003, reflect the situation of the economy in the countries of origin and destination of migrants. In the latter there is a factor of attraction that requires the contribution of the labor of those workers, who play a role in wealth creation and – as those who study these processes have acknowledged – make a very significant contribution to the welfare and development of the receiving countries. A study on this issue by the International Labour Office (ILO) – cited in the brief submitted by the Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL) – mentions, with regard to a universe of 152 countries, that between 1970 and 1990 the number of countries classified as major recipients of immigrants seeking work increased from 39 to 67, while the number of those considered major originators of migrants increased from 29 to 55. The conditions in which some of these processes occur and their results produce a form of subsidy for the most developed economies, in addition to their importance as a source of income for the migrants who provide their services in those economies and for their families who reside in their countries of origin.

7. These processes cannot – or rather, should not – be exempt from scrupulous respect for the human rights of migrants. This is the central thesis of Advisory Opinion OC-18/2003, which extends to the different areas it covers. It is a thesis that corresponds to the best expressions of the guiding principle of contemporary national and international law, to legal writings and practice of the rule of law in a democratic society, and to the principles that govern international human rights law and the implementation of its norms by the States that compose the legal community and the corresponding international jurisdictions.

8. Evidently, it is not possible to reduce a phenomenon of this nature to a question of border policy, or approach it from the simple perspective of the legal or illegal, regular or irregular status of the residence of aliens in a specific territory. This viewpoint does not permit us to understand and regulate rationally and constructively the offer of licit and creative work and the demand that keeps the economic processes operating, to the benefit of those who provide their services and to those who employ them. The phenomenon goes beyond these reductionist perspectives, which often lead to the adoption of inadmissible and harmful measures for migrant workers, and even for the economy in which they are established. Moreover, this limited and flawed vision frequently entails problems in relations with neighboring countries.

9. Those who form part of these migratory flows are very often almost totally helpless, owing to their lack of social, economic and cultural knowledge of the country in which they work, and to the lack of instruments to protect their rights. In these circumstances, they constitute an extremely vulnerable sector that has suffered the consequences of this vulnerability by the implementation of laws, the adoption and execution of policies, and the proliferation of discriminatory and abusive practices in their labor relations with the employers who use their services and the authorities of the country where they reside. This vulnerability is structural in character. Its cultural aspect, of an endogenous nature, is associated – as the amicus curiae brief presented by an academic of the Juridical Research Institute of the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México states – with “conditions that are sufficient to result in extreme impunity for those who violate the human rights of aliens/ immigrants.”

10. It is well known that there have been many cases of aggression against undocumented migrants by public authorities, who fail to comply with or distort the exercise of their attributes, and by individuals who take advantage of the vulnerable situation of undocumented migrants and subject them to ill-treatment or convert them into victims of crimes. The latter include different kinds of violent crime and arbitrary treatment, which regularly remain unpunished or are only penalized by light measures, utterly disproportionate to the gravity of the illegal acts that have been committed. In a resolution on “Protection of migrants” (A/RES/54/166, of 24 February 2000) – mentioned in the Advisory Opinion – the General Assembly of the United Nations expressed its concern for “the manifestations of violence, racism, xenophobia and other forms of discrimination and inhuman and degrading treatment to which migrants are subjected, particularly women and children, in different parts of the world.”

11. The vulnerability of migrant workers increases, reaching dramatic extremes that move the universal moral conscience, when they lack official authorization to enter and remain in a country and, consequently, form part of the category of those persons who are instantly identified as “undocumented,” “irregular” or, worse still “illegal,” workers. What should be an administrative description with well-defined effects becomes a “label” that results in many disadvantages and exposes the bearer to innumerable abuses. This sector is grouped under a significant heading: it is a “suspected category,” as the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights indicates – another amicus curiae brief alludes to “suspect category” – a concept elaborated on the basis of European case law and comparative law. In brief, it refers to “persons under suspicion,” with all that this implies and, furthermore, with all that it suggests and even allows.

12. Although it should be borne in mind, I will not go into detail about the nature of the treatment usually meted out to undocumented workers. It includes abuse and arbitrariness of different kinds in the workplace, but also outside of it, because of the lack of security that they endure, the treatment they receive, and other very diverse aspects of their personal and family life, even its most intimate and delicate aspects. Reports on this situation, which observers of different countries provide from time to time on conditions prevailing on different continents, illustrate this matter amply.

13. This is the situation in which millions of persons live, work and suffer in many countries in the world, some of which have historically been in the forefront of human rights and democracy. Thus, when alluding to the problem of undocumented migrant workers, the focus of OC-18/2003, reference is being made to a large number of human beings in different countries, as noted in the statistical contributions made by those who took part, as representatives of States or amici curiae, in the process of reflection which led to this Advisory Opinion.

14. OC-18/2003 is based on the acceptance of the human rights recognized to all persons and required of all States. This corresponds, moreover, to the basic concept of fundamental rights in the words used in national declarations as of the eighteenth century and in the most important international instruments of the twentieth century. This recognition, which is based on human dignity and transcends all political borders, is the most relevant moral, juridical and political fact in the current stage of law. The violations committed during the last century and in the one which is just beginning do not diminish the contemporary status of the individual, product of a long and eventful evolution, nor eliminate the enforceability of human rights before all States. To the contrary, they reinforce a concern shared by innumerable persons and underline the need to continue the struggle to ensure to everyone the most extensive enjoyment and exercise of those rights. We may add that this is the philosophy that sustains the major international organizations, such as the United Nations and the Organization of American States, in the words of their Charters, and it therefore binds the States that form part of them and have accepted their values and the commitments that the latter represent.

15. Thinking behind the declarations of rights and their contemporary expression cites the freedom and equality of all human beings. This entails, first implicitly, then explicitly in numerous documents – as indicated in this Advisory Opinion – the most complete and conclusive rejection of discrimination whatever the motive. This profound conviction is the source of the historic struggles of the individual against different forms of oppression – struggles that have culminated in the establishment of a successive series of fundamental rights – and the foundation on which the modern legal system is built.

16. Equality before the law and rejection of all forms of discrimination is at the forefront of texts that stipulate, regulate and guarantee human rights. They could be said to represent reference points, constructive elements, interpretation criteria, and options for the protection of all rights. Because of the degree of acceptance they have achieved, they are clear expressions of jus cogens, with the peremptory nature that this has over and above general or specific conventions, and with its effects for the determination of obligations erga omnes.

17. That idea, stated in OC-18/2003, was expressed during the preparatory work. Thus, the amicus curiae participation of the Central American Council of Ombudsmen, with the support of its Technical Secretariat, the Inter-American Institute of Human Rights, mentions, in its brief, that “owing to the progressive development of international human rights law, the principle of non-discrimination and the right to equal and effective protection of the law, must be considered norms of jus cogens and, in this respect, they are norms of peremptory international law that form part of an international public order (ordre public) which cannot be validly opposed by the other norms of international law, and much less the domestic norms of States.” Finally, in the absence of the embodiment and exercise of equality before the law and the rejection of discrimination, it would not be possible to understand human development and assess the present development of law.

18. True equality before the law is not measured by the mere declaration of equality in the law, but must take into account the true conditions of those who are subject to the law. There is no equality when, for example, in order to enter an employment relationship, an agreement is reached by an employer, who has ample resources and knows that he is supported by the law, and the worker, who only has his hands and perceives – or knows perfectly well – that the law does not offer him the support it provides to his counterpart. There is no equality either when there is a powerful defendant, armed with the means to defend himself, and a weak litigant, who lacks instruments to prove and argue his defense, regardless of the reasons and rights that support their respective claims.

19. In such cases, the law must introduce compensation or correction factors. This is what the Inter-American Court stated when, for the purposes of Advisory Opinion OC-16/99, it examined the concept of due process – which upholds setting those who are unequal for other reasons on an equal footing and permits just solutions to be reached in both material and procedural relations. I believe that it would be useful to quote a phrase of Francisco Rubio Llorente here, which can be applied to the point that I am making, without detriment to its more general scope. According to this Spanish scholar, all “law is intended to be fair and it is the idea of justice that leads directly to the principle of equality which, in some ways, constitutes its essential content.” Nevertheless, “equality is not a point of departure, but a an end” (“La igualdad en la jurisprudencia del Tribunal Superior,” in La forma del poder (Estudios sobre la Constitución), Centro de Estudios Constitucionales, Madrid, 1993, pp. 644 and 656). The laws that regulate relationships between parties that are socially or economically unequal and the norms and practices of all aspects of judicial proceedings should tend towards and respond to this end.

20. The prohibition to discriminate does not admit exceptions or areas of tolerance that would shelter violations; discrimination is always rejected. In this respect, it is does not matter that the prohibition relates to rights that are considered fundamental, such as those that refer to life, physical integrity or personal freedom, or to rights to which some assign a different ranking or a different importance. It is discriminatory to establish different sanctions for the same offences because the authors belong to determined social, religious or political groups. It is discriminatory to deny access to education to members of an ethnic group and to provide it to members of another group; and it is discriminatory – following the same reasoning – to provide some individuals with all measures of protection that the performance of lawful work merits and deny such measures to other individuals who perform the same activity, on grounds that are unrelated to the work itself, such as those arising from their migratory status.

21. The principles of equality before the law and non-discrimination are put to the test when there is contact between different human groups, that are called on to take part in legal and economic relationships which imperil the rights of those who are weakest or least well equipped, owing to their circumstances and the way in which such relationships are established and developed. This has been seen – and is still seen – in many cases, for the most diverse reasons. Nationals and aliens, men and women, adults and minors, ethnic, cultural, political and religious majorities and minorities, winners and losers in domestic and international conflicts, deeply-rooted groups and displaced groups, are only some examples. This occurs among those who form part of the workforce in their own country and those who participate in the same economic processes alongside them, but lack the status of nationals. This status is a protective shield for some; and its absence is frequently the factor that leads to the exclusion or harm of others.

22. The permanent and uncompromising purpose of the human rights system, and also the ideas on which it is based and the goals it seeks, is to eliminate distances, combat abuses, and guarantee rights; in brief, to establish equality and see that justice is done, not merely for ethical reasons, which would in themselves be relevant, but also in strict compliance with the peremptory norms that do not admit exceptions and oblige all States: jus cogens and obligations erga omnes. In some cases, valuable although insufficient progress has been made; for example, legal equality between men and women – even though this is not yet a reality for all – and, in others, such as the area of labor relations, where national and alien workers are involved, there is still much to be done.

23. OC-18/2003 rejects the opinion suggesting there should be restrictions and reductions in the rights of the individual when he crosses the borders of his own country and moves abroad, as if this journey eroded his human condition and took away a migrant's dignity and, therefore, his rights and freedoms. The United Nations Inter-governmental Working Group of Experts on the Human Rights of Migrants – cited in the amicus curiae brief of the Center for Legal and Social Studies (CELS), the Ecumenical Service for the Support and Orientation of Refugees and Immigrants (CAREF) and the Legal Clinic for the Rights of Immigrants and Refugees of the Law School of the Universidad de Buenos Aires – pointed out that “[a]ll persons, regardless of their place of residence, have a right to the full enjoyment of all the rights established in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. States must respect the fundamental human rights of migrants, irrespective of their legal status.” It added: “[a] basic principle of human rights is the fact of entering a foreign country, violating the immigration laws of that country, does not lead to losing the human rights of an immigrant with an irregular status; nor does it eliminate the obligation of a Member State (in an international instrument) to protect them.” However, this is not always acknowledged. To the contrary, as the representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) indicated in his amicus curiae statement, when a person is classified as a migrant, “this means that he has no rights and therefore the State, exercising its sovereignty, may expel him, deport him, or violate his basic rights.”

24. This Advisory Opinion does not deny the possibility of establishing differences between categories of subjects: reasonable differences, based on objective information, with a view to attaining lawful objectives by legitimate means. Evidently, when regulating access to its territory and permanence in it, a State may establish conditions and requirements that migrants must fulfill. Non-compliance with migratory provisions would entail the relevant consequences, but should not produce effects in areas that are unrelated to the matter of the entry and residence of migrants.

25. In view of the above, it would be unacceptable, for example, to deprive an undocumented person of freedom of thought and expression, merely because he is undocumented. Likewise, it is unacceptable to punish non-compliance with migratory provisions by measures relating to other areas, disregarding the situations created in those areas and the potential effects, completely unrelated to the migratory offence. Taking any other course would, as has indeed occurred, deprive a person of the benefits of work already performed, alleging administrative errors: an expropriation, lato sensu, of what the worker has obtained for his work – through an agreement entered into with a third party, which has already produced certain benefits to the latter – which would become undue profit if the different forms of remuneration for the work performed are eliminated.

26. Taking into consideration the characteristics of the general obligations of States under general international law and international human rights law, specifically, with regard to these extremes of jus cogens, States must develop, as stated in OC-18/2003, specific actions of three mutually complementary types: a) they must ensure, by legislative and other measures – in other words, in every sector of State attributes and functions – the effective (and not only nominal) exercise of the human rights of workers on an equal footing and without any discrimination; b) they must eliminate provisions, whatever their scope and extent, that lead to undue inequality or discrimination; and c) lastly, they must combat public or private practices that have this same consequence. Only then, can it be said that a State complies with its obligations of jus cogens in this area, which, as we have said, does not depend on the State being a party to a specific international convention; and only then would the State be protected from international responsibility arising from non-compliance with international obligations.

27. OC-18/2003 focuses on rights arising from employment and thus concerning workers. Such rights belong to the category of "economic, social and cultural rights, which some scholars have classified as "second-generation" rights. Nevertheless, whatever their status, bearing in mind their subject matter and also the moment in which they were included, first in constitutional and then in international texts, the truth is they have the same status as the so-called "civil and political" rights. Mutually dependent or conditioned, they are all part of the contemporary statute of the individual; they form a single extensive group, part of the same universe, which would disintegrate if any of them were excluded.

28. Among these rights, the only difference relates to their subject matter, the identity of the property they protect, and the area in which they emerge and prosper. They have the same rank and demand equal respect. They should not be confused with each other; however, it is not possible to ignore their interrelationship, owing to circumstances. For example, let us say that, although the right to work cannot be confused with the right to life, work is a condition of a decent life, and even of life itself: it is a subsistence factor. If access to work is denied, or if a worker is prevented from receiving its benefits, or if the jurisdictional and administrative channels for claiming his rights are obstructed, his life could be endangered and, in any case, he would suffer an impairment of the quality of his life, which is a basic element of both economic, social and cultural rights, and civil and political rights.

29. The human rights of workers, namely, the fundamental labor rights, arise from two sources, which function together: a) the human condition of the owner, which, as I have already said, excludes inadmissible inequalities and discriminations; and b) the employment relationship established between the owner of those rights and the legal person, individual or group, to which he will provide, is about to provide or has provided his services; a relationship that arises from the very fact of providing, being about to provide or having provided a service, regardless of what has been formalized in a contract, which does not exist in many – probably, most – cases, although if it exists – and this is what is really important – it is the determining factor of the employment relationship, which is also a source of rights and obligations.

30. It is necessary to draw attention to these considerations with regard to all those who engage in activities in exchange for remuneration, but principally – since it is the issue being examined in OC-18/2003 – with regard to those classified as workers, according to the usual description of this category in labor law: persons who provide dependent and subordinate services, and who form part of the most extensive sector of the vulnerable group owing to their migratory status, principally undocumented migrants.

31. The different international instruments, as well as the most progressive national texts, contain lists of labor rights that must be respected and guaranteed; for example, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man, the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (Protocol of San Salvador), the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, and the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work (86th Session, Geneva, 1998).

32. These and other instruments coincide in establishing the international standards for labor rights cited in this Advisory Opinion and applicable to the law and practice of States, according to this Opinion. Such standards are the product of constant and well-documented development, express the shared opinion of the members of the international juridical community, and are therefore doubly important owing to this circumstance and to the nature of the instruments in which they are enshrined.

33. Certain rights mentioned in the considerations of OC-18/2003 are particularly important because they are the ones that are generally included in national and international norms, often constitute conditions or elements of other labor rights and, owing to their characteristics, determine the general framework for the provision of services and for the protection and welfare of those who provide them. The corresponding list – which is not exhaustive – includes the prohibition of obligatory or forced labor, the elimination of discriminations in the provisions of labor, the abolition of child labor, the protection of women workers and the rights corresponding to remuneration, the working day, rest and holidays, health and security in the workplace, association to form trade unions and collective negotiation.

34. In the “Programme of Action” issued by the World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance (Durban, 2001) States were urged to ensure the full equality of migrants in the law, “including labor legislation”, and “to eliminate barriers, where appropriate, to their participation in vocational training, collective bargaining, employment, contracts and trade union activity; access to judicial and administrative tribunals dealing with grievances; seeking employment in different parts of their country of residence; and working in safe and healthy conditions” (Programme para. 28). They were also urged to “take all possible measures to promote the full enjoyment by all migrants of all human rights, including those related to fair wages and equal remuneration for work of equal value without distinction of any kind, and to the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond their control, social security, including social insurance, access to education, health care, social services and respect for their cultural identity” (Programme, para. 30(g)).

35. The mention of these rights in Advisory Opinion OC-18 is not intended to establish a specific ranking of the human rights of workers, as one group of rights that could constitute the “hard core” and another that might have another nature, in some way secondary or non-essential. The Opinion merely highlights certain rights that are important for the employment relationship and for the needs and expectations of undocumented migrant workers and to which special attention should be paid to ensure that they are respected and guaranteed, without lessening the attention that should be paid to other rights not mentioned in the list.

36. Announcing rights without providing guarantees to enforce them is useless. It becomes a sterile formulation that sows expectations and produces frustrations.

Therefore, guarantees must be established that permit: demanding that rights should be recognized, claiming them when they have been disregarded, re-establishing them when they have been violated, and implementing them when their exercise has encountered unjustified obstacles. This is what the principle of equal and rapid access to justice means; namely, the real possibility of access to justice through the means that domestic law provides to all persons, in order to reach a just settlement of a dispute; in other words, formal and genuine access to justice.

37. This access is facilitated by due process, which the Inter-American Court of Human Rights has examined fully in the exercise of its advisory and contentious competence. Strictly speaking, due process is the means to ensure the effective exercise of human rights that is consistent with the most advanced concept of such rights: a method or factor to ensure the effectiveness of law as a whole and of subjective rights in specific cases. Due process – a dynamic concept guided and developed under a guarantee model that serves individual and social interests and rights, and also the supreme interest of justice – is a guiding principle for the proper resolution of legal actions and a fundamental right of all persons. It is applied to settle disputes of any nature – including labor disputes – and to the claims and complaints submitted to any authority: judicial or administrative.

38. Due process, for the purpose that interests us in OC-18/2003, entails, on the one hand, the greatest equality – balance, “equality of weapons” – between the litigants, and this is particularly important when on one side of the dispute is the vulnerable migrant worker and on the other the employer endowed with ample and effective rights, an equality that is only obtained – in most cases that reflect the true dimension of the collective problem – when the public authorities incorporate the elements of compensation or correction that I have mentioned above, through laws and criteria for interpretation and implementation; and, on the other hand, clear and flexible compliance with the State’s obligation to provide a service of justice without distinction, much less discrimination, which would entail the defeat of the weaker party at the very outset.

39. The clarifications in OC-18/2003 have particular relevance. Indeed, undocumented workers usually face severe problems of effective access to justice. These problems are due not only to cultural factors and lack of adequate resources or knowledge to claim protection from the authorities with competence to provide it, but also to the existence of norms or practices that obstruct or limit delivery of justice by the State. This happens because the request for justice can lead to reprisals against the applicants by authorities or individuals, measures of coercion or detention, threats of deportation, imprisonment or other measures that, unfortunately, are frequently experienced by undocumented migrants. Thus, the exercise of a fundamental human right – access to justice – culminates in the denial of many rights. It should be indicated that even where coercive measures or sanctions are implemented based on migratory provisions – such as deportation or expulsion – the person concerned retains all the rights that correspond to him for work performed, because their source is unrelated to the migratory problem and stems from the work performed.

40. The Advisory Opinion, with which I agree in this separate opinion, deals with the issue of public policies posed in the questions raised by the requesting State. In this respect, it is acknowledged that States have the authority to adopt public policies – which are expressed in laws, regulations and other norms, plans, programs and different acts – in order to achieve legitimate collective goals. These policies include those relating to demographic processes, which involve migratory issues, in addition to those relating to the management of the economy, the use of the workforce, the promotion of certain productive activities, the protection of specific sectors of agriculture, industry, commerce and services, and others.

41. There is a problem, however, when some specific aspects of State policy enter into conflict with the human rights of a certain sector of the population. Obviously, this should never occur. It is one of the State's functions – which responds to its democratic vocation and recognizes and guarantees the human rights of its inhabitants – to implement the various public policies so that these rights are preserved and, at the same time, the legitimate objectives for which those policies were designed are achieved. Let me repeat that achieving a commendable end does not justify using unlawful means. In such cases, the State's essential commitment to human rights prevails, because the guarantee of human rights is an underlying principle of the political structure, as has been stated constantly in the principal political texts of the modern era, produced by the major rebel and revolutionary movements of the United States and France in the latter part of the eighteenth century. If this is the essential ethical and legal basis of politics, a State cannot violate the human rights of the persons subject to its jurisdiction on the basis of specific policies.

42. On these grounds, Advisory Opinion OC-18/2003 refers to several agreements of the international community – evidently based on profound convictions – with regard to migratory policies, the subject of the request submitted by the United Mexican States. In this respect, the “Declaration” and the “Programme of Action” resulting from the Durban Conference, and the corresponding resolution of the United Nations Human Rights Commission (Res. 2001/5) should be underscored; they are all mentioned by the Inter-American Court in the Advisory Opinion. The Declaration affirms the right of States to adopt their own migration policies and also that “these policies should be consistent with applicable human rights instruments, norms and standards” (Declaration, para. 47).

43. It would be unrealistic to believe that the opinion of a jurisdictional body – even though it is supported by the convictions and decisions of States representing hundreds of millions of individuals in this hemisphere – and the trend towards progress with justice that inspires many men and women of good will, could, in the short-term, reverse obsolete tendencies that are rooted in deep prejudices and sizeable interests. However, when combined, these forces can play their role in man's effort to move mountains. Making this effort and succeeding requires the adoption – as was said in Durban – of strategies, policies, programs and measures that are part of the “responsibility of all the States, with the full participation of civil society, at the national, regional and international level” (Declaration, para. 122). OC-18/2003 fulfills its particular mandate in this effort. It does so, as corresponds to this Court, from its own specific position: the legal one, based on the principles that are at the root of the international human rights system.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE HERNÁN SALGADO PESANTES

This Advisory Opinion, requested by the State of Mexico and enhanced by the opinions of other States and the intellectual contribution of non-governmental organizations, allowed us to reflect on numerous issues, some of which I would like to take up again in support of the opinions expressed therein.

1. In light of the interrelation and indivisibility of human rights, equality and non-discrimination are rights that form a platform on which others are erected, particularly economic, social and cultural rights, whose content cannot omit the former. The same is true in the case of freedom.

2. Non-discrimination is inseparable from equality and determines the scope of the former. At the current stage in the development of human rights, I believe that equality and non-discrimination are two rights with an autonomous content that have a separate existence within this framework of indivisible interrelation.

3. In recognition of the diversity of human beings, it is acknowledged that equality accepts and promotes certain distinctions, provided they tend to increase rather than prevent the enjoyment and exercise of all rights, including equality itself. Consequently, such distinctions do not affect the right to non-discrimination; nor do they restrict the concept of equality.

4. In the context of this Opinion, the Court has differentiated between distinction and discrimination (paragraph 84) and has indicated the characteristic elements of the former, on which I would like to insist.

5. The concept of distinction refers to a treatment that is different from the one generally applied; in other words, a specific situation is singularized for certain reasons. To ensure that distinction does not become discrimination, the following requirements, established by human rights case law and theory, must be fulfilled.

6. It should pursue a legitimate goal and it should be objective, in the sense that there is a substantial and not merely formal difference, because, as this Court has indicated, distinction in treatment should be founded on "substantial factual differences and [...] a reasonable relationship of proportionality between these differences and the aims of the legal rule under review."<sup>207</sup>

7. In addition, the difference must be relevant, have sufficient importance to justify a different treatment, and be necessary and not merely convenient or useful. For example, the difference between a man and a woman is not sufficient to impose a different treatment in the workplace, but the fact of pregnancy and maternity is.

8. There must be proportionality between the factual and juridical difference, between the chosen means and the ends; disproportion between the content of the different treatment and the proposed goal leads to discrimination. For example, in order to sustain a labor policy, it is decided that undocumented workers should be stripped of their fundamental rights.

9. Together with proportionality, appropriateness and relevance are usually indicated, as regards the desired juridical consequences of the differentiated treatment, taking into account the concrete and actual circumstances in which the distinction will be applied.

10. But there is a common denominator with regard to the preceding elements, which fine tunes the content and scope of the other elements, and that is reasonableness. The use of these elements allows us to identify the presence of discrimination in a "suspect category," represented in this case by the undocumented migrant workers.

11. Undocumented migrant workers have – as has any human being – the rights to equality before the law and not to be discriminated against.

12. Equality before the law means that they must be treated in the same way as documented migrants and nationals before the law of the receiving country. The prohibition to work has to be considered in this context. The condition of undocumented worker can never become grounds for not having access to justice and due process of law, for failing to receive earned salaries, for not having social security benefits and for being the object of various forms of abuse and arbitrariness.

13. Such situations illustrate the existence of a series of discriminatory treatments that those responsible seek to found on the distinction between documented and undocumented.

14. As the Advisory Opinion states, this difference in treatment is neither justified, necessary nor proportionate, and its effects are not reasonable; it is at odds with the State's main function, which is to respect and ensure the rights of every individual who, for labor-related reasons, and with or without documents, is subject to its jurisdiction.

15. It should be borne in mind that grave violations of rights, as in the case of the undocumented migrant workers, end up by seriously affecting the right to life. In this respect, the Inter-American Court has stated that life includes, "not only the right of every human being not to be deprived of his life arbitrarily, but also the right that he will not be prevented from having access to the conditions that guarantee a dignified existence."<sup>208</sup>

16. It is worth emphasizing that, as in the case of the other rights, the obligation to respect and ensure equality and non-discrimination embodied in international human rights law – with its treaties and case law – is also a non-derogable obligation in the domestic law of constitutional and democratic States.

17. I consider that an extremely important point in this Advisory Opinion is that of establishing clearly the effectiveness of human rights with regard to third parties, in a horizontal conception. These aspects, as is acknowledged, have been amply developed in German legal writings (Drittwirkung) and are contained in current constitutionalism.

18. It is not only the State that has the obligation to respect human rights, but also individuals in their relationships with other individuals. The environment of free will that prevails in private law cannot become an obstacle that dilutes the binding effectiveness erga omnes of human rights.

19. The possessors of human rights – in addition to the State (the public sphere) – are also third parties (the private sphere), who may violate such rights in the ambit of individual relationships. For the purposes of this Opinion, we are limiting ourselves basically to the workplace where it has been established that the rights to equality and non-discrimination are being violated.

20. Labor rights as a whole acquire real importance in relationships between individuals; consequently, they must be binding with regard to third parties. To this end, all States must adopt legislative or administrative measures to impede such violations and procedural instruments should be effective and prompt.

21. At the level of international responsibility, any violation of rights committed by individuals will be attributed to the State, if the latter has not taken effective measures to prevent such violation or tolerates it or permits the authors to remain unpunished.

22. The foregoing signifies that international human rights instruments also produce binding effects with regard to third parties. Likewise, the responsibility of the individual has a bearing on and affects that of the State.

I have participated in this Advisory Opinion, like my colleagues, aware of its importance for the countries of our hemisphere.

CONCURRING OPINION OF JUDGE ALIRIO ABREU BURELLI

While being of the same opinion as the other judges of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in rendering this Advisory Opinion, I wish to submit the following considerations separately:

I

On this occasion, the Court has defined the scope of the obligation of the member States of the Organization of American States to respect and guarantee the labor rights of undocumented migrant workers, irrespective of their nationality, by establishing that the principle of equality and non-discrimination, which is fundamental for the safeguard of those rights, belongs to ius cogens<sup>209</sup>.

This definition also leads the Court to declare that, regardless of whether or not States are party to a specific international treaty, they are obliged to protect the right to equality and non-discrimination and that this obligation has effects erga omnes, not only with regard to the States, but also with regard to third parties and individuals. Consequently, States must respect and guarantee the labor rights of workers, whatever their migratory status and, at the same time, must prevent private employers from violating the rights of undocumented migrant workers and the employment relationship from violating minimum international standards. For the protection of the labor rights of undocumented migrants to be effective, such workers must be guaranteed access to justice and due process of law<sup>210</sup>.

A State's observance of the principle of equality and non-discrimination and the right to due process of law cannot be subordinated to its policy goals, whatever these may be, including those of a migratory character.

By voting in favor of the adoption of this Opinion, I am aware of its particular importance in endeavoring to provide legal answers, in international law, to the grave problem of the violation of the human rights of migrant workers. In general, despite their non-contentious nature, Advisory Opinions have indisputable effects on both the legislative and administrative acts of States and on the interpretation and application of laws and human rights treaties by judges, owing to their moral authority and the principle of good faith on which the international treaties that authorize them are based.

<sup>209</sup> According to the European Court of Human Rights, the affirmation that the principle of equality and non-discrimination belongs to the domain of ius cogens has several legal effects: recognition that the norm ranks higher than any norm of international law, except other norms of ius cogens; in case of dispute, the norm of ius cogens would prevail over any other norm of international law, and the provision that contradicts the peremptory norm would be null or lack legal effects. (Taken from the arguments of the Legal Clinics of the College of Jurisprudence of the Universidad San Francisco, Quito).

<sup>210</sup> In Advisory Opinion OC-16/99 of October 1, 1999, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights indicated that "for 'the due process of law' a defendant must be able to exercise his rights and defend his interests effectively and in full procedural equality with other defendants. It is important to recall that the judicial process is a means to ensure, insofar as possible, an equitable resolution of a difference. The body of procedures, of diverse character and generally grouped under the heading of the due process, is all calculated to serve that end. To protect the individual and see justice done, the historical development of the judicial process has introduced new procedural rights. An example of the evolutive nature of judicial process are the rights not to incriminate oneself and to have an attorney present when one speaks. These two rights are already part of the laws and jurisprudence of the more advanced legal systems. And so, the body of judicial guarantees given in Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights has evolved gradually. It is a body of judicial guarantees to which others of the same character, conferred by various instruments of international law, can and should be added.

II

In this Opinion, the Court has ruled on the rights that States must recognize and apply to workers who, due to different circumstances, emigrate from their countries in search of economic well-being, and who, because they do not have legal migratory status, may become victims of violations of such rights as their labor rights, and their rights to decent treatment, equality and non-discrimination. In this respect, the State that requested the Court to render an Opinion referred specifically to the fact that almost six million Mexican workers are outside national territory; and, of these, approximately two and a half million are undocumented migrant workers. It added that "in less than five months (in 2002), the Government of Mexico had to intervene, through its consular representatives, in the defense of the human rights of Mexican nationals in approximately 383 cases, in order to protect migrant workers with regard to employment-related discrimination, unpaid wages, and compensation for occupational illnesses and accidents, among others matters."

Likewise, Judge Antonio Cançado Trindade, in a study on enforced migratory flows, indicated that "... migrants seeking work and better living conditions amount to 80 million human beings today... The causes of forced migrations are basically no different from those of population displacement. In a 1992 analytical report on internally displaced persons, the Secretary General of the United Nations identified natural disasters, armed conflict, generalized violence and systematic human rights violations among the causes of massive involuntary migrations within State borders."<sup>211</sup>

According to Judge Cançado Trindade, other causes of massive migrations are, "the multiple internal conflicts, of an ethnic and religious nature, repressed in the past but set in motion in recent years. These are supplemented by the increase in chronic poverty, which, according to the United Nations Development Programme, today affects more than 270 million persons in Latin America alone... ." According to a report of the United Nations human rights body<sup>212</sup>, the causes of contemporary migrations in search of work are fundamentally poverty and the inability to earn or produce enough for personal or family subsistence in the country of origin. These reasons characterize not only migration from poor States to rich ones; poverty also encourages movement from developing countries to other countries where the work prospects appear to be better, at least from a distance. According to this report, there are other reasons that explain the departure abroad in search of work. War, civil conflict, insecurity or persecution derived from discrimination due to race, ethnic origin, color, religion, language or political opinions are all factors that contribute to the flow of migrant workers.

III

Limited to the strictly juridical sphere, established by regulatory, statutory and convention-related instruments that govern its proceedings, in exercise of its competence, the Court cannot go beyond the interpretation and application of legal norms in its judgments and advisory opinions. However, it is impossible to prevent the human tragedy underlying the cases it hears from being reflected in the Court's proceedings and reports. Frequently, the statements of the victims or of their next of kin, who resort to the Court seeking justice, have moved the judges profoundly. The arbitrary death of children, of youth or, in general, of any person; enforced disappearance; torture; illegal imprisonment, and other human rights violations, submitted to the Court's consideration and decision, cannot be resolved by mere legal concepts; not even bearing in mind the Court's efforts to try and provide reparations for the damages suffered by the victims that go beyond monetary compensation. It continues to be an ideal – whose achievement depends on the development of a new collective conception of justice – that these violations should never be repeated and that, if they are, their authors should be severely punished. In this Opinion, stated in concrete legal – but also humanistic – terms, and taking into account the international obligations assumed by States, the Court has defined the conduct that States should observe in order to respect and guarantee the rights of undocumented migrants, to prevent them from becoming victims of exploitation or discrimination in the enjoyment and exercise of their labor rights. It is a ruling of the Court on the interpretation and application of norms that are in force and that are universally accepted because they are grounded on principles of ius cogens, that obliges all States equally; however, this ruling also contains an implicit call for social justice and human solidarity.

IV

In particular – and due to the possibility of doing so in this separate opinion – I consider that the tragedy represented in each case of forced migration, whatever its cause, cannot be bypassed for mere juridical considerations. Thus, the tragedy of all those who, against their will, abandon their country of origin, their home, their parents, their spouse, their children, their memories, in order to confront generally hostile conditions and become the target of human and labor exploitation owing to their particularly vulnerable situation, should give us cause for reflection. In addition to trying to repair the consequences of forced migrations, through instruments of international law, the creation of courts, migratory policies and administrative or other measures, the international community should also concern itself with investigating the real causes of migration and ensure that people are not forced to emigrate. In this way, it would be discovered that, apart from inevitable natural events, on many occasions migrations are the result of the impoverishment of countries, due to erroneous economic policies, which exclude numerous sectors of the population, together with the generalized fact of corruption. Other factors include dictatorships or populist regimes; irrational extraction from poor countries of raw materials for processing abroad by transnational companies, and the exploitation of workers with the tolerance and complicity of Governments; vast social and economic imbalances and injustice; lack of national educational policies that cover the entire population, guaranteeing professional development and training for productive work; excessive publicity which leads to consumerism and the illusion of well-being in highly developed countries; absence of genuine international cooperation in the national development plans; and macro-economic development policies that ignore social justice.

Faced with the magnitude of these problems, proposals have been formulated, some addressed at the construction of a new international order based on justice and the strengthening of democracy. In his book "El derecho Internacional de los Derechos Humanos en el siglo XXI", Judge Cançado Trindade considers that "... according to recent information from UNDP and CEPAL, the current phenomenon of impoverishment, and of the significant growth of contingents of "new poor" in so many Latin American countries, reveals the failure to observe, and even the generalized violation of, economic, social and cultural rights. Certain rights, of an economic and social nature, such as the rights not to be submitted to forced labor or to discrimination in relation to employment, and also freedom of association to form labor unions, are closely linked to the so-called civil liberties... The 1992 Human Development Report of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) indicates that 'democracy and freedom depend on much more than the vote'. The expansion of democracy has been complemented by a greater acknowledgment of human rights. In brief, there are no human rights without democracy, as there is no democracy without human rights... Participative democracy and, in the final analysis, human development itself, are only possible within the framework of human rights... Today, the concept of democracy embraces both political democracy (with an emphasis on formal democratic processes) and "development democracy; in the latter, 'civil and political rights are considered vehicles for the advancement of the equality of conditions, and not merely opportunities.' ...The interrelation of human rights and democracy nowadays finds expression in the provisions of general human rights instruments at the global and regional level."<sup>213</sup>

In Advisory Opinion OC-9/87 of October 6, 1987, the Court indicated, as it had in previous Opinions (OC-5/85, OC-6/86, OC-8/87), that the rule of law, democracy and personal freedom are consubstantial with the regime of human rights protection contained in the Convention and added: "In a democratic society, the rights and freedoms inherent in the human person, the guarantees applicable to them and the rule of law form a triad. Each component thereof defines itself, complements and depends on the others for its meaning."

It is possible that the establishment of a just society begins with the strengthening of a genuine democracy that fully guarantees the dignity of the human being.

PREFACE

The parties

1. The Claimant S.D. Myers, Inc. (“SDMI”) is a privately held corporation established and existing in the State of Ohio, United States of America (“USA”).
2. SDMI has its principal place of business at 180 South Avenue, Tallmadge, Ohio 44278, USA.
3. The Respondent is the Government of Canada (“CANADA”), having its address for service at the Office of the Deputy Attorney-General of Canada, Justice Building, 248 Wellington Street Ottawa, Ontario, KIA OH8, Canada.
4. CANADA is a Party to the North American Free Trade Agreement (the “NAFTA”).

The Existence of a Dispute

5. SDMI claims that it was an “Investor” in Canada and that it owned an “Investment” in Canada as defined in the NAFTA.
6. CANADA denies that SDMI was an “Investor” or that it owned an “Investment”.
7. SDMI claims that it has suffered loss or damage as a result of one or more breaches by CANADA of its obligations under Chapter 11 of the NAFTA.

8. CANADA denies that it was in breach of its obligations under the NAFTA or that SDMI suffered any loss or damage.

The Disputes Resolution Provisions

9. Part B of Chapter 11 of the NAFTA (Articles 1115 to 1138) contains the relevant disputes resolution provisions.
10. On July 22, 1998 SDMI delivered a Notice of Intent to Submit a Claim to Arbitration under Part B of Chapter 11 of the NAFTA.
11. Pursuant to Article 1120 of the NAFTA, SDMI elected to submit its claims under the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules 1976 (the “Rules”).
12. On October 30, 1998 SDMI delivered a Notice of Arbitration pursuant to Article 3 of the Rules. The arbitration is deemed to have been “commenced” on that date pursuant to Article 3.1 of the Rules.
13. By letter dated November 6, 1998 CANADA notified SDMI that Ms. Valerie Hughes was appointed as CANADA’s representative pursuant to Article 4 of the Rules.

The Tribunal

14. On January 11, 1999 SDMI nominated Professor Bryan Schwartz of Winnipeg, Manitoba, to be the arbitrator appointed by it pursuant to Article 1123 of the NAFTA.
15. On January 27, 1999 CANADA nominated Mr. Bob Rae of Toronto, Ontario, to be the arbitrator appointed by it pursuant to Article 1123 of the NAFTA.

16. By letter dated February 16, 1999 the Disputing Parties jointly invited Professor J. Martin Hunter of London, England to accept appointment as the third and presiding arbitrator. On March 2, 1999 Professor Hunter and the representatives of the Disputing Parties held a telephone conference.
17. By letter dated March 4, 1999 Professor Hunter formally confirmed to the Disputing Parties' representatives his acceptance of appointment as presiding arbitrator.
18. The Tribunal was thus duly constituted and became seized of the arbitration on March 4, 1999.

CHAPTER II
HISTORY OF THE PROCEEDINGS

20. By letter dated March 8, 1999 CANADA requested the consent of the Tribunal to its constitution and membership being made public. By letter dated March 24, 1999 the Tribunal confirmed that it had no objection to the existence of the arbitration and the names of its members being placed in the public domain.
21. By the same letter dated March 24, 1999 the Tribunal sent an “agenda of procedural matters” to the Disputing Parties in order to ascertain the extent that they were agreed on the overall procedural structure for the arbitration.
22. By letter dated April 19, 1999, having considered the replies of the Disputing Parties to the Tribunal’s agenda of procedural matters, the Tribunal informed the Disputing Parties that there appeared to be some unresolved fundamental procedural issues between them and that a meeting between the Tribunal and the Disputing Parties should be held before the Tribunal made an order designed to establish the procedural structure for the arbitration.
23. By letter dated April 22, 1999 the Tribunal notified the Disputing Parties that it would hold a first case management meeting with them in Toronto, on May 20, 1999.
24. By letter dated May 3, 1999 the Tribunal sent a provisional draft Procedural Order No. 1 to the Disputing Parties to act as an agenda for the first case management meeting.
25. By letter dated May 11, 1999 SDMI, while not alleging actual bias, submitted a challenge under Article 12.1 of the Rules to the Secretary-General of ICSID (in his capacity as appointing authority), objecting to the continued participation of Mr. Rae as a member of the Tribunal on the ground of an appearance of lack of independence because Mr. Rae was a registered lobbyist.

26. On May 20, 1999 the first case management meeting was held, in Toronto.
27. By letter dated May 28, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 1 (establishing an overall procedural framework for the arbitration) and Procedural Order No. 2 (dealing with the confidentiality of certain documents prepared by the Disputing Parties in connection with the arbitration).
28. By letter dated June 2, 1999 the Secretary-General of ICSID informed the Tribunal and the Disputing Parties that he would uphold the challenge of Mr. Rae unless he discontinued his activities as a registered lobbyist in connection with the Softwood Lumber Agreement between the USA and CANADA.
29. By letter dated June 3, 1999 Mr. Rae notified his resignation from the Tribunal to the Secretary-General of ICSID.
30. By letter dated June 10, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 3, which amended Procedural Order No. 2 at the request of CANADA.
31. By letter dated June 18, 1999 CANADA (having been granted a short extension of time) submitted its Statement of Defence pursuant to Article 19 of the Rules. (SDMI had delivered its Statement of Claim under Article 18 of the Rules, with its Notice of Arbitration on October 30, 1998, before the Tribunal had been established.)
32. By letter dated June 24, 1999 CANADA notified the Tribunal and SDMI that it designated Mr. Edward C. Chiasson Q.C. of Vancouver, British Columbia, as the arbitrator to replace Mr. Bob Rae pursuant to Article 13 of the Rules. The newly constituted Tribunal determined pursuant to Article 4 of the Rules that it would not be necessary to repeat any part of the proceedings.

33. By letter dated July 6, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 4, which extended the period of time for which Procedural Order No. 3 would remain effective.
34. By letter dated July 20, 1999 SDMI submitted its Memorial and its Reply to CANADA's Statement of Defence.
35. On July 28, 1999 the Tribunal held a telephone conference call with the representatives of the Disputing Parties for the purpose of hearing argument on issues that had arisen between them as to the scope of the documents to be produced pursuant to requests made under the relevant provisions of Procedural Order No. 1.
36. On the same day, July 28, 1999, after deliberations, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 5. This Order established a procedure for the determination of disputes arising from the requests for document production under the provisions of Procedural Order No. 1.
37. On September 2, 1999 a second case management meeting was held, in Toronto.
38. By letter dated September 4, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 6 concerning matters arising from requests for the production of documents and certain other matters arising out of procedural Order No. 1.
39. By letter dated September 17, 1999 the Clerk of the Privy Council of CANADA notified the Tribunal that CANADA claimed Crown privilege<sup>1</sup> in respect of certain documents ordered to be produced by Procedural Order No. 6.
40. By letter dated September 19, 1999 with the consent of the Disputing Parties, the Tribunal wrote to the other NAFTA Parties (MEXICO and the USA) to:

...enquire whether your Government wishes to make any submissions to the Tribunal in this arbitration; and, if so, to establish an appropriate procedure that will ensure the orderly and expeditious future conduct of the proceedings

41. By letter dated September 23, 1999 CANADA sought certain urgent procedural directions from the Tribunal.
42. By letter dated October 4, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 7, which contained determinations on the outstanding procedural issues.
43. By letter dated October 5, 1999 following a request by CANADA, the Tribunal communicated to the Disputing Parties a summary of its reasons for the decisions contained in Procedural Order No. 7.
44. By letter dated October 8, 1999 MEXICO notified the Tribunal that it would send representatives to the third case management meeting scheduled for October 28, 1999 and by letter of the same date, the USA notified the Tribunal that it also would send representatives to the third case management meeting.
45. On October 28, 1999 a third case management meeting was held in Toronto. Representatives of MEXICO and the USA were present in addition to the representatives of the Disputing Parties.
46. By letter dated October 31, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 8 and also confirmed that the Tribunal accepted the basis for calculation of arbitrators' fees proposed by the Disputing Parties.
47. By letter dated November 1, 1999 the Tribunal confirmed to MEXICO and the USA the procedural arrangements it proposed in respect of their participation in the arbitration.

48. By letter dated November 4, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 9, which gave further directions concerning document production, witness testimony and an option to the parties to deliver Supplemental Memorials.
49. By letter dated November 11, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 11 concerning confidentiality in materials produced in the arbitration.
50. By letter dated November 16, 1999 the Tribunal sent to the Disputing Parties Procedural Order No. 10 concerning CANADA's claims in respect of Crown privilege, together with an explanatory note.
51. By letter dated November 26, 1999 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 12, concerning written questions to be addressed to certain witnesses.
52. By letter dated December 10, 1999 CANADA delivered the affidavits of Messrs. Plummer, Mayne and Fosbrooke, as directed by Procedural Order No. 12.
53. By letter dated December 10, 1999 the Clerk of the Privy Council of Canada notified the Tribunal that CANADA claimed Crown privilege in relation to the documents listed in a schedule attached to his letter.
54. By letter dated December 13, 1999 CANADA delivered to SDMI a list of "severed documents" as well as the documents themselves. By the same letter CANADA confirmed its belief that it had by that date fully complied with the Procedural Orders Nos. 9 and 10.
55. By letter dated December 14, 1999 SDMI delivered its Supplemental Memorial.
56. By letter dated December 14, 1999 CANADA delivered its Supplemental Memorial.

57. By letter dated December 22, 1999 CANADA requested the Tribunal to give directions for the exchange of reports of expert witnesses on U.S. law and their examination at the hearing.
58. By letter dated December 22, 1999 SDMI objected to the introduction of expert testimony at this stage of the proceedings.
59. By letter dated December 23, 1999 CANADA replied to SDMI's objections concerning the introduction of expert testimony on U.S. law.
60. By letter dated December 31, 1999 the Tribunal notified the Disputing Parties that it expected to receive argument on U.S. law issues through counsel (or co-counsel) at the hearing rather than through expert witnesses and in Procedural Order No. 13 gave the Tribunal's directions for the exchange of "Memoranda on U.S. Law Issues".
61. By letter dated January 14, 2000 MEXICO delivered its Submission pursuant to Article 1128 of the NAFTA.
62. By letter dated January 14, 2000 CANADA's U.S. co-counsel, Garvey, Schubert & Barer, delivered CANADA's Memorandum on U.S. Law Issues.
63. By letter dated January 18, 2000 CANADA notified SDMI and the Tribunal that neither of the disputing parties in the NAFTA Chapter 11 Arbitral Tribunal in Metalclad -v- MEXICO arbitration objected to the release to SDMI of the Notice of Claim in that case, and attached a copy of that document.
64. By letter dated January 24, 2000 the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 14, notifying the Disputing Parties of certain detailed directions for the conduct of the hearing.

65. By a further letter dated January 24, 2000, in reply to certain questions raised by the Disputing Parties, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 16 giving supplementary directions concerning the duration of the hearing, time limits for cross-examination and counsels' opening statements.
66. By letter dated January 24, 2000 SDMI delivered its Pre-Hearing Memorandum pursuant to paragraph 22 of Procedural Order No. 1 and a brief reply to CANADA's Supplemental Memorial pursuant to paragraph 13 of Procedural Order No. 9.
67. By letter dated January 24, 2000 CANADA delivered its Pre-Hearing Memorandum pursuant to paragraph 22 of Procedural Order No. 1.
68. By letter dated January 25, 2000 CANADA requested further directions concerning the cross-examination of witnesses, including the unavailability of Mr. Roy Hickman to be present in person.
69. By letter dated January 28, 2000 SDMI delivered a Response to MEXICO's Submission dated January 14, 2000.
70. By letter dated January 31, 2000 the Tribunal issued further directions concerning the matters raised by CANADA in its letter of January 25 2000, introducing those directions with the following paragraph:

The Tribunal considers that the general principle to be applied is that, where written direct testimony is submitted with a memorial as evidence on which the relevant party relies, the witness in question should be offered for oral examination at the witness hearings unless the opposing party states that his or her presence is not required. Where a party fails or refuses to produce any such witness the written testimony will not be ruled inadmissible, but the Tribunal is likely to attach little or no weight to the written testimony concerned to the extent that it is not corroborated by other documentary or witness evidence. However, exceptional circumstances may justify exceptional measures, especially where the Tribunal itself wishes to have the benefit of hearing a particular witness 'live'. Applying this principle to the present circumstances the Tribunal directs as follows:...

71. By letter dated February 4, 2000 SDMI raised certain matters concerning the directions given in Procedural Order No. 16.
72. By letter dated February 4, 2000 CANADA raised certain matters concerning MEXICO's Submission.
73. By letter dated February 4, 2000 SDMI replied to the matters raised by CANADA concerning MEXICO's Submission and also raised certain matters concerning the confidentiality of material prepared for and submitted in the arbitration.
74. By letter dated February 6, 2000 CANADA raised certain matters concerning the requests for the examination of witnesses at the hearing.
75. By letter dated February 7, 2000 SDMI delivered its Reply Memorandum on U.S. Law Issues pursuant to Procedural Order No. 13.
76. By letter dated February 8, 2000 the Tribunal replied to the parties' several letters dated February 4, 6 and 7, 2000 in order to resolve certain "eleventh hour" procedural matters raised by the parties.
77. By letter dated February 11, 2000 MEXICO notified the Tribunal that Messrs. Luis Ernesto Gonzalez Rojas and J. Cameron Mowatt would attend the hearing.
78. By letter dated February 11, 2000 the USA notified the Tribunal that Ms. Andrea J. Mcnaker would attend the hearing.

79. The substantive hearing took place in Toronto on February 14, 15 and 16, 2000. SDMI was represented by Mr. Barry Appleton and his colleagues, I. Laird, R. Sharma and T. Weiler. CANADA was represented by Mr. Joseph de Pencier and his colleagues B. Evernden, S. Tabet, E. Leroux and F. Fracassi as well as U.S. co-counsel.

80. After short opening statements from counsel for each party the following witnesses were heard:

Rev Michael Valentine
Mr. Seth Myers
Mr. Dana Myers
Mr. John Mylicki
Mr. Vic Shantora

(listed in order of appearance)

81. Closing statements by counsel for the Disputing Parties, CANADA's U.S. co-counsel and an oral statement by Mr. Cameron Mowatt on behalf of MEXICO were heard on February 16, 2000.

82. A verbatim transcript of the hearing was prepared and forms part of the record in the arbitration, together with all the other written submissions and documentary and witness evidence presented to the Tribunal during the proceedings.

83. The Tribunal started its deliberations on February 17, 2000 and thereafter deliberated on several occasions.

84. By letter dated July 4, 2000 CANADA delivered to the Tribunal a redacted copy of an Interim Award of the NAFTA Chapter 11 Arbitral Tribunal in Pope & Talbot v. Government of Canada together with a request that the Tribunal should give procedural directions for the Disputing Parties and the Parties to have an opportunity to make further written submissions.

85. By letter dated July 6, 2000 SDMI stated that while it had no objection to the Tribunal reading and taking account of this award (or any other international decision), SDMI did object to the Tribunal's deliberations being disrupted by further argument.

86. By letter dated August 14, 2000 the Tribunal sent to the Disputing Parties Procedural Order No. 18 concerning CANADA's request for an opportunity to deliver further written argument.

87. Where this award is not unanimous, the Tribunal so states and expresses in summary form the views of the minority.

CHAPTER III
THE FACTUAL BACKGROUND

88. By the end of the 20th Century Tallmadge, Ohio, had a population of around 15,000. It is not a large community by modern standards. It is situated about 50 kilometres South East of Cleveland, in the suburban environs of Akron, and is approximately 100 kilometres South of that part of the U.S./Canadian border that runs through Lake Erie.
89. Mr. Stanley Myers founded his business in Tallmadge in 1965. At that time he was engaged primarily in maintaining and repairing transformers and other industrial electrical equipment. In due time, the business flourished and became one of the two largest employers in Tallmadge. Later, Stanley Myers handed over ownership of the business to his four sons leaving the eldest, Dana, with 51% of the share capital of the principal company within the group. At the time of the events that gave rise to this arbitration Mr. Dana Myers was chief executive officer of SDMI, which by then had an annual turnover of some $25 million.
90. Historically, SDMI's core businesses were transformer oil testing, oil reclaiming, and rewinding, rebuilding, manufacturing transformers. It returned to these businesses in 1999 when its PCB remediation activities in the USA were sold. This aspect of the Claimant's business had begun in earnest in the 1980's.<sup>2</sup>
91. PCB remediation in this context consists of analysing equipment and oil to assess the level of contamination, the transportation of the oil or equipment to a facility and the extraction of the PCBs from the materials so transported. The decontaminated components of the equipment and the oil are recycled. The extracted PCBs and PCB waste material then is destroyed.<sup>3</sup>

92. SDMI's interest in Canada developed in the 1990's as the U.S. market declined. Mr. Dana Myers testified that SDMI went into the Canadian market because ...that's going to extend the usefulness of our facility. It's going to extend our business.<sup>4</sup> The PCB remediation business was working its way out of existence, because no new PCBs were being manufactured and the world's stockpiled inventory was decreasing as SDMI and its competitors did their work.<sup>5</sup>
93. Although SDMI did give consideration to developing a treatment facility in Canada, the focus of the Canadian project was to obtain PCB waste for treatment by SDMI in its U.S. facility.<sup>6</sup> It was envisaged that Canadian entities would contract for the treatment of their waste in the USA and that Myers Canada would receive a percentage of the contract as its remuneration. The business was done by marketing, customer contact, testing and assessment of oil and other like services. SDMI personnel from the USA participated in these activities.
94. The term "PCB" is an abbreviation for a synthetic chemical compound known as polychlorinated biphenyl. This compound consists of chlorine, carbon and hydrogen and has a combination of properties that provide an inert, fire-resistant and insulating material. This makes the compound suitable for insulation. PCBs were used mainly in electrical equipment and to a lesser extent in other products. PCBs biodegrade slowly and remain in the environment for a long time. To eliminate them from the environment, PCBs must be disposed of through either a process of thermal destruction at high temperatures or by chemical processing. Landfilling is also used as a means of disposal, but this method merely contains the material in a relatively safe manner and does not result in the removal of the substance from the environment.

<sup>6</sup> Mr. Jeff Smith, then employed as a political assistant to the Minister of the Environment, was asked if CANADA would be willing to provide funds to SDMI for the purpose of constructing a treatment facility in Canada. The answer was 'No'.

95. The most widely used technique for destroying PCBs is high temperature incineration, typically at temperatures of about 1200 degrees Centigrade. Most incinerators can accept the full range of PCB wastes, including high and low concentration PCB liquids, PCB contaminated soils and electrical equipment. Before incineration, electrical equipment is either shredded or pre-cleaned with heat or solvents to facilitate metal recycling and to reduce the amount of material to be incinerated.
96. Air pollution control equipment is used to clean the incinerator stack gases by removing hydrogen chloride gas, particulate matter and other compounds, such as dioxins and furans. These are by-products of the incineration process and are highly toxic. When properly conducted, incineration is a highly efficient means of destroying PCBs and is used in many countries throughout the world, but a poorly operated incinerator can be a major source of air pollution.
97. Chemical treatment is often used to destroy PCBs found at concentrations of less than 1000 parts per million. Such concentrations are sometimes found in oil from transformers that has been inadvertently contaminated when the transformers were serviced.
98. By the early 1970s PCBs had become recognised as highly toxic substances that harmed both human and animal health. Since that time PCBs have been the subject of increasingly strict regimes of regulation both in Canada and internationally.
99. In February 1973 the OECD, of which CANADA is a member, adopted a Council Decision urging member countries to limit the use of PCBs and to control them in a manner designed to minimise risk to human health and the environment. Thereafter, together with other nations, the USA and CANADA banned future production of PCBs and joined the international community in attempting to determine the best way of resolving the substantial environmental problem caused by existing PCBs.

100. In 1977 CANADA added PCBs to the toxic substances listed under the Environmental Contaminants Act and prohibited the use of PCBs in new products manufactured in or imported into Canada. This legislation was later replaced by the CEPA which came into force on June 30, 1988. The regime imposed by the CEPA were in turn supplemented by the PCB Waste Export Regulations 1990, which effectively banned the export of PCB waste from Canada to all countries other than the USA. Under these regulations exports to the USA were permitted with the prior approval of the US EPA.
101. The position in the USA was not dissimilar. In 1980 the USA closed its borders to the import and export of PCBs and PCB waste for disposal. Since then the U.S.-Canadian border has been closed so far as PCBs are concerned. It was open to imports from CANADA from November 15, 1995 to July 20, 1997.<sup>7</sup>
102. In the USA PCBs primarily are regulated under the federal TCSA, which imposes restrictions on the manufacture, sale, use, import, export, and disposal of PCBs and PCB contaminated waste. The US EPA may grant an operator exemption for one year if it were satisfied that the activity would not result in unreasonable risk to human health or the environment and that the applicant has made good faith efforts to develop a substitute that does not represent an unreasonable risk.
103. At the international level, in 1986 CANADA and the USA entered into the Transboundary Agreement, which contemplated the possibility of cross-border activity. The recitals contain the following passage:

Recognizing that the close trading relationship and the long common border between the United States and CANADA engender opportunities for a generator of hazardous waste to benefit from using the nearest appropriate disposal facility, which may involve the transboundary shipment of hazardous waste:

104. During the arbitration CANADA took the position that this agreement did not cover PCBs because PCB wastes have never been classified as a “hazardous waste” in the USA. SDMI responded that, pursuant to the terms of the Transboundary Agreement, it was not necessary for PCBs to be so classified.<sup>8</sup>
105. In March 1989 a number of countries including CANADA signed the Basel Convention. This convention deals with international traffic in PCBs and other hazardous wastes. It was developed under the auspices of the United Nations Environment Programme. Although the USA signed the Basel Convention it had not ratified it by the time of the events under review in this arbitration.
106. State parties to the Basel Convention accept the obligation to ensure that hazardous wastes are managed in an environmentally sound manner. The Basel Convention establishes rules and procedures to govern the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes and their disposal. Amongst other things, it prohibits the export and import of hazardous wastes from and to states that are not party to the Basel Convention (Article 4(5)), unless such movement is subject to bilateral, multilateral or regional agreements or arrangements whose provisions are not less stringent than those of the Basel Convention (Article 11).
107. The Basel Convention also requires appropriate measures to ensure the availability of adequate disposal facilities for the environmentally sound management of hazardous wastes that are located within it (Article 4(2)(b)). It also requires that the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes be reduced to the minimum consistent with the environmentally sound and efficient management of such wastes and be conducted in a manner that will protect human health and the environment (Article 4(2)(d)).
108. Following signature of the Basel Convention, but before it came into force, the CCME, which includes the Federal and provincial ministers responsible for the environment, agreed that the destruction of PCBs should be carried out to the maximum extent possible within Canadian borders. At the same time, CANADA confirmed its policy that PCB wastes from Federal sites would not be exported for disposal in other countries.

109. This was the regulatory and policy background that confronted SDMI in 1990 when it began its efforts to obtain the necessary approvals to import electrical transformers and other equipment containing PCB wastes into the USA from Canada. By this time SDMI had become one of the most prominent operators in the PCB disposal industry in the USA. It also had expanded into Australia, MEXICO and South Africa and was looking for other markets in which its expertise could be deployed.
110. SDMI possessed full details of the PCBs inventory in Canada, because a computerised database was available freely. It also knew that it could compete successfully against the Canadian hazardous waste disposal industry, which was virtually non-existent in 1990.
111. In 1993, Myers Canada was incorporated under the Canada Business Corporations Act.
112. Even by 1993, when SDMI entered the Canadian market, there was only one credible Canadian competitor: Chem-Security, which was located in Swan Hills, Alberta. As the majority of the Canadian PCB inventory was in Ontario and Quebec - several thousand kilometres from Alberta - SDMI possessed a significant cost advantage as against Chem-Security and, indeed, as against many of its U.S. competitors.
113. SDMI started a lobbying campaign which involved making numerous petitions to the US EPA in the USA (there were two in August 1993 alone) and many representations to Environment Canada. In Canada, SDMI enlisted the assistance of several potential Canadian customers who were under pressure to dispose of their PCB waste and wanted to have it done as cost-effectively as possible.

114. Research carried out by CANADA for the purposes of the arbitration indicated that SDMI's lobbying ...involved at least 2 mayors, 6 Congressmen, 2 Senators, a County Executive, the US Chamber of Commerce... and others.
115. The position was clearly moving towards a critical point in the USA during the spring and summer of 1995. All the players were expecting a significant development. Whichever way the USA moved there would be considerable publicity. A number of participants had much to gain and much to lose.
116. The position in Canada was equally sensitive. In answer to a parliamentary question on July 9, 1995, the then Minister for the Environment is recorded by Hansard as saying:

It is still the position of the government that the handling of PCBs should be done in Canada by Canadians [emphasis added]

This may have reflected a movement from the 1989 policy, referred to above, that CANADA's policy (in line with the Basel Convention), was simply that disposal of PCBs should take place in Canada.

117. The Tribunal received a substantial amount of evidence concerning SDMI's activities during the period 1990 to the Fall of 1995. In summary, SDMI through its employees and the employees of Myers Canada, contacted Canadian PCB holders with the objective of having their PCBs remediated by SDMI using its facilities in the USA. Marketing initiatives were undertaken and assessments made of PCB contaminated equipment. Equipment was drained and transportation organized.
118. That evidence may be relevant to other questions that arise in the case, but no more need be said about it for the purposes of this narrative of the events giving rise to the measure taken by CANADA to close the border to the transit of PCBs. For present purposes, it is sufficient to record that on October 26, 1995 the US EPA issued an enforcement discretion to SDMI, valid from November 15, 1995 to December 31, 1997, for the purpose of importing PCBs and PCB waste from Canada into the USA for disposal.

119. The term “enforcement discretion” is not defined in U.S. law, but apparently means that the US EPA would not to enforce the U.S. regulations banning importation of PCBs against SDMI, provided that SDMI met the detailed conditions that were attached to the US EPA’s October 26, 1995 letter (which included “no landfilling”). The import ban itself would remain in place and any imports to the USA technically would be contrary to U.S. law. Following the decision relating to SDMI, the US EPA (as predicted in its October 26, 1995 letter) granted further enforcement discretions to about nine other U.S. companies, permitting them to import PCBs and PCB waste from Canada for disposal.

120. From early 1995 CANADA was well aware that the US EPA was likely to take action to open the border within a relatively short period, but the Tribunal accepts that CANADA’s ministers and their officials were taken by surprise by the lack of government-to-government consultation, the timing and the method used by the US EPA to achieve this result.

121. A period of intensive activity followed, both inside and outside Canadian government circles. Within government, a number of meetings took place and a number of memoranda were circulated. Undoubtedly, there were legitimate concerns. These were listed in CANADA’s Counter Memorial as follows:

- whether the enforcement discretion fully complied with U.S. law;
- whether exports of PCB wastes to the U.S., a non-party, would comply with the Basel Convention;
- whether PCBs would be disposed of in the U.S. in an environmentally sound manner;
- compliance with CANADA’s 1989 policy to destroy Canadian PCBs in CANADA;
- the long-term viability of domestic PCB disposal facilities; and

- what would happen in the event that U.S. disposal facilities subsequently became unavailable, or if the U.S. border was closed again, as eventually happened.

122. Simultaneously, the fledgling Canadian PCB disposal industry started a vigorous lobbying campaign designed to persuade CANADA to maintain the closed status of the border. For example, on November 1, 1995 a letter written by the General Manager of Chem-Security to the Minister of the Environment stated:

I am writing to reaffirm your commitment to assist the Canadian hazardous waste industry by removing the exemption which allows export of PCB waste to the United States and to underline the urgency of the situation currently facing the industry...

You should be aware that EPA estimates that it will take only approximately 30 days to import the entire Canadian PCB inventory.

You will recall that we stressed the fact that the inventory is a finite resource which is vital to our industry's growth and our ability to provide capital for the export of our technology. Any delay in the Canadian response to the EPA action could have serious repercussions.

123. On November 16, 1995 the Minister of the Environment signed an Interim Order that had the effect of banning the export of PCBs from Canada. This order was defective for procedural reasons and, after the procedural defect had been remedied, on November 20, 1995 the Minister approved and signed the following Interim Order which was in the same terms:

INTERIM ORDER RESPECTING THE PCB WASTE EXPORT REGULATIONS

WHEREAS PCB's are substances specified on the list of Toxic Substances in Schedule 1 to the Canadian Environmental Protection Act;

AND WHEREAS the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Health believe that PCBs are not adequately regulated and that immediate action is required to deal with a significant danger to the environment and to human life and health;

THEREFORE, the Minister of the Environment, pursuant to subsection 35(1) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, hereby makes the annexed Interim Order respecting the export of PCB wastes.

Ottawa, in the National Capital Region, November 20, 1995

The annexed Interim Order stated as follows:

INTERIM ORDER RESPECTING THE PCB WASTE EXPORT REGULATIONS

Short title:

This Order may be cited as the PCB Waste Export Interim Order

Amendment

Section 4 of the PCB Waste Export Regulations is replaced by the following:

“4. Section 3 does not apply to a person who exports:

(a) to the United States, any PCB waste from United States agencies operating in CANADA where the Environmental Protection Agency has given prior consent in respect of the export or

(b) any product that is in good working order and has a capacitor that contains not more than 500 µg of PCB and is an Integral part of the product where the capacitor is necessary for the operation of the producer.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

(This note is not part of the Order)

On becoming aware of information indicating that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency is allowing PCB imports into the U.S. from CANADA for destruction, the Minister of the Environment made this Interim Order to Amend the PCB Waste Export Regulations on November 20, 1995. The purpose of the Interim Order is to ensure that Canadian PCB Wastes are managed in an environmentally sound manner in CANADA and to prevent any possible significant danger to the environment or to human life or health.

124. Under Canadian law the Interim Order had to be approved by the Privy Council within fourteen days. This requirement led to further intensive activity within the government.

Among this activity two meetings were held at the offices of the Canadian Privy Council, at which several government departments were represented. These meetings are referred to in more detail later in this award.

125. The Interim Order was confirmed by the Canadian Privy Council on November 28, 1995 in the following terms:

ORDER IN COUNCIL DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Interim Order Respecting the PCB Waste Export Regulations

P.C. 1995 2013 November 28, 1995

Whereas, pursuant to subsection 35(1) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the Minister of the Environment, on November 20, 1995, made the annexed Interim Order respecting the PCB Waste Export Regulations to deal with a significant danger to the environment or to human life or health;

Whereas the Minister of the Environment has, within 24 hours after making the Order, offered to consult the governments of all the affected provinces to determine whether they are prepared to take sufficient action to deal with the significant danger;

Whereas the Minister of the Environment has consulted with other Ministers of the Crown in right of CANADA to determine whether any action can be taken under any other Act of Parliament to deal with the significant danger;

And whereas less than 14 days have elapsed since the Order was made;

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of the Environment pursuant to subsection 35(3) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, is pleased hereby to approve the annexed Interim Order respecting the PCB Waste Export Regulations, made by the Minister of the Environment on November 20, 1995.

INTERIM ORDER RESPECTING THE PCB WASTE EXPORT REGULATIONS

Whereas PCBs are substances specified on the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule 1 to the Canadian Environmental Protection Act;

And whereas the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of the National Health and Welfare believe that PCBs are not adequately regulated and that immediate action is required to deal with a significant danger to the environment and to human life and health;

Therefore, the Minister of the Environment pursuant to subsection 35(1) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, hereby makes the annexed Interim Order respecting the export of PCB wastes.

Ottawa, in the National Capital Region, November 20, 1995

SHEILA COPPS

Minister of the Environment

126. On February 26, 1995, by means of an Order in Council of the Governor General amending the PCB Waste Export Regulations, CANADA turned the Interim Order into a Final Order banning the commercial export of PCB waste for disposal. This Order was in the following terms:

WHEREAS, on November 20, 1995, the Minister of the Environment made, pursuant to subsection 35(1) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, the PCB Waste Export Interim Order.

WHEREAS, by Order in Council P.C. 1995 2013 of November 28, 1995 the Governor in Council approved the Interim Order pursuant to subsection 35(3) of the Act;

AND WHEREAS, pursuant to subsection 35(5) of the Act, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare within ninety days after approval of the Interim Order by the Governor in Council, recommended to the Governor in Council that the PM Waste Export Regulations be amended under section 34 of the Act to have the same effect as the Interim Order,

THEREFORE HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL on the recommendation of the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare pursuant to subsection 35(5) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is pleased hereby to accept the recommendation of the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the PCB Waste Export Regulations be amended under section 34 of the Act to have the same effect as the PCB Wage Export Interim Order.

127. In February 1997 CANADA opened the border by a further amendment to the PCB Waste Export Regulations. The border was closed (for the cross-border movement of PCBs and PCB waste) by regulations introduced by CANADA for a period of approximately 16 months, from November 20, 1995 to February 1997. Thereafter, the border was open and there were seven contracts pursuant to which PCBs and PCB waste material was exported from CANADA to the USA for processing by SDMI.
128. In July 1997 the border once again was closed to PCBs and PCB wastes as a result of a decision of the Ninth Circuit of the U.S. Court of Appeals. The overall effect of these events in Canada and the USA was that the border was only open for cross-border shipment of the materials in question from February to July 1997 – a period of approximately five months.

CHAPTER IV

SUMMARY OF THE POSITIONS OF THE PARTIES

SDMI's Claims

129. SDMI claims that CANADA failed to comply with its obligations under the NAFTA in four respects, as described in the following paragraphs.

Article 1102 – National Treatment

130. The NAFTA Article 1102 sets out the NAFTA's national treatment obligation for investment. SDMI contend that under Article 1102(2) the investments of investors of other NAFTA Parties must be given the best in jurisdiction treatment with respect to the establishment, acquisition, expansion, management, conduct, operation and sale or other disposition of investments in like circumstances to the investments of Canadian investors.<sup>9</sup> SDMI claims that, when read substantively, the national treatment obligation ensures that all companies, whether domestic or foreign, are treated equally and without discrimination. SDMI says that the PCB Waste Export Interim Order and Final Order constituted disguised discrimination aimed at SDMI and its investment in Canada contrary to Article 1102.

131. SDMI asserts that the Interim Order discriminated against U.S. waste disposal operators who sought to operate in Canada by preventing them from exporting PCB contaminated waste for processing in the USA. U.S. waste disposal companies were not permitted to operate in Canada in the same fashion as Canadian PCB waste disposal companies. CANADA limited SDMI's ability to carry out its operations on an arbitrary and discriminatory basis. SDMI claims that, by granting better treatment to Canadian waste disposal companies, CANADA breached its national treatment obligation under the NAFTA.

132. SDMI claims that, when preparing and effecting the measure, CANADA was well aware that SDMI had been operating in Canada and had been seeking to process, distribute and treat PCB contaminated wastes in the USA. SDMI claims that, on November 20, 1995 when CANADA issued the Interim Order, it was clear that CANADA knew that its export ban specifically would affect SDMI and its investment in Canada. SDMI says that the Interim Order was a clear and direct government measure aimed at prohibiting the export of Canadian PCB wastes to the USA by a U.S. PCB waste disposal company. SDMI claims that this was discrimination against it as a U.S. investor actively operating and competing within the Canadian marketplace.

133. SDMI asserts that the Interim Order was intended to curtail its operations and its investment in Canada. SDMI claims that while it was prohibited from conducting its business of exporting PCB contaminated wastes, Canadian based companies were given better treatment by being permitted to conduct their business in Canada without interference.

Article 1105 - Minimum Standard of Treatment

134. Article 1105 of the NAFTA requires the Parties to treat investors of another Party in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment. Article 1105 imports into the NAFTA the international law requirements of due process, economic rights, obligations of good faith and natural justice.

135. SDMI claims that in the making export bans, CANADA failed to accord to it and its Investment, treatment in accordance with international law in violation of Article 1105.

136. SDMI claims that the promulgation of the export ban by CANADA was done in a discriminatory and unfair manner that constituted a denial of justice and a violation of good faith under international law.

Article 1106 - Performance Requirements

137. The NAFTA Article 1106(1) prohibits a number of specific governmental activities collectively referred to as performance requirements. Under Article 1106(1), a Party must not impose or enforce a “requirement, commitment or undertaking” in connection with the establishment, acquisition, expansion, management, conduct or operation of an investment of an investor.

138. Under subparagraph (1)(b) of Article 1106, a Party may not require investors to include in their products or services an amount of goods or services that originate within the territory of that Party.

139. Under subparagraph (1)(c) of Article 1106, the Parties may not require investors to give any preferential treatment to any products or services made domestically. Investors cannot be required to acquire or use goods or services that originate within a Party.

140. SDMI claims that the Interim Order operated effectively to force it to dispose of PCB contaminated waste in Canada, if such disposal were to occur at all. SDMI says that this resulted in a performance requirement requiring PCB disposal operators to accord preference to Canadian goods and services and to achieve a given level of domestic content contrary to CANADA’s obligations under Article 1106.

141. SDMI claims that CANADA’s measures affecting the operations of PCB waste exporters were applied in an arbitrary and unjustifiable manner that also constituted a disguised restriction on international trade or investment.

Article 1110 - Expropriation

142. SDMI claims that Article 1110 of the NAFTA obliges the Parties to pay fair market value in the case of an expropriation or a measure tantamount to the expropriation of the property of an investor of another Party. The NAFTA does not define the term “expropriation”, but SDMI claims that Article 1110 clearly is designed to protect against direct and indirect measures by extending its coverage to “measures tantamount to expropriation”. Under international law, expropriation refers to the act by which governmental authority is used to deny some benefit of property. This denial can be actual or constructive.
143. SDMI contends that international law and the NAFTA both impose standards on the treatment of those whose property has been expropriated. Article 1110 does not prevent regulatory actions by governments. It merely requires governments to compensate investors for interference with their property rights. SDMI claims that CANADA has not paid any compensation to SDMI for this expropriation despite the requirement of Article 1110.

Losses Suffered by SDMI

144. SDMI claims that it has suffered or will suffer losses in the following categories as a result of CANADA’s breaches of its obligations under the NAFTA:

- i Lost sales and profits since the date of introduction of the measures;*
- ii Loss of its investment in its joint venture with Myers CANADA*
- iii The cost of reducing operations in CANADA;*
- iv Fees and expenses of professional services incurred to defend itself NAFTA inconsistent measure.*
- v Tax consequences of the award to maintain the integrity of the award.*

CANADA's Claims

145. CANADA claims that the Interim Order was not a measure that related to an investor or an investment in Canada.
146. Canada asserts that even if SDMI were to have had an investment in Canada, the Interim Order and Final Order did not breach any NAFTA Chapter 11 obligation owed to SDMI or to any investment it had in Canada.
147. CANADA claims that it has demonstrated its full compliance with its obligations under Chapter 11 and that, in any event, SDMI is not entitled to recover damages under the heads of damage or in the amounts claimed.
148. CANADA contends that if SDMI were to be successful it would require inflating the scope and application of Chapter 11 out of all proportion and that a proper construction of the provisions in question must result in dismissal of this claim.
149. CANADA says that, as the complaining party, SDMI bears the burden of proving its claim and that SDMI has not done so.
150. CANADA's position is that SDMI's construction of Chapter 11 is inconsistent with Canada's other international obligations, including the Basel Convention and Transboundary Agreement and that these prevail over Chapter 11 obligations in the circumstances to the extent of the inconsistency.
151. CANADA asserts that it was necessary for it to pass the Interim Order because the legality of the Enforcement Discretion was uncertain and it did not know whether PCBs were covered by the Transboundary Agreement.

152. CANADA says that the measure was made because CANADA believed PCBs are a significant danger to health and the environment when exported without appropriate assurances of safe transportation and destruction.
153. The Disputing Parties acknowledge that PCBs are highly toxic and harmful to human health and the environment. CANADA claims that the sudden and surprising US EPA decision to grant the enforcement discretion effectively opened the U.S. border and required prompt action on CANADA's part. Given the circumstances, CANADA had no duty to consult. CANADA's actions were in compliance with its domestic laws and with its international obligations. CANADA claims that there was no bad faith on its part in the making or implementation of the Interim Order.
154. CANADA claims that the Interim Order neither imposed nor enforced a prohibited performance requirement contrary to Article 1106(1)(b) or (c) of the NAFTA. The Interim Order imposed no requirement to buy Canadian goods or services or to achieve a certain level of Canadian content. The NAFTA lists all prohibited performance requirements. CANADA says that export bans are not a prohibited performance requirement.
155. CANADA claims that, even if the Interim Order were to have violated Article 1106, the Article's exception applies because it is a measure necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health or was necessary for the conservation of living or non-living exhaustible natural resource.
156. CANADA says that the Interim Order did not expropriate or constitute a measure tantamount to an expropriation of an investment contrary to Article 1110 of the NAFTA. Myers Canada continued operations in Canada while the Interim Order remained in force and afterwards; so did SDMI. There is no evidence that Myers Canada or SDMI sustained any loss while the Interim Order remained in force. Any losses sustained thereafter occurred as a consequence of events for which CANADA was not responsible. These events included, but may not be restricted to, the closing of the U.S. border to PCB waste exports by the US EPA in 1997.

157. CANADA claims that, as a result, SDMI is not entitled to the compensation or damages claimed, or any compensation or damages and that SDMI's claim is grossly exaggerated.
158. CANADA asserts that if Chapter 11 were interpreted with the result that it was violated by the Interim Order, Chapter 11 would be inconsistent with Chapter 3 of the NAFTA (Trade in Goods). In the event of inconsistency between Chapter 11 and another Chapter of NAFTA, Article 1112 requires Chapter 11 to give way. SDMI's claim would have to be dismissed.
159. CANADA adopts the positions taken by MEXICO which include the contention that because SDMI and Myers Canada were engaged in the provision of a service, Chapter 11 does not apply.
160. CANADA claims that it is entitled to the costs it has incurred in this arbitration.

CHAPTER V
THE EXPORT BAN

161. The intent of government is a complex and multifaceted matter. Government decisions are shaped by different politicians and officials with differing philosophies and perspectives. Each of the many persons involved in framing government policy may approach a problem from a variety of different policy objectives and may sometimes take into account partisan political factors or career concerns. The Tribunal can only characterize CANADA's motivation or intent fairly by examining the record of the evidence as a whole.
162. The evidence establishes that CANADA's policy was shaped to a very great extent by the desire and intent to protect and promote the market share of enterprises that would carry out the destruction of PCBs in Canada and that were owned by Canadian nationals. Other factors were considered, particularly at the bureaucratic level, but the protectionist intent of the lead minister in this matter was reflected in decision-making at every stage that led to the ban. Had that intent been absent, policy makers might have reached a conclusion in November 1995 that would have been consistent with the conclusion reached by CANADA when the ban was lifted in February 1997. CANADA's view in 1997 was that the opening of the U.S. border should be welcomed in the interests of expediting the elimination of PCBs from the environment, provided that any risks associated with exporting PCB waste to the U.S. was minimised through proper regulations and safeguards.
163. In order to explain the Tribunal's assessment of the events that took place some of the facts that appeared in the evidentiary record are set out in the paragraphs that follow.
164. On August 2, 1994 a briefing note prepared by Mr. John Hilborn and two other officials in the Department of the Environment stated that the US EPA might approve the import of PCBs from Canada. This briefing note concluded by advising that federal and provincial policies should be changed so as to open the border from the Canadian side, because such a policy would represent ...a technically and environmentally sound solution to the destruction of some of Canada's PCBs.<sup>10</sup>

165. A policy memorandum to the Minister of the Environment in the autumn of 1994, signed by Mr. H.A. Clarke, Assistant Deputy Minister, Environmental Protection Service, refers to a current policy that PCB waste be managed in Canada, but calls for a review of the policy based on the following factors.

- Our domestic destruction capacity, either short term or long term, has seen limited development;
- CANADA's position at Basel Convention meetings has been to support the use of regional capacity;
- The U.S. EPA is considering a change to their PCB policy and may permit selected Canadian PCB imports;
- The U.S. ban has effectively allowed CANADA to restrict PCB shipments to the U.S. in the absence of authority in CEPA to do so.<sup>11</sup>

166. In March 1995, federal and provincial officials discussed the issue of PCB waste shipments to the USA. According to a letter from the Minister of the Environment of the Province of Manitoba, dated December 18, 1995 ...the open border concept was specifically discussed and supported by all the jurisdictions. Environment CANADA's position was that the U.S. closed the border and it was the U.S. who could open it. Now, without prior consultation, the Interim Order [banning exports to the U.S., issued by the Minister of the Environment] seems to reverse the federal position.<sup>12</sup>

167. The Deputy Minister of the Environment<sup>13</sup> expressed support for the principle of opening the border at a meeting with Mr. Cloghesy in 1995.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>13</sup> Unless otherwise stated, references to "minister" and "ministries" are to those of the Federal Government.

168. In July 1995 senior officials of two Canadian operators of hazardous waste facilities, Chem-Security and Cintec, met the Minister of the Environment in her office. They warned that the US EPA might respond positively to lobbying to permit the import of PCB waste from Canada for disposal. It is clear from the account of Mr. Mathes, who attended that meeting on behalf of Chem-Security, that the arguments of the Canadian companies focused on the contention that U.S. competition would threaten the economic viability of their own operations. In addition to the account of the meeting by Mr. Mathes, there is on record a letter from him dated March 14, 1995, invoking ... the economic benefits of maintaining the current Canadian policy. Also in attendance at the meeting on behalf of Chem-Security was Mr. Jeff Smith, who earlier had been a staff member in the Minister's office.<sup>15</sup>
169. Mr. Mathes said that, at that meeting, the Minister stated it was CANADA's policy that PCB waste should be disposed of ... in Canada by Canadians.<sup>16</sup>
170. CANADA did not make formal submissions to the US EPA at its hearings in Washington on SDMI's application. CANADA was well aware of the hearings, because it monitored them. Indeed the Deputy Minister suggested to Mr. Cloghesy that he should say to the US EPA hearing that the Department (of the Environment) favoured an open border with the USA.<sup>17</sup>
171. On June 9, 1995 the Minister of the Environment repeated her ...in Canada by Canadians... statement in the House of Commons. A statement by the lead Minister in the House of Commons with respect to government policy on an issue is ordinarily to be accepted at face value as stating official government policy and the rationale behind it.<sup>18</sup>

172. On July 13, 1995 a Department of Environment note on the Minister's "business week" recalled that the Minister had promised the Canadian industry that she would close the border from the Canadian side if the US EPA opened it from the U.S. side. This note referred to concerns over the NAFTA and attached a ...paper that Chem-Security... had prepared on this. Chem-Security's paper does not appear on the record in this case.<sup>19</sup>
173. On August 2, 1995 Messrs. Hilborn, Dave Campbell, and Hugh Dibbs, three Department of the Environment officials, prepared a briefing note on the potential opening of the border from the U.S. side. They recommended that federal policy be changed to support the US EPA proposal ...because it represents a technically and environmentally sound solution for the destruction of some of Canada's PCBs.<sup>20</sup>
174. An undated draft letter from the Deputy Minister of the Environment thanked Mr. Smith for a memorandum of September 1, 1995, concerning a possible opening of the border by the US EPA. This draft recalls the promise that the Minister had made to Chem-Security and Cintec officials earlier in the summer. The reference to that promise is crossed out by hand, with the explanatory note ...I don't want to put the commitment down on paper.<sup>21</sup>
175. On September 7, 1995 Mr. Hilborn prepared a briefing note on PCB waste management policy. It was essentially identical to what Mr. Clark had written in the autumn of 1994.<sup>22</sup>
176. On October 27, 1995 Mr. Hilborn prepared a memorandum at the request of the Associate Deputy Minister. He stated that ...an interim order to amend the PCB Waste Export Regulations quickly is not a viable option because it cannot be demonstrated that closing the border is required to deal with a significant danger to the environment or to human health. This memorandum noted that the Minister had told the House of Commons that

PCB Waste should be destroyed in Canada and suggested that banning exports to the USA would be consistent with ...current policy... and would mean that ...the Commitment to the Canadian PCB destruction industry... would be fulfilled.<sup>23</sup>

177. The October 27, 1995 memorandum also outlines the case against banning exports. It notes that:

PCBs destroyed in either country is positive for the environment. PCB owners may have lower destruction costs due to competition and more incentive to destroy PCBs, but offset by liability insurance costs if U.S. option is selected.

178. On October 30, 1995 Mr. George Cornwall, Director of the Hazardous Waste Branch, wrote a note referring to the Minister's possible immediate action on PCB wastes. She would pass an interim order that would close the border from the Canadian side and make a public statement that an open border with the USA was contrary to her ...long standing position that Canadian PCBs should be destroyed in this country. Mr. Cornwall cited as the only "pro" factor in favour of this decision was that the Canadian environmental industry investment, i.e., Chem-Security is protected by a secure supply of PCBs for their facility in Swan Hills.<sup>24</sup>

179. In the same note of October 30, 1995 Mr. Cornwall outlined the "cons" of the Minister's possible closing of the border as follows:

Interim orders are design [sic] to provide immediate action to resolve 'significant danger' to the environment and/or human health. It can be argued that the opening of the U.S. border poses no such significant danger.<sup>25</sup>

S.D. Myers will certainly seek redress through NAFTA intervention, since they have invested/lobbied heavily to get the border opened. The company

can be expected to object formally to any action taken under CEPA to close the border;

It will be difficult to argue that the transportation of PCBs to the U.S.A. poses a greater danger than transporting PCBs to Swan Hills, Alberta.

Industry Canada and Foreign Affairs are likely to object to the closing of the Canadian border because it will appear to be an unjustifiable restriction on international trade.

Current practice of returning U.S. owned PCBs in Canada to their originators in the U.S. will be jeopardized if the Canadian border is completely shut. An 'escape hatch' will have to be provided.

180. On November 9, 1995 Mr. Cornwall sent a note to Mr. Clarke. It refers to serious legal problems with an interim order to close the border from the Canadian side. It suggests that a note from the Department of Justice might make it easier for the Minister of the Environment to accept contrary advice. Mr. Cornwall suggested that officials were looking at a means to at least delay PCB exports along these lines:

(i) We could ask an (independent?) consultant to assess that the disposal facilities in the U.S. that would be handling/disposing of Canadian PCB wastes in an environmentally acceptable way. U.S. EPA did this before accepting stables (??);

(ii) We need to satisfy ourselves that U.S. consents are all adequate vis-a-vis our export-import of hazardous waste (eihw) regulations;<sup>26</sup>

181. On November 10, 1995 Mr. Smith sent a letter to the Deputy Minister of the Environment suggesting points that could be used as a "justification" for an interim ban. The Deputy Minister appears to have passed the note on to Messrs. Victor Shantora and Hilborn, two department officials, with the comment that ...this letter makes some interesting arguments which could be used as its basis for the Minister's justification. Mr. Smith's letter does not appear in the record in the arbitration.<sup>27</sup>

182. On November 15, 1995 Mr. Hilborn prepared a note entitled ...justification for the interim order. He stated that:

Export of PCB waste from CANADA to the U.S. is consistent with the CANADA-U.S.A. Agreement on the Transboundary Movement of Hazardous Waste. Furthermore, the Canadian position at the Third Conference of the parties to the Basel Convention was to use facilities in other OECD countries where we could be sure that hazardous wastes would be managed in an environmentally sound manner for final disposal.<sup>28</sup>

183. In that same note Mr. Hilborn also noted that a draft opinion from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade ...indicates the closing the Canadian border would likely be found by a NAFTA panel to be a restriction on trade. The first consideration listed by Mr. Hilborn in his review of the considerations for or against an interim order was the Minister's statement in the House that ...the handling of PCBs in CANADA should be done in Canada by Canadians.<sup>29</sup>

184. On the morning November 16, 1995 the Minister signed an "interim order" that prohibited PCB exports to the USA unless they were PCBs in CANADA owned by U.S. agencies. The Minister relied on her authority under the CEPA to issue such an order ...where there is a significant danger to the environment and to human life and health.

185. In a speech to the Canadian Bar Association Environmental Section later on the same day the Minister stated that:

We are meeting our obligations under the Basel Convention to dispose of our own PCBs. And this kind of action was supported by provincial and territorial environment ministers when they met in Charlottetown in 1989. The handling of PCBs should be done in Canada by Canadians. We have to take care of our own problems.

186. On November 16, 1995 Mr. Hilborn revised the note he had written on the previous day. The second version omitted the references to the Transboundary Agreement. It referred to the fact that CANADA has signed the Basel Convention, which imposed obligations upon CANADA to ensure that it had adequate destruction facilities within its borders and to ensure that it reduced the transboundary movement of PCBs to a minimum: ...consequently, the federal government's policy is that Canadian PCBs should be destroyed in this country. There was ...no confirmatory evidence at this time to assure ourselves that Canadian PCBs would be managed in an environmentally sound manner. There were also uncertainties, the note said, about assured long term access to U.S. facilities, and the US EPA's granting of an enforcement discretion might be challenged in the courts.<sup>30</sup>
187. The Minister of Health was required by CEPA to concur in the issuance of the interim order. There was no evidence before the Tribunal that the Minister of Health personally directed her mind to the issue. There also was no evidence that her Department made an independent evaluation of whether any health risk existed. On the contrary, such evidence as there was suggested that the Department simply accepted the Department of the Environment's assertion that a risk existed.
188. On November 20, 1995 the Interim Order was re-issued.
189. Shortly afterwards a meeting of officials from various departments was held to discuss the position. It was attended, among others, by Mr. Aharon Mayne, a Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade official. His responsibilities included cross-border transportation issues involving the USA, including PCB wastes. He had not heard of any proposed ban prior to it being imposed. He recalled that some officials at the meeting thought the ban was ill-conceived: ...some of them thought it was not being done on the merits, but rather for 'political reasons' that had nothing to do with the substance of the issue. Some Environment Canada officials were not happy with the Order and were quite 'expressive' on this point.<sup>31</sup>

190. On December 6, 1995, CANADA sent a diplomatic note to the USA asking whether PCBs were defined as hazardous waste under U.S. legislation and implementing regulations, and whether PCBs were covered by the Transboundary Agreement. On January 23, 1996, the USA confirmed that the answer to both questions was "yes". CANADA's concerns could have been investigated long before the Enforcement Discretion was issued. It was well aware of the possibility that the border might open.
191. CANADA sought to establish in this arbitration that the Enforcement Discretion, which ultimately was set aside in U.S. court litigation, was not lawful. The Tribunal makes no determination on this issue because in this case the Disputing Parties acted on the basis of the law as it then appeared to exist. CANADA passed the Interim and Final Orders and did not challenge the legality of the Enforcement Discretion. Once the border was re-opened, SDMI arranged for the importation of PCBs and a quantity did cross the border.
192. On December 12, 1995, Mr. Dana Myers wrote to the Minister of the Environment to propose that SDMI should be required by CANADA to satisfy any possible environmental concerns by making it a condition of allowing the cross-border movement that the waste should be destroyed or recycled in the USA (rather than landfilled).<sup>32</sup> The evidentiary record does not contain a reply from the Minister.
193. Having reviewed all the documentary and testimonial evidence before it, the Tribunal is satisfied that the Interim Order and the Final Order favoured Canadian nationals over non-nationals. The Tribunal is satisfied further that the practical effect of the Orders was that

<sup>32</sup> Op. Cit., vol. 10, tab 186. In fact, it was a condition of the US EPA's permission to SDMI that imported PCB wastes should not be landfilled. SDMI did not use landfill methods.

SDMI and its investment were prevented from carrying out the business they planned to undertake, which was a clear disadvantage in comparison to its Canadian competitors.

194. Insofar as intent is concerned, the documentary record as a whole clearly indicates that the Interim Order and the Final Order were intended primarily to protect the Canadian PCB disposal industry from U.S. competition. CANADA produced no convincing witness testimony to rebut the thrust of the documentary evidence.

195. The Tribunal finds that there was no legitimate environmental reason for introducing the ban.<sup>33</sup> Insofar as there was an indirect environmental objective - to keep the Canadian industry strong in order to assure a continued disposal capability - it could have been achieved by other measures.

<sup>33</sup> The Tribunal has noted that there were other equally effective means of encouraging the development and maintenance of a Canadian based PCB's remediation industry.

CHAPTER VI
INTERPRETATION OF THE NAFTA

Introduction

196. The NAFTA provides internal guidance for its interpretation in a number of provisions. In the context of a Chapter 11 dispute, it is appropriate to begin with the Preamble to the treaty, which asserts that the Parties are resolved, inter alia, to ...Create an expanded and secure market for the goods and services produced in their countries... to ensure a predictable commercial framework for business planning and investment... and to do so in a manner consistent with environmental protection and conservation.
197. Article 102(2) obliges the Parties to ...interpret and apply the provisions of [the] Agreement in the light of its objectives set out in paragraph 1 and in accordance with the applicable rules of international law.
198. The objectives specified in Article 102(1) are to:
- (a) promote conditions of fair competition in the free trade area;
  - (c) increase substantially investment opportunities in the territories of the Parties;
  - (d) provide adequate and effective protection and enforcement of intellectual property rights in each Party's territory;
  - (e) create effective procedures for the implementation and application of this Agreement, for its joint administration and for the resolution of disputes; and
  - (f) establish a framework for further trilateral, regional and multilateral co-operation to expand and enhance the benefits of this Agreement.

199. Furthermore, Chapter 11 arbitrators are required by Article 1131(1) to ...decide the issues in dispute in accordance with [the] Agreement and applicable rules of international law".<sup>34</sup> Pursuant to Article 1112(1), in the event of inconsistency between Chapter 11 and another chapter of the NAFTA, the other chapter prevails ...to the extent of the inconsistency.

200. It is appropriate for the Tribunal to examine the international law rules of interpretation. The first port of call is the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

The Vienna Convention

201. Article 31 of the Vienna Convention states:

A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose.

The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes:

(a) Any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty;

(b) Any instrument which was made by one or more of the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty.

202. In interpreting the NAFTA the Tribunal must start by identifying the plain and ordinary meaning of the words in the context in which they appear and also must take due account of the object and purpose of the treaty. The context for the purpose of interpretation of a treaty includes its preamble and any annexes.

<sup>34</sup> The Tribunal does not suggest that national law is irrelevant, as it may be relevant in various ways; but the general principle of interpretation is clear.

203. The Vienna Convention also contains, in Article 27, a general principle that ...A party may not invoke the provisions of its own internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty.

204. The next step is for the Tribunal to review the other international agreements to which the Parties adhere. The first is the Transboundary Agreement. This agreement recognizes the possibility of achieving both economic efficiencies and the effective management of hazardous waste by cross-border shipments.

The Transboundary Agreement

205. The preamble of the Transboundary Agreement states:

Recognizing that the close trading relationship and the long common border between the United States and Canada engender opportunities for a generator of hazardous waste to benefit from using the nearest appropriate disposal facilities, which may involve the transboundary shipment of hazardous waste.

Recognizing that the most effective and efficient means of achieving environmentally sound management procedures for hazardous waste crossing the United States - Canada border is through cooperative efforts and controlled regulatory schemes.

206. Article 2 of the Transboundary Agreement provides that:

The parties shall permit the export, import and transit of hazardous waste across their common border for treatment, storage or disposal pursuant to the terms of their domestic laws, regulations and administration practices, and the provisions of this agreement.

The parties will cooperate in monitoring and spot-checking shipments of hazardous waste to ensure, to the extent possible, that such shipments conform to the requirement of the applicable legislation and of this Agreement.

To the extent that any implementing regulations are necessary to comply with this Agreement, the parties will act expeditiously to issue such regulations consistent with domestic law. Pending such issuance, the parties will make their best efforts to provide notification in accordance with this Agreement where current regulatory authority is insufficient. The parties will provide each other with a diplomatic note upon the issuance and the coming into effect of any such regulation.

207. Article 11 states:

The provisions of this Agreement shall be subject to the applicable laws and regulations of the Parties.

208. Article 11 does not give a party to the Transboundary Agreement absolute freedom to exclude the import or export of hazardous waste simply by enacting whatever national laws it chooses.<sup>35</sup>

209. Chronologically, the next instrument to be reviewed is the Basel Convention.

210. The Basel Convention came into force in May 1992, when twenty states had ratified it. CANADA became a party to it. The U.S. has not.

211. The Basel Convention commits its participants to:

- reduce the production of hazardous waste (Article 4(2)(a));
- ensure the availability of adequate disposal facilities, to the extent possible, within its own boundaries (Article 4(2)(b));
- ensure that the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes and other waste is reduced to the minimum consistent with the environmentally sound and efficient management of such wastes and is conducted in a manner which will protect human health and the environment against the adverse effects which may result from such movement (Article 4(2)(d)).

<sup>35</sup> Insofar as CANADA did refer to its domestic legal regime, it anchored its position on the contention that the measure was necessary to protect health and the environment.

212. The Basel Convention is not as explicit as the Transboundary Agreement in emphasizing the potential benefits of cross-border movement of toxic wastes in achieving economies and better protecting the environment. Article 4(2)(d) of the Basel Convention acknowledges that the environmentally sound and efficient management of waste is not necessarily accomplished by avoiding cross-border shipments.
213. Article 11 expressly allows parties to enter into bilateral or multilateral agreements for the cross-border movement of waste, provided that these agreements do not undermine the Basel Convention's own insistence on environmentally sound management. So far as CANADA and the USA were concerned, Article 11 clearly permitted the continuation of the Transboundary Agreement with its emphasis on including cross-border movements as a means to be considered in achieving the most cost-effective and environmentally sound solution to hazardous waste management.<sup>36</sup>
214. The drafters of the NAFTA evidentially considered which earlier environmental treaties would prevail over the specific rules of the NAFTA in case of conflict. Annex 104 provided that the Basel Convention would have priority if and when it was ratified by the NAFTA Parties.
215. Even if the Basel Convention were to have been ratified by the NAFTA Parties, it should not be presumed that CANADA would have been able to use it to justify the breach of a specific NAFTA provision because ...where a party has a choice among equally effective and reasonably available alternatives for complying....with a Basel Convention obligation,

<sup>36</sup> NAFTA's Commission for Environmental Cooperation issued a report in June 1996 on the Status of PCB Management in North America. Its discussion of the various agreements notes that "Although NAFTA is designed to promote free, uninhibited trade between the three countries, it also recognizes the supremacy of the Basel Convention, the 1986 Agreement between CANADA and the U.S. and the 1983 La Paz Agreement between the United States and MEXICO in case of any inconsistency between NAFTA and these environmental agreements. In fact, the CANADA - U.S. - MEXICO hazardous waste agreements are predicated upon the free movement of hazardous waste between the parties subject to prior notice and consent by the importing country. The Basel Convention principles that disposal facilities be established within the country generating waste and that transboundary movement of waste shall be reduced to the minimum do not apply to bilateral movements of hazardous waste between the U.S. and MEXICO or CANADA because these would be governed by the principle of the freedom of movement, subject to notification and consent of the country of import." [Authorities, tab 4].

it is obliged to choose the alternative that is ...least inconsistent... with the NAFTA. If one such alternative were to involve no inconsistency with the Basel Convention, clearly this should be followed.

216. The next international instrument to be considered is a “side agreement” to the NAFTA on the environment, the NAAEC.

The NAAEC

217. The NAAEC’s Statement of Objectives include both:

- Article 1(d) - support for the environmental goals and objectives of the NAFTA, and
- Article 1(e) - avoidance of new barriers of distortions in cross-border trade .

218. Article 3 of the NAAEC states that:

Recognizing the right of each Party to establish its own levels of domestic environmental protection and environmental development policies and priorities, and to adopt or modify accordingly its environmental laws and regulations, each Party shall ensure that its laws and regulations provide for high levels of environmental protection and shall strive to continue to improve those laws and regulations.

219. The NAAEC mandates the creation of a Commission for Environmental Cooperation. The Council of the Commission is authorized to strengthen cooperation on environmental laws and regulations. Without reducing levels of environmental protections, the Council is to consider ways to render technical requirements more compatible (NAAEC, Article 93).

220. The Preamble to the NAFTA, the NAAEC and the international agreements affirmed in the NAAEC suggest that specific provisions of the NAFTA should be interpreted in light of the following general principles:

- Parties have the right to establish high levels of environmental protection. They are not obliged to compromise their standards merely to satisfy the political or economic interests of other states;
- Parties should avoid creating distortions to trade;
- environmental protection and economic development can and should be mutually supportive.

221. In the Tribunal's view, these principles are consistent with the express provisions of the Transboundary Agreement and the Basel Convention. A logical corollary of them is that where a state can achieve its chosen level of environmental protection through a variety of equally effective and reasonable means, it is obliged to adopt the alternative that is most consistent with open trade. This corollary also is consistent with the language and the case law arising out of the WTO family of agreements.

CHAPTER VII

WAS SDMI AN INVESTOR? WAS THERE AN INVESTMENT?

222. SDMI's claim is advanced pursuant to Article 1116.<sup>37</sup> It is a claim by SDMI itself as an "investor" on its own behalf. It is a dispute in relation to SDMI's alleged investment in Canada and is for damages arising out of the alleged breach by CANADA of its obligations under Section A of Chapter 11. SDMI asserts that it ... has suffered economic harm to its Investment through interference with its operations, lost contracts and opportunities in CANADA. [emphasis added].<sup>38</sup> That is, that it has sustained damages because its investment in Canada has suffered harm.
223. The issue is one of standing. To sustain a claim, SDMI must meet the qualifying requirements of Chapter 11.
224. Chapter 11 covers claims by investors against a host Party. In the context of this case, SDMI contends that it is an investor which is a national of a Party ...that seeks to make, is making or has made an investment. It is common ground that SDMI is a national of a Party, but CANADA asserts that it did not have an investment in Canada.
225. Two of the definitions set out in Section C of Chapter 11 are of consequence in considering CANADA's contention. First:

investment means:

- (a) an enterprise;
- (b) an equity security of an enterprise;
- (c) a debt security of an enterprise

<sup>38</sup> Ibid. Section E.

- (i) where the enterprise is an affiliate of the investor, or
- (ii) where the original maturity of the debt security is at least three years, but does not include a debt security, regardless of original maturity, of a state enterprise;

(d) a loan to an enterprise

- (i) where the enterprise is an affiliate of the investor, or
- (ii) where the original maturity of the loan is at least three years, but does not include a loan, regardless of original maturity, to a state enterprise;

(e) an interest in an enterprise that entitles the owner to share in income or profits of the enterprise;

(f) an interest in an enterprise that entitles the owner to share in the assets of that enterprise on dissolution, other than a debt security or a loan excluded from subparagraph (c) or (d);

(g) real estate or other property, tangible or intangible, acquired in the expectation or used for the purpose of economic benefit or other business purposes; and

(h) interests arising from the commitment of capital or other resources in the territory of a Party to economic activity in such territory, such as under

- (i) contracts involving the presence of an investor's property in the territory of the Party, including turnkey or construction contracts, or concessions, or
- (ii) contracts where remuneration depends substantially on the production, revenues or profits of an enterprise;

but an investment does not mean,

- (i) claims to money that arise solely from
  - (i) commercial contracts for the sale of goods or services by a national or enterprise in the territory of a Party to an enterprise in the territory of another Party, or
  - (ii) the extension of credit in connection with a commercial transaction, such as trade financing, other than a loan covered by subparagraph (d); or
- (j) any other claims to money, that do not involve the kinds of interests set out in subparagraphs (a) through (h);

second:

investment of an investor of a Party means an investor other than an investor of a Party, that seeks to make, is making or had made an investment;”

[emphasis in original]

226. During the proceedings there was considerable debate concerning whether Myers Canada fitted into any of the categories under the definition of “investment”. Evidence was presented to demonstrate that SDMI lent money to Myers Canada and that SDMI had an expectation that it would share in the income or profit if there were any. In fact, some payments for services were made by Myers Canada to SDMI.<sup>39</sup>

227. At the relevant time Myers Canada was undoubtedly an “enterprise”,<sup>40</sup> but CANADA submitted that it was not owned or controlled directly or indirectly by SDMI. This is because the shares of Myers Canada were owned not by SDMI, but equally by four members of the Myers family. They also owned the shares in SDMI, but in different proportions. As noted previously, Mr. Dana Myers owned 51% of that company. His was the authoritative voice in SDMI and the evidence of his brother, Mr. Scott Myers, was that Dana Myers was the authoritative voice in Myers Canada.<sup>41</sup>

228. Mr. Dana Myers explained the basis on which the Claimant carried on its international operations at the relevant time:

“Q. Now, just to return for a moment, and I understand it was in your capacity as an official with SDMI that you were involved in the operations in Australia, Saudi Arabia and MEXICO. And I wanted to clarify from what perspective you were operating in this sense: Were you providing direction as the Chief Executive of SDMI or were you providing direction as an officer of those companies in those locations?”

A. Okay. Here’s how we operate. S.D. Myers was the big portion of our business. We were trying to expand into other countries, and so we would set up these other companies because it’s better to have a local presence in these companies countries. I’m sorry.

Specifically, I think it was my position as President of S.D. Myers, Inc. that I exercised control over all these other places because all these other places were basically just an offshoot or an outpost of S.D. Myers, Inc. to do business around the world.

Q. Now, but in each of those cases, they were corporations with their own directors and their own shareholders?”

A. Correct.

Q. And their own corporate officers?”

A. Correct.

Q. Were you a corporate officer of any of those concerns in Australia?”

A. Yeah. Yes.

Q. And the same is true of Saudi Arabia and MEXICO?”

A. Yes, yes.

Q. All right. Now you also told us, I believe it was in connection with MEXICO, but it may have been in connection with Saudi Arabia, as well, that you signed some papers

---

Q. in respect of those operations.

Were those papers that related to your arrangement with individuals within those companies or those countries, rather, for the delivery of PCB disposal services?

A. No. What it would have been was we had 51 per cent. My brothers and I had 51 per cent of the operation in MEXICO and the Mexican owner had 49 per cent. So we had a document that laid out what he was going to provide and what we were going to provide.

Q. And that's what you would characterize as a joint venture, a joint venture agreement?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you have a similar agreement in respect of Australia?

A. At the beginning, because we were dealing with a guy named Neil Richter and I forget the other guy's name. So we had something. Then we bought them out and then basically there wouldn't have been an agreement because it was just all within the family.

Q. So, in fact, in Australia, you did as well have

A. To begin with.

Q. a joint venture agreement?

A. For a year or two.

Q. All right. And that document set out the respective responsibilities and obligations of the participants?

A. Correct.

Q. And indicated the extent to which they would share in the success of the venture?

A. Correct.

Q. Now, in respect of Myers CANADA, was there such a document ever signed by you or anybody else for your company?

A. Because it was all in the family, no.<sup>42</sup>

229. Taking into account the objectives of the NAFTA, and the obligation of the Parties to interpret and apply its provisions in light of those objectives, the Tribunal does not accept that an otherwise meritorious claim should fail solely by reason of the corporate structure adopted by a claimant in order to organise the way in which it conducts its business affairs. The Tribunal's view is reinforced by the use of the word "indirectly" in the second of the definitions quoted above.
230. The uncontradicted evidence before the Tribunal was that Mr. Stanley Myers had transferred his business to his sons so that it remained wholly within the family and that he had chosen his son Mr. Dana Myers to be the controlling person in respect of the entirety of the Myers family's business interests.
231. On the evidence and on the basis of its interpretation of the NAFTA, the Tribunal concludes that SDMI was an "investor" for the purposes of Chapter 11 of the NAFTA and that Myers Canada was an "investment".
232. The Tribunal recognizes that there are a number of other bases on which SDMI could contend that it has standing to maintain its claim including that (a) SDMI and Myers Canada were in a joint venture, (b) Myers Canada was a branch of SDMI, (c) it had made a loan to Myers Canada, and (d) its market share in Canada constituted an investment. It is not necessary to address these matters in this context and the Tribunal does not do so, although they may be relevant to other issues in the case. Insofar as they are, they will be dealt with at the appropriate time.

CHAPTER VIII

DID THE MEASURE RELATE TO AN INVESTMENT?

233. Article 1101 of the NAFTA states:

Scope and Coverage

This Chapter applies to measures adopted or maintained by a Party relating to:

- (a) investors of another Party;*
- (b) investments of investors of another Party in the territory of the Party; and*
- (c) with respect to Articles 1106 and 1114, all investments in the territory of the Party.*

234. In this case, the requirement that the import ban be “in relation” to SDMI and its investment in Canada is easily satisfied. It was the prospect that SDMI would carry through with its plans to expand its Canadian operations that was the specific inspiration for the export ban. It was raised to address specifically the operations of SDMI and its investment.

235. That is sufficient to dispose of the “relating to” requirement for the immediate purpose of determining liability in this case.

236. CANADA also took the position that the requirement was not met because the measure concerned trade in goods. This contention is dealt with separately in the context of the relationship between Chapter 11 and other chapters of the NAFTA.

CHAPTER IX

DID CANADA COMPLY WITH ITS NAFTA CHAPTER 11 OBLIGATIONS?

237. In this Chapter the Tribunal reviews the merits of SDMI's claims under four separate provisions of Chapter 11 of the NAFTA.

Article 1102 (National Treatment)

238. SDMI claims that CANADA denied it "national treatment", contrary to Article 1102. Article 1102(1) states:

Each Party shall accord to investors of another Party treatment no less favorable than it accords, in like circumstances, to its own investors, with respect to the establishment, acquisition, expansion, management, conduct, operation, and sale or other disposition of investments.

239. Article 1102(2) is identical, except that it refers to "investments", rather than "investors":

Each Party shall accord to investments of investors of another Party treatment no less favorable than it accords, in like circumstances, to investments of its own investors with respect to the establishment, acquisition, expansion, management, conduct, operation, and sale or other disposition of investments.

240. Article 1102(3) addresses the obligations of "sub-national" authorities - local states or provinces - and states that in that context the relevant comparison is between the treatment accorded to an investment or an investor and the best treatment accorded to investments or investors within the jurisdiction of the sub-national authority:

The treatment accorded by a Party under paragraphs 1 and 2 means, with respect to a state or a province, treatment no less favorable than the most favorable treatment accorded, in like circumstances, by that state or province to investors, and to the investments of investors, or the Party of which it forms a part.<sup>43</sup>

241. CANADA argues that the Interim Order merely established a uniform regulatory regime under which all were treated equally. No one was permitted to export PCBs, so there was no discrimination. SDMI contends that Article 1102 was breached by a ban on the export of PCBs that was not justified by bona fide health or environmental concerns, but which had the aim and effect of protecting and promoting the market share of producers who were Canadians and who would perform the work in Canada.
242. CANADA's submission is one dimensional and does not take into account the basis on which the different interests in the industry were organized to undertake their business.

“Like Circumstances”

243. Articles 1102(1) and 1102(2) refer to treatment that is accorded to a Party's own nationals “in like circumstances”. The phrase “like circumstances” is open to a wide variety of interpretations in the abstract and in the context of a particular dispute.
244. WTO dispute resolution panels, and its appellate body, frequently have been required to apply the concept of “like products”. The case law has emphasized that the interpretation of “like” must depend on all the circumstances of each case. The case law also suggests that close attention must be paid to the legal context in which the word “like” appears; the same word “like” may have different meanings in different provisions of the GATT. In Japan - Alcoholic Beverages, WT/DS38/AB/R, the Appellate Body stated at paragraphs 8.5 and 8.6:

[the interpretation and application of “like”] is a discretionary decision that must be made in considering the various characteristics of products

<sup>43</sup> Article 1102(4) appears to be of little relevance to the current discussion. It confirms that a state cannot require that a minimum level of equity in an enterprise in its territory be held by its own nationals, and that an investor of another Party cannot be required to sell or otherwise dispose of its investment in the territory of the Party.

in individual cases. No one approach to exercising judgment will be appropriate for all cases. The criteria in [an earlier case], Border Tax Adjustments should be examined, but there can be no one precise and absolute definition of what is “like”. The concept of “likeness” is a relative one that evokes the image of an accordion. The accordion of “likeness” stretches and squeezes in different places as different provisions of the WTO Agreement are applied. The width of the accordion in any one of those places must be determined by the particular provision in which the term “like” is encountered as well as by the context and the circumstances that prevail in any given case to which the provisions may apply.

245. In considering the meaning of “like circumstances” under Article 1102 of the NAFTA, it is similarly necessary to keep in mind the overall legal context in which the phrase appears.

246. In the GATT context, a prima facie finding of discrimination in “like” cases often takes place within the overall GATT framework, which includes Article XX (General Exceptions). A finding of “likeness” does not dispose of the case. It may set the stage for an inquiry into whether the different treatment of situations found to be “like” is justified by legitimate public policy measures that are pursued in a reasonable manner.

247. The Tribunal considers that the legal context of Article 1102 includes the various provisions of the NAFTA, its companion agreement the NAAEC and principles that are affirmed by the NAAEC (including those of the Rio declaration). The principles that emerge from that context, to repeat, are as follows:

- states have the right to establish high levels of environmental protection. They are not obliged to compromise their standards merely to satisfy the political or economic interests of other states;
- states should avoid creating distortions to trade;
- environmental protection and economic development can and should be mutually supportive.

248. As SDMI noted in its Memorial, all three NAFTA partners belong to the OECD. OECD practice suggests that an evaluation of “like situations” in the investment context should take into account policy objectives in determining whether enterprises are in like circumstances. The OECD Declaration on International and Multinational Enterprises, issued on June 21, 1976, states that investors and investments should receive treatment that is ...no less favorable than that accorded in like situations to domestic enterprises. In 1993 the OECD reviewed the “like situation” test in the following terms:

As regards the expression ‘in like situations’, the comparison between foreign-controlled enterprises is only valid if it is made between firms operating in the same sector. More general considerations, such as the policy objectives of Member countries could be taken into account to define the circumstances in which comparison between foreign-controlled and domestic enterprises is permissible inasmuch as those objectives are not contrary to the principle of national treatment.

249. The Supreme Court of Canada has explored the complexity of making comparisons as it has developed its line of decisions on discrimination against individuals. In the Andrews case, the Court stated that the question of whether or not discrimination exists cannot be determined by applying a purely mechanical test whether similarly situated individuals are treated in the same manner. Whether individuals are “similarly situated”, and have been treated in a substantively equal manner, depends on an examination of the context in which a measure is established and applied and the specific circumstances of each case.<sup>44</sup>
250. The Tribunal considers that the interpretation of the phrase “like circumstances” in Article 1102 must take into account the general principles that emerge from the legal context of the NAFTA, including both its concern with the environment and the need to avoid trade distortions that are not justified by environmental concerns. The assessment of “like circumstances” must also take into account circumstances that would justify governmental regulations that treat them differently in order to protect the public interest. The concept of “like circumstances” invites an examination of whether a non-national investor complaining of less favourable treatment is in the same “sector” as the national investor. The Tribunal takes the view that the word “sector” has a wide connotation that includes the concepts of “economic sector” and “business sector”.

<sup>44</sup> [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143, at paragraphs 27 to 31. Decisions of U.S. courts are to a similar effect. Although domestic law is not controlling in Chapter 11 disputes, it is not inappropriate to consider how the domestic laws of the parties to the dispute address an issue.

251. From the business perspective, it is clear that SDMI and Myers Canada were in “like circumstances” with Canadian operators such as Chem-Security and Cintec. They all were engaged in providing PCB waste remediation services. SDMI was in a position to attract customers that might otherwise have gone to the Canadian operators because it could offer more favourable prices and because it had extensive experience and credibility. It was precisely because SDMI was in a position to take business away from its Canadian competitors that Chem-Security and Cintec lobbied the Minister of the Environment to ban exports when the U.S. authorities opened the border.

National treatment and protectionist motive or intent.

252. The Tribunal takes the view that, in assessing whether a measure is contrary to a national treatment norm, the following factors should be taken into account:

- whether the practical effect of the measure is to create a disproportionate benefit for nationals over non nationals;
- whether the measure, on its face, appears to favour its nationals over non-nationals who are protected by the relevant treaty.

253. Each of these factors must be explored in the context of all the facts to determine whether there actually has been a denial of national treatment.

254. Intent is important, but protectionist intent is not necessarily decisive on its own. The existence of an intent to favour nationals over non-nationals would not give rise to a breach of Chapter 1102 of the NAFTA if the measure in question were to produce no adverse effect on the non-national complainant. The word “treatment” suggests that practical impact is required to produce a breach of Article 1102, not merely a motive or intent that is in violation of Chapter 11.

255. CANADA was concerned to ensure the economic strength of the Canadian industry, in part, because it wanted to maintain the ability to process PCBs within Canada in the future. This was a legitimate goal, consistent with the policy objectives of the Basel Convention. There were a number of legitimate ways by which CANADA could have achieved it, but preventing SDMI from exporting PCBs for processing in the USA by the use of the Interim Order and the Final Order was not one of them. The indirect motive was understandable, but the method contravened CANADA's international commitments under the NAFTA. CANADA's right to source all government requirements and to grant subsidies to the Canadian industry are but two examples of legitimate alternative measures. The fact that the matter was addressed subsequently and the border re-opened also shows that CANADA was not constrained in its ability to deal effectively with the situation.

256. The Tribunal concludes that the issuance of the Interim Order and the Final Order was a breach of Article 1102 of the NAFTA.

257. The consequences of the Tribunal's determination in relation to Article 1102 of the NAFTA are considered later.

Article 1105

258. SDMI submits that CANADA treated it in a manner that was inconsistent with Article 1105(1) of the NAFTA. Entitled "Minimum Standard of Treatment", it reads as follows:

Each Party shall accord to investments of investors of another Party treatment in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.

259. The minimum standard of treatment provision of the NAFTA is similar to clauses contained in BITs. The inclusion of a "minimum standard" provision is necessary to avoid what might otherwise be a gap. A government might treat an investor in a harsh, injurious and unjust manner, but do so in a way that is no different than the treatment inflicted on its own nationals. The “minimum standard” is a floor below which treatment of foreign investors must not fall, even if a government were not acting in a discriminatory manner.

260. The US-Mexican Claims Commission noted in the Hopkins case that:

It not infrequently happens that under the rules of international law applied to controversies of an international aspect a nation is required to accord to aliens broader and more liberal treatment than it accords to its own citizens under its municipal laws...The citizens of a nation may enjoy many rights which are withheld from aliens, and conversely, under international law, aliens may enjoy rights and remedies which the nation does not accord to its own citizens.<sup>45</sup>

261. When interpreting and applying the “minimum standard”, a Chapter 11 tribunal does not have an open-ended mandate to second-guess government decision-making. Governments have to make many potentially controversial choices. In doing so, they may appear to have made mistakes, to have misjudged the facts, proceeded on the basis of a misguided economic or sociological theory, placed too much emphasis on some social values over others and adopted solutions that are ultimately ineffective or counterproductive. The ordinary remedy, if there were one, for errors in modern governments is through internal political and legal processes, including elections.

262. Article 1105(1) expresses an overall concept. The words of the article must be read as a whole. The phrases ...fair and equitable treatment... and ...full protection and security... cannot be read in isolation. They must be read in conjunction with the introductory phrase ...treatment in accordance with international law.

263. The Tribunal considers that a breach of Article 1105 occurs only when it is shown that an investor has been treated in such an unjust or arbitrary manner that the treatment rises to the level that is unacceptable from the international perspective. That determination must be made in the light of the high measure of deference that international law generally extends to the right of domestic authorities to regulate matters within their own borders. The determination must also take into account any specific rules of international law that are applicable to the case.

264. In some cases, the breach of a rule of international law by a host Party may not be decisive in determining that a foreign investor has been denied “fair and equitable treatment”, but the fact that a host Party has breached a rule of international law that is specifically designed to protect investors will tend to weigh heavily in favour of finding a breach of Article 1105.
265. The breadth of the “minimum standard”, including its ability to encompass more particular guarantees, was recognized by Dr. Mann in the following passage:

...it is submitted that the right to fair and equitable treatment goes much further than the right to most-favored-nation and to national treatment....so general a provision is likely to be almost sufficient to cover all conceivable cases, and it may well be that provisions of the Agreements affording substantive protection are not more than examples of specific instances of this overriding duty.<sup>46</sup>

266. Although modern commentators might consider Dr Mann’s statement to be an over-generalisation, and the Tribunal does not rule out the possibility that there could be circumstances in which a denial of the national treatment provisions of the NAFTA would not necessarily offend the minimum standard provisions, a majority of the Tribunal determines that on the facts of this particular case the breach of Article 1102 essentially establishes a breach of Article 1105 as well.
267. Mr. Chiasson considers that a finding of a violation of Article 1105 must be based on a demonstrated failure to meet the fair and equitable requirements of international law. Breach of another provision of the NAFTA is not a foundation for such a conclusion. The language of the NAFTA does not support the notion espoused by Dr. Mann insofar as it is of International Law 160, at 166-167 (1926).

considered to support a breach of Article 1105 that is based on a violation of another provision of Chapter 11. On the facts of this case, CANADA's actions come close to the line, but on the evidence no breach of Article 1105 is established.

268. By a majority, the Tribunal determines that the issuance of the Interim and Final Orders was a breach of Article 1105 of the NAFTA. The Tribunal's decision in this respect makes it unnecessary to review SDMI's other submissions in relation to Article 1105.

269. The consequences of the Tribunal's determination in relation to Article 1105 of the NAFTA are considered in the next chapter.

Article 1106 – Performance Requirements

270. SDMI contends that CANADA's export ban breached Article 1106 of NAFTA because, in effect, SDMI was required, as a condition of operating in Canada, to carry out a major part of its proposed business, the physical disposal of PCB waste in Canada. In doing so, SDMI effectively would have been required to consume goods and services in Canada.

271. Article 1106 states:

No party may imposed or enforce any of the following requirements, or enforce any commitment or undertaking, in connection with the establishment, acquisition, expansion, management, conduct or operation of an investment of an investor of a Party or a non Party in its territory:

(b) to achieve a given level or percentage of domestic content

(c) to purchase, use or accord a preference to goods produced or services provided in its territory or to purchase goods or services from persons in its territory;

272. Article 1106(5) states:

241 at p. 243.

Paragraphs 1 and 3 do not apply to any requirement other than the requirements set out in those paragraphs

273. The export ban imposed by CANADA was not cast in the form of express conditions attached to a regulatory approval but, in applying Article 1106 the Tribunal must look at substance, not only form.
274. The 1947 GATT agreement contained no specific provisions on performance requirements. One dispute was brought before a GATT panel. The USA challenged CANADA's FIRA. Under that statute, non-Canadian investors in some circumstances had to obtain regulatory approval before operating or expanding in CANADA. The regulator could attach conditions to its approval. For example, a factory operator might be required to purchase 50% of its supplies from local suppliers, rather than from abroad. The GATT panel accepted some aspects of the U.S. complaint and rejected others, but the GATT panel looked at the substance of the measure notwithstanding the fact that the GATT did not contain any express provision equivalent to Article 1106 of the NAFTA.
275. Although the Tribunal must review the substance of the measure, it cannot take into consideration any limitations or restrictions that do not fall squarely within the "requirements" listed in Articles 1106(1) and (3).
276. The only part of the definition that might apply to the current situation is ...conduct or operation of an investment... but in the opinion of the majority of the Tribunal, subparagraph (b) clearly does not apply and, neither does subparagraph (c).
277. Looking at the substance and effect of the Interim Order, as well as the literal wording of Article 1106, the majority of the Tribunal considers that no "requirements" as defined were imposed on SDMI that fell within Article 1106. Professor Schwartz considers that the effect of the Interim Order was to require SDMI to undertake all of its operations in Canada and that this amounted to a breach of subparagraph (b).

278. By a majority, the Tribunal concludes that this is not a “performance requirements” case.

Article 1110 – Expropriation

279. SDMI claims that the Interim Order and the Final Order were “tantamount” to an expropriation and violated Article 1110 of the NAFTA.

280. The term “expropriation” in Article 1110 must be interpreted in light of the whole body of state practice, treaties and judicial interpretations of that term in international law cases. In general, the term “expropriation” carries with it the connotation of a “taking” by a governmental-type authority of a person’s “property” with a view to transferring ownership of that property to another person, usually the authority that exercised its de jure or de facto power to do the “taking”.

281. The Tribunal accepts that, in legal theory, rights other than property rights may be “expropriated” and that international law makes it appropriate for tribunals to examine the purpose and effect of governmental measures. The Interim Order and the Final Order were regulatory acts that imposed restrictions on SDMI. The general body of precedent usually does not treat regulatory action as amounting to expropriation. Regulatory conduct by public authorities is unlikely to be the subject of legitimate complaint under Article 1110 of the NAFTA, although the Tribunal does not rule out that possibility.

282. Expropriations tend to involve the deprivation of ownership rights; regulations a lesser interference. The distinction between expropriation and regulation screens out most potential cases of complaints concerning economic intervention by a state and reduces the risk that governments will be subject to claims as they go about their business of managing public affairs.

283. An expropriation usually amounts to a lasting removal of the ability of an owner to make use of its economic rights although it may be that, in some contexts and circumstances, it would be appropriate to view a deprivation as amounting to an expropriation, even if it were partial or temporary.
284. In this case the closure of the border was temporary.<sup>47</sup> SDMI's venture into the Canadian market was postponed for approximately eighteen months. Mr. Dana Myers testified that this delay had the effect of eliminating SDMI's competitive advantage. This may have significance in assessing the compensation to be awarded in relation to CANADA's violations of Articles 1102 and 1105<sup>48</sup>, but it does not support the proposition on the facts of this case that the measure should be characterized as an expropriation within the terms of Article 1110.
285. SDMI relied on the use of the word "tantamount" in Article 1110(1) to extend the meaning of the expression "tantamount to expropriation" beyond the customary scope of the term "expropriation" under international law. The primary meaning of the word "tantamount" given by the Oxford English Dictionary is "equivalent". Both words require a tribunal to look at the substance of what has occurred and not only at form. A tribunal should not be deterred by technical or facial considerations from reaching a conclusion that an expropriation or conduct tantamount to an expropriation has occurred. It must look at the real interests involved and the purpose and effect of the government measure.
286. The Tribunal agrees with the conclusion in the Interim Award of the Pope & Talbot Arbitral Tribunal<sup>49</sup> that something that is "equivalent" to something else cannot logically encompass more. In common with the Pope & Talbot Tribunal, this Tribunal considers that the drafters of the NAFTA intended the word "tantamount" to embrace the concept of so-called

“creeping expropriation”, rather than to expand the internationally accepted scope of the term expropriation.

287. In this case, the Interim Order and the Final Order were designed to, and did, curb SDMI’s initiative, but only for a time. CANADA realized no benefit from the measure. The evidence does not support a transfer of property or benefit directly to others. An opportunity was delayed.

288. The Tribunal concludes that this is not an “expropriation” case.

CHAPTER X

IS SDMI's CLAIM BARRED BY OTHER CHAPTERS OF THE NAFTA?

289. CANADA and MEXICO contend that SDMI's claim is met or circumscribed by either or both of Chapters 3 and 12 of the NAFTA. The former deals with trade in goods and the latter with cross-border trade in services.

The Claim

290. As noted previously, the claim advanced by SDMI is that it has suffered economic harm to its investment through interference with its operations, lost contracts and opportunities in Canada. SDMI submits its claims pursuant to Article 1116 of the NAFTA. That is, SDMI alleges that it has incurred loss or damage by reason of conduct that caused economic harm to its investment in Canada.

Chapter 3

291. In Korea – Definitive Safeguard Measure on Imports of Certain Dairy Products, the Panel summarized the line of WTO cases as follows, at paragraph 738 of its report:<sup>50</sup>

It is now well established that the WTO Agreement is a “Single Undertaking” and therefore all WTO obligations are generally cumulative and Members must comply with all of them simultaneously unless there is a formal “conflict” between them.

292. The chapters of the NAFTA are part of a “single undertaking”. There appears to be no reason in principle for not following the same preference as in the WTO system for viewing different provisions as “cumulative” and complementary.

293. The WTO Panel in the Korean Dairy Products case adopted the definition of “conflict” in several earlier cases, including the report of the Appellate Body of the WTO in Guatemala Cement, at paragraph 65.<sup>51</sup> The latter case suggests that provisions of agreements in the WTO system should be read as complementary unless there were a conflict in the sense that adherence to one provision would cause a violation of the other.
294. The view that different chapters of the NAFTA can overlap and that the rights it provides can be cumulative except in cases of conflict, was accepted by the decision of the Arbitral Tribunal in Pope and Talbot. The reasoning in the case is sound and compelling. There is no reason why a measure which concerns goods (Chapter 3) cannot be a measure relating to an investor or an investment (Chapter 11).
295. Chapter 3 deals with items of trade – namely, “goods”. A measure that relates to goods can relate to those who are involved in the trade of those goods and who have made investments concerning them. The thrust of a dispute under Chapter 11 is that the impugned measure relates to an investor or an investment. If it were to do so, it would be covered by Chapter 11 unless excluded. If it were not to do so, it would not be covered.
296. On the facts of this case there is a clear causal link between the Interim Order and the Final Order and the activities of SDMI. It is common ground that the Orders were passed in response to the Enforcement Discretion granted to SDMI by the US EPA. It was designed to prevent the export of PCBs for processing by SDMI. Insofar as SDMI can otherwise establish the requirements for it to be classified as an investor and can show that the measure related to it or its investment, Chapter 11 is engaged.

The principle of interpretation against conflict has been confirmed by the Appellate Body in Canada - Certain Measures Concerning Periodicals adopted on 30 July 1997, WT/DS31/AB/R, (“Canada Periodicals”), page 19; in EC Bananas, paras. 219-222; in Guatemala Cement, para. 65; and by the panel in Indonesia - Certain Measures Affecting the Automobile Industry, adopted 23 July 1998, WT/DS54, 55, 59 and 64/R (not appealed) (“Indonesia Autos”), para. 14.28. For a definition of conflict, see for instance the Appellate Body statement in Guatemala Cement, para. 65 or the Panel Report on Indonesia Autos, para. 14.28.

297. CANADA argued that Chapter 3 is inconsistent with Chapter 11 on the facts of this case. It contended that even if the export ban appears to contravene Chapter 11, it would also be an export ban with respect to goods and controlled by Chapter 3. CANADA appears to contend that insofar as the measure concerns the export of goods it was driven by proper environmental concerns. That proposition has been rejected by the Tribunal, but the contention also is not sustainable on a proper interpretation of the NAFTA.
298. The NAFTA Parties properly wanted to ensure that Chapter 11 could not be used to impugn government measures that are protected by other specific aspects of the NAFTA, but the Orders are not protected by either Article XX(b) (Human, Animal or Plant Life) or Article XX(e) (Conservation) of GATT. The measures taken by CANADA would not satisfy the requirements of the chapeau of Article XX (General Exceptions). CANADA could have satisfied any health or environmental concerns it had in a manner that did not impair open trade. As CANADA implicitly agreed when it subsequently lifted the ban, it would have better served the cause of a safe environment if it had kept the Canadian border open, but put in place safeguards.

Chapter 12

299. Consideration of the relationship between Chapters 11 and 12 is more complex. Insofar as the focus is merely on the fact that the two chapters may relate to the same activity, the Tribunal's observations concerning Chapter 3 are apt, but it may be that the question is not whether there is a conflict between Chapters 11 and 12, but whether the cross-border supply of services involves an "investment".
300. This latter issue has not been addressed fully by the Disputing Parties and may be of more significance to a consideration of damages. The Tribunal finds it not relevant to liability in this case.

CHAPTER XI

THE PRINCIPLES ON WHICH COMPENSATION SHOULD BE AWARDED

301. The Tribunal has determined that CANADA's ban on PCB exports to the USA was a breach of CANADA's obligations under Articles 1002 and 1005 Chapter 11 of the NAFTA. Insofar as this conduct caused harm to SDMI by injuring its investment, Myers Canada, CANADA must pay compensation to SDMI.

302. Paragraph 1 of Procedural Order No. 1 stated as follows:

Bifurcation

As a first stage of the proceedings the Tribunal will determine (in a partial award) liability issues and issues as to the principles on which damages (if any) should be awarded, leaving the calculation of the quantification of such damages, if any, to a second stage.

303. This stage of the arbitration is concerned solely with the principles on which damages should be awarded. Quantification is to be the subject of a second stage of the proceedings.

304. Article 1131 provides that Chapter 11 tribunals shall decide ...in accordance with [the NAFTA] and applicable international law. Article 1135 provides that an investor may submit to arbitration a claim that ...the enterprise has incurred loss or damage by reason of, or arising out of, that breach. Article 1135 also provides that an arbitral tribunal has the authority to award only ...monetary damages and any applicable interest or restitution of property.

305. So far as the NAFTA is concerned, the only guidance on the principles to be adopted in awarding compensation is contained in Article 1110, which concerns expropriation. The relevant provisions are as follows:

1110(1). No Party may directly or indirectly nationalize or expropriate an investment of an investor or another Party in its territory or take a measure tantamount to nationalization or expropriation of such an investment (“expropriation”), except:

- (a) For a public purpose;*
- (b) On a non-discriminatory basis;*
- (c) In accordance with due process of law and Article 1105(1); and*
- (d) On payment of compensation in accordance with paragraphs 2 through 6.*

1110(2) Compensation shall be equivalent to the firm market value of the expropriated investment immediately before the expropriation took place (“date of expropriation”) and shall not reflect any change in value occurring because the intended expropriation had become known earlier. Valuation criteria shall include going concern value, asset value, including declared tax value of tangible property, and other criteria, as appropriate, to determine fair market value.

306. SDMI suggested in its Memorial that Chapter 11 tribunals are likely to find that the standard set out in Article 1110(2) applies also to breaches of other Articles of Chapter 11. The Tribunal doubts that Article 1110(2) supplies the appropriate standard when a Party has breached one of the other provisions of Chapter 11.

307. The drafters of the NAFTA did not state that the “fair market value of the asset” formula applies to all breaches of Chapter 11. They expressly attached it to expropriations.<sup>52</sup>

308. Expropriations that take place in accordance with the framework of Article 1110 – that is, expropriations that are conducted for a public purpose, on a non-discriminatory basis and in accordance with due process of law - are “lawful” under Chapter 11 provided that compensation is paid in accordance with the ...fair market value of the asset... formula.

<sup>52</sup> According to some commentators, that express provision was intended to resolve a long standing difference of opinion between the USA and MEXICO over compensation in expropriation cases. The latter contended that in the case of a lawful expropriation, a lower standard of compensation might be appropriate than all of the economic loss sustained.

Under other provisions of Chapter 11, the liability of the host Party arises out of the fact that the government has done something that is contrary to the NAFTA and is “unlawful” as between the disputing parties. The standard of compensation that an arbitral tribunal should apply may in some cases be influenced by the distinction between compensating for a lawful, as opposed to an unlawful, act. Fixing the fair market value of an asset that is diminished in value may not fairly address the harm done to the investor.<sup>53</sup>

309. By not identifying any particular methodology for the assessment of compensation in cases not involving expropriation, the Tribunal considers that the drafters of the NAFTA intended to leave it open to tribunals to determine a measure of compensation appropriate to the specific circumstances of the case, taking into account the principles of both international law and the provisions of the NAFTA. In some non-expropriation cases a tribunal might think it appropriate to adopt the “fair market value” standard; in other cases it might not. In this case the Tribunal considers that the application of the fair market value standard is not a logical, appropriate or practicable measure of the compensation to be awarded.
310. There being no relevant provisions of the NAFTA other than those contained in Article 1110 the Tribunal turns for guidance to international law.
311. The principle of international law stated in the Chorzow Factory (Indemnity) case is still recognised as authoritative on the matter of general principle:

The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe-out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed. Restitution in kind or, if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear; the award, if need be, of damages for loss sustained which would not be covered by restitution in kind or payment in place of it - such are the principles which should serve to determine the amount of compensation for an act contrary to international law.

---

<sup>53</sup> The Tribunal does not suggest that punitive damages may be awarded, as these are expressly prohibited by NAFTA.

312. The Draft Articles on State Responsibility under consideration by the International Law Commission at the date of this award similarly propose that in international law, a wrong committed by one state against another gives rise to a right to compensation for the economic harm sustained.
313. It was not suggested to the Tribunal by either of the parties that the Chorzow principle is somehow inapplicable because the claim in this case is brought directly by SDMI. Under international law, a wrong done to an investor is usually viewed as a wrong done to its home state and it is the state that brings the claim against the host state, not the investor directly.
314. The Tribunal agrees with CANADA that it would be premature at this stage to attempt to set out detailed, exclusive, principles for calculating the compensation payable. The disputing parties should have the opportunity to make further factual and legal submissions on the question of the precise methodology to be used.
315. The Tribunal already has suggested that whatever precise approach is taken, it should reflect the general principle of international law that compensation should undo the material harm inflicted by a breach of an international obligation.
316. CANADA has submitted, and the Tribunal accepts, that the following principles also apply:
- the burden is on SDMI to prove the quantum of the losses in respect of which it puts forward its claims;
  - compensation is payable only in respect of harm that is proved to have a sufficient causal link with the specific NAFTA provision that has been breached; the economic losses claimed by SDMI must be proved to be those that have arisen from a breach of the NAFTA, and not from other causes;
  - damages for breach of any one NAFTA provision can take into account any damages already awarded under a breach of another NAFTA provision; there must be no “double recovery”.

317. In summary, the Tribunal will assess the compensation payable to SDMI on the basis of the economic harm that SDMI legally can establish.
318. When both Article 1102 and 1105 have been breached, as the Tribunal has found in this case, the usual principle to be applied is that rights and remedies under trade agreements are cumulative unless there is actual conflict between different provisions. The fact that a host Party has breached both Articles 1102 and 1105 cannot be taken to mean that the investor is entitled to less compensation than if only Article 1102 were breached. A host Party does not reduce the extent of its liability by breaching more than one provision of the NAFTA.
319. On the facts of this case, the Tribunal is satisfied that the damages to which SDMI is entitled arising out of CANADA's breach of Article 1102 are neither increased nor diminished by its breach of Article 1105.

CHAPTER XII

CONCLUSIONS AND DISPOSITIVE PROVISIONS OF THE AWARD

The Tribunal's conclusions

320. The Interim Order and the Final Order did “relate to” an “investor” of a Party and its “investment”

321. SDMI was an “investor” and it had an “investment” in Canada at the relevant time.

322. The Interim Order and the Final Order were in breach of Articles 1102 and 1105 of the NAFTA.

323. The Interim Order and the Final Order were not in breach of Articles 1106 or 1110 of the NAFTA.

324. SDMI's claim is not barred by any inconsistencies between Chapter 11 and any other provisions of the NAFTA.

Dispositive Provisions of the Award

325. CANADA shall pay to SDMI compensation for such economic harm as is established legally by SDMI to be directly as a result of CANADA's breach of its obligations under Articles 1102 or 1105 of the NAFTA.

326. Such compensation shall be quantified in accordance with the principles set out in this Partial Award, at the second stage of the arbitration as contemplated by paragraph 1 of Procedural Order No. 1.

327. All questions concerning the parties' claims in respect of costs under Articles 38 and 40 of the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules are postponed to the Tribunal's Final Award.

I. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

A. REGISTRATION OF THE REQUEST FOR ARBITRATION

1. On 6 June 2003, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (hereinafter the “Centre”) received a request for arbitration (hereinafter the “Request”) submitted by El Paso Energy International Company (hereinafter “El Paso” or “the Claimant”), a company organised under the laws of the State of Delaware (United States of America) against the Republic of Argentina (hereinafter “Argentina,” “the Respondent,” “the respondent State,” “the respondent Government” or “GOA”).
2. On the same date, in accordance with Rule 5 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings (“Institution Rules”), the Acting Secretary-General of the Centre acknowledged receipt of the Claimant’s Request.
3. In the Request, the Claimant submitted that Argentina had violated the 1991 Treaty Concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment between the Republic of Argentina and the United States of America (hereinafter “the BIT”)<sup>1</sup>, as well as other Argentinian and international law instruments.
4. The Request was registered by the Centre on 12 June 2003, pursuant to Article 36(3) of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of Other States (“the ICSID Convention” or “the Washington Convention”)<sup>2</sup> and Rules 6(1)(a) and 7(a) of the Institution Rules. On the same date, the Acting Secretary-General notified the Parties of the registration and invited them to constitute an arbitral tribunal as soon as possible.

B. PARTIES

5. The present dispute is between El Paso International Energy Company and the Republic of Argentina. It raises the question of whether Argentina has breached the Treaty between the United States and Argentina of 14 November 1991 concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment as regards investments made by the Claimant in Argentina.
6. El Paso is a United States company incorporated in the State of Delaware. It had that quality “on the date on which the parties consented to submit such dispute to ... arbitration” (Article 25(2)(b) of the ICSID Convention), i.e. when it accepted the jurisdiction of the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (hereinafter “ICSID”).
7. As indicated by its name, the Claimant is an energy company. It alleges that, up until 2003, it owned indirect and non-controlling shareholdings in a number of Argentinian entities: Compañías Asociadas Petroleras (CAPSA) and CAPEX SA (El Paso contends that it held a 45% indirect interest in CAPSA which, in turn, owned 60.36% of the shares of CAPEX); Central Costanera SA (Costanera), in which El Paso claims to have acquired a 12.335% indirect interest; and Gasoducto del Pacífico SA (Pacífico), in which its indirect interest was said to amount to approximately 13.4% (preferred shares), and 11.8% (ordinary shares) respectively. These four entities have been collectively referred to, in the present proceedings, as the “Argentinian companies.” El Paso further alleged an indirect controlling interest (99.92%) in SERVICIOS El Paso, another entity incorporated in Argentina, and a 61.6% interest in the Triunion Energy Company.
8. The respondent State argued, however, that these direct and indirect interests had not been proved by the Claimant. The latter had, shortly after filing its Reply, submitted an amended version of paragraphs 314-326 of that document to the Arbitral Tribunal. According to the respondent State, a comparison between the amended text and the original one yielded serious discrepancies.
9. Thus, the Claimant had alleged, in its original Reply, ownership of a 61.6% interest in Triunion, whereas the amended text referred to 71.968%. In the original Reply, it had also been asserted that 0.0084% of Gasoducto del Pacifico (Argentina) S.A. was owned by Gasoducto del Pacifico (Cayman) Ltd., while the amended Reply spoke of 87.5%. In the initial Reply, there had been a question of El Paso holding 21.799% of Gasoducto del Pacífico (Argentina) S.A., a figure that was subsequently corrected to 12.5% (common shares) and 21.8% (preferred shares). Further discrepancies appeared in connection with Agua del Cajón (Cayman), the Reply's original text having alleged a 100% ownership of that company by El Paso, the subsequent one reducing that figure to 50%, the latter figure also appearing in documents filed by the Claimant with the United States Securities and Exchange Commission. Finally, the Claimant asserted that, through the sale of its interests in the Argentinian companies, it secured an additional equity interest of 6.3% in Gasoducto del Pacífico (Argentina) S.A., an assertion which has remained unproven as well.<sup>3</sup>

10. In April 1997, El Paso acquired, through KLT Power Inc., an indirect non-controlling shareholding of 12.335% in Costanera. The latter, a local company engaged in the generation and sale of electricity, with a total capacity of 2311 megawatt-hour (MWh), is the largest thermal generator in Argentina. It owns approximately 10% of the installed generation capacity in the country, with a plant that includes two state-of-the-art combined cycle units located in the city of Buenos Aires.
11. In January 1998, El Paso acquired an indirect non-controlling interest in Pacifico, which owns and operates a natural gas pipeline linking Argentina to the Chilean city of Cochabamba. That interest amounted to 13.4% of the preferred shares and 11.8% of the ordinary shares of Pacifico.<sup>4</sup>
12. Further observations are in order regarding SERVICIOS, Costanera and Pacifico. SERVICIOS was established by El Paso as an Argentinian subsidiary in March 1998 and entered thereafter into an agreement with an Argentinian branch of the Bank of Boston to lease a gas processing plant located on the Agua de Cajón field in Neuquén Province. Pursuant to a ten-year gas processing agreement with CAPEX, SERVICIOS transformed gas produced at CAPEX's facilities into liquid petroleum gas (LPG) by-products that were sold by CAPEX.

13. It is alleged that, from 1997 to 2001, El Paso invested US$ 336 million in the Argentinian companies, and that its parent company guaranteed around US$ 24 million of SERVICIOS' lease obligations. El Paso sold its interest in the companies' shares in two sales, one in June 2003 – in CAPSA (consequently in CAPEX) and in SERVICIOS – another in October 2003 – in Costanera.
14. The Respondent is the Republic of Argentina.

C. CONSTITUTION OF THE ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL AND COMMENCEMENT OF THE PROCEEDINGS

15. The Parties agreed that the Tribunal would consist of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by each Party and the third and presiding arbitrator to be appointed by the Chairman of the Administrative Council of the Centre.
16. Accordingly, the Claimant appointed Professor Piero Bernardini (Italian) as an arbitrator and the Respondent appointed Professor Brigitte Stern (French) as an arbitrator. The Chairman of the Administrative Council of ICSID, with the agreement of the Parties, appointed Professor Lucius Caflisch (Swiss) as President of the Arbitral Tribunal.
17. Pursuant to Rule 6(1) of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for Arbitration Proceedings ("Arbitration Rules"), the Centre informed the Parties that all arbitrators having accepted their appointment, the Tribunal was deemed to have been constituted and the proceedings to have commenced on 6 February 2004. In accordance with ICSID Administrative and Financial Regulation 25, the Parties were also notified that Ms. Gabriela Alvarez-Avila, Senior Counsel, ICSID, would serve as Secretary of the Arbitral Tribunal.
18. After consultation with the Parties, the first session of the Tribunal was held on 21 April 2004 in Geneva. The Claimant was represented at the session by Mr. R. Doak Bishop and Mr. José Alfredo Martínez de Hoz (Jr.). The Respondent was represented by Mr. Jorge Barraguirre and Ms. María Vallejos Meana of the Procuración del Tesoro de la Nación, who were present at the session on behalf of the Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación, Dr. Horacio Daniel Rosatti.

19. At the first session, the Parties agreed that the Tribunal had been properly constituted and that they had no objection to any of the members of the Tribunal. It was agreed that the proceedings would be conducted under the Arbitration Rules in force since 1 January 2003.
20. It was decided that the Claimant would file its Memorial on the Merits within 90 days of the date of the first session, that the Respondent would file its Counter-Memorial on the Merits within 90 days of the date of receipt of the Memorial, that the Claimant's Reply would be filed within 45 days of the date of receipt of the Counter-Memorial, and that the Respondent's Rejoinder would be filed within a further 45 days of the receipt of the Reply. It was further agreed that the Respondent had the right to raise any objections it might have to jurisdiction no later than 45 days from its receipt of the Claimant's Memorial. If such objections to jurisdiction were made by the Respondent, the Claimant would have 45 days to file its Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction from its receipt of the Respondent's Memorial on Jurisdiction. The Tribunal would decide at a later stage, after having consulted the Parties, whether a second round of pleadings on jurisdiction would be necessary.

D. JURISDICTIONAL PHASE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

21. In accordance with the agreed schedule, the Claimant filed its Memorial on the Merits on 20 August 2004. The Respondent filed its Memorial on Jurisdiction on 19 October 2004 and the Claimant filed its Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction on 13 December 2004.
22. After having considered the views of the Parties, the Tribunal decided on 3 February 2005 that a second round of pleadings on jurisdiction was not necessary and fixed the date for the hearing on jurisdiction on 7 April 2005. On 25 February 2005, the Tribunal announced that the hearing on jurisdiction was re-scheduled for 8 April 2005.

23. The hearing on jurisdiction was held at the seat of the Centre in Washington, D.C. on 8 April 2005. The Claimant was represented by Mr. R. Doak Bishop, Mr. José Alfredo Martínez de Hoz (Jr.), Mr. Tomasz J. Sikora, Mr. Craig S. Miles, Ms. Valeria Macchia and Ms. Angolie Singh. The Respondent was represented by Mr. Jorge Barraguirre, Ms. Gisela Makowski, and Ms. Cintia Yaryura from the Procuración del Tesoro de la Nación.
24. During the hearing, counsel for the Parties made presentations to the Tribunal, and as per the Respondent's request, Mr. Ed Sereno's testimony was heard. The Claimant briefly presented the witness; this was followed by cross-examination from the Respondent and redirect from the Claimant. The Tribunal then asked the witness some questions. Verbatim transcripts of the hearing were drawn up in English and Spanish and were distributed to the Tribunal and the Parties.
25. During the hearing on jurisdiction, the Tribunal requested some documents from both Parties. By letter of 14 April 2005, the Claimant responded to the request regarding the sale of its shares in Compañías Asociadas Petroleras S.A. (CAPSA), CAPEX S.A. and SERVICIOS El Paso S.R.L. On 6 May 2005, the Respondent provided certain documents to the Tribunal regarding the financial structure of Transportadora Gas del Norte and Metrogas, as well as the taxes imposed on the gas sector. In the same letter, the Respondent asked for the production by the Claimant of documents regarding its investment and the sale of its shares in the above-mentioned companies. On 10 June 2005, the Claimant objected to the Respondent's request of 6 May 2005. The Respondent answered the Claimant's objections by a letter of 27 June 2005.
26. By Procedural Order No. 1 of 28 July 2005, the Tribunal decided that "the information in possession of the Tribunal [was] sufficient to decide the jurisdictional issues raised by the Respondent and that if the proceedings were to reach the merits of the dispute, it [would] be open to the Respondent to reiterate the above request for production of documents".
27. In its Decision on Jurisdiction of 27 April 2006, the Tribunal decided that the dispute was within the jurisdiction of the Centre and within the competence of the Tribunal. On the same date, it issued Procedural Order No. 2 by which the Tribunal confirmed the calendar agreed upon during the first session. Accordingly, the Respondent's Counter-Memorial on the Merits was due within 90 days from the date of Procedural Order No. 2, the Claimant's Reply within 45 days from its receipt of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent's Rejoinder within 45 days from its receipt of the Claimant's Reply.

E. MERITS PHASE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

28. By letter of 6 June 2006, the Respondent requested the Tribunal (i) to order the Claimant to produce a number of additional documents related to its claim; (ii) to suspend the filing of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial on the Merits until the requested documents were submitted; and (iii) to extend the deadline for the filing of the Counter-Memorial on the Merits by 60 days.
29. By letter of 21 June 2006, the Claimant produced a number of the documents requested by the Respondent and objected to the production of some others, as well as to the suspension and extension for the filing of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial.
30. On 5 July 2006, the Tribunal decided to grant a 30-day extension for the filing of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial and requested the Respondent to make its observations on the Claimant's letter of 21 June 2006. By letter of 5 July 2006, the Respondent repeated its requests. On 11 July 2006, the Respondent asked the Tribunal to (i) order the Claimant to produce four sets of documents; and (ii) extend the time-limit for the filing of its Counter-Memorial on the Merits by the number of days taken by the Claimant to produce all such documents. By letter of 13 July 2006, the Claimant produced additional documents and objected to the Respondent's request for an additional extension of the time-limit.
31. On 26 July 2006, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 3, by which it ordered the Claimant to produce by 3 August 2006 documents demonstrating how El Paso acquired its direct participation in Gasoducto del Pacífico (Argentina) S.A., in order to have a complete picture of El Paso's ownership in Triunion Energy Co., Cayman. The Tribunal also took note of the Claimant's explanation of 13 July 2006 regarding CAPSA's financial statement of 2003 and invited the Claimant to make that statement available. The remaining requests submitted by the Respondent for production of documents were denied and the Tribunal fixed 1 September 2006 as the date for the filing of the Counter-Memorial on the Merits. In accordance with the schedule set by the Tribunal in its Procedural Order No. 3, the Respondent submitted its Counter-Memorial on the Merits on that date.

32. By letter of 25 September 2006, the Claimant requested a 30-day extension for the filing of its Reply. This request was objected to by the Respondent in a letter of 26 September 2006. On 4 October 2006, the Tribunal informed the Parties that it granted the requested extension and therefore fixed 28 November 2006 as the date for the filing of the Claimant's Reply.
33. By letter of 12 October 2006, the Respondent also requested a 30-day extension for the filing of its Rejoinder and a suspension of the schedule of the proceedings during January 2007. By letter of 19 October 2006, the Claimant agreed to the requested extension but objected to the suspension of the procedural schedule. On 26 October 2006, the Tribunal informed the Parties that it decided not to grant the suspension requested by the Respondent but to grant the 30-day extension for the filing of the Respondent's Rejoinder. Therefore, the Respondent's Rejoinder was due within 75 days from the receipt of the Spanish translation of the Claimant's Reply and accompanying documentation. The Claimant submitted the electronic copy of its Reply Memorial on the Merits on 28 November 2006, while the hard copy of the Claimant's Reply and the accompanying documentation were dispatched by a courier company on 29 November 2006.
34. By letter of 14 December 2006, the Respondent requested the Tribunal to disregard the Claimant's Reply because it was filed late. The Tribunal carefully examined the Respondent's request as well as the Claimant's letter of 18 December 2006 and the Respondent's observations of 20 December 2006.

35. By letter of 3 January 2007, the Tribunal decided not to disregard the filing; however – in view of the circumstances – it granted the Respondent until 12 March 2007 to file its Rejoinder. The Respondent filed its Rejoinder on that date.
36. By the Claimant's letters of 23, 25 and 26 April 2007 and the Respondent's letters of 24 and 25 April 2007, the Parties submitted their preliminary views about the conduct of the hearing on the merits scheduled for June 2007. By letter of 8 May 2007, the Tribunal confirmed that the hearing would be held from 4 through 13 June 2007 (including Saturday 9 June 2007). It decided to grant each Party equal time to present factual witnesses and experts and to make their Opening and Closing Statements. Since the Parties failed to reach agreement on the order of appearance of factual witnesses and experts, the Tribunal decided that they were to be presented in the following order: (i) the Claimant's factual witnesses; (ii) the Respondent's factual witnesses; (iii) the Claimant's experts; and (iv) the Respondent's experts.
37. The hearing on the merits was held at the seat of the Centre in Washington, D.C. from 4 to 13 June 2007. The Claimant was represented by Mr. R. Doak Bishop, Mr. Craig Miles, Mr. Adam Schiffer, Mr. Roberto Aguirre-Luzi, and Mrs. Sarah Zagata (King & Spalding); Mr. José A. Martínez de Hoz (Jr.), Ms. Valeria Macchia, Ms. Jimena Vega Olmos and Ms. Florencia Mónica Celasco (Pérez Alati, Grondona Benites, Arntsen & Martínez de Hoz); and Mr. Tomasz J. Sikora, in-house counsel of El Paso Energy. The Respondent was represented by Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino (Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina), Mr. Ignacio Pérez Cortés, Mr. Gabriel Bottini, Ms. Gisela Makowski, Ms. Silvina González Napolitano, Mr. Tomás Braceras, Mr. Jorge Barraguirre, Ms. Alejandra Etchegorry, Ms. Leticia Sierra Lobos, Mr. Nicolás Duhalde, Mr. Javier Gallo Mendoza, Mr. Juan Pablo Tarelli, Mr. Luciano Lombardi, Mr. Rodrigo Ruiz Esquide and Mr. Ignacio Torterola. Counsel for the Parties gave their oral presentations before the Tribunal and examined the factual witnesses and experts.
38. Verbatim transcripts of the hearing on the merits were prepared and distributed to the Tribunal and the Parties. The Tribunal invited the Parties to submit a joint document with both Parties' corrections to the transcripts of the hearing in order to facilitate the Tribunal's review and reading of the transcripts.

39. Further to the receipt of the Claimant's letters of 20 May, 11 July and 8 September 2008, and the Respondent's letter dated 19 August 2008, the Tribunal informed the Parties that any filings made by the Parties and not expressly authorised by the Tribunal would be disregarded.
40. By letters of 21 November 2007 and 13 December 2007, it was confirmed that the members of the Tribunal had decided to retain an independent expert, who would assist them in the review of the expert reports filed by the Parties. The Tribunal requested the ICC International Centre for Expertise to provide a list of names from its database of experts.
41. The Tribunal reviewed the curricula vitae of a number of possible candidates and submitted their names to the Parties. Upon receipt of both Parties' observations, by 21 May 2008, the Tribunal appointed Mr. François Savagner as its independent valuation expert.
42. By letter of 12 September 2008, the Tribunal informed the Parties that it had not been able to reach an agreement with Mr. Savagner on the amount of fees that the Tribunal considered reasonable for his assignment. It invited the Parties to submit their observations on the expert's estimate to decide whether they authorised or not the continuation of the expert's appointment.
43. By letter of 30 September 2008, the Tribunal informed the Parties that since they had not reached an agreement with respect to the acceptance of the estimate, it would terminate the expert's assignment. The expert had already agreed to renounce claims to any fees and or expenses incurred before that decision.
44. By letter of 7 January 2009, the Tribunal submitted the name of another possible expert and solicited the Parties' observations. Upon receipt of the Parties' observations on 23 January 2009, the Tribunal invited each Party to submit a list of four candidates along with their curricula vitae. The list of each Party was to be communicated to the other Party. If there were one or more common names on both lists, the Tribunal would proceed to make an appointment.

45. The Tribunal informed the Parties that if there were no common names on both lists, each Party was invited to comment on the other Party's list within eight days of the receipt of that list. Upon receipt of the Parties' comments, the Tribunal informed the Parties that it would make a final decision either on the basis of the lists or at its own discretion. The Parties submitted their proposals and exchanged their comments on each other's lists.
46. By letter of 15 June 2009, the Tribunal appointed Professor Patrice Geoffron as its independent expert. By letter of October 27, 2009, the Centre transmitted to the Parties an order to provide additional documentation to the expert as well as a confidentiality undertaking signed by Professor Geoffron. As ordered by the Tribunal, both Parties submitted the requested additional documentation to the expert. The Expert's Preliminary Report was circulated to the Parties on 14 April 2010. The Tribunal invited both Parties to submit any observations regarding the expert's Preliminary Report at the latest by May 14, 2010. In addition, the Tribunal invited the Claimant to submit, along with the above-mentioned observations, its answers to some further questions. By letter of May 19, 2010, the Tribunal granted an extension to the Parties for submitting their observations on the Preliminary Report. Both Parties submitted their observations on June 1, 2010. By letter of 22 November, 2011, the Tribunal circulated the Expert's July Report and a Complementary Note dated 10 July 2010, followed by the Final Report (October Report) dated 12 October 2010 and invited the Parties to submit their observations on both documents by 24 December, 2010. By letter of December 15, 2010 the Tribunal granted an extension for the Parties to submit their observations on the Expert's Final Report at the latest by 27 December, 2010. Both Parties submitted their observations on the date set by the Tribunal.
47. By letters of 22 November and 15 December 2010, the Tribunal invited the Parties to present their statement on costs, which were received on 27 December 2010. By letter dated 5 May 2011, the Tribunal declared the closure of the proceedings pursuant to Arbitration Rule 38. On June 1, 2011 the Tribunal invited the Parties to submit their final statements of costs pursuant to ICSID Arbitration Rule 28(2). The Respondent submitted its final statement of costs on June 15, 2011, and the Claimant on 16 June 2011.

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. THE ORIGINS OF THE DISPUTE

48. The facts summarised hereafter are those considered and debated in the Parties' written pleadings and oral arguments.
49. CAPSA produces oil and, via CAPEX, generates electric power in Argentina; it also markets propane, butane and gasoline. From December 2001 onward, the GOA took a series of measures which, according to the Claimant, caused considerable harm to the latter, breached undertakings assumed by the respondent State when the investments were made, rendered the investments worthless, particularly those in CAPSA and CAPEX, and prevented these companies from functioning independently. These measures were alleged to be in violation of provisions of the 1991 BIT, i.e. those on expropriation, on discriminatory treatment, on fair and equitable treatment, and on full protection and security.<sup>5</sup>
50. These assertions were vigorously objected to by the Government which argued that the measures taken by it, even if they had been contrary to provisions of the 1991 BIT, were justified under Article XI of that Treaty which allows the States Parties to take measures needed for the maintenance of public order, for the fulfilment of their obligations regarding the maintenance or the restoration of international peace or security, or for the protection of their own essential security interests.<sup>6</sup>

B. THE LEGAL SITUATION AT THE TIME OF THE INVESTMENT

1. History and General Context

51. Prior to 1990, most of Argentina's essential economic activities were State-run. The infrastructures were unsatisfactory, however, and the public debt was high, particularly regarding the production of energy, i.e. electricity and hydrocarbons. This led the GOA to introduce, in 1989, a bill which was to become the State Reform Law, announcing a privatisation programme encompassing incentives as well as monetary and structural measures to promote foreign investment and to stabilise the country's economy.
52. Prior to these reforms, the electricity market had been dominated by the State. Public enterprises controlled the production, transmission and distribution of energy. In addition, some provinces ran their own energy companies. The system was flawed by insufficient funding, rife with inefficiency and was in deficit. In 1988/1989, rolling black-outs were organised owing to limited power-generating capacity.
53. The oil and gas sector, too, was essentially in the hands of the State, with private business playing a secondary role. It was characterised by low productivity, excess demand and significant deficits for the State-owned companies.
54. Laws Nos. 23,696 and 23,697, referred to respectively as the "State Reform Law" and the "Economic Emergency Law," brought a radical change by de-regulating the economy and offering some public companies for sale. In addition, Law No. 23,928, the "Convertibility Law," complemented by Decree No. 529/1991, pegged the peso to the dollar at a fixed rate of 1:1, and no increase in the domestic monetary supply would henceforth be permitted without a corresponding increase in the Central Bank's foreign currency holdings. As a consequence, inflation abated and the economy grew during the period from 1991 to 1997.

55. The State Reform Law, with its measures of liberalisation and improvement of the public sector, and the call for foreign investment, aimed at the privatisation of State companies to improve production.
56. A reform of the legislation on foreign investment was mainly brought about by Decree No. 1853/1993. That Decree encouraged foreign investment by removing various restrictions, notably the three-year waiting period for the repatriation of foreign capital, allowing for such repatriation at any time; and by opening domestic credit facilities to both foreign and national businesses on an equal footing.
57. Further to improve the domestic context, Argentina concluded about 50 bilateral investment treaties (BITs), one of which was the 1991 BIT with the United States.
58. Finally, to protect investors' long-term interests, regulatory regimes were established for the electricity and hydrocarbon sectors. Together these regimes, the Electricity and the Hydrocarbons Regulatory Frameworks, formed the new "Energy Regulatory Framework."

2. Electricity Regulatory Framework

59. To improve the supply of electricity, the GOA allowed foreign investors a dominant role in the production, transmission and distribution of electric energy. They could acquire facilities and equity interests and also proceed to direct investments. Investments had to be made within the legal framework provided by Law No. 24,065 (the "Electricity Law"), by Regulatory Decree No. 1398/1992 and related regulations, and by Resolution No. 61/1992.
60. The objectives of the Electricity Law were the promotion of private investments in the production, transmission and distribution of electrical power, the setting of appropriate rates in order to further such activities, the efficient use of electricity, and the stimulation of competition.
61. Within the Electricity Regulatory Framework, a competitive system, the Wholesale Electricity Market (WEM), was established in order to organise the sale of energy by its generators. The two markets established within the WEM were: (i) the term market, where producers and buyers could freely agree on sales, conditions and prices; and (ii) the spot market, where energy was supplied, on an hourly basis, for a uniform price linked to the short-term marginal cost of the energy produced.

62. Distributors were, however, entitled to buy energy at a “seasonal price” fixed by the Compañía Administradora del Mercado Mayorista Eléctrico SA (CAMMESA) and approved by the GOA’s Energy Secretariat. This was achieved by establishing a fixed monthly charge which was to remain stable for the first three months of the six-month seasonal price; that price was based on predictions of demand and supply in the seasonal period. After three months, adjustments would have to be made if the seasonal price, instead of reflecting the average spot-market price, significantly differed from it. This was to be done by providing compensation out of a “Seasonal Stabilisation Fund,” yet another measure to protect investors.
63. The Electricity Regulatory Framework was managed by three agencies. The first was the GOA’s Secretariat of Energy, endowed with regulatory powers to implement the Framework. It was to govern dispatch within the WEM and to set seasonal prices. The scheduling and physical dispatch by generators and the management of the WEM were handled by CAMMESA, an independent entity representing all WEM agents but subject to the veto of the Energy Secretariat. Thirdly, there was the Ente Nacional Regulador de la Electricidad (ENRE), an independent governmental body with regulatory and jurisdictional power over the electricity industry.
64. The spot price was the price paid at any hour to all participants in the WEM. It was uniform, based on the short-term marginal cost incurred by the least efficient generator dispatched at any given hour. This Variable Cost of Production (VCP) had to be indicated in US dollars. The most efficient producer, i.e. that with the lowest VCP, was dispatched first and enjoyed the largest profit, as the spot price would be set on the basis of the VCP of the last generator dispatched. Accordingly, the spot price determined by CAMMESA was not arbitrary: the most efficient generator’s VCP was below the spot price, and the difference between that price and the VCP incurred by the last generator dispatched was the margin of the most efficient producer. In other words, not all producers enjoyed the same margin.

65. The competitive system described above rewarded efficient power generators such as CAPEX and Costanera by the manner in which spot prices and margins were fixed. This, together with the security offered by the Electricity Regulatory Framework, provided an incentive for El Paso to invest.
66. By contrast, contractual energy sales could be freely negotiated. As a rule, they were made in US dollars and for one year, prices being set proportionally to the spot price and somewhat above it.
67. In addition to the sales proceeds, since 1994 power generators received “capacity payments” amounting to 10 US dollars per megawatt-hour (MWh). These payments were intended to encourage operators to upgrade and expand the electricity system. Capacity payments, with the proceeds from the sales, were the two pillars of the new Framework; according to the Claimant, the capacity payments received by CAPEX and Costanera amounted to about 27 and 92 million US dollars per year, respectively.<sup>7</sup> The Claimant also alleged that, on the basis of these payments, investors could legitimately expect that if a devaluation of the peso were to occur, capacity payments would continue to be paid in US dollars or, if paid in pesos, be adjusted to attain the same value;<sup>8</sup> and that adjustments would also be made in the pricing system.
68. The Claimant’s assertions were vigorously objected to by the respondent State.<sup>9</sup> According to the latter, the establishment of capacity payments, and their decrease in terms of US dollars, did not, from the legal and economic viewpoint, entail an undue prejudice. The Electricity Law, while providing for such payments, left the determination of the currency and of the mode of calculation to Argentina’s Department of Energy. Initially, in 1992, capacity payments were fixed at US$ 5 dollars/MWh, this figure being subsequently raised to US$ 10 dollars. In 2002, payments decreased to AR$ 10 pesos, to be raised again to AR$ 12 pesos three months later. At the same time, the Energy Secretariat detached payment from actual dispatch, a measure favourable to the producers. There were not, accordingly, any vested rights in those respects.

69. Nor was there any undue prejudice from an economic point of view. The value of the capacity payments determined by the Secretary of Energy was, according to the GOA, compatible with the operation of the electricity market in the context of the crisis and with what would have happened, in that context, in a competitive market, given the macroeconomic circumstances prevailing at the time in the Argentine economy. At that time, a significant decrease in the demand for reliability of the electricity supplies was expected as a result of the drop of the economy's gross product and household income: "if an income drop occurs, a lower quality product at a lower price is preferred."<sup>10</sup>
70. At the beginning of the crisis, the electricity generation system enjoyed a high reserve margin. Despite the fact that, during the last years, no new producers had appeared, the existing ones were capable of satisfying a 12.3% increase in the peak demand. This shows that the system had excess capacity; accordingly, the reduction of capacity made perfect sense in a competitive market.
71. The Claimant considered that the capacity payment had to cover their capital costs and that the reduction in it to an amount equivalent to four dollars did not fulfill that requirement. The GOA rejected El Paso's arguments<sup>11</sup> linking the Claimant's capacity payments to its capital costs: there was no rule under which the main ground for capacity payments was the protection of capital costs or the recovery of investments, and in fact such payments distorted the operation of the WEM; there was no document justifying economically that the payment had to be 10 US dollars and to remain at that level; if capacity payments were to defray capital costs, they should have been detached from dispatch, which was not what happened in the past decade.

72. The alleged link between the reduction of capacity payments and the lack of investments after 2001 was also belied by the fact that the last decision to invest in the field of power generation was taken in 1996, five years before the crisis, when capacity payments still amounted to 10 US dollars/MWh.
73. Accordingly, the decline of investments in power generation resulted from the performance of the economy as such and, more specifically, from the conditions of the energy market, explained by the crisis of emerging economies followed by the economic crisis of Argentina in 2001. Thus, it cannot be maintained that, despite the crisis, the electricity market would have continued to receive investments if the capacity payments had remained at the same level.

3. Hydrocarbon Regulatory Framework

74. Initially, the hydrocarbon trade in Argentina was governed by Law No. 17,319 of 1967, which allowed for the grant of concessions to private businesses. Until 1990, this possibility was not used, however, and the near-totality of crude oil and gas production remained in the hands of Yacimientos Petrolíferos Fiscales (YPF), a State company.
75. This changed in 1989 with the adoption of a privatisation programme, which brought many changes and offered private entrepreneurs the opportunity to conduct activities in new, unexplored areas as well as in areas formerly exploited by YPF. Deregulation was implemented by a series of legislative acts, including Decrees Nos. 1055/1989 of 10 October 1989, 1212/1989 of 8 November 1989 and 1589/1989 of 27 December 1989.
76. These acts removed import and export restrictions on crude oil, and abolished withholdings and duties. At the end of 1991, the domestic oil industry was deregulated, including prices, and at the beginning of 1994 natural gas prices were deregulated as well.

77. The centre-piece of the de-regulation process was the right “freely to dispose” of extracted resources, on domestic and foreign markets, and the exemption from export duties or withholdings.
78. Additional regulation in the hydrocarbon sector included Decree No. 2411/1991 (“Reconversion Decree”), Decree No. 2178/1991, as amended by Decree No. 1271/1992 (“Plan Argentina”), Law No. 24,076 (“Gas Law”) and implementing Decree No. 1738/1992. These texts, together with those cited above in paragraph 75, formed the “Hydrocarbon Regulatory Framework.”
79. The Gas Law made it possible to privatise “Gas del Estado” (GdE). Practically all of that company’s assets were transferred to eight distribution and two transportation companies, a majority participation in each being sold to a consortium of private companies. These measures were intended to promote competition and to stimulate foreign investment in the oil and gas industry.
80. Regarding incentives for obtaining investments, the following rights and advantages were offered to entities such as CAPSA/CAPEX: (i) the right to export crude oil without the GOA’s prior approval; (ii) an exemption from fees and duties, except royalties; (iii) the right to negotiate hydrocarbon sales in the open market; (iv) the constitutional protection of investments as property or contractual rights, including those of CAPSA/CAPEX, for the sale of liquid hydrocarbons; (v) the duty, for the Federal Executive, to give twelve months’ notice before restricting the export of crude oil, and the requirement that the producer receive a price not below that of similar, imported crude oil and petroleum products; and (vi) the freedom for producers to sell their production.

4. Argentina’s Drive to Attract Foreign Investment

81. The GOA made it clear that the new Energy Regulatory Framework was aimed at attracting investments, especially foreign investments. Argentina was prepared to provide certain guarantees to domestic and foreign investors. The privatisation policy in the energy sector was carried out, on the federal level, by the Executive and Legislative Powers which agreed that foreign investors were important to achieve privatisation successfully.

82. That result was reached by emphasising three principles – credibility, certainty and legal stability – the core requirement for attracting foreign investment being foreseeability, to be obtained especially through legal stability.
83. The privatisation drive of the Menem administration and its Energy Secretariat was supported by intergovernmental agencies such as the World Bank (IBRD), the International Finance Corporation (IFC), the UN Development Programme (UNDP), and the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB) through loans and measures of technical assistance. This institutional support obviously encouraged private foreign investment.
84. With the help of its Energy Secretariat, of its Privatisation Under-Secretariat and the above-mentioned intergovernmental organisations, the GOA thus actively invited investments from abroad and, to that end, organised seminars and other promotional meetings (“road shows”) in the United States, in Europe and in South-East Asia; at least part of them were financed by the UNDP. In these meetings, the new-found openness of Argentina’s economy and the stability of the new investment framework were emphasised. Potential investors were led to assume that prices would be determined by market mechanisms and that costs and capacity payments be denominated in dollars.
85. The privatisation of the energy sector was successful. The electricity industry was modernised, power production almost doubled, and domestic demand rose by more than one half; equipment was renewed and upgraded; power and transmission failures became rare; and transmission lines for power export to Chile and Brazil were installed.
86. The same can be said of the hydrocarbon industry: crude oil and natural gas outputs rose by half or more, and so did the reserves of hydrocarbons. Despite the increase in production, the known natural gas reserves also rose by one third. Exports of crude oil grew from almost nothing to 15.6 million m<sup>3</sup>, and exports of natural gas from zero to about 9.3 million m<sup>3</sup> per day. Energy exports now amounted to 13% of Argentina’s total exports, the country thus being transformed from an energy importer into an exporter. The distribution network was improving as well, pipelines being installed to connect Argentina with Chile, Brazil and Uruguay.

87. The Claimant argued that the privatisation drive, the circumstances surrounding it and its consequences were evidence of the GOA's intention to establish a stable framework for attracting foreign investment to the energy sector, thereby raising legitimate expectations. This view was contested by the GOA which pointed out that, whatever efforts may have been deployed by it to develop the energy sector, such development, and the rights allegedly infringed, arose not from contracts but from Argentinian law. Law is not immutable, however, be it in the field of investment or elsewhere; and States are entitled, on the strength of their sovereignty, to change them. This is particularly true in emergency situations such as that in which Argentina found herself in 2001.<sup>12</sup>
88. As pointed out earlier, in paragraph 57, another element in the GOA's investment strategy was the conclusion of some 50 BITs, among which was the Treaty with the United States of 14 November 1991. While such treaties are meant to cover investments of both sides, the 1991 BIT with the United States could, of course, have been viewed as an additional protection for investments to be made in the energy sector of Argentina.

C. THE ECONOMIC CRISIS AND THE MEASURES TAKEN BY ARGENTINA IN THE ENERGY SECTOR

1. The Advent of the Crisis

89. The years between 1991 and 1998 were good for Argentina. They brought a growth of the GDP averaging close to 6% and an important influx of capital. When deterioration began to set in, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) identified both external and internal causes therefore, including a sharp rise of the public debt from 1999 onward. This led to solvency problems which were aggravated by the rise of the US dollar and the drop of capital flows to developing market economies. Despite exceptional financial assistance by the IMF, confidence was not restored.

90. Beginning in Spring of 2001, the GOA took a series of measures: elaboration of a plan to switch the convertibility regime from the dollar to a basket of US dollars and euros; tax-exemption measures to assist the economic sectors most affected by the recession; and a “mega-swap” of outstanding government bonds for instruments with longer periods of maturation. These measures had little effect: capital flight and deposit runs generated a partial deposit freeze. When Argentina failed to comply with the fiscal targets set, the IMF declined to make a payment for December 2001.
91. At the end of 2001, savings were massively withdrawn from the banks. In order to control the situation, the Government issued Decree No. 1570/01, known as “Corralito,” on 1 December 2001, restricting bank withdrawals and prohibiting any transfer of currency abroad. The situation led to demonstrations and tens of deaths in December 2001, and these, in turn, brought about the resignation of President de la Rúa on 20 December 2001. It can be noted that within a period of less than ten days, Argentina had a succession of five Presidents, who resigned one after the other. According to the GOA, “Argentina seemed to be on the brink of anarchy and the abyss.”<sup>13</sup> The situation was indeed critical, and at the end of that month Argentina partly defaulted on its international obligations and abandoned the convertibility regime, replacing it by a dual exchange-rate system.
92. Argentina’s crisis of 2001-2002 resulted in a massive default regarding the public debt on the domestic as well as the international level. The real gross domestic product decreased by about 10% in 2002, the cumulative decline since 1998 amounting to 20%; and inflation rose to approximately 10% in April 2002, but eventually reached 40% for that entire year. More generally, due to the over-valuation of the peso and the deterioration in the economy’s competitiveness, the Buenos Aires stock market lost more than 60% between

1998 and 2002; conversely, unemployment rose to over 20% in 2002. Fifty-four percent of the urban population now lived on the “poverty level,” while the population on an “indigence level” reached 25%; private consumption dropped by 20%. So alarming was the situation that the United Nations General Assembly resolved to reduce Argentina’s membership dues on account of the crisis, which was the first case in history.

93. The above description is purely factual. The Arbitral Tribunal does not intend, at this stage, to go into the question of the inevitability of the crisis, to assign responsibility for it, or to decide on the applicability or otherwise of Article XI of the 1991 BIT to the measures taken by the GOA. These issues will be addressed later in this award §§ 627-670.

2. The Measures Taken by Argentina: Overview

94. The specific measures complained of by El Paso were adopted by Argentina in the context described above and were aimed at overcoming the crisis. Most of them were related, in one way or another, to the convertibility regime and its demise.
95. A first measure consisted in freezing bank deposits and introducing foreign exchange controls. This was achieved, initially, by Decree No. 1570 of 1 December 2001, followed by the Public Emergency Law No. 25,561 of 6 January 2002 and by implementing measures. The Public Emergency Law: (i) abolished the parity of the US dollar and the peso; (ii) converted US dollar obligations into pesos at the rate of 1:1, a measure known as “pesification”; (iii) effected the conversion, on that basis, of dollar-denominated tariffs into pesos; (iv) eliminated adjustment clauses established in US dollars or other foreign currencies as well as indexation clauses or mechanisms for public service contracts, including tariffs for the distribution of electricity and natural gas; (v) required electricity and gas companies to continue to perform their public contracts; and (vi) authorised the GOA to impose withholdings on hydrocarbon exports.
96. These measures, according to the Claimant, turned the electric power sector into a strictly regulated industry operating with price caps and other requirements which made it difficult to earn a profit and even to retrieve investments. The Government, moreover, moved large sums of US dollars from the energy to the banking sector, which was particularly affected by the crisis, a measure which the Claimant considered discriminatory.<sup>14</sup> To answer this contention, the respondent State pointed to the “[t]he non-discrimination principle ... [which] requires the State to treat equally investments that are in like situations,”<sup>15</sup> such situations arising within the same business or economic sector, and not among different sectors. But from El Paso’s point of view, there was an intention to discriminate on the part of the State. However, from the Government’s point of view, the discrimination must produce actual harm which the GOA did not assume to have occurred, and there were reasonable grounds for making the distinction complained of.

97. It will now be convenient to turn to the specific measures taken in each of the two sectors examined in the present case.

3. The Electricity Sector

98. Following the enactment of the Public Emergency Law and of Decree No. 214/2002, CAMMESA resolved to pesify the Electricity Regulatory Framework and, with it, the contracts existing on 6 January 2002 and the transactions on the spot market after that date. By a series of resolutions, the GOA’s Energy Secretariat then extended pesification to all values in that Framework. While under the latter, VCPs, capacity payments and other values had been calculated in US dollars, power generators now had to express their VCPs in pesos at an exchange rate of 1:1, which accounted for substantially lower spot prices; electric power export agreements were, however, excluded from pesification.
99. The same was to be done for calculating the fuel reference price which determined the maximum allowable variable price on the spot market. A price cap was established which, according to the Claimant,<sup>16</sup> could prevent some participants from recuperating even their VCPs. This was why CAMMESA would now also dispatch producers whose VCPs were above the cap, these generators receiving the difference between that cap and the actual spot price. For generators such as CAPEX and Costanera, it no longer mattered whether they operated efficiently or not. Accordingly, the idea that the spot price would be the same for all generators, and be based on the costs incurred by the last generator dispatched, was abandoned; new price caps were imposed on the basis of new calculation methods applied by CAMMESA.

100. Another change concerned capacity payments: as reported earlier,<sup>17</sup> these payments initially amounted to 5 US dollars, and had been increased to 10 US dollars per MWh, which was the amount at the time of the measures. Their calculation at the rate of one dollar to one peso amounted to a decrease to almost one third of their value. Later on, they were increased from 10 to 12 pesos, a sum which, at the relevant time, was roughly equivalent to 4 (instead of 10) US dollars.
101. Regarding the legality of the measures thus taken by the respondent State, the GOA pointed out that ever since the reform of the electricity sector, the agents of and participants in the WEM were to operate under the regulations issued by the Energy Department; participants in the market were aware of the risk of changes which, however, had to be in conformity with the guidelines set by the Electricity Law (No. 24,065). There were and had been continuous adjustments in the sector. According to the GOA, this shows that “the legitimate expectations of any investor entering the market had to include the true possibility of changes and amendments to the Procedures.”<sup>18</sup>
102. Moreover, according to the respondent State, the adjustments made were reasonable and allowed for adaptation to the new context. There was no reason to exclude the electricity industry from the pesification of the whole Argentine

economy; nor was there any legal obstacle to the Energy Department's order to state costs in this or that currency. In addition, the Energy Department took account of the effect of the mega-devaluation of the peso on generators' costs. The adjustment of capacity payments was, as discussed earlier,<sup>19</sup> appropriate, reasonable and consistent with a competitive market.

103. The GOA further argued that the measures taken by the Energy Department to calculate spot prices were not exceptional: (a) because the exclusion of certain machines from the spot-price calculation was practised during as well as prior to the crisis; (b) because there always were price caps in the spot market; and (c) because the replacement of the formula "reference prices + 15%," substituted by that of generators' actual costs, was intended to protect producers.
104. Finally, CAPEX and Costanera had agreed to the measures later objected to by El Paso. In 2002 and 2003, before the sale of the holdings in the Argentinian companies, CAPEX challenged some of the measures taken by the respondent State. These challenges were dismissed in the federal court of Argentina, and these decisions were not appealed by CAPEX. A further challenge became moot when CAPEX – voluntarily according to the GOA – resolved, together with most participants in the WEM, to participate in the FONINVEMEM, a system created by the GOA to normalise the service and to make the necessary investment in power generation. "El Paso cannot contradict the own acts of the companies on behalf of which it is claiming."<sup>20</sup> The Claimant objected that the local companies' consent did not bind it and that these companies had acted under duress.<sup>21</sup>

4. The Hydrocarbon Sector

105. As indicated in paragraph 95, export withholdings were imposed on the hydrocarbons sector to compensate the banking sector for the imbalance generated by the mandatory conversion of dollar-denominated deposits and credits as per Decree 310/2002 of 13 February 2002.

106. Decree No. 310/2002 prescribed a 20% withholding on crude oil and LPG exports, according to El Paso, or 16.67% according to Argentina,<sup>22</sup> the withholding on the latter being subsequently reduced to 5%<sup>23</sup> according to El Paso, or 4.76 according to Argentina.<sup>24</sup> On 13 May 2002, the Government raised export withholdings on crude oil and LPG to 25% and 20%, respectively. In August 2004, additional withholdings on crude oil, on a sliding scale, were decreed for the event that the crude oil price would reach or exceed a certain level. Such withholdings affected hydrocarbons sales abroad and depressed domestic prices by increasing the local availability of such products.<sup>25</sup> It must be added here that CAPEX requested and obtained, from Argentina's federal courts, a preliminary injunction suspending the restrictions on exports, and that the latter were subsequently repealed by the GOA's Secretary of Energy.<sup>26</sup>
107. Some withholding measures seem to have persisted for a long time, CAPSA's and CAPEX's revenues suffering as a result on both the international and domestic levels, until El Paso, in 2003, sold its shares in the Argentinian companies (on this issue, see below, paragraphs 114-120).
108. Another measure taken in the Hydrocarbon Sector was, of course, the pesification of contracts under the Public Emergency Law and Decree No. 214/2002, i.e. of the existing dollar-denominated obligations and claims, at the rate of 1:1. That measure had, in particular, a negative impact on CAPSA's and CAPEX's dollar-denominated crude oil sales and purchase contracts. Regarding liquid hydrocarbons, the Public Emergency Law obliged the parties to existing sales contracts to re-negotiate them, and the two companies had to accept price reductions. Agreements for the transportation of natural gas for export were not, however, affected by pesification.

109. To insulate domestic consumers from the rise of the price of crude oil on the international market, the GOA directed producers and refiners to enter into special sales agreements. This was done and there were, according to the respondent State, over 20 such agreements executed by it and El Paso's Argentinian companies. As it had done for the electricity sector,<sup>27</sup> the GOA highlighted that fact to show that the measures taken by it had been acquiesced in by the companies.<sup>28</sup> Again the Claimant challenged the argument mainly by asserting that the companies' consent did not engage El Paso, their foreign shareholder, and that the agreements were concluded under duress.<sup>29</sup> As of 1 January 2003, the reference sales price from producers to refiners was 28.50 US dollars. The barrel price of crude oil in the world market was, however, significantly higher and has risen further since then. For the depressed price prescribed, the producers were to be compensated by the refiners should the world market price remain above 28.50 US dollars for a long time, though a cap was set at 36 US dollars per barrel, which limited the duty to compensate. Nothing happened, however, and no compensation was paid.
110. The measures taken in the hydrocarbon sector spawned, among the parties, much the same discussions and controversies as over the electricity sector. These arguments, having been summarised above in paragraphs 101-104, do not need to be repeated here.

5. The Tax Depreciation Issues

111. With the depreciation of investments a tax issue arose. Under Argentina's Income Tax Law, assets were depreciated annually by prorating them according to their estimated life expectancy. The Public Emergency Law repealed the Convertibility Law, and the GOA took measures causing both a devaluation of the peso and inflation, thus reducing the amount of permissible depreciation and decreasing the tax relief the Argentinian companies could claim.

112. Regarding the losses suffered by hydrocarbon producers and investors, the Public Emergency Law provided that losses resulting from the new exchange rate which affected dollar-denominated liabilities could only be deducted in five yearly instalments of 20%.

6. The Energy Crisis in Argentina

113. The above-described measures, prompted by the 2001-2002 crisis, resulted in depressed electricity and gas prices, which brought increased consumption. These prices, together with the reduction of capacity payments, dissuaded generators of electricity from investing in new power plants, and gas producers from exploring and drilling for further resources. As a consequence, shortages were likely and did in fact occur.

D. THE SALE OF THE CLAIMANT'S SHARES IN THE ARGENTINIAN COMPANIES

114. According to El Paso, the sale of its investment in the Argentinian companies was due to the destruction of their value by the measures of the GOA and their lack of prospects.<sup>30</sup> The respondent State pointed out, however, that the sale was a consequence, not of its own conduct, but of a decision made by El Paso to concentrate on its core business world-wide in order to improve its liquidity,<sup>31</sup> which had suffered through inadequate policies pursued by the Claimant.

115. The first phase of the sale took place on 23 June 2003. El Paso sold its interest in CAPSA (45%) (and, consequently, in CAPEX) to Wild SA, the majority shareholder of CAPSA, for 24 million US dollars. The transaction was made contingent on a stock swap with CAPEX International Business Co. (CIBCO), an entity controlled by CAPSA, by which El Paso transferred to CIBCO its interest in SERVICIOS in exchange for CIBCO's 38.4% interest in Triunion, another company of the El Paso group.

116. The second phase occurred on 3 October 2003: El Paso sold its interest in Costanera (12,335%) to Empresa Nacional de Electricidad, a Chilean company, for a cash price of 4.5 million US dollars.
117. The respondent State alleged that the sale was prompted by reasons alien to the Argentinian crisis.<sup>32</sup> It was, moreover, an unwise move, for while El Paso had purchased its investment at a time when the Argentinian economy had reached a peak, it sold that investment when the economy hit bottom. To borrow from the GOA's colourful language, El Paso bought its investment "at the sound of the trumpets" and sold it "at the sound of the cannons."<sup>33</sup>
118. In reply, the Claimant asserted that the sale resulted from the Argentinian crisis, the measures taken by the respondent State, the uncertainty generated by them, and reasons of good and prudent stewardship.<sup>34</sup>
119. The respondent State also expressed doubts about the 24 million US dollars collected by El Paso.<sup>35</sup> That was the sum paid by Wild to EPEC, a company fully owned by El Paso and, also, holding 45% of CAPSA's shares on behalf of El Paso. Of these 45%, 38.5% went to Wild (via EPEC) for the above-mentioned sum of 24 million US dollars; the remaining 6.5% was handed over to Deutsche Bank for 14.1 million US dollars. This caused the GOA to doubt the reality of the price charged to Wild, the price paid by Deutsche Bank being 400% higher.
120. The Claimant explained that the 6.5% of CAPSA's shares went to Deutsche Bank, not on the basis of a sale of stock but as a guarantee for a loan of 14 million US dollars extended by the Bank to enable Wild to buy CAPSA's shares.<sup>36</sup> In other words, the transaction questioned by the GOA was not a straightforward sale but a loan agreement guaranteed by a security. What determined the amount paid to Deutsche Bank was not the value of the shares but the amount of the loan.

E. THE FINAL SUBMISSIONS OF THE PARTIES

121. The final submissions of the Claimant read as follows:<sup>37</sup>

“For the reasons stated herein, in its Memorials, and at the hearing, Claimant respectfully requests an award granting it the following relief:

1. A finding and declaration that the Argentine Republic violated the BIT;
2. An order that the Argentine Republic compensate Claimant for all damages it has suffered, plus interest compounded quarterly until the date of payment, and
3. An order that the Argentine Republic pay the costs of these proceedings, including the Tribunal’s fees and expenses, the cost of Claimant’s legal representation, and other costs.”

122. The respondent State’s final submissions were the following:<sup>38</sup>

“Based on the arguments and evidence of the case, the Argentine Republic hereby requests this Tribunal to dismiss Claimant’s claim in all its aspects and to require Claimant to pay for all the expenses and legal costs deriving from this arbitration.”

(i) The Claimant’s Position

1991 BIT, the latter, as interpreted and applied in accordance with general principles of international law, constitutes the “rules of law” to which the parties “agreed.” Customary international law, which is explicitly incorporated by the BIT in its provisions, has a double role: (1) to clarify the terms of the BIT; and (2) to establish a floor for the treatment of investments.

124. The BIT and international law are also governing under the second sentence of Article 42(1), which provides that the Tribunal “shall apply the law of the Contracting State Party to the dispute ... and such rules of international law that may be applicable.” In fact, Argentina has incorporated the BIT and international law into its domestic law and the second sentence creates a duty to apply international law. Argentinian law is irrelevant for determining whether Argentina is internationally liable for its conduct, the role of such law being to “inform the content of commitments” made by Argentina to the Claimant.

125. The Claimant relies on a certain number of decisions of ICSID tribunals on the subject, including the decision adopted on 3 July 2002 by the Annulment Committee in Vivendi Universal v. Argentina, stating that:

“ ... the inquiry which the ICSID tribunal is required to undertake is one governed by the ICSID Convention, by the BIT and by applicable international law. Such an inquiry is neither in principle determined, nor precluded, by any issue of municipal law, including any municipal law agreement of the parties.”<sup>39</sup>

(ii) The Respondent’s Position

126. Argentina asserts that “there is no agreement between Argentina and El Paso with respect to the law governing the dispute.” The fact that the agreement between States is regulated by international law is not related to the law applicable to a dispute in which such an agreement should be applied. Whenever a treaty provides that in a specific dispute the provision of such treaty and domestic law will be applied, domestic legislation is considered to be

“law” (and not a “fact”), applicable on the same level as international law (unless otherwise stated).

127. To decide whether Argentina is internationally responsible under the BIT, the rights that El Paso would allegedly have acquired under Argentina law have to be determined under such law, this being the legal system to which the investor has voluntarily become subject. It is not enough for the Claimant to establish that Argentina violated legal or contractual provisions, it must also show that its behaviour implied a violation of the BIT. As stated in the Decision on Jurisdiction, purely contractual claims not amounting to claims for violation of the BIT cannot be entertained.

2. The Tribunal’s Analysis

128. Despite the diverging views expressed by the Parties, both have extensively relied on the BIT, international law and Argentinian law in support of their respective claims and defences. Argentina is right when calling attention to the circumstance that in the absence of an agreement between the Parties on the law governing the dispute, under Article 42(1), second sentence, of the ICSID Convention both the law of Argentina and international law are applicable. The Claimant is also right in emphasising the relevance of the BIT and international law, given the nature of the claims involved in the dispute.
129. The Tribunal shares the view that both systems – the BIT supplemented by international law as well as Argentinian law – have a role to play. The issue is to determine the role of each system for the decision on the merits, given the context of a dispute arising under an investment treaty. The advent of treaty arbitration has brought about a departure from the typical situation where the contract between the investor and the host State is the basis for the consent to ICSID jurisdiction. The basis for consent in treaty arbitration is the treaty itself, in our case the BIT, such consent covering as a rule only claims arising under the BIT (“treaty claims,” as opposed to “contract claims”). The specific context characterising treaty arbitration permits in our case to define the role of the BIT and international law, on the one hand, and Argentina law, on the other.

130. The Claimant relies on Argentina’s responsibility for the violation of various provisions of the BIT. According to the ILC Articles on State Responsibility,<sup>40</sup> “every internationally wrongful act of a State entails the international responsibility of the State.” (Article 1) Further, “the characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful is governed by international law. Such characterization is not affected by the characterization of the same act as lawful by internal law.” (Article 3) Accordingly, the primary governing law in this case is the BIT, supplemented by international law to which the BIT itself makes reference in various provisions.
131. The application of the treaty as the prevailing source as well as the national law of the host State in the case of a dispute under a bilateral investment treaty has been upheld by various ICSID tribunals which have also noted the relation of the treaty to the law of the host State. In Asian Agricultural Products Ltd v. Sri Lanka,<sup>41</sup> the ICSID tribunal noted that

“the prior choice-of-law referred to in the first part of Article 42 of the ICSID Convention could hardly be envisaged in the context of an arbitration case directly instituted in implementation of an international obligation undertaken between two States in favour of their respective nationals investing within the territory of the other Contracting State.”<sup>42</sup>

Accordingly, the tribunal noted that both Parties acted in a manner that demonstrated their mutual agreement that the Sri Lanka-UK BIT be the primary source of the applicable legal rules and concluded that the Sri Lanka-UK BIT, as lex specialis, provides the applicable law in the case of a British (Hong Kong) national asserting violations of that treaty by the Sri Lanka

Government. The tribunal added, however, that the agreement of the parties on the application of the BIT did not exclude the application of other rules, as

“the Bilateral Investment Treaty is not a self-contained closed legal system limited to provide for substantive material rules of direct applicability, but has to be envisaged within a wider juridical context in which rules from other sources are integrated through implied incorporation methods, or by direct reference to certain supplementary rules, whether of national law character or of domestic law nature.”<sup>43</sup>

132. The ICSID tribunal in Compañía del Desarrollo de Santa Elena S.A. v. Costa Rica concluded that Costa Rican law was “generally consistent with the accepted principles of public international law on the same subject,” noting that “[t]o the extent that there may be any inconsistency between the two bodies of law, the rules of public international law must prevail.”<sup>44</sup> In Wena Hotels Limited v. Arab Republic of Egypt, the Annulment Committee stated the following:

“What is clear is that the sense and meaning of the negotiation leading to the second sentence of Article 42(1) allowed for both legal orders to have a role. The law of the host State can indeed be applied in conjunction with international law if this is justified. So too international law can be applied by itself if the appropriate rule is found in this other ambit.”<sup>45</sup>

133. The Committee then affirmed the original tribunal’s reliance on the Egypt-UK BIT as the primary governing law, stating: “This treaty law and practice evidences that when a tribunal applies the law embodied in a treaty to which Egypt is a party it is not applying rules alien to the domestic legal system of this country.”<sup>46</sup>

134. Authoritative scholars have expressed the same view. Thus, Professor Prosper Weil has observed:

<sup>45</sup> Wena Hotels Limited v. Arab Republic of Egypt [hereinafter Wena], (ICSID Case No. ARB/98/4), Decision on Annulment of 5 February 2002, § 40.

“Even where the investment instrument – be it a contract or a unilateral act – provides that the relationship between the host State and the foreign investor is entirely or partly subject to the domestic law of the host State, the existence of a Bilateral Investment Treaty raises the question of compliance with the rights and obligations contained therein to the level of a matter under international law, with respect not only to relations between the States parties to the treaty but also to relations between the host State and the investor.”<sup>47</sup>

135. The fact that the BIT and international law govern the issue of Argentina’s responsibility for violation of the treaty does not exclude that the domestic law of Argentina has a role to play too. The Tribunal agrees with the Claimant that this role is to inform the content of those commitments made by Argentina to Claimant that the latter alleges to have been violated. Thus, in order to establish which rights have been recognised by Argentina to the Claimant as a foreign investor, resort will have to be had to Argentina’s law. However, whether a modification or cancellation of such rights, even if legally valid under Argentina’s law, constitutes a violation of a protection guaranteed by the BIT is a matter to be decided solely on the basis of the BIT itself and the other applicable rules of international law.
136. The above approach, according to which the BIT and international law as well as Argentinian law have to be applied, is consistent with decisions of ICSID tribunals and annulment committees in disputes involving Argentina under the same BIT. Thus, in CMS Gas Transmission Company v. Argentine Republic,<sup>48</sup> the tribunal, referring to the passage of the Annulment Committee in the Wena decision quoted above in paragraph 132, held:

“This is the approach this Tribunal considers justified when taking the facts of the case and the arguments of the parties into account. Indeed, there is here a close interaction between the legislation and the regulations governing the gas privatization, the Licenses and international law, as embodied both in the Treaty and in customary

137. In Azurix Corporation v. Argentine Republic, the tribunal stated:

“Azurix’s claim has been advanced under the BIT and, as stated by the Annulment Committee in Vivendi II, the Tribunal’s inquiry is governed by the ICSID Convention, by the BIT and by applicable international law. While the Tribunal’s inquiry will be guided by this statement, this does not mean that the law of Argentina should be disregarded. On the contrary, the law of Argentina should be helpful in the carrying out of the Tribunal’s inquiry into the alleged breaches of the Concession Agreement to which Argentina’s law applies, but it is only an element of the inquiry because of the treaty nature of the claims under consideration.”<sup>50</sup>

138. In LG&E Capital Corp. and LG&E International Inc. v. Argentine Republic, the tribunal held:

“The fact that there is no contract between the Argentine Republic and LG&E favours in the first place the application of international law, inasmuch as we are dealing with a genuine dispute in matters of investment which is especially subject to the provisions of the Bilateral Treaty complemented by the domestic law.”<sup>51</sup>

139. In Enron Corporation and Ponderosa Assets L.P. v. Argentine Republic, the tribunal had this to say:

“While on occasion writers and decisions have tended to consider the application of domestic law or international law as a kind of dichotomy, this is far from being the case. In fact, both have a complementary role to perform and this has begun to be recognised.

It must be noted also that the very legal system of treaties of the Argentine Republic, like many modern systems, provides for a prominent role of treaties under both Article 27 and 31 of the Constitution. Treaties are constitutionally recognized among the sources considered ‘the supreme law of the Nation.’ It follows that in case of conflict between a treaty rule and an inconsistent rule of domestic law, the former will prevail.”<sup>52</sup>

140. In Sempra Energy International v. Argentine Republic,<sup>53</sup> the arbitral tribunal has held that the role of Argentinian law is not limited to the determination of factual questions and has a broader role to play,<sup>54</sup> but that international law holds a prominent role, both Parties having invoked it in respect of a number of matters.<sup>55</sup> In case of inconsistency between Argentinian law and international law, the latter shall prevail.<sup>56</sup> The tribunal has then concluded that:

“In accordance with the above considerations, the Tribunal will consider both Argentine law and international law to the extent each is relevant to a determination on liability.”<sup>57</sup>

141. Accordingly, this Tribunal will apply to the merits of the case the BIT and international law, when applicable, as well as the Argentinian law, each in its role as defined above.

B. DEFINITION OF THE INVESTMENT

142. It is well known that in order to qualify for protection under the ICSID/BIT mechanism, an investment has to satisfy the requirements of the definition of an investment both under the Washington Convention and the BIT. Although there is no definition of an “investment” in the ICSID Convention, case-law has emerged to allow for determination of what constitutes an investment. One of the central purposes of ICSID arbitration is the protection of foreign investments. In order for this Tribunal to entertain a claim, the latter must be related to a legal dispute arising directly out of an investment. The existence of an investment is therefore an essential requirement, and the Tribunal will ascertain what the substance of the protected investment is in this case.

1. Introduction

143. Article I(1)(a) of the BIT provides:

“For the purposes of this Treaty,

(a) ‘investment’ means every kind of investment in the territory of one Party owned or controlled directly or indirectly by nationals or companies of the other Party, such as equity, debt and service and investment contracts; and includes without limitation:

(i) tangible and intangible property, including rights such as mortgages, liens and pledges;

(ii) a company or shares of stock or other interests in the assets thereof;

(iii) a claim to money or a claim to performance having economic value and directly related to an investment;

(iv) intellectual property which includes, inter alia, rights relating to:

literary and artistic works, including sound recordings, inventions in all fields of human endeavour, industrial designs, semiconductor mask works, trade secrets, know-how, and confidential business information, and trademarks, service marks, and trade names; and

(v) any right conferred by law or contract, and any licenses and permits pursuant to law.”

144. The question to be answered is that of the extent of the “investment” or “investments” made by the Claimant, i.e. whether the rights protected by the BIT are limited to those pertaining to the shares held by the Claimant in the Argentinian companies, or whether they include other items, such as legal and contractual rights belonging to the Argentinian companies. The Parties disagree on this issue. Before examining the matter and expressing the present Tribunal’s views thereon, it may be convenient to recall that in its Decision on Jurisdiction, the Tribunal rejected, inter alia, an objection of the Respondent to the effect that the Claimant lacked jus standi.<sup>58</sup>

145. That objection had been based on two arguments: (i) the investments in question had been sold by the Claimant, and claimants must retain their investor's status throughout the examination of their claim; and (ii) the Claimant had but a minority shareholding in the Argentinian companies.

146. Regarding the first argument, the Tribunal found that no rule prescribing continuous ownership of the investment could be deduced from the ICSID Convention and the BIT or from the relevant case-law.<sup>59</sup> All that was required was ownership of the claim at the time of consent to arbitration as well as at the time of the registration of the claim, and these conditions were met in the instant case.
147. As to the second argument, the Arbitral Tribunal considered that it had been presented too late. But even if it had been timely, pursued the Tribunal, it would have been of little help to the Respondent for reasons similar to those mentioned by the Decision on Jurisdiction in LG&E.<sup>60</sup> In that decision it is said that foreign claimants' shares in local companies "are the investment within the meaning of Article 1(1)(a)(ii) of the Bilateral Treaty"<sup>61</sup> and that "it is irrelevant whether the shares are majority or minority shares."<sup>62</sup>
148. Accordingly, the Tribunal recognised the jus standi of the Claimant. It remains to be seen, on the merits of the present case, what exactly the Claimant's investment consists of: the shares of the Argentinian companies only or other elements as well?

2. The Parties' Positions

(i) The Claimant's Position

149. In its Post-Hearing Brief, the Claimant asserts that the term "investment" used in the BIT between Argentina and the United States includes elements other than shareholdings.<sup>63</sup> That term must be read as including not only shareholders' rights, but also investment contracts and legal or contractual

rights owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by the investor. This means, according to the Claimant, that since CAPSA and CAPEX were

“ ... the investment vehicles through which El Paso invested in Argentina’s hydrocarbon sector, the vested and contractual rights belonging to those entities indirectly belonged to El Paso within the terms of this Treaty [the BIT].”<sup>64</sup>

150. Moreover, according to the Claimant,

“ ... the actions of the local operating companies – whether they choose to enter into settlement agreements, renegotiations, or seek relief in local courts – cannot waive the rights of a shareholding investor (minority or majority) under an applicable treaty; only the investor can give its consent to waive such rights.”<sup>65</sup>

151. The above views are confirmed by the experts commissioned by the Claimant and their testimony in this Tribunal’s hearings. Thus, in his Opinion of August 2004, Professor Reisman stated:

“... in addition to the expropriation of specific contract and legal rights and frustration of legitimate expectations that resulted from the measures taken ..., the cumulative effect of the measures ... accomplished an indirect expropriation of El Paso’s investment.”<sup>66</sup>

152. In the present context, what is of interest in the above passage is not so much what it says about expropriation, but the fact that “it includes specific contract and legal rights” of the Argentinian companies within El Paso’s investment and, hence, in the object of the alleged expropriation. This view is confirmed by an exchange that took place between the expert and counsel for the respondent State during the hearing on the merits:

“Q. Were the legal and contractual rights of the Argentine companies El Paso’s investment?”

<sup>66</sup> Expert Opinion of Professor W. Michael Reisman [hereinafter Reisman Report] of August 2004, p. 50, Memorial Legal Authority No. 29.

A. Yes.”<sup>67</sup>

A few moments later, the following dialogue between counsel for Argentina and Professor Reisman was recorded:

“Q. ... Now, under the definition of investments in the bilateral investment treaty, in addition to the shares that El Paso had in the Argentine companies, would the specific contractual and legal rights held by those companies with the government qualify as protected investments under the treaty?

A. In my opinion it would.

Q. And in your view are specific legal and contractual rights susceptible to expropriation independent from the business of the company as a whole?

A. Of course. It’s such an obvious point that I needn’t try to give examples, but there are some.”<sup>68</sup>

153. These views were confirmed by Professor Schreuer, another expert consulted by the Claimant.<sup>69</sup> In his Opinion, Professor Schreuer asserted that Argentina had abrogated essential rights of the Claimant resulting from the latter’s investment by taking, not physical assets but rights under the Electricity and Hydrocarbon Regulatory Frameworks – rights guaranteed by laws, decrees, resolutions and concession agreements – thereby depriving El Paso of a reasonably expected economic return.<sup>70</sup> This expert later asserted

“ ... that specific rights that El Paso enjoyed under the Electricity and Hydrocarbons Regulatory Frameworks are covered by the definition of investment in the BIT and that these rights were taken from El Paso. This means that any ‘right conferred by law or contract’ upon El Paso is protected by the BIT.”<sup>71</sup>

154. A confirmation of the above may be found in the conclusions of Professor Schreuer's Opinion:

“The term ‘investment’ is defined in Article I(1) of the BIT. That definition includes ‘a claim to money or a claim to performance having economic value and directly related to an investment’ as well as ‘any right conferred by law or contract, and any licenses and permits pursuant to law.’ Therefore, contracts and public concessions are included in the definition of investments. This also squarely covers the rights enjoyed by El Paso under the Electricity Regulatory Framework and under the Hydrocarbons Regulatory Framework. It follows that the rights of El Paso under the Electricity Regulatory Framework and under the Hydrocarbons Regulatory Framework as well as the rights arising under permits and contracts based on these legal frameworks are covered by the BIT’s provisions protecting United States investors from expropriation and measures tantamount to expropriation.”<sup>72</sup>

155. In his testimony before the Tribunal, Professor Schreuer was asked whether he would be surprised if he were told that the Regulatory Frameworks for Electricity and for Hydrocarbons do not grant any rights to El Paso. Here is the expert's answer:

“Yes, I would be, unless you mean ‘directly,’ of course. If you mean they granted rights to the Argentinian Companies in which El Paso invested, then I would not be surprised; but, if you say it did not grant any directly or indirectly, then I would be surprised.”<sup>73</sup>

156. All in all, the Claimant and its experts clearly are of the view that the expression “investment” used in Article I(1)(a) of the BIT between Argentina and the United States must be interpreted as including both El Paso's shares in the domestic companies and the contractual and legal rights directly owned by those entities.

(ii) The Respondent's Position

157. The Respondent's view is that the legal and contractual rights of the Argentinian companies belong to the latter and not to El Paso, a foreign entity that has invested in them. Accordingly, El Paso can claim for the loss allegedly caused unlawfully by the Respondent to its shares in said companies but not for allegedly unlawful damage caused to rights belonging to the latter. In its Rejoinder, the GOA asserts that

“the claim by the foreign investor whose investment is an interest in a local company may only be founded on the detriment to the investment itself when it is in breach of the BIT, rather than on the detriment to the local company’s rights.”<sup>74</sup>

158. Similarly, in its Closing Statement, the GOA points out that

“[a] shareholder may not claim compensation in connection with a measure concerning the rights of the company where the shareholder holds a participating interest.”<sup>75</sup>

159. The Government’s views on this issue were further developed by Professor Sornarajah,<sup>76</sup> one of its experts. His Opinion begins with the finding that the lack of diplomatic protection for foreign shareholders in local companies under the Barcelona Traction doctrine<sup>77</sup> became increasingly cumbersome when developing countries targeting foreign investment began to require that such investment be made through domestic companies in which foreign shareholders would usually hold minority participations.<sup>78</sup> This, according to the expert, is why some protection has been extended to foreign shareholders by the BITs.

160. But this protection, according to the same expert, will come to bear only if it is the shares as such which have been affected by measures such as forcible divestment or expropriation of the company; if the latter “continued to function and the shares were intact, the need for such protection would not arise.”<sup>79</sup> The measures decided by the State thus were issues to be taken up on the domestic level by the company itself. Professor Sornarajah then points out that

“[t]he mere fact that the shares had depleted in value does not give a cause of action to a minority shareholder under an investment treaty. Had the company been expropriated, the situation would have been different as the minority shareholder has a right to compensation for the extent of his share in the value of the company.”<sup>80</sup>

161. The expert pursues his analysis by asserting that in international law the understanding always was that “the shares in a company incorporated in a host country are not usually affected by any measures” taken by that country. In such situations, the company itself is the victim. The domestic company as such does not have the personality required to seek protection under a BIT. This finding cannot be subverted merely by showing that the protected foreigners hold minority shareholdings. The situation is different when the company itself ceases to exist, in which case foreign shareholders can claim the value of their shares.<sup>81</sup>
162. According to the Barcelona Traction ruling, customary international law does not allow for diplomatic protection by the national State of foreign shareholders. The change to this ruling brought about by the BITs is that shareholders are now given the possibility to protect shares, whether “directly or indirectly held.” This can be taken to mean: (i) that the intention was to protect the shares of majority shareholders and their value when the company was expropriated, especially in States making the entry of foreign investment dependent on local incorporation; and (ii) that there was no intention to protect shares of functioning companies.<sup>82</sup>
163. While it is true that the Tribunal recognised the jus standi of the Claimant as a minority shareholder in the Argentinian companies,<sup>83</sup> this was a prima facie finding. The remaining question is whether “the investment treaty protects shareholder rights beyond the protection of their rights as shareholders and includes the protection of the rights of the companies in which such shares are held.”<sup>84</sup>

164. The problem dealt with next by the Respondent’s expert is whether minority shareholders qualify as owners of a “protected investment” under Article I(1)(a) of the BIT. Such shareholders “own and control” their shares but not the company itself. Investments owned or controlled “directly or indirectly,” as referred to in Article I.1 of the Treaty, is a term describing shares owned or controlled by their holders or someone higher up in the chain. It does not “extend downward” to the local company serving as a vehicle of the investment. The latter’s property remains unprotected,<sup>85</sup> and its assets cannot benefit from the diplomatic protection of the shareholders’ national State. All the BIT aims for is to transfer the object of the diplomatic protection from the foreign State to the foreign individual investor; it does not enlarge the definition of the objects protected.<sup>86</sup>
165. The Respondent’s expert then comments on views that contractual and legal rights of the domestic companies are not protected as rights of the latter’s foreign shareholders.<sup>87</sup> Wherever such claims were successful, this was because specific commitments had been made directly to the foreign investors guaranteeing these rights via permits or contracts. Such was the case in CMS,<sup>88</sup> where there was a license granted by decree, and in Revere Copper v. Jamaica,<sup>89</sup> where a stabilisation contract “involved a specific contractual commitment.”<sup>90</sup>
166. The legal and contractual rights under discussion are based on Argentinian law, which brought them to life. Professor Sornarajah points out that<sup>91</sup> they are not enlarged at the international level but remain co-terminous with the rights as they stand on the domestic level: “foreign investment rights under the investment treaty can exist only to the extent permitted by the host State’s law at the time of the entry.”<sup>92</sup>

167. It is, therefore, to Argentinian law that one must turn to establish whether specific rights have been attributed to the Claimant.<sup>93</sup> In the case at hand, there were no such rights. Regarding the Electricity Sector,<sup>94</sup> changes had to be expected and, in fact, frequently occurred; changes were foreseen in the Regulatory Framework and, indeed, were accepted voluntarily by the local companies; it was the foreign minority shareholders who complained. In the Hydrocarbons Sector,<sup>95</sup> the situation is similar:

“... to the extent that the measures taken during the economic crisis are reasonable within the regulatory structure, they cannot create any impact or any external system of investment protection for a wrongful infringement of treaty rights.”<sup>96</sup>

168. Professor Sornarajah finally turns to the permanent sovereignty over natural resources, which he considers to be a principle of jus cogens. This means that, with the fluctuations of what can be considered as being the public interest, an element of paramount importance in this matter, the rights granted to operators and investors may fluctuate as well; entrants to the field cannot but be aware of that possibility. Pursuant to the jus cogens argument, what may have been possible at a given time under the angle of the jus cogens principle of permanent sovereignty over natural resources will no longer be at another point in time. In technical terms, this means that a supervening impossibility of performance may occur under Article 61 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.<sup>97</sup> In such situations, the Respondent’s expert concludes, “a recovery of sovereignty is permissible.”<sup>98</sup> According to the Respondent’s expert, all BITs are subject to that limitation.

(iii) A Summary of the Discussion

169. El Paso holds the view that it may claim, not only on the basis of its shareholdings in the Argentinian companies, but also based on the legal and contractual rights of those entities.
170. The respondent Government holds that the fundamental rules to be used to define the content of foreign shareholders’ rights on the international level are those governing diplomatic protection. In principle, such protection can be granted to foreign shareholders only if their personal, i.e. direct, rights have suffered at the hands of the State: annulment or confiscation of its shares, refusal of the right to participate in shareholders’ meetings or to receive a dividend, and so on. To this, one may add, at least for majority shareholders, the expropriation of the company, especially by States making the entry of foreign investment contingent on local incorporation. By contrast, shares of functioning companies remain unprotected.
171. This was, according to the Respondent, the situation prevailing up to the Barcelona Traction case.<sup>99</sup> The only thing that changed with the advent of BITs is that, whereas in the past such claims had to be made through the channel of diplomatic protection, they can, today, be presented directly by the foreign investor. The BITs do not, however, enlarge the content of the rights protected in any way; they do not, in particular, extend to legal and contractual rights of domestic companies, except if specific commitments were made directly guaranteeing these rights to the foreign investor. Another point made was that minority shareholdings do not qualify for BIT protection.
172. The above suggests that the two essential questions to be addressed by the Tribunal are: (i) Should Article I(1)(a) of the Argentina-US BIT be construed narrowly, as reflecting, so far as foreign shareholders' rights are concerned, the situation prevailing in the field of diplomatic protection? and (ii) Is the protection offered by that provision limited to foreign majority shareholders?

3. The Tribunal's Analysis

173. In the present case, El Paso's right to claim is not in dispute. Being an entity incorporated in the State of Delaware, it is unquestionably a US company and, thus, placed under ICSID jurisdiction pursuant to Article 25(2)(b) of the ICSID Convention. What is in dispute is whether, in addition to El Paso's shares in the Argentinian companies, which the Parties agree qualify as "investment" according to Article I(1)(a) of the BIT, the term "investments" as defined by said Article includes other elements.
174. El Paso's basic contention is that Article I of the BIT between Argentina and the United States uses very broad language and can therefore encompass both its shareholdings in the Argentinian companies and the legal and contractual rights of which those entities had allegedly been deprived in violation of the BIT. This line of argument appears contradictory: either the domestic companies enjoy an independent legal existence, in which case it is they who own said legal and contractual rights, this meaning that the foreign investors' losses can be measured only by the diminished value of their shares in the companies. Or the domestic companies' legal existence is but a fiction, at least on the international level, and can therefore be disregarded, which would mean that the investment can practically be characterised as a direct one, the consequence being that the foreign investor may claim, as the owner of the local companies, the legal and contractual rights in question, but not its losses as a shareholder.
175. In the Tribunal's eyes, the above two views are irreconcilable, so that it is indispensable to opt for the one or the other. As things are, the Claimant's contentions in their present form do not seem viable because they amount to claiming twice for damage caused by the same events: once for the taking of the rights of the Argentinian companies and once for the diminution in value of the shares of those companies held by El Paso. That the loss of share value is linked to the taking of the rights belonging to the local company appears obvious.

176. The Respondent's thesis appears flawed as well. It is based on the assumption that the only change from the Barcelona Traction<sup>100</sup> situation brought on by the BITs is that diplomatic protection will no longer be required because the individual foreign investor may now bring claims on the international level. Otherwise, it is argued, nothing has changed; in particular, the content of the claimable rights remains the same.
177. To remove any doubt and to ensure that its analysis is exhaustive, the Tribunal will first confirm that interests repeatedly invoked by the Claimant as having been interfered with are not investments protected by the BIT: this holds true for the licenses and other contracts granted to the Argentinian companies, as well as for purported investment agreements that would belong to El Paso. After this negative approach, the Tribunal will turn to a positive approach and concentrate on the definition of what does constitute El Paso's investment in Argentina, i.e. its shares in different Argentinian companies, thus giving an answer to the questions under paragraph 172 above. It seems however apposite, before entering into the analysis of the substance of El Paso's investment, to recall what the Claimant considers as its investment in its submissions. In its Memorial, El Paso's investment is described as follows, on the basis of Article 1(1)(a) of the BIT:

“Applying these standards, Claimant's claims clearly arise directly out of an ‘investment.’ Claimant's investment directly and indirectly include: (i) equity interests in the Argentine Companies; (ii) the ownership and control of legal rights under the Energy Regulatory Framework, including concession and contract rights, such as those arising under the Concessions and crude oil, LPG and energy supply agreements; (iii) a substantial amount of Dollars invested by Claimant in Argentina; and (iv) claims to money and performance having economic value under Claimant's Concession, contract and legal rights.”<sup>101</sup>

(i) What Is Not El Paso's Investment?

(a) The Licenses and Other Contracts Granted to the Argentinian Companies Are Not Protected Investments

178. Although the Claimant has not asserted that the Argentinian companies as such are its investment, it has claimed violation of rights belonging to these companies and can therefore be considered to have implicitly considered the Argentinian companies either as protected investors or protected investments. The Tribunal therefore deems it necessary to clarify whether the Argentinian companies are or are not protected investors and whether the Claimant can therefore claim for rights belonging to them.

179. In its Article 25(2), the ICSID Convention gives a definition of the companies that can be considered nationals of a given State:

“... (2) ‘National of another Contracting State’ means:

... (b) any juridical person which had the nationality of a Contracting State other than the State party to the dispute on the date on which the parties consented to submit such dispute to conciliation or arbitration and any juridical person which had the nationality of the Contracting State party to the dispute on that date and which, because of foreign control, the parties have agreed should be treated as a national of another Contracting State for the purposes of this Convention.”

180. In the BIT, Article I gives the following definition of a “company”:

“b) ‘company’ of a Party means any kind of corporation, company, association, state enterprise, or other organization, legally constituted under the laws and regulations of a Party or a political subdivision thereof whether or not organized for pecuniary gain, and whether privately or governmentally owned.”

181. A first point can be dealt with quite quickly: it is not contested that CAPSA, CAPEX, Costanera and SERVICIOS are Argentinian companies under these definitions, as they are incorporated under the laws of Argentina and registered in that country.

182. The second question to be asked is whether, although they have the nationality of the Contracting State Party to the dispute – i.e. the nationality of Argentina – the Parties have agreed that, because of foreign control, these companies should be treated as United States nationals, and therefore their rights considered as protected investments, for the purposes of the ICSID Convention and this arbitration. It should be noted that Argentina has indeed agreed to treat the Argentinian Companies as foreign companies under Article VII(8) of the BIT for purposes of Article 25(2)(b) of the ICSID Convention, on condition of a foreign (U.S.) control over such entities.
183. For Costanera, there is clearly no control, as El Paso holds only an indirect non-controlling interest of about 12% in Costanera. The same is true for CAPSA and, through the latter, CAPEX, as there is no control by the American company El Paso over these two Argentinian entities: El Paso has only indirect non-controlling shareholdings in CAPSA and CAPEX; more precisely, El Paso owns a 45% interest in CAPSA, the latter having a 60.36% interest in CAPEX.<sup>102</sup> The analysis is different for SERVICIOS: both the first condition for considering it as a foreign company – El Paso owned a 99.2 % controlling shareholding in that company – and the second condition – the agreement by Argentina to consider SERVICIOS as a US company because of control – are met. However, SERVICIOS has signed no contracts or other agreements with Argentina. The conclusion is that the rights of the four mentioned Argentinian companies in which El Paso has invested cannot be considered rights enjoying the protection of the Argentina-US BIT by application of Article 25(2)(b) of the ICSID Convention.
184. A similar situation was found to exist in CMS.<sup>103</sup> That company was complaining about the treatment it received as a foreign investor during the Argentinian crisis, its investment being a minority shareholding in TGN (Transportadora de Gas del Norte), an Argentinian company to which the GOA had granted a concession for the transportation of natural gas. The Claimant, the Respondent and the Tribunal made the same analysis of the situation, considering that TGN was not a protected investor. The Respondent's position, as summarised by the tribunal in the Decision on Jurisdiction, was the following:

“In its view, while the acquisition of shares qualifies as an investment under the Treaty, neither TGN, as an Argentine corporation, nor the License qualify as an investment under the BIT. TGN, the argument follows, has its own assets, including the License; because these assets do not constitute an investment under the Treaty, CMS's claims, based on the alleged breach of TGN's rights under the License cannot be considered to arise directly from an investment.”<sup>104</sup>

185. The claimant did not disagree with this analysis, as highlighted again by the tribunal:

“CMS shares the view that TGN is not an investor under the Treaty, and that it has not been agreed to treat this company as a non-Argentine national because of foreign control. Neither is the License an investment under the Treaty. However, CMS adds, its 29.42% share in TGN qualifies as an investment covered under the Treaty ...”<sup>105</sup>

186. The tribunal concluded along the same lines and accepted jurisdiction, not on the basis of any rights of TGN or any rights relating to the License, which were not protected investments, but on account of the existence of the shareholding of CMS in the Argentinian company:

“Because ... the rights of the Claimant can be asserted independently from the rights of TGN and those relating to the License, and because the Claimant has a separate cause of action under the Treaty in connection with the protected investment, the Tribunal concludes that the present dispute arises directly from the investment made and that therefore there is no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction on this count.”<sup>106</sup>

187. The conclusion is therefore unavoidable: the Argentinian companies – CAPSA, CAPEX, Costanera and SERVICIOS – do not qualify as protected investors under the ICSID Convention and the BIT, and the Tribunal so holds.
188. The Argentinian companies not being protected investors, their rights and licenses cannot be considered protected investments. Throughout its submissions, the Claimant complains about interferences with “its contractual rights.” A few examples can be given: in its Memorial, it mentions that “El Paso was stripped of legal and contractual rights and associated revenues.”<sup>107</sup> In its Reply, the Claimant asserts that the GOA interfered with electricity sale contracts “[i]n violation of express provisions of the Electricity Law that guaranteed the right of generators to freely negotiated contracts,”<sup>108</sup> that it mandatorily converted “all Dollar denominated payments in PPAs into Pesos at a confiscatory exchange rate,”<sup>109</sup> that “the GOA unilaterally interfered with contractual rights arising from the sale agreements, contravening express assurances granted to CAPSA and CAPEX under the Hydrocarbon Deregulation Decrees and Decree N° 43/1991 that granted the CAPEX Concession”;<sup>110</sup> also, as stated by the Claimant in the same submission, “the currency conversion imposed by Law N° 25,561 and Decree N° 214 severely impacted CAPSA and CAPEX’s contracts.”<sup>111</sup>
189. However, this Tribunal considers that El Paso owns no contractual rights to be protected, as it has signed no contract with Argentina. In so doing, it agrees with the analysis of the tribunal in the CMS case, as evidenced by the references to the licenses in the citation from the Decision on Jurisdiction in paragraph 186. It is thus the conclusion of the Tribunal that none of the contracts the interference with which is complained of by the Claimant are protected investments under the ICSID Convention and the BIT.

between Argentina and El Paso

190. In its Decision on Jurisdiction, the Tribunal considered that it could accept prima facie the contention of the Claimant that there might be some investment agreements in this case, although that notion is not defined in the BIT. It is worth mentioning that while the BIT involved here fails to supply a complete definition of “investment agreements,” the following definition of that notion has been given in BITs and free trade agreements concluded by the US since 1994:

“ ... a written agreement between the national authorities of a Party and a covered investment or a national or company of the other Party that (i) grants rights with respect to natural resources or other assets controlled by the national authorities and (ii) the investment, national or company relies upon in establishing or acquiring a covered investment.”

191. According to the Claimant, the concessions granted to the Argentinian companies could be so characterised because they constitute written agreements between those companies and the Government; they grant the companies rights to natural resources belonging to the host State; and they establish investment obligations for the companies towards the Government. For example, in its Reply, the Claimant asserts that “each of the Concessions qualifies as an ‘investment agreement’.”<sup>112</sup> According to the Respondent, on the contrary, “[i]n the case under analysis, there is no investment agreement because the requirements for it to exist have not been met: (a) El Paso did not enter into an agreement with the Argentine Government; and (b) the concessions invoked by Claimant lack the elements that may internationalise them because they are governed by Argentine law, are subject to domestic courts and have been granted to Argentine Companies.”<sup>113</sup>

192. The Tribunal, in its Decision on Jurisdiction, considered that “[a]ccording to this Tribunal, the Claimant has made out a prima facie case that there is indeed an investment agreement as that notion may be generally understood.”<sup>114</sup>
193. As the Tribunal is now at the merits phase, it has to re-consider its initial characterisation. The Hydrocarbon Concession and Contracts could indeed have been considered “investment agreements” if they had been signed between Argentina and a foreign investor, as results from the plain wording of Article VII(1) of the BIT which provides for the competence of arbitral tribunals over “investment disputes.” That term is defined in Article VII(1) as “a dispute between a Party and a national or company of the other Party arising out of or relating to (a) an investment agreement between that Party and such national or company.”<sup>115</sup>
194. As has been pointed out, CAPSA and CAPEX cannot be considered US companies. The inescapable conclusion is that the Hydrocarbon Concession and Contracts do not legally qualify as “investment agreements” under the relevant BIT. The disputes related to these agreements are therefore not, as such, investment disputes falling under the jurisdiction of this Tribunal.
195. This conclusion is corroborated a contrario by the decision in Lanco International, Inc. v. Argentina,<sup>116</sup> where the tribunal decided that the concessions were investment agreements, stating that “insofar as Lanco is a party to [the concession agreement, the latter] can be characterised as an investment agreement.”<sup>117</sup> This conclusion was based on the fact that Lanco was not only a shareholder of the concession holder but also a party to the concession agreement, which is not the situation in the present case, where El Paso was not a party to the concession agreements, nor to any other contract with Argentina for that matter. It is also in line with the decision in Occidental

Exploration and Production Co. v. Ecuador,<sup>118</sup> where the tribunal, faced with the interpretation of an exclusion of tax matters similar to that found in Article XII of the BIT, had to determine whether or not an investment agreement was involved. As in Lanco, the tribunal found that there was indeed such an agreement, but that, as in Lanco, this was so because the contract was directly signed between the foreign investor and Petroecuador in the name of Ecuador:

“In 1999, OCCIDENTAL EXPLORATION AND PRODUCTION COMPANY (“OEPC” or “the Company”), a company registered under the laws of California, entered into a participation contract (“the Contract” or “Modified Participation Contract”) with Petroecuador, a State-owned corporation of Ecuador, to undertake exploration for and production of oil in Ecuador.”<sup>119</sup>

“Investments were made by OEPC under the Contract in pursuance of its obligation and exclusive right to carry out the exploration and exploitation activities in the assigned area.”<sup>120</sup>

196. This being the description of the contract, the tribunal in Occidental Exploration and Production Company v. Ecuador, partly relying on Lanco, held that such a contract had to be considered an investment agreement:

“The Tribunal must note ... that ... the Modified Participation Contract qualifies as an ‘investment agreement’ under the Treaty. On this point the Tribunal believes that Ecuador’s argument is consistent with the Lanco Preliminary Award in so far as this decision identified a concession contract, albeit structured in a more complex manner, with an investment agreement between the State and the foreign investor under the Argentine-United States bilateral investment treaty.”<sup>121</sup>

197. The present case has nothing to do with these two precedents as there never was a contract signed between El Paso and Argentina, nor was there a concession granted to El Paso by Argentina. The Tribunal considers that the concessions, having been granted to Argentinian companies and not to El Paso, do not qualify as investment agreements. It is only in partial agreement, therefore, with the Claimant, when the latter states in its Reply that “[t]he equity interest in CAPSA/CAPEX and the Concessions are covered investments under the BIT. Thus, the definition of investment includes Claimant’s interest in CAPSA/CAPEX and the concessions they hold.”<sup>122</sup> If indeed Claimant’s shareholding in CAPSA/CAPEX is a protected investment, the contrary holds true for the concessions, which do not qualify as protected investments under the BIT entered into by Argentina and the United States.

198. The Tribunal therefore concludes that no investment agreement protected by the BIT was concluded between Argentina and El Paso and that, as a consequence, the concession agreements entered into by the Argentinian companies cannot give rise to an ICSID claim as protected investments.

(ii) What Is El Paso’s Investment?

(a) The Protection of the Shares under the ICSID Convention and under Article I(1)(a) of the BIT

199. In the present case, El Paso’s right to claim for interference with its shares under the ICSID Convention is not in dispute.
200. The Tribunal now turns to Article I(1)(a)<sup>123</sup> to address this issue in the context of the Argentina-United States BIT and the case at hand. The text of the provision is formulated in a somewhat circular way in that “investments” are defined as being “investments.” There are, however, further elements making that expression more precise.
201. First, as suggested by the Claimant, the expression “investments” is conceived broadly, witness the qualifier “every kind of.” Second, the investment made in one Contracting State must be “owned or controlled directly or indirectly” by nationals or companies of the other Contracting State. Hence, an investment is protected only if it is owned or controlled by such nationals or companies. The words “owned or controlled,” read in conjunction with the words “directly or indirectly,” suggest that the “investment” may be one made by a foreign national or a company incorporated under the laws of the host State but wholly or partly controlled by persons of the other Contracting State; in addition, such control may shift from persons of one foreign State to persons of another.<sup>124</sup> Third, “investments” may, in particular, consist of “equity, debt, and service and investment contracts,” as well as “tangible and intangible property” and – this is crucial – companies “or shares of stock or other interests in the assets thereof.” Other categories of “investments” mentioned are claims to money or to performance having economic value and directly related to an investment, intellectual property, and – this is important equally in the present case – “any right conferred by law or contract, and any licenses and permits pursuant to law.”

202. The circular character of the initial definition of the term “investments” is amply made up for by the above elements. “Investment” covers almost any kind of economic input. It expressly includes “shares of stock” in companies, notably in entities which are incorporated under the laws of the receiving State. There is no limitation regarding the quantity of stock needed, nor are there restrictions regarding the situation of the company (in full operation, expropriated, in the process of liquidation, wound up) or the character of the claims (taking of the shares, right to a dividend, right to participate in stockholders’ meetings, claims for losses in the value of shares). All this is clear evidence that the BIT, as asserted in its preamble, aims at facilitating private investment, promoting the flow of capital and creating conditions of fair and equitable treatment for investments.
203. The Respondent asserts that, according to the text of the BIT, the Parties intended to transfer to the BIT, lock, stock and barrel, the regime practised in the area of diplomatic protection and that the only change brought by the BITs was that the individual investors were now being given direct access to an international dispute settlement mechanism. This “intention” is not, however, attested to by anything and the respondent State has not even attempted to prove it.

204. It is of course true, as the Claimant observes, that the term “investment” used in Article I(1)(a)(v) includes, “without limitation,” “any right conferred by law or contract, and any licences and permits pursuant to law.” But, as shown above in paragraph 175, investors cannot have their cake and eat it too. The loss of value of El Paso’s shares is due, to a large extent, to the measures taken against the legal and contractual rights of the Argentinian companies. To allow claims of El Paso on both counts, for the loss of value of its shares in the companies and for the prejudice suffered by the latter, would amount to compensating the Claimant twice.

(b) International Practice

205. A spate of decisions of ICSID tribunals deals with the interpretation to be given to Article I(1)(a) of the Argentina-United States BIT or similar clauses of other BITs: Lanco International, Ltd. v. Argentine Republic,<sup>125</sup> Goetz v. Republic of Burundi,<sup>126</sup> Maffezini v. Spain,<sup>127</sup> Genin v. Estonia,<sup>128</sup> *CMS v. <sup>134</sup> Pan American v. The Argentine Republic, and BP America v. Argentine Republic [hereinafter Pan American], Decision on Preliminary Objections of 27 July 2006, §§ 209-221.

206. With the exception of Goetz – which only deals with the specific circumstances of that case, i.e. the presence of foreign majority shareholders – these precedents, taken collectively, yield the following conclusions:

- the situation envisaged here is not one of diplomatic protection, as in Barcelona Traction and ELSI,<sup>135</sup> and the practice reflected in those cases is not necessarily relevant here;
- what is relevant is Article I(1)(a) of the Argentina-United States BIT as well as comparable provisions of other instruments, read according to their text and the preamble of the BIT;
- these instruments protect the rights of foreign shareholders in domestic companies, more precisely their own rights as shareholders (right to the shares, right to a dividend, participation in stockholders' meetings, etc.), including the right to compensation for loss of value of stocks imputable to measures taken by the host State;
- that protection is not limited to foreign majority shareholdings but encompasses minority holdings.

This last conclusion has been forcefully approved by the Annulment Committee in the case of CMS:

“The Committee observes that, as regards shareholder equity, the BIT contains nothing which indicates that the investor in capital stock has to have a majority of the stock or control over the administration of the company. Investments made by minority shareholders are covered by the actual language of the definition, as also recognized by ICSID arbitral tribunals in comparable cases.”<sup>136</sup>

To this summary of the international practice, the Tribunal will now add further observations.

207. The problem of the admissibility of claims by foreign shareholders has produced a steady trickle of international practice. According to that practice, the national States of foreign shareholders owning shares and the rights flowing therefrom – as defined in the preceding paragraph – are entitled to claim those rights regardless of the quantity or value of the shares held. It has generally been assumed that, as long as the company’s home State was in a position to claim on the international level, by way of diplomatic protection, the shareholders’ national States could not claim for any infringement of the rights of the company, or could do so only if the shareholders’ rights had become immediate rights against the host State as a result of the disappearance of the company itself.
208. International practice, however, shows a clear tendency also to protect the interests of foreign shareholders where the company itself belongs to the respondent State, especially where incorporation in that State is a condition for making investments. In such instances, it is thought desirable to protect such interests, for otherwise there would be no protection at all. The ELSI case decided by a Chamber of the International Court of Justice<sup>137</sup> attests to that tendency.
209. Moreover, the present instance must be viewed, not from the angle of general international law, as the International Court of Justice did in Barcelona Traction, but from that of treaty law, specifically Article 25 of the ICSID Convention and Article I(1)(a) of the BIT between Argentina and the United States. An examination of those provisions and of the relevant international practice show that they deviate from Barcelona Traction and that they were intended to do so. This has also been acknowledged by the CMS Annulment Committee when it stated that “[s]uch treaties [BITs] and in particular the ICSID Convention must be applied as lex specialis.” (§ 69).
210. Whether it can be asserted that, today, the lex specialis thus developed is “so prevalent that it can now be considered the general rule,” as stated by the ICSID tribunal in CMS,<sup>138</sup> is a difficult question which the present Tribunal will not have to go into, however, since the case before it is governed by the lex specialis anyway.

211. Another issue regarded as unsolved by some is whether the foreign shareholding, to be protected, must be of some importance. The ICSID case-law recited earlier<sup>139</sup> shows that, regarding the rights of foreign shareholders, no majority is required; a minority will suffice. That raises the further question of whether that minority must be a substantial one or whether even a single share could give rise to a claim. Some concern has indeed been voiced by international tribunals that not any minor portion of indirectly owned shares should necessarily be considered an investment. In Enron, the Claimants had a 35.263% indirect ownership of the shares of an Argentinian company through a complex corporate structure. The tribunal considered this an investment, while adding a caveat:

“The Tribunal notes that while investors can claim in their own rights under the provisions of the treaty, there is indeed a need to establish a cut-off point beyond which claims would not be permissible as they would only have a remote connection to the affected company.”<sup>140</sup>

212. In the present instance, El Paso’s shareholding interest in the Argentinian companies is undoubtedly substantial in nature, which is why the question does not have to be answered.

(iii) Summary

213. BITs do not concern situations such as that addressed in Barcelona Traction: they do not pertain to diplomatic protection, nor do they reflect the rules of general international law in matters of investment protection. Interpreted in conformity with the canons of treaty law, they prescribe that rights and interests of foreign shareholders, in casu El Paso’s shareholdings in the Argentinian companies, are protected regardless of whether they are majority or minority participations.

214. The Tribunal has come to the clear conclusion that the investment protected by the BIT was constituted by the shares in the Argentinian companies that belonged to El Paso. The Claimant in fact has itself admitted this conclusion of the Tribunal, if one looks at its Memorial, where it is stated that “[i]n summary, El Paso owned certain investments in Argentina, which include indirect non-controlling shareholdings in CAPSA, CAPEX and Costanera and an indirect controlling shareholding in SERVICIOS.”<sup>141</sup> The overall conclusion related to the definition of the protected investment could be: what is protected are “the shares, all the shares, but only the shares.”

IV. THE ALLEGED VIOLATIONS

215. As stated by the Claimant in its Memorial,

“[t]his dispute arises out of a series of laws, decrees, orders and resolutions of the GOA, mostly enacted during and since 2002, through which it fundamentally breached the explicit and implicit obligations it had assumed towards investors by abrogating and repudiating legal and contractual rights and radically altering the very economic, regulatory and legal frameworks that had been specifically designed to induce investment, and upon which El Paso had relied in making its investments in Argentina.”<sup>142</sup>

216. The Respondent has a totally different approach to the events and considers that what happened was a terrible economic crisis affecting all economic actors and that El Paso was necessarily caught in these economic disturbances:

“Isolating the foreign investor from the crisis through the ICSID is distorting the nature and purpose of the protection granted by treaties to investors only to turn them into privileged subjects that may appear before such World Bank agency seeking protection against structural crises as the one undergone by the Argentine economy. Bilateral

217. The Tribunal does not see exactly what the Claimant means by “implicit” obligations, unless this is a mere formula to extend State liability. It will therefore concentrate on the explicit obligations towards American investors undertaken by Argentina when ratifying the Argentina-US BIT, to establish whether any of these obligations have been violated. If the answer is positive, the Tribunal will still have to verify whether there are circumstances, according to the BIT or general international law, under which these acts cannot be qualified as BIT violations.
218. Before examining whether the violation of the Claimant’s rights amounts to a breach of one or more BIT standards, it is necessary for the Tribunal to have a full picture of the rights alleged by the Claimant which the latter considers to have been violated. These rights were stated first in the Request for Arbitration, and no new right was asserted thereafter. A distinction has to be drawn between the Electricity Sector and the Hydrocarbon Sector.
219. In the Electricity Sector, the following rights are said to have been violated in the Request for Arbitration:<sup>144</sup>
- Right to receive Capacity Payments in dollars.
  - Right to have Spot Market Prices set at a uniform rate based on the marginal production cost of the system.
  - Right to have Spot Prices calculated in dollars.
  - Right to collect payments for spot energy supplies in accordance with pre-established conditions.<sup>145</sup>

<sup>144</sup> El Paso Energy International Company v. Argentine Republic, Request for Arbitration of 6 June 2003. [hereinafter Request for Arbitration], §§ 55, 56, 58 and 60.

<sup>145</sup> In the Claimant’s Memorial, the power generation dispute is described as an alteration of the electricity market involving the following measures, all considered as a violation of the investor’s rights:

1. Alteration of Spot Price Setting Mechanisms;
2. Pesification of VCPs at an Artificial Exchange Rate;
3. Caps on Spot Prices;

220. In the Hydrocarbon Sector, the following rights are alleged to have been breached in the Request for Arbitration:<sup>146</sup>

- Right to have hydrocarbon exports exempted from export taxes and withholdings.
- Right to export freely.
- Right to dollar-denominated sale and purchase agreements.<sup>147</sup>

221. It is worth underscoring that El Paso does not claim that the devaluation per se constitutes a violation of the BIT. In fact, El Paso's core claim, really consists in claiming the violation of its right to earn a reasonable return on its investments, as appears, for example, from its own conclusion of the analysis of the measures adopted in the Electricity Sector which is found in its Memorial and where it is stated that:

“El Paso's most fundamental right with respect to CAPEX and Costanera was the right to operate within an Electricity Regulatory Framework that would permit them to receive capacity payments sufficient to cover their investment costs, and energy prices sufficient to recover their costs of production, while also earning a reasonable return on the investment.”<sup>148</sup>

In the same submission, it is also claimed, more generally, that “El Paso was deprived of the reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of its investment in the Argentine Companies.”<sup>149</sup>

4. Reduction in Value of Capacity Payments;
  5. Additional Alterations of the Electricity Regulatory Framework;
  6. Mandatory Currency Conversion of Power, LPG and Crude Oil Sale Contracts;
  7. GOA's Interference in Generators' Ability to Collect Bills.

The list seems longer but it is only more detailed and refers always to the same four rights invoked in the Request for Arbitration.

<sup>147</sup> In the Claimant's Memorial, the oil and gas dispute is described as a violation of the Hydrocarbon Regulatory Framework, implying a violation of the three same rights as listed in the Request for Arbitration:

1. Violation of the Right to Export Hydrocarbons Free of Export Withholdings;
2. Imposition of Restrictions on Exports;
3. The Right to Dollar-denominated Purchase and Sale Agreements Violated by Pesification.

222. El Paso recognises that the BIT does not protect foreign investors and their investments against devaluation. The Tribunal takes note of this position and takes this opportunity to point out that devaluation pertains to the monetary and fiscal sovereignty of the State and to indicate its agreement with the dictum of the tribunal in Continental v. Argentina relating to the question of devaluation:

“The fixing of an exchange rate and deciding the mechanism by which the national currency may be exchanged for foreign currency and its conditions, including the possibility of maintaining accounts and deposits denominated in a foreign currency within the country, pertain to the monetary sovereignty of each State. These policies ... do not render the State liable for the burden or losses that may be suffered by those affected, provided there is no discrimination or unfairness in their application.”<sup>150</sup>

223. It should also be mentioned here that throughout its submissions, El Paso has complained about measures adopted after the sale of its investments.<sup>151</sup> The Tribunal must however note that these measures cannot – from a logical point of view alone – be taken into account to evaluate whether the sale of El Paso’s shares was or was not entirely forced by Argentina’s measures, or whether these measures played, among other factors, a significant role in the sale.

224. Before it begins to evaluate the facts and contentions of the Parties in this case, in order to ascertain whether or not they show violations of the international standards of protection of foreign investments, the Tribunal wishes to insist on the specificity of the facts of each case and considers it appropriate to identify the legal framework within which the factual aspects can and must be examined. As stated in Continental,

“each case addressing Argentina’s crisis, with its different parties, claims and legal texts, raises its own special issues and particular considerations. Guided by the issues in the present case, the Tribunal

<sup>150</sup> Continental Casualty Company v. Argentine Republic [hereinafter Continental], (ICSID Case No. ARB/03/9), Award of 5 September 2008, § 278. This case arose after the Parties had made their submissions, and for this reason, the Tribunal does not rely on it for its decision, but it considers it interesting to point to some convergences of the reasoning in that case with the one adopted by this Tribunal.

<sup>151</sup> Memorial, § 327: “Furthermore, the situation in the electricity market, particularly for power generators, has deteriorated progressively and significantly since El Paso sold its investments in CAPSA/CAPEX in June 2003 and in COSTANERA in October 2003.”

has made its own analysis and has arrived at its own conclusions based upon the materials presented by the Parties in these proceedings.”<sup>152</sup>

Once ascertained, the facts as they result from the record have to be analysed taking due account of the applicable rules. It is therefore of utmost importance to try to identify the content and scope of the different standards of protection benefitting foreign investors under the BIT.

A. GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON THE DIFFERENT STANDARDS OF PROTECTION

225. The standards of protection applicable to foreign investments, in addition to the protection against expropriation provided for in Article IV (1), are stated in Article II(2)(a) and (b).

Article IV (1) of the BIT prescribes:

“Investments shall not be expropriated or nationalized either directly or indirectly through measures tantamount to expropriation or nationalization (“expropriation”) except for a public purpose; in a non-discriminatory manner; upon payment of prompt, adequate and effective compensation; and in accordance with due process of law and the general principles of treatment provided for in Article II(2).”

Article II(2)(a) and (b) provides that:

“(a) Investment shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment, shall enjoy full protection and security and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than that required by international law.

(b) Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, or disposal of investments. For the purposes of dispute resolution under Articles VII and VIII, a measure may be arbitrary or discriminatory, notwithstanding the opportunity to review such measure in the courts or administrative tribunals of a Party.”

226. ICSID case-law has developed in a way that generates some confusion and overlap between these different standards of protection found in most BITs. In view of this situation, which is not conducive to security of the legal framework and predictability of its application to foreign investments, the Tribunal will endeavour to clarify as much as possible the scope of the different standards of protection, for it is convinced that they should not be used indifferently one for the other. Before doing so, it thinks it appropriate to give a few examples of the prevailing confusion which, in its view, justifies its approach.

227. There is not always a clear distinction between indirect expropriation and violation of legitimate expectations, as can be seen from an excerpt of the Claimant's Memorial stating that "measures that are inconsistent with an investor's legitimate expectations constitute an expropriation"<sup>153</sup> or of the Claimant's Reply, where it is asserted that

"[s]everal other ICSID cases have held that an indirect expropriation occurs when the State repudiates fundamental commitments in frustration of an investor's legitimate expectations deriving from the rights granted in contracts, law or decrees (which, under the BIT, clearly are "investments" protected against any form of expropriation)."<sup>154</sup>

According to this Tribunal, the violation of a legitimate expectation should rather be protected by the fair and equitable treatment standard.

228. Sometimes, there is also no distinction between the fair and equitable treatment (FET) and the full protection and security (FPS) standards. This has been the position adopted by the tribunal in Azurix:

"The Tribunal is persuaded of the interrelationship of fair and equitable treatment and the obligation to afford the investor full protection and security ... when the terms 'protection and security' are qualified by 'full' and no other adjective or explanation, they extend, in their ordinary meaning, the content of this standard beyond physical security. To conclude, the Tribunal, having held that the Respondent failed to provide fair and equitable treatment to the investment, finds that the Respondent also breached the standard of full protection and security under the BIT.”<sup>155</sup>

Another example of this confusion can be found in the so-called VAT arbitration, Occidental Exploration and Production Company v. Ecuador, where the tribunal declared that “treatment that is not fair and equitable automatically entails an absence of full protection and security of the investment.”<sup>156</sup> The Claimant in our case takes the same position and assimilates FET and FPS, alleging that the FPS has been breached because Argentina has adopted laws interfering with the Claimant’s investment:

“The GOA not only failed to protect the investment of El Paso, but affirmatively disregarded the terms of the Electricity Regulatory Framework, the Hydrocarbons Regulatory Framework and the Concessions, and destroyed the very protections and security provided by law. In Law N° 25,561 and its progeny, the GOA nullified essential vested rights it offered and promoted to investors. Thus, the GOA failed to provide full security and protection to El Paso’s investments.”<sup>157</sup>

229. Sometimes there is no distinction between several standards of treatment, which are all amalgamated, as was done by the tribunal in Noble Ventures, stating that:

“Considering the place of the fair and equitable treatment standard at the very beginning of Art.II(2), one can consider this to be a more general standard which finds its specific application in inter alia the duty to provide full protection and security, the prohibition of arbitrary and discriminatory measures and the obligation to observe contractual obligations towards the investor.”<sup>158</sup>

230. The distinction seems also often difficult between arbitrary or discriminatory treatment and violation of the FET. It must of course be emphasised that it is quite non-controversial that an arbitrary or discriminatory treatment is necessarily a violation of the FET as well, as mentioned for example in CMS:

<sup>158</sup> Noble Ventures, Inc. v. Romania [hereinafter Noble Ventures], (ICSID Case No. ARB/01/11), Award of 12 October 2005, § 182.

“The standard of protection against arbitrariness and discrimination is related to that of fair and equitable treatment. Any measure that might involve arbitrariness or discrimination is in itself contrary to fair and equitable treatment.”<sup>159</sup>

This is of course true, but the reverse might not necessarily be, as violations of the fair and equitable treatment standard could result from types of situations other than arbitrariness or discrimination. The difference should be sufficient to prevent an assimilation of the two categories of violations. It is, in fact, the Tribunal’s view that FET is designed to guarantee that, in situations where the other more precise standards are not violated, but where there is an unreasonable interference bringing about an unjust result regarding an investor’s expectations, that investor can claim a violation of the FET and obtain reparation therefore.

231. In conclusion, it seems to the Tribunal that, in order not to engage in redundant analyses, interferences with a foreign investment should be analysed successively with reference to the different standards of protection in a sequential order, proceeding from expropriation to violation of the FPS. In other words, the Tribunal will examine first whether there is an indirect expropriation, second whether there is arbitrary or discriminatory treatment, third whether there is a violation of the FET, and fourth whether there is a breach of the FPS.

B. ARTICLE IV: INDIRECT EXPROPRIATION

232. The Tribunal will first address the complaints of El Paso concerning acts of the GOA, other than tax measures, which the Claimant considers as expropriatory. It will then deal with the tax measures complained of, which only enter into the Tribunal’s jurisdiction if they amount to expropriation. Before scrutinising the facts, the Tribunal will set the applicable analytical framework.

1. Indirect Expropriation in General

(i) The Tribunal's Legal Analysis of the Applicable Principles

233. Much has been said about the concept of indirect expropriation in the written and oral submissions of the Parties in this case, as well as in contemporary legal writings. The Tribunal will endeavour to clarify that concept and present first its analysis in a nutshell, before developing it in more detail. In summary, it is the Tribunal's view that:

1. Some general regulations can amount to indirect expropriation

a. As a matter of principle, general regulations do not amount to indirect expropriation.

b. By exception, unreasonable general regulations can amount to indirect expropriation.

2. A necessary condition for expropriation is the neutralisation of the use of the investment

a. This means that at least one of the essential components of the property rights must have disappeared.

b. This means also, a contrario, that a mere loss in value of the investment, even an important one, is not an indirect expropriation.<sup>160</sup>

(a) Some General Regulations Can Amount to Indirect Expropriation

234. No absolute position can be taken in such delicate matters, where contradictory interests have to be reconciled. In this sense, the Tribunal subscribes to the decisions which have refused to hold that a general regulation issued by a State and interfering with the rights of foreign investors can never be considered expropriatory because it should be analysed as an exercise of the State's sovereign power or of its police powers. This Tribunal is, for example, in agreement with the following statement made in Tecmed:

“ ... we find no principle stating that regulatory administrative actions are per se excluded from the scope of the Agreement, even if they are beneficial to society as a whole – such as environmental protection – particularly if the negative economic impact of such actions on the financial position of the investor is sufficient to neutralize in full the value, or economic or commercial use of its investment without receiving any compensation whatsoever.”<sup>161</sup>

235. By the same token, the Tribunal shares the view expressed by the tribunal in Pope & Talbot, when it declares that “... a blanket exception for regulatory measures would create a gaping loophole in international protections against expropriation.”<sup>162</sup> The same idea was expressed in Saluka v. The Czech Republic, where the tribunal listed the exceptions to the principle that general regulations do not as a rule amount to expropriation:

“These exceptions do not, in any way, weaken the principle that certain takings or deprivations are non-compensable. They merely remind the legislator, or, indeed, the adjudicator, that the so-called ‘police power exception’ is not absolute.”<sup>163</sup>

236. Therefore, in order to differentiate between situations where a general regulation can be considered tantamount to expropriation and situations where it cannot, the Tribunal has to start from the principle and then look at the exceptions. It considers that the most appropriate approach is to admit that, as a matter of principle, a general regulation – whose object is not the taking of property as in the case of direct expropriation – does not amount to an indirect expropriation (a). This evident proposition finds support in State practice, doctrine and arbitral case-law. Of course, the general principle suffers exceptions and has to be set aside in some circumstances on account of the content of the regulations (b).

1. As a Matter of Principle, General Regulations Do Not Amount to Indirect Expropriation

237. The above principle is accepted both by writers and arbitral case-law.

238. Thus, Professor Ian Brownlie has stated that:

“State measures, prima facie a lawful exercise of powers of government, may affect foreign interests considerably without amounting to expropriation. Thus foreign assets and their use may be subjected to taxation, trade restrictions involving licenses and quotas, or measures of devaluation. While special facts may alter cases, in principle such measures are not unlawful and do not constitute expropriation.”<sup>164</sup>

The same principle is clearly stated in the Third Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of United States 1987,<sup>165</sup> which is often quoted as a formula of reference and which many consider as reflecting customary international law on this point.<sup>166</sup>

“A state is not responsible for loss of property or for other economic disadvantage resulting from bona fide general taxation, regulation, forfeiture for crime, or other action of the kind that is commonly accepted as within the police power of states, if it is not discriminatory.”

239. Several arbitral tribunals have also restated this fundamental principle. In Feldman v. Mexico, the ICSID arbitral tribunal said that:

“Governments must be free to act in the broader public interest through protection of the environment, new or modified tax regimes, the granting or withdrawal of government subsidies, reductions or increases in tariff levels, imposition of zoning restrictions and the like. Reasonable governmental regulation of this type cannot be achieved if any business that is adversely affected may seek compensation, and it is safe to say that customary international law recognizes this.”

---

<sup>164</sup> Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, supra note 293, p. 532. This principle has not been only considered in international legal scholars' opinions but it has also been included in several international instruments. See, for example, Additional Protocol to the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 4 November 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 262, section 1; Harvard Draft Convention on the International Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens, in L.B. Sohn / R. R. Baxter, “Responsibility of States for Injuries to the Economic Interests of Aliens”, 55 Am. J. Int'l L. 545 (1961), at 554.

...

“... not all government regulatory activity that makes it difficult or impossible for an investor to carry out a particular business, change in the law or change in the application of existing laws that makes it uneconomical to continue a particular business, is an expropriation ... Governments, in their exercise of regulatory power, frequently change their laws and regulations in response to changing economic circumstances or changing political, economic or social considerations ... those changes may well make their activities less profitable or even uneconomic to continue.”<sup>167</sup>

A similar general statement is found in Tecmed:

“The principle that the State’s exercise of its sovereign powers within the framework of its police power may cause economic damage to those subject to its powers as administrator without entitling them to any compensation whatsoever is indisputable.”<sup>168</sup>

But the clearest and strongest assertion of the principle can be found in the Saluka award, an UNCITRAL investment arbitration under a BIT:

“It is now established in international law that States are not liable to pay compensation to a foreign investor when, in the normal exercise of their regulatory powers, they adopt in a non-discriminatory manner bona fide regulations that are aimed at the general welfare.”<sup>169</sup>

240. In sum, a general regulation is a lawful act rather than an expropriation if it is non-discriminatory, made for a public purpose and taken in conformity with due process. In other words, in principle, general non-discriminatory regulatory measures, adopted in accordance with the rules of good faith and due process, do not entail a duty of compensation.

2. By Exception, Unreasonable General Regulations Can Amount to Indirect Expropriation

241. If general regulations are unreasonable, i.e. arbitrary, discriminatory, disproportionate or otherwise unfair, they can, however, be considered as amounting to indirect expropriation if they result in a neutralisation of the foreign investor's property rights. The need for reasonableness and proportionality of State measures interfering with private property has been stressed by the tribunal in LG&E:

“With respect to the power of the State to adopt its policies, it can generally be said that the State has the right to adopt measures having a social or general welfare purpose. In such a case, the measure must be accepted without any imposition of liability, except in cases where the State's action is obviously disproportionate to the need being addressed.”<sup>170</sup>

242. The Claimant itself cites the Harvard Draft Convention on the International Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens<sup>171</sup> which provides that a taking of property may include any

“unreasonable interference with the use, enjoyment or disposal of property as to justify an inference that the owner thereof will not be able to use, enjoy, or dispose of the property within a reasonable period of time after the inception of such interference.”<sup>172</sup>

In the Claimant's Memorial, indirect expropriation is precisely said to result from “unreasonable interference that significantly deprives an owner of the control, use, or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefits of property, rights or interests.”<sup>173</sup>

243. The Tribunal will now review some examples where such general regulations have been considered as possible expropriations. A first example is that of an intentionally discriminatory regulation or an objectively discriminatory regulation. Although it did not find that in the case under review there had been an indirect expropriation, the tribunal in the Methanex case clearly distinguished discriminatory regulations from non-discriminatory ones:

“In the Tribunal’s view, Methanex is correct that an intentionally discriminatory regulation against a foreign investor fulfils a key requirement for establishing expropriation. But as a matter of general international law, a non-discriminatory regulation for a public purpose, which is enacted in accordance with due process and, which affects, inter alia, a foreign investor or investment is not deemed expropriatory and compensable unless specific commitments had been given by the regulating government to the then putative foreign investor contemplating investment that the government would refrain from such regulation.”<sup>174</sup>

Another example would be a disproportionate regulation, meaning a regulation in which the interference with the private rights of the investors is disproportionate to the public interest. In other words, proportionality has to exist between the public purpose fostered by the regulation and the interference with the investors’ property rights, as recognised in Tecmed:

“After establishing that regulatory actions and measures will not be initially excluded from the definition of expropriatory acts, in addition to the negative financial impact of such actions or measures, the Arbitral Tribunal will consider, in order to determine if they are to be characterized as expropriatory, whether such actions or measures are proportional to the public interest presumably protected thereby and to the protection legally granted to investments, taking into account that the significance of such impact has a key role upon deciding the proportionality ... There must be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the charge or weight imposed to the foreign investor and the aim sought to be realized by any expropriatory measure.”<sup>175</sup>

In other words, discriminatory or disproportionate general regulations have the potential to be considered as expropriatory if there is a sufficient interference with the investor’s rights, as will be explained now.

2. A Necessary Condition for Expropriation: The Neutralisation of the use of the Investment

---

244. Etymologically, “ex-propropriation” refers to the taking of property or property rights. In S.D. Myers v. Canada, a clear distinction was drawn between deprivation amounting to expropriation and interference with property by regulations not amounting to expropriation:

“Expropriations tend to involve the deprivation of ownership rights; regulations a lesser interference. The distinction between expropriation and regulation screens out most potential cases of complaints concerning economic intervention by a state and reduces the risk that governments will be subject to claims as they go about their business of managing public affairs.”<sup>176</sup>

(i) At Least One of the Essential Components of the Property Rights Must Have Disappeared

245. The Tribunal considers that at least one of the essential components of the property rights must have disappeared for an expropriation to have occurred. It emphasises that the overwhelming majority of investment arbitration cases stand for the proposition that an expropriation usually implies a “removal of the ability of an owner to make use of its economic rights.”<sup>177</sup> It is generally accepted that the decisive element in an indirect expropriation is the “loss of control” of a foreign investment, in the absence of any physical taking.

246. In the case of Pope & Talbot, Canada stated that “mere interference is not expropriatory; rather, a significant degree of deprivation of fundamental rights of ownership is required”,<sup>178</sup> and the tribunal accepted this approach when it said that “the test is whether that interference is sufficiently restrictive to support a conclusion that the property has been ‘taken’ from the owner.”<sup>179</sup> In the case of Tecmed, the same approach was adopted, the tribunal holding that there is an indirect expropriation when “the economic value of the use, enjoyment or disposition of the assets or rights affected by the administrative action or decision have been neutralized or destroyed.”<sup>180</sup>

247. This approach has also been adopted in several of the Argentinian cases resulting from the crisis which brought about the present litigation. In CMS, the tribunal first mentioned the general criterion to be applied in order to ascertain whether there has been an expropriation:

“The essential question is therefore to establish whether the enjoyment of the property has been effectively neutralized. The standard that a number of tribunals have applied in recent cases where indirect expropriation has been contended is that of substantial deprivation.”<sup>181</sup>

248. Then, applying this test to the case at hand, the tribunal considered that the measures adopted by the State did not deprive the investor of control over its investment and therefore concluded that there was no expropriation. In Enron<sup>182</sup> as well as in Sempra,<sup>183</sup> the tribunals held that for expropriation to exist there must be a substantial deprivation and that such a deprivation occurs when the investor is forced to lose control over the investment. If the measures do not interfere with the control of the property, there can be no expropriation. This has been confirmed more recently by the award in another Argentinian case, Continental, where an indirect expropriation was defined as amounting to

“ ... limitations and hampering with property, short of outright suppression or deprivation, interfering with one or more key features, such as management, enjoyment, transferability, which are considered as tantamount to expropriation, because of their substantial impact on the effective right of property.”<sup>184</sup>

(ii) A Mere Loss in Value of the Investment, even though Important, Is Not an Indirect Expropriation

249. In the Tribunal’s view, a mere loss in value of the investment, even if important, is not an indirect expropriation. This was also stated, for example, in

the Waste Management case where the tribunal explicitly pointed out that “the loss of benefits or expectations is not a sufficient criterion for an expropriation, even if it is a necessary one.”<sup>185</sup> The Tribunal is, of course, aware of some cases or general dicta that might seem to support the idea that a substantial deprivation of the value of an investment can also be viewed as an expropriation. But a careful scrutiny of those cases, some of which were cited by the Claimant, does not support such a conclusion, as will be shown now.

250. In Middle East Cement v. Egypt, relied on by the Claimant,<sup>186</sup> an ICSID tribunal found that Egypt had violated the provision on expropriation of the Egypt-Greece BIT. In that case, the Egyptian General Authority for Investment and Free Zones had granted a 10-year license to a Greek bulk cement importer for the importation and storage of cement. Some years later, Egypt issued a decree prohibiting the importation of certain types of cement. This decree, which on its face did not purport to take the investor’s property or affect the investor’s import license, nevertheless paralysed the investor’s operations. In the ensuing arbitration proceedings, the foreign investor argued that, although the license technically remained in effect after the decree, the latter destroyed the economic benefit of the investment. The tribunal concluded that there was an expropriation, although the decree remained in force for only four months, with the following explanation:

“As also Respondent concedes that, at least for a period of 4 months, Claimant was deprived, by the Decree, of rights it had been granted under the License, there is no dispute between the Parties, that in principle, a taking did take place. When measures are taken by a State the effect of which is to deprive the investor of the use and benefit of its investment even though it may retain nominal ownership of the respective rights being the investment, the measures are often referred to as ‘creeping’ or as ‘indirect’ expropriation, or, as in the BIT, as measures the effect of which is tantamount to expropriation. As a matter of fact, the investor is deprived by such measures of parts of the value of its investment.”<sup>187</sup>

The Tribunal wishes to point to the fact that, if indeed a reference is made to the deprivation of the benefit of the investment, the formula used by the tribunal in Middle East Cement refers more precisely to the deprivation of “the use and benefit.” The loss of benefit is a result of the impossibility to use the investment – equivalent to a loss of control over the investment – and not an expropriation per se.

251. In Goetz and Others v. Republic of Burundi, another case invoked by the Claimant,<sup>188</sup> the tribunal held:

“Since ... the revocation of the Minister for Industry and Commerce of the free zone certificate forced them to halt all activities ... , which deprived their investments of all utility and deprived the claimant investors of the benefit which they could have expected from their investments, the disputed decision can be regarded as a ‘measure having similar effect’ to a measure depriving of or restricting property within the meaning of Article 4 of the Investment Treaty.”<sup>189</sup>

In this case also, there is a reference to the deprivation of the expected benefit, but this was a result of the cancellation by the State of a free-zone certificate which prevented the investor from continuing any economic activity, which is indeed a situation where it can be said that the investor was expropriated as it completely lost the use of its property.

252. Metalclad is often mentioned, and was cited by the Claimant,<sup>190</sup> in support of the proposition that a mere loss in value of an investment is an expropriation. It is true that the tribunal in this case used a very general formulation, which could be misconstrued if it were truncated:

“Thus, expropriation under NAFTA includes not only open, deliberate and acknowledged takings of property, such as outright seizure or formal or obligatory transfer of title in favour of the host State, but also covert or incidental interference with the use of property which has the effect of depriving the owner, in whole or in significant part, of the use or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of property even if not necessarily to the obvious benefit of the host State.”<sup>191</sup>

Two remarks are worth making here. First, as in the former examples, the loss of benefits is a result of a deprivation of the use of the investment. Second, considering the facts and not the mere broad language, it is evident that the tribunal in Metalclad did not hold that there was an expropriation because the benefits of the investor were not as expected, but decided that there was an expropriation of the investment because, after the investor was granted the federal permit to exploit the landfill, and given assurances that it would receive the municipal permit to the same effect, the latter was not granted, rendering the whole project impossible to pursue: it was because there was a complete neutralisation of the investment project that an expropriation was found.

253. Nor does another case cited by the Claimant, in the Tribunal’s view, support the idea that a loss in value is an expropriation. In Tecmed,<sup>192</sup> the claims were related to an investment in land, buildings and other assets relating to a controlled landfill operation with hazardous industrial waste. A resolution cancelling the authorisation to run the waste landfill operation was adopted, among other reasons, because of the strong opposition of the local population. The tribunal had to study the resolution cancelling the permit. In order to decide on the existence of an indirect expropriation, the tribunal made the following analysis:

“To establish whether the Resolution is a measure equivalent to an expropriation under the terms of section 5(1) of the Agreement, it must be first determined if the Claimant, due to the Resolution, was radically deprived of the economical use and enjoyment of its investments, as if the rights related thereto – such as the income or benefits related to the Landfill or to its exploitation – had ceased to exist. In other words, if due to the actions of the Respondent, the assets involved have lost their value or economic use for their holder and the extent of the loss. This determination is important because it is one of the main elements to distinguish, from the point of view of an international tribunal, between a regulatory measure, which is an ordinary expression of the exercise of the state's police power that entails a decrease in assets or rights, and a de facto expropriation that deprives those assets and rights of any real substance.”<sup>193</sup>

Here again, it was not just a loss of benefits that was considered to be expropriatory; it was the cancellation of the permit which neutralised the whole investment, as no other activity could be performed on the landfill. This was underscored by the tribunal, according to which there is an indirect expropriation when “the economic value of the use, enjoyment or disposition of the assets or rights affected by the administrative action or decision have been neutralized or destroyed.”<sup>194</sup>

254. Even in Consortium R.F.C.C. v. Morocco, also cited sometimes to support the idea that loss of value is sufficient to find an indirect expropriation, careful reading shows that in fact the tribunal based its reasoning on the necessity of a neutralisation of property rights. The tribunal started by referring to the fact that for an expropriation to exist, the measures taken by the State must have

“ ... [s]ubstantial effects of a definite intensity that decrease and/or make disappear the benefits that can be legitimately expected from the exploitation of the rights that were the object of the measure to such an extent that they render the possession of those rights useless.”<sup>195</sup>

In the preceding paragraph, the tribunal had been quite clear that this disappearance of benefits had to be the result of a loss of control or access to the property rather than of a change in the assets' value:

“The expropriation of an asset or a right is characterised by the disappearance, for the expropriated person, if not of the title to property at least of the enjoyment of the said property or of the access to it.”<sup>196</sup>

255. Finally, it is worth mentioning that in all the Argentinian cases decided so far, the loss in value of the investment was not considered a sufficient basis for a finding of expropriation, even where the loss was quite significant and comparable to the losses claimed in the present case by El Paso. In LG&E, for example, although according to the claimant the value of LG&E's holdings in the licenses had been reduced by more than 90% as a result of Respondent's abrogation of the principal guarantees of the tariff system, the tribunal did not find an expropriation, as the measures themselves did not interfere "with the investment's ability to carry on its business,"<sup>197</sup> even though the profits were drastically diminished. Regulations that reduce the profitability of an investment but do not shut it down completely and leave the investor in control will generally not qualify as indirect expropriations even though they might give rise to liability for violation of other standards of treatment, such as national treatment or fair and equitable treatment.
256. In conclusion, the Tribunal, consistently with mainstream case-law, finds that for an expropriation to exist, the investor should be substantially deprived not only of the benefits, but also of the use of his investment. A mere loss of value, which is not the result of an interference with the control or use of the investment, is not an indirect expropriation.

(iii) The Parties' Positions on the Existence of an Expropriation

257. According to the Claimant, "[t]he Argentine Republic expropriated Claimant's investments directly, indirectly or by measures tantamount to expropriation."<sup>198</sup> The list of the expropriatory acts presented by the Claimant is the following: abrogation and repudiation of contractual rights of the Argentinian companies; violation of the right to collect payments as promised, which constitutes a taking of CAPEX's and Costanera's rights, legitimate expectations and revenues without compensation; pesification of capacity payments at an artificial exchange rate, which amounts to an expropriation of legal rights, legal expectations and significant revenues from CAPEX and Costanera; fundamental alteration of the price-setting mechanism for electrical generators, which resulted in the expropriation of the legal rights, legitimate expectations and specific revenues of CAPEX and Costanera; pesification of VCPs at an artificial exchange rate which constitutes a taking of El Paso's rights, legitimate expectations and revenues; violation of the right to freely dispose of production, which interfered in the business decisions and management of CAPSA and CAPEX; and violation of the right freely to dispose of production, which constituted a direct taking of CAPSA's and CAPEX's revenues.<sup>199</sup>

258. More generally, it is the Claimant's contention that it was expropriated because, due to all the adverse measures taken against the Argentinian companies in which it had invested, it was "forced" to sell its shares in those companies at a considerable loss. In its Reply, the Claimant states that expropriation results from measures

" ... destroying 100% of the equity value of SERVICIOS, 83% of the equity value of CAPSA/CAPEX, and 91% of the equity value of COSTANERA and compelling El Paso to sell its interests in the Argentine Companies for less than 15% of what would have been their value in the absence of the measures."<sup>200</sup>

259. According to Argentina, none of the rights invoked by El Paso are rights protected under the BIT. The measures adopted in the context of the crisis did not amount to expropriation. Argentina argues that: the pesification of the whole economy was not an expropriation and benefited the Argentinian companies; the restrictions on oil and gas exports were not expropriations; nor were the measures adopted to make electric power generation consistent with the new context. Neither on account of their effect nor in view of their nature can these measures be considered expropriatory.

260. First, it is Argentina's position that these measures did not interfere substantially with rights possessed by the Claimant. According to the Respondent:

"In effect, the pesification of the whole economy and the measures adopted in connection with the oil and electric power generation industries did not substantially deprive the Claimant from the use and profits of its investment [paraphrasing the tribunal in the Otis Elevator case]. On the contrary, the Argentine Companies continued and continue operating and obtaining profits despite the crisis."<sup>201</sup>

261. Second, the Respondent contends that the measures challenged by El Paso were non-discriminatory regulatory decisions taken in good faith and included in the police power of the State. Therefore, no compensation would be due.

262. Third, Argentina affirms that, contrary to what the Claimant pretends, the sale of El Paso was not forced by Argentina but provoked by the Claimant's own problems. These problems are addressed both in the Counter-Memorial<sup>202</sup> and the Rejoinder,<sup>203</sup> and are summarised in the former in the following way:

"Unlike El Paso's allegation, the Argentine crisis was not the cause why it decided to sell its assets in Argentina but this was the global situation of the company itself.

The energy crisis in California, the link with Enron's policies, the accusations of questionable accounting and business practices, an unfavourable court decision related to illegal practices, the strong fall in the value of its shares, the accumulation of a major debt, liquidity issues, the lack of market confidence, the resignation (and even suicide) of top executives, among others, were the events that led to the serious crisis in El Paso."<sup>204</sup>

263. The analysis of all these elements brings the Respondent to the conclusion that there is no causal link between the measures adopted by Argentina to face the crisis and the sale of El Paso's shares in the Argentinian companies:

“The only cause of the damages, the compensation for which is claimed in this arbitration, is El Paso’s global situation that forced it to sell its interests around the world, including those located in Argentina. The fact that Argentina was in the midst of a crisis had a negative impact on the price collected by El Paso on account of the sale of its assets in Argentina, but it was not what determined that the transaction had to be carried out.”<sup>205</sup>

264. In other words, the sale was not due to Argentina’s measures but to a reasoned decision taken by El Paso, in light of its financial difficulties all over the world, to focus on its traditional business, natural gas transportation and production.<sup>206</sup>

(iv) The Tribunal’s Analysis of the Alleged Expropriation of El Paso’s Property Rights

265. Although the Claimant has complained about direct expropriation, it can be declared by the Tribunal from the outset, without extensive reasoning, that no such expropriation occurred. It is enough here to recall the definition given to direct expropriation by Professor Sacerdoti: “the coercive appropriation by the State of private property, usually by means of individual administrative measures.”<sup>207</sup> In direct expropriation, there is a formal transfer of the title of ownership from the foreign investor to the State engaged in the expropriation or to a national company of that State, and it has never been asserted that the shares of El Paso in the Argentinian companies have been transferred by the State to itself or to another public or private company.
266. Thus the only question which remains is whether there has been an indirect expropriation, which concept will be considered as including “measures tantamount to expropriation.”<sup>208</sup>

267. According to the Claimant,

“ ... the GOA undertook a policy that ... effectively expropriated CAPEX’s and COSTANERA’s contractual right to receive Dollar-denominated prices for their sale of electricity and liquid hydrocarbons ... The GOA measures also expropriated SERVICIOS’ rights to receive Dollar-denominated payments under the Gas Processing Agreement.”<sup>209</sup>

The Claimant reiterated that position later in its Memorial, when stating that “the GOA’s measures deprived CAPSA, CAPEX and Costanera of the exercise of their vested legal and contractual rights, which were abrogated and repudiated by the GOA.”<sup>210</sup> The Tribunal does not need to decide if this could be an expropriation, as it has no jurisdiction over the Argentinian companies and can only rule on an expropriation of the foreign investor’s rights.

268. The same reasoning must apply to the claim that sums owed to CAPEX and CAPSA were in fact transformed into contributions to the Stabilization Fund, and subsequently into stock of a new power plant to be financed with the proceeds to this Fund, which plant will be operated by the Government. El Paso considers this as “a forceful novation of the receivables owed by CAMMESA to the generators, which amounts to a confiscatory action that interferes with the ability of the generators to operate their own business.”<sup>211</sup> These are rights belonging to the Argentinian companies, over which the Tribunal has no jurisdiction, and not to El Paso. In addition, the Tribunal is inclined to consider that a change in the form of a credit cannot amount to a confiscation.

269. The Tribunal wishes to emphasise next that, if this point had to be decided, it would certainly be difficult to find an expropriation of the rights of the Argentinian companies. In effect, the impugned measures adopted in connection with the oil and electric power generation industries did not substantially deprive the Claimant of the use of and profits from its investment.

On the contrary, the Argentinian companies continue operating and earning profits despite the crisis. For example, CAPSA had income in the amount of over ARS 111 million in 2003.<sup>212</sup> CAPSA, CAPEX, Costanera and Gasoducto del Pacífico are still operating on the Argentine market and their survival is not in danger. SERVICIOS was absorbed by CAPEX, which is still profitable in the LPG processing business. According to the Respondent's Rejoinder, CAPSA's Financial Statements show that "[i]ncome in 2006 is more than 10 time higher [in US$] than the company's income in 1997, when El Paso acquired interests in CAPSA."<sup>213</sup>

(b) Analysis of the Sale of El Paso's Shares in the Argentinian Companies as an Alleged Expropriation

270. The Tribunal must ascertain a last point, which is whether the sale was or was not the automatic consequence, i.e. the only and unavoidable consequence, of the measures taken by the GOA, so as to be equivalent to an outright expropriation, as contended by the Claimant in its Memorial:

"These measures amount to an expropriation of El Paso's investment, violate commitments to Claimant and constitute unfair and inequitable treatment in violation of the BIT, international law and Argentina law. Due to these measures, El Paso was forced to sell its investments in the Argentina Companies at prices that represented less than 10% of El Paso's investment."<sup>214</sup>

In its Reply, the Claimant reverts to this idea under the title "Argentina Expropriated Claimant's Investment:"

"In its Memorial, Claimant demonstrated the various ways in which Argentina's measures violated the BIT's prohibition against expropriating without compensation, whether directly or indirectly by measures tantamount to expropriation. These include: ... (iii) taking measures ... compelling El Paso to sell its interests in the Argentine

Companies for less than 15% of what would have been their value in the absence of the measures.”<sup>215</sup>

271. The Respondent, on the contrary, insists that causes other than the Argentinian measures explain the sale of the shares of El Paso:

“The cause for El Paso’s losses is not related in any way to the measures but to the time in which it was forced (due to its own issues) to sell its assets in Argentina. Had it not faced the serious issues that it underwent globally, El Paso would have profited from the gradual improvement in Argentina’s conditions, by the increase in oil and gas prices around the world, and by the normalisation of the Argentine economy.”<sup>216</sup>

272. The Tribunal has thus to examine the question of whether the sale was “freely” entered into or whether it was effectively “compulsory,” intrinsically linked to Argentina’s measures, in such a way that it was the only possible consequence of these measures. Only if the sale was the only possible consequence of the Argentinian measures could one consider that these measures were expropriatory as they entailed a loss of control directly attributable to Argentina. In order to answer the question raised by the contradictory views of the Parties on that issue, the Tribunal will scrutinise the context of the sale and look into contemporary or subsequent public statements emanating from El Paso. The Tribunal has closely examined the different documents contemporaneous with the sale or subsequent to it in order to ascertain the causes of the sale, among others the reports to the United States Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), usually considered as one of the main sources of information for the market relating to companies.

273. A first point to be made is that the measures adopted after the sale of El Paso’s shares, of which the Claimant repeatedly complains, cannot be considered as a cause of such sale, being subsequent to it. Therefore, the Tribunal will not take into account, for ascertaining the causes of the sale, the numerous measures adopted after the sale complained of by El Paso, among which a few can be mentioned: Resolution SE N° 826/2004, which invited the power generators to a mandatory conversion of their unpaid receivables for energy sales and future gross margins into either (i) equity in two new power plants or (ii) a Government monetary commitment that would become payable in 10-year instalments from the revenues of the two new power plants once they become operational; Law N° 26,095, dated 26 April 2006, which authorises the Executive Branch to apply “charges” to electricity and gas distribution tariffs to finance “new” investments in the energy sector; Law No. 26,217, published on 16 January 2007, which extended the export taxes through 2012;<sup>217</sup> various measures imposed on the electricity sector after 2003; and export withholdings imposed and extended on various dates from 2004-2007.

274. It is worth noting that in its 2005 Annual Report filed with the SEC, no mention was made by the Claimant itself either of the deterioration in the economic conditions of Argentina nor of any adverse regulatory changes in Argentina to explain the restructuring of El Paso and the sale of the shares in the Argentinian companies.<sup>218</sup> In its 2004 Report,<sup>219</sup> the focus was also on general problems, with no specific mention of any adverse measures taken by the GOA.
275. It is true that in the 2002 and 2003 Reports to SEC, El Paso mentioned the economic situation of Argentina, but only the Argentinian economic crisis, more specifically “the deteriorating economic conditions” in the country, with no specific reference made to measures adopted by the Government, in contrast to what was done for other countries, and more specifically for its power generators in Australia, where the Claimant explained its divestiture by “regulatory difficulties.” In the same 2003 Report, a world-wide change in strategy of El Paso was announced.

276. 277. It is not reasonable to assume that, with such an overall picture of divestment, the decision to sell in Argentina was unrelated to the situation of El Paso in the rest of the world and was solely due to the measures taken by Argentina. In the Tribunal's view, the global situation of El Paso worldwide as well as that of the Argentine economy and the measures taken by Argentina are elements to be taken into account to explain the sale.
278. The Tribunal notes that El Paso did not suffer any interference with its property, as is shown by the fact that it could decide what to do with it and chose to sell its shares. Argentina did not confiscate the Claimant's shareholdings in the Argentinian companies. It is therefore the Tribunal's conclusion that El Paso did not suffer any major interference with its property rights, as is evidenced by the fact that it decided to sell its shares; thus the Tribunal cannot find that there was an indirect expropriation.
279. The fact that no direct automatic causal link is recognised by the Tribunal between Argentina's measures and the sale has important consequences for the evaluation of possible damages owed to El Paso. More precisely, although the sale, in other words the quasi-total loss of El Paso's investment, was not an unavoidable and direct consequence of Argentina's measures, and cannot be the basis of a claim for expropriation, it must still be ascertained whether, if the measures breach another standard of protection of the BIT, compensation should be granted for the contribution of those measures to the loss of value of the shares at the time of the sale, if it is demonstrated that they had a detrimental effect on that value. If some of the impugned measures violating BIT standards made the sale less profitable, the Tribunal considers that the Claimant should receive compensation.

Respondent's Exhibit RA 156.

280. It must be noted, therefore, that it is indeed quite possible to consider, in the Tribunal's view, that the sale of El Paso's investments in Argentina was not an expropriation, as it was not exclusively determined by Argentinian measures, and yet to conclude that those measures were the prevailing cause of the sale and, therefore, if the Tribunal finds this to be a violation of the FET, that the Respondent can be held responsible for damage resulting from this violation.

C. INDIRECT EXPROPRIATION IN RELATION TO ARTICLE XII ON TAX MATTERS

1. The Parties' Positions

281. It is worth noting that at first sight the Claimant's Memorial looks as if El Paso had not included the tax withholdings among the expropriatory acts of Argentina. This is what results from the table of contents, under the heading "The GOA's Expropriatory Acts":

- (i) Abrogation and repudiation of contractual rights
- (ii) Withholdings of hydrocarbon exports
- (iii) Violation of right to collect payments as promised
- (iv) Pesification of capacity payments at an artificial exchange rate
- (v) Fundamental alteration of the price-setting mechanism for electrical generators
- (vi) Pesification of VCPs at an artificial exchange rate
- (vii) Violation of right to dispose freely of production
- (viii) Failure to mitigate impact of Law N° 25,561
- (ix) Restrictions on deductions for losses from Law N° 25,561
- (x) Interference with crude oil sales.

However, the tax measures enacted from 2002 onward are complained of under three of these headings.

282. Firstly, under the heading “Withholdings of hydrocarbon exports,” El Paso is in fact complaining about “Withholdings on hydrocarbon exports,” alleging that violation of the right to export freely hydrocarbons includes the right to export hydrocarbons free of export withholdings. And the Claimant concludes that “Export Withholdings on crude oil constitute (i) a direct taking of export revenues of CAPSA and CAPEX and (ii) an indirect taking from [sic] by artificially depressing domestic crude oil and LPG prices.”<sup>232</sup>
283. Secondly, under the heading “Failure to mitigate impact of Law N° 25,561,” El Paso explains that, with the devaluation of the peso and the inflation deriving therefrom - that reached 118% in 2002 -, the non-recognition of inflation for tax depreciation purposes was unreasonable and confiscatory. As a result, there has been an expropriation: according to the Claimant, the policy of the Government “artificially diluted the amount of depreciation that the CAPEX [sic] and COSTANERA are allowed to claim for tax purposes, thus resulting in confiscatory taxation and a taking of revenues.”<sup>233</sup>
284. Thirdly, under the heading “Restrictions on deductions for losses from Law N° 25,561,” El Paso also complains about tax measures. More specifically it states that “[t]he GOA unreasonably limited the tax deductions of the Argentine Companies in light of the significant losses caused by the devaluation of the Peso.”<sup>234</sup>
285. The two last claims of expropriation are based on the idea that a foreign investor has a right to certain tax deductions. This was asserted by the Claimant when it stated that

“[w]hile it is fair and reasonable for an investor to expect that no inflation adjustment be used in a low inflation environment, it is also reasonable that the same investor can expect that inflation will be recognized for tax depreciation purposes in the context of high inflation such as occurred in 2002.”<sup>235</sup>

286. According to Argentina, the claims regarding tax issues in the BIT are limited to assumptions of expropriation, transfers, or investment agreements. Analysing the question of whether there could be a finding of expropriation, Argentina states first the general principle according to which a State is free to modify its tax regime. Only if excessive taxes with a confiscatory effect equivalent to an expropriation are imposed may international law be deemed to have been violated. Following this general approach, the Respondent argues that

“[t]he creation of export duties on oil and gas within the context of the crisis is a reasonable governmental regulation. The regulations issued in connection with income tax [and those not issued] are also a part of Argentina’s freedom to act in the broader public interest through new or modified tax regimes.”<sup>236</sup>

Moreover, in the view of Argentina, the limited impact of the taxes could by no means be equivalent to an expropriation:

“Exports duties of 16.67% on oil and gas did not deprive El Paso from the benefits of its investment completely or in a significant portion. On the contrary, the increase in international oil and gas prices and the fall in costs resulting from the mega-devaluation of the peso allowed oil and gas producing companies to increase their benefits significantly, even when paying export duties.”<sup>237</sup>

287. As far as the deductions from taxations are concerned, Argentina stresses that a decision was taken in 1992, well before the Emergency Law, which simply did not modify the existing arrangement. This is acknowledged by the Claimant in its Memorial, where it admits that:

“Law N° 24,073, enacted on February 4, 1992, froze all applicable indices and provisions for inflation adjustment purposes, including those related to tax depreciation, as from April 1, 1992. This was a reasonable measure at the time there was hardly any inflation in Argentina.”<sup>238</sup>

What El Paso complains about, therefore, is not a change in the law but a change in the economic circumstances:

“Law N° 24,073 ceased to be appropriate in January 2002 when Law N° 25,561 repealed the Convertibility Law and the GOA took a number of measures that caused a huge devaluation of the Peso ... This sudden and unexpected change of circumstances materially altered the context in which the freezing of inflation indices for tax purposes had been issued pursuant to Law N° 24,073.”<sup>239</sup>

Argentina contends that it is not possible for El Paso to demand “an economic compensation because the applicable tax system has not been modified since 2002 according to what it considers convenient.”<sup>240</sup> Moreover, the two claims related to deductions from the tax basis were only brought for CAPEX and Costanera, and according to Argentina, neither of these two companies paid taxes in the years before the sale of El Paso’s shares.<sup>241</sup>

288. The Respondent’s conclusion is thus that, there being no expropriation, the tax measures do not come under the Tribunal’s jurisdiction according to the BIT. This has far-reaching consequences, according to Argentina, as it contends that 93% of the claims are based on export withholdings.<sup>242</sup>

(i) The Tribunal’s Legal Analysis of the Applicable Principles

289. Article XII of the BIT provides:

“1. With respect to its tax policies, each Party should strive to accord fairness and equity in the treatment of investment of nationals and companies of the other Party.

<sup>241</sup> Counter-Memorial, §§ 459 and 477. See also § 32: “CAPSA does not pay income tax because it would be exempt therefrom since 1999.”

2. Nevertheless, the provisions of this Treaty, and in particular Articles VII and VIII, shall apply to matters of taxation only with respect to the following:

(a) expropriation, pursuant to Article IV;

(b) transfers, pursuant to Article V; or

(c) the observance and enforcement of terms of an investment agreement or authorization as referred to in Article VII (1) (a) or (b), to the extent they are not subject to the dispute settlement provisions of a Convention for the avoidance of double taxation between the two Parties, or have been raised under such settlement provisions and are not resolved within a reasonable period of time.”

290. The tax policy of a country is a matter relating to the sovereign power of the State and its power to impose taxes on its territory. The Tribunal agrees that the State has a sovereign right to enact the tax measures it deems appropriate at any particular time. Every year, governments around the world propose the adoption of tax measures which constitute either new initiatives or amendments to the existing fiscal legislation. There is a presumption of validity in favour of legislative measures adopted by a State, and it is up to those who challenge such measures to demonstrate their invalidity. This idea has been embodied in Article XII of the BIT, the effect of which is to only limit slightly the State’s power to levy taxes.

291. As Article XII grants an important margin of freedom to the host State in relation to its fiscal policy towards foreign investors, the States Parties indicate in paragraph 2 of Article XII that this policy should not be unfair or inequitable. Considering both the language used – “each Party should strive” – and the fact that Article XII (2) excludes, except in specific and limited cases, any review of a possible violation of the fair and equitable treatment standard, the Tribunal concludes that Article XII (1) creates only a best-effort obligation.

292. In its Decision on Jurisdiction, the present Tribunal has already decided that the duties imposed on exports “are a tax measure,”<sup>243</sup> and this conclusion is reiterated here. The Tribunal also found that it had limited jurisdiction over only three issues:

“The Tribunal concludes that it has jurisdiction over tax matters, but only insofar as the tax measures complained of are linked with: (a) expropriation, pursuant to Article IV; (b) transfers, pursuant to Article V; or (c) the observance and enforcement of terms of an investment agreement or authorization as referred to in Article VII(1)(a) or (b). In other words, the only claims that the Tribunal can consider at the merits stage are the tax claims based on the existence of an expropriation and on the violation of an investment agreement or authorization. Everything else is beyond the competence of the Tribunal.”<sup>244</sup>

293. Since El Paso did not file any claim in connection with transfers (point b), and since the Tribunal has already decided<sup>245</sup> that there is no investment agreement benefiting El Paso (point c), the only issue which remains to be addressed is whether such taxes could qualify as an expropriation (point a).

(ii) The Tribunal’s Analysis of the Facts of the Case

294. A significant portion of El Paso’s claims are related to tax issues. These issues include the claims related to the export duties established by the Emergency Law and the deductions on income tax. Like any other activity, foreign investments are subject to taxes imposed by the host State and “the foreign investor has neither the right nor any legitimate expectation that the tax regime will not change ... during the period of the investment,”<sup>246</sup> even though that may reduce its economic benefits, except if a stabilisation of the tax regime (at least for certain taxes) was agreed on by the State.

295. The Tribunal will examine the different tax measures complained of and will summarily dismiss the claims against the regime of tax deductions which was in place since 1992, as there were no complaints from the Claimant during ten years. In this arbitration, the Claimant does not complain about a change of the law; it complains about “no change in the law.” The only claim here is that the State has not modified its laws in order to alleviate the economic problems resulting for the economic actors from the new economic situation. Without needing to enter into a discussion on this point, the Tribunal seriously doubts that, as alleged by the Claimant, “[i]nvestors have a reasonable and legitimate expectation to be able to adjust their fixed assets for tax purposes in periods of high inflation.”<sup>247</sup> A State cannot be considered to have a duty to adapt its tax regime to the best interests of foreign investors. An unfavourable calculation of taxes cannot be equated with an expropriation, especially as the Claimant has not quantified its alleged losses.

296. The Tribunal will now look into the export-tax withholdings in order to decide whether they can be considered an expropriation. Before analysing them, it is appropriate to recall the content of the impugned measures. First, the Emergency Law adopted on 6 January 2002 decided on the principle of such a tax, known as withholding on oil and gas:

“The Executive Branch of Government shall be entitled to establish compensatory measures to avoid the unbalancing of financial institutions resulting from the provisions set forth in the preceding paragraph. These measures may include the issue of guaranteed national public bonds in foreign currency. For purpose of funding such guarantee, an export tax on hydrocarbons is hereby created for the term of FIVE (5) years, and the Executive Branch of Government shall be entitled to determine the corresponding tax rate.”<sup>248</sup>

Then, as far as crude oil exports were concerned, on 13 February 2002, the GOA enacted Decree N° 310/2002, which placed a 20% withholding on crude oil exports: this amounts to a 16.67% export duty on crude oil exports<sup>249</sup>, as in Argentina the withholding is included in the amount used to calculate export duties and, therefore, a 20% export duty implies an actual 16.67% withholding.<sup>250</sup> Such export duty began to be levied on 1 March 2002 and was still effective when El Paso sold its equity interests in the Argentinian companies.

Regarding LPG exports, a new tax was imposed on 13 May 2002: during a term of fifteen days in 2002 (from 14 May through 31 May 2002), a 20% export duty was also applied to LPG exports,<sup>251</sup> which implies, for the same reason as stated above, a 16.67% export withholding. From 1 June 2002 onward, the duty was reduced to 4.76% as a result of the Agreement for the Stabilisation of the Liquefied Petroleum Gas Wholesale Price in the Argentine Market (hereinafter: the LPG Price Stabilisation Agreement). This Agreement was entered into in July 2002 between the Minister of Economy and the main LPG producers in Argentina. One of the companies that signed the agreement was CAPEX. From the execution of the LPG Price Stabilisation Agreement until May 2004, the LPG export duty remained at 4.76%. El Paso sold its equity interests in CAPSA – and, consequently, in CAPEX – in mid-2003, and in Costanera in autumn 2003. This reduced export duty was therefore still effective at the moment of the two sales in June and September 2003.

297. Turning now to the analysis of these measures, the Tribunal considers, first, that the creation of export duties on oil and gas is a reasonable governmental regulation within the context of the crisis. According to the Respondent's expert Roubini, "it made total economic sense to have a 'compensated devaluation' by relying on export taxes to raise revenues in the sectors that had most benefited from the devaluation."<sup>252</sup> The devaluation of the peso entailed extraordinary revenues for the exporting sectors which did not arise from increased efficiency but from the devaluation. It is thus logical to establish a tax on exports to be levied on a portion of this extraordinary income. By mid-2002, the Argentine peso had lost 200% against the US dollar. At the same time, the price of oil climbed; as stated by Argentina,

“[f]rom mid-1998 (when recession started in Argentina) to mid-2003 (when El Paso sold its share in CAPSA and in Servicios), the WTI crude oil barrel rose from below USD 13/bbl to over USD 30/bbl, even peaking over USD 35/bbl.”<sup>253</sup>

Faced with this new economic situation, the export duties imposed on oil and gas amounted to only between 4.76% and 16.67%. According to the Tribunal, this may be regarded as reasonable. Therefore, the tax on unexpected income, resulting from the mega-devaluation of the Argentine peso and the increase in the international price of oil cannot be considered an expropriation. In this sense, the Tribunal is supported in its analysis by the approach followed in Aminoil v. Kuwait,<sup>254</sup> where the tribunal noted that it was acceptable to impose taxes on the oil industry in connection with unexpected income attributable to the “explosion” of oil prices rather than to efforts made by the concession holders.

298. Second, the tax measures had only a limited impact on Claimant’s property rights. On crude oil, the withholdings were fixed at 20% (16.67%). On LPG, the rate, first established at 20% (16.67%), was later reduced to 5% (4.46%). Only after El Paso’s sale, on 13 May 2004, did Argentina increase the export withholdings imposed on crude oil from 20% to 25% and on LPG exports from 5% to 20%, and reinstated the previously abolished withholdings on exports of gasoline and other by-products at a rate of 5%. A first remark is that the export withholdings imposed in May 2004 cannot have caused a forced sale constituting an expropriation of El Paso’s shares in the Argentinian companies subjected to these withholdings, or constitute an expropriation by themselves.

A second remark is that, without needing to enter into sophisticated reasoning or calculations, it is obvious that a tax of such a percentage is by no means an unreasonable measure that could be deemed expropriatory: under no circumstances may a tax of under 20% on exports be characterised as expropriation of an investment. The impact of the imposition of export withholdings, at a rate of 4.76% for LPG and a rate of 16.67% for oil, on El Paso's shares cannot be deemed to be expropriatory.

299. In conclusion, the Tribunal, having analysed the different tax measures, does not consider that they amount to indirect expropriation, as they were reasonable and did not result in the neutralisation of the property rights of the Claimant.

D. ARTICLE II(2)(B): DISCRIMINATORY AND ARBITRARY TREATMENT

300. Article II(2)(b) of the 1991 BIT states:

“Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investments. For the purposes of dispute resolution under Articles VII and VIII, a measure may be arbitrary or discriminatory notwithstanding the opportunity to review such measure in the courts or administrative tribunals of a Party.”

1. Discriminatory Treatment: Has El Paso Been Discriminated Against?

(i) The Parties' Positions

301. According to the Claimant's Memorial, the energy companies were discriminated against:

“... the GOA's measures have been designed to benefit other sectors of the economy at the expense of energy companies, thus constituting a politically-motivated and discriminatory transfer of wealth from energy companies to other sectors of the economy;”<sup>255</sup>

“ ... in an obvious display of discrimination, the GOA effectively took billions of Dollars from the energy sector and transferred that money to other economic groups;”<sup>256</sup>

“... [t]he Energy Secretariat’s acts were driven by the GOA’s decision to manipulate energy prices in order to disproportionately distribute the damage caused by the GOA’s alterations to the system so that generators shouldered a larger burden than other participants.”<sup>257</sup>

The same position was taken in the Claimant’s Reply:

“ ... the measures adopted by the GOA regarding the energy sector were not a mere result of Argentina’s economic condition, but part of a specific policy adopted by the GOA to discriminate against the energy sector, abrogating fundamental rights and assurances granted under the Energy Regulatory Framework.”<sup>258</sup>

302. And the discrimination is described as follows:

“Many of Argentina’s measures had a disproportionate effect on foreign investors in the energy sector and thus constitute a clear case of de facto discrimination ... Essentially, Argentina forced the energy sector to bear a disproportionate brunt of Argentina’s financial difficulties in order to cross-subsidize the rest of its economy by US$ 10.7 billion.”<sup>259</sup>

303. The Respondent presented a different view of what constituted unauthorised discrimination. The GOA considered that the measures were not discriminatory and expressed the following view on the conditions for measures to be discriminatory:

“The differential treatment between national and foreign investors does not necessarily lead to the violation of international law standards. In order for a State’s action or measure to be discriminatory in the sense that it is prohibited under international law, two requirements should be present. In the first place, the measure must result in actual damages to the foreign investor; in the second place, the action or measure must have been taken to harm the foreign investor. If these requirements are not present, there will be no discriminatory action by the State that is protected by international law.”<sup>260</sup>

304. In addition to this abstract view of what constitutes discrimination, Argentina contended that, according to the facts of the case, the energy and oil and gas companies had not been concretely discriminated against. According to the Respondent,

“[a]ll the sectors of the economy were impacted by the crisis and had to adapt to the new context. El Paso has filed a claim for investments related to electric power generation and oil and gas production. Although these sectors could not remain alien to the crisis, they were not, at any rate, among the most disfavoured ones.”<sup>261</sup>

(ii) The Tribunal’s Analysis

305. On the one hand, the Tribunal does not agree with Argentina’s contention that discriminatory intent is necessary for a measure to be discriminatory. It is sufficient that, objectively, two similar situations are not treated similarly. As stated by the ICSID tribunal in Goetz v. Burundi, “discrimination supposes a differential treatment applied to people who are in similar situations.”<sup>262</sup> Professor Kenneth Vandeveldel further explains that anti-discrimination provisions in BITs prohibit measures that are “discriminatory in effect as well as those which are intentionally discriminatory,”<sup>263</sup> which implies that while discriminatory intent gives rise to a finding of discrimination, the discriminatory effect of a measure is sufficient for such a finding. On the other hand, the Tribunal can also not accept the Claimant’s view according to which any discrimination against an investor is a violation of the BIT. The Claimant has cited many authorities and stated that, according to Professor A. F. M. Maniruzzaman,

<sup>263</sup> Kenneth J. Vandeveldel, United States Investment Treaties: Policy and Practice, Boston, Kluwer Law and Taxation, 1992, p. 77.

“[t]he concept of discrimination entails two elements: first, the measures directed against a particular party must be for reasons unrelated to the substance of the matter, for example, the company’s nationality. Second, discrimination entails like persons being treated in an inequivalent manner.”<sup>264</sup>

306. The protection against discrimination in the BIT is a protection against discrimination of foreign investors as such. In the Tribunal’s view, the standard of the BIT according to which foreign investors are protected against discrimination does not entail the far-reaching consequence that a State cannot treat differently the economic actors in different sectors of the economy, as long as this differential treatment applies equally to national and foreign investors. None of the impugned measures adopted to face the economic crisis differentiated in legal terms between Argentinian nationals or companies, on the one hand, and foreigners or foreign or foreign-owned companies, on the other. It appears moreover from the file that, in practice, no foreign investor has received treatment different from that granted to its Argentinian counterparts, and El Paso has received the same treatment as other investors in the same sector.

307. The Tribunal has not been convinced by the Claimant allegation that

“ ... the measures adopted by the GOA regarding the energy sector were not a mere result of Argentina’s economic condition, but part of a specific policy adopted by the GOA to discriminate against the energy sector, abrogating fundamental rights and assurances granted under the Energy Regulatory Framework.”<sup>265</sup>

308. The conclusion of this Tribunal is that no de jure discrimination between national and foreign investors, or different foreign nationals, resulted from the measures adopted to face the crisis.

309. The question that remains is whether there has been de facto discrimination. According to the Claimant, the banks are mainly Argentinian and the oil and gas sector companies mainly foreign-owned: as the banking sector and the energy sector have not been treated in the same manner, there has been de facto discrimination according to the Claimant.

<sup>264</sup> Memorial, § 556, citing A. F. M. Maniruzzaman, “Expropriation of Alien Property and the Principle of Non-Discrimination in International Law of Foreign Investment: An Overview”, 8 J. Transnat’l L. & Pol’y 57 (1998) (footnote omitted). Claimant’s Legal Authority No.133.

310. It has been said, and is indeed confirmed by the text of the relevant law, that the export withholdings were established to compensate for the difficulties of the Argentinian banking sector. According to the Claimant,

“ ... [t]he mandatory conversion of Dollar-denominated bank deposits and bank credits created an imbalance in the system that was termed asymmetrical pesification. This imbalance occurred because Decree N° 214 converted Dollar-denominated bank deposits into Pesos at a rate of US$ 1 = per Arg.$1.40, while Dollar-denominated bank loans were converted into Argentine currency at a rate of US$ 1 = Arg$ 1. According to Law N° 25,561, the hydrocarbon export withholding was created to compensate the banking sector for this imbalance.”<sup>266</sup>

It is not denied that the banking and the hydrocarbon sectors were not subject to the same measures, but the Tribunal thinks that the measures concerning each of these sectors were reasonable and did not discriminate against either of them. On the contrary, the overall scheme adopted by the Argentine Government had the objective of balancing for each sector the advantages and disadvantages of the general economic situation.

311. The banking sector was at a disadvantage because the Government had imposed an asymmetrical pesification, the loans being pesified at a lower exchange rate than the deposits, which created a greater loss for the banking system than symmetrical pesification would have. This was acknowledged by the tribunal in the award in Continental when it analysed the same Decree:

“The Government intervened massively to support the banks in the asymmetric pesification. This scheme would have brought the banks otherwise to bankruptcy, since they had to ‘pay back’ to depositors 1.40 pesos for each dollar, while their credits were converted at 1:1.”<sup>267</sup>

This is a very specific application of pesification which placed the banks in a situation that cannot be considered as similar or comparable to that of the oil and gas companies but, on the contrary, was less favourable. The GOA practised discrimination in favour of the banks and then a sort of reverse discrimination to equalise the playground. In other words, what Decree N° 214 and Law N° 25,561 did was what is called in another context “inégalité compensatrice”<sup>268</sup> and does not amount to discriminatory treatment of foreign investors.

312. The same analysis was made in Metalpar v. Argentina, where the claimants – two companies which had invested in Argentinian companies engaged in the manufacturing of bus bodies – alleged that Argentina, through Law No. 25,561, Law No. 25,789, and Presidential Decree No. 905/2002, had discriminated against them in favour of the financial sector, just as El Paso claims to have been discriminated against in favour of the banking sector. The answer of the tribunal was simple and is shared by this Tribunal:

“The Tribunal considers that a State’s power to create its legal system – through its competent authorities – allows it to establish different rules to govern different subjects. If Claimants neither were nor are financial institutions, they cannot argue that the Argentine Government should have treated them as such.”<sup>269</sup>

313. Moreover, as far as the Hydrocarbon Sector was concerned, the exports being expressed in dollars and the costs in Argentina being sustained in pesos, the hydrocarbon companies seemed to be in a more favourable position than those

---

<sup>268</sup> At the time of the New International Economic Order (NIEO), the idea was to give advantages to developing countries in order to foster a more balanced relationship with developed countries. The idea was for example expressed in Article 18 of the Charter for Economic Rights and Duties of States, embodied in General Assembly Resolution 3182 of December 1974, which reads: “Developed countries should extend, improve and enlarge the system of generalized non-reciprocal and non-discriminatory tariff preferences to the developing countries consistent with the relevant agreed conclusions and relevant decisions as adopted on this subject, in the framework of the competent international organizations. Developed countries should also give serious consideration to the adoption of other differential measures, in areas where this is feasible and appropriate and in ways which will provide special and more favourable treatment, in order to meet the trade and development needs of the developing countries. In the conduct of international economic relations, the developed countries should endeavour to avoid measures having a negative effect on the development of the national economies of the developing countries, as promoted by generalized tariff preferences and other generally agreed differential measures in their favour.”

which did not export. Argentina argued that “[w]ithholdings captured only one portion of the extraordinary profitability obtained by exporters, who had suddenly benefited as a result of the mega-devaluation of the local currency.”<sup>270</sup>

The Tribunal here refers to a statement by Mr. Fernandez, who declared in February 2004, when he was Chief of Cabinet:

“We are referring to various sectors of the economy which shall bear the cost of this increase, most of them are exporters who have enjoyed the possibility to export their products in dollars while paying a very low tariff for gas and electricity in pesos.”<sup>271</sup>

314. The Tribunal also takes note of a statement made by the Claimant itself, making the same analysis when saying that “those who export their production ... benefited from the devaluation of the Peso since the Peso equivalent value of their exports tripled.”<sup>272</sup> It was thus reasonable for the Government to institute a tax on the unexpected profits made by the oil and gas companies to re-balance the situation of the banking sector. Far from being discriminatory, this measure aimed at equalising the playground of the different economic actors, by distributing more equitably the burden of the country’s economic crisis among all those affected. This idea was indeed spelled out in Section 11 of the Emergency Law, which pointed to “the principle of shared efforts.” To these considerations one should add that it was common knowledge that at the time of the Argentine crisis the international price of oil increased tremendously, which was all to the benefit of the exporting companies. Argentina explained that

“[i]n the oil and gas sector, export duties were established levied only on a minor portion of the extraordinary profits generated by the mega devaluation of the Argentine peso for tradable goods producing sectors. The increase in the international price of crude oil was an additional issue that also benefited the sector dramatically. Domestic oil and gas prices increased at a pace that exceeded domestic inflation and converted this sector into one of the most favoured ones within the context of the crisis.”<sup>273</sup>

Therefore, as stated by Mr. Roubini, expert for the Respondent, “it made total economic sense to have a ‘compensated devaluation’ by relying on export taxes to raise revenues in the sectors that had most benefited from the devaluation and the sectors that were most able to afford an increased tax imposition.”<sup>274</sup>

315. It is this Tribunal’s view that a differential treatment based on the existence of a different factual and legal situation does not breach the BIT’s standard. Here the Tribunal is in line with the approach of other tribunals already cited and finds itself in agreement with the tribunal in Enron, which found no discrimination between the different sectors of the economy, although they were indeed treated differently, as there was no “capricious, irrational or absurd differentiation in the treatment accorded to the Claimant as compared to other entities or sectors.”<sup>275</sup> The Tribunal finds that the Claimant has not proved any improper differentiation.

316. Last but not least, the Tribunal recalls that the application of standards in the BIT other than that of protection from expropriation is excluded for tax matters. The question that was discussed in the preceding paragraphs is therefore somewhat academic, although, if it had had to decide the issue, the Tribunal would have considered it important to state that, for the reasons presented, it held that there had been neither de jure nor de facto discrimination against El Paso during the Argentine crisis.

2. Arbitrary Treatment: Has El Paso Been Treated Arbitrarily?

(i) The Parties’ Positions

317. The Claimant argues in its Memorial that the decisions of the Argentinian authorities were arbitrary, but without really saying more than that “the GOA took a series of politically-motivated measures,”<sup>276</sup> without elaborating on the possible political motives behind these measures. Later on, some explanation was given of this idea of political motivation in the testimony of Mr. Bastos, the former Secretary of Energy: “the changes that have been introduced are political ones aimed mainly at preventing an increase in the price of energy ...”<sup>277</sup>

318. The Respondent considers that the measures were not arbitrary and were designed to improve the global economic situation. They were adopted after extensive discussions in the Government and the ministries, and their sole aim was to face the crisis in the best way possible.

(ii) The Tribunal’s Analysis

319. Black’s Law Dictionary defines the word “arbitrary” as “not governed by any fixed rules or standard,” “performed without adequate determination of principle,” “without cause based upon the law,” or resulting from a “failure to exercise honest judgment.”<sup>278</sup> In addition, “arbitrary and capricious” is defined as “characterization of a decision or action taken by an administrative agency . . . [as] wilful and unreasonable action without consideration or in disregard of facts or law or without determining principle.”<sup>279</sup> According to international law, “[a]rbitrariness is not so much something opposed to a rule of law, as something opposed to the rule of law . . . It is a wilful disregard of due process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of juridical propriety.”<sup>280</sup>

320. The Tribunal sees no arbitrariness in Argentina’s reaction to the crisis. Of course, if one is faced with a difficult economic situation, there are always several methods for dealing with it, depending on the circumstances, the political constraints incumbent on governments and their economic analyses. It is clear that neither the causes of, nor the answers to, Argentina's economic crisis at the end of 2001 have been the object of unanimous appraisal.

321. The Tribunal has heard various experts, all knowledgeable, having opposite perceptions of the same reality. Some experts stated that the pesification was the only solution; others said that dollarisation would have been much preferable.<sup>281</sup>

There is no common analysis of the origin of the crisis, as was pointed out by the tribunal in the CMS case, which was dealing with the same crisis:

“This crisis ... stemmed basically from economic conditions that made it impossible to maintain the fixed exchange rate and which gradually led to the greatest default on foreign debt in history and the collapse of the Argentine financial markets. Some tend to fault foreign investors and put the blame on excessive privatization and globalization, while others see in it the result of not having carried out the liberalization program in its entirety and having allowed major governmental interferences in the functioning of the economy.”<sup>282</sup>

It cannot be denied also that the reactions to the crisis could have been different, as stated by the tribunal in LG&E:

“ ... Argentina faced severe economic and social hardships from 2001 onwards and had to react to the circumstances prevailing at the time. Even though the measures adopted by Argentina may not have been the best, they were not taken lightly, without due consideration.”<sup>283</sup>

322. The Tribunal thinks that the GOA certainly tried to take the best measures to cope with the situation. Judging whether the measures taken were or were not the best is very difficult as shown by the diverging views expressed on the

<sup>281</sup> See for example, Reply, § 747, Claimant's developments on the subject: “An additional alternative available to Argentina was “dollarization.” Argentina could have adopted the Dollar as legal tender, as other countries (such as Ecuador and Panama) did. Under this option, the Central Bank of Argentina could have used its Dollar reserves to exchange all pesos in circulation for dollars, and all Peso-denominated obligations would have been transformed into dollar-denominated obligations at the exchange rate of 1:1, which was the exchange rate in force during the currency board system. The peso was already pegged to the Dollar under the currency board system, and the Argentine Central Bank possessed the dollar reserves necessary to maintain that peg. ‘Dollarization’ was thus an obvious and logical alternative that was frequently discussed in 2001. It had the support of senior US officials, making it “highly likely that had Argentina opted for dollarization, both the Bush Administration and the multilateral institutions would have supported the policy.” (footnotes omitted.)

subject by commentators of the Argentinian crisis of 2001. Something had to be done. The only item to be verified by the Tribunal is whether the measures were taken arbitrarily. In view of the extensive file before it, which it has studied exhaustively, it appears to the Tribunal that the measures adopted in the context of the crisis were not arbitrary but reasonable and consistent with the aim pursued. They were intended to face the extremely serious crisis that Argentina was going through and emanated from the police power regularly exercised by governments.

323. It is also apposite to note that all measures were taken in the framework of the existing constitutional order, as stressed by the tribunal in Continental:

“It is worth noting that ultimately the crisis did not affect the functioning of the democratic constitutional order of Argentina beyond emergency measures enacted on the basis of the Constitution. Civil liberties were not restricted, nor constitutional guarantees suspended. This is apparent now; but it certainly could not be assumed in late 2001 and 2002.”<sup>284</sup>

324. It could moreover be said that the subsequent evolution of the Argentinian economy might give some confirmation of the adequacy of the policy followed.<sup>285</sup> The Claimant itself has recognised this positive evolution more than once. For example, in its Closing Statement, it was indicated that the GDP growth was the following: + 8.83 for 2003; + 9.03 for 2004; + 9.18 for 2005; + 8.46 for 2006; and approximately + 7.5 for 2008. Moreover, in a letter dated 20 May 2008 sent by its counsel to the Tribunal, the Claimant recognised the positive effects of Argentina’s policies, stating that “Argentina’s economy has been growing at record rates since 2003.” According to the Embassy of Argentina in Washington, D.C., “Argentina’s economy has been growing at a fast pace since 2003 (9% average during 2004-2006), having overcome its major crisis in modern history.” In her first annual address to the Argentine

325. The conclusion of the Tribunal is that the measures taken by Argentina were based on a reasoned scheme to answer a major crisis and effectively had the desired result, which means that they cannot be considered as tainted by arbitrariness.

E. ARTICLE II(2)(a): FAIR AND EQUITABLE TREATMENT

326. Article II(2)(a) of the BIT prescribes:

“Investment shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment, shall enjoy full protection and security and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than that required by international law.”

327. Two main issues are raised by the application of the fair and equitable treatment (FET) standard in an arbitration case: the first concerns the relation of FET with general international law, whereas the second is the determination of its content and scope.

1. The Parties’ Positions

328. The Claimant has an all-encompassing conception of FET, as is shown by the summary of the development of this concept given in its Memorial:

“In summary, government measures violate the fair and equitable treatment standard when they are inconsistent with the reasonable and legitimate expectations of the parties. It is both reasonable and legitimate for investors to expect that a government will conform its conduct to accepted standards such as its own treaties, constitution, laws, regulations, customary international law, and general usage that falls into the category of a norm. Indeed, this is the essence of the rule of law. It is also unfair and inequitable for a government to violate the principles of honesty and good faith, to act in a non-transparent manner, to act in a manner inconsistent with representations and inducements offered to attract foreign investment, to revoke or alter arbitrarily or for political reasons regulatory approvals or conditions upon which the investor relied, to abuse its legal rights or its discretionary powers, to interfere with property rights unreasonably and to unforeseeably change the essential rules of the game upon which investors relied in such a way as to frustrate the very purpose of the investment. These standards are all fundamental and well accepted. They encompass the most elementary principles of fairness and economic morality, and in a practical sense, they are necessary preconditions for the confidence based upon the stability and predictability that comes with respect for the rule of law that is so necessary both to attract foreign investment and for any economy to prosper and grow.”<sup>286</sup>

Without wishing to analyse at this stage the details of this conception of FET, the Tribunal notes that, in the Claimant’s view as expressed in this excerpt, any violation by a State of any of its laws or its regulations is a violation of FET. In its Reply, the Claimant examined the relation between the concept of FET and general international law and contended that fair and equitable treatment as prescribed in the BIT established a different and higher standard than that prevailing in customary international law.<sup>287</sup>

329. The Respondent began its discussion of FET by stating that “[t]he treatment standards are provided by the international customary law minimum standard. This is thus established by the BIT, practice and international legal scholars.”<sup>288</sup> As far as the content of the notion is concerned, Argentina points out that FET cannot be interpreted to mean that no change in the legal framework may be made if circumstances so require. In the GOA’s Counter-Memorial, it is thus stated that

“[c]ountries with unstable economies – such as Argentina – did not undertake to refrain from undergoing economic crises again. If El Paso’s interpretation of the standard were allowed, bilateral investment treaties would only be used to worsen the crisis when making the country in trouble compensate the investors affected and thus keep them isolated from the crisis.”<sup>289</sup>

2. The Tribunal’s Analysis of the Legal Standard

330. The Tribunal will address in turn the two issues raised by the FET.

Minimum Standard

331. As far as the relation between FET and the minimum standard of international law is concerned, two main approaches have been adopted by ICSID tribunals, to which one may add an intermediate, undecided position.
332. Under the first approach, FET has to be equated with the minimum standard of treatment provided for by general international law. This has been, for example, the position adopted by the CMS tribunal:

“In fact, the Treaty standard of fair and equitable treatment and its connection with the required stability and predictability of the business environment, founded on solemn legal and contractual commitments, is not different from the international law minimum standard and its evolution under customary law.”<sup>290</sup>

333. The second approach deals with FET as an autonomous concept, considered in general as more demanding and more protective of investors’ rights than the minimum standard of treatment provided for by general international law. The Azurix tribunal, for example, took this position:

“The clause, as drafted, permits to interpret fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security as higher standards than required by international law. The purpose of the third sentence is to set a floor, not a ceiling in order to avoid a possible interpretation of these standards below what is required by international law.”<sup>291</sup>

However, after this statement of principle, the Azurix tribunal contradicted it, or at least emptied it of any significance, when it added that:

“... the Tribunal does not consider that it is of material significance for its application of the standard of fair and equitable treatment to the facts of the case. As it will be explained below, the minimum requirement to satisfy this standard has evolved and the Tribunal considers that its content is substantially similar whether the terms are interpreted in their ordinary meaning, as required by the Vienna Convention, or in accordance with customary international law.”<sup>292</sup>

334. Between these two approaches, some tribunals chose not to decide. This was the case of the tribunal in BG v. Argentina which adopted the following position:

“For the reasons set out below, this Tribunal has concluded that the measures adopted by Argentina fall below the minimum standard and it is consequently not necessary for this award to examine whether the Argentine-UK BIT provides a more generous independent standard of protection.”<sup>293</sup>

335. The Tribunal considers this discussion to be somewhat futile, as the scope and content of the minimum standard of international law is as little defined as the BITs’ FET standard, and as the true question is to decide what substantive protection is granted to foreign investors through the FET. The issue is not one of comparing two undefined or weakly defined standards; it is to ascertain the content and define the BIT standard of fair and equitable treatment.

336. This being said, it is the view of the Tribunal that the position according to which FET is equivalent to the international minimum standard is more in line with the evolution of investment law and international law<sup>294</sup> and with the identical role assigned to FET and to the international minimum standard. The Tribunal wishes to emphasise what is, in its view, the specific role played by both the general international minimum standard and the FET standard as found in BITs. The role of these similar standards is to ensure that the treatment of foreign investments, which are protected by the national treatment and the most-favoured investors’ clauses, do not fall below a certain minimum, in case the two mentioned standards do not live up to that minimum. As stated by Ian Brownlie, “[s]ince the beginning of the present century, legal doctrine has opposed an ‘international minimum standard,’ ‘a moral standard for civilized states,’ to the principle of national treatment.”<sup>295</sup> This has been highlighted

<sup>294</sup> Although this is not applicable to our case, one may note that in the FTA between the United States and Chile it was held that the fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security standards included in Article 10(4) and Chapter 10 on Investments “do not require treatment in addition to or beyond that which is required by that standard, and do not create additional substantive rights.” Free Trade Agreement between Chile and the United States of 6 June 2003, Article 10.4(2).

already in two arbitral awards. In Genin, it was asserted by the tribunal that, under international law, this requirement is generally understood to “provide a basic and general standard which is detached from the host State’s domestic law.”<sup>296</sup> Then, in Saluka, the same idea was elaborated on:

“ ... the ‘fair and equitable treatment’ standard requires the Contracting States to accord to foreign investors treatment which does not fall below a certain minimum, this minimum being in any case detached from any lower minimum standard of treatment that may prevail in the domestic laws of the Contracting States.”<sup>297</sup>

337. In conclusion, it is the Tribunal’s view that the FET is not to be viewed with reference to national law – in which case it could be lower than required by international law – but has to be interpreted with reference to international law, the result being that it cannot go below what is required by international law, which is the standard to be applied. But if national law or the treatment accorded to some foreigners exceeds this minimum international standard, it is one of the former that has to be applied. In a sense, it could be said that the foreign investor is entitled to the most favourable treatment, be it national law, rules applied to some foreigners or the international minimum standard embodied in FET. The Tribunal thus considers that the FET of the BIT is the international minimum standard required by international law, regardless of the protection afforded by the national legal orders.

(ii) The Content and Scope of Fair and Equitable Treatment

338. The true problem is in fact to establish the content and scope of the FET. In most BITs the term “fair and equitable treatment” is not defined. Pursuant to the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, a treaty is to be interpreted “in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose.” At the outset, the Tribunal wishes to cite a general comment made by the ad hoc Annulment Committee in the CMS case,<sup>298</sup> with which it cannot but agree fully:

“The Committee would only note that the fair and equitable standard has been invoked in a great number of cases brought to ICSID arbitration and that there is some variation in the practice of arbitral tribunals in this respect.”

339. The Tribunal can also agree with a general description of the FET given by the Claimant in its Memorial in the following citation, although it cannot approve all aspects of this standard as they are presented later in the same submission, quoted in paragraph 328 of this Award:

“The contours of fair and equitable treatment have gradually come into focus in the past few years. It has become clear that the basic touchstone of fair and equitable treatment is to be found in the legitimate and reasonable expectations of the parties, which derive from the obligation of good faith.”<sup>299</sup>

340. Within this general acceptable definition, some tribunals have however extended the scope of the FET to a point where, according to this Tribunal, the sovereign power of the State to regulate its economy is negated, as will be developed below.

3. The Different Conceptions Used by Arbitral Tribunals

341. One of the broadest conceptions of FET is that the State has a duty to adopt a proactive behaviour in favour of the foreign investment. This has been stated for example in the case of MTD, where the tribunal, although referring to Tecmed, seems to have even expanded on it, when it said:

“In terms of the BIT, fair and equitable treatment should be understood to be treatment in an even-handed and just manner, conducive to fostering the promotion of foreign investment. Its terms are framed as a proactive statement – ‘to promote,’ ‘to create,’ ‘to stimulate’ – rather than prescriptions for a passive behavior of the State or avoidance of prejudicial conduct to the investors.”<sup>300</sup>

342. Sometimes, the description of what FET implies looks like a programme of good governance that no State in the world is capable of guaranteeing at all times. The exigencies of FET have been detailed in Tecmed in the following manner:

“To provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investment and comply with such regulations. Any and all State actions conforming to such criteria should relate not only to the guidelines, directives or requirements issued, or the resolutions approved thereunder, but also to the goals underlying such regulations. The foreign investor also expects the host State to act consistently, i.e. without arbitrarily revoking any preexisting decisions or permits issued by the state that were relied upon by the investor to assume its commitments as well as to plan and launch its commercial and business activities. The investor also expects the state to use the legal instruments that govern the actions of the investor or the investment in conformity with the function usually assigned to such instruments, and not to deprive the investor of its investment without the required compensation.”<sup>301</sup>

343. It is, according to this Tribunal, interesting to note that the ad hoc Annulment Committee in the MTD case distanced itself from the very broad definition in Tecmed on which the MTD tribunal had relied. It did so in the following terms:

“According to the Respondent, ‘the TecMed programme for good governance’ is extreme and does not reflect international law. The TECMED dictum is also subject to strenuous criticism from the Respondent’s experts, Mr. Jan Paulsson and Sir Arthur Watts ...

The Committee can appreciate some aspects of these criticisms. For example the TECMED Tribunal's apparent reliance on the foreign investor's expectations as the source of the host State's obligations (such as the obligation to compensate for expropriation) is questionable. The obligations of the host State towards foreign investors derive from the terms of the applicable investment treaty and not from any set of expectations investors may have or claim to have."<sup>302</sup>

The ad hoc Committee goes on to take a closer look at the definition of FET given by the MTD tribunal and expresses some concerns about the scope of States' obligations under that definition:

"... a standard formulated in the terms of paragraph 113 is defensible. No doubt the extent to which a State is obliged under the fair and equitable treatment standard to be pro-active is open to debate, but that is more a question of application of the standard than it is of formulation. In any event the emphasis in the Tribunal's formulation is on 'treatment in an even-handed and just manner.'"<sup>303</sup>

344. Another only slightly less far-reaching conception implies that the State is under an obligation to stabilise the legal and business framework in which the foreign investment was made. For example, in the VAT case of Occidental Exploration and Production Co. v. Ecuador, the tribunal stated:

"Although fair and equitable treatment is not defined in the Treaty, the Preamble clearly records the agreement of the parties that such treatment 'is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective utilization of economic resources.' The stability of the legal and business framework is thus an essential element of fair and equitable treatment."<sup>304</sup>

The Tribunal further stressed this point by saying that "there is certainly an obligation not to alter the legal and business environment in which the investment has been made."<sup>305</sup>

345. This conception was also followed by ICSID tribunals in some of the already decided Argentinian cases by relying on the Preamble in order to identify the object and purpose of the treaty. The CMS tribunal turned to the Preamble of the Argentina-US BIT to clarify the standard of fair and equitable treatment:

“The Treaty Preamble makes it clear, however, that one principal objective of the protection envisaged is that fair and equitable treatment is desirable ‘to maintain a stable framework for investments and maximum use of economic resources.’ There can be no doubt, therefore, that a stable legal and business environment is an essential element of fair and equitable treatment.”<sup>306</sup>

346. Similarly, the tribunal in LG&E referred to the Preamble of the same BIT to determine the object and purpose of FET, and concluded:

“In considering the context within which Argentina and the United States included the fair and equitable treatment standard, and its object and purpose, the Tribunal observes in the Preamble of the Treaty that the two countries agreed that ‘fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources.’ . . . In light of these stated objectives, this Tribunal must conclude that stability of the legal and business framework is an essential element of fair and equitable treatment in this case . . . .”<sup>307</sup>

347. But there are also much narrower conceptions of FET, which come closer to the Neer test.<sup>308</sup> Such an approach, which considers that FET is only violated by wilful bad faith behaviour of the State, has been used by the tribunal in Genin:

“While the exact content of this standard is not clear, the Tribunal understands it ... [as] a minimum standard. Acts that would violate this minimum standard would include acts showing a wilful neglect of duty, an insufficiency of action falling far below international standards, or even subjective bad faith.”<sup>309</sup>

<sup>307</sup> LG&E, supra note 51, § 124. It should be mentioned that if a tribunal states that, if FET is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources, this implies that a stable framework is an essential element of FET, it should also be concluded that the maximum effective use of economic resources should be considered an essential element of that standard.

348. As can be seen, there is a broad range of conceptions of FET emerging from ICSID case-law. However, the legitimate expectations of the investors have generally been considered central in the definition of FET, whatever its scope. There is an overwhelming trend to consider the touchstone of fair and equitable treatment to be found in the legitimate and reasonable expectations of the Parties, which derive from the obligation of good faith. This has been aptly stated by the tribunal in Waste Management II: “In applying this standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.”<sup>310</sup> And the tribunal in Saluka reiterated the same idea, when stating: “The standard of ‘fair and equitable treatment’ is therefore closely tied to the notion of legitimate expectations which is the dominant element of that standard.”<sup>311</sup>
349. The Tribunal will now present its own understanding of this standard of protection of foreign investors.

4. The Tribunal’s Understanding of Fair and Equitable Treatment

350. In the Tribunal’s view, if the often repeated formula to the effect that “the stability of the legal and business framework is an essential element of fair and equitable treatment” were true, legislation could never be changed: the mere enunciation of that proposition shows its irrelevance. Such a standard of behaviour, if strictly applied, is not realistic, nor is it the BITs’ purpose that States guarantee that the economic and legal conditions in which investments take place will remain unaltered ad infinitum. Such an outcome based on the holdings of some tribunals has been criticised by Professor Vaughan Lowe, when he analysed some of the cases based on this kind of conception, in the following terms: “The tenor of the cases suggests that it is now regarded as ‘unfair’ or ‘inequitable’ for a state to make material changes in the business environment that prevailed when the investor committed itself to its investment.”<sup>312</sup> The Claimant itself did accept the view that things cannot remain unaltered.

351. Indeed, in its Reply, El Paso stated that:

“Claimant does not call into question Argentina’s right to change its laws or regulations. It has never been Claimant’s position that the BIT imposes an absolute obligation not to alter the regulatory framework.”<sup>313</sup>

adding however that

“... [i]t is certainly foreseeable that a government will adapt the regulatory framework to the needs of the country. But the complete alteration of the regulatory framework in a manner that does not reasonably protect existing capital investments promoted by the government necessarily frustrates the legitimate expectations of investors.”<sup>314</sup>

352. In other words, the Tribunal cannot follow the line of cases in which fair and equitable treatment was viewed as implying the stability of the legal and business framework. Economic and legal life is by nature evolutionary.

353. Some of the specific claims of El Paso show that, if pushed to its logical consequences, this conception of FET cannot be tenable. In its Reply, the Claimant asserted the following claims:

“Claimant seeks compensation for BIT violations resulting from the abrogation and repudiation by Argentina of approximately 12 key rights that were granted to investors (such as Claimant) under the Electricity Law, the Energy Regulatory Framework, the Hydrocarbon Regulatory Framework, and the Concessions, which include:

- a uniform Spot Price for sales of electricity to the WEM that reflect the economic costs of the system;
- the payment by electricity distributors of a uniform energy price plus transmission costs sufficient to cover the prevailing Spot Price;

- electricity distribution tariffs payable by end users that reflect the full cost of the energy they purchase in the WEM;
- variable costs of production (VCPs) based upon reference prices of fuel that reflect their undistorted market prices;
- natural gas distribution tariffs calculated in Dollars and natural gas distribution tariff adjustments in Dollars;
- market-driven electricity and natural gas wellhead prices;
- capacity payments during 90 hours a week of US$ 10 per megawatt per hour (i.e., US$ 900 per week per MW);
- the right to export crude oil without prior government consent;
- exports of hydrocarbons exempt from any existing or future fees, duties, rights or withholdings, and no taxes, whether federal, provincial or municipal, on CAPSA's production of liquid hydrocarbons;
- the commitment of the GOA to give 12 months' prior notice before imposing restrictions on crude oil exports. In the event such restrictions are imposed, producers are entitled to receive, in respect of each production unit, a price not lower than that of crude oil in similar conditions;
- the right of hydrocarbon producers to freely sell their production and the right to freely dispose of the percentage of foreign exchange sale proceeds set forth in the relevant contract, bidding or renegotiation document, set at 70%; and
- the right to enter into electricity and hydrocarbon sale contracts with distributors, large users, marketers and refiners, and freely agree contractual terms, including price and currency."<sup>315</sup>

354. Suffice it here to take two examples to understand why it is inconceivable that a foreign investor would benefit forever, because there is a BIT, of “capacity payments during 90 hours a week of US$ 10 per megawatt per hour.” In the same manner, can it really be seriously contended, as the Claimant does, that the latter benefits from an internationally protected right that variable costs of production (VCPs) would be based upon reference prices for fuel that reflect their undistorted market prices, and that that right was violated because “Resolution SE 240/2003 excluded from the VPC used to determine the spot market price the cost paid by generators using more expensive liquid fuels”?<sup>316</sup>
355. The Tribunal, for its part, is inclined to accept the overwhelming jurisdictional trend mentioned above, which considers that the concept of fair and equitable treatment must be analysed with due consideration of the legitimate expectations of the Parties, but it will elaborate on the interpretation to be given to such a statement. If legitimate expectations of the foreign investors are to be taken into account at all, it has to be stressed that of course all the elements that the investors would like to rely on in order to maximise their benefits, if they are indeed expectations, cannot be considered legitimate and reasonable. The Tribunal will thus endeavour to specify what it thinks can be viewed as legitimate and reasonable expectations.

(i) The Linkage of Fair and Equitable Treatment with Objective Legitimate and Reasonable Expectations of Foreign Investors

356. On the one hand, if this Tribunal indeed agrees that FET can be linked to foreign investors’ legitimate and reasonable expectations, it insists, on the other hand, that these expectations, as well as their violation, have to be examined objectively. It must be emphasised that, as aptly stated by the CMS Annulment Committee,

“[a]lthough legitimate expectations might arise by reason of a course of dealing between the investor and the host State, these are not, as such, legal obligations, though they may be relevant to the application of the fair and equitable treatment clause contained in the BIT.”<sup>317</sup>

The Tribunal considers that the notion of “legitimate expectations” is an objective concept, that it is the result of a balancing of interests and rights, and that it varies according to the context.

(a) Legitimate Expectations Can Be Breached even in the Absence of Subjective Bad Faith of the State

357. This means, firstly, that the Tribunal considers that a violation can be found even if there is a mere objective disregard of the rights enjoyed by the investor under the FET standard, and that such a violation does not require subjective bad faith on the part of the State. This approach of the Tribunal has been followed in several earlier arbitral awards.

In Loewen, the tribunal clearly explained this point:

“Neither State practice, the decisions of international tribunals nor the opinion of commentators support the view that bad faith or malicious intention is an essential element of unfair and inequitable treatment or denial of justice amounting to a breach of international justice. Manifest injustice in the sense of a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends a sense of judicial propriety is enough, even if one applies the interpretation according to its terms.”<sup>318</sup>

Likewise, in CMS, the tribunal said:

“The Tribunal believes this is an objective requirement unrelated to whether the Respondent has had any deliberate intention or bad faith in adopting the measures in question. Of course, such intention and bad faith can aggravate the situation but are not an essential element of the standard.”<sup>319</sup>

This analysis was also followed in LG&E, where the tribunal declared that it was “not convinced that bad faith or something comparable would ever be necessary to find a violation of fair and equitable treatment.”<sup>320</sup>

(b) Legitimate Expectations Result from a Confrontation of the Objective Expectations of Investors and the Right of the State to Regulate

358. This means also, secondly, that legitimate expectations cannot be solely the subjective expectations of the investor, but have to correspond to the objective expectations than can be deduced from the circumstances and with due regard to the rights of the State. In other words, a balance should be established between the legitimate expectation of the foreign investor to make a fair return on its investment and the right of the host State to regulate its economy in the public interest. The Saluka tribunal insisted on this necessary equilibrium and concluded:

“In order to determine whether frustration of the foreign investor’s expectations was justified and reasonable, the host State’s legitimate right subsequently to regulate domestic matters in the public interest must be taken into consideration as well.”<sup>321</sup> ... “a foreign investor protected by the Treaty may in any case properly expect that the [Government] implements its policies bona fide by conduct that is, as far as it affects the investor’s investment, reasonably justifiable by public policies and that such conduct does not violate the requirements of consistency, transparency, even-handedness and non-discrimination.”<sup>322</sup>

In other words, an interpretation of the fair and equitable treatment standard in the light of the object and purpose of the BIT may not exclusively rely on the interests of foreign investors. The Tribunal refers here to the father of the ICSID Convention who had said that:

“The purpose of the Convention is to promote private foreign investment by improving the investment climate for investors and States alike. The drafters have taken great care to make it a balanced instrument -serving the interests of the host States as well as investors.”<sup>323</sup>

(c) Legitimate Expectations Necessarily Vary with the Circumstances

359. Moreover, according to this Tribunal, legitimate expectations necessarily vary with the surrounding circumstances, as stated in Noble Ventures, Inc. v. Romania, where the tribunal explained that:

“Although in this respect Art. II(2)(a) mirrors standard clauses in BITs and other international instruments and courts and tribunals have been concerned with violations of fair and equitable treatment standards, the question whether those standards have been violated has to be considered in the light of the circumstances of each case.”<sup>324</sup>

360. It has thus been recognised that legitimate expectations might differ between an economy in transition such as that of Ukraine and a more developed one. As the tribunal in Generation Ukraine v. Ukraine pointed out:

“The Claimant was attracted to the Ukraine because of the possibility of earning a rate of return on its capital in significant excess to the other investment opportunities in more developed economies. The Claimant thus invested in the Ukraine on notice of both the prospects and the potential pitfalls.”<sup>325</sup>

361. It was also observed by a tribunal that an investor cannot pretend to have legitimate expectations of stability of environmental regulations in a State such as California, where concern for the protection of the environment and of sustainable development are high:

“Methanex entered a political economy in which it was widely known, if not notorious, that governmental environmental and health protection institutions at the federal and state level, operating under the vigilant eyes of the media, interested corporations, non-governmental organizations and a politically active electorate, continuously monitored the use and impact of chemical compounds and commonly prohibited or restricted the use of some of those compounds for environmental and/or health reasons. Indeed, the very market for MTBE in the United States was the result of precisely this regulatory process. Methanex appreciated that the process of regulation in the United States involved wide participation of industry groups, non-governmental organizations, academics and other individuals, many of these actors deploying lobbyists. Methanex itself deployed lobbyists. Mr Wright, Methanex's witness, described himself as the government relations officer of the company ... Methanex entered the United States market aware of and actively participating in this process. It did not enter the United States market because of special representations made to it.”<sup>326</sup>

362. More recently, the tribunal in Continental insisted on the importance of taking account of circumstances when evaluating a violation of FET:

“ ... the content of the obligation incumbent upon the host State to treat a foreign investor in a fair and equitable manner, even when applicable ‘at all times’ as specified in Art. II(2)(a) of the BIT, varies in part depending on the circumstances in which the standard is invoked: the concept of fairness being inherently related to keeping justice in variable factual contexts.”<sup>327</sup>

363. It is this Tribunal's view that, if the circumstances change completely, any reasonable investor should expect that the law also would drastically change. It is reasonable to foresee that a small change in circumstances might entail minor changes in the law, while a complete change might entail major changes in the law. This has been underscored by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal in Starrett:

“... investors in Iran, like investors in all other countries, have to assume a risk that the country might experience strikes, lock-outs, disturbances, changes of the economic and political system and even revolution. That any of these risks materialized does not necessarily mean that property rights affected by such events can be deemed to have been taken.”<sup>328</sup>

364. In sum, the Tribunal considers that FET is linked to the objective reasonable legitimate expectations of the investors and that these have to be evaluated considering all circumstances. As a consequence, the legitimate expectations of a foreign investor can only be examined by having due regard to the general proposition that the State should not unreasonably modify the legal framework or modify it in contradiction with a specific commitment not to do so, as will be shown below.

(ii) The Definition of Fair and Equitable Treatment

(a) Fair and Equitable Treatment Implies that there Is No Unreasonable or Unjustified Modification of the Legal Framework<sup>329</sup>

365. A preliminary point to be emphasised by the Tribunal is that, despite the standard reference to “the stability of the legal and business framework,” this cannot mean that when concluding a BIT a State gives any guaranty to foreigners concerning its economic health and the maintenance of the economic conditions for business prevailing at the time of the investment. This Tribunal shares the views of the tribunal in Saluka, which stated that

“ ... while it subscribes to the general thrust of these and similar statements [referring to the stability of the business and legal framework], it may be that, if their terms were to be taken too literally, they would impose upon host States obligations which would be inappropriate and unrealistic.”<sup>330</sup>

366. Firstly, economic stability cannot be a legitimate expectation of any economic actor, as stated quite clearly at the beginning of the last century by the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ), whose dictum still rings true today:

“No enterprise – least of all a commercial or transport enterprise, the success of which is dependent on the fluctuating level of prices and rates – can escape from the changes and hazards resulting from general economic conditions. Some industries may be able to make large

<sup>329</sup> See Christoph Schreuer, for whom the FET “is not absolute and does not amount to a requirement for the host state to freeze its legal system for the investor’s benefit. A general stabilization requirement would go beyond what the investor can legitimately expect. It is clear that a reasonable evolution of the host state’s law is part of the environment with which investors must contend.” “Fair and Equitable Treatment in Arbitral Practice”, 6, Journal of World Investment & Trade, 357, at 374 (2005).

profits during a period of general prosperity, or else by taking advantage of a treaty of commerce or of an alteration in customs duties; but they are also exposed to the danger of ruin or extinction if circumstances change.”<sup>331</sup>

367. Secondly, it is inconceivable that any State would accept that, because it has entered into BITs, it can no longer modify pieces of legislation which might have a negative impact on foreign investors, in order to deal with modified economic conditions and must guarantee absolute legal stability.

368. In the Tribunal’s understanding, FET cannot be designed to ensure the immutability of the legal order, the economic world and the social universe and play the role assumed by stabilisation clauses specifically granted to foreign investors with whom the State has signed investment agreements. The same approach was followed recently by the ICSID tribunal in Parkerings:

“It is each State’s undeniable right and privilege to exercise its sovereign legislative power. A State has the right to enact, modify or cancel a law at its own discretion. Save for the existence of an agreement, in the form of a stabilisation clause or otherwise, there is nothing objectionable about the amendment brought to the regulatory framework existing at the time an investor made its investment.”<sup>332</sup>

369. It will be noted, that in the two cases mentioned earlier (in §§ 345-346), the reference to the Preamble said that its object and purpose was to maintain “a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources;” however, in determining what these purposes implied for the interpretation of FET, the tribunals in these two cases only retained the first purpose, in order to conclude that a stable legal and business environment is an essential element of fair and equitable treatment, without taking into account the goal that any State has to pursue as well, which is to guarantee to its population maximum effective use of its economic resources.

370. The idea that the foreign investor is not protected against reasonable changes was also put forward by the tribunal in the Argentinian case Continental, where it was stated that “the fair and equitable standard is aimed at assuring that the normal law-abiding conduct of the business activity by the foreign investor is not hampered without good reasons by the host government and other authorities.”<sup>333</sup>

371. The State has to be able to make the reasonable changes called for by the circumstances and cannot be considered to have accepted a freeze on the evolution of its legal system. This has indeed been acknowledged by the tribunal in CMS, but mainly as a general statement of principle with no legal practical consequences on the settlement of the case:

“It is not a question of whether the legal framework might need to be frozen as it can always evolve and be adapted to changing circumstances, but neither is it a question of whether the framework can be dispensed with altogether when specific commitments to the contrary have been made. The law of foreign investment and its protection has been developed with the specific objective of avoiding such adverse legal effects.”<sup>334</sup>

The same point concerning a State’s regulatory power was made in Enron, where the tribunal noted “that the stabilisation requirement does not mean the freezing of the legal system or the disappearance of the regulatory power of the State.”<sup>335</sup>

372. Under a FET clause, a foreign investor can expect that the rules will not be changed without justification of an economic, social or other nature. Conversely, it is unthinkable that a State could make a general commitment to all foreign investors never to change its legislation whatever the circumstances, and it would be unreasonable for an investor to rely on such a freeze. This point was also made by the tribunal in Continental:

“ ... it would be unconscionable for a country to promise not to change its legislation as time and needs change, or even more to tie its hands by such a kind of stipulation in case a crisis of any type or origin arose. Such an implication as to stability in the BIT’s Preamble would be contrary to an effective interpretation of the Treaty; reliance on such an implication by a foreign investor would be misplaced and, indeed, unreasonable.”<sup>336</sup>

373. In other words, fair and equitable treatment is a standard entailing reasonableness and proportionality. It ensures basically that the foreign investor is not unjustly treated, with due regard to all surrounding circumstances. FET is a means to guarantee justice to foreign investors.<sup>337</sup>

374. There can be no legitimate expectation for anyone that the legal framework will remain unchanged in the face of an extremely severe economic crisis. No reasonable investor can have such an expectation unless very specific commitments have been made towards it or unless the alteration of the legal framework is total.

(b) Fair and Equitable Treatment Implies that there Is No Modification of the Legal Framework when Contrary Specific Commitments Have Been Made towards the Investor

375. A reasonable general regulation can be considered a violation of the FET standard if it violates a specific commitment towards the investor. The Tribunal considers that a special commitment by the State towards an investor provides the latter with a certain protection against changes in the legislation, but it needs to discuss more thoroughly the concept of “specific commitments.” In the Tribunal’s view, no general definition of what constitutes a specific commitment can be given, as all depends on the circumstances. However, it seems that two types of commitments might be considered “specific”: those specific as to their addressee and those specific regarding their object and purpose.

<sup>337</sup> The same idea is expressed in PSEG Global, Inc., The North American Coal Corporation, and Konya Ingin Elektrik Uretim ve Ticaret Limited Sirketi v. Republic of Turkey, [hereinafter PSEG], (ICSID Case No. ARB/02/5), Award of 19 January 2007, § 239: “Because the role of fair and equitable treatment changes from case to case, it is sometimes not as precise as would be desirable. Yet, it clearly does allow for justice to be done in the absence of the more traditional breaches of international law standards.”

376. First, in order to prevent a change in regulations being applied to an investor or certain behaviour of the State, there can indeed exist specific commitments directly made to the investor – for example in a contract or in a letter of intent, or even through a specific promise in a person-to-person business meeting – and not simply general statements in treaties or legislation which, because of their nature of general regulations, can evolve. The important aspect of the commitment is not so much that it is legally binding – which usually gives rise to some sort of responsibility if it is violated without a need to refer to FET – but that it contains a specific commitment directly made to the investor, on which the latter has relied.
377. Second, a commitment can be considered specific if its precise object was to give a real guarantee of stability to the investor. Usually general texts cannot contain such commitments, as there is no guarantee that they will not be modified in due course. However, a reiteration of the same type of commitment in different types of general statements could, considering the circumstances, amount to a specific behaviour of the State, the object and purpose of which is to give the investor a guarantee on which it can justifiably rely.<sup>338</sup>
378. The tribunal in Continental addressed the question of what can be considered a special commitment giving “reasonable legitimate expectations” to the foreign investor with care and insight. It insisted on “the specificity of the undertaking” that can give rise to reasonable legal expectations, and for that purpose distinguished:<sup>339</sup>

- Political statements which can – “regrettably but notoriously” says the tribunal – create no legal expectations;

<sup>338</sup> These two aspects seem to have been implicitly taken into account in Continental, supra note 150, where the tribunal examined both general legislation and contractual commitments, both capable of giving rise to some expectations, the force of which would depend on the circumstances.

- general legislative statements which “engender reduced expectations;”
- contractual undertakings by governments which can create more legitimate expectations and “deserve clearly more scrutiny,” as “they generate as a rule legal rights and therefore expectations of compliance.” But even there, the tribunal says, whether the FET standard has been violated will depend on “the context, reasons and effect” of the unilateral modification.

379. The Tribunal will follow the same logic for deciding whether El Paso can be considered to have had legitimate expectations that the Regulatory Frameworks for oil and electricity would not be modified during the full course of its investment. It considers that special commitments have to be carefully analysed as a coherent behaviour from the State, the purpose of which was to have the foreign investor expect that it would be protected against overly drastic changes.

F. THE TRIBUNAL’S APPLICATION OF THE FAIR AND EQUITABLE TREATMENT STANDARD TO THE FACTS OF THE CASE

380. Before the end of the 1990s, the Argentinian economy was mainly State-owned or -controlled: in the Electricity Sector, thermal and hydroelectric generating facilities, transmission lines and the most important electricity distribution utilities were all controlled by State-owned companies; and in the Oil and Gas Sector, approximately 95% of the exploration and production of crude oil and gas were carried out by Yacimientos Petrolíferos Fiscales (YPF), a State-owned company. This scheme was modified at the end of the 1990s, in both sectors, to deregulate the market and to attract foreign investors. The legal framework adopted at the end of the 1990s in both sectors was modified during the Argentinian economic crisis. It is precisely the measures adopted then by Argentina that are impugned by the Claimant as a breach of its right to fair and equitable treatment under the BIT.

1. The Parties’ Positions

(i) The Violation of the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard by the

Measures Enacted in the Electricity Sector

381. The Electricity Sector was reorganised in 1989. In that Sector, as stated in the Request for Arbitration,

“[g]eneration was reorganized as a competitive market, in which independent generators, such as CAPEX and Costanera, could sell the power that they produce both in the spot market and under bilateral contracts in the term market.”<sup>340</sup>

The Claimant explained that “[a] competitive market known as the Wholesale Electricity Market (the WEM) was established so that generators could sell the power that they produced.”<sup>341</sup> This did not mean, however, that the Government which, before the structural reforms of the electricity market in the 1990s, owned and operated the generation, transmission and distribution sectors in a vertically integrated organisation, did not keep some important regulatory powers in such a sensitive sector. The existence of these powers is duly acknowledged by El Paso in its Memorial:

“The structure of the Electricity Regulatory Framework was established through three interrelated agencies. The first agency is the Secretariat of Energy (“SE”), a governmental body with authority to issue rules and regulations to implement the Electricity Regulatory Framework. The SE governs the technical and economic dispatch of the WEM. It also sets the Seasonal Prices for the distribution companies based on calculations made by CAMMESA.

Second, the scheduling and physical dispatch of the generating units and management of the WEM is carried out by CAMMESA, an entity that was intended to be quasi-independent from the Government (although the Energy Secretariat always maintained veto power over CAMMESA) and represents all agents of the WEM.

Third, the Ente Nacional Regulador de la Electricidad (“ENRE”) was created as an independent governmental body of the GOA with both regulatory and jurisdictional power over the power industry. These last two bodies were created as part of the new regulatory framework.”<sup>342</sup>

The main features of the electricity market established at the end of the 90s were: payments based on Spot Prices based on variable costs of production (VCP, expressed in dollars), favouring the most efficient actors and payments based on freely negotiated contracts denominated in dollars, plus capacity payments in dollars to induce investors to upgrade the system.

382. The Claimant considers that the changes introduced at the end of 2001 and the beginning of 2002 to cope with the crisis transformed the existing system into a completely different one. This amounted to unfair and inequitable treatment of the economic actors in the electricity market:

“In summary, through several laws, decrees and resolutions, the GOA has severely and unfairly intervened into a competitive market, distorting a previously established set of rules in a manner that interferes with El Paso’s legitimate and reasonable expectations, depriving it of duly acquired rights.”<sup>343</sup>

More specifically, El Paso claims that it had a legitimate expectation that the devaluation would have no effect on the capacity payments:

“Since the Electricity Regulatory Framework set capacity payments in Dollars, and since such capacity payments were designed to encourage investments and ensure adequate levels of generation capacity availability, investors also had legitimate expectations that if a devaluation of the Peso occurred, capacity payments would be kept in Dollars at their original value or, alternatively, adjusted in Pesos proportionally to the devaluation. Since investment costs are essentially and foreseeably incurred in foreign currency, a devaluation of the Peso should not change their Dollar value.”<sup>344</sup>

More generally, El Paso claims that there had been assurances that “the variables impacting its business were not dependent on changes in the foreign exchange policy.”<sup>345</sup>

383. The Respondent insists on the fact that, although deregulated, the electricity market was subject to the State’s regulatory power, as was indeed acknowledged by the Claimant:

“The generation of electric power is a considerably deregulated activity that is carried out within the context of a regulatory structure that has been modified since the creation of the WEM, while the Executive Branch has not assumed any commitment not to amend such regulations.”<sup>346</sup>

As a result, Argentina contends that El Paso had no “right not to have the electric power generation system changed or adjusted, and no right not to be subject to the general pesification of the Argentine economy.”<sup>347</sup> According to the GOA, El Paso “cannot invoke a right not to have WEM regulations changed because that was an intrinsic characteristic of the sector.”<sup>348</sup> To illustrate this statement, it has indicated in its Counter-Memorial that, from their creation to the enactment of the Emergency Law in January 2002, the procedures in the WEM had already been modified many times. According to Argentina:

“Since the enactment of the Electricity Law in 1991, the Energy Department Secretary issued several resolutions that modified the WEM operation. For instance, the Energy Department modified the available capacity payment in 1992 and the method to calculate the spot price in 1995, among many other amendments. In 2001, before the crisis, the Argentine Executive Branch issued a presidential decree that also introduced significant changes to the sector.

... In late 2001, when the crisis began, the Procedures had already been modified by the Energy Department 131 times.”<sup>349</sup>

This leads the Respondent to the conclusion that “the legitimate expectations of any investor entering the market had to include the true possibility of changes and amendments to the Procedures.”<sup>350</sup>

(ii) The Violation of the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard by the Measures Enacted in the Oil and Gas Sector

384. In the Oil and Gas Sector, the Claimant explains that, at the end of the 90s, private companies were allowed to conduct operations in new and unexplored areas as well as in those oil fields that had been exploited only by YPF, and could freely own and sell their production, either locally or abroad, due to the abolition of hydrocarbon import/export restrictions and the elimination of duties and withholdings on exports and imports of hydrocarbons guaranteed to them. El Paso complains about some restrictions on exports but mainly about the withholding taxes on exports, relying in particular on Article 3 of Decree 1589/1989 providing that “[e]xports of hydrocarbons shall be exempt from any existing or future fees, duties, rights or withholdings” and on Article 403 of Law 12,161 prescribing that “except for royalties, no other taxes, whether federal, provincial or municipal, shall be imposed on the production of liquid hydrocarbons.” Moreover, the Claimant considers that its right to dollar-denominated purchase and sale agreements was violated by the mandatory pesification at the artificial and confiscatory exchange rate of US$ 1 = 1 Peso.
385. The Respondent, for its part, holds that none of the rights invoked by El Paso existed, and that the oil and gas Framework implied a right of the State to regulate the market in the general public interest. The GOA asserts that there is no right to the non-application of restrictions on oil and gas exports, no right to the non-creation of export duties, and no right for anyone to be excluded from the effects of the pesification of the whole Argentine economy.
386. Concerning the general regulatory power, the Government retained, as it did in the Electricity Sector, some regulatory powers: for example, according to

Article 6 of Decree 1589/1989, it could impose restrictions on crude oil exports, on twelve-month prior notice. It is also provided in the Hydrocarbons Law of 1967 that the concessionaires shall own the oil and gas they extract and may transport, market, industrialise and trade the related derivatives, “in compliance with such regulations as the Executive Branch may issue, on reasonable technical-economic bases that consider the needs of the domestic market and seek to encourage oil and gas exploration and exploitation.”<sup>351</sup>

387. As far as exports are concerned, the Respondent explains that,

“[a]s the primary aim of the oil policy is to supply the Argentine market, oil and gas exports are subject to self-supply, the application of reasonable prices and the Executive Branch’s prior authorization.”<sup>352</sup>

Indeed, Section 6 §4.4 of the Hydrocarbons Law provides:

“The Executive Branch shall allow exporting oil and gas or derivatives not required to satisfy adequately domestic needs, provided that these exports are made at reasonable commercial prices and, in that case, the criteria that shall govern the domestic market operations may be established to allow all producers in the country to participate therein on a rational and equitable basis.”

388. As for withholdings on exports, Argentina explains that whether one looks at the Mining Code or the Hydrocarbons Law applicable to CAPSA’s concessions, or at the Presidential Decree No. 43/91 of 7 January 1991 granting CAPEX its concession, as well as the different regulatory decrees, there was no vested right to tax stabilisation, the State having explicitly retained its fiscal regulation power towards both companies.

389. Finally, as far as pesification is concerned, the Respondent considers that, on the one hand, the crude oil producers and refiners voluntarily adjusted their contracts to the new context and that, on the other hand, and in any case, the Argentinian companies benefited from the pesification process.

2. The Tribunal’s Analysis: General Approach

390. The Tribunal does not doubt that

“[t]he legal rights granted by the Government of Argentina through the Electricity Regulatory Framework, the Hydrocarbons Regulatory Framework and the BIT were very important to El Paso’s decision to invest in Argentina,”<sup>353</sup> but this does not ipso facto grant El Paso a right to have this framework unaltered throughout the years, whatever the economic circumstances. The Claimant does not seem to question the sovereign right of a government to adopt new rules; in its Reply, the Claimant acknowledges that “[o]f course, the Government can alter its laws and regulations at any time in the public interest,”<sup>354</sup> but adds immediately that “there are and must be some limits.”<sup>355</sup> And El Paso indeed finds that Argentina’s measures go beyond the limits authorised by the BIT: in its view, the decisions and regulations in issue did not result from a normal exercise of regulatory powers but, in reality, were measures that brought a radical alteration of key rules, effectively eviscerated the existing regulatory frameworks, and therefore exceeded normal regulatory powers. This emerges, for example, from the following passage in its Memorial: “... the totality of the GOA’s actions has radically changed the regulatory regime so that the electricity generators are forced to suffer the consequences of the Argentine crisis.”<sup>356</sup> But why and on what legal basis should El Paso have been immune from the severe economic crisis faced by Argentina at the end of 2001? The Respondent asserts that it adopted reasonable measures to deal with the serious economic circumstances prevailing at the end of 2001 and insists that, knowing the economic history of Argentina, El Paso could not have had reasonable expectations of guaranteed stability of all the parameters in place when it decided on its investment:

“When the Claimant invested in the oil and electric power industries in Argentina, it knew that such economy was under development and that it had a long history of growth cycles followed by serious crises. Investing in these types of economies permits to obtain higher profits than in stabler economies, but there are also higher risks. The Claimant was aware of these advantages and risks.”<sup>357</sup>

<sup>355</sup> Ibid., See also ibid., § 570: “Claimant does not call into question Argentina’s right to change its laws or regulations. It has never been Claimant’s position that the BIT imposes an absolute obligation not to alter the regulatory framework.”

The Claimant mentions that, in order to promote investments in the Electricity Sector and to explain the Regulatory Framework, the Government had organised road shows, conferences and seminars to explain the main features of the Framework and to give assurance to investors that their rights would be protected.

391. The Tribunal will try to ascertain what El Paso could reasonably have expected when it decided to invest in Argentina and whether there were any commitments on the part of that State not to change the basic tenets of the Regulatory Frameworks put in place.
392. At the beginning of the 1990s, the GOA aggressively targeted foreign investors and conducted several road shows in the United States, Europe and Southeast Asia to promote privatisation; US investors were the focal points of these trips. The Claimant asserts that strong legal value should be attached to such unilateral declarations of Argentina, comparing them to those made by France in the Nuclear Tests cases<sup>358</sup> between Australia and New Zealand, on the one hand, and France, on the other, where France in her pleadings, had presented unilateral declarations before the World Court and the ICJ had concluded that these declarations created binding obligations for France. It is the Tribunal’s view, however, that what is involved here are two totally different types of unilateral declarations – one made before the highest judicial body in the world, the other in commercial meetings – and that no lesson can be drawn from the Nuclear Tests cases to give legal weight to investment-promoting road shows. In the Tribunal’s view, such political and commercial incitements cannot be equated with commitments capable of creating reasonable expectations protected by the international mechanism of the BIT.

393. The Tribunal will next consider the position of the Claimant, which has laid much emphasis on legal or political representations made to foreign investors and attesting to the good intentions of the GOA regarding the stability of its regulations. Statements contained in Argentina's legislation or made by the President of the Republic as the country's highest authority were relied on by the Claimant, especially:

- the preamble of Decree No. 1589/1989, which stated that the Decree had been enacted "to set clear and definitive rules that guarantee the legal stability for the contractual arrangements in the hydrocarbon sector;"

- the message of Carlos Menem, President of the Republic, made jointly with the Minister of Economy, Domingo Cavallo, delivered at the National Congress on 13 June 1991 regarding the Electricity Regulatory Framework Law. This message asserts that the enactment of the Electricity Law "give[s] the required legal certainty to the process of transformation of the electricity sector, thus preventing the ancient lack of stability of the rules of the game."

394. The Tribunal however cannot consider that any rule or even clear commitment embodied in a general piece of legislation or regulation – as in Decree No. 1589/1989 – is in itself a special commitment towards the foreign investors,<sup>359</sup> as such a conclusion would again immobilise the legal order and prevent any adaptation to circumstances. These items might only raise reduced expectations which do not guarantee complete stability and have to be analysed in relation to other undertakings and with due regard to all circumstances.

395. Moreover, a declaration made by the President of the Republic clearly must be viewed by everyone as a political statement, and this Tribunal is aware, as is every individual, of the limited confidence that can be given to such political statements in all countries of the world. It might well be that these representations contributed to inducing potential investors to invest in the sectors concerned, as many of them – including El Paso – actually did. But it is one thing to be induced by political proposals to make an economic decision, and another thing to be able to rely on these proposals to claim legal guarantees.

396. The Tribunal does not consider that the GOA made a specific commitment to foreign investors not to modify the existing framework, which was designed to attract them. It seems uncontested that the Executive was endowed with broad regulatory powers over the Electricity Sector and the Oil and Gas Sector.
397. In the Electricity Sector, El Paso complains about the changes introduced in the WEM. The question is whether it had a legitimate expectation that such changes would never occur. The Argentinian Electric Power Sector is regulated by Laws Nos. 15,336 and 24,065 (Electricity Law), as well as by the administrative orders based thereon. According to Sections 35 and 36 of the Electricity Law, the Secretary of the Energy Department is in charge of regulating the WEM.<sup>360</sup> The Tribunal notes that Presidential Decree No. 186/95, Section 6, established that “the agents and participants of the wholesale electric market (WEM) shall operate pursuant to the regulations issued for such purpose by the Energy Department.”<sup>361</sup> As a consequence, it is clear that the Secretary of the Energy Department Secretary could introduce changes in the functioning of the WEM.
398. In other words, it is the Tribunal’s view that the legitimate expectations of any investor entering the energy market had to include the real possibility of reasonable changes and amendments to the procedures governing the WEM.
399. The same can be said of the Oil and Gas Sector. Section 6 of the Hydrocarbons Law of 1967 provided that concessionaires shall own the oil and gas they extract and may transport, market, industrialise and trade the related derivatives, “in compliance with such regulations as the Executive Branch may issue, on reasonable technical-economic bases that consider the needs of the domestic market and seek to encourage oil and gas exploration and exploitation.” In order to meet these objectives, the Government may use any relevant tool: as asserted by the Respondent, “[t]he self-supply at reasonable prices may therefore be subject to established export quotas, export duties or other instruments that the Government may deem appropriate for the circumstances undergone by the country.”<sup>362</sup>

400. It is therefore also the view of the Tribunal that the legitimate expectations of any investor entering the oil and gas market had to include the real possibility of reasonable changes and amendments in the legal framework, made by the competent authorities within the limits of the powers conferred on them by the law.

401. As a general statement, the Tribunal agrees with the Republic of Argentina that

“[i]solating the foreign investor from the crisis through the ICSID is distorting the nature and purpose of the protection granted by treaties to investors only to turn them into privileged subjects that may appear before such World Bank agency seeking protection against structural crises as the one undergone by the Argentine economy. Bilateral treaties are not good business insurance or a protection against a crisis.”<sup>363</sup>

The same concern was expressed by Professor Ian Brownlie in his Separate Opinion on the Final Award in CME Czech Republic B.V. v. Czech Republic, where he stated:

“It would be strange indeed, if the outcome of acceptance of a bilateral investment treaty took the form of liabilities ‘likely to entail catastrophic repercussions for the livelihood and economic well-being of the population’ ....”<sup>364</sup>

402. The Tribunal will thus consider whether any of the measures complained of by El Paso can be considered as adopted outside the acceptable margin of change that must be taken into account by any investor and therefore be characterised as unfair and inequitable treatment, before considering the issue of a possible violation of the FET standard by the accumulation of all the measures complained of. The question is therefore whether the measures adopted exceeded the normal regulatory powers of the State and violated the legitimate expectations of the Claimant.

3. The Tribunal's Analysis of the Measures Adopted in the Electricity Sector

(i) General Remark

403. It has been stated by the Tribunal that the FET standard can be breached if there is a violation of a special commitment.

404. It is a fact that El Paso never entered into any concession contract with the GOA embodying a stabilisation clause. There is no contractual relationship whatsoever with the State resulting in rights capable of being invoked by El Paso. There was no particular relationship between El Paso and the GOA before this arbitration, and no special commitment on which El Paso could reasonably rely. The legitimate expectations of any investor entering the electric power generation market of Argentina had therefore to include the possibility of changes in the procedures regulating the WEM. The Tribunal will however, for the sake of completeness, also examine whether there were any specific commitments in the concessions granted to CAPEX and CAPSA, of which El Paso was an indirect shareholder.

(ii) Presentation of the Wholesale Electricity Market

405. Power generators obtained their revenues from three main sources: (i) sales to the Spot Market at Spot Prices through the WEM; (ii) sales through the WEM to the Term Market by means of power purchase agreements (PPAs) at contractual prices; and (iii) capacity payments.

406. In the WEM, the price was determined on an hourly basis, taking into consideration the marginal cost of the least efficient generator who was dispatched at any given hour. It was fixed on an hourly basis, taking into account the (marginal) cost of generating one additional megawatt-hour (MWh) to supply such possible increase in the system's demand at that time. This price was known as the Spot Price or Market price, which could undergo significant variations from hour to hour.
407. Electricity distributors may purchase electric power at the Spot Price, but also through a stabilised (or seasonal) price system. With respect to the latter, every quarter, and based on CAMMESA's estimates, the Energy Department established in advance the seasonal energy price applicable to such period. This was the price at which distribution companies would buy in the Spot Market. The differences between both prices (hourly spot and seasonal prices) were accumulated in a special account called the Stabilisation Fund. This system benefited efficient generators since it enabled them to receive larger gross margins (that is, the difference between the Spot Price and the generator's actual variable costs of production (VCP)).

Power generators could also enter into PPAs, in which the price was freely determined. Typically, term contracts were concluded for one year and denominated in dollars.

408. In addition to the price thus received, generators were entitled to "capacity payments" which were designed to encourage investors to expand and upgrade generation facilities. These payments were mainly designed to cover the fixed costs (i.e. investments and financing), since the competitive energy Spot Price system basically only remunerated variable (i.e. operating) costs. Capacity payments were set in dollars because investment costs would essentially and foreseeably be incurred in foreign currency. Originally, these payments were set at 5 US dollars per megawatt/capacity-compensation hour; later on, they doubled and were set at 10 dollars<sup>365</sup> before the impugned measures were taken.

409. On the basis of the Electricity Law, the electricity market was regulated by the Department of Energy. Article 35 of that Law provided:

“The Department of Energy shall determine the rules applicable to the DNDC<sup>366</sup> for the performance of its duties, which shall guarantee the transparency and fairness of decisions, according to the following principles:

b) To dispatch the required demand, based on the acknowledgment of prices of energy and capacity set forth in the following article, to which market players shall expressly commit, in order to be entitled to supply or receive electricity not freely agreed-upon by the parties.”

Article 36 of the Law established uniform Spot Prices for electricity generators:

“The Department of Energy shall issue a resolution containing the economic dispatch rules for energy and capacity transactions included in article 35(b) to be applied by the DNDC. Said rule shall provide that generators be paid such rate in each location of delivery as established by the DNDC for the energy sold by them, which rate shall be the same for every generator and based on the economic cost of the system.”

(iii) Were the Measures Changing the Functioning of the WEM in Breach of the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard?

410. The Claimant considers that the changes introduced at the end of 2001 and at the beginning of 2002 to cope with the crisis transformed the existing deregulated system into a completely different one, amounting to unfair and inequitable treatment of the economic actors in the electricity market.

<sup>366</sup> This is the Argentine Load Dispatch, an agency in the form of a corporation “whose majority shareholding shall be initially held by the Energy Secretariat, and where the various participants in the WEM will be entitled to hold shares.”

411. It has to be clear that the Claimant does not explicitly seek damages due to the devaluation, i.e. the abrogation of the Convertibility Law, but bases its claims on the consequences drawn by the Government from this abrogation in the electricity market: “The alteration of the rules governing the Spot Market cannot be attributed to the repeal of the Convertibility Law.”<sup>367</sup> However, if the issue is examined closely, it appears to the Tribunal that many of the claims are implicitly based on damage caused by devaluation more than by the regulatory measures.

412. For example, caps on Spot Prices for deficit situations have resulted in damage, not because of the cap which was set in pesos – as it always was – but because the pesos thus earned could no longer be converted into dollars at the market rate but had to be converted at the rate of one to one. The Claimant explains this quite clearly in its Memorial:

“The Energy Secretariat has also converted into Pesos, at an artificial rate of US$1 = Arg.$1, caps that are to be placed on the Spot Price when deficits occur due to system failures. Depending on the deficit level, the following caps have been imposed on the price of electricity in hours of unsupplied demand: Arg.$120MW/h, Arg.$170MW/h, Arg.$240MW/h and Arg.$1500MW/h. The Electricity Regulatory Framework set similar values, but in Dollars not Pesos. As a consequence of the conversion of those Dollar values into Pesos at an artificial rate of exchange of US$1 = Arg.$1, the energy payments that a power generator can receive in deficit situations have been reduced to 1/3 of their original value and are artificially low.”<sup>368</sup>

413. The mechanism of setting the Spot Price and the Seasonal Price was also altered, but the Tribunal does not consider that such changes were unfair and inequitable, as the unpaid balances due to the creditors in the electricity market were consolidated and either repaid when the Seasonal Stabilization Fund had funds available or transformed into shares of a new company or bonds payable in energy.

414. The Claimant equally complains about the exclusion of machines using liquid fuels instead of natural gas due to the shortage of the latter. But the Tribunal notes that this measure was decided in the second half of 2003. Therefore, it could not affect El Paso's investment in CAPEX since, a few months before the measure was adopted, the Claimant sold its interest in CAPSA and, consequently, also in CAPEX; and its impact on El Paso's interest in Costanera would have been minimal as that company was sold a month and a half afterwards. Such a minor change cannot amount to a violation of the FET standard.
415. More generally, according to Argentina, the new method for calculating the Spot Price was adopted in order to alleviate the problems raised by the new financial situation resulting from the devaluation:
- “The increase in periodicity, the replacement of the reference price + 15% method for the declaration of each VPC component (and not only the fuel price) and the consideration of the variation in the foreign exchange rate implied higher revenues for generators than the ones that would have been earned with the original mechanism.”<sup>369</sup>
416. In sum, the Tribunal cannot see in the measures taken to adapt the WEM to the new economic circumstances anything but direct consequences of the devaluation, which is not impugned as such by the Claimant, or technical adaptations of a sophisticated pricing system that did not fundamentally change its structure and its functioning. Therefore, the measures adapting the functioning of the WEM cannot be characterised, in isolation, as a violation of the FET standard.

(iv) Was the Change in the Amount of Capacity Payment a Violation of the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard?

417. The Claimant in fact asserts a right to a 10-dollar capacity payment or its equivalent in pesos, stating that such a right was conferred on it by law,<sup>370</sup> and considers therefore that any lower amount would breach the FET standard.
418. As to the capacity payments, they were set in dollars in order to cover capital investment costs that were dollar-denominated. Thus, it can be argued that there was a kind of necessary link between the dollar value or a peso value equivalent to the dollar value, so that the foreign investors, having made their equipment investments and paid for them in dollars, could be guaranteed to recoup their investments. The question therefore is whether the change in value was such as to amount to unfair and inequitable treatment.
419. A first observation that can be made is that, contrary to the Claimant's contention, the law does not provide for capacity payments to be stated in dollars. A second observation is that if the parameters for deciding the level of the capacity payments were indeed provided by the law, no amount was fixed in it, again contrary to what the Claimant contends, and the parameters of reference left a margin of appreciation which has been used by the administration. As an indication of this necessary flexibility, it is possible to quote a Selling Memorandum emanating from the Ministry of Economy, Public Works and Utilities of the Republic of Argentina for the privatisation of the generator Hidroeléctrica Norpatagonica presented by the Claimant in its Exhibits and quoted by the Respondent in its Closing Statement:

“The Secretary of Energy is responsible for setting the capacity payment. The value of capacity has been set at US$ 5 per MW per hour for the period from November 1, 1992 to April 30, 1994. It has been decided to increase the value of capacity to US$ 10 per MW per hour from April 30, 1994 and it currently is expected that the value will remain at this level over the medium term.”<sup>371</sup>

<sup>370</sup> See expert statement by Carlos Bastos to the effect that “... the 10 dollar capacity payment is a computation provided by law.” Hearing Transcript in English, Day 5, p. 1211.

This language is by no means an indication of an immutable value, written in stone.

420. There have been many submissions and exchanges concerning the figure of 10 dollars. The Claimant’s damages expert, LECG, seems to differentiate between what a non-expropriating government could have done and what Argentina has done:

“LECG admits that the Secretary of Energy not only had the authority to modify the amount of the capacity payment but also that, within the framework of the crisis, a non-expropriatory government would have reduced such amount.”

In this respect, LECG stated:

“The changes in relative prices in the economy following the devaluation of the peso would naturally provide an opportunity for a non-expropriatory Government to re-examine the appropriateness of the level of capacity payments.”<sup>372</sup>

Having concluded that a non-expropriatory government would have reduced the levels of capacity payments, LECG affirmed that the “appropriate” level was, in 2002, a little over USD 5.<sup>373</sup> However, there is no evidence showing that this amount is more appropriate than ARS 12 (approximately USD 4). Anyhow, the Claimant’s expert itself confirmed that a capacity payment of USD 5 could not be considered expropriatory. It would thus be difficult to assert that a one-dollar difference would amount to a violation of the FET standard.

421. The Tribunal concludes that in the new economic circumstances, a capacity payment equivalent to 4 dollars was not, in isolation, a violation of the FET standard.
422. In conclusion, none of the measures adopted in the electricity sector is considered by the Tribunal, per se, as a violation of the WEM, nor a violation of FET.

4. The Tribunal's Analysis of the Measures Adopted in the Oil and Gas Sector

(i) Presentation of the Overall Regulation of the Hydrocarbon Sector

423. CAPSA is governed by the Mining Code first passed in 1887 and updated by Law No 12,161 enacted in 1935. CAPEX is governed by Law No. 17,319, the Hydrocarbons Law enacted in 1967, which to date governs all hydrocarbon-related activities that are not subject to the Mining Code. These two laws established the general principles and the legal system applicable to the exploration, exploitation, industrialisation, transportation and trading of oil and gas, before the reforms at the end of the 90s and the new measures adopted during the economic crisis. At the end of the 90s, the oil and gas sector was privatised and liberalised, and the monopoly of the State-owned company ended. Private entities were generally allowed to conduct operations in oil fields and could freely own and sell their production, locally or abroad. This reform, effected by the State Reform Law of 28 August 1989, was mainly enacted through what has come to be known as the “Hydrocarbon Deregulation Decrees,” i.e. Presidential Decrees N° 1055/1989, 1212/1989 and 1589/1989, published in the Official Gazette on 12 October 1989, 14 November 1989 and 4 January 1990.<sup>374</sup> These Decrees allow investors freely to dispose of their hydrocarbons and to export them, within the parameters of Argentina’s legislation. The scope of the rights granted and the extent of the State powers have been hotly disputed between the Parties and will be thoroughly examined by the Tribunal.

(ii) Was the Restriction of the Right to Export Freely a Violation of the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard?

(a) The Extent of the Right to Export Freely

424. The Claimant argued that it had a vested right to dispose freely of its hydrocarbon production, including the right to export freely liquid hydrocarbons. This right has been provided for in three Deregulation Decrees, more precisely in Article 15 of Presidential Decree No. 1055/89, Articles 4 and 9 of Presidential Decree No. 1212/89, and Article 5 of Presidential Decree No. 1589/89.

425. Argentina, on the other hand, explains that

“[t]his free availability provided for by the Deregulation Decrees entailed setting aside the policy implemented by the mid-80s according to which the Argentine Government (through YPF) was the only producer enjoying the free availability of crude oil and the other producers were obliged to sell their whole production to the state.”<sup>375</sup>

According to the GOA, there is no absolute right freely to export hydrocarbons, as such exports are subject to restrictions by the Government in accordance with Article 377 of the Mining Code and Article 6 of the Hydrocarbons Law.

426. The Tribunal will examine successively the possible entitlement of the two Argentinian companies of which El Paso was a shareholder to a vested right of free availability of hydrocarbons.

427. As far as CAPSA is concerned, this right of free availability was first stated in Law No. 12,161, incorporated into the Mining Code in 1935 and into the three Deregulation Decrees mentioned above, none of which could be incorporated as contractual rights in the mining concession granted to CAPSA before 1925. This right of free availability appears not to have been considered as unlimited. Section 377 of the Mining Code expressly provides that the Executive Branch may restrict or ban fluid oil and gas exports. Also, section 6 of the Hydrocarbons Law provides that:

“Permit holders and concessionaires shall be the owners of any hydrocarbons extracted by them and, as a result, they may transport, sell and industrialize them, as well as sell their by-products, in accordance with the regulations enacted by the Executive Branch, based on reasonable technical and economic considerations which shall bear in mind the best interest of the domestic market and attempt to promote the exploration and exploitation of hydrocarbons.

During periods in which the national production of liquid hydrocarbons is not enough to meet domestic needs, the use in the country of all available hydrocarbons of national origin shall be mandatory, except in cases where it is not convenient due to sufficient technical reasons. As a result, the new refineries or extensions shall adapt to the rational use of national oils.

If during such a period the Executive Branch sets the prices for selling crude oil in the domestic market, such prices shall be equal to those set for the relevant state-owned company, but not lower than the price levels for imported oils of similar characteristics. Where the prices of imported oils significantly increase due to special circumstances, they shall not be taken into consideration when fixing the sales price in the domestic market and, in that case, they may be set on the basis of the actual exploitation costs of the state-owned company, such amortization as may be technically appropriate, and a reasonable interest rate on the updated and depreciated investments made by such state-owned company. If the executive sets the prices for by-products, they shall be consistent with the oil prices calculated on the basis of the above criteria.

The Executive Branch shall allow the export of hydrocarbons or by-products which are not required for properly satisfying domestic needs, provided that such exports are carried out at reasonable commercial prices. In such case, it may establish the criteria that shall govern transactions in the domestic market, in order to allow all of the country's producers to participate in it in a reasonable and equitable manner.

The natural gas produced may be used, first, to satisfy the needs characteristic of the exploitation of the fields from which it is extracted and of other fields in the area, whether or not they belong to the concessionaire and in pursuance of the provisions of section 31. Any state-owned company providing public gas distribution services shall be given preference in the acquisition, within acceptable terms, of the amounts remaining after the abovementioned use at agreed-upon prices which may ensure a fair return on the relevant investment, bearing in mind the specific characteristics and conditions of the field.

With the approval of the enforcement authority, the concessionaire may decide on the destination and terms of use of the gas not employed in the manner indicated above.

The sale and distribution of gaseous hydrocarbons shall be subject to the regulations enacted by the Argentine Executive Branch,”<sup>376</sup>

428. As far as CAPEX is concerned, the concession of Agua del Cajón was granted by Presidential Decree No. 43/91 in January 1991. Regarding free availability, Article 6 of that Decree establishes the following:

“The concession holder shall have the free availability of hydrocarbons produced in such area, pursuant to the provisions of Articles 6 and 94 of Law No. 17,319, Article 15 of Presidential Decree No. 1055/89, and Articles 5 and 6 of Presidential Decree No. 1589/89, the terms of which are incorporated to this concession.”<sup>377</sup>

429. In other words, the Hydrocarbons Law and the Deregulation Decrees apply to CAPSA as general legislation and to CAPEX as contractual commitments. Before considering whether this entails a difference in the conclusions to be reached by the Tribunal relating to the claimed violations of El Paso’s rights, the Tribunal considers it necessary to analyse the content of the rules that were incorporated in CAPEX’s concession.

Article 6 of Law 17,319 of 1967<sup>378</sup> prescribes:

“Permit holders and concessionaires shall have the ownership of the hydrocarbon which they produce, and consequently, they may transport, market and refine the same and market the products manufactured therefrom, subject to such reglamentation as may be dictated by the Executive Power upon reasonable technical and economic bases, in the benefit of the domestic market and of stimulating the exploration and exploitation of hydrocarbons.

The Executive Branch shall allow exporting oil and gas or derivatives not required to satisfy adequately domestic needs, provided that these exports are made at reasonable commercial prices and, in that case, the criteria that shall govern the domestic market operations may be established to allow all producers in the country to participate therein on a rational and equitable basis.”

The objective of satisfying the country’s need for hydrocarbons explains why Article 6 grants free disposal of the oil and gas in Argentina but, on the contrary, calls for an authorisation in case of exportation.

430. Article 15 of Presidential Decree No. 1055/89 provides that:

“Free availability of the hydrocarbons ... will be governed by the following rules:

a) They may be freely commercialized both in the domestic and foreign market within the framework of the rules in force.”<sup>379</sup>

Article 6 of Presidential Decree No. 1589/89 states that:

“... Concerning export restrictions. If the Executive Branch were to establish restrictions on exports of crude oil and by-products, Article 6 of Law N° 17,319 shall apply, by virtue of which producers, refiners and exporters, shall be entitled to receive per unit of production a value that is not lower than the one of petroleum and by-products of similar condition.”

The conclusion to be drawn from a reading of the rules incorporated in the CAPEX concession is that no absolute right of free availability existed but, rather, a right contingent on limitations that could be decided by the Government.

431. The Tribunal therefore concludes that CAPSA – of which El Paso was an indirect shareholder – had a right to the free disposal of its hydrocarbons recognised by law, while CAPEX – of which El Paso was also an indirect shareholder – had a vested right to the free disposal of its hydrocarbons, including the right to export freely, incorporated in its concession agreement, both within the framework of the rules in force. It cannot be denied that the regulatory framework in force included the Argentine Mining Code and the Hydrocarbons Law, which expressly provided for the possibility of limiting or prohibiting hydrocarbon exports to satisfy domestic needs.

(b) Has the Right to Export Freely Been Violated?

432. Were these rights to free disposal, respectively granted to CAPSA by law and to CAPEX by contract, violated by Argentina’s measures? It is the Tribunal’s view that the rights arising from a concession must be clearly distinguished from the rights flowing from the regulatory framework applicable to a concession.
433. Concerning CAPSA, in the Tribunal’s view, the right to export freely that was granted by law was not unrestricted. As any right, it was subject to reasonable restrictions decided by the Government for reasons of public interest, for example in order to satisfy the domestic market. This was provided for by Article 377 of the Mining Code of 1887, incorporated in Law 12,161 of 1 April 1935, applicable to CAPSA’s concessions:

“The Executive Branch may restrict or ban the import or export of fluid oil and gas when, in urgency cases, this is advisable for public interests reasons, which shall be reported, when appropriate, to Congress.”<sup>380</sup>

434. The Hydrocarbons Law No 17,319 of 30 June 1967 also ensured the power of the Government to regulate the Hydrocarbon Sector in all aspects. Article 2 provides:

“Activities related to exploration, exploitation, manufacturing, transportation and marketing of hydrocarbons shall be entrusted to State-owned enterprises, and private or mixed enterprises, in accordance with the rulings of this present law and with any relevant relementation that may be dictated by the Executive power.”

Nothing is said in this Article about free disposal, but there is a clear insistence on the fact that all activities entrusted to concessionaires in the field of hydrocarbons will be subject to that Law and to any future executive regulation.

Along the same line, Article 3 of Law No 17,319 prescribes:

“The National Executive Power shall establish the national policy of the activities mentioned in the preceding Article 2, in deference to the primordial objective of satisfying the country’s need for hydrocarbons with the output from the country’s natural deposits.”

435. According to this Tribunal, it is only if the regulations were unreasonable, for example not adapted to the purpose of satisfying the national market, that a violation could be found. The Tribunal, however, does not consider it necessary to examine the issue of the reasonableness of the measures adopted, for reasons that will shortly be explained.
436. The question which has to be asked is whether a somewhat different analysis is needed of the right to export freely granted by Argentina to CAPEX in the concession agreement. The answer must be in the negative, as the texts granting powers of regulation to the State were also incorporated in the concession.
437. Irrespective of whether the right of free disposal was granted by law or incorporated in a contract, the Tribunal does not deem it necessary to examine the question of a possible violation of the FET standard, since the restrictions on crude oil export were effective for less than 60 days.<sup>381</sup> More precisely, during the first half of 2002, it was noted that there might be problems to supply the domestic market with hydrocarbons. Therefore, the President of Argentina issued Presidential Decree No. 867/2002 on 23 May 2002 adopting certain measures to regulate the export of oil and gas:

“It declared the emergency in the oil and gas supply in the whole Argentine territory until 30 September 2002”<sup>382</sup>

“It empowered the Energy Department ... to determine the domestic production volume of crude oil and LPG that should be used to supply the domestic market.”<sup>383</sup>

Moreover, in June 2002, the Energy Department imposed certain limitations on the export of crude oil to ensure domestic supply.<sup>384</sup> Twenty-three days afterwards, these measures became more flexible.<sup>385</sup> Less than sixty days after the measures had been taken, on 25 July 2002, they were abrogated.<sup>386</sup> The limitations on the exports of crude oil lasted only from 30 May to 31 July 2002.

438. The Tribunal notes – and this confirms its analysis – that in the recitals of Presidential Decree No. 867/02, in which a state of emergency regarding hydrocarbons supply was declared throughout the Republic of Argentina, the following was stated:

“This measure does not impair the essence of the right to freely dispose, i.e. the right of producers to dispose of the product at freely agreed upon price, in the domestic and foreign market, and in the latter case, in compliance with the provisions of Article 6 of Law No. 17,319.”

439. The Tribunal considers that the short-term restrictions on the right freely to export hydrocarbons cannot amount, in isolation, to a violation of the FET standard.

(iii) Was the Enactment of Export Withholding Taxes a Breach of the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard?

440. To find a violation of the FET standard under this heading, the following conditions should be fulfilled: first, the Tribunal must have jurisdiction over tax matters; second, there must be a violation of a right belonging to the Claimant which could result from a confiscatory law providing for an excessive tax, or a violation of a contractual right to tax exemption on exports, in other words of a tax stabilisation clause if such a clause is found to have been granted to the foreign investor.
441. There have been extensive discussions between the Parties on the question of whether or not a stabilisation clause was included in the concession contracts of CAPSA and CAPEX.
442. As far as CAPSA's concessions are concerned, two legislative provisions concerning taxes and withholdings were cited by both Parties, Law N° 12,161 of 1935 integrated into the Mining Code and Article 3 of Decree N° 1589/1989. First, Article 403 of Law N° 12,161 establishes that “[e]xcept for royalties, no other tax, whether federal, provincial or municipal, shall be imposed on the production of liquid hydrocarbons.” Second, Article 3 of Decree N° 1589/89, which applies to all hydrocarbons concessions, provides that “[e]xports and imports of hydrocarbons and by-products are authorised, which shall be exempt from all existing or future duties, rights or withholdings.”
443. The Parties hold diverging views on different aspects of these rules. First, they disagree on the applicability of Article 403 to CAPSA: for Argentina, “this Section was added to the Argentine Mining Code several years after CAPSA was granted the Concessions;”<sup>387</sup> for the Claimant, “Article 403 was immediately applicable to the Concession under Argentine law as soon as it was enacted.”<sup>388</sup> The Parties also have different views on the interpretation of Article 403, the Claimant saying that it was all-encompassing and included exports, the Respondent contending that the reference to “production” has to be interpreted as relating only to production, thus excluding exports. The Parties further disagree on the consequence of Article 403: for the Claimant, it is a vested right which could not be interfered with, for Argentina it is a right given by law which can be modified by a new legislative enactment. More specifically, the Claimant says that “[o]nce Article 403 was enacted, it took on the status of a vested right that has express legal recognition under Argentine law, and since it is still in full force and effect,<sup>389</sup> it is binding under Argentine law and the BIT.”<sup>390</sup> The Respondent, on the contrary, considers that, “like any other law within the legal framework, this regulation can be repealed or modified with no responsibility attached.”<sup>391</sup> Moreover, the Parties’ views diverge on the applicability of Article 3 of Decree N° 1589/1989, taking the same positions as those adopted in relation to Article 403.

444. The debate was even more heated over the CAPEX concession: that concession was governed by Article 7 of Presidential Decree No. 43/91 and Article 3 of Presidential Decree No. 1589/89. The question discussed was whether the right in question was or was not incorporated into CAPEX’s concession and, thereby, transformed into a contractual right.

Article 7 of Presidential Decree No. 43/91 granting the concession to CAPEX provides:

“The concession holder shall be subject to the general tax laws that may be applicable to it, and such holders shall not be subject to any provisions that may impose taxes, discriminately or specifically on the person, legal condition or activity of the holders or the property devoted to the execution of the relevant tasks.”<sup>392</sup>

---

<sup>389</sup> Law No. 17,319 (“Hydrocarbons Law”), 30 June 1967. Claimant’s Exhibit No. 45 and Respondent’s Exhibit RA 10. Article 8 expressly maintains in full force the provisions of the Mining Code and provides: “Mining properties of hydrocarbons already in the possession of private enterprises before the date of enforcement of this law shall continue to be governed by the rules whereby they were awarded, without prejudice to the rights of the holders thereof to claim the benefits of this present law, in accordance with the procedure which shall be established by the Executive Power.”

445. According to Argentina, contrary to what happened with the right to export freely, where legislative and executive rules were incorporated into CAPEX's concession, there is no incorporation of the right to be exempt of tax withholding granted to the investors by Article 3 of Presidential Decree No. 1589/89, quoted in paragraph 442. On the contrary, according to the Claimant, this right, like the right freely to dispose of hydrocarbons, was incorporated into the concession.
446. There were also sophisticated discussions on the hierarchy of the different Argentinian enactments, but the Tribunal does not consider it necessary to summarise them, as this would unduly complicate the Award by considerations which are of no relevance for the outcome of the case.
447. There is certainly, in the Tribunal's view, room for discussion of these divergences between the Parties. However, considering the restrictions on the Tribunal's jurisdiction in relation to tax matters and the Tribunal's previous conclusion that the tax withholdings did not amount to an indirect expropriation, it is clear that the Tribunal cannot entertain a claim that the establishment of tax withholdings – whether or not in conformity with a right deriving from a law, a decree or a contract – amounts to a violation of the FET standard. It does not, therefore, have to settle the controversy between the Claimant and the Respondent over the extent of the commitment not to raise any new taxes allegedly received by El Paso from Argentina; in particular, it does not need to rule on the interpretation of Article 403 of the Mining Code,<sup>393</sup> nor does it have to decide whether, when mentioning the “exploitation of liquid hydrocarbons mines,” it also refers to the export of the same. Nor does it need to rule on the incorporation of a general tax exemption into the different concessions.
448. Decisions on these controversies might have been necessary in the absence of Article XII of the BIT. But the violation of a contractual commitment not to impose new taxes, in other words the breach of a fiscal stabilisation clause, could only be discussed, unless the amount of the tax were totally confiscatory, as a violation of the FET standard and not as an expropriation. If considered as a breach of the FET standard, the impugned measures are excluded from the Tribunal's analysis by virtue of Article XII. It is therefore unnecessary and even outside the Tribunal's jurisdiction to settle the controversy between the Parties over the existence of fiscal stabilisation clauses or over any other issue raised by this claim, such as the possible invocation by El Paso of a fiscal stabilisation clause benefiting not directly El Paso but companies whose shares are indirectly owned by it.

<sup>393</sup> It can be recalled that Article 403 of the Mining Code provides that except for royalties “no other tax, whether federal, provincial or municipal, shall be imposed on the exploitation of liquid hydrocarbons mines.”

449. In sum, even if the enactment of the withholding tax were in violation of the FET standard, either because of its excessively high amount or because of a contractual commitment not to levy such taxes, the Tribunal would have no jurisdiction over such claim.

5. The Tribunal's Analysis of the Pesification in Both Sectors

450. Another claim presented by El Paso results from the compulsory pesification of the contracts entered into by the Argentinian companies. On 3 February 2002, Decree No. 214/2002 provided the "conversion into PESOS of all obligations to pay money ... expressed in dollars" at one to one.
451. Before the crisis, some elements were valued in Argentine pesos and some in dollars, and the system was workable as the peso was pegged to the dollar through a currency board. With the devaluation, a huge imbalance would have been introduced into the economy if the Government had omitted to decide what it did decide, i.e. pesification. According to the pesification scheme, despite the devaluation, the existing contracts in dollars had to be transformed into contracts in pesos, at the rate of 1 peso to 1 dollar. What happened was a mandatory de-dollarisation, i.e. a pesification of contracts, deposits, debts and utility tariffs. It appears that, from an economic viewpoint, if this had not been done after a devaluation of the peso of more than 300%, the prices of electricity and energy would have increased and been multiplied by three. The question here is whether the pesification of contracts amounted to a violation of the FET standard.

452. In fact, CAPEX and CAPSA re-negotiated their contracts but El Paso, as their indirect shareholder, considers that they did not do this freely and that the fact that they were forced by the Government to participate in such re-negotiation amounts to a violation of the FET due to El Paso.
453. The Tribunal wishes to state at the outset that many contracts were excluded from pesification and that it is important to give a full picture of the contracts affected by pesification.
454. First, the emergency decree which was enacted for the application of the Emergency Law excluded from pesification the agreements for the export of fuel power and associated electric power.<sup>394</sup> Generators of electricity, with export agreements, among them Costanera in which El Paso was a stockholder, were favoured by such a measure because, while many of their costs decreased in terms of US dollars, as a result of the devaluation, their revenues remained in dollars. In this regard, El Paso stated, in its Memorial, that Costanera was better able to withstand the impact of the crisis due to its agreements with Brazil to export electricity, under which it received payments for capacity and the sale of electricity in US dollars.<sup>395</sup>
455. Second, the pesification of the whole economy did not affect oil and gas exports. In early 2002, the Executive Branch excluded from pesification the export agreements entered into, including oil and gas export agreements.<sup>396</sup> Therefore, so far as the Argentinian companies were concerned, the agreements to export CAPSA's crude oil and CAPEX's LPG were not pesified. In the same manner, the agreements to transport natural gas for export were not affected by pesification. In April 2002, the President of Argentina excluded such agreements from pesification.<sup>397</sup>

456. The narrow impact of pesification on the Argentinian companies is acknowledged by El Paso. In the Claimant's Reply, it is stated that:

“Claimant's hydrocarbon claim does not relate in any way to the pesification of oil and gas exports, which in any case were not affected by pesification but only by the imposition of export withholdings. Claimant's claim involves the pesification of CAPSA's and CAPEX domestic supply agreements and SERVICIOS' Gas Processing Agreement.”<sup>398</sup>

As far as the pesified contracts are concerned, the Respondent has insisted on the fact that “the pesification of credits and debts in US dollars provided for in the Emergency Law was advantageous for the Argentine Companies.”<sup>399</sup>

Interestingly, the same conclusion can be drawn from the report of the Claimant's expert, LECG, in which the following table can be found:

(in million USD)	CAPSA	Capex	COSTANERA
Pesified credits	14.3	3.1	-
Pesified debts	48.0	15.7	58.4
Benefits of pesification	27.8	7.5	29.6
Prejudice of pesification	5.4	1.2	-
Net Benefit	22.4	6.3	29.6

457. Both the Respondent and the Claimant being in agreement on the fact that the pesification did not damage the Argentinian companies, CAPSA, CAPEX and Costanera, the Tribunal cannot see any basis on which a breach of the FET standard could be asserted in relation to these companies.

458. In conclusion, it appears from the file that pesification has not caused any damage to the Argentinian companies of which El Paso was a shareholder and cannot therefore be considered as having created a damage of which the Claimant can complain. The Tribunal thus considers that no claim for violation of the FET standard can be derived from the mandatory pesification of contracts.

6. The Tribunal's Analysis of the Cumulative Effect of those Measures

459. The fact that none of the measures analysed – that were not outside the Tribunal's jurisdiction or not excluded from consideration by the Tribunal because they did not result in any significant damage – were regarded, in isolation, as violations of the FET standard does not prevent the Tribunal from taking an overall view of the situation and to analyse the consequences of the general behaviour of Argentina. In order to obtain an overall picture, the Tribunal has to revisit the causes of El Paso's sale of shares. It has already held that the transaction was not an automatic and unavoidable consequence of Argentina's measures, and this prevented it from finding an expropriation. But this does not mean, of course, that the impugned measures did not play an important role in the sale; and the Tribunal will thus successively assess the overall role of Argentina's measures in the sale of El Paso's shares and their overall impact with regard to the FET standard.

(i) The Overall Role of the Argentinian Measures in the Sale of El Paso's Shares

460. The Parties' positions regarding expropriation have been described in paragraphs 270-271. Argentina has invoked a series of circumstances which, in its view, caused the sale of El Paso shares, to which El Paso has objected. In particular, El Paso has objected to Argentina's argument that the sale was not a consequence of the GOA's measures but the result of a decision taken by El Paso's parent company to concentrate on its "core business," divesting assets not related to that business, in order to increase liquidity.<sup>400</sup> Before the Tribunal addresses the Parties diverging views on the causes of the sale of El Paso, it has first to deal with the existence and exact nature of this sale which has been the subject of heated controversies between the Parties.

(a) The sale by El Paso of its interest in the Argentinian Companies

461. As previously mentioned (supra, §§ 115-116), El Paso sold the shares in the Argentinian companies in two steps, one in June 2003 and another in October 2003.
462. The first transaction occurred in June 2003 and concerned the sale of El Paso's interests in CAPSA, CAPEX and SERVICIOS. In exchange for the sale of its interest in SERVICIOS, El Paso received a 6.3% interest in GASODUCTO, allegedly worth about Arg. $19.3 million, and US$ 29 million in cash, but had to pay US$ 20 million to exercise the option to purchase SERVICIOS' lease for the LPG plant ultimately transferred to CAPEX.<sup>401</sup> The second transaction occurred in October 2003 and concerned the sale of El Paso's equity interest in Costanera for a cash price of US$ 4.5 million.<sup>402</sup>
463. The Claimant's indirect participating interest in CAPSA was sold under a Share Purchase Agreement dated 23 June 2003 by the Claimant, as Seller, to Wild S.A., as Purchaser.<sup>403</sup> By virtue of this Agreement, the Claimant sold 100% of the share capital it owned in EPEC Energy Argentina S.A. ("EPEC Argentina"). EPEC Argentina in turn owned 45% of the share capital of CAPSA, the remaining 55% being held by the Purchaser. Since CAPSA owned 60.3% of CAPEX' share capital, by selling its entire participation in EPEC Argentina, the Claimant sold all of its investments in CAPSA and CAPEX to Wild, for a total price of US$ 24 million (Section 2.1 of the Share Purchase Agreement).
464. The Claimant's indirect controlling interest in SERVICIOS was sold under a Share Exchange Agreement made by and between Agua del Cajón (Cayman) Company and Capex International Business Company ("CIBCO") on 23 June 2003.<sup>404</sup> The Agreement in question records in its relevant part the sale by

The Agreement provides that, after the Closing, CIBCO would pay an “Adjustment Amount” to Agua del Cajón to adjust for the difference between the Working Capital of SERVICIOS and the Working Capital of Triunion (Section 2.4 (a) of the Share Exchange Agreement).

465. Under a Termination and Set-Off Agreement dated 23 June 2003 by and between Bank Boston N.A., Servicios El Paso S.r.l., Fleet National Bank, El Paso Corporation and Agua del Cajón (Cayman) Company,<sup>405</sup> SERVICIOS, as Lessee under a Lease Agreement with Bank Boston, Lessor, covering the lease of the LPG plant operated by SERVICIOS, agreed to pay to Bank Boston an Agreed Purchase Price equal to US$ 11,797,910.85 (Section 1.2 of the Termination and Set-Off Agreement), plus VAT, to exercise the purchase option on the lease for the LPG plant and to terminate the Lease Agreement.<sup>406</sup>
466. The Claimant’s indirect participating interest in Costanera was sold under a Share Purchase Agreement dated 3 October 2003 by and between KLT Power Inc., as Seller, and Empresa Nacional de Electricidad S.A., as Purchaser.<sup>407</sup> Under the Agreement, Seller sold to Purchaser its participating interest in Costanera, equal to 11% of the latter’s capital stock, and its 100% participation in KLT Power (Bermuda) Ltd., the latter owning a 1.35% participation in Costanera (Recital B, C and D and Sections 1.1 and 2.1 of the Share Purchase Agreement). 467. The respondent State argued that the Claimant had not sufficiently proven the interests it claimed in the Argentinian companies.<sup>408</sup> In its Reply, the Claimant submitted arguments and additional evidence in response to Argentina's contestation.<sup>409</sup> This response and the related evidence were amended and integrated by the Claimant in its submissions on 5 December 2006.<sup>410</sup>
468. In its Rejoinder, the respondent State emphasised the differences between the Claimant's description of its participating interests in the Argentinian companies in the original Reply as compared to the amended Reply,<sup>411</sup> concluding that "El Paso failed to adequately prove its participating interest in the companies for which it claims."<sup>412</sup>
469. Having carefully reviewed and analysed the evidence proffered by the Claimant and the respondent State's critical arguments, the Tribunal is satisfied that adequate proof has been given by the Claimant evidencing the level of its direct participating interest in the Argentinian companies or, when such interest was held indirectly, the corporate relations with the seller of an interest in the Argentinian companies under each transaction. The analysis has included the Claimant's corporate relation to EPEC Argentina,<sup>413</sup> Agua del Cajón and Triunion<sup>414</sup> and KLT Power.<sup>415</sup> It has not considered GASODUCTO since the sales of El Paso's shares in 2003 did not involve this Company. These corporate relations at the time of the sales are evidenced by the Officer Certificate filed by the Claimant on 5 December 2006 (Exhibit No. 223).
470. As to Agua del Cajón and Triunion, the Officer Certificate shows that Claimant:

<sup>413</sup> As per the Agreement described in § 646.

<sup>414</sup> As per the Agreement described in §§ 647-648.

- (a) owned a 100% participation in Agua del Cajón through the intermediary of four 100% owned subsidiaries and that Agua del Cajón owned 99.92% of SERVICIOS (Annex A);
- (b) owned a 23.2% interest in Triunion through the intermediary of two 100% owned subsidiaries and another 38.4% interest in Triunion through the intermediary of three 100% owned subsidiaries (Annexes B and C).

471. The Officer Certificate does not record the corporate relations between the Claimant and EPEC Argentina, on the one side, and KLT Power, on the other. However, the following may be noted in that regard. The Claimant's 100% ownership of EPEC Argentina is indicated in the Share Purchase Agreement between the Claimant and Wild,<sup>416</sup> and is confirmed in documents annexed to such Agreement. It is only logical to assume that the Purchaser had satisfied itself of the 100% ownership by the Claimant of 100% of EPEC Argentina shares since this was the object of its purchase. No further inquiry appears therefore necessary. Ownership of KLT Power was acquired by the Claimant under a Stock Purchase and Sale Agreement made on 2 July 1998 by and between KLT Inc., as Seller, and the Claimant, as Purchaser.<sup>417</sup> The Respondent has not challenged the Claimant's 100% ownership of KLT Power.

472. According to the Claimant and its accounting expert, the result of the various transactions on 23 June 2003, including the value of the 6.3% interest acquired in GASODUCTO, allegedly worth about US$ 19.3 million, was "a net divestiture price for El Paso of US$ 28.2 million in current dollars."<sup>418</sup> According to the Respondent, there are doubts regarding the amount of the sale transactions in June 2003. Specifically, GOA has contended that the party that bought 45% of the Claimant's indirect interest in CAPSA had sold in that month 6.5% of that company's share for an amount exceeding 400% of the price agreed for the purchase by Wild.<sup>419</sup> The level and value of the participating interest acquired in GASODUCTO are uncertain,<sup>420</sup> while the amount paid by El Paso as a termination fee in the context of the sale of the interest in SERVICIOS, allegedly equal to US$ 20 million, is not proven.<sup>421</sup> Argentina's contentions will be examined below.

473. The Respondent's doubts regarding the sale price of the participating interest in CAPSA are based on the circumstance that the purchaser had sold to Deutsche Bank, during the same month, 6.5 % of CAPSA's shares for a price in pesos equivalent to US$ 14.1 million at the then current exchange rate. That price was 400% higher than that of US$ 24 million reported by the Claimant, which should have been US$ 94.4 million.<sup>422</sup>
474. The Claimant does not deny the existence of a second transaction between EPEC Argentina and Deutsche Bank nor the price agreed on for the 6.5% of CAPSA's shares, but contends that the operation was not a sales transaction but one of collateral financing and a contingent loan arrangement.<sup>423</sup> The 6.5% of CAPSA's shares was received by Deutsche Bank as a security in the context of the financing of the purchase price to be paid by Wild of EPEC Argentina, and the price thereof was fixed without any reference to the market value of those shares at the time of the transfer.<sup>424</sup> Such financing consisted in (i) a loan to Wild for a US$ 14 million from EPEC Argentina (which, in turn, had received the same amount as a loan from Deutsche Bank), and (ii) a direct loan of US$ 10 million from Deutsche Bank to Wild.<sup>425</sup>
475. According to the Claimant, the repayment of the loan of US$ 14 million was secured by: (i) a put option granted by Wild to Deutsche Bank to transfer to Wild 6.5% of CAPSA's shares at a price equal to the amount of the loan; (ii) the assignment to Deutsche Bank by EPEC Argentina of its rights against Wild under the loan agreement pursuant to which it had reloaned to Wild the US$ 14 million; (iii) the endorsement to Deutsche Bank of the promissory note evidencing the amount of the EPEC Loan Agreement with Wild; (iv) the assignment by Wild of 55% of CAPSA's shares to a trust created for the benefit of Deutsche Bank; and (v) a pledge on 51% of CAPSA's shares for the benefit of Deutsche Bank, to become effective upon notice to CAPSA of the transfer of the 6.5% of its shares to Deutsche Bank.<sup>426</sup>

476. Having thoroughly analysed the various documents to which the Parties have made reference as evidence in support of their respective positions, the Tribunal is satisfied that the transaction regarding the 6.5% of CAPSA's shares is in the nature of a financing arrangement to secure to the purchaser Wild a portion of the amount of the purchase price equivalent to US$ 14 million. This conclusion is based on the following reasons.
477. The contract by which Wild acquired 6.5% of CAPSA's shares from EPEC Argentina, dated 23 June 2003, is a contract of sale and rightly was so recorded in a number of documents in the file of these proceedings on which the GOA relies to assert that a sale was the true nature of this transaction. However, in the Tribunal's view, this contract must not be considered in isolation but as part and parcel of a more complex contractual arrangement consisting of various instruments, including but not limited to the contract in question.
478. As a matter of fact, that contract was part of a Trust Agreement dated 23 June 2003 between Wild, the Claimant, Deutsche Bank, EPEC Argentina and First Trust of New York.<sup>427</sup> Following the Respondent's request of 23 March 2007 and the Tribunal's direction of 26 March 2007, by letter of 9 April 2007, the Claimant filed the exhibits to the Trust Agreement, all dated 23 June 2003.
479. The exhibits so filed consist of:

- Exhibit A, Contrato de Compraventa de Acciones between EPEC Argentina, as seller, and Wild, as purchaser, relating to the sale of the 6.5% of CAPSA's shares;
- Exhibit B, Model of Contrato de Préstamo between EPEC Argentina and Wild (the "EPEC Loan Agreement"), whereby EPEC Argentina loans to Wild an amount equivalent to US$ 14 million to finance the payment of a portion of the purchase price to be paid by Wild under the Share Purchase Agreement relating to the sale by the Claimant of 100% of EPEC Argentina's shares;
- Exhibit C, Model of Contrato de Cesión de Derechos y Asunción de Deuda Eventual between EPEC Argentina, as assignee, Wild, as Assigned Debtor, First Trust New York as Assignor, and Deutsche Bank.

480. The content of these various agreements is consistent with the Claimant's description of the various guarantees provided to Deutsche Bank for the repayment by Wild of the loan of US$ 14 million.<sup>428</sup>

481. Were the transaction relating to 6.5% of CAPSA's shares just a sale between EPEC Argentina and Deutsche Bank, there would be no reasonable explanation why: (i) all the contractual instruments described above were concluded on the same day as the Share Purchase Agreement between EPEC Argentina and Wild, 23 June 2003; (ii) in addition to the sale of 6.5% of CAPSA's shares, Deutsche Bank had to be guaranteed by a number of securities of different nature and extent; (iii) the amount for the exercise of the put option granted to Deutsche Bank under the Trust Agreement was the same as the amount paid by Deutsche Bank for 6.5% of CAPSA's shares, i.e. US$ 14 million, thus protecting Deutsche Bank from any risk that at the time of exercise of the put option the value of the 6.5% of CAPSA's shares would be lower than US$ 14 million while permitting Deutsche Bank to retain said shares should their value increase in the meantime above US$ 14 million;<sup>429</sup> (iv) clauses 1.1. and 1.3 of the Contrato de Compraventa de Acciones<sup>430</sup> provide for a condition (“condición resolutoria”) by virtue of which this contract would become null and void if Wild did not pay to the Claimant, by a fixed date, the price for the purchase of 100% of EPEC Argentina’s shares; (v) the 6.5% of CAPSA’s shares sold to Wild were not delivered to the latter but were transferred to First Trust of New York as “Fiduciario,”<sup>431</sup> subject to the “condición resolutoria” mentioned under (iv) above.

482. The foregoing analysis leads the Tribunal to conclude that:

- (a) the transaction between EPEC Argentina and Wild under the Contrato de Compraventa de Acciones was a sales transaction covering 6.5% of CAPSA’s shares, subject to a reversionary right in favour of EPEC Argentina of such shares upon occurrence of the condition subsequently provided therein;
- (b) when viewed not in isolation but as part and parcel of a more complex scheme under the Trust Agreement and all its exhibits, the transaction reveals its true nature as a loan arrangement to secure the financing to Wild of a portion of the purchase price, equal to US$ 14 million, that Wild had to pay to the Claimant for the purchase of 100% of EPEC Argentina’s shares.

483. The respondent State has cast doubt on the percentage of equity interest acquired by El Paso as a result of the transaction regarding SERVICIOS and the value of such interest.<sup>432</sup> For the Claimant’s expert, LECG, the percentage amounts to 6.3% and is worth about US$ 19.3 million according to GASODUCTO financial statements of June 2003.<sup>433</sup>

484. As to the percentage interest acquired in GASODUCTO as a result of the Share Exchange Agreement, the following may be noted. Under that Agreement CIBCO transferred to Agua del Cajón (a 100% subsidiary of the Claimant)

38.4% of Triunion's shares, the latter owning indirectly 21.8% of GASODUCTO's shares.<sup>434</sup> Accordingly, the percentage interest should be 8.4%, as contended by the respondent State, not 6.3%, as indicated by the Claimant. Following the Tribunal's request for clarifications, by letter dated 1 June 2010, Claimant has documented that the interest actually acquired is equal to 6.1%, considering that a portion of the 8.4% interest, equal to 2.3%, was already (indirectly) owned by Claimant through its indirect holding in Capex.<sup>435</sup> Having reviewed Claimant's position and the evidence to which it refers, the Tribunal is satisfied that the percentage acquired in GASODUCTO is equal to 6.1%.

485. As to the value of the participation so acquired in GASODUCTO, the Claimant confirms in its letter of 1 June 2010 that the book value of the 6.1% interest transferred to El Paso, based on GASODUCTO's and Gasoducto del Pacífico (Argentina) S.A.'s 30 June 2003 financial statements, is equal to US$ 19,271,152. Having reviewed the said financial statements,<sup>436</sup> the Tribunal accepts that the value of GASODUCTO's shares acquired indirectly by the Claimant, equal to 6.1%, is equal to US$ 19,271,152.

486. The Claimant alleges that it paid US$ 20 million for the termination of the lease agreement for the LPG plant operated by SERVICIOS.<sup>437</sup> According to the GOA, this amount is not proven.<sup>438</sup>

487. Under the Termination and Set-Off Agreement, the price to be paid for the purchase option was US$ 11,797,910.85,<sup>439</sup> to which the value-added-tax for ARS 6.9 million must be added.<sup>440</sup> After converting the amount in ARS into US dollars at the rate of ARS 2.79 for one US dollar prevailing in June 2003, the total is equal to US$ 14,271,029. As indicated in the Claimant's letter of 1

(b) The Argentinian measures were the prevailing reason of the sale

488. The Tribunal shall address the Parties' diverging views regarding the causes of El Paso's sales in 2003 by focusing on two issues which are at the root of the debate, namely, El Paso's liquidity problems since late 2001<sup>443</sup> and that company's "core business" at the time of the sales, since, as alleged by the Respondent and denied by the Claimant, to face its liquidity problems El Paso was led into divesting its "non-core" assets.<sup>444</sup> The Tribunal has already decided that the measures were not the unique cause of El Paso's sale entailing a finding of expropriation; it has now to deal with the Respondent's view that the Argentinian measures did not contribute at all to the decision to sell El Paso's Argentinian assets.

489. The existence of liquidity problems since late 2001 is not denied by El Paso. The 2002 Report filed with the US Security and Exchange Commission (SEC) by El Paso Corporation on 31 March 2003 mentions that:

"In response to industry events, the credit ratings agencies, including Moody's and Standard and Poor's, re-evaluated the ratings of companies involved in energy trading activities. As a result, the ratings of many of the largest participants in the energy trading industry, including us, were downgraded to below investment grade."<sup>445</sup>

<sup>445</sup> 2002 El Paso Report filed with the SEC, supra note 224, p. 33. Respondent's Exhibit RA 79. Emphasis added by the Tribunal. See also Counter-Memorial, §§ 15, 26, 63.

The downgrading of El Paso Corporation's credit ratings had a significant impact on that company's liquidity.

490. The Claimant contends that, in order to meet its liquidity problems, an orderly disposition of certain assets was planned in a time-frame of three to five years but that "the Argentine assets of El Paso were not sold either because they were considered non-core assets or to increase El Paso's Corporation's liquidity."<sup>446</sup> The Tribunal shares this position for the following reasons.

491. First, El Paso's 2002 Report filed with the SEC indicates that several steps had been taken since the last quarter of 2001 "to address the issues affecting us" and that significant progress had been made "to meet the demands on our liquidity and to strengthen our capital structure."<sup>447</sup> The Report lists nine different steps taken for that purpose, among which only one refers to the divestiture of assets, in terms that suggest the orderly disposition of such assets.<sup>448</sup> The 2003 Report filed by El Paso with the SEC enumerates the resources available to El Paso Corporation to increase its liquidity, in addition to the sale of assets (which was therefore only one of the various resources available):

"We rely on cash generated from our internal operations as our primary source of liquidity, as well as available credit facilities, project and bank financing ... and the issuance of long-term debt, preferred securities and equity securities."<sup>449</sup>

It is on record that a large number of assets were divested by El Paso Corporation in 2002-2004, although the divestiture of individual assets apparently did not entail the level of losses experienced by the sale of El Paso's investment in Argentina.<sup>450</sup>

492. Second, the contribution of the sales of its Argentinian assets by El Paso was so marginal (US$ 33 million) as to make it unlikely that the decision to sell in

Argentina was motivated by the liquidity problems of El Paso's parent company. As mentioned by the Claimant, had the liquidity problems been the cause of the divestiture of such assets, El Paso Corporation would have chosen to divest its investments in the power sector in Brazil, worth approximately US$ 2 billion in 2003 (which investments were kept).<sup>451</sup>

493. Third, it is not correct that, as asserted by the Respondent, only non-core business assets were divested in Argentina to meet liquidity problems, while core-business assets were kept.<sup>452</sup> Evidence before the Tribunal shows that core-business assets were also sold by El Paso in July and October 2003. This issue is analysed below based on evidence showing what the core business of El Paso was immediately before the sales of its Argentinian assets.

494. By a News Release of 5 February 2003, El Paso announced its 2003 business plan based upon five key principles:

- “- Preserve and enhance the value of the company's core business
- Exit non-core business quickly, but prudently
- Strengthen and simplify the balance sheet while maximizing liquidity
- Aggressively pursue additional cost reductions
- Continue to work diligently to resolve litigation and regulatory matters

El Paso is committed to:

- Preserving and enhancing the value of its core business – natural gas pipelines, production, midstream and non-merchant power. The company will continue to invest efficiently in these businesses to maintain its leadership positions. The company's capital expenditure plan reflects that commitment with 87 percent of 2003 capital devoted to the pipeline and production businesses.

<sup>452</sup> Counter-Memorial, § 82: “In late 2001, El Paso decided to focus on its core business (natural gas production and transportation) and to sell quickly all the assets not related thereto so as to reduce its debt significantly.” Emphasis by the Respondent. The Respondent relies on two documents to assert that natural gas production and transportation was El Paso's core business in late 2001. The first document (EDGARonline, El Paso Corp., Filing Date, 30 September 2004, Respondent's Exhibit RA 231) mentions that in late 2001 El Paso's focus changed by, i.e., “returning to our core natural gas business,” which does not mean that natural gas was the only core business. The other (an article by Kenneth Betz dated 25 June 2002, Respondent's Exhibit RA 115) does not deal at all with El Paso's core business.

- Exiting non-core business quickly, but prudently..."<sup>453</sup>

495. In its 2002 Report filed with the SEC on 31 March 2003, El Paso, after confirming the above plan, states:

"We will also continue to focus on winding down our non-core business including energy trading and petroleum markets as well as other capital intensive businesses such as liquefied natural gas (LNG) operations."<sup>454</sup>

The Report states that the divestiture plan focused on "those businesses and operations that were not core to our long-term objectives or that were not performing consistently with the expectations we had for them at the time we made the investment."<sup>455</sup>

The Report then indicates the four primary business segments into which El Paso operations are divided: "Pipelines," "Production," "Field Services" and "Merchant Energy," which were all considered to be "strategic business units that provide a variety of energy products and services."

496. The "Production" segment is described by the Report as covering "our natural gas and oil exploration and production activities."<sup>456</sup> The "Merchant Energy" segment consisted in 2002 of three primary divisions: "global power," "petroleum" and "energy trading."<sup>457</sup> The "global power division included ownership and operation of domestic and international power generation facilities," the commercial focus being "to develop projects in which new long-term power purchase agreements allow for an acceptable return on capital."<sup>458</sup>

CAPEX/CAPSA was included in the “global power” division, as shown by the list of power plant projects existing as at 31 December 2002.<sup>459</sup> The Report mentions that “as part of our 2003 Operational and Financial Plan, we have announced the planned sales of some of these power generation assets.”<sup>460</sup> “Petroleum,” as one of the divisions of the “Merchant Energy” segment, presumably covered areas other than those included in the “Production” segment.

497. In the 2003 Report filed with the SEC on 30 September 2004,<sup>461</sup> El Paso’s purpose is described as follows:

“Over this two-year period [2002-2003] we refocused on our natural gas assets and divested or otherwise sold our interest in a significant number of assets,”<sup>462</sup> indicating the sales of CAPSA/CAPEX and COSTANERA in the Section ‘Divestitures,’ under the ‘Merchant Energy’ segment<sup>463</sup> as part of the ‘global power’ division.”

498. El Paso’s “Long Range Plan” was announced after the sale of El Paso’s Argentinian assets had been completed,<sup>464</sup> following the change in the Corporation’s management. This Plan’s objective was to turn El Paso into “a strong natural gas provider.”

499. The above analysis makes it possible to conclude that El Paso’s core business prior to the sales in 2003 comprised natural gas and oil exploration and production activities (the “Production” segment), while the non-core business during the same period included power generation facilities, petroleum markets, energy trading and LNG.

500. Confronting El Paso’s sales of 2003 with the above-defined core- and non-core businesses of El Paso, it may be concluded that:

<sup>464</sup> Press Release, El Paso Corporation, El Paso Corporation Announces Long-Range Plan, 15 December 2003. Respondent’s RA 264.

- (a) the sale of CAPSA, a company mainly engaged in oil exploration and production, was not consistent with the idea of focusing on the core business;
- (b) the sale of CAPEX was also not consistent with the idea of focusing on the core business, to the extent to which that company was engaged, in addition to electric power generation, in natural gas production. Since CAPSA owned a 60.36% interest in CAPEX, the sale by El Paso of the former's shares entailed the sale of its indirect participation in the latter; however, had CAPSA been profitable in 2003, it would have been kept by El Paso in view of its core-business activity, even if this had meant keeping the electric power generation activity of CAPEX (a non-core business but on the same assumption a profitable one), as was done in Brazil;
- (c) the sale of SERVICIOS (a company engaged in LNG production and sale) was consistent with the programme of exiting non-core business;
- (d) the sale of Costanera, a company engaged in the generation and sale of electricity, was consistent with the plan of divesting power generation projects that did not meet expectations;
- (e) keeping PACIFICO (a company engaged in natural gas transportation) and even increasing indirect shareholding in this company on the occasion of the sale of June 2003 was consistent with the programme of preserving and enhancing the value of core business.

501. While the sale of Costanera and SERVICIOS was thus in line with the objective of exiting non-core business, the sale of CAPSA/CAPEX was not. It is therefore to be assumed that such sale was due to other reasons. One such reason can only have been the perceived lack of prospects of recovery from the loss of value suffered by the two companies in 2002 and until the date of their sale. PACIFICO was not sold since it was part of the core business and, not having been economically prejudiced by the GOA measures, was performing consistently with expectations.

502. It is interesting to note that in the 2003 Report filed with the SEC, El Paso defines the year ending on 31 December 2003 as "a year of significant change in our business strategy and our financial conditions.”<sup>465</sup> The Report continues by stating that in 2003:

“We completed the sale of a number of assets and investments including production properties ... Total proceeds from these sales were approximately $3.3 billion;

a. We completed a number of financial transactions that allowed us to maintain our access to needed capital to meet our cash requirements, simplify our capital structure, and eliminate a significant amount of off-balance sheet obligations and preferred securities;

b. We implemented a cost reduction program ...;

c. We completed the Western Energy Settlement which became effective in June 2004, resolving a substantial uncertainty arising from the California energy crisis in 2001; and

d. We announced our Long-Range Plan that, among other things, defines our core business, establishes a timeline for debt reductions, sets a timetable for existing non-core business and assets and sets financial goals for the company.”<sup>466</sup>

This confirms that the sale of assets was just one of various measures taken by El Paso Corporation to meet the problems that had emerged in the preceding period, including the liquidity issues. It is doubtful that the sale of the Argentinian assets, due to the modest price, was intended to contribute to the solution of these problems.

503. The Tribunal has considered the Respondent’s contention that “[i]t was the Claimant’s decision to sell its assets in the country in the worst time of the Argentine crisis, in the need for facing its own global crisis, what caused the damage alleged by El Paso.”<sup>467</sup> It has been mentioned that El Paso Corporation’s policy was based on the orderly disposition of assets. With specific reference to the Argentinian assets, it is on record that El Paso had received an offer to buy part of those assets (the 45% indirect interest in CAPSA/CAPEX) as early as in November 2002, at a price equal to US$ 24 million.<sup>468</sup> El Paso's reply of 21 November 2002 was non-binding and made subject to conditions,<sup>469</sup> which shows that El Paso was not under pressure to sell. The Tribunal shares the Claimant's view that the fact that the sales were made later in 2003, one and a half years after the measures were adopted, is indicative of a prudent decision,<sup>470</sup> aimed at mitigating future damage in the presence of a scenario which, at that time, was far from being predictable.<sup>471</sup>

504. The Tribunal has considered the further contention by the Respondent that there is no official document from which it may be inferred that the sale by El Paso was due to the GOA's measures.<sup>472</sup> The Respondent points to the Reports filed with the SEC by El Paso Corporation for the years 2002 and 2003, which state that the cause of the losses suffered as a result of the sale of its assets in Argentina was the economic crisis, with no mention of the GOA measures.<sup>473</sup> By contrast, concerning the sale of the power generation investments in Australia, the 2003 Report states that the losses were due to regulatory difficulties.<sup>474</sup>
505. Regarding the above contention, it may be noted that the SEC filings by El Paso, although important,<sup>475</sup> do not exhaust the range of circumstances that may be taken into account by the Tribunal to form its judgment. It has been shown that, contrary to the Respondent's assumptions, the sale of the Argentinian assets was neither made to assist in improving El Paso's liquidity and solving other problems; nor did it involve non-core business only. The decision was made at a time when, according to the Claimant's evaluation, the financial conditions of the Argentinian companies (except for PACIFICO) had deteriorated to the extent of a loss of value of about 90% and when "the prospects for the near and mid-term future appeared bleak."<sup>476</sup>

<sup>475</sup> It may be noted that the 2002 Report covers the year preceding the sales of El Paso assets in Argentina, so that its relevance is doubtful. The page of the 2003 Report quoted by the Respondent (Rejoinder, footnotes 31 and 32) contains a chart allegedly recording "our impairment charges and gains and losses on sales of equity investments during 2003, 2002 and 2001," where CAPSA/CAPEX are shown as having been sold in 2002 (at a loss of $262 million) due to "weak economic conditions in Argentina." The reference to a sale of CAPSA/CAPEX in 2002 shows a lack of accuracy in the Report.

506. In conducting its evaluation, the Tribunal has also considered that other energy and utilities companies have divested their investments in Argentina following the enactment of the Respondent's measures,<sup>477</sup> losing approximately 90% of their investment according to the Claimant, although others did not divest their investments while faced with the same economic measures.
507. In the light of the preceding analysis and after due consideration of the Parties' arguments and the evidence in the file, the Tribunal concludes that the GOA measures were, if not the only, certainly the prevailing reason for El Paso's sales in 2003. It remains to determine the consequences to be drawn from that conclusion. This point will be addressed hereafter.
508. The Claimant has asserted that since the GOA measures "forced" it to sell, this was evidence of discriminatory and arbitrary treatment of its investment, in breach of Article II(2)(b) of the BIT which protects the investor if the effect of this kind of measures is to "impair ... the disposal of investments."<sup>478</sup> The Tribunal has already decided that the GOA measures do not amount to discriminatory or arbitrary treatment of El Paso's investment.<sup>479</sup> No discrimination or arbitrariness having been found in the measures taken by the Respondent, no breach of the above-mentioned provision of the BIT can derive from the sales made by El Paso, even if they were in part caused by these measures.
509. Now that it has been found that Argentina's measures can be considered a contributory cause of the losses suffered by El Paso, it remains to be seen whether these measures can, by their cumulative effect, be considered a violation of the FET standard.

(ii) The Overall Cumulative Impact of the Measures with Regard to the Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard

510. According to the Claimant, “[a]n investor will never invest if it expects that the rules of the game will be completely altered in a manner it cannot predict.”<sup>480</sup> It asserts that there were commitments by the GOA that it would not be affected by a new crisis in that country because all the main parameters were either in dollars or linked to the dollar: the electricity Spot Price was connected with the US PPI, adjusted bi-annually (a kind of de facto dollarisation); the VPCs were declared in dollars bi-annually; and the capacity payments were in dollars. According to El Paso, as a foreign company investing money in Argentina’s economy, it relied on the overall setting of the legal framework, which was clearly aimed at protecting the foreign investor from a devaluation of the dollar. These features were of the utmost importance due to the economic history of Argentina.
511. For example, the fact that capacity payments would be in the same currency as the investment, so that they would be immune from devaluation, was a strong incentive to invest in Argentina despite the frequent crises that had occurred throughout the country’s history. The dollar calculation was intended to protect the investor from devaluation. According to Robert L. Perez, an expert witness for the Claimant, the existence of capacity payments made investments in companies such as CAPEX and Costanera attractive to potential investors such as El Paso because they could make the investment, knowing that they would be able to upgrade the plant without the risk of losing their capital costs:

“These capacity payments would be in U.S. Dollars because investors would only be able to capitalize their investment in U.S. Dollar terms (including loans, equity, etc.... since it was highly unlikely that Argentine banks could supply the amounts needed by investors to upgrade facilities. Thus, the declarations of variable production costs and the denomination of capacity payments in U.S. Dollars was significant to potential foreign investors like El Paso. When El Paso made its decision to enter Argentina's electricity sector, it fundamentally relied on the assurance of these capacity payments in assuring that CAPEX would be able to service US Dollar debt and be able to provide a reasonable return to us."<sup>481</sup>

512. The problem, therefore, was not so much whether the capacity payment should be at 4, 5 or 10 dollars; it was the calculation in US dollars that mattered to the foreign investor. But the GOA disregarded the very reason for which capacity payments were created, which was to attract investment to expand capacity by allowing generators to recover their capital expenditures in US dollars, in destroying the link between capacity payments and computation in dollars.
513. In the same manner, based on the assurances generally contained in the Electricity Regulatory Framework, investors such as El Paso could reasonably expect that a devaluation of the peso would not substantially alter the dollar value of Spot Prices.
514. The fact that the contracts were in US dollars could also be viewed as a special commitment towards the companies in which El Paso invested, and the pesification as entailing a violation of freely agreed terms and conditions.
515. Although they may be seen in isolation as reasonable measures to cope with a difficult economic situation, the measures examined can be viewed as cumulative steps which individually do not qualify as violations of FET, as pointed out earlier by the Tribunal, but which amount to a violation if their cumulative effect is considered. It is quite possible to hold that Argentina could pesify, put a cap on the Spot Price, etc., but that a combination of all these measures completely altered the overall framework.
516. According to the Tribunal, this series of measures amounts to a composite act, as suggested by the International Law Commission in its Articles on State

Responsibility (Article 15).<sup>482</sup> Such an analysis is not without precedent. The tribunal in Société Générale, for example, referred to the concept of composite act and stated clearly that acts that are not illegal can become such by accumulation:

“While normally acts will take place at a given point in time independently of their continuing effects, and they might at that point be wrongful or not, it is conceivable also that there might be situations in which each act considered in isolation will not result in a breach of a treaty obligation, but if considered as a part of a series of acts leading in the same direction they could result in a breach at the end of the process of aggregation ...”<sup>483</sup>

517. It cannot be denied that in the matter before this Tribunal the cumulative effect of the measures was a total alteration of the entire legal setup for foreign investments, and that all the different elements and guarantees just mentioned can be analysed as a special commitment of Argentina that such a total alteration would not take place. As stated by the tribunal in LG&E, when evaluating the same events, “here, the Tribunal is of the opinion that Argentina went too far by completely dismantling the very legal framework constructed to attract investors.”<sup>484</sup>

518. The Tribunal considers that, in the same way as one can speak of creeping expropriation, there can also be creeping violations of the FET standard. According to the case-law, a creeping expropriation is a process extending over time and composed of a succession or accumulation of measures which, taken separately, would not have the effect of dispossessing the investor but, when viewed as a whole, do lead to that result. A creeping violation of the FET standard could thus be described as a process extending over time and comprising a succession or an accumulation of measures which, taken separately, would not breach that standard but, when taken together, do lead to such a result.

519. The Tribunal, taking an all-encompassing view of consequences of the measures complained of by El Paso, including the contribution of these measures to its decision to sell its investments in Argentina, concludes that, by their cumulative effect, they amount to a breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard.

G. FULL PROTECTION AND SECURITY

1. The Parties' Positions

520. According to the Claimant, the full protection and security (FPS) provision of the BIT is, like FET, a standard different from and higher than the full protection and security required by international law:

“The duty to provide full protection and security creates an independent treaty obligation that is distinct from a state’s obligation under customary international law.”<sup>485</sup>

The Claimant considers that FPS imposes obligations of due diligence and vigilance on Argentina and is not limited to physical security or the performance of its basic police functions by the State. For the Claimant, the FPS standard is sufficiently broad “to provide protection against the measures taken by the GOA;”<sup>486</sup> and in its view, “by its ordinary meaning, the phrase ‘full protection and security’ must include the ‘full’ security provided through legal and regulatory frameworks, not mere physical security.”<sup>487</sup> As a consequence of this broad interpretation, the Claimant asserts in its Reply that “Argentina, acting in its sovereign capacity, failed to provide full protection and security to El Paso’s investment by, inter alia:

- disregarding and violating numerous key provisions of the Electricity Law;
- transforming the electricity sector from a competitive, market-based system to a fully-regulated industry characterized by government intervention and price manipulation;
- radically altering the Spot Price setting mechanism by creating Spot Price caps and artificially lowering the Maximum Recognized VCP through the market price of various fuels from the setting of the Spot Price and the generators' VCPs that exceeded the VCPs allowed by the Energy Secretariat;
- converting capacity payments from Dollars, as offered by the GOA in the Electricity Regulatory Framework in order to attract investments, to Argentine Pesos at a rate that decreased such payments to 40% of their original value;
- locking generators into frozen and depressed electricity prices by freezing the Seasonal Price at the nominal value in Pesos and failing to fund the Seasonal Stabilization Fund;
- imposing Export Withholdings on crude oil and LPG exports through Article 6 of Law N° 25,561 and Decree N° 310/2002, in violation of the stabilization provisions of the Mining Code and the Hydrocarbon Deregulation Decrees that enjoy legislative status, and the Concessions;
- violating CAPSA's, CAPEX's and COSTANERA's contractual rights by imposing a mandatory conversion of Dollar-denominated energy, LPG, and crude oil term contracts with third parties to Pesos at an artificially-low and confiscatory exchange rate;
- violating SERVICIOS' contractual rights by pesifying its Gas Processing Agreement at an artificially-low exchange rate;
- imposing quotas on LPG and crude oil exports in direct violation of Decrees N° 1589/1989, N° 1055/1989 and N° 1212/1989, which guarantee the right to export freely; and
- coercing CAPSA and CAPEX to renegotiate and enter into new LPG and crude oil supply agreements."<sup>488</sup>

521. According to the Respondent, on the contrary, “like the fair and equitable treatment standard, the protection and security standard relates to the international law minimum standard.”<sup>489</sup> In order to give content to that standard, Argentina contends that:

“In conformity with this interpretation, the protection and security standard is no more than the traditional obligation to protect aliens under international customary law. It is a residual obligation provided for the cases in which the challenged acts may not be in themselves attributed to the Government, but to a third party. In these assumptions, the Government must act diligently to prevent and penalize illegitimate acts by third parties damaging aliens.”<sup>490</sup>

The obligation of due diligence implies a certain number of consequences, among which the most important is that the State authorities are “obliged to protect aliens from acts not attributable to themselves, but stemming from third parties.”<sup>491</sup> In light of this first condition, the Respondent points out that, in the present case, none of the measures challenged by El Paso stems from a third party; all of them were taken by the State itself. Consequently, according to the Respondent, such measures should only be examined in the light of the other standards of the BIT and not under the full protection and security standard.

2. The Tribunal’s Analysis

522. The BIT requires that Argentina provide “full protection and security” to El Paso’s investment.<sup>492</sup> The Tribunal considers that the full protection and security standard is no more than the traditional obligation to protect aliens under international customary law and that it is a residual obligation provided for those cases in which the acts challenged may not in themselves be attributed to the Government, but to a third party. The case-law and commentators generally agree that this standard imposes an obligation of vigilance and due diligence upon the government.<sup>493</sup> The AAPL decision quotes with approval Professor Freeman's definition of due diligence:

"The 'due diligence' is nothing more nor less than the reasonable measures of prevention which a well-administered government could be expected to exercise under similar circumstances."<sup>494</sup>

And in the AMT case, the tribunal explained:

"These treatments of protection and security of investment required by the provisions of the BIT of which AMT is beneficiary must be in conformity with its applicable national laws and must not be any less than those recognized by international law. For the Tribunal, this last requirement is fundamental for the determination of the responsibility of Zaire. It is thus an objective obligation which must not be inferior to the minimum standard of vigilance and of care required by international law."<sup>495</sup>

523. The minimum standard of vigilance and care set by international law comprises a duty of prevention and a duty of repression. A well-established aspect of the international standard of treatment is that States must use "due diligence" to prevent wrongful injuries to the person or property of aliens caused by third parties within their territory, and, if they did not succeed, exercise at least "due diligence" to punish such injuries. If a State fails to exercise due diligence to prevent or punish such injuries, it is responsible for this omission and is liable for the ensuing damage. It should be emphasised that the obligation to show "due diligence" does not mean that the State has to prevent each and every injury. Rather, the obligation is generally understood as requiring that the State take reasonable actions within its power to avoid injury when it is, or should be, aware that there is a risk of injury. The precise degree of care, of what is "reasonable" or "due," depends in part on the circumstances.

Democratic Republic of Congo* (earlier referred to as Republic of Zaire) [hereinafter AMT], (ICSID Case No. ARB/93/1), Award of 21 February 1997, § 6.05; AAPL, supra note 41, § 50. <sup>494</sup> AAPL, supra note 41, § 77.

524. However, El Paso does not complain about a violation by Argentina of an obligation of prevention or repression. In the Tecmed case, the tribunal made the same interpretation as this Tribunal and said the following:

“The Arbitral Tribunal considers that the Claimant has not furnished evidence to prove that the Mexican authorities, regardless of their level, have encouraged, fostered, or contributed their support to the people or groups that conducted the community and political movements against the Landfill ...”<sup>496</sup>

El Paso did not specify or determine the duty to act against a third party that has allegedly been breached by Argentina under the BIT: all the impugned acts that allegedly violate the FPS standard are directly attributable to the GOA and not to any third party. In the present case, none of the measures challenged by El Paso were taken by a third party; they all emanated from the State itself. Consequently, these measures should only be assessed in the light of the other BIT standards and cannot be examined from the angle of full protection and security.

525. The conclusion is that there is no trace of a violation of the full protection and security standard by any of the GOA’s measures impugned by the Claimant.

H. ARTICLE II(2)(c): THE UMBRELLA CLAUSE

526. The so-called umbrella clause contained in Article II(2)(c) provides as follows:

“Each Party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments.”

1. The Parties’ Positions

527. According to the Claimant, the Respondent violated the BIT by failing to observe its obligations under Article II(2)(c).<sup>497</sup> In particular, the breach of some contractual rights of the Argentinian companies was complained of under that provision. The Claimant asserted that under Article II(2)(c) Argentina had assumed an obligation, inter alia:

---

“To respect the terms of the Concessions that provide fiscal stability and not impose in the future either Export Withholdings nor discriminatory taxes.

To respect the right of power generators and hydrocarbon producers, like CAPSA, CAPEX and COSTANERA, to freely sell their production and agree on the terms governing its sale, including price and currency.

To respect the license agreements with gas distribution companies and power distributors to pass through to their tariffs the market price of the gas and electricity they acquire from gas producers and power generators.”<sup>498</sup>

These are all contractual rights belonging to the Argentinian companies, CAPSA, CAPEX and Costanera.

528. The Respondent’s answer can be summarised as follows: According to Argentina, the umbrella clause only applies to investment agreements entered into with foreign investors, not to hydrocarbon concessions granted by the State to national companies. In other words, there are no contractual commitments directly between the Claimant and Argentina, as any such commitments were made to CAPSA and CAPEX via the concessions and are not protected rights under the BIT.<sup>499</sup>

529. In its Reply, the Claimant has added to its initial analysis the idea that even if they are not elevated to the rank of treaty claims under Article II(2)(c), the contractual claims should still be seen as having led to a violation of this provision, as the concessions can be characterised as “investment agreements”:

“Nonetheless, even if Argentina’s characterization of the scope of the Umbrella Clause were correct, which it is not, Argentina’s abrogation

and repudiation of its commitments in the Concessions, the CAPSA Hydrocarbon Regulatory Framework, the Hydrocarbon Regulatory Framework, and the Electricity Regulatory Framework would still violate the Umbrella Clause because each of the Concessions qualifies as an ‘investment agreement’ under the BIT.”<sup>500</sup>

And there follows a list of alleged contractual breaches of these investment agreements:

“The GOA violated the Umbrella Clause by:

- unilaterally interfering in the contracts of private parties (i.e., the electricity and hydrocarbon sale contracts of CAPEX, COSTANERA and CAPSA and SERVICIOS’ Gas Processing Agreement) by decreeing that their price terms be converted from Dollars to Pesos at the artificially low exchange rate of US$ 1 - to - Arg. 1;
- breaching the CAPEX Concession (which had generally incorporated the provisions of Decree N° 1589/1989) and the CAPSA Concessions that benefited from the tax exemption established by Article 403 of the Mining Code by imposing Export Withholdings;
- breaching the license agreements of gas and electricity distributors by pesifying them and abrogating their US price index and US Dollar terms, which had a direct and immediate financial impact on electricity generators.”<sup>501</sup>

530. The Respondent again rejected this line of argument, stating that

“[t]he Argentine Republic did not violate the umbrella clause [because] ... (a) the scope of the umbrella clause is limited to the commitments assumed in an investment agreement; (b) there is no investment agreement in the present case.”<sup>502</sup>

In order to explain why no “investment agreement” was at stake here, Argentina explained that

“CAPSA and CAPEX concessions may never be put at the same level as an investment agreement since:

(a) they were not concluded between Argentina and a foreign investor, but granted by the Argentine Republic to local companies;

(b) they are governed by Argentine law and subject to Argentine courts; and

(c) they do not have any element internationalising it or provision linking them – not even indirectly – to the investment protection system provided for in bilateral investment treaties.”<sup>503</sup>

2. The Tribunal’s Analysis

531. In its Decision on Jurisdiction, the Tribunal rejected the argument that the so-called umbrella clause included in Article II(2)(c) could elevate any contract claim to the level of a treaty claim:

“In other words, the Tribunal, endorsing the interpretation first given to the so-called ‘umbrella clause’ in the Decision SGS v. Pakistan, confirms what it mentioned above, namely, that it has jurisdiction over treaty claims and cannot entertain purely contractual claims, which do not amount to a violation of the standards of protection of the BIT. It adds that, in view of Article VII(1) of the US-Argentina BIT, a violation of an investment agreement entered into by the State as a sovereign and an American national or company is deemed to be also a violation of the Treaty and can thus give rise to a treaty claim.”<sup>504</sup>

532. This means that a contract claim is not transformed into a treaty claim by the umbrella clause, while an “investment agreement” claim can be viewed as a treaty claim by virtue of a combination of Articles VII(1) and II(2)(c): “[m]oreover, Article II, read in conjunction with Article VII(1), also considers as treaty claims the breaches of an investment agreement between Argentina and a national or company of the United States.”<sup>505</sup> In other words, although in general a contract claim is not a treaty claim, the violation of an investment

agreement can be considered a treaty claim as it is an obligation entered into with regard to investments under Article VII(1).

533. The Tribunal has already decided that El Paso has no contract claim based on contracts or licenses (see supra §§ 178-189) and that there is no investment agreement entered into by El Paso (see supra §§ 190-198). As a consequence, the question of their elevation to the level of a treaty claim does not arise.

534. The Tribunal wishes to add that this position finds support in the Annulment Decision in the CMS case.<sup>506</sup> It may be recalled that the ICSID tribunal dealing with that case had concluded in its Award of 12 May 2005 that there was a violation of the so-called umbrella clause included in Article II(2)(c):

“ ... the obligation under the umbrella clause of Article II(2)(c) of the treaty has not been observed by the Respondent to the extent that legal and contractual obligations pertinent to the investment have been breached and have resulted in the violation of the standards of protection under the Treaty.”<sup>507</sup>

In particular, this finding applied to two aspects of the commitments that the claimant CMS considered to have been made by Argentina in its favour, i. e.

“ ... two stabilization clauses contained in the License that have significant effect when it comes to the protection extended to them under the umbrella clause. The first is the obligation undertaken not to freeze the tariff regime or subject it to price controls. The second is the obligation not to alter the basic rules governing the License without TGN’s written consent.”<sup>508</sup>

535. The ad hoc Committee criticised the tribunal’s findings concerning the violation of the umbrella clause, stating that it was “impossible for the reader to follow the reasoning on this point,”<sup>509</sup> and therefore annulled this part of the decision for failure to state reasons. At the same time, it tried to reconstruct the possible reasoning of the Tribunal and, while doing so, gave some hints as to what could, in its view, be the possible meaning of an umbrella clause or, to be

more precise, as to what could not be the meaning of an umbrella clause. Thus, two points were made clear by the ad hoc Committee.

536. First, according to that Committee, the umbrella clause, if it had any meaning – a question on which it did not take a position – could only concern consensual obligations and not general obligations:

“In speaking of ‘any obligations it may have entered into with regard to investment,’ it seems clear that Article II(2)(c) is concerned with consensual obligations arising independently of the BIT ... They do not cover general requirements imposed by law.”<sup>510</sup>

537. Second, the ad hoc Committee also made it clear that, in its view, a contractual obligation towards a non-protected investor cannot be transformed by the magic of the so-called umbrella clause into a treaty obligation towards a protected investor:

“The effect of the umbrella clause is not to transform the obligation which is relied on into something else; the content of the obligation is unaffected, as is its proper law. If this is so, it would appear that the parties to the obligation (i.e. the persons bound by it and entitled to rely on it) are likewise not changed because of the umbrella clause.”<sup>511</sup>

538. It is evident that the Tribunal cannot find any violation of a right pertaining to El Paso under the so-called umbrella clause, for the reason that the so-called umbrella clause cannot not elevate any contract claims to the status of treaty claims as El Paso cannot claim a contractual right of its own in this case.

V. CAN THE VIOLATIONS COMMITTED BY ARGENTINA BE PREVENTED OR EXCUSED?

A. CAN THE VIOLATIONS COMMITTED BY ARGENTINA BE EXCUSED ON ACCOUNT OF THE CONSENT ALLEGEDLY GIVEN THROUGH THE SIGNATURE OF AGREEMENTS?

1. The Parties' Positions

(i) The Respondent's Position

539. The Republic of Argentina contends that El Paso's argument is inconsistent with the very actions of the Argentinian companies it is now claiming for. As a matter of fact, both CAPSA and CAPEX (together with many other companies in the same sector) entered into at least eight agreements with the GOA during the years 2002 and 2003 by which they recognised the Government's power to impose export duties on oil and gas and to take other measures. Through these agreements, the companies obtained advantages which, naturally, proved beneficial to their shareholders. In its damages estimate, El Paso omitted to consider these benefits.
540. Even if El Paso was a non-controlling shareholder of the companies in question and not a party to the various agreements with the Government, the fact remains that the companies entered into agreements by which the GOA's powers were recognised. Furthermore, there is no evidence that these agreements were concluded under duress, as alleged by El Paso, nor has any producer in the last five years challenged the voluntary nature of these agreements.
541. All the measures contested by El Paso (except for the export restrictions and the pesification) were expressly consented to by the Argentinian companies. A shareholder may not claim compensation for a measure concerning the rights of a company in which it holds a participating interest when the company in question has consented to such a measure. As a minority shareholder, El Paso should address its claim to the majority shareholder, not to the GOA.

(ii) The Claimant's Position

542. The Claimant contends that it was not a Party to the agreements with the Government, the latter having been signed by the Argentinian companies together with other oil companies. In addition, El Paso was a minority, non-controlling shareholder, and therefore not in a position to determine the decisions of the companies.
543. The Claimant also disputes the purported voluntary nature of these agreements, arguing that they were signed under duress. In fact, the GOA had threatened to impose higher export duties or artificially to depress domestic prices in the event of a failure to accept the agreements. Thus, to sign them was a way to mitigate damages.
544. Regarding the Crude Oil Special Arrangements, in the absence of Government pressures, no rational crude oil producer would have agreed to a US$ 28.50 reference value for which the producers received nothing in exchange. Similar pressure was exercised regarding the LPG Price Stabilisation Agreement, which was concluded under the Government's threat to depress domestic prices artificially.
545. None of the agreements signed by CAPSA, CAPEX or Costanera, while El Paso was a shareholder, contains any acquiescence to the export withholdings or any waiver of legal rights, express or implied. In international law, waivers require a clear and unambiguous expression of consent.
546. In any event, as shown in CMS and LG&E, the presence of duress will not only invalidate a waiver but, in addition, confirm that the State has breached the BIT.
547. No objections were filed by El Paso before the courts of Argentina for a number of reasons, including the risk that raising a claim before the local courts could trigger the "fork-in-the-road" clause of the BIT (Articles VII (2) and (3)).

548. The Respondent's waiver claim assumes that El Paso is bound by the signing of the special agreements by CAPSA, CAPEX and Costanera. This, according to the Claimant, is wrong. As illustrated by GAMI Investments v. Mexico,<sup>512</sup> the decision of the local company (in that case, to pursue domestic remedies) cannot affect the right of a minority shareholder to claim under the applicable treaty. The same conclusion was reached by the LG&E, Enron and Azurix tribunals in their awards against the Republic of Argentina.

2. The Tribunal's Analysis

549. As noted by the Tribunal in its Decision on Jurisdiction when referring to the Decision on Jurisdiction in the LG&E case, the shares owned by El Paso in the Argentinian companies constitute the Claimant's investment in Argentina within the meaning of Article I (1)(a)(ii) of the BIT. This has been reiterated in paragraph 214 of the present Award. A clear distinction must therefore be made between the Claimant as an investor under the BIT and the Argentinian companies in which the Claimant participated and which operated in Argentina under local laws and regulations. Bearing in mind this distinction, the Respondent's contention that El Paso consented to export withholdings or other measures taken by the GOA by not objecting to the signing by CAPEX, CAPSA and Costanera of a number of agreements with the Government may not be shared. El Paso may not, in fact, be equated to the companies in which it was only a minority, non-controlling shareholder. Actions by the Argentinian companies cannot affect El Paso's rights as an investor under the BIT, except to the extent to which it has consented to such actions. However, there is no evidence of such consent.

550. Contrary to the Respondent's allegation, El Paso is not claiming for the Argentinian companies; nor is it acting for their benefit or on their behalf. The claims filed by El Paso in these proceedings are those of an investor requesting compensation for the breach by the State of a certain number of guarantees provided by the BIT, an international treaty. El Paso is therefore claiming in its own right, not in somebody else's. The fact that El Paso as a shareholder may have derived benefits from the agreements entered into by the companies and that such advantages have to be considered when evaluating its damages does not contradict this conclusion. The shareholding in the companies being the investment made by El Paso in Argentina, the damage to that investment caused by the breach of the BIT must obviously be calculated by taking into account any benefits accruing from the agreements in question or from the Government's measures.

551. This being the nature of El Paso's claims, and in the absence of any consent to the Argentinian companies entering into the agreements with the Government, no waiver of rights and claims accruing under the BIT may be imputed to El Paso. The Argentinian companies' decisions and their agreements with the GOA therefore have no impact on El Paso's rights under the BIT, the breach of which is the cause of action in these proceedings.

B. CAN THE VIOLATIONS COMMITTED BY ARGENTINA HAVE BEEN PREVENTED OR BE EXCUSED ON ACCOUNT OF THE EXISTENCE OF A STATE OF NECESSITY?

552. The Tribunal will first examine the defense allegedly provided by Article IV (3) of the BIT. It will then address the two other Articles invoked by Argentina to avoid any responsibility for the measures taken to face the economic crisis, Article XI of the BIT and Article 25 of the ILC Articles on State Responsibility. The Tribunal will concentrate on the arguments based on Article XI first because, as was also stated by the tribunal in the case of Continental, "the application of Art. XI in the present case (if warranted) may be such as to render superfluous a detailed examination of the defense of necessity under general international law applied to the particular facts of the present dispute."<sup>513</sup> Of course, Article XI has to be interpreted taking into account general principles of international law, some of those being embodied in Article 25, as mentioned below in paragraph 590. And only if Article XI is found by the Tribunal not to apply in the case would an analysis of Article 25 be performed. Article XI is the lex specialis, Article 25, the lex generalis. As the Tribunal will consider Article XI of the BIT to apply to the case, it can dispense to fully analyse and to apply as such Article 25 of the ILC Articles.

553. It is however appropriate for the Tribunal to emphasise the difference between the two defences based on Article XI of the BIT and on Article 25 in general international law. Under Article XI, measures necessary “for the maintenance of the public order” or for “the protection of essential security interests” are not in breach of the relevant BIT, and therefore it would have been appropriate for the Tribunal to analyse the existence of a situation of necessity under Article XI even before evaluating the different measures adopted. On the contrary, if the rules of general international law regarding necessity apply, this is a ground for precluding the wrongfulness of an act not in conformity with an international obligation and thus implies that the acts be analysed first. This difference was clearly emphasised in a statement found in the Annulment Decision in CMS:

“Article XI is a threshold requirement: if it applies, the substantive obligations under the Treaty do not apply. By contrast, Article 25 is an excuse which is only relevant once it has been decided that there has otherwise been a breach of those substantive obligations.”<sup>514</sup>

554. In other words, in order to analyse the consequences of Article XI, the first question to answer is whether there was a situation of emergency as defined by that Article. If the answer is in the affirmative, all the acts considered necessary by the Tribunal to cope with this situation are excluded from the scope of the BIT, the contrary being true of the acts not considered necessary by the Tribunal. If the answer is in the negative, the Tribunal has to examine the different measures taken in order to determine whether or not they are in violation of one of the BIT standards of treatment of foreign investments. To analyse the consequences of Article 25, the reverse approach is required. The Tribunal should first analyse whether or not the measures constitute a violation of the standards of treatment of the BIT. If the answer is no, this marks the end of the inquiry. If the answer is in the affirmative, the Tribunal has to consider whether the illegality can be set aside on account of a state of necessity.

555. However, in order to analyse the consequences of Article XI, the Tribunal has chosen to proceed as follows. It will first answer the question whether by its behaviour the State has contributed to endangering its public order or essential security interests. If the answer is in the affirmative, the defence under Article XI shall not apply since the challenged measures would fail to qualify as “necessary” under that Article. If the answer is in the negative, the Tribunal has to examine whether there was a situation of emergency as defined by Article XI, in which case, in the affirmative, all acts considered necessary by the Tribunal to cope with that situation are excluded from the scope of the BIT.”

1. Can the Violations Committed by Argentina Be Excused on the Basis of Article IV(3)?

556. Article IV (3) of the BIT provides:

“Nationals or companies of either Party whose investments suffer losses in the territory of the other Party owing to war or other armed conflict, revolution, state of national emergency, insurrection, civil disturbance or other similar events shall be accorded treatment by such other Party no less favorable than that accorded to its own nationals or companies or to nationals or companies of any third country, whichever is the more favorable treatment, as regards any measures it adopts in relation to such losses.”

(i) The Parties’ Positions

557. According to the Claimant, “[i]n reality, Article IV(3) of the BIT is completely irrelevant to Argentina’s defense of necessity.”<sup>515</sup> As explained by El Paso, that provision deals with possible measures taken by a State to compensate losses that have occurred due, for example, to war or civil disturbances. It does not apply as an excuse based on necessity or emergency: “Since Article IV(3) relates to compensatory measures rather than acts that cause an investor’s loss,

it provides no guidance as to whether such acts are excusable in a given context.”<sup>516</sup>

558. The Respondent has a different interpretation of Article IV(3), arguing that the emergency measures challenged are indeed authorised by that provision:

“The BIT expressly mentions the adoption of emergency measures by a state, which may generate losses to the investments of the other contracting party. Not only does it point out this possibility, but it also legitimises the act from Government [sic]....”<sup>517</sup>

In fact, Argentina equates “measures adopted in relation to losses due to an emergency situation” with “measures to be adopted to mitigate the crisis or emergency”<sup>518</sup> and then concludes that the only obligation of a State during a period of emergency is to accord foreign investors’ treatment that is not discriminatory. Stating that “upon the state of emergency, El Paso received the same treatment as the other national and foreign companies that were engaged in the provision of similar services,”<sup>519</sup> it concludes that Argentina fully complied with its obligations towards the foreign investor. The position of the GOA is that “Article IV(3) provides for a special solution in the event of an exceptional situation, which proves that the general obligations contained in the treaty are only applicable in ‘normal’ circumstances.”<sup>520</sup>

(ii) The Tribunal’s Analysis

559. The Tribunal cannot accept the Respondent’s interpretation, which goes against the plain meaning of the text, and it agrees with the Claimant that Article IV(3) applies to measures adopted in response to a loss, not to measures that cause a loss. The plain meaning of the provision is that the standards of treatment of the BIT – national treatment and most favoured nation treatment – have to be applied when a State tries to mitigate the consequences of war or other emergency. This is in line with the analysis of the same provision made by the tribunal in CMS when it pointed out that:

“The plain meaning of the Article is to provide a floor treatment for the investor in the context of the measures adopted in respect of the losses suffered in the emergency, not different from that applied to nationals or other foreigners. The Article ... ensures that any measures directed at offsetting or minimizing losses will be applied in a non-discriminatory manner.”<sup>521</sup>

560. It is therefore the conclusion of the Tribunal that the violations committed by Argentina cannot be excused by Article IV (3), as that provision does not deal with the matter at hand.

2. Can the Violations Committed by Argentina be Excused on the Basis of Article XI?

561. In its written and oral presentations, Argentina has justified its conduct by invoking Article XI of the 1991 Argentina-US BIT. That provision reads:

“This Treaty shall not preclude the application by either Party of measures necessary for the maintenance of public order, the fulfilment of its obligations with respect to the maintenance or restoration of international peace or security, or the protection of its own essential security interests.”

This is obviously an important provision, as recognised by Professor Michael Reisman, an expert called by the Claimant, who stated during the hearing that:

“Obviously the Parties felt that this assurance was critical to them. Whether this could have been available as a matter of general international law to the Parties is another matter. But by establishing this particular regime in Article 11 the Parties indicated that customary international law that might otherwise govern would not govern, and that this would be the provision for those circumstances, what we generally refer to as necessity.”<sup>522</sup>

562. This provision raises the following questions: Who is entitled to interpret Article XI authoritatively? Do the provisions of that Article apply to the present dispute? If so, does its applicability exonerate Argentina from any duty to pay compensation?

(i) The Question of Whether Article XI Is Self-judging: Who Is Entitled to Interpret Article XI?

(a) The Respondent's Position

563. In its pleadings, Argentina, partly basing itself on expert legal opinions,<sup>523</sup> contended that each Contracting Party was entitled to interpret the terms of Article XI of the Argentina-US Treaty with final effect, subject only to the principle of good faith. Argentina's thesis can be summarised as follows.

564. It is true that, unlike the provisions of other treaties, such as Article XXI of the GATT,<sup>524</sup> Article XI of the 1991 Argentina-US BIT does not expressly state that it is self-judging. It nevertheless exhibits that characteristic because this is the position of both Contracting Parties: that of the United States since 1986, when it argued, in the Nicaragua case, that the International Court of Justice (hereinafter: ICJ) had to examine<sup>525</sup> whether a similar provision contained in the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation (hereafter: FCN) concluded on 21 January 1956 between the US and Nicaragua<sup>526</sup> was self-judging in character; this was the position of Argentina was well.
