565. The self-judging character of Article XI of the BIT can, according to the respondent State, be deduced from its text, read in its context, and from the object and purpose of the Treaty, the preparatory work and the circumstances surrounding its conclusion.<sup>527</sup> This character also results from the position taken by the US Department of State at the time of the BIT's approval by the US Senate, which amounts to an interpretative declaration in the sense of Article 31 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.<sup>528</sup>

566. Regarding the texts of Articles XXI of the GATT and XXI of the Nicaragua-US FCN, they are not, according to Argentina, relevant for interpreting the Argentina-US BIT; they are not, in particular, part of that instrument's context in the sense of Article 31 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. The same can be said of Article XX(1)(d) of the Iran-US Treaty of Amity, Economic Relations and Consular Relations, of 15 August 1955.<sup>529</sup>
567. So far as the ruling of the ICJ in the Nicaragua case is concerned, Argentina considers it to have no bearing on the present arbitration because: (i) at the time when that case was decided, the evidence for ascertaining the Parties' positions was insufficient, and the US began to make statements on the matter precisely on the basis of that case; (ii) Nicaragua and the US held conflicting views in the Nicaragua case, the former contending that the contested provision was not self-judging, the latter holding the opposite view, whereas in the present arbitration the States involved are of the same opinion, namely, that Article XI of the 1991 BIT is self-judging; and (iii) the circumstances surrounding the two cases are different, the US having invoked the self-judging character of the relevant clause in Nicaragua to legitimise the use of force against another State, whereas, in the present instance, Argentina does so to justify domestic economic measures “sought to pacify the country, maintain public order and national security.”<sup>530</sup>

568. According to the respondent State, there is evidence showing that both the US and Argentina considered Article XI of their BIT to be self-judging. One evidential element is the fact that in August 1992, barely one year following the conclusion of the Treaty but prior to its ratification, the US Department of State submitted five BITs and a model BIT to the US Senate for approval. Each provision of the Model BIT was accompanied by commentaries; and the commentary on Article X – whose text is identical to Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT – explained that the provision was self-judging and that this feature was carefully recorded by the US State Department in each negotiation.<sup>531</sup>
569. In LG&E,<sup>532</sup> the tribunal considered the date of conclusion of the Argentina-US BIT rather than that of ratification to be relevant for ascertaining the meaning of treaty clauses, says Argentina. But, in view of the declaration by the US Senate,<sup>533</sup> there are strong reasons to believe that even at the time of concluding their BIT, both the US and Argentina believed its Article XI to be self-judging. Further, when Argentina ratified the BIT in 1994, it was well aware of the position taken by the United States in 1992.
570. It may be presumed, always according to Argentina, that all bilateral investment treaties concluded by the US follow the 1992 Model Treaty, unless the State Department, in its letter accompanying the text of treaties on the occasion of their submission to the Senate, indicates otherwise, which is not the case here. As no contrary evidence has been presented by the Claimant, Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT must be deemed self-judging.
571. The same obtains on the side of Argentina, the other Contracting Party. True, when the BIT between the US and Russia was being negotiated, it was the Russian negotiators who wished to specify that the Treaty's provision corresponding to Article XI of the Argentina-US Treaty was self-judging. This cannot, however, be taken to mean, a contrario, that Article XI, for the United States, does not have that characteristic as well.

572. The United States view, while it has grown more explicit, has not changed at least since 1984, when it was put forth in the Nicaragua case. An inevitable consequence of that view is, as explained by the US Government to the US Senate, that self-judging clauses in BITs could also be invoked, on the basis of reciprocity, by the other Contracting Party, to the detriment of US investors, this being the price to pay for the United States' freedom of action under the BITs.
573. Argentina concludes its arguments by asserting that the self-judging nature of provisions such as Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT promotes, rather than undermines, international law. It confirms the contractual freedom of States within the mandatory framework of jus cogens and, accordingly, strengthens the concept of sovereignty. Another restriction based on the power of self-judging clauses is that recourse to such a clause is limited by the principle of good faith.

(b) The Claimant's Position

574. The Claimant contends that Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT is not self-judging.<sup>534</sup> It begins its argument by pointing out that the evidence adduced by Argentina to establish the self-judging character of Article XI exclusively pertains to the "essential security interests" element in that provision, and that there is no evidence showing that the US Government has considered self-judging the "public order" element or the reference to international peace and security contained in that same Article.
575. Moreover, says the Claimant, in reality the "essential security interest" feature of Article XI is not self-judging. As a rule, treaty provisions are self-judging only if the States Parties to the treaty clearly say so, which is not the case here. Article XI is phrased in the same objective manner as the other provisions of the BIT, the review of which is the object of a compulsory adjudication procedure.

576. There is, according to the Claimant, no ambiguity in the text of Article XI. In the absence of any contrary indication, it is up to this Tribunal to review the existence of necessity under that Article, as it is within its competence to interpret the BIT by virtue of Article VII of that Treaty and the acceptance of the Tribunal's jurisdiction by the Parties. Adjudication being the mode of review established by the BIT, the existence of a self-judging mechanism for a given provision must be attested to by explicit language, such as that found in Article XXI of the GATT. The difference of language in that instrument and in Article XI of the 1991 BIT is striking: "action which it [the State] considers necessary" in Article XXI of the GATT, as compared to "measures necessary" in Article XI of the BIT.
577. According to the Claimant, a similar situation arose in the Nicaragua case, where the ICJ had to establish the meaning to be attributed to Article XXI(1) of the 1956 Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation (FCN) between Nicaragua and the US. The provision in question prescribed that "the present Treaty shall not preclude the application of measures ... (d) ... necessary to protect essential security interests." The Court concluded that the reference to "essential security interests" in Article XXI(1) of the 1956 Treaty fell within the Court's jurisdiction as defined in the dispute settlement provision of Article XXIV of the same Treaty. The Court then compared the language of Article XXI(1) of the 1956 Treaty of FCN ("necessary") to that of Article XXI of the GATT ("which it [the State] considers necessary"). The latter provision, the Court explained, constituted an exception to the "normal implementation" of the General Agreement by allowing a Contracting Party to take action which it "considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests" in fields such as nuclear fission and arms, whereas Article XXI of the 1956 Treaty

578. Is it believable, asks the Claimant, that the United States did not learn from the ICJ’s judgment that self-judging provisions must be identified by explicit language? Could the US have thought it possible, a mere five years after the Nicaragua judgment, to make the reference to “essential security interests” in Article XI self-judging, without any explicit indication to that effect? According to the Claimant, it could not.
579. To this, the Claimant adds that in the wake of the Nicaragua case, the United States showed that it knew how to draft a self-judging clause when necessary. The Protocol appended to the BIT with Russia,<sup>536</sup> negotiated in the same period as that with Argentina, states that “the Parties confirm their mutual understanding that whether a measure is undertaken by a Party to protect its essential security interests is self-judging.”<sup>537</sup> No similar statement was made in connection with the 1991 Argentina-US BIT; and whereas the Protocol accompanying the latter does comment on Article XI, it says nothing about its alleged self-judging character, as it surely would have done had the Parties intended to give it such a character. This is especially so since, in subsequent BITs with El Salvador and Bahrain, the US saw to it that the “which it considers necessary” formula suggested in the Nicaragua judgment found its way into their texts.<sup>538</sup>
580. Turning to the evidence of Argentina’s legal experts, the Claimant asserts that not a single word uttered in the 1991 Treaty or any element in its context denotes any intent on the part of the United States or Argentina to confer self-judging status on Article XI of the Treaty.

581. Next, the Claimant turns to unilateral assertions made by the United States, in connexion with other BITs, in the course of internal debates. Specifically it refers to exchanges between the US Department of State and the US Senate in 1988 and 1992 relating to the “essential security interests” clause in other BITs and in the 1992 Model Treaty.<sup>539</sup> These exchanges, the Respondent argued, were evidence of the American attitude regarding the Model Treaty and suggested that the US position on Article XI of the 1991 BIT must have been the same during that period; and, since there is no contrary evidence, Argentina must have shared that attitude. According to the Claimant, there is no reason to have recourse to supplementary means of interpretation.

582. Indeed, the text of Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT, read in its context and in light of the Treaty’s purpose, is “quite clear.” In such situations, the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties does not authorise the use of supplementary means of interpretation. And, even if it did, and if Article 31(4) of the Vienna Convention<sup>540</sup> were relied on to establish that the treaty terms in issue have a special meaning, inconsistent with that resulting from the application of Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention, such a meaning would have to be established “conclusively” and by “decisive” proof.<sup>541</sup> All the respondent State has to offer are internal statements which dwell on other treaties and do not support the idea that the US silently willed Article XI of the 1991 BIT to be self-judging. Moreover, says the Claimant, given Argentina’s history of economic emergencies, it is unlikely that the US would have intended to clothe Article XI with self-judging character. Even if it had wished to do so, it would have had to inform Argentina and to obtain its consent.

583. In other words, according to the Claimant, the Argentinian legal experts have failed to show the Parties' mutual intention to vest Article XI of the 1991 Treaty with self-judging character; nor can such an intention be derived from that instrument's context. According to Article 31(2) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, the "context" includes, in addition to the text proper, the preamble and the annexes, (a) any agreement relating to the treaty "made between all the Parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty," and (b) any instrument "made by one or more Parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other Parties as an instrument related to the treaty." It follows from this that what the US may have intended with regard to Article XI, according to the Respondent, would not be relevant context. The status of relevant context would be limited to intentions agreed upon by the Parties, and there is no evidence of agreement on this point. Treaty interpretation does not consist in looking for the unilateral and silent wishes of a Party.
584. In the absence of relevant contextual elements, the interpreter should stick to the "ordinary meaning" of Article XI and to the Treaty's "object and purpose."<sup>542</sup> As pointed out already, the ordinary meaning of the relevant provision is that, like other Articles of the Treaty, it is of an objective rather than self-judging nature. This view is buttressed by the fact that the Treaty's object and purpose is to protect investments made by investors of one Party on the territory of the other. A self-judging interpretation of Article XI of the 1991 Treaty would enable Argentina to interfere almost limitlessly with US investments, subject only to a good faith standard.
585. To justify a departure from the above reasoning, Argentina would have to show that both Parties intended to give Article XI of the 1991 Treaty a special meaning under Article 31(4) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. There is no evidence, however, that they did. Consequently, the ordinary meaning of the text of the provision, viewed in the context of its object and purpose, must prevail.

586. The question of the self-judging nature of Article XI of the 1991 BIT came up, and was answered in the negative by the tribunal in CMS.<sup>543</sup> Accordingly, that tribunal's task was not limited to establishing whether the plea of necessity had been invoked and whether the challenged measures were taken in good faith. The tribunal was called upon to examine whether, as a matter of substance, Argentina's recourse to Article XI was justified. The LG&E tribunal<sup>544</sup> reached the same conclusion.
587. Finally, according to the Claimant, even if one were to decide otherwise, and if the self-judging power allegedly inherent in Article XI of the 1991 BIT were limited only by a good faith standard, Argentina's views could not prevail. Indeed, the continuous repudiation of the Claimant's rights, on the basis of an emergency that had long ceased to exist, is inconsistent with the good faith standard invoked by the respondent State.

(c) The Tribunal's Analysis

588. The Tribunal will ascertain the meaning of Article XI of the 1991 Argentina-US BIT by applying Articles 31 and 32 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Before doing so, it wishes to point out, as the Claimant has done,<sup>545</sup> that the evidence presented by the Respondent relates to a single element of Article XI, "essential security interests." That Article, however, mentions two other possible justifications: the maintenance of public order and the fulfilment of the State's obligations regarding the maintenance or restoration of international peace or security. This could be taken to suggest that the self-judging character of Article XI is, at any rate, limited to "essential security interests" and cannot extend to the other elements, in particular the maintenance of public order. At first glance, the present case does not,

however, seem to concern (external) security interests but possibly the maintenance of (internal) public order, which would not be a self-judging matter at all under Article XI of the BIT.

589. It is not necessary to pursue this line of argument, however, since the Tribunal believes that Article XI contains no self-judging elements, as it will now show by examining the content of that provision in the light of the canons of treaty interpretation of Articles 31 and 32 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.
590. The Tribunal considers that, pursuant to Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention, any interpretation has to begin with an examination of the terms of the treaty taken in their ordinary meaning. The wording of the treaty is deemed to express the intention common to the Parties, and what the Parties effectively agreed to, even though a Party might have wished otherwise on one or another point. As long as such wishes are not expressed, the content of the treaty's provisions is paramount, and what is not there cannot be read into them. This prompts the further conclusion that in principle treaty rules must be regarded as being objective in nature, which means that, unless the contrary is specified, they are not self-judging: a State Party is not entitled to interpret unilaterally the terms of a treaty in an authoritative manner.
591. In principle, the ordinary meaning of a treaty provision is that given to its terms at the time of its conclusion, in the present case in 1991, as was pointed out by the tribunal in LG&E.<sup>546</sup> Changes occurring elsewhere, at a later stage, for instance when other, similar treaties are being negotiated or when a model treaty is being submitted to a national authority for approval, even if they happened before the treaty to be interpreted is ratified or comes into force, are irrelevant for establishing the meaning to be given to it. This means that Argentina cannot rely on the BITs negotiated after 1991 or on the 1992 Model Treaty.

592. Treaty provisions allowing for exceptions to the rights guaranteed in the same treaty must be attributed the ordinary meaning resulting from their text, without reading self-judging clauses into them, especially when the treaty contains compromissory clauses, as is the case here. This clearly results from the case-law and from international practice.
593. In this respect, Nicaragua is evidently the leading case, where the ICJ was confronted with an “essential security interests” clause found in Article XXI of the 1956 Nicaragua-US Treaty of FCN (“the present Treaty shall not preclude the application of measures ... (d) ... necessary to protect its essential security interests”). That same Treaty also contained a compromissory clause placing disputes pertaining to the interpretation and application of its provisions under the ICJ’s jurisdiction. The ICJ thought that the above clause was not self-judging and found that it had jurisdiction to determine whether the essential security interests clause was applicable – a question it answered in the negative. In this precedent, the Court establishes that, in the absence of qualifying language, the text of the relevant provision must be interpreted as it is, according to its ordinary meaning. To buttress its conclusion, the ICJ cites, a contrario, Article XXI of the GATT, which does contain qualifying language (“Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed ... (b) To prevent any Contracting Party from taking any action which it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests”).
594. The above precedent is of particular relevance in the present instance because it relates to a treaty which, though not a BIT, also defines and protects rights of individuals of one Party on the territory of the other and because the 1991 Argentina-US BIT, like the Nicaragua-US Treaty of FCN, contains a compromissory clause. The Nicaragua judgment was rendered in 1986; the Argentina-US BIT was concluded in 1991, barely five years later. It is most unlikely that within this short time-span the US could have forgotten the lesson of Nicaragua which amounted to saying that if one wishes a treaty clause to be self-judging, one has to say so and to obtain the other Party’s assent. The conclusion emerging from these elements is that at the relevant time, the US did not seek to attribute self-judging character to Article XI of the 1991 BIT.

595. This conclusion is supported by two decisions of ICSID tribunals bearing on the very same provision, i.e. Article XI of the 1991 BIT. In CMS, the tribunal said:

“The Tribunal is convinced that when States intend to create for themselves a right to determine unilaterally the legitimacy of extraordinary measures importing [sic] non-compliance with obligations assumed in a treaty, they do so expressly.”<sup>547</sup>

The arbitral tribunal then explained that if measures taken by Argentina are considered justified by that State under Article XI of the BIT, it is not up to Argentina to determine unilaterally that such justification is legitimate. It is not sufficient, in other words, merely to invoke Article XI and to assert that the State’s measures were taken in good faith. It is also necessary to show that those measures were effectively covered by the language of Article XI.<sup>548</sup>

596. The above views were shared by the arbitral tribunal in LG&E. In its decision, that tribunal said:

“Based on the evidence before the Tribunal regarding the understanding of the Parties in 1991 at the time the Treaty was signed, the Tribunal decides and concludes that the provision [Article XI] is not self-judging.”<sup>549</sup>

The passage just cited is of particular interest because it emphasises what has been said earlier,<sup>550</sup> namely, that what matters is the Parties’ common intention at the time of signature in 1991, when negotiations had been concluded, rather than subsequent events.

597. The case-law reported above is particularly persuasive because the US has been one of the champions of self-judging clauses, a device which it has used at least since the end of World War II, witness the so-called Connally amendment embodied in the declaration made by the United States on 26 August 1946 under Article 36(2) of the Statute of the ICJ. In that declaration,<sup>551</sup> the US accepted the Court's compulsory jurisdiction, except for matters falling within its domestic jurisdiction "as determined by the United States." Surely the inclusion of that clause – which only ceased to exist when the US withdrew its declaration in 1985 – shows that the possibility of introducing a self-judging mechanism, coupled with the necessity of doing so explicitly, had been known to the US for many years and that the Nicaragua judgment did not, on this point, come as a surprise, even though, in that case, the ICJ did examine whether, implicitly, Article XXI of the Nicaragua-US Treaty of FCN of 1956 had a self-judging character.

598. Article 15 of the 1950 European Convention on Human Rights<sup>552</sup> allows States Parties, in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation, to derogate from their obligations under the Convention – except regarding Articles 2, 3, 4(1) and 7 – to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such derogations are not inconsistent with the Parties' other obligations under international law. A similar clause can be found in Article 27 of the 1969 American Human Rights Convention.<sup>553</sup> The case-law of the European Court of Human Rights shows that these provisions, despite their being emergency clauses, are far from being self-judging. In concrete cases brought before the Court and involving derogations formulated on the basis of those provisions, it is the European Court which determines whether they meet the conditions provided for in Article 15.<sup>554</sup>
599. According to Article 31(1) of the 1969 Vienna Convention, the terms of a treaty must be interpreted in their context (Article 31(1)). That notion is defined by Article 31(2) of the Convention as including, besides the body of the treaty, its preamble and its annexes – the "narrow" context – as well as (a) "agreements" relating to the treaty made by all its Parties in connection with its conclusion; and (b) instruments “made” by one or several Parties to the treaty and accepted as such by the other Parties to the treaty. These agreements and instruments form what may be called the “wide” context.

600. So far as the 1991 BIT between Argentina and the US is concerned, it may be argued that its preamble and the body of the text show that this Treaty aims at creating a stable and prosperous investment climate in both countries. That aim could not be attained if the exceptions allowed by Article XI were considered self-judging. Remaining within the “wide” context, one may note that there are no “agreements” relating to the treaty made by all Parties in connection with its conclusion (Article 31(2)(a) of the Vienna Convention), nor are there any “instruments” emanating from one or more Treaty Parties, accepted by the other Parties and “connected with the conclusion of the treaty.” Whatever may be and has been invoked by the respondent State – other BITs, the 1992 Model Treaty, etc. – is certainly not “connected with the conclusion” of the 1991 BIT between Argentina and the US.
601. Article 31(3) of the Vienna Convention does, however, mention elements not connected with the conclusion of the treaty and subsequent to the latter, i.e. (a) subsequent agreements between the Parties to the treaty regarding the interpretation or application of the latter’s provisions; (b) any subsequent practice which establishes the agreement of the Parties regarding its interpretation; and (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the Parties.
602. While the above-mentioned sub-paragraphs (a) and (c) of Article 31(3) of the Vienna Convention do not appear relevant here, a closer look at sub-paragraph (b) – any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation – seems necessary. Indeed, it has been contended by Argentina that the views of the US on self-judging provisions of BITs and other agreements changed in 1992 and that Argentina accepted the change, the aggregate amounting to a subsequent agreement on the interpretation of Article XI of the 1991 Argentina-US BIT. There is, to be sure, a “subsequent practice” consisting in a changed negotiating position; Argentina did not, however, have to approve or disapprove it since it did not relate to the interpretation of the 1991 BIT but to the American attitude in future negotiations with other States.

603. Even if this were not so, internal exchanges between the organs of one Contracting State, coupled with the silence of the other State, are not sufficient to produce an agreed practice of interpretation; at least some communication must be shown to have occurred, which is not the case here. According to the respondent State, the Argentinian “agreement” consists, inter alia, in Argentina’s “awareness” that in its argument before the ICJ in the Nicaragua case, the US had alleged that the exception embodied in Article XXI of the US-Nicaragua Treaty of FCN – essential security interests – was self-judging and that, this being the case, the idea of self-judgment was also implicit in Article XI of the 1991 BIT between Argentina and the US. This line of argument seems far-fetched, and there is no evidence to support it. The provision in issue in the Nicaragua case defined the ICJ’s jurisdiction in matters covered by the treaty and an exception thereto, related to “essential security interests,” while the 1991 Argentina-US BIT pertains to substantive rights of individuals and companies and, moreover, contains not one but three exceptions in its Article XI (essential security interests, performance of obligations for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, maintenance of public order). Furthermore, the argument wholly overlooks the judgment in the case, which refuses self-judging character to a provision not unlike Article XI of the 1991 BIT. In reality, the signal received by both Argentina and the US in Nicaragua is likely to have been that no provision is self-judging unless the Parties clearly say so, which is not the case for Article XI. Finally, the “awareness” of Argentina seems to be of recent origin, having made its first appearance in the written pleadings on the substance of the present dispute.

604. A further element of interpretation to be examined is the object and purpose of the treaty (Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention of the Law of Treaties). The purpose of BITs such as the present one is to establish a climate inducing investors of one State to invest on the territory of the other by creating, for both sides, reasonable conditions for the making of investments and for their protection. The three elements embodied in Article XI of the 1991 Argentina-US BIT – and in similar provisions of other BITs – are part and parcel of the balance that must exist in such treaties. That balance would be disrupted if the legality of invoking one of the three elements present in Article XI were to be interpreted unilaterally by the State on whose territory the investments have been made. One could of course reply that the balance is restored by the fact that the recognition of a power of self-judgment for one Party entails the same power for the other Party on the basis of reciprocity. Would this re-adjust the balance? Not quite. BITs are about funds invested by foreign nationals, not about direct relationships between States. Therefore, self-judging exceptions such as that allegedly introduced into Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT by tacit consent would give extremely large powers to the State on whose territory the investment was made – the reference to good faith is of little help – and expose the investors to large risks.

605. The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties however departs from the rules in paragraphs 1 to 3 of Article 31 by stating, in its paragraph 4, that “[a] special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the Parties so intended.” Article 31(4) must be read in conjunction with Article 32 of the Convention according to which recourse may be had to “supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion,” if the interpretation obtained from the elements listed in Article 31: (a) leaves the meaning of a provision ambiguous or obscure; or (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable. Article 32 of the Vienna Convention adds that the supplementary means of interpretation mentioned by it – preparatory work, circumstances surrounding the treaty’s conclusion – may also be used to confirm an interpretation already obtained via the elements listed in Article 31, which carries the implication that said supplementary means may equally be used to invalidate that interpretation.

606. To sum up, supplementary means of interpretation may be used:

- to establish a special meaning;
- to confirm or invalidate interpretations obtained by applying the elements listed in Article 31;

- to correct results so obtained if they are ambiguous, obscure, manifestly absurd or unreasonable.
607. Despite opinions according to which the supplementary means of interpretation cannot normally be resorted to – and this also seems to be the Claimant’s view – the above explanations show that in practice it is always possible to have recourse to them.
608. The next question to consider is thus whether the results of the interpretation of Article XI of the 1991 BIT obtained by the application of Article 31 of the Vienna Convention are confirmed or invalidated if one turns to the supplementary means of interpretation mentioned in Article 32 of that Convention.
609. The Tribunal is not aware of any element suggesting that the interpretation of Article XI based on Article 31(1) to (3) of the Vienna Convention is wrong, ambiguous, obscure, manifestly unreasonable or absurd. On the contrary, insofar as any of the elements mentioned in Article 32 of the Convention can be identified, their use would confirm or at least not contradict the conclusion previously reached, i.e. that Article XI does not have self-judging character. Indeed, no travaux préparatoires to the contrary have been identified – declarations made in connection with other BITs or the 1992 Model Treaty do not qualify as preparatory work related to the present Treaty – and the same is true for the circumstances surrounding the latter’s conclusion. The ICJ’s Judgment in the Nicaragua case makes it clear that, to render a treaty provision self-judging, the intention to do so must be explicitly stated – which it was not – particularly where the treaty is equipped with a dispute-settlement mechanism, as is the case of the 1991 BIT.
610. For all these reasons, the Tribunal considers that Article XI of the 1991 Argentina-US BIT is not self-judging. In other words, it is the duty of the Tribunal first to interpret Article XI and then to decide whether or not the situation that prevailed in Argentina at the time of the impugned measures can be subsumed under the exceptions listed in that Article.

(ii) The Interpretation of Article XI: a General Approach

611. As far as the interpretation of Article XI is concerned, the Tribunal wishes to emphasise that a state of emergency can be of an economic nature, as stated by other ICSID tribunals in the Argentinian cases.
612. It will also be noted that no compensation must be awarded for damage suffered during the period of emergency, as the BIT does not apply in such a period, except if the State has substantially contributed to create it, while damages might be awarded for measures taken during the state of emergency and not cancelled when the state of emergency has ceased to exist.

(iii) The Interpretation of Article XI: Admissibility of the State's Defence under Article XI

613. As any other provision of the BIT, Article XI is interpreted on the basis of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Further, as also recognised in Continental,<sup>555</sup> concepts used in Article 25 of the ILC Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts<sup>556</sup> “assist in the interpretation of Article XI itself.” When interpreted in light of the above principles, the requirement under Article XI that the measures must be “necessary” presupposes that the State has not contributed, by acts or omissions, to creating the situation which it relies on when claiming the lawfulness of its measures.
614. Article 31 (3) of the Vienna Convention provides that the terms of a treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to those terms in their context and in the light of the object and purpose of the treaty. As indicated in the preamble, the object and purpose of the BIT between Argentina and the US is to promote and improve the investment climate between the Contracting Parties, notably by establishing some stability regarding the status of investments.

615. That such stability cannot be total is stating the obvious. The world changes and so does the environment for foreign investment, especially when extraordinary circumstances appear. The host State is generally not responsible for the consequences of a state of emergency. It will be responsible, however, for the consequences of a state of emergency if it has significantly contributed to that situation. Holding otherwise would mean that Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT is not being interpreted in the light of its object and purpose, for that Treaty cannot possibly allow for the possibility that if the host State itself has caused or significantly helped to cause, intentionally or by omission, the situation and the consequences complained of, that State may shirk its obligations under the BIT by invoking Article XI. This conclusion is supported by other elements.
616. According to Article 31 (3) of the Vienna Convention, the interpretation of treaty rules should take into account, inter alia, “any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the Parties.” This approach to the interpretation of a treaty has also been adopted by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal in the Amoco case, where it stated:
- “As a lex specialis in the relations between the two countries, the Treaty supersedes the lex generalis, namely customary international law. This does not mean, however, that the latter is irrelevant in the instant Case. On the contrary, the rules of customary international law may be useful in order to fill in possible lacunae of the Treaty, to ascertain the meaning of undefined terms in its text or, more generally, to aid interpretation and implementation of its provisions.”<sup>557</sup>
617. Surely one of those general rules of international law is that codified in Article 25(2) of the ILC’s Articles on the Responsibility of States, which provides, in part, that: “In any case, necessity may not be invoked by a State as a ground for precluding wrongfulness if: ... (b) The State has contributed to the situation of necessity.”

<sup>557</sup> Amoco v. Iran, Case No. 56, Chamber 3, Award No. 310-65-3 of 14 July 1987, § 112.

618. In its commentary on the above provision, the Commission points out, however, that “the [State’s] contribution to the situation of necessity must be sufficiently substantial and not merely incidental or peripheral.”<sup>558</sup> That this rule, as framed by the Commission, forms part of general international law is shown by the case-law of the International Court of Justice. Indeed, in its Judgment in the case of the Gabčíkovo-Nagymaros Project, the Court held that:

“Hungary would not have been permitted to rely on that state of necessity in order to justify its failure to comply with its treaty obligations, as it had helped, by act or omission, to bring it about.”<sup>559</sup>

619. The rule in question has also been applied in interpreting Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT. As mentioned by the arbitral tribunal in LG&E,

“[i]t seems logical that if the State has contributed to cause the emergency, it should be prevented from invoking the state of necessity. If there is fault by the State, the exception disappears, since in such case the causal relationship between the State’s act and the damage is produced.”<sup>560</sup>

And in Continental, the arbitral tribunal said, in connection with “essential security interests,” which, under Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT, allows recourse to that Article, that “ ... if a Contracting Party to the BIT has contributed to endangering its essential security interest, for the protection of which it has then adopted the challenged measures, those measures may fail to qualify as ‘necessary’ under Article XI, since that Party could have pursued some other policy that would have rendered them unnecessary.”<sup>561</sup>

620. The general applicability of the rule barring the invocation of necessity when the State concerned itself has created that necessity or has significantly contributed to it is also supported by other provisions of the ILC Articles dealing with the preclusion of wrongfulness. Thus, Article 23 (1) of that text, dealing with force majeure, provides that to invoke the latter, the event creating the necessity must have been “beyond the control of the State.” Article 24(2)(a), for its part, relates to “distress” and rules out the preclusion of wrongfulness “if the State has contributed to the situation of distress.” Thus, the rule expressed in Article 25(2)(b) of the ILC Articles concerns but one type of situation where “contributory behaviour” on the part of the State involved precludes reference to necessity.

621. So far, this Tribunal has limited itself to examining the question of whether the above-mentioned precept is a rule of general international law, applicable between the Parties to the BIT and, hence, a rule which may be used to interpret Article XI of the latter. It has reached an affirmative conclusion on this point. One could also ask whether the rule exists as a “general principle of law recognised by civilised nations” in the sense of Article 38 (1) (c) of the Statute of the ICJ.
622. Volumes have been written on the subject of “general principles.” Some authors consider that the latter must meet requirements similar to those applied to customary rules (general practice and opinio juris), which suggests that in reality this category is not an autonomous one.<sup>562</sup> The mainstream view seems to be, however, that “general principles” are rules largely applied in foro domestico, in private or public, substantive or procedural matters, provided that,

after adaptation, they are suitable for application on the level of public international law.<sup>563</sup>

623. That there is a general principle on the preclusion of wrongfulness in certain situations can hardly be doubted, as is confirmed by the UNIDROIT Principles on International Commercial Contracts, a sort of international restatement of the law of contracts reflecting rules and principles applied by the majority of national legal systems.<sup>564</sup> Article 6(2)(2) of these Principles, dealing with “hardship,” provides that events causing hardship must be “beyond the control of the disadvantaged Party.” Article 7(1)(6) on “exemption clauses” prescribes that a party may not claim exemption from liability “if it would be grossly unfair to [exempt it] having regard to the purpose of the contract.” Finally, Article 7(1)(7), relating to “force majeure” (vis maior) excuses non-performance of a contract

“... if that Party proves that the non-performance was due to an impediment beyond its control and that it could not reasonably be expected to have taken the impediment into account at the time of the conclusion of the contract or to have avoided or overcome its consequences.”<sup>565</sup>

Exemption from liability for non-performance or other forms of relief are therefore excluded under the UNIDROIT Principles if the Party claiming it was “in control” of the situation or if it would be “grossly unfair” to allow for such exemption.

624. It follows from the above that: (i) there is a rule of general international law which provides that necessity may not be invoked as a ground for precluding wrongfulness if the State concerned has significantly contributed to creating that necessity; (ii) there also seems to be a general principle of law recognised by civilised nations that necessity cannot be recognised if a Party to a contract has contributed to it. This means that the rule or principle in question may be used, under Article 31 (3) of the Vienna Convention, to ascertain the meaning of Article XI of the Argentina-US BIT. Accordingly, that Article may be taken to mean that necessity cannot be invoked by a Party having itself created such necessity or having substantially contributed to it.

625. Before examining whether Argentina has contributed to creating the situation on which it relies under Article XI, it is necessary to determine which Party bears the burden of proof in that regard. The Respondent appears to accept that it has to prove the defence it advances, namely, its entitlement to relying on “necessity”, since in its view the events of 2001 required emergency measures.<sup>566</sup> The Claimant concurs but suggests that it is up to Argentina also “to demonstrate that the alleged economic situation was not self-inflicted.”<sup>567</sup>
626. It is the Tribunal’s view that the existence of the conditions for the application of Article XI, i.e. whether: (a) public order or essential security interests are at stake, and (b) whether the measures are necessary to maintain the former or protect the latter, is to be proved by the Respondent since it relies on such facts to preclude a finding that the measures breached the BIT.<sup>568</sup> Conversely, it is incumbent upon the Claimant to prove Respondent’s contribution to bringing about the necessity of the measures since it relies on such a contribution as a defence against the application of Article XI.<sup>569</sup>

(iv) The Application of Article XI: The Parties' Positions on the State's Contribution to the Economic Crisis of 2001

(a) The Claimant's Position

627. The Claimant contends that “Argentina’s economic ‘emergency’ of 2001 was almost entirely a result of the economic policy failures of the Argentine authorities.”<sup>570</sup> In order to substantiate its position, the Claimant has produced a report by a macroeconomic expert, Professor Sebastian Edwards, dated 26 November 2006 and accompanied by many exhibits (“Edwards Report”). The Tribunal will therefore examine the Edwards Report as detailing the Claimant’s position on the issue.

628. The Edwards Report asserts that “[t]he Argentine economic crisis of 2001-2002 was primarily self-induced”<sup>571</sup> and explains that a significant portion of Argentina’s responsibility for its economic and currency crisis of 2001 is related to the failure to implement structural reforms that the currency board system (i.e. the currency system that pegged the Argentinian Peso to the US dollar) needed in order to succeed. For Argentina’s currency board to work properly and remain viable over the medium or long term, there were at least four broad categories of supporting measures that Argentina needed to implement:

- Achieve and maintain fiscal discipline. In the absence of balanced fiscal accounts, a currency board would not be credible, and the public would end up withdrawing deposits from the banking sector. This would restrict liquidity and result in higher interest rates, which in turn would provoke a decline of investment and economic growth. Furthermore, during economic expansion, the public sector should run surpluses and build up fiscal reserves in order to provide a cushion during economic downturns and to enable the economy to face adverse international shocks.<sup>572</sup>

- Achieve and maintain labour market flexibility. In the absence of exchange rate flexibility, an economy needs labour market flexibility in order to accommodate external shocks. Competitiveness must therefore be achieved through a reduction in labour costs. However, if the labour market is heavily regulated and inflexible, labour costs will not decline and competitiveness will not improve; this will result in a higher rate of unemployment.<sup>573</sup>
- Open its economy by reducing barriers to foreign trade. If a currency board economy has a low degree of openness to international trade, even a modest external shock will result in a large decline in growth, since the GDP is forced to contract significantly in order to bring about a modest reduction in imports. However, in a currency board economy that is open to trade, even a large external shock will have a minor impact on economic activity.<sup>574</sup>
- Show firm governmental resolve to maintain the currency peg. If the credibility of the government's resolve to maintain the currency peg wanes, the public will begin to withdraw deposits. As deposits decline, bank liquidity diminishes, which leads to higher interest rates and a decline in economic activity. As the economy slumps, credibility and deposits are likely to decline further.<sup>575</sup>

629. Recommendations to that effect were made repeatedly by the IBRD, the IMF and others. In short, the GOA knew precisely what it needed to do to make the currency board work. It also fully understood that if it did not implement the required reforms, Argentina's economy would remain highly vulnerable, and a future currency crisis would be inevitable.<sup>576</sup> Despite this knowledge, Argentina's leaders never had the political will to implement the measures required. Fiscal responsibility, labour market flexibility and an open-trade policy each entailed a political price, and the Government simply never mustered the political will to pay that price. In the fiscal arena, Argentina ran large and increasing deficits throughout the 1992-2000 period. During many of the “good years,” GDP growth was strong, and Argentina could have run surpluses to build up reserves as a cushion for a future economic downturn.<sup>577</sup>

630. Although the GOA could have implemented a variety of measures during the 90s to strengthen fiscal discipline, one of the most obvious and significant steps that it could have taken, according to the Claimant – but did not take – was to reduce provincial spending. Doing so would have required the Government fundamentally to reform Argentina’s “Co-Participation Law” of 1988, which created strong incentives for fiscal indiscipline on the part of the country’s provincial governments. The Co-Participation Law provided for large transfers of tax revenues from the Federal Government to the provincial governments, and these transfers accounted for a significant portion of Argentina’s total public sector expenditure.<sup>578</sup>
631. By 2001, Argentina’s economic condition had further declined, and the pressures on the currency board had grown. Nevertheless, Argentina still took no serious action to implement the structural reforms so desperately needed by its economy, such as the fundamental reform of the highly destabilising and perverse Co-Participation Law, the curtailment of aggressive public sector spending, the reform of the onerous and highly inefficient system of union-run social services (“obras sociales”) and the elimination of protectionist trade practices.<sup>579</sup> Instead, the GOA embarked on a series of short-term manoeuvres such as the “Zero-Deficit” policy based on measures (such as the reduction in Government employees’ salaries and pensions) that further reduced credibility, signalling a lack of commitment to the Convertibility Law.<sup>580</sup>

632. One of the most important policy mistakes of 2001, according to the Claimant, was postponing fiscal and provincial adjustments until after the elections of October 2001. The Minister of the Economy, Domingo Cavallo, actively discussed the serious need to reform the Co-Participation Law and reduce provincial spending. That discussion, however, was put off until mid-October 2001. The governing coalition was concerned about the congressional elections of 14 October 2001, and provincial governors were spending heavily in support of their senatorial candidates. The day after the elections, Minister Cavallo proposed to reform the Co-Participation Law, to reduce the size of the public sector and to restructure provincial debts, but once again politics prevailed and the governors rejected the proposals. As a result of “quick-fix” measures taken in 2001, as well as the almost massive issuance of “quasi-monies” by the provinces and the refusal to reform the Co-Participation Law, confidence in the currency board and the stability of the banking system and of the currency board regime was increasingly at risk. The Argentinian public as well as the international financial community drew the obvious conclusion that Argentina’s political leadership would not undertake the serious reforms required by the currency board. In November 2001, Standard & Poor lowered Argentina’s long-term sovereign rating to “selective default.”<sup>581</sup>
633. Contrary to what was suggested by the GOA and its expert, Professor Roubini, external shocks played a limited role in Argentina’s economic crisis. However, misguided internal policies significantly amplified<sup>582</sup> the effects of external shocks on the Argentine economy. Many Latin-American countries experienced more severe external shocks than Argentina, yet did not suffer a major crisis. Moreover, most of the external shocks affecting Argentina (such as the decline in export prices, the increase of international interest rates and the growing strength of the U.S. dollar in international markets) were temporary phenomena that reversed in late 2001.<sup>583</sup>

(b) The Respondent's Position

634. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent, referring to Article 25 of the ILC Articles, denies having contributed to the occurrence of the state of necessity. Argentina relies on the requirement that any such contribution must be sufficiently substantial, not merely incidental or peripheral, to disregard the existence of a state of necessity.<sup>584</sup>
635. If the requirement of a lack of contribution were to be interpreted in such an extensive way, it would be impossible for a State to invoke the state of necessity as a circumstance precluding wrongfulness.<sup>585</sup> Quoting its experts, the Respondent suggests that “it strains credulity to think that Argentina intentionally sought to cause the financial collapse of 2000-2001.”<sup>586</sup> Still relying on its experts, the GOA points to the considerable bearing that external factors, such as IMF policies and the state of the global economy, had on Argentinian economic policies.<sup>587</sup>
636. Regarding the defence of necessity, in the Rejoinder, Argentina deals separately with Article XI and Article 25 of the ILC Draft Articles. However, the Respondent refers essentially to Article 25 when dealing with the issue of “non-contribution.”<sup>588</sup> It addresses issues raised by the Edwards Report by invoking essentially the Report by Professor Nouriel Roubini of 24 August 2006 presented with the Counter-Memorial (the “Roubini Report”), and the Report by Professors Robert Frenkel and Mario Damill, undated but appended to the Rejoinder (the “Frenkel-Damill Report”). The Roubini Report pre-dates the Edwards Report but deals with some of the issues considered by the latter. The Frenkel-Damill Report is in part a response to the Edwards Report, as evidenced by its title: “Diagnosis of the Crisis and Measures of the Argentine Government and Reply to Professor Sebastian Edwards’ Report.” These Reports will be analysed hereafter to the extent to which they deal with Argentina's contribution to the crisis.

637. According to Professor Roubini, Argentina's fixed-exchange-rate regime was not sustainable as it was inconsistent with economic and macroeconomic fundamentals, and was worsened by domestic and external shocks. When this regime became unsustainable, there was a run on the reserves of the Central Bank; and when these reserves were exhausted, there would be a currency collapse and a depreciation/devaluation of the currency. After this occurred in Argentina, the only economically sensible option was to abandon convertibility, to repeal the currency board and to move to a floating exchange rate, the experience of Argentina being the rule rather than an exception among emerging market economies.<sup>589</sup>

638. The following macroeconomic factors made it unavoidable for Argentina to abandon the currency board regime:

“i) a series of shocks to the economy; ii) large fiscal imbalances and debt accumulation; iii) structural vulnerabilities; iv) currency overvaluation and large and eventually unsustainable external imbalances and loss of competitiveness.”<sup>590</sup>

639. Several external shocks were identified by Professor Roubini, including (but not limited to): a “sudden stop” of capital inflows in 1998 and 1999, making the cost of borrowing in the international market higher and the quantity of funds more limited; the sharp devaluation of the Brazilian currency; the general strengthening of the US dollar against the euro and other major currencies between 1998 and 2001, causing Argentina to lose competitiveness in European and other markets since the peso was tied to the appreciated US dollar. The combination of these shocks slowed GDP growth in the second half of 1998 and produced an increasing recession until 2001.<sup>591</sup>

640. Fiscal deficits and debt accumulation worsened after 1998 because of a fall in revenues, a cyclical increase in spending and the sharp increase in interest payments resulting from the sharp increase in the foreign debt sovereign spread and domestic interest rates. Fiscal deficit and debt accumulation were exacerbated by an increase in nominal and interest rates for Argentina after 1998, due partly to the worsening domestic fiscal position and the successive Governments' inability to achieve sufficient surpluses.<sup>592</sup>
641. Other structural vulnerabilities included: the reduced openness of the economy due to a long history of inward-oriented trade policies; labour market rigidities; a very large external debt-to-exports ratio; and an enormous currency mismatch due to the fact that almost the entire domestic and external Government debt was denominated in dollars.<sup>593</sup>
642. According to Professor Roubini, these factors made the fixed exchange rate regime inconsistent with economic fundamentals and led to a currency crisis. Argentina's macroeconomic hands were tied since it could not adjust its currency peg without bankrupting many firms while its high existing debt prevented it from running a counter-cyclical fiscal policy.<sup>594</sup>
643. In their rebuttal of the Edwards Report, Professors Frenkel and Damill contend, first, that since macroeconomics are not an experimental science, the views put forward by Professor Edwards are only his own.<sup>595</sup> They are of the opinion that external factors were the proximate cause of the crisis (the decline of export prices, the US dollar revaluation, the massive drop in the prices of emerging market bonds, the subsequent rise of country risk premium and interest rates after the Eastern Asia crisis, and the devaluation of the Brazilian currency). Regarding individual issues raised by the Edwards Report, the following is noted by Damill and Frenkel:

<sup>595</sup> Mario Damill and Roberto Frenkel, Diagnosis of the Crisis and Measures of the Argentine government, and reply to Professor Sebastian Edwards Report [hereinafter Damill and Frenkel Report], § 171. Annex to the Rejoinder.

- (a) a high level of wages, reducing the competitiveness of the economy: reforms were implemented in the 1990's which, according to Professor Edwards, were not sufficient to solve the problem; to reach the required labour market flexibility, however, would have meant an increase in the unemployment rate, thus worsening the problem;<sup>596</sup>
- (b) as to the measures which, according to Professor Edwards, should have been adopted in 2001 to avoid the devaluation, the default by the public debt and the pesification, they were: (i) exchanging bonds for bonds with longer maturity and, possibly, a lower interest rate: this took place in June 2001 through a voluntary debt swap (megaswap), but with no result;<sup>597</sup> (ii) "dollarisation": this was not feasible since the Central Bank would not have had available the amount of liquid US dollars needed to implement the measure; furthermore, it would have meant a dollarisation by the GOA of private contracts in order to change their currency from Argentine Pesos to US dollars, with the same effects that were complained of for the pesification, without the withdrawal of bank deposits being prevented.<sup>598</sup>

644. Regarding the fiscal evolution, Professor Edwards selectively quoted figures from secondary sources.<sup>599</sup> According to Professor Edwards' sources, Argentina's fiscal performance, improved during 1992-1996, declined in 1997 (2.1% of the GDP), climbed to 3.7% in 1998 and 6.6% in 1999. Professors Damill's and Frenkel's figures, based on more reliable sources, are different, showing a deficit of just 0.56% of the GDP in the 1991-1994 period. The difference is due to the fact that Edwards' secondary source considers debts incurred before the introduction of the currency board as expenditures. Between 1995 and 1997, the fiscal situation deteriorated because of the pension system reform implemented from 1994 onward.<sup>600</sup> Fiscal surplus in any case is not synonymous with immunity to crisis. The fiscal situation significantly deteriorated from 1997 on, when the economy was affected by external shocks.<sup>601</sup>

645. As to the role of the Provinces in the deterioration of fiscal accounts during the development of the crisis, Professor Edwards, according to Frenkel and Damill, fails to consider that a reform in this area would have involved major institutional problems (Argentina being a federal State) and taken a lot of time. After all, the provincial deficit had a limited influence on the increase in the aggregate imbalance of public accounts during the crisis.<sup>602</sup>
646. As to external shocks being only “temporary,” this fails to consider that even though temporary, they may have lasting effects. The Brazilian crisis caused extensive damage to the Argentine economy.<sup>603</sup>
647. As to Argentina’s economy being “closed,” Frenkel and Damill point out that Argentina initiated more open trade at the beginning of the 90s. However, the ratio between international and domestic trade flows depends not only on such governmental policies but also on the behaviour of individuals. The degree of openness rose until 1997, dropped in 1998-2001, to rise again thereafter. So, trade protectionism did not frustrate the design of Argentina’s economic policy.<sup>604</sup>
648. During the hearing, Professors Damill and Frenkel mentioned that a financial system may collapse “if [the process is] not arrested in time and if measures are not taken to arrest it, if the State does not intervene to break those trends.”<sup>605</sup> There was an improvement in Argentina’s fiscal policy due to measures adopted during 1998-2001, but it was not sufficient to prevent contagion by the

(v) The Application of Article XI: The Tribunal's Analysis of the State's Contribution to the Economic Crisis of 2001

649. In addressing the question of whether Argentina contributed to the situation of necessity on which it relies to assert the lawfulness of the measures taken by it, the Tribunal will be guided essentially by two considerations. On the one hand, it acknowledges Argentina's right as a sovereign State to choose the economic policy best suited to the needs of the population. In that respect, the Tribunal is far from suggesting that actions by Argentina were specifically intended to hurt foreign investors or some of them, as Argentina appears to understand the Claimant's position.<sup>607</sup> On the other hand, it will take due account of the fact that the protection offered by the BIT to the Claimant's investment is suspended to the extent that Article XI is applicable, which makes it necessary to analyse carefully all the conditions for the application of that Article.

650. In conducting this analysis, the Tribunal shall not adopt a restrictive interpretation of necessity and its consequences under Article XI, as has been done by other tribunals in connection with the state-of-necessity defence under Article 25 of the ILC's Articles.<sup>608</sup> As mentioned in its Decision on Jurisdiction in the present dispute,

“[t]his Tribunal considers that a balanced interpretation is needed, taking into account both State sovereignty and the State's responsibility to create an adapted and evolutionary framework for the development of economic activities, and the necessity to protect foreign investment and its continuing flow.”<sup>609</sup>

It will rely on the evidence made available by the Parties in these proceedings, with very limited consideration of prior decisions in other cases involving

Argentina since the arguments and evidence placed before each tribunal are not the same in every case. Finally, the Tribunal will take account of the fact that, as already mentioned,<sup>610</sup> the Claimant bears the burden proving the facts regarding Argentina's contribution to the economic crisis of 2001.

651. The review of the experts' reports conducted by the Tribunal allows it to single out a few aspects on which there is some convergence of opinions.
652. Argentina's expert, Professor Roubini, acknowledges the significant role that Argentina's fiscal deficits and debt accumulation played in provoking the currency crisis of 2001. Although maintaining that the country's fiscal problems were partly aggravated by recession and external interest rates after 1998, his report suggests that the GOA's lack of fiscal control was already a problem by that time, as is shown by the following quotations:

"Argentina's fiscal deficits and debt accumulation worsened after 1998";

"... while for the first few years the currency board was viable based upon economic fundamentals, starting in 1998 it became increasingly vulnerable and eventually not viable because of: . . . large fiscal imbalances and debt accumulation ...;"

"Fiscal deficits and debt accumulation – partly worsened by recession and external interest rate shocks – made the pegged parity fragile and vulnerable to a speculative attack;"

"In Argentina, persistent fiscal deficits ... led to an accumulation of a growing stock of public debt, particularly as the economy began to shrink and interest rates rose after 1998."<sup>611</sup>

Professor Edwards also considers the absence of fiscal discipline as one of the causes of the economic and currency crisis of 2001.<sup>612</sup>

653. Professor Roubini equally concurs with Professor Edwards' view that Argentina's failure to liberalise labour markets and trade policies played a significant role in bringing about the 2001 currency crisis. He concedes that Argentina’s “inward-oriented trade policies” and “labour market rigidities” “made the fixed-rate regime fragile and vulnerable to shocks.”<sup>613</sup>

654. The experts diverge in their analysis of responsibility for causing the Argentina economic and currency crisis. While the Edwards Report considers such crisis to have been primarily self-induced by Argentina,<sup>614</sup> Professor Roubini generally attributes the currency collapse to macroeconomic factors as including external shocks, although he concedes that “slippages of fiscal policy”<sup>615</sup> occurred, an expression suggesting a reduced level of attention or performance.<sup>616</sup>
655. Professors Frenkel and Damill’s rebuttal of the Edwards Report is rather polemical and only in part based on data from external sources;<sup>617</sup> no evidence is provided by the two experts in support of their various contentions. This is striking, considering that the Frenkel-Damill Report was meant to rebut that of Professor Edwards, a comprehensive, very detailed and well-documented work.<sup>618</sup> The remark that Professor Edwards expressed only personal opinions therefore appears misguided.
656. It is clear from the evidence filed in the present proceedings that both internal and external factors were at the root of the economic crisis that occurred in Argentina at the end of 2001. Having fully considered the Parties’ arguments and the evidence before it, a majority of the Tribunal has reached the conclusion that Argentina’s failure to control several internal factors, in particular the fiscal deficit debt accumulation and labour market rigidity, substantially contributed to the crisis. The progressive worsening of internal factors diminished Argentina's ability to respond adequately to external shocks, unlike what happened in other South American countries.

657. The Tribunal's conclusion finds support in independent and authoritative sources. Reference may be made to the IMF Independent Evaluation Office's (IEO) Evaluation Report of 2004: "The IMF and Argentina, 1991-2001."<sup>619</sup> That Report contains a comprehensive analysis of Argentina's situation in that period. The Report was examined and presumably approved by the Argentinian authorities and benefited from substantive contributions by Nouriel Roubini, Argentina's expert in the present proceedings.<sup>620</sup>

The following passages of the IEO Executive Summary are significant:

"The crisis resulted from the failure of Argentina policymakers to take necessary corrective measures sufficiently early, particularly in the consistency of fiscal policy with their choice of exchange rate regime. The IMF on its part erred in the precrisis period by supporting the country's weak policies too long, even after it had become evident in the late 1990s that the political ability to deliver the necessary fiscal discipline and structural reform was lacking."

"While fiscal policy improved substantially from previous decades, the initial gains were not sustained, and the election-driven increase in public spending led to a sharp deterioration in fiscal discipline in 1999. As a result, the stock of public debt steadily increased, diminishing the ability of the authorities to use countercyclical fiscal policy when the recession deepened."

"Insufficient attention was paid to the provincial finances, the sustainable level of public debt for a country with Argentina's economic characteristics was overestimated, and debt sustainability issues received limited attention."

"The IMF correctly identified structural fiscal reforms, social security reform, labour market reform, and financial sector reform as essential to enhancing the medium-term viability of the convertibility regime, by promoting fiscal discipline, flexibility and investment.”

“Some gains were made in the early years, but the long-standing political obstacles to deeper reforms proved formidable. Little progress was made in later years, and the earlier reforms were even reversed in some cases.”<sup>621</sup>

658. A considerable number of statements made by Argentina in official documents, by its own witnesses and by qualified international experts have been placed in evidence in the present proceedings; they confirm the substance of the Edwards Report as well as the analysis and conclusions of the IEO Report. The following statement made in Argentina’s SEC Filing (2004) may be quoted here:

“The sustainability of Argentina’s economic growth during the 1990s was undermined by the Government’s inability to maintain fiscal discipline. Instead of capitalizing on periods of sustained growth and rising revenues to balance its budget and pay down its debt, the Government continued to incur overall fiscal deficits. This resulted primarily from inability to achieve political consensus about needed reforms, failure to reform revenue-sharing arrangements with the provinces, increasing debt service obligations and a widening gap between the Government’s social security revenues and social security outlays attributable to the privatization of the social security system. The Government’s inability to set its finance on a more sustainable course also undermined confidence in Argentina among foreign investors, increasing the Government’s borrowing costs and threatening the capital inflows on which the country had come to depend.”<sup>622</sup>

659. According to the former Argentine Minister of the Economy and Finance, Domingo Cavallo,

“[t]he most important lesson to be learned from the Argentine experience relates to the importance of fiscal policy and, particularly, of fiscal discipline during good times. In my 1994 interview, I emphasized the role of fiscal balance as a precondition for stability. However, stability requires more than just that. During periods of rapid growth and favorable external conditions, it is necessary to generate fiscal surplus as a cushion for the negative external shocks that may show up unexpectedly at any moment. Argentina should have done this between 1991 and 1994, and again between 1996 and 1998, but it did not. Therefore, at the time of external shocks, it depended on foreign financing precisely at a time when foreign expectations turned sour.”<sup>623</sup>

660. Alieto Guadagni, a witness for Argentina and Secretary for Energy in 2002, stated, in an article published in April 2002, that:

“Convertibility proved to be a simple and efficient regime. Yet it failed because it was not supported by a State that would observe the reasonable restrictions on progressive fiscal deficit accumulation, which worked to blow up the colourful balloon of public debt year after year. In January 2002, the balloon finally burst, and the two Ds’ (devaluation and default) started walking the path of uncertainty.”<sup>624</sup>

661. And, on 2 July 2004, Eduardo Duhalde, President of Argentina at the time of the crisis, wrote in the Financial Times that:

“In the case of Argentina, no one bears more of the blame for the crisis than Argentina itself. We spent more than we earned; we failed to complete the full cycle of economic reforms; and we tied ourselves to the most productive economy in the world without building our own productivity. Of course, this was compounded by the global decline in commodity prices, by protectionism in key markets and by shifts in global capital flows. Yet Argentina’s crisis is largely home grown.”<sup>625</sup>

662. In 2002, Professor Gary Becker, 1992 Nobel Economist of the University of Chicago, found that “[t]he current [2002] crisis again is mainly due to politicians who continued to borrow on the international capital market to finance large and growing budget deficits.”<sup>626</sup>

663. The same Professor S. Becker concluded three years later that the GOA's lack of fiscal discipline led to the eventual crisis: "the Argentina problem arose because spending by the government, including the provinces, was very excessive and was not controlled."<sup>627</sup>
664. In an article published on 25 March 2002, Michael Moussa, Senior Fellow, Institute for International Economics in Washington, D.C., wrote:
- "Enumerating the many things that contributed to Argentina's tragedy, however, should not obscure the critical failure of Argentina's economic policy that was the fundamental cause of disaster – namely the chronic inability of the Argentinian authorities to run a responsible fiscal policy. This is an old and a sad story for Argentina."<sup>628</sup>
665. It is true, as has been said, that, "qualified observers remain in disagreement as to the exact causes of the crisis and the mix of measures that might have avoided it."<sup>629</sup> However, having found that Article XI is not "self-judging," the Tribunal has the power and duty to make sure that all conditions for its application are satisfied, including the absence of a substantial contribution by Argentina to the crisis of 2001. While accepting that "in economic matters, the analysis of causation ... does not lend itself to the same scientific analysis as in the domain of the so-called exact sciences and of natural phenomenon,"<sup>630</sup> the evidence presented by the Claimant regarding the actions and omissions by Argentina until the end of 2001, and Argentina's own admission of its "inability to maintain a fiscal discipline," support the conclusion of a majority of the Tribunal that Argentina contributed to the crisis to a substantial extent, so that Article XI cannot come to its rescue.
666. Arbitrator Stern, while she agrees, as a matter of principle, with the theoretical analysis of the role played by the contribution by a State to a situation of necessity as expressed in paragraphs 613-626, does not consider that, on the concrete level, the contribution of a State to an economic crisis should be lightly assumed – should the US be held responsible of the worldwide sub-prime crisis as it contributed to it, because the SEC did not monitor the banks closely enough? Moreover, she is of the view that, considering the facts of this case, the substantial contribution of the Argentine authorities to the crisis has not been sufficiently proven by strong and uncontroverted evidence presented by the Claimant.

667. Arbitrator Stern disagrees with the far-reaching conclusion by the majority, which is not based, in her view, on an in-depth understanding of the intricacies of economic development. It should not lightly be assumed that a State is responsible for an economic collapse in a liberal market economy, where the invisible hand of the market is more powerful than the hand of the State. The majority, after having presented the experts' evidence on both sides and concluded that the latter diverged on the analysis for the responsibilities of the economic crisis, the Claimant expert considering, not surprisingly, that the crisis was primarily self-induced and the Respondent's expert holding, unsurprisingly too, that the essential factors of the crisis were external shocks. The experts have presented contradictory analyses. The IMF itself recognised that it made mistakes in monitoring Argentina's problems, as can be seen in the citation of one of its reports in paragraph 657 of this Award, where it is recognised that "the IMF on its part erred in the precrisis period."
668. Economics is a complicated science or, better, a complicated art; the mere reading of the analyses of the experts of both Parties show that there is little certainty. In Arbitrator Stern's view, the conclusion reached by the majority is based essentially on a comparative analysis of the expert reports, the Edwards' Report being described as "comprehensive, very detailed and well documented," while the Frenkel/Damil report is said to be "rather polemical and only in part based on data from external sources." In her view, the situation of the Argentine economy was extremely serious and out of control by any definition. Many publicly well known events support this conclusion, and there is no reason to doubt the statement, made by Argentina, that it was "the worst economic crisis (which later became a political and institutional crisis) ever experienced by the Argentine Republic as from its onset in 1810.”<sup>631</sup> A serious clue to the gravity of the crisis was the decrease of Argentina’s contribution to the United Nations:

“In May 2002, the critical situation caused the United Nations Organization General Assembly to reduce Argentina’s contribution to such organization. It was the first time in history that the organization decreased the contribution to be made by a member state and the decision was taken unanimously by its members.”<sup>632</sup>

669. Moreover, according to Arbitrator Stern, the measures adopted were necessary to prevent the crisis from resulting in anarchy and social disintegration and they constituted a suitable means to overcome the chaos. It should also be recorded that the policies followed by Argentina before the crisis were generally supported by the World Bank and that the measures taken to address the crisis had the support and encouragement of the IMF. This has been stressed, for example, in Continental:

“In its Second Review of January 2001, the IMF staff noted that “the external environment worsened in the subsequent months, with external financing to emerging markets nearly drying up. This was compounded by domestic political uncertainties, which raised doubts about the political governability of the country. (...) The authorities have responded to these adverse developments by strengthening the growth orientation of their economic program, through measures aimed at promoting a recovery of investment, and an accelerated implementation of structural reforms.... “In view of the staff, this strategy is appropriate, and deserves the increased financial support of the international community ... A recovery of confidence hinges, in turn, not only on a relatively benign international environment, but perhaps more importantly, on a demonstrated, unwavering commitment by the authorities to a rapid and full implementation of their announced policies.”<sup>633</sup>

670. In other words, Argentina adopted mainstream policies, following the Washington consensus, and earned praise for its conduct from the international financial community. Therefore, Arbitrator Stern is inclined to adopt the same conclusion as in Continental, i.e. that the evidence is insufficient to conclude that the policies adopted by the GOA before the crisis were mainly responsible for the crisis. More could be said on the period during which a state of emergency existed, but this seems unnecessary, considering the decision of the majority. If needed, however, she would adopt dates essentially similar to those adopted by the LG&E tribunal, i.e. from 1 December 2001 to 26 April 2003.<sup>634</sup> As a result of such an approach, the consequences of the measures on the decision to sell taken between 6 January 2002 and 23 April 2003 should not have been considered. However, the minority Arbitrator, being in agreement with the other analyses of the Tribunal, did not consider it necessary to append a dissenting opinion, as the divergence on the application of Article XI does not have far-reaching consequences on the material aspects of the final disposal of the case.

VI. THE CLAIMANT'S DAMAGES

A. CAUSATION

671. The Tribunal has concluded (supra, § 492) that the Respondent breached the fair and equitable treatment standard under Article II(2)(a) of the BIT and that such breach cannot be excused by reference to Article IV(3) (supra, § 533) or – by majority – by reference to Article XI (supra, § 638). Prior to assessing the amount of damages owed the Claimant for breach of the BIT, the Tribunal will examine the issue of causation as discussed by the Parties.<sup>635</sup>

<sup>634</sup> In LG&E, supra note 51, the Tribunal considered that a state of emergency existed from 1 December 2001 to 26 April 2003, stating: “These dates coincide, on the one hand, with the Government’s announcement of the measure freezing funds, which prohibited bank account owners from withdrawing more than one thousand pesos monthly and, on the other hand, with the election of President Kirchner. The Tribunal marks these dates as the beginning and end of the period of extreme crisis in view of the notorious events that occurred during this period.” § 230.

1. The Parties' Positions

(i) The Claimant's Position

672. Argentina's argument that losses were due to macroeconomic conditions and that the Claimant "bought high" in 1997 and "sold low" in 2003, so that it cannot recover for the "business risk" inherent in such divestiture, is misplaced for a number of reasons.
673. El Paso sold its investment in Argentina not at the "worst possible" time but at a time when equity prices and certain rates also used by Macroconsulting coincided with the historic average of the period January 1992 – April 2006. The claim is not for losses due to a business risk or a perceived "bad investment" but rather for the loss of value of the investment due to the GOA measures violating the Claimant's legal and contractual rights.<sup>636</sup>
674. The discounted cash flow ("DCF") method adopted by the Claimant's expert, LECG, removes from the damages analysis losses due to macroeconomic conditions in Argentina by capturing only those that result directly from the GOA measures.<sup>637</sup>
675. The only reason for Macroconsulting's comparables approach showing damages different from LECG's method is that the actual equity value of CAPEX and Costanera was substantially higher than LECG's due to the arbitrary reduction by 35% of their debts as of 31 December 2001. This means that by simply correcting this aspect, the two valuations are very similar, thus showing the soundness of LECG's work.<sup>638</sup>
676. Therefore, LECG's valuation methodology takes into account only the measures and not the macroeconomic situation, but nothing but the measures, considered to be the sole cause of the sale, the consequences of the crisis having been eliminated from the calculation.

(ii) The Respondent's Position

677. Argentina contends that there is no causal connection between the alleged breach and the losses that El Paso alleges to have incurred. For such connection to exist, the internationally wrongful act must be the proximate cause of the loss, which is not denied by the Claimant.<sup>639</sup>
678. According to Argentina, two criteria have been applied by international courts to determine such proximate cause, one objective (the damage must be the natural and normal result of the wrongful act) and one subjective (the damage was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of that act or was so intended by the perpetrator).<sup>640</sup> Not only has the Claimant not proven the causality link; it has, rather, confirmed having caused the losses by its own acts.
679. None of the GOA measures constitutes the proximate cause of the damage alleged by the Claimant, regardless of whether the objective or the subjective criterion is applied, since they result from the macroeconomic, social and political situation suffered by Argentina as of late 2001. The damage allegedly suffered by El Paso were caused by the latter's decision to sell its assets in the worst time of the crisis in Argentina, as confirmed by the 2003 Report to the SEC and by Macroconsulting's comparables method.<sup>641</sup> Should it be held that there is a causal connection between the GOA measures and the Claimant's damage, the Claimant should bear part of such damage, having decided to sell at the time when the country's macroeconomic conditions had considerably reduced the value of its investment.<sup>642</sup>
680. Contrary to the comparables method used by Macroconsulting, the DCF method is a sophisticated device that requires much information and makes assumptions regarding several variables, so that this device can be easily manipulated by the party using it.<sup>643</sup>

681. Argentina's primary position is that its measures played no role at all in the decision of El Paso to sell its shares, its secondary position being that the decision to sell in 2003 resulted also from economic considerations by the Claimant, with the consequence that the latter's decision played a role in the damage suffered by it.

2. The Tribunal's Analysis

682. The Tribunal shares the view expressed by other investment treaty tribunals that the test of causation is whether there is a sufficient link between the damage and the treaty violation.<sup>644</sup>

683. In essence, the Respondent contends that there is no causal connection between the GOA measures and the damage allegedly suffered by the Claimant since the latter decided to sell at the worst possible time of the financial crisis, the country's macroeconomic conditions at that time being the cause of the reduced value of its investment.<sup>645</sup>

684. It cannot be denied that the general economic situation was taken into account by El Paso when deciding the sale in question.<sup>646</sup> However, contrary to what is mentioned by Argentina,<sup>647</sup> there is no contribution by the Claimant to a loss it suffered due to its own conduct, in the absence of wilful or negligent action by the Claimant.<sup>648</sup> The Tribunal does not view the sale by the Claimant of its

See also the Report of the International Law Commission to the UN General Assembly on the Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, 2001: "Various terms are used to describe the link which must exist between the wrongful act and the injury in order for the obligation of reparation to arise. investment in the Argentinian companies as a wilful or negligent action, “i.e. an action which manifests a lack of due care on the part of the victim of the breach for his or her own property or right.”<sup>649</sup> The Tribunal has examined the relationship between the sale of El Paso’s shares in the Argentinian companies and the GOA measures in the context of determining whether such measures may be considered a violation of the FET standard, concluding that the measures were the prevailing cause of the sale.<sup>650</sup>

685. The Tribunal is satisfied that LECG has calculated the Claimant’s damage under its DCF valuation method by considering only damage directly attributable to the GOA measures, to the exclusion of damage which might be attributable to the financial crisis. As explained by LECG:

“In our DCF Approach (both the 2004 and the 2006 update we discuss below), the macroeconomic indicators, as well as all available ex-post company performance information are included in the building of cash flows from January 2002 onwards. Thus, the DCF analysis is based on actual sales volumes and costs that fully reflect all the actual macroeconomic conditions in which the companies have been operating in Argentina since January 2002 to date. This is true for both the but for and actual scenarios, so as to make the comparison between the two scenarios compatible and avoid attributing damages to factors other than the Government measures. In other words, volumes and costs reflect the impact of the 2002 recession, and of the dramatic economic recovery of 2003 onwards.”<sup>651</sup>

686. The circumstance that the valuation of the Claimant’s damage, based on LECG’s DCF method, refers only to the impact of the measures on the value of its investment is confirmed by the Tribunal’s Expert, Professor Geoffron, in his Report of 6 April 2010.<sup>652</sup> The Respondent has criticised the use of the DCF method<sup>653</sup> but has not disputed the fact that LECG's has only considered the effect of the GOA measures on the value of the Claimant's investment when evaluating the latter's damage.

687. The Tribunal has held previously that the Respondent's measures were a contributory cause of the damage suffered by the Claimant for the loss of value of its investment in the Argentinian companies.<sup>654</sup> The Tribunal concludes that a causal connection exists between the GOA measures and the Claimant's damage.

B. COMPENSATION

1. The Parties' Positions

688. What follows is a summary of each Party's position regarding compensation due to the Claimant for breach of the BIT. More will be said on the subject when analysing the Tribunal's Expert's reports discussing the position of the Parties' accounting experts on the various issues relating to the damages assessment.

(i) The Claimant's Position

689. El Paso claims damages based on the loss of value of its investment due to GOA measures taken in violation of its legal and contractual rights and not, as alleged by the Respondent, because it sold in bad macroeconomic conditions.<sup>655</sup>

690. The amount claimed is estimated by LECG on the basis of two alternative valuation methodologies, the DCF and the transactions methods.<sup>656</sup> Both methods are reasonable and valid means to calculate the damage inflicted by the GOA measures on the Claimant.<sup>657</sup> LECG's Updated Report demonstrates that

as of 31 December 2006 the Claimant suffered damage amounting to US$ 147 million under the DCF method and US$ 210 million under the transactions method.<sup>658</sup> The amount under the DCF method is increased in LECG's Report of 22 March 2007 to US$ 228.2 million (including export withholding taxes up to February 2012).

691. The DCF model takes into account the conditions prevailing after the sales made in 2003 (such as current crude oil prices) since it assumes that El Paso would not have sold its investments in the absence of the GOA measures. The transactions method measures the Claimant's damage by comparing what a reasonable buyer would have paid for the assets in mid-2003 in the absence of the GOA measures to El Paso's actual sale proceeds in the light of the measures, therefore not using post-sale information.<sup>659</sup>
692. Contrary to Argentina's contention that the DCF method has "a high degree of uncertainty and includes an uncertain loss of profits",<sup>660</sup> that method is the most recognised and applied, as shown by other cases involving the Argentinian measures at issue in the present case.<sup>661</sup> El Paso is not claiming lost profits but rather the reduction of the market value of its Argentinian assets as a result of the GOA measures, even if a key component of the DCF method is future cash flows, which is analogous to accounting profits.<sup>662</sup>

(ii) The Respondent's Position

693. As already mentioned (supra, § 672), Argentina contends that even if it were found liable for breach of the BIT, the damage asserted by El Paso would not be the proximate consequence of that breach.<sup>663</sup> It asserts further that the sale by El

Paso took place at one of the worst moment of the Argentinian economy and that the sales were due to El Paso's own problems.<sup>664</sup>

694. Always according to Argentina, it is unreasonable to take into account post-sale conditions (such as current crude oil prices) in the damages assessment since, on the one side, El Paso cannot benefit from the increase in the price of the assets marketed following the sale of its investments<sup>665</sup> and, on the other side, this contradicts Article IV(1) of the BIT under which “compensation shall be equivalent to the fair market value of the expropriated investment immediately before the expropriatory action was taken ....”<sup>666</sup>
695. The DCF method embodies a wide range of inherently speculative elements, as stated by the International Law Commission (“ILC”) and by arbitral awards.<sup>667</sup> The Claimant's statement that the damages claimed is not uncertain since it does not include any loss of profits is incorrect, considering that with the DCF method lucrum cessans becomes the sole element of compensation, as held by the Amoco v. Iran tribunal.<sup>668</sup>
696. According to the Claimant, the compensation standard should be the same as that applicable in cases of expropriation, namely fair market value. This is wrong, since the compensation applying in cases of expropriation cannot be obtained for the lower responsibility threshold of other Treaty violations.<sup>669</sup> Additionally, damage deriving from the export withholdings on hydrocarbons cannot be included in the calculation of damages.<sup>670</sup>
697. LECG's assessment of damages presents serious errors regarding its methodology and the assumptions made, as stated in the Counter-Memorial and the Macroconsulting's reports.<sup>671</sup> There are also doubts regarding the sum obtained from the sale of El Paso's investment in CAPSA, so that LECG's use of that sum to assess the damages is also suspicious.<sup>672</sup>

2. The Tribunal's Analysis

698. The Tribunal has duly considered the reports and testimonies of the experts retained by each Party, Dr. Manuel Abdala and Dr. Pablo T. Spiller of LECG (for the Claimant), Dr. Martín Rodríguez Pardina of Macroconsulting (for the Respondent). In view of the number and complexity of the accounting issues relating to the damages assessment, as evidenced by the diverging views given on many relevant questions by the Parties' experts, the Tribunal, with the agreement of the Parties, has appointed its own expert in the person of Professor Patrice Geoffron, Professor of Economics at the University Paris-Dauphine (the "Expert").
699. The Report produced by the Expert on 6 April 2010 (the "April Report") was transmitted to the Parties on 14 April 2010. The Expert answered the observations made by the Parties on 21 May 2010 on the April Report, as directed by the Tribunal, by a "Complementary Note" of 10 July 2010 (the "July Report"), followed by a Final Revision of 12 October 2010 (the "October Report"). Both the July and October Reports were transmitted to the Parties on 22 November 2010 and comments thereon were filed by the Parties on 27 December 2010. The Expert's Reports and the Parties' comments shall be examined by the Tribunal in the context of determining the damages due to the Claimant. This will be done after establishing the principles that should govern the valuation of the damages in the present case.

(i) The Indemnification Standard

700. The BIT does not specify the standard for evaluating damages to which the investor is entitled in case of breach of a standard of treatment, such as that of fair and equitable treatment (as in the present case). Only in the event of lawful expropriation, which is not a treaty breach, Article IV (1) of the BIT refers to the “fair market value” immediately before expropriation. In the absence of an agreed criterion, the appropriate standard of reparation under international law is compensation for the losses suffered by the party affected, as established by the Permanent Court of International Justice (“PCIJ”) in the Factory of Chorzów case (“Chorzów Factory”) in 1928:

“The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act – a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals – is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and re-establish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed.”<sup>673</sup>

701. Many tribunals have applied this principle in deciding on damages due for breach of the standard of fair and equitable treatment.<sup>674</sup> As noted by the tribunal in SD Myers v. Canada, the silence of the treaty indicates the intention of the drafters “to leave it open to tribunals to determine a measure of compensation appropriate to the specific circumstances of the case,”<sup>675</sup> adding that “whatever precise approach is taken, it should reflect the general principle of international law that compensation should undo the material harm inflicted by a breach of an international obligation.”<sup>676</sup>
702. In cases involving Argentina where, absent a finding of expropriation, a breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard under the BIT was found, other tribunals have held that damage should compensate for the difference in the “fair market value” of the investment resulting from the Treaty breach.<sup>677</sup> Fair market value has been so defined:

“the price, expressed in terms of cash equivalents, at which property would change hands between a hypothetical willing and able buyer and a hypothetical willing and able seller, acting at arm’s length in an open and unrestricted market, when neither is under compulsion to buy or sell and when both have reasonable knowledge of the relevant facts.”<sup>678</sup>

703. The Tribunal shares this approach. The “fair market value” standard shall therefore be adopted to determine the value of the loss suffered by the Claimant by comparing the fair market value of El Paso’s investment with and without the GOA measures (respectively, the actual and the but for scenarios).
704. Fair market value is the valuation standard adopted by the BIT to calculate compensation due in case of lawful expropriation under Article IV(1). However, in the present case; the Tribunal is not confronted with a lawful expropriation but with a breach of the BIT. The majority of the Tribunal takes account of the difference between the two situations and of the fact that, as established by the dictum in the Chorzów Factory case, “reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act.” The fair market value in the but for scenario shall be calculated considering also data and information which became known after 1 January 2002, including after El Paso’s sales in 2003, to the extent they are representative of financially assessable damages.<sup>679</sup> Arbitrator Stern considers that a fair market value evaluation of damage resulting from a violation of FET should only take into account what a willing buyer and a willing seller could foresee at the time of the interference with the investor’s rights. However, as, for reasons explained in paragraph 736, the Tribunal finally relies on a valuation taking into account the prices of oil as foreseen in 2003, at the time of the sale, she does not expand on the theoretical aspects of the question of the indemnification standard and the time of valuation.
705. These valuation criteria are in keeping with principles of public international law. It is worth reproducing the relevant passage of the Judgment in the Chorzów Factory case:

“Restitution in kind, or, if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear; the award, if need be, of damages for loss sustained which would not be covered by restitution in kind or payment in place of it – such are the principles which should serve to determine the amount of compensation due for an act contrary to international law ... The dispossession of an industrial undertaking ... then involves the obligation to restore the undertaking and, if this be not possible, to pay its value at the time of the indemnification, which value is designed to take the place of restitution which has become impossible.”<sup>680</sup>

(ii) The Valuation Date

706. To pay the value of the property “at the time of indemnification”, as stated by the above dictum, means that the property (in our case, El Paso’s participation in the Argentinian companies) is to be evaluated by reference not to the time of the dispossession, as in the case of a lawful expropriation, but to the time when compensation is paid. Compensation is in fact in lieu of restitution that “has become impossible”, so that it should correspond “to the value which a restitution in kind would bear” (as stated by the Chorzów Factory Judgment in the passage cited).
707. In the Amco Asia v. Indonesia Resubmitted Case, the respondent State was found by the ICSID tribunal responsible for an unlawful interference with the Claimant’s rights to develop and operate a hotel complex in Indonesia. The tribunal emphasised the difference of the standard of damages after an unlawful act, which should be based on the principle of full reparation, and the standard of compensation after a lawful expropriation:

“It may, on one view, be the case that in a lawful taking, Amco would have been entitled to the fair market value of the contract at the moment of dispossession. In making such a valuation, a Tribunal in 1990 would necessarily exclude factors subsequent to 1980. But if Amco is to be placed as if the contract had remained in effect, then subsequent known factors bearing on that performance are to be reflected in the valuation technique ...”<sup>681</sup>

708. The tribunal emphasised the reasons why developments up to the time of the award had to be taken into account:

“Foreseeability not only bears on causation rather than on quantum, but it would anyway be an inappropriate test for damages that approximate to restitution in integrum. The only subsequent factors relevant to value which are not to be relied on are those attributable to the illegality itself.”<sup>682</sup>

709. In making its assessment of damages, the tribunal further stated:

“But as to valuation techniques for 1980-1989 the tribunal will not use the perspective of what the reasonable businessman in 1980 could foresee, because for this period it can use known data for relevant factors.”<sup>683</sup>

710. Article 36 (“Compensation”) of the ILC Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts provides the following:

“1. The State responsible for an internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to compensate for the damage caused thereby, insofar as such damage is not made good by restitution.

2. The compensation shall cover any financially assessable damage, including loss of profits insofar as it is established.”

After considering the above dictum in the Chorzów Factory case, the ILC’s Commentary of this Article concludes that “the function of compensation is to address the actual losses incurred as a result of the internationally wrongful act.”<sup>684</sup> The reference to “loss of profits” in Article 36(2) confirms that the value of the property should be determined with reference to a date subsequent to that of the internationally wrongful act, provided the damage is “financially assessable”, therefore not speculative. The Tribunal shares this position.

(iii) The Valuation Method

711. The Expert’s opinion is that “the Transaction approach presents uncertain reliability for assessing economic damages in the context of the Argentine crisis,”<sup>685</sup> while the Comparable method, proposed by Macroconsulting, is not favored by financial practitioners “due to the restricted reliability of sounds sets of comparables in the local market.”<sup>686</sup> The DCF method is preferred, as being “by far the most widely used as a primary valuation tool.”<sup>687</sup>
712. The Tribunal endorses the choice of the DCF method as being the most appropriate in the circumstances, considering also its consistency with the Expert’s chosen valuation standard. The method has been used widely, including by numerous arbitral tribunals in similar circumstances.<sup>688</sup> It makes it possible to assess the loss of value of El Paso’s investment due solely to the GOA measures, including the Argentinian companies’ capacity, as going concerns, to generate returns.

(iv) The Tribunal’s Findings

713. Having established the valuation standard to be applied and the methodology to be used, the Tribunal shall now examine the Expert’s Reports insofar as they also respond to the Parties’ comments. This will allow the Tribunal to establish to what extent the Expert’s findings and conclusions may be shared as to individual issues bearing on the quantum determination. The Tribunal’s analysis shall be concluded by the assessment of the amount of compensation due to the Claimant for the breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard under the BIT.

714. The DCF method having been chosen, it is correct to take LECG's DCF model as the basis for damages assessment, as was done by the Expert. Macroconsulting having chosen another method, LECG's model is the only DCF model available.
715. The Tribunal has analysed LECG's DCF model with the Expert's assistance and is satisfied that it conforms to the principles that are to be applied to assess El Paso's damages in the frame of the chosen valuation standard. Reference is made in particular to LECG's explanations of the chosen methodology and to how cash flows have been built.<sup>689</sup>
716. The Tribunal has initially submitted to the Expert a number of questions under the "Terms of Reference for the Independent Expert Appointed by the Tribunal".<sup>690</sup> Six issues have been examined by the Expert's Reports in answer to the Tribunal's questions<sup>691</sup>:

(a) the WAAC

<sup>689</sup> LECG's Updated Report, §§ 145-147, footnotes omitted. "In our DCF Approach (both the 2004 and the 2006 update we discuss below), the macroeconomic indicators, as well as all available ex-post company performance information is included in the building of cash flows from January 2002 onwards. Thus, the DCF analysis is based on actual sales volumes and costs that fully reflect all the actual macroeconomic conditions in which the companies have been operating in Argentina since January 2002 to date. This is true for both the but for and actual scenarios, so as to make the comparison between the two scenarios compatible and avoid attributing damages to factors other than the Government measures. In other words, volumes and costs reflect the impact of the 2002 recession, and of the dramatic economic recovery of 2003 onwards.

Consider, for example, the calculation of the companies' operating costs. All cost components such as labor, as well as other costs that are not linked to revenue or output levels are the same in the but for and actual scenarios and are invariant to the Government measures.

The only cost component that is attributable to the Government measures (the cost of natural gas for Central Costanera) is modelled differently between the but for and the actual. In this way, we strictly capture damages that are solely attributable to the measures, and not due to any other differences between scenarios.

Furthermore, in our DCF analysis we assumed domestic sales were affected by the economic crisis. Indeed, in both the actual and but for scenarios, El Paso's electricity generation companies' output declined in 2002, immediately after the crisis. The reduction in output reflects the impact of the recession on electricity sales, which affected Capex (a reduction of 10% as compared to 2001 output) and Central Costanera (a 36% reduction). Our damage analysis fully takes this impact into account, by subjecting both the but for and the actual scenario to the same macroeconomic shock. Thus, all effects from the devaluation of 2002 as well as the macroeconomic factors surrounding it are fully taken into account in our damage analysis in a way that is consistent with the computation of damages attributable to the Government measures only."

- (b) the debt discount
- (c) the withholding tax
- (d) the oil prices
- (e) the benefits accruing to El Paso from the pesification and other measures
- (f) the value collected by El Paso for the sale of the Argentinian companies.

717. The Tribunal is satisfied that, by dealing with these issues, the Expert's Reports answer adequately the questions submitted to him.

(a) The WAAC

718. The Parties' experts have proposed widely divergent discount rates regarding the WAAC. Macroconsulting's rate averages 35%, while LECG's rate averages 12-13%. The April Report criticises both rates, the former as not reflecting a fair market value since it attributes "all the value variation to the economic crisis" while the latter is "too low to reflect the increasing risk to private investors in December 31st, 2001", so as to be "strangely 'immune' from the economic crisis."<sup>692</sup>

719. In discussing what should be the appropriate discount rate for 31 December 2001, the April Report underlines that, contrary to LECG's analysis, private investors are not immune from the consequences of a sovereign default, being indirectly exposed to Argentina's sovereign credit risk.<sup>693</sup> This leads the Expert to "upgrade" the discount rate proposed by LECG, the latter being consistent with a risk assessment in November 2001 but not reflecting the increasing threat to private investors in December 2001.

720. This consideration leads the Expert to re-evaluate the discount rate proposed by LECG according to the change in the country risk between November and December 2001. Following the Claimant's expert's remark, the final WAAC's values retained by the Expert are 15.45% for electricity and 15.43% for hydrocarbons.<sup>694</sup>

721. The Tribunal shares the Expert's view that the discount rate, in a situation such as that confronting Argentina at the end of 2001, must consider the increase in the country risk between November and December 2001. The Expert's measure of LECG's WAACs is reasonable, as is confirmed by the result of the calculation which, while accounting for the increased country risk, does not make the new WAACs incompatible with fair market value. The re-evaluated WAACs are therefore accepted.

(b) The Debt Discount

722. Here again the Parties' experts have expressed widely divergent views. LECG states that no discount should be applied to the debts of Costanera (US$ 383 million) and CAPEX (US$ 285 million) since the book value of the two companies' debts before and after the GOA measures were similar due to the implementation of debt restructuring agreements with the lenders. Applying a discount to such value would therefore, according to LECG, not make sense economically. Macroconsulting, on the contrary, stresses that the completion of the debt restructuring in 2005 is not relevant to the debt values in December 2001 and that account should be taken of the economic crisis of the period.
723. The Expert opines that keeping unchanged the book value of the debts in a turbulent period such as that characterising Argentina's economy in December 2001 would not be in line with the dominant view in the literature. He proposes to apply a debt discount that is not to be ascribed entirely to the economic crisis, as proposed by Macroconsulting, but that reflects the negative and continued impacts of both the GOA measures and the crisis in the actual scenario and only the impact of the crisis in the but for scenario.<sup>695</sup>

724. By following an approach inspired by the reasoning adopted to re-evaluate the WAACs, the Expert proposes a debt discount of 35% in the actual scenario and of 26.25% in the but for scenario.<sup>696</sup> This assessment was subsequently confirmed by the Expert.<sup>697</sup>
725. The Tribunal agrees with the Expert that keeping the value of Costanera's and CAPEX' debts unchanged in the turbulent period experienced by Argentina's economy in December 2001 would not reflect the real value of the debts. A discount should therefore be applied to reconcile their value with the market value. The Tribunal also agrees that a debt discount should be separately calculated for the but for scenario and for the actual scenario, as proposed by the Expert and accepts the two figures proposed by the Expert.

726. The April Report distinguishes between a direct effect of the withholding tax (external effect) and an indirect effect (internal effect).<sup>698</sup> The direct effect of the withholding tax is the normal operation and effect of a tax, in this case the direct appropriation by the State of revenues accruing to CAPSA and CAPEX from the export of crude oil and LPG; while the indirect effect consists in artificially depressing domestic crude oil and LPG price.<sup>699</sup>
727. The Tribunal has already excluded its jurisdiction regarding the withholding tax, holding that the tax imposed by Argentina on the export of crude oil and LPG in 2002 and thereafter is a tax measure under Article XII (2) of the BIT.<sup>700</sup> The Expert has correctly removed from LECG's DCF model the direct effect of the withholding tax by excluding from the damages calculation the lost

revenues for CAPSA (on crude oil exports) and CAPEX (on crude oil and LPG exports) due to the withholding tax.<sup>701</sup>

728. The indirect effect of the withholding tax requires more developments by the Tribunal. The starting point is the precise identification of this effect. This is described as follows by the Claimant:

”On the other hand, Export Withholdings have the effect of artificially depressing domestic prices for those products that are subject to these levies. This is because the Export Withholdings produce what is known as the “export parity.” Buyers in the domestic market will predictably refrain from paying a price to the producer that is higher than the net price the producer would receive (after deducting export costs, including any Export Withholdings) if the product is exported. Consequently, due to the Export Withholdings, CAPSA and CAPEX were forced to accept prices for their domestic sales of crude oil and LPG that were significantly lower than those prices that would have prevailed in the domestic market in the absence of the Export Withholdings.”<sup>702</sup>

729. May the indirect effect of the withholding tax be deemed to fall within the scope of Article XII(2) of the BIT, so that the Tribunal’s lack of jurisdiction extend to any consideration or ruling regarding this effect? The Tribunal believes this to be the case, for the following reasons.

730. Article XII(2) of the BIT, when interpreted “in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose”,<sup>703</sup> is meant to preserve the State’s sovereign power in “matters of taxation”, the latter being clearly an attribute of sovereignty. Contracting States agreed therefore to exclude matters of taxation from the system of guarantees and protections of foreign investments established by the BIT in order to preserve their full sovereignty in that regard. This being the object and purpose of Article XII(2), it is for this reason that the Tribunal has declined jurisdiction regarding the withholding tax.<sup>704</sup>

731. Is the export parity effect described by the Claimant a “matter of taxation” within the meaning of Article XII(2), interpreted as mentioned above? The answer is in the affirmative. In its ordinary meaning, the expression “matters of taxation” is not limited to the levy and collection by the State of the specific tax but includes all effects of the tax on the taxpayer. The Tribunal shares the Respondent’s view that not only the withholding tax as such falls within the scope of Article XII(2) of the BIT but also its indirect effects.<sup>705</sup>
732. The export parity effect (the indirect effect of the withholding tax) should therefore be excluded from the damages calculation. Having been so directed by the Tribunal, the Expert, in the October Report, has excluded any withholding tax effects, both local and external.<sup>706</sup>

(d) The Oil Prices

733. The Tribunal has decided that the valuation standard to be applied for the calculation of El Paso’s damages enables it to consider data and information which became known subsequent to the date of the first GOA measures, 1 January 2002.<sup>707</sup> Crude oil prices have been taken into consideration by LECG in the DCF model submitted by the Claimant in support of the claim for damages by using crude oil futures as of 2004<sup>708</sup> and as of 2006.<sup>709</sup>

---

<sup>704</sup> Supra, § 289: “The tax policy of a country is a matter relating to the sovereign power of the State and the State’s power to impose taxes within its territory. The Tribunal must emphasise the sovereign right of a State to enact tax measures it deems appropriate in any particular time.”

<sup>709</sup> LECG’s Updated Report, § 210: “We updated crude oil prices up to September 2006 and from then onwards we use a WTI Future prices that converge to US $ 50 per barrel in 2012.” Historical price data for WTI (West Texas Intermediate, a type of crude oil) are publicly available.

734. LECG's damages assessment based on said crude oil futures is consistent with the valuation standard adopted by the Tribunal to determine the fair market value of El Paso's investment in the but for scenario. Crude oil prices during the period are reported internationally so that a loss of profits based on such prices is financially assessable and not speculative.<sup>710</sup>
735. Consistent with the above, the Expert's reduction of the LECG's damages assessment by considering only information available in 2002<sup>711</sup> was not accepted by the Tribunal. The Expert was directed to prepare two alternative solutions, one applying the 2003 oil prices, the other integrating oil prices to include future prices. The October 2010 Report accordingly presents two different valuations, the first (Valuation 1) applying the "2003 futures / oil prices" and the other (Valuation 2) applying oil prices up to 2020, both valuations excluding the withholding tax effects.<sup>712</sup>
736. In the Tribunal's view, Valuation 2 is more problematic since it is based on oil prices that, by projecting the calculation up to 2020, make the result financially not assessable on safe grounds, thus providing to be speculative. The Tribunal's choice is therefore for the more reliable results of Valuation 1.

(e) The Benefits Accruing to El Paso from the Pesification and Other Measures

737. The Expert confirms that the positive impact of the pesification has been integrated by LECG in its DCF model,<sup>713</sup> adding that this specific issue is not mentioned by Macroconsulting in its Second Report.<sup>714</sup> No benefits from other measures are mentioned.
738. The Tribunal is satisfied that benefits accruing to El Paso as a result of the GOA measures have been duly considered by the Claimant's expert reports.

739. Based on LECG's reports, the total price collected by El Paso for the sale of its interest in Argentina in 2003 is equal to US$ 32.7 million.<sup>715</sup> Contrary to the Claimant's contention,<sup>716</sup> the Respondent asserts that there are serious doubts on the price actually received by El Paso and that there is no trace of the 2003 transactions in the DCF damages assessment under LECG's DCF model.<sup>717</sup>
740. Having initially considered that the price so collected by El Paso should be deducted from the DCF damages,<sup>718</sup> following further analysis the Expert has concluded that the price collected by El Paso for the sale of its participation in the Argentinian companies in 2003 should not be deducted to determine the damages amount since the DCF damages calculation assumes that the Claimant continues to keep its shareholding in said companies.<sup>719</sup>
741. Following the Parties' observations of 27 December 2010, the Tribunal has requested the Expert to express his final opinion regarding the damages assessment based on Valuation 1. This has led the Expert to recommend to the Tribunal the following modifications to the October Report:
- (a) the increase of the damages for CAPSA by US$ 14.2 million by accepting LECG's suggested correction to withdraw CAPSA's negative damages;<sup>720</sup>
  - (b) the deduction of US$ 2.15 million regarding CAPEX and US$ 0.69 million regarding Costanera, for a total of US$ 2.84 million, suggested by MacroConsulting as correction on the electricity spot prices.<sup>721</sup>

The Expert's recommendations are accepted by the Tribunal.

742. As a result of all modifications of the initial damages assessment under the April Report accepted by the Tribunal, El Paso's total damages amount to US$ 43.03 million. The compensation due by Argentina to El Paso is therefore fixed by the Tribunal to the amount of US$ 43.03 million.

C. INTEREST

1. The Parties' Positions

743. The Claimant has requested interest "at commercially reasonable rate from the date of expropriation", as provided by Article IV of the BIT, to be compounded quarterly through the date of the award.<sup>722</sup> In reply to the Respondent's contention that only simple interest should be awarded, the Claimant, referring to LECG, notes that compound interest "merely reflects the economic reality that a dollar foregone could otherwise have been invested and that income on that investment could have been reinvested so that funds grow at a compound rate."<sup>723</sup> In its last written submission, the Claimant, relying on the Enron award, has requested that interest be awarded at the LIBOR plus 2% rate until the date of payment.<sup>724</sup>

744. Relying on the alleged general position of international courts and tribunals as well as of most authors, Argentina has asserted that simple interest should be granted.<sup>725</sup>

2. The Tribunal's Analysis

745. The Tribunal notes that LIBOR plus 2% is the rate of interest used by other awards involving Argentina regarding the same economic crisis as that considered in the present.<sup>726</sup> Such a rate appears less speculative than other rates of interest granted by other awards involving Argentina. This rate is, therefore, accepted by this Tribunal.

746. Compound interest is generally recognised by arbitral tribunals in the field of investment protection, including all awards in the Argentine cases.<sup>727</sup> The Tribunal shares the view expressed by these awards that compound interest reflects economic reality and will therefore better ensure full reparation of the Claimant's damage. Interest shall be compounded semi-annually, for the same reason.
747. Interest shall run from 1 January 2002, being the date to which the amount of compensation is discounted back in the Expert's Report, until full payment of the amount due.

VII. COSTS OF THE PROCEEDING

748. According to Article 61(2) of the ICSID Convention and Rule 47(1)(j) of the Arbitration Rules, the Tribunal has to decide, as part of the award, the apportionment of the expenses incurred by the Parties in connection with the proceedings as well as of the fees and expenses of the members of the Tribunal and the charges for the use of the facilities and services of the Centre.
749. Each Party has asked the Tribunal that its costs in connection with these proceedings, including the advances made to ICSID for the Centre's charges and the expenses and fees of the arbitrators, be reimbursed to it by the other Party.<sup>728</sup> The Claimant has quantified its costs in the amount of US$ 7,950,823 besides ICSID fees and expenses.<sup>729</sup> The Respondent has quantified its costs, net of ICSID fees and expenses, in the amount of US$ 546,456.71.<sup>730</sup>
750. The Convention and the Arbitration Rules give ICSID tribunals broad discretion in awarding costs. The practice in apportioning costs has sometimes followed the principle "the loser pays" while in many other cases the decision has been that the Parties were to bear their own costs and share equally the fees and expenses of the arbitrators as well as the charges for the use of the Centre's facilities and services.

751. Regarding the present case, the Tribunal notes that the Claimant has been successful on the jurisdictional issue but only in part as to the merits of the case and the damages claimed. There are therefore good reasons to decide, as is hereby decided, that each Party shall bear its own costs connected with the proceedings as well as half of the fees and expenses of the arbitrators and the charges for the use of the Centre's facilities and services.

VIII. DECISION OF THE TRIBUNAL

752. For the foregoing reasons, the Tribunal decides as follows:

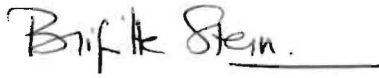

- A) Argentina breached Article II(2)(a) of the BIT by failing to accord fair and equitable treatment to El Paso's investment.
- B) Argentina's defence of necessity to El Paso's claims is rejected.
- C) Within 30 (thirty) days of the date of dispatch to the Parties of this Award, Argentina shall pay to El Paso compensation in the sum of US $ 43.03 million, increased by semi-annually compounded interest on that amount at the rate of LIBOR plus 2% from January 1, 2002 until the date of payment in full of this Award.
- D) The Parties shall bear all their own legal costs and expenses, without recourse to each other.
- E) The Parties shall bear equally the costs and expenses of the Tribunal and ICSID.

All other claims by either Party are rejected

I. THE PARTIES

1. Claimants, LG&E Energy Corp. and LG&E Capital Corp. are corporations created and existing under the laws of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, in the United States of America, with domestic and foreign operations.<sup>1</sup> LG&E International Inc. is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, United States of America. Claimants hereinafter will be referred to collectively as “LG&E” or “Claimants.”
2. LG&E has a shareholding interest in three local, gas distributing companies in Argentina created and existing under the laws of Argentina by commandment of the Argentine Government: Distribuidora de Gas del Centro (“Centro”), Distribuidora de Gas Cuyana S.A. (“Cuyana”) and Gas Natural BAN S.A. (“GasBan”), hereinafter collectively referred to as “the licensees”. LG&E owns a controlling equity interest in Centro and minority equity interests in GasBan and Cuyana.
3. Respondent is the Argentine Republic, which along with the United States of America, is a party to the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States (“ICSID Convention” or “Convention”), ratified by the Argentine Republic in 1994 and by the United States of America in 1966. The Bilateral Investment Treaty between the United States of America and the Argentine Republic Concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investments was signed on 14 November 1991 (“BIT”, “the Bilateral Treaty” or the “Treaty”) (and entered into force on 20 October 1994).

<sup>1</sup> Until 1 December 2005, Claimants were LG&E Energy Corp., LG&E Capital Corp. and LG&E International Inc. However, on 26 January 2006, Claimants informed the Tribunal that the name of two of the companies had been modified: LG&E Energy Corp. is now E.ON.US LLC and LG&E Capital Corp. is now E.ON.US. Capital Corp. LG&E International Inc. kept its name. Upon request by the Tribunal, LG&E submitted documents that, in the Tribunal’s opinion, only prove the change of name but not its effects. Respondent remained silent on this issue.

II. THE ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL

4. On 31 January 2002 the Centre's Secretary-General registered Claimants' Request for Arbitration in accordance with Article 36(3) of the ICSID Convention. In accordance with Rule 7 of the Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings ("the Institution Rules"), the Secretary-General gave notice to the parties of the registration of Claimants' Request and invited them to constitute an Arbitral Tribunal as soon as possible.
5. Forthwith, the parties agreed that the Arbitral Tribunal should be formed by three arbitrators, one appointed by the Claimants, another by the Argentine Republic and the third one, called to preside over the Tribunal, would be appointed by the Centre's Secretary-General in accordance with the method agreed upon by the parties.
6. On 20 June 2002, the Claimants appointed Professor Albert Jan van den Berg, a national of the Netherlands, as an arbitrator for this case. Said appointment was ratified by the Claimants by letters to the Centre dated 15 and 28 August 2002. The Argentine Republic, by letter dated 26 August 2002, appointed Judge Francisco Rezek, a Brazilian citizen, as an arbitrator. On 7 November 2002, the Centre's Secretary-General, with the parties' agreement, appointed Dr. Tatiana B. de Maekelt, a citizen of Venezuela, as the Arbitral Tribunal's President.
7. On 13 November 2002, the ICSID's Secretariat, in accordance with Rule 6(1) of the Rules of Procedure for Arbitration Proceedings ("Arbitration Rules"), notified the parties that all the arbitrators had accepted their appointments and that the Tribunal was deemed to be constituted and the proceeding deemed to begun as from that date. On this same day, in accordance with Rule 25 of the ICSID Administrative and Financial Regulations, the parties were informed that Dr. Claudia Frutos-Peterson would act as the Tribunal's Secretary.

III. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

8. On 28 December 2001, ICSID received from LG&E a request for arbitration dated 21 December 2001 against the Argentine Republic.
9. By letter dated 24 January 2002 the Claimants filed with ICSID a supplement to their request for arbitration. Claimants asserted that Respondent had committed further violations of the BIT as a result of the enactment by the Government of the Public Emergency and Currency Exchange Law (“Emergency Law”), which allegedly adversely affected Claimants’ investment in Argentina.
10. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 13, the Tribunal held its first session with the parties at the seat of the Centre in Washington D.C. on 19 December 2002. The parties agreed to set the following schedule for the written procedure: Claimants were to file a Memorial on 31 March 2003. Upon receipt of Claimants’ Memorial, Respondent could choose to file an answer within either 60 or 90 days. In its answer, Respondent was entitled to file exceptions on jurisdiction, and to the extent it deemed necessary, could respond to Claimants’ arguments on the merits. In the event that the Respondent filed a Memorial on Jurisdiction, the Claimants were to file their Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction within 30 days from their receipt of the Respondent’s Memorial on Jurisdiction, followed by Respondent’s Reply on Jurisdiction within 20 days following receipt of Claimants’ Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction, and Claimants’ Rejoinder on Jurisdiction to be filed 20 days from receipt of the Respondent’s Reply on Jurisdiction.
11. With respect to oral procedure, it was also agreed during the first session to set the following schedule based on the written submissions. In the event that Respondent filed its answer within 60 days and if the Tribunal decided so, there was to be a hearing on jurisdiction between 22 and 23 September 2003. In the event that Respondent filed its answer within 90 days, the hearing on jurisdiction, if the Tribunal were in agreement, was to be held on 20 and 21

October 2003. The hearing on the merits was scheduled for 8 through 12 March 2004.

12. The Claimants filed their Memorial on 31 March 2003.
13. Subsequently, under covenant, the parties decided to amend the schedule of proceedings concerning the objections to jurisdiction. Respondent and Claimants informed the ICSID Secretariat of this amendment on 1 and 2 July 2003, respectively. Under the new schedule, Respondent's Memorial on Jurisdiction was to be filed on 21 July 2003; Claimants' Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction, on 29 August 2003; Respondent's Reply on Jurisdiction, on 22 September 2003, and Claimants' Rejoinder on Jurisdiction, on 13 October 2003. It was also agreed that the hearing on jurisdiction was to be held on 20 and 21 October 2003, but subsequently, the Tribunal, in joint agreement with the parties, decided that the hearing on jurisdiction should be held between 20 and 21 November 2003, at The Hague, Netherlands.
14. In accordance with the terms set, on 21 July 2003, Respondent formally filed objections to ICSID's jurisdiction. In its Memorial on Jurisdiction, Respondent presented the grounds upon which it based said objections and attached documents in support of its arguments. On 29 August 2003, Claimants filed their Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction. On 22 September 2003, the Argentine Republic filed its Reply on Jurisdiction, and on 14 October 2003, Claimants filed their Rejoinder on Jurisdiction.
15. On 30 October 2003, Respondent filed a motion to suspend the proceedings and requested, as an alternative measure, a stay of the hearing on jurisdiction. On 31 October 2003, the President of the Tribunal asked Claimants to submit their comments on said motion by 3 November 2003. On 3 November 2003, the Claimants filed an objection to the stay motion. On 5 November 2003, the members of the Arbitral Tribunal deliberated on the Argentine Republic's motion and denied Respondent's motions to suspend these proceedings and stay the hearing on jurisdiction scheduled for 20 and 21 November 2003.

16. The hearing on jurisdiction was held on the date set, at the seat of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague, the Netherlands. Messrs. Eugene D. Gulland and Oscar M. Garibaldi of the law firm of Covington & Burling from Washington, D.C. acted as counsel for the Claimants. Also present at the hearing were Ms. Dorothy O'Brien, Deputy General Counsel for LG&E Energy Corp. and Mr. S. Bradford Rives, Chief Financial Officer of LG&E Energy Corp.
17. Messrs. Carlos Ignacio Suárez Anzorena and Ignacio Pérez Cortés, on behalf of Dr. Horacio Daniel Rosatti, the then-Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, attended the hearing on behalf of the Respondent.
18. During the hearing, the parties presented their arguments on the jurisdictional issues. The Tribunal posed questions to the parties in accordance with Rule 32(3) of the Arbitration Rules.
19. On 30 April 2004, the Tribunal issued its Decision on Objections to Jurisdiction, holding that the present dispute is within the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal. In so holding, the Tribunal considered the following criteria:
  - a. That the dispute should be between a Contracting State and a national of another Contracting State and that Claimants should have jus standi to act in these proceedings;
  - b. That the issue should be a dispute of a legal nature arising directly from an investment;
  - c. That the parties should have given their consent, in writing, to submit to arbitration and, specifically to the ICSID arbitration; and
  - d. That all the other requirements of both the ICSID Convention and the Bilateral Treaty should be met in order to submit a dispute to arbitration.

20. With respect to criteria (a), regarding jus standi, the Tribunal was of the opinion that, for purposes of the ICSID Convention and the Bilateral Treaty, Claimants should be considered foreign investors, even though they did not directly operate the investment in the Argentine Republic, but acted through companies constituted for that purpose in its territory (Decision on Jurisdiction, ¶ 63).
21. With respect to criteria (b), which requires that the issues before the Tribunal be a dispute of a legal nature arising directly from an investment, the Tribunal concluded that, at the jurisdictional phase, it was to be presumed that Claimants' claims were based on alleged breaches of the Bilateral Treaty affecting Claimants' investments within the meaning of the ICSID Convention and the Bilateral Treaty (Decision on Jurisdiction, ¶ 66).
22. With respect to criteria (c), requiring the consent of the parties to submit the dispute to ICSID arbitration, the Tribunal was of the opinion that the Argentine Republic's consent was given through Article VII(4) of the Bilateral Treaty. In turn, when Claimants resorted to ICSID, they decided to submit their investment disputes to the Centre's jurisdiction. It is noteworthy, in this case, that Claimants did not submit the dispute to the Argentine courts or to any other dispute settlement mechanism mentioned in Article VII of the Bilateral Treaty. For this reason, no question regarding the "fork in the road" provision arises in the present case (Decision on Jurisdiction, ¶ 69 et. seq.).
23. Finally, with respect to criteria (d), concerning verification of the other requirements of the ICSID Convention and the Bilateral Treaty, the Tribunal concluded that the claims are not time barred, and that the claims asserted in the additional request filed by Claimants are sufficiently sequential to the originally stated claims as to permit their review by this Tribunal for the sake of efficiency. The fact that the license holders may have begun negotiations with Respondent is outside this arbitral proceeding, inasmuch as the license holders, which are different legal entities, are pursuing that process from their own (corporate) perspective. Thus, in view of the fact that more than six months elapsed from the date on which the dispute arose, i.e. 24 January 2002, there is no bar in initiating the arbitral proceedings (Decision on Jurisdiction, ¶ 80 et. seq.).

24. Based on these considerations, the Tribunal:
  - a. Held that the present dispute is within the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal;
  - b. Dismissed all of the Respondent's objections as to the admissibility of the dispute and all of the Respondent's objections to the jurisdiction of ICSID and the competence of this Tribunal;
  - c. Ordered, pursuant to Rule 41(4) of the Arbitration Rules, the continuation of the proceeding;
  - d. Reserved all questions concerning the costs and expenses of the Tribunal and the parties for future determination.
25. In accordance with Procedural Order No. 1 dated 4 May 2004, Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial on the merits on 18 June 2004, seeking dismissal of LG&E's claims. On 6 August 2004, Claimants filed their Reply.
26. Respondent filed its Rejoinder on the merits on 27 September 2004, in which it asked the Tribunal, among other legal and factual arguments, to exclude Claimants' witness, Mr. Patricio Perkins, from the hearing on the merits on grounds of an alleged conflict of interest. Claimants objected to Respondent's motion to exclude the witness on 1 November 2004.
27. By means of Procedural Order No. 3, dated 23 November 2004, the Arbitral Tribunal decided (i) to admit the witness depositions offered by Respondent; (ii) to grant Claimants the opportunity to offer additional evidence regarding the witness depositions produced by Respondent in its Rejoinder, at the latest on 20 December 2004 and to cross-examine said witnesses during the hearing on the merits; (iii) to admit the testimony of Mr. Patricio Perkins, subject to cross-examination by Respondent.

28. In accordance with Procedural Orders Nos. 4 and 5, dated 13 and 18 January 2005, respectively, the hearing on the merits was held between 23 and 29 January 2005, at the seat of the Centre in Washington, D.C. The following persons were present at that hearing:

29. The hearing commenced, as scheduled on Sunday, 23 January 2005 at 8:45 a.m. After a brief introduction by the Tribunal's President, Claimants' counsel, Messrs. Eugene Gulland and Oscar Garibaldi, made their oral presentation to the Tribunal, referring to the arguments indicated in their briefs. They also presented their witnesses for oral examination: Messrs. S. Bradford Rives, Eduardo A. Hurtado, Patricio Carlos Perkins, Rudolf Dolzer, Eduardo Schwartz, Carlos Lapuerta, Antoni Peris Mingot, and Jose E. Álvarez.
30. Thereafter, Messrs. Osvaldo César Guglielmino, Ignacio Pérez Cortés and Gabriel Bottini made their submissions on behalf of the Argentine Republic. The following witnesses testified on behalf of Respondent: Ms. Anne-Marie Slaughter and Messrs. Eduardo A. Ratti, Jorge G. Simeonoff, Cristian Folgar, Nouriel Roubini and Fabián Bello.
31. On 28 February 2005, the parties submitted Post-Hearing Briefs.
32. By letter dated 18 May 2005, the Tribunal informed the parties of its decision to appoint an independent expert to assist the Tribunal in evaluating the expert financial evidence. By letter of 14 September 2005, the ICSID Secretariat transmitted the report on the findings of the independent expert to the parties and invited them to comment on the report by 5 October 2005. The parties filed their observations with the Tribunal on that date.

IV. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

33. Before considering the merits of the dispute, the Tribunal deems it necessary to set forth the facts that it considered relevant for its decision.

A. LATE 1980S AND 1990S

34. The present claims are to be viewed against the historic background and especially the economic upheaval in Argentina and the Government's reaction to the several economic crises suffered by the country in the late 1980s and 1990s.

35. In the late 1980s, Argentina underwent an economic crisis characterized by deep recession and hyperinflation. As part of its economic recovery plan, the Government began an ambitious privatization program with the enactment of the State Reform Law in August 1989. Within this framework, large Government-owned businesses and entities were privatized or granted on concession (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶121).
36. One March 27, 1991, Argentina enacted Law No. 23,928, referred to as the Convertibility Law, which ordered the implementation of a fixed exchange rate, pegging the austral (the then-Argentine currency) to the United States dollar.<sup>2</sup> The Convertibility Law also banned price or value indexation.
37. One of the primary goals of the Government's plan was the privatization of Gas del Estado S.E., the national natural-gas transport and distribution monopoly. Pursuant to the Government's privatization plan, investors could purchase shares in newly-formed, licensed private corporations that would offer gas transport and distribution services. Such shares were available to domestic and foreign investors.
38. To implement its plan, the Government enacted in June 1992, the Ley del Gas ("Gas Law"), which established a comprehensive regulatory structure for the provision of natural-gas transport and distribution services, and created a public agency, called Ente Nacional Regulador del Gas (ENARGAS) to oversee the industry.
39. The Gas Law adopted a tariff structure under which ENARGAS would collect tariffs on the price of gas paid by consumers. Under the provisions of the Gas Law, ENARGAS was required to set the transport and distribution tariffs at fair and reasonable levels that would allow licensed utility providers to recoup a “reasonable rate of return,” after accounting for costs, defined as a rate similar to that applied to activities of similar risk and adequately related to the level of efficiency and satisfactory performance of the transport or distribution service. Profitability was to be measured against other activities of comparable risk.

40. ENARGAS was to set maximum tariffs for a period of five years. At the end of the five-year period, the tariffs were to be reviewed and adjusted based on international market indicators that reflected changes in the value of the goods and services representative of the activities of service providers.
41. The Gas Law was implemented by regulations adopted on 28 September 1992 by Decree No. 1738/92. Pursuant to these regulations, transport and distribution tariffs were to be calculated in U.S. dollars and then expressed in Argentine pesos, and the Government could not rescind or modify the licenses without the consent of the licensees.
42. On 7 December 1992, the Government adopted Decree No. 2255/92, called Reglas Básicas de la Licencia (Basic Rules of the License), which supplemented the Gas Law and the above-mentioned regulation and approved prototype licenses for natural-gas transport and distribution. The prototype licenses included a schedule of the maximum tariffs for the first five-year period (1993-1997) of service. The Basic Rules of the License obligated the Government to compensate the licensees fully for any losses resulting from changes to the guaranteed tariff system. The Basic Rules of the License also implemented the semi-annual tariff review based on the U.S. Producer Price Index (“PPI”), to be conducted in January and June of each year (“PPI adjustment”).

43. Under this framework comprised of the Gas Law, its regulations and Basic Rules of the License, the five-year review was to be a comprehensive review of the method used to calculate tariffs.
44. By Decree No. 1189/92, published on 17 July 1992, Argentina approved the procedure for the privatization of Gas del Estado S.E. It was restructured into two distinct transport business units and eight separate distribution business units, each responsible for a geographic region of the country. Each of the ten business units were transferred to the newly-created companies, which were to operate with a license under the legal framework in force.
45. An international bidding process was set in place by Resolution No. 874/92 issued by the Ministry of Public Works and Services and conducted pursuant to the Pliego de Bases y Condiciones para la Licitación (“Bidding Rules”). Under these Bidding Rules, both foreign and domestic investors were free to bid on the shares. The purpose of the Bidding Process was the purchase and sale of the majority interest in each of the licensed companies created by Decree No. 1189/92. Three of those majority interests were sold during that bidding process: 60% of Cuyana’s shares, 70% of GasBan’s shares, and 90% of Centro’s shares.
46. In December 1992, the Argentine Government awarded the contracts for the purchase of the majority of shares in the ten newly-formed licensees into which Gas del Estado S.E. had been restructured. The licenses relevant to this dispute were approved by Decrees Nos. 2454/92 for Centro, 2460/92 for GasBan and 2453/92 for Cuyana, and became effective on 22 December 1992.
47. The blocks of shares of Centro, GasBan and Cuyana that were subject to privatization were awarded to private investors: 90% of the shares of Centro were awarded to a consortium formed by Società Italiana Per Il Gas S.p.A. (“Italgas”), an Italian company, and Sideco Americana S.A., an Argentine company (“Sideco”); 70% of the shares of GasBan were awarded to a consortium formed by Gas Natural SdG S.A., a Spanish company, Compañía General de Combustibles S.A. and Manra S.A., both Argentine companies; and 60% of the shares of Cuyana were awarded to a consortium formed by Italgas and Sideco.

48. Three Argentine investment companies were created as vehicles for the acquisitions: (i) Inversora de Gas del Centro S.A. to acquire the privatized shares of Centro; (ii) Invergas S.A. to acquire the privatized shares of GasBan; and (iii) Inversora de Gas Cuyana S.A. to acquire the privatized shares of Cuyana. The successful bidders or their affiliates became shareholders of the respective investment companies, which then entered into Transfer Agreements with the Respondent concerning the shares subject to this arbitration.
49. The privatization scheme created by Respondent targeted foreign investors because foreign capital was deemed essential for the successful operation of the Government's economic recovery plan. Foreign investors were encouraged to purchase shares with guarantees, such as tariffs calculated in U.S. dollars, automatic and periodic adjustments to the tariffs based on the PPI, a clear legal framework that could not be unilaterally modified, and the granting of "licenses" instead of "concessions" with a view to offering the highest degree of protection to prospective investors.
50. As part of its marketing efforts, Argentina distributed an Information Memorandum in foreign markets, including the United States and Europe. The Information Memorandum summarized the legal framework governing the privatization, the terms and conditions for the bidding, the bidding process and the legal and the regulatory framework that would apply to the new industry after privatization. The information in the memorandum concerning the privatization, prepared and distributed by investment banks, contained descriptive information and included disclaimers to discourage investors from relying solely on the information therein.

51. During this period, Argentina undertook to provide enhanced legal protection to investors so as to attract foreign investment in support of its privatization scheme. The Respondent ratified several treaties relating to international investment obligations, such as the ICSID Convention and a great number of bilateral investment treaties, including the Argentina-U.S. Bilateral Investment Treaty at issue in this dispute. As mentioned above, the Convertibility Law, which pegged the peso to the U.S. dollar, was also enacted at this time.
52. In reliance on the legal guarantees offered by the Argentine Government for the privatized energy industry, and based on its positive prior experience investing in the privatized Argentine gas market in 1992, Claimants chose to purchase shares of three licensed companies in the gas-distribution market. In February 1997, LG&E purchased a 45.9% interest in Centro and a 14.4% interest in Cuyana. In March 1999, LG&E purchased a 19.6% interest in GasBan.
53. From 1993 until the end of 1999, Claimants agree that the gas-distribution licensees and Respondent abided by their respective obligations under the licenses and law governing the privatization scheme. According to Claimants, the licensees invested heavily in Argentina's natural-gas-distribution infrastructure. GasBan invested about US$372 million in a new plant and equipment, even though originally required to invest US$90.9 million; Centro invested US$92 million, although originally required to invest US$10 million; and Cuyana invested more than US$120 million, although originally required to invest US$10 million. In return, Argentina honored the provisions of the licenses and other legal obligations, including the semi-annual tariff adjustment under the PPI indicator, and calculation of the tariffs in U.S. dollars.

B. ECONOMIC CRISIS AND THE EMERGENCE OF THE DISPUTE – 1999-2001

54. A new economic crisis developed in Argentina in the late 1990s. In the third quarter of 1998, the Argentine economy plunged into a period of recession that was to last four years and triggered, in Respondent's opinion, the worst economic crisis since Argentina's inception in 1810 (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 782).

55. In 1999, Argentina's Gross Domestic Product ("GDP") decreased causing a dramatic fall in domestic prices. Private consumption and investments began falling in August 1998 and Argentina entered a deflationary period. The period was marked by widespread decline in the value of assets located in Argentina. By the end of the 1990s, many economists considered the peso as overvalued, and predicted that the currency board would have to be abandoned, which would inevitably devalue the peso. Argentina's country risk premium increased, gradually excluding the country from the international credit market. These economic indicators were accompanied by social problems –unemployment, poverty and indigence levels began to increase. On 10 December 1999, Mr. Fernando de la Rúa took office as the President of Argentina. His administration tried to maintain the peg of the Argentine peso to the U.S. dollar as mandated by the Convertibility Law.
56. Against this background, public services rates, as specified in the contracts, were due to be adjusted in January 2000 based on the PPI. At the time, the United States was experiencing a high inflationary period, while Argentina was experiencing a significant deflationary period. As established in the Gas Law, the tariffs were to be adjusted to reflect changes in the cost structure of utility providers (Gas Law, Article 41). Argentina considered that the pending tariff adjustments based on the U.S. rate were unreasonable because they would result in a significant increase in utility rates within a recessionary and deflationary context.
57. Argentina met with the gas-distribution licensees to discuss a temporary suspension of the semi-annual tariff adjustments. Two agreements that the Government and the licensees entered in 2000 formed part of Claimants' original claim submitted to this arbitration.

58. On 6 January 2000, the Government and the licensees entered an agreement (Acta Acuerdo) whereby the licensees agreed to a one-time, six-month postponement of the tariff adjustment due in January 2000. Pursuant to the agreement, the tariffs would be recovered with interest from 1 July 2000 to 30 April 2001. Therefore, through resolutions published on 10 January 2000, ENARGAS approved the tariff effective as from 1 January 2000 without the PPI adjustment. The ENARGAS resolutions provided that the legal regime governing the tariffs would remain intact.
59. During the first six months of 2000, the situation in the Argentine economy continued to deteriorate. The semi-annual PPI adjustment would have forced a second tariff increase in a continued deflationary period. Although the licensees had agreed to only one-time tariff adjustment postponement, the Government urged the gas-distribution licensees to accept a second postponement of the tariff adjustments; including the previously postponed adjustments that were scheduled to be recovered beginning on 1 July 2000 in accordance with the Acta Acuerdo of 6 January 2000.
60. On 17 July 2000, by Decree No. 669/00, effective 4 August 2000, the licensees and the Government agreed to a second postponement of the tariff adjustments until 30 June 2002. Pursuant to the agreement, a stabilization fund would be created to recover the postponed amounts, subject to certain ceilings and floors, with interest. As with the previous agreement, this agreement reaffirmed the Government's commitments and guarantees provided to the licensees and their investors under the legal structure created for the privatization of the gas industry, specifically recognizing the enforcement of Argentina's bilateral investment treaties and the semi-annual PPI adjustments as an integral component of the tariff system.
61. On 3 August 2000, the Argentine National Ombudsman filed a lawsuit in an Argentine Federal Court, seeking an injunction against the operation of Decree No. 669/00. On 18 August 2000, the Court issued an order provisionally enjoining the application of Decree No. 669/00 and of the agreement of 17 July 2000. On 5 October 2001, the Court of Appeal ratified the order and the case is presently pending before the Supreme Court (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 255).

62. ENARGAS declared in November 2001 that no further adjustments to the tariffs would be approved until final judgment in the lawsuit. No further adjustments to the tariffs have occurred to date.

C. THE EMERGENCY LAW – 6 JANUARY 2002

63. Argentina's crisis deepened at the end of 2001. The Government experienced increased difficulties in repaying its foreign debt. As poverty and unemployment soared, Argentines feared that the Government would default on its debt and immobilize bank deposits. Therefore, savings were massively withdrawn from the banks. In response, the Government issued Decree No. 1570/01, known as "Corralito," on 1 December 2001, restricting bank withdrawals and prohibiting any transfer of currency abroad. Amid widespread discontent and public demonstrations, including violence that claimed tens of lives, President De la Rúa and his Cabinet resigned on 20 December 2001. A succession of presidents took office and quickly resigned.
64. Finally, President Eduardo Duhalde took office and implemented a new economic plan, which contained measures that form the additional claim submitted by Claimants. On 6 January 2002, Congress enacted Law No. 25,561, the Public Emergency and Foreign Exchange System Reform Law (known as "the Emergency Law"). The Emergency Law abrogated the Convertibility Law so that the one-to-one peg of the Argentine peso to the United States dollar no longer existed. The Emergency Law provided for the switch into Argentine pesos of debts owed to the banking system, debts arising from management contracts governed by public law, and debts under private agreements. The law further provided for the renegotiation of private and public agreements to adapt them to the new exchange system.

65. The Emergency Law adopted measures modifying public-service contracts, such as establishing that tariffs and prices for public services were to be calculated in pesos, instead of U.S. dollars; abolishing all clauses calling for tariff adjustments in U.S. dollars or other foreign currencies; eliminating all indexing mechanisms; and directing the Executive Branch to renegotiate all public-service contracts.
66. By Presidential Decree No. 214 of 3 February 2002, the Government adopted a currency conversion scheme under which all obligations payable in dollars existing on the date of enactment of the Emergency Law would be converted into pesos at the fixed one-to-one exchange rate.
67. The switch into Argentine pesos, also called “pesification,” which affected the entire Argentine economy, was characterized by Respondent as a necessary process to return the country to the path of economic stability.

D. RENEGOTIATION OF THE PUBLIC SERVICE CONTRACTS

68. On 12 February 2002, Argentina announced the renegotiation of all public service contracts. By Decree No. 293/02, licenses for transport and distribution of natural gas were subject to mandatory renegotiation by a Renegotiation Committee within the Ministry of Economy. Under the Decree, the Government could either sign a renegotiated agreement or rescind the contract. By Resolution No. 38/02, issued on 9 March 2002, ENARGAS was ordered to discontinue all tariff reviews and to refrain from adjusting tariffs or prices in any way.
69. After enactment of the Emergency Law, the licensees and the Argentine Executive launched three initiatives to implement an emergency increase in the natural gas and electricity tariffs. Each of these initiatives was successfully challenged by consumer organizations and ombudspersons in the Argentine judiciary and consequently did not become effective. The Argentine Government attempted twice more in 2003 to obtain tariff increases through Presidential Decrees but both these efforts were also quashed by the judiciary.

70. On 25 May 2003, a new Argentine President, Dr. Néstor Kirchner, took office after a popular election was held on 26 April 2003, replacing the transition authorities that had been appointed by the Argentine Congress. Respondent states that with the new administration, a period of institutional stabilization at the federal level began (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, 317).
71. By Presidential Decree No. 311/03, published on 4 July 2003, and Law No. 25,790, passed on 22 October 2003, the Argentine Government extended the renegotiation process. Centro, Cuyana and GasBan have been involved in the renegotiation process under threat of rescission of contract. During the renegotiation process, the Government has not offered to restore the legal guarantees that were eliminated by the Emergency Law, or compensate Claimants for any losses incurred.

E. REQUEST FOR RELIEF

72. Bearing in mind the background already described, Claimants request the following relief (Request for Arbitration, ¶ 111 as revised in Claimants' Memorial at ¶ 208):
  - (i) Declaring that the Respondent has breached its obligations under Article II(2)(c) of the Bilateral Treaty by failing to observe obligations that it entered into with regard to the Claimants' investment;
  - (ii) Declaring that the Respondent has breached its obligations under Article II(2)(a) of the Bilateral Treaty by failing to accord to the Claimants' investment fair and equitable treatment and by according treatment less than that required by international law;
  - (iii) Declaring that the Respondent has breached its obligations under Article II(2)(b) of the Bilateral Treaty by taking arbitrary and discriminatory measures that impair the use and enjoyment of the Claimants' investment;

- (iv) Declaring that the Respondent has breached Article IV(1) of the Bilateral Treaty by indirectly expropriating the Claimants' investment without complying with the requirements of the Bilateral Treaty, including observance of due process of law and payment of prompt, adequate, and effective compensation;
- (v) Ordering the Respondent to pay the Claimants full compensation in the amounts set forth in the Memorial, plus pre- and post-award compound interest;
- (vi) Ordering the Respondent to pay all costs and expenses of this arbitration proceeding, including the fees and expenses of the Tribunal and the cost of the Claimants' legal representation, plus interest thereon in accordance with the Bilateral Treaty; and
- (vii) Such other or additional relief as may be appropriate under the Bilateral Treaty or may otherwise be just and proper.

73. According to Claimants' Reply (¶ 287), the relief they seek is stated as follows:

1. Finding the Argentine Republic to be in breach of its obligations under the Treaty;
2. Ordering the Argentine Republic to pay LG&E: (i) compensation in the amounts specified in Part VI of [the] Reply; (ii) all costs and fees of the arbitration, including reasonable attorneys' fees; and (iii) compound interest on the monetary award from the date of the award until the date of actual payment; and
3. Ordering such additional relief as may be appropriate under the applicable law or otherwise just and proper.

74. The monetary relief sought by Claimants is US$ 248 million or, if the Tribunal concludes that there was expropriation, US$ 268 million, plus compound pre-award and post-award interest and costs.

75. Respondent denies that it has violated the Treaty and seeks an order from this Tribunal dismissing LG&E's claims and holding LG&E liable for costs. In asserting its defense, Respondent contends in the alternative that the circumstances warrant application of the state of necessity defense, thus exempting it from liability for any Treaty violations.

V. PRELIMINARY MATTERS

76. In the analysis below, the Tribunal has not only considered the positions of the parties as summarized in the various sections above, but also their numerous detailed arguments in support of those positions as well as the arguments made at the hearing. To the extent that these arguments are not referred to expressly, they must be deemed to be subsumed in the analysis below.

A. JUS STANDI

77. With respect to jus standi, the Tribunal re-affirms its conclusions adopted in the Decision on Objections to Jurisdiction of 30 April 2004. As determined in the Decision on Jurisdiction, the Centre has jurisdiction over LG&E's claims and this Tribunal is competent to decide on Claimants' claims.

78. Argentina continues to argue that this Tribunal shall only have jurisdiction if Argentina's non-compliance with an international obligation is verified (Respondent's Rejoinder, ¶ 521(a)). Pursuant to the Tribunal's Decision on Jurisdiction issued on 30 April, 2004, the Tribunal deems that all the obligations in discussion are international because they relate to the Treaty. Thus, LG&E's minority-shareholder status has no bearing on its standing to bring these claims or on the Tribunal's competence to rule upon them.

79. It should be pointed out that, as this Tribunal stated in the Decision on Jurisdiction, the subject matter of this arbitration focuses on the investments made by LG&E in the Argentine licensees. Accordingly, the Tribunal has insisted on the independent treatment of LG&E regarding the licensees, both from the point of view of the legal personality of each entity and from the actions of each. This does not mean, however, that certain actions of the licensees, by the fact that they are the investment's beneficiaries, may have, in some cases, effects on the investment itself. For such reasons, on occasion, the Tribunal shall be bound to refer to the licensees and their actions without implying a reference to LG&E. One should bear in mind that the recognition of the independence among these entities was the basis on which the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal were supported.

B. LAW APPLICABLE

1. Parties' Positions

80. The Claimants argue that their claims asserted arise under the Treaty. The law that applies to the dispute is therefore the Treaty and general international law. Claimants contend that this approach comports with the first part of Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention. In Claimants' view, Argentine law merely establishes a factual predicate for the claims under the Treaty and general international law (Claimants' Memorial, ¶¶ 155-56).
81. Respondent does not deny the application of the Bilateral Treaty to this dispute, but argues that in the absence of an agreement on the applicable law, the relationship between LG&E and the Argentine Government should be subject to the second part of Article 42(1) of the ICSD Convention, which establishes the precedence of sources of law; therefore, the Argentine law should be applied first. Respondent asserts that "where an investor makes an investment in a State it is subject –as are local investors– to the laws of the country where the investment is made" (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 25). Argentina stresses the insufficiency of the Treaty to govern the dispute at issue, particularly in light of the substantive framework regarding the foreign investment's treatment under Argentine law.

2. Tribunal's Analysis

82. In accordance with Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention:

“(1) The Tribunal shall decide a dispute in accordance with such rules of law as may be agreed by the parties. In the absence of such agreement, the Tribunal shall apply the law of the Contracting State party to the dispute (including its rules on the conflict of laws) and such rules of International Law as may be applicable.”

83. This rule grants the parties' autonomy in choosing the law applicable to the substance of the dispute in an arbitration administered by ICSID. If no applicable law is chosen, the Tribunal must resort to the second sentence of Article 42(1).

84. It is evident that the parties hereto had not agreed on the applicable law in this dispute. This is usually found in the investment agreement, though this does not hold in this case. Nor is there any express reference to the applicable law in other documents related to the investment by LG&E, a fact that would result in the application of the second part of Article 42(1).

85. It is to be noted that the Argentine Republic is a signatory party to the Bilateral Investment Treaty, which may be regarded as a tacit submission to its provisions in the event of a dispute related to foreign investments. In turn, LG&E grounds its claim on the provisions of the Treaty, thus presumably choosing the Treaty and the general international law as the applicable law for this dispute. Nevertheless, these elements do not suffice to say that there is an implicit agreement by the Parties as to the applicable law, a decision requiring more decisive actions. Consequently, the dispute shall be settled in accordance with the second part of Article 42(1).<sup>3</sup>

86. In addition to the indication of the applicable law, there are two other concepts embedded in the second part of Article 42(1) which deserve comment—the references to private international law and to the rules of international law “as may be applicable”.

87. As to the reference to the private international law, the Tribunal has not found in the ICSID records any case in which the Arbitral Tribunal has resorted to the rules of conflict of law of the State party to the dispute. It has been so observed in the Amco v. Indonesia case, in which the Arbitral Tribunal, presided by Berthold Goldman, affirmed that it did not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion on the rules of conflict, inasmuch as the parties make constant references to the law of the State party in the dispute and, moreover in “the dispute before the Tribunal relating to an investment in Indonesia, there is no doubt that the substantive municipal rules of law to be applied by the Tribunal are to drawn from Indonesian Law.”<sup>4</sup> The Tribunal in this case shares the same criterion.
88. With reference to the rules of international law and, particularly, to the language “as may be applicable,” found in Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention, the Tribunal holds the view that it should not be understood as if it were in some way conditioning application of international law. Rather, it should be understood as making reference, within international law, to the competent rules to govern the dispute at issue.<sup>5</sup> This interpretation could find support in the ICSID Convention’s French version that refers to the rules of international law “en la matière.”<sup>6</sup>

89. Likewise, applying the rules of international law is to be understood as comprising the general international law, including customary international law, to be used as an instrument for the interpretation of the Treaty. For example, where a term is ambiguous, or where further interpretation of a Treaty provision is required, the Tribunal will turn to its obligations under Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, signed in 1969.
90. Having made this part clear, the Tribunal proceeds to analyze the extension of the remission to the domestic law contained in the second part of Article 42(1), whereby the Tribunal shall apply “the law of the Contracting State Party to the dispute...” The Argentine doctrine contributes to gaining insight into the remission’s scope: “the situation is much clearer by virtue of the incorporation of the international law to the Argentine law and the hierarchical relation conferred by the 1994 constitutional reform to international treaties in Article 75, paragraph 22,<sup>7</sup> of the National Constitution.”<sup>8</sup>
91. The Tribunal notes that as part of the Argentine legal system, the Bilateral Treaty prevails over domestic law, “especially, inasmuch as in most of the Bilateral Treaty’s assumptions there is an express mention of international law, be it when referring to the treatment to be given to investments, or to the compensation in the event of expropriation or any other like measure, etc.”<sup>9</sup>
92. This interpretation has been accepted in Argentina “as long as the litigation is linked to the violation of the BIT [bilateral investment treaty] and of international law and not to the mere pretensions of infringement of a local contract and as the parties should have not provided expressly the law applicable to the first of said disputes, the decision shall be governed by the ICSID Convention, by the BIT and applicable international law. Thus, the BIT becomes the lex specialis regarding disputes appearing in matters of investment between the foreign investor and the Host State.”<sup>10</sup>

93. It is this Tribunal’s opinion that obviating application of international law, specifically of the ICSID Convention and the Bilateral Treaty, would entail ignoring the fact that “international treaties move away from the principle according to which foreign investment is subject to the law and jurisdiction of the host state and seek international solution of conflicts.”<sup>11</sup> This thesis, held by part of the Argentine doctrine, indicates that when submitting the settlement of a dispute to an Arbitral Tribunal acting within the framework of an international agreement, like ICSID, the dispute falls under public international law; thus its rules are to be applied.<sup>12</sup> However, the problem is more complex as has been admitted by several scholars, who are of the opinion that it is necessary to “balance the weight that domestic law and international law should have upon the settlement of the dispute”<sup>13</sup>, this is, to establish an order of precedence of the sources.
94. International law overrides domestic law when there is a contradiction since a State cannot justify non-compliance of its international obligations by asserting the provisions of its domestic law.
95. If this contradiction does not exist, it is not an easy task to establish the relationship between international law and domestic law. In the original draft of the ICSID Convention, the conjunction “and” was not present in the rule, but rather the conjunction “or” was in its place, so that it read, “The Arbitral Tribunal shall decide the dispute submitted to it in accordance with such rules of law, whether national or international as it shall determine to be applicable.”<sup>14</sup> The intention in the language of the original draft was not to establish an order of preference, but rather to establish the possibility of alternatives. Initially, scholarly authorities and some ICSID Tribunals admitted that the conjunction “and” meant that “and in case of lacunae, or should the law of the Contracting State be inconsistent with international law.”<sup>15</sup> However, any limitation to the role of international law under these terms would imply accepting that international law may be subordinate to domestic law and would obviate the fact that there are a growing number of arbitrations initiated on the basis of bilateral or multilateral investment treaties.

96. It is this Tribunal’s opinion that “and” means “and,” so that the rules of international law, especially those included in the ICSID Convention and in the Bilateral Treaty as well as those of domestic law are to be applied. In the Wena Hotels Limited v. Arab Republic of Egypt case, the Tribunal affirmed that “and means and”, but accepted the supremacy of international law.<sup>16</sup>
97. The Tribunal concludes, as the tribunal concluded in the Asian Agricultural Products, Ltd, (AAPL) v. Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka, Award of June 27, 1990, that the Treaty “is not a self-contained closed legal system limited to provide for substantive material rules of direct applicability, but it has to be envisaged within a wider juridical context in which rules from other sources are integrated through implied incorporation methods, or by

98. In short, one must also recall that between Argentina and LG&E there is no binding contractual agreement. The existence of such relationship would have allowed the parties to agree on stabilization clauses in the event of changes in certain circumstances. But, in the absence of such agreement, one is bound to resort to a legal system regulating those events. The fact that there is no contract between the Argentine Republic and LG&E favors in the first place, the application of international law, inasmuch as we are dealing with a genuine dispute in matters of investment which is especially subject to the provisions of the Bilateral Treaty complemented by the domestic law.

3. Tribunal’s Conclusion

99. In order to settle this controversy, the present Tribunal shall apply first the Bilateral Treaty; second and in the absence of explicit provisions therein, general international law, and, third, the Argentine domestic law, particularly the Gas Law that governs the natural gas sector. The latter is applicable in view of its relevance for determining the Argentine Republic’s liability and the defenses to which it may resort vis-à-vis the allegations made by Claimants.

VI. LIABILITY

A. ARTICLE II(2)(a): FAIR AND EQUITABLE TREATMENT

1. Parties’ Positions

100. Based on the circumstances of this case as described in Section IV above, for Annulment, Feb. 5, 2002, 41 ILM 933 (2002).

LG&E claims that the Argentine Republic breached Article II(2)(a) of the Bilateral Treaty, which guarantees that LG&E's investment in Argentina will at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment.

101. In Claimants' view, by committing itself to the Treaty, Argentina made promises to the United States as to how it would treat the investments of U.S. nationals in Argentina. In Article II, Argentina agreed to maintain an investment environment that is even-handed towards all investors, foreign and domestic alike, free of arbitrary and discriminatory laws and regulations, and ultimately fair and equitable, offering full protection and security to the investments of U.S. nationals.

102. Claimants explain that fair and equitable treatment in the context of this Treaty, requires a stable and predictable legal framework for the investment. Claimants support their interpretation of the standard on the basis of the Preamble of the Treaty, which sets forth the object and purpose of the Treaty and specifically the provision on fair and equitable treatment, as well as three recent opinions of arbitral tribunals considering the question in a similar context.<sup>18</sup> Claimants contend that, under this standard, a State cannot grant treatment that affects the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. Considering that the Treaty's objective was to promote foreign investment, Claimants argue that the stability and predictability of the legal framework that laid the foundations for their investment and granted protection to its value are particularly important.

103. With respect to Respondent's reliance on the Genin case, Claimants argue that as the Genin<sup>19</sup> case is merely a standard for evaluating the fairness and equity of State procedures, such a standard should be evaluated in light of more recent cases.

104. Claimants also contend that the extent to which the fair and equitable standard relates to the minimum standard of treatment under customary international law makes no difference in this case because that standard has evolved since the Mondev<sup>20</sup> case to include the reasonable expectations of the investor.
105. Under this articulation of the standard, Claimants state that Argentina treated LG&E's investment in an unfair and inequitable manner. First, Argentina repudiated the guarantees that it had offered to the foreign investors at the time it induced them to invest in Argentina. Second, Argentina singled out the gas-distribution industry and other public utility industries, for treatment that was less favorable than the treatment granted to all other sectors of the economy. Third, Argentina publicized unfounded charges against the foreign investors and coerced the gas-distribution companies to waive their rights under the licenses and renegotiate the licenses. Fourth, Argentina held the licensees responsible for strict compliance with the terms of the licenses while the Government froze the gas-distribution tariffs. Finally, Claimants allege that Argentina foreclosed the licensees from pursuing judicial or arbitral remedies (Claimants' Memorial, ¶ 171).
106. Argentina had attracted Claimants with the guarantees derived from the Treaty and the legal framework for privatization, under which its laws and regulations guaranteed how Argentina would treat LG&E's investment. In making their decision to invest in Argentina, Claimants relied on Argentine laws that granted protection against currency fluctuation and inflation, while providing for adjustment of utility rates, thus ensuring reasonable rates of return and that the Argentine Government would not freeze utility rates, but rather maintain a dynamic tariff system, regulated by an expert agency.

107. Claimants did not expect their investment to be free of risk, or that Article II of the Bilateral Treaty should protect them from all risks associated with their investment. But they insist that the gas regulatory framework that Argentina put in place made their investment free from risk of regulatory alterations or changes in the rules in which they had invested. LG&E understood that it would bear what it calls “commercial risks,” such as industry demand, recession and substitution of natural gas by alternative fuels (Hearing on the Merits, Perkins, 24 January, 2005, Spanish Transcript, p. 369; Claimants’ Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 8).
108. Claimants allege that, during the economic crisis, Argentina abandoned the guarantees that it made to investors in the gas-distribution sector. In January 2002, the Emergency Law swept away the protection against inflation. Argentina forced licensees to enter into two agreements postponing the PPI adjustments, after which an Argentine court issued an order that ENARGAS interpreted as an injunction against the PPI adjustment. The Emergency Law permanently abolished the PPI adjustment.
109. The Emergency Law also abandoned the protection against currency fluctuations. The Gas Law had guaranteed that the tariffs would be calculated in dollars and converted into pesos. In reliance on this protection against any sharp devaluation of the peso, Claimants decided to invest in the licensees.
110. In light of these prior measures, Claimants argue that Argentina repudiated its guarantee that generally prohibited the freezing or control of tariffs (Claimants’ Post-Hearing Brief, ¶¶ 15-31).
111. While Claimants acknowledge that the material used by Respondent in order to make the offer was not binding, the laws and promises referenced therein were (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 9). Claimants add that if establishing the tariffs had been left to the State, investors would have never invested.

112. Respondent objects to the definition given to fair and equitable treatment. In Respondent's view, the standard should be defined by impartial and objective rather than personal and arbitrary criteria. They conclude that Claimants' interpretation of the standard is so vague as to ignore the parties' obligations and rights (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 603-604).
113. Citing Alex Genin, Eastern Credit Limited, Inc. and A.S. Baltoil v. The Republic of Estonia<sup>21</sup> and Robert Azinian, Kenning Davitian & Ellen Baca v. The United Mexican States<sup>22</sup>, Respondent concludes that the fair and equitable treatment principle refers to the international minimum standard of treatment owed to an investor, and as such, constitutes a minimum pattern for substantive justice (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 620). Respondent also contends, citing S.D. Myers Inc. v. The Government of Canada<sup>23</sup> that a violation of the fair and equitable standard "occurs only when it is shown that an investor has been treated in such an unjust or arbitrary manner that the treatment rises to the level that is unacceptable from the international perspective" (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶¶ 621-622).
114. Regarding the list of guarantees cited by Claimants, Respondent contends that the Gas Law does not provide for what Claimants call "exchange protection" (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 74a). Respondent points out that, in fact, when Claimants' witnesses were examined, they were not able to identify where any such "protection" had been established. Respondent also asserts that the tariff calculation in U.S. dollars was linked to the existing fixed rate of exchange between the peso and the U.S. dollar as established by the Convertibility Law. None of Claimants' witnesses was able to prove the opposite. Respondent adds that maintaining tariffs linked to the U.S. dollar after the convertibility system was abandoned lacks any economic logic. Respondent points out that none of the Government's guarantees address the abandonment of convertibility.

115. With respect to the tariff guarantee, Respondent argues that it is possible that the Argentine authorities had considered guaranteeing the calculation of the tariffs in U.S. dollars regardless of the Convertibility Law, but such plan was rejected due to the fact that the Government concluded that the Convertibility Law provided sufficient protection to the investment (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 26).
116. With respect to the PPI adjustments, Respondent argues that from mid-1998, application of the PPI as the rate adjustment index became unreasonable and failed to fulfill the goal it was conceived for – namely, reflecting the changes in the value of the goods and services involved in the activity of service providers (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 44). Additionally, Respondent states that the measure did not cause loss to the licensees. Citing the opinions of Schwartz and Lapuerta, Respondent contends that suspension of the PPI adjustment would have affected tariffs only by approximately 2% between August 2000 and October 2002 (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 46).
117. Respondent agrees that the tariffs must be fair and sufficient, yet not abusive, something that would occur if the Claimants' position were sustained (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 74c).
118. Regarding the claim that the Claimants were "induced" to invest in the Argentine Republic, Respondent argues that there is no proof of such inducement (Respondent’s Counter-Memorial, ¶ 647). Respondent points out that the Claimants rely on non-binding documents, such as reports and minutes without any legal relevance. According to Respondent, these documents were irrelevant to the laws that should have been considered in deciding whether or not to invest in the Argentine gas-distribution market (Respondent’s Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 17).

Award, ¶ 263, (13 November 2000).

2. Tribunal’s Conclusion Concerning Argentina’s Guarantees to Investors

119. The Tribunal concludes that the Gas Law and its implementing regulations made four guarantees to investors in the gas transport and distribution centers:

1. Article 41.1 of Decree No. 1738/92,<sup>24</sup> and Section 9.2 of the Basic Rules of the License<sup>25</sup> mandated that the tariffs would be calculated in U.S. dollars before conversion into pesos.
2. Section 9.4.1.1 of the Basic Rules of the License guaranteed that the tariffs would be subject to semi-annual adjustments according to the PPI.<sup>26</sup>
3. Article 38 of Law No. 24,076 provided that tariffs were to provide an income sufficient to cover all costs and a reasonable rate of return.<sup>27</sup>

<sup>24</sup> Article 41.1 provides: “Transportation and Distribution rates shall be calculated in United States dollars. The resulting Rate Schedule shall be stated in Argentine pesos and shall be convertible as stated in Law No. 23,928, using for the retranslation into Argentine pesos the parity set forth in Article 3 of Argentine Presidential Decree No. 2,128/91.”

<sup>27</sup> Article 38 provides: “The services rendered by distributors will be offered at tariffs in line with the following principles:

a) To provide distributors who operate economically and prudently the opportunity to obtain sufficient income to meet all reasonable operating costs applicable to the service, taxes, amortization, and a

4. Section 9.8 of the Basic Rules of the License guaranteed that the tariff system would not be subject to freezing or price controls without compensation.<sup>28</sup>
120. The Tribunal also finds that as a matter of fact, the Emergency Law, passed on 6 January 2002, declared that the tariffs would no longer be calculated in U.S. dollars but directly in pesos (Article 8), and that there would be no further semi-annual tariff adjustments according to the PPI (Article 8). The Tribunal notes that since July 1999, there have not been any PPI adjustments in the tariffs relating to the licensees and the five-year review due in 2002 was not conducted – both affecting the level of the tariffs in the gas-distribution sector and, as a consequence, Claimants’ rate of return on their investment. Argentina took these steps without compensating Claimants and forcing Claimants to renegotiate (a process in which an Argentine official recommended that investors waive their claims against the Government relating to the licenses) or face rescission of the licenses. (Decree No. 293/02, Article 2 and Claimants’ Memorial ¶¶ 120 et seq).

3. Tribunal’s Analysis

121. The question before the Tribunal is whether the measures implemented by Argentina violated Argentina’s obligation under Article II(2)(a) of the Treaty to give fair and equitable treatment to LG&E’s investment.
122. The Treaty does not define what is meant by fair and equitable treatment. In these circumstances, the Tribunal must interpret this provision in good faith, in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms in their context, and in light of its object and purpose, as required by Article 31(1) of reasonable rate of return, as determined in the following article.”

<sup>28</sup> Section 9.8 provides: “Licensee’s tariff system will not be subject to freezing, administration and/or price control. If, in spite of this stipulation, Licensee is forced to adapt to a price control system establishing a lower level than that arising from the Tariff, Licensee will have the right to be compensated by the Government in an equivalent amount.”

the Vienna Convention.

123. The Treaty, following the general trend with investment treaties, provides for treatment applicable to investors in the host State through the establishment of a series of internationally recognized standards.<sup>29</sup> Due to the fact that such international standards have a generic nature and that their interpretation varies with the course of time and with the circumstances of each case, it becomes difficult to establish an unequivocal and static concept of these notions.
124. In considering the context within which Argentina and the United States included the fair and equitable treatment standard, and its object and purpose, the Tribunal observes in the Preamble of the Treaty that the two countries agreed that “fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources.” In entering the Bilateral Treaty as a whole, the parties desired to “promote greater economic cooperation” and “stimulate the flow of private capital and the economic development of the parties”. In light of these stated objectives, this Tribunal must conclude that stability of the legal and business framework is an essential element of fair and equitable treatment in this case, provided that they do not pose any danger for the existence of the host State itself.
125. Several tribunals in recent years have interpreted the fair and equitable treatment standard in various investment treaties in light of the same or

<sup>29</sup> The notion of a standard appeared for the first time in a 1948 treaty, the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization, and it was considered a protection against state actions violating internationally-accepted rules. In the 1960s it was related to the protection given to foreign properties. In international case law, the standard existed pursuant to the interpretation provided in the 1920s in the emblematic Neer case, which required that State conduct be deemed outrageous, wrongful, open injustice, an atrocity, bad faith or voluntary negligence of duty for a violation to be found. That interpretation is not the same that is given today. What was considered an “atrocity” in 1926 might not be so today, and what may be considered “violent” now, may not have been at that time. See “Fair and Equitable Treatment Standard in International Investment Law”, OECD, Working Paper on similar language as the Preamble of the Argentina – U.S. BIT.<sup>30</sup> These tribunals have repeatedly concluded based on the specific language concerning fair and equitable treatment, and in the context of the stated objectives of the various treaties, that the stability of the legal and business framework in the State party is an essential element in the standard of what is fair and equitable treatment.<sup>31</sup> As such, the Tribunal considers this interpretation to be an emerging standard of fair and equitable treatment in international law.

126. Although the Chile - Malaysia BIT does not include express reference in its Preamble with respect to fair and equitable treatment, the tribunal in MTD Equity Sdn. Bhd. and MTD Chile S.A. v. Republic of Chile referred to the objectives of the Treaty set forth in the Preamble, and concluded that in light of these objectives, fair and equitable treatment meant treatment in an “even-handed and just manner, conducive to fostering the promotion of foreign investment.”<sup>32</sup>
127. In addition to the State’s obligation to provide a stable legal and business environment, the fair and equitable treatment analysis involves consideration of the investor’s expectations when making its investment in reliance on the protections to be granted by the host State. Indeed, this view is reflected in the Tecmed decision, that has been adopted by a succession of tribunals:

International Investment, November 2003/4.

<sup>30</sup> See, e.g., CMS Gas Transmission Company v. The Argentine Republic, ICSID Case No. ARB/01/8 Award (12 May 2005) (Argentina-U.S. BIT); Occidental Exploration and Production Company v. Republic of Chile, ICSID Case No. ARB/01/7 Award ¶ 113 (25 May 2004) (Malaysia-Chile BIT); Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States, ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/97/1 Award ¶ 75 (30 August 2000). <sup>32</sup> MTD, ¶ 113.

“The Arbitral Tribunal considers that this provision of the [BIT], in light of the good faith principle established by international law, requires the Contracting Parties to provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investment and comply with such regulations.”<sup>33</sup>”

128. Similarly, the tribunal in Waste Management, Inc. v. The United Mexican States, interpreting the fair and equitable treatment standard under NAFTA Article 1105(1) concluded that in applying the fair and equitable treatment standard, “it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.”<sup>34</sup> This means that violations of the fair and equitable treatment standard may arise from a State’s failure to act with transparency –that is, all relevant legal requirements for the purpose of initiating, completing and successfully operating investments made, or intended to be made under an investment treaty should be capable of being readily known to all affected investors.<sup>35</sup>
129. The Tribunal is not convinced that bad faith or something comparable would ever be necessary to find a violation of fair and equitable treatment. The tribunal in Alex Genin, Eastern Credit Limited, Inc. and A.S. Baltoil v. The Republic of Estonia,<sup>36</sup> did not reach this conclusion either. The tribunal merely stated: “Acts that would violate this minimum standard would

130. It can be said that the investor’s fair expectations have the following characteristics: they are based on the conditions offered by the host State at the time of the investment; they may not be established unilaterally by one of the parties; they must exist and be enforceable by law; in the event of infringement by the host State, a duty to compensate the investor for damages arises except for those caused in the event of state of necessity; however, the investor’s fair expectations cannot fail to consider parameters such as business risk or industry’s regular patterns.
131. Thus, this Tribunal, having considered, as previously stated, the sources of international law, understands that the fair and equitable standard consists of the host State’s consistent and transparent behavior, free of ambiguity that involves the obligation to grant and maintain a stable and predictable legal framework necessary to fulfill the justified expectations of the foreign investor.

4. Tribunal’s Conclusion

132. In light of the foregoing, the Tribunal concludes that Argentina violated the fair and equitable treatment provision in the Bilateral Treaty for the following reasons.
133. Emerging from the economic crisis of the late 1980s, Argentina created an economic recovery plan mainly dependent upon foreign capital. Argentina prepared with the investment banks an attractive framework of laws and regulations that addressed the specific concerns of foreign investors with respect to the country risks involved in Argentina. In light of these risks, Claimants relied upon certain key guarantees in the Gas Law and implementing regulations, such as calculation of the tariffs in U.S. dollars before their conversion into pesos, the semi-annual PPI adjustments, tariffs set to provide sufficient revenues to cover all the costs and a reasonable rate of return, and compensation in the event that the Government altered the tariff scheme. Having created specific expectations among investors, Argentina was bound by its obligations concerning the investment guarantees vis-à-vis public utility licensees, and in particular, the gas-distribution licensees. The abrogation of these specific guarantees violates the stability and predictability underlying the standard of fair and equitable treatment.

134. Specifically, it was unfair and inequitable to pass a law discarding the guarantee in Decree No. 1738/92 that the tariffs would be calculated in U.S. dollars and then converted into pesos. As pointed out by Claimants, this was not merely an economic and monetary policy of the Argentine Government which materialized through the Convertibility Law. Rather, it was a guarantee laid down in the tariff system. This guarantee was very important to investors to protect their investment, which was made in dollars, from a subsequent devaluation of the peso.
135. Argentina also acted unfairly and inequitably in the manner in which it abrogated the guarantees of the Gas Law and its implementing regulations, adversely affecting the gas-distribution sector but not affecting other sectors of the economy. For example, certain contracts, such as those in the export industry, were excluded from the forced conversion to pesos regulation, or the conversion was performed at a more favorable rate to the individual or company.

136. Argentina acted unfairly and inequitably when it prematurely abandoned the PPI tariff adjustments and essentially froze tariffs prior to the onset of the public disorder and threats to its essential security in December 2001, and when it refused to resume adjustments when conditions had normalized in April 2003, forcing instead the licensees to renegotiate.<sup>39</sup> History has shown that the PPI adjustments that initially were supposed to be postponed have been abandoned completely and are now being “negotiated” away.
137. Argentina also has acted unfairly and inequitably in forcing the licensees to renegotiate public service contracts, and waive the right to pursue claims against the Government, or risk rescission of the contracts. Even though the Gas Law provided for the renegotiation of public service contracts, in practice there was no real renegotiation, but rather the imposition of a process.
138. Likewise, the Government’s Resolution No. 38/02 issued on 9 March 2002, which ordered ENARGAS to discontinue all tariff reviews and to refrain from adjusting tariffs or prices in any way, also breaches the fair and equitable treatment standard.
139. The Tribunal nevertheless recognizes the economic hardships that occurred during this period, and certain political and social realities that at the time may have influenced the Government’s response to the growing economic difficulties. Certainly, LG&E was aware of the risks inherent in investing in a foreign State. But here, the Tribunal is of the opinion that Argentina went too far by completely dismantling the very legal framework constructed to attract investors.

<sup>39</sup> As described more fully below, Argentina is excused from liability for the measures taken during the extreme circumstances of December 2001 until April 2003 in order to maintain public order and protect its essential interests. It was fair that during this period of time, Argentina suspended the guarantees of the Gas Law and postponed the PPI tariff adjustments until such time as the Government could manage to resume its obligations.

B. ARTICLE II(2)(b): DISCRIMINATORY AND ARBITRARY TREATMENT

1. Discriminatory Treatment

(i) Parties' Positions

140. Claimants contend that the Argentine Government adopted measures that discriminated against the downstream gas sector (transport and distribution) compared to upstream businesses (production), large industrial customers, and other sectors not dominated by foreign investors, such as alternative energy and the public. In their view, such discrimination violates Article II(2)(b) of the Bilateral Treaty, which provides that “[n]either Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investments.”
141. Claimants state that, from the time of the first PPI adjustment until the enactment of the Emergency Law of 6 January 2002, the gas industry received treatment different from that accorded to similarly situated public utilities, including electricity and water distribution companies. These other public utilities continued to enjoy the PPI adjustment until the enactment of the Emergency Law.
142. Claimants also support their contention by pointing out that, following enactment of the Emergency Law on 6 January 2002, the Government subjected most of the privatized public-utility sector, including the gas-distribution industry, to the least favorable of several regimes devised for the conversion of dollar obligation into pesos. Within the public-utility sector, Claimants also allege that the Government discriminated against the gas-distribution industry by excluding other public-service companies from the conversion of tariffs into pesos. The Government imposed upon the privatized gas-distribution companies what was considered the worst exchange and tariff system during the Argentine crisis.

143. Claimants stress that if one compares the measures that affected sectors such as gas production, alternative energy sources or even those of the public sector, with those affecting gas transportation or distribution, the Tribunal can only conclude that the Argentine Government discriminated against the gas distribution and transportation sectors. The alleged discrimination is particularly obvious in Claimants' view by the fact that most of the investors in the gas-distribution sector are foreigners.
144. Respondent argues that the measures it adopted were not discriminatory because they were general measures without any unreasonable distinction. Respondent questions whether Argentina's measures can be considered discriminatory, if one acknowledges, as Claimants have, that other industries related to public services were affected by the measures adopted regarding the PPI (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 700).
145. Respondent explains that each public service is regulated by its own set of tariff rules, and for that reason, the effect may not have been exactly the same for all sectors, including the field of public services. Respondent alleges that "[i]t is irrational and illegitimate to compare one utility to a different one, subject to different rules, different agreements and different characteristics, and then hold that it is discriminatory to treat differently the different utilities at stake" (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶ 703, emphasis omitted).

146. In the context of investment treaties, and the obligation thereunder not to discriminate against foreign investors, a measure is considered discriminatory if the intent of the measure is to discriminate or if the measure has a discriminatory effect.<sup>40</sup> As stated in the ELSI Elettronica

<sup>40</sup> See Vandevelde, Kenneth J., United States Investment Treaties: Policy and Practice, Kluwer Law

Sicula SpA case (United States of America v. Italy), ICJ Report 1989 RLA 56 at 61-62 (20 July 1989), in order to establish when a measure is discriminatory, there must be (i) an intentional treatment (ii) in favor of a national (iii) against a foreign investor, and (iv) that is not taken under similar circumstances against another national.

(iii) Tribunal's Conclusion

147. While the Tribunal concludes that based on the evidence presented, Respondent treated the gas-distribution companies in a discriminatory manner, imposing stricter measures on the gas-distribution companies than other public-utility sectors, Claimants have however not proven that these measures targeted Claimants' investments specifically as foreign investments.

148. Certainly, all the gas-distribution companies were affected by the economic crisis and by the Government's measures like all other companies within the public-utility sector. However, Argentina suspended PPI adjustments for the gas industry two years before enacting the Emergency Law. It did not take the same action with respect to the public-utility companies such as the electricity and water distribution companies, in which case it continued to adjust their tariffs until enactment of the Emergency Law. Instead, the gas-distribution companies were subjected to unfavorable regimes devised for the conversion of dollar obligations and tariffs into pesos. Even though it was not proved that these measures had been adopted with the purpose of causing Claimants' foreign investments damage, discrimination against gas distribution companies vis-à-vis other companies, such as water supply and electricity companies, is evident.

2. Arbitrary Treatment

(i) Parties' Positions

149. Claimants characterize Argentine Government's course of conduct towards the gas-distribution licensees as arbitrary in violation of Article II(2)(b) of the Bilateral Treaty. Claimants articulate the standard for what constitutes an "arbitrary" act as "disregard for the rule of law" (Claimants' Memorial, ¶ 176).
150. Claimants argue that, in taking measures against the gas-distribution licensees and other public utilities, the Argentine Government acted in disregard for the rule of law. According to Claimants, the Government acted under the trappings of laws, decrees, resolution, regulations and court decisions, but by willfully repudiating the commitments it made to the gas-distribution licensees and their shareholders, the Government followed "the rule of power, not the rule of law" (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 44). In Claimants' view, the Government's wholesale repudiation of the tariff system was unnecessary to achieve the stated aims of the PPI suspension or those of the Emergency Law, since the the tariff system was sufficiently flexible to allow Respondent to reduce tariffs unilaterally, for any reason, as long as it paid compensation to the licensees. Instead, the Government chose to dismantle the whole tariff system without granting due compensation (Claimants' Memorial, ¶ 176).
151. Claimants argue that when Respondent's Bilateral Treaty obligations and the promises made to the foreign investors became politically and economically inconvenient, Respondent ignored its obligations and repudiated the Gas Law's key provisions. These measures, they assert, not only surprise but also contradict any sense of Respondent's ownership of its legal obligations, and accordingly they are arbitrary in nature. Claimants refute as without evidence any assertion by Respondent that if the guarantees had not been abolished, tariffs would have tripled or quadrupled in price (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 44).

152. In its defense, Respondent contends that the measures were not arbitrary; on the contrary, they were reasonable and proportionate to the end pursued. In Argentina's view, the tariff system was not dismantled. Rather, it was modified by the measures that the Government was forced to put in place during the economic crisis. Respondent suggests that under the circumstances, the deferment of the PPI adjustment in the year 2000 was a reasonable measure. This position, as Respondent views it, is supported by both a decision of a court of first instance and by the Federal Court of Appeal (Cámara Federal de Apelaciones), which concluded that the adjustment at issue was unreasonable within the recessive economic context endured by the Argentine Republic. The stability that Claimants argue should characterize the legal system does not mean that the system will exist in perpetuity, immutability or immobility. Any requirement of "freezing the law" without considering the social and economic circumstances under which the laws were enacted, is transforming the Argentine legal system into a "frivolous rite" (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, ¶¶ 638-639).
153. Respondent contends that linking the tariff adjustments to the peso (pesificación) is not arbitrary or discriminatory. Had there been no link to the peso, many customers could not have had access to the gas service, which would have resulted in the collapse of the distribution industries themselves, and tariffs would have been no longer fair but abusive.
154. In Respondent's view, none of the measures adopted by the Argentine Government may be qualified as arbitrary or discriminatory. On the contrary, they were proportionate and reasonable under the circumstances and accordingly, not a violation of Article II(2)(b) of the Bilateral Treaty (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 112).

155. Article II(2)(b) of the Bilateral Treaty provides that "[n]either Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investments.”

156. The term “arbitrary” is left undefined by the Bilateral Treaty. Thus, the Tribunal looks to its plain meaning for international law to determine whether the measures adopted by Argentina could be classified as arbitrary.
157. According to international law, arbitrariness has been described as “a willful disregard of due process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of juridical propriety.”<sup>41</sup> The tribunal in Ronald S. Lauder v. The Czech Republic, referring to the Black’s Law Dictionary, defined the term as “depending on individual discretion; (...) founded on prejudice or preference rather than on reason or fact.”<sup>42</sup>
158. It is apparent from the Bilateral Treaty that Argentina and the United States wanted to prohibit themselves from implementing measures that affect the investments of nationals of the other Party without engaging in a rational decision-making process. Such process would include a consideration of the effect of a measure on foreign investments and a balance of the interests of the State with any burden imposed on such investments. Certainly a State that fails to base its actions on reasoned judgment, and uses abusive arguments instead, would not “stimulate the flow of private capital.”<sup>43</sup>
159. The Genin case quoted by Respondent provides a good example of a State measure upholding a guarantee similar to the prohibition in the Estonia – U.S. BIT against arbitrary treatment. There, the tribunal concluded that the Bank of Estonia’s annulment of a license occurred in the course of exercising its statutory obligations to regulate the Estonian banking sector, and therefore was not arbitrary.<sup>44</sup> In so concluding, the tribunal accepted Estonia's explanation that the circumstances of political and economic transition prevailing in Estonia at the time justified heightened scrutiny of the banking sector, and that such regulation by a State reflects "a clear and legitimate public purpose."<sup>45</sup>

160. In contrast, the Lauder tribunal determined that the acts of the Czech Republic's Media Council were arbitrary. Such acts consisted in forcing a private investor in the newly-privatized company that held the state television license to exchange a direct participation in the company for a contractual relationship.<sup>46</sup> The tribunal reasoned that the act was motivated by fear of the political implications of having a foreigner influencing Czech television broadcasts.<sup>47</sup>

(iii) Tribunal's Conclusion

161. This case lands between the two cases mentioned above, but ultimately the Tribunal concludes that the acts of Argentina were not arbitrary, and therefore did not violate Article II(2)(b) for the following reasons.
162. While Claimants have alleged Argentina's political motivation to use foreign investors in the public utility sector as an excuse to justify the economic mistakes committed in the country, Argentina has explained that the Government's motivation was its desire to avoid its full economic collapse. To this end, it entered into agreements with the licensees in 2001, in addition to other actions taken. Bearing in mind the Tribunal's analysis, characterizing the measures as not arbitrary does not mean that such measures are characterized as fair and equitable or regarded as not having

affected the stability of the legal framework under which gas transportation companies in Argentina operated. On the contrary, this means that Argentina faced severe economic and social hardships from 2001 onwards and had to react to the circumstances prevailing at the time. Even though the measures adopted by Argentina may not have been the best, they were not taken lightly, without due consideration. This is particularly reflected in the PPI adjustments which, before deciding on their postponement, Argentina negotiated with the investors. The Tribunal concludes that the charges imposed by Argentina to Claimants' investment, though unfair and inequitable, were the result of reasoned judgment rather than simple disregard of the rule of law.

163. Likewise, it was not arbitrary, though unfair and inequitable, not to restore the Gas Law or the other guarantees related to the gas distribution sector and to implement the contract renegotiation policy.

C. ARTICLE II(2)(c): THE UMBRELLA CLAUSE

1. Parties' Positions

164. LG&E claims that Argentina violated Article II(2)(c) of the BIT when it assumed certain fundamental obligations with regard to investments in its gas-distribution sector and the foreign investors and then repudiated each of these legal commitments without compensating Claimants for their loss.
165. As LG&E explains it, Argentina used foreign capital investment as the cornerstone of its economic recovery plan in the early 1990s. Respondent designed the privatization of Gas del Estado S.E. as an international bidding process, in which the conditions for bidding on local enterprises could be met only by a consortium involving foreign investors. Argentina wooed foreign investors with promises of return on investment that would always be reasonable, protections against currency exchange and inflation, adjustment of rates pursuant to international indexes, no unilateral changes and no price controls without indemnification. Argentina bound itself to these promises in the form of legal obligations.

166. According to Claimants, these are the promises that the umbrella clause is meant to address. The Tribunal need not decide that every commitment regarding investments embodied in general legislation or regulations gives rise to obligations that must be observed under that clause. Rather, liability derives from this article of the Treaty when in the particular circumstances of this case, Respondent failed to observe its obligations.
167. The problem with LG&E's claim, according to Respondent, is that it assumes that general legislation relating to the natural gas distribution and transportation industry falls within Article II(2)(c)'s parameter. Respondent suggests that such promises do not qualify as specific representations that make the umbrella clause effective.
168. Respondent also asserts that LG&E's claims are nothing more than claims of contractual breaches, which are to be considered under the specific jurisdictional clauses of the contract and not adjudicated in an international forum under application of the umbrella clause.

2. Tribunal's Analysis

169. Article II(2)(c) of the Treaty provides that "[e]ach party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments."
170. Such clause, referred to as an "umbrella clause," is a general provision included in a fairly large number of bilateral treaties that creates a requirement for the host State to meet its obligations towards foreign investors, including those that derive from a contract. Hence such obligations receive extra protection by virtue of their consideration under the bilateral treaty.

171. In many cases it has been considered that the umbrella clause is activated not by obligations set forth in municipal law, but in contracts between the State and the investor.<sup>48</sup> Several of those tribunals have concluded that the breach of a contractual obligation in a contract between the State and the investor gives rise to a claim under the umbrella clause.<sup>49</sup>
172. The issue for the Tribunal's consideration is whether the provisions of the Gas Law and its implementing regulations constitute (i) "obligations" (ii) "with regard to" LG&E's capacity as a foreign investor (iii) with respect to its "investment," such that abrogation of the guarantees set forth in the Gas Law and its implementing regulations give rise to a violation of the Treaty.
173. In this case, it will be necessary to establish whether LG&E's claims fall under the umbrella clause's protection.
174. In order to determine the applicability of the umbrella clause, the Tribunal should establish if by virtue of the provisions of the Gas Law and its regulations, the Argentine State has assumed international obligations with respect to LG&E and its investment. To this end, it is necessary to remember that the provisions of the Gas Law and its regulation fixed and regulated the tariff scheme ensuring the value of Claimants' investment; that the purpose of Claimants' investment was to increase the value of its shares in the Licensees through a fragile balanced management of profits and costs, represented by the tariffs fixed by Argentina in light of the already mentioned Gas Law and its regulation. In view of the statements above, the Tribunal concludes that these provisions were not legal obligations of a general nature.<sup>50</sup> On the contrary, they were very specific in relation to

<sup>50</sup> SGS v. Philippines, ¶ 121 ("For [the umbrella clause] to be applicable, the host State must have assumed a legal obligation, and it must have been assumed vis-à-vis the specific investment – not as a matter of the application of some legal obligation of a general character.").

LG&E's investment in Argentina, so that their abrogation would be a violation of the umbrella clause.

3. Tribunal's Conclusion

175. As such, Argentina's abrogation of the guarantees under the statutory framework – calculation of the tariffs in dollars before conversion to pesos, semi-annual tariff adjustments by the PPI and no price controls without indemnification – violated its obligations to Claimants' investments. Argentina made these specific obligations to foreign investors, such as LG&E, by enacting the Gas Law and other regulations, and then advertising these guarantees in the Offering Memorandum to induce the entry of foreign capital to fund the privatization program in its public service sector. These laws and regulations became obligations within the meaning of Article II(2)(c), by virtue of targeting foreign investors and applying specifically to their investments, that gave rise to liability under the umbrella clause.

D. CONSIDERATIONS ON INDIRECT EXPROPRIATION

1. Parties' Positions

176. LG&E seeks a declaration from this Tribunal that Argentina expropriated LG&E's investment in the Argentine gas-distribution sector without compensation in violation of Article IV of the Treaty, which provides, in part:

“1. Investments shall not be expropriated or nationalized either directly or indirectly through measures tantamount to expropriation or nationalization (“expropriation”) except for a public purpose; in a non-discriminatory manner; upon payment of prompt, adequate and effective compensation; and in accordance with due process of law and the general principles of treatment provided for in Article II(2).”

177. LG&E articulates its expropriation claim as one of indirect expropriation. In other words, LG&E argues that the Argentine Government's treatment of Claimants' investment in the Licensees constitutes an indirect expropriation of the investments because the value of LG&E's holdings in the Licenses has been reduced by more than 90% as a result of Respondent's abrogation of the principal guarantees of the tariff system (Claimants' Memorial, ¶ 180).

178. LG&E contends that, pursuant to Article IV of the Bilateral Treaty, it is entitled to compensation equivalent to the fair market value of the expropriated investment immediately before the expropriation was committed. Claimants pinpoint the date of expropriation in this case as the date on which Respondent's course of conduct finally resulted in the virtual destruction of the value of the investment –not later than August 2000, when the Argentine court enjoined implementation of the 17 July 2000 agreement and any further PPI adjustments (Claimants' Memorial, ¶ 181).

179. Under Claimants' theory, indirect expropriation occurs when government action substantially impairs the value of an investment (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 53 citing Dolzer Reb., ¶ 56). In this case, the Claimants consider that the Argentine Government's actions had a substantial effect on LG&E's shares in the Licensees, which are an investment protected under Article I(1)(a) of the Treaty. The value of LG&E's investment was based on a tariff system and depended on the Respondent respecting the system. The value of LG&E's shares in the Licensees now fluctuates according to general speculation around the future tariff relief that Argentina may or may not grant (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 53).

180. Claimants add that when it comes to establishing whether there was effectively an indirect expropriation, there is no relevance to the fact that the Licensees continue to operate or control their gas-distribution business, or as to whether Claimants hold title to the shares. In the case of indirect expropriation, it does not matter whether title to the licenses has been transferred to the State. It is enough to show that their investment has been impaired as a result of government action, which they claim is the case here as there allegedly has been a substantial appropriation of value by the State and transfer of wealth from the gas industry to gas consumers, especially large industrial consumers (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶¶ 53-54).

181. The Respondent denies that any expropriation under Article IV of the Bilateral Treaty has occurred. Respondent contends that, in order for the Argentine Government to have either directly or indirectly expropriated Claimants' investment, the measures at issue would have had to have been designed to transfer title to the investment to the State. The sole difference between direct and indirect expropriation in this case, according to Respondent, is that with indirect expropriation, no formal transfer of title is required, since its purpose is that of "masking, disguising the expropriating event and of eluding the resulting liability" (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 103).
182. Respondent argues that Claimants have not proven that the PPI's suspension constitutes an expropriating event. Respondent contends that the suspension of the PPI adjustments would have affected tariffs by approximately 2%, and states that under no circumstance could a tribunal conclude that such a small loss qualifies as an expropriation subject to compensation.
183. Argentina argues that in any event there could not have been any expropriation during the economic crisis. The fact that the licensees may have been affected by the crisis, along with everyone else, does not lead to the conclusion that their investment was expropriated. Respondent denies any causal link between the measures adopted by the Argentine State during this time and the fluctuations in the value of LG&E's shares in the licensees. In its opinion, the fluctuation in the value of LG&E's investment is attributable to the "macroeconomic conditions affecting the Argentine Republic", rather than the measures adopted by the Argentine State (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 109). Argentina points out that between 1997 and 2000, LG&E earned higher income than expected through its investments in the licensees.
184. Finally, after objecting the expropriation claim because the company remains de facto and by law the owner of the investment, Respondent alleges that, in fact, the share prices of Claimants' investment have increased in value from the period immediately preceding the suspension of the PPI adjustments. As such, Respondent argues that where property is worth more today than it was prior to the measures' adoption, the property may not be deemed expropriated (Respondent's Post-Hearing Brief, ¶¶ 110-111).

2. Tribunal's Analysis

185. In order to establish the sustainability of an indirect expropriation, the Tribunal must define the concept. Generally, bilateral treaties do not define what constitutes an expropriation –they just make an express reference to “expropriation” and add the language “any other action that has equivalent effects.” Likewise, Article IV of the Bilateral Treaty does not define the term “expropriation” and does not establish which measures, actions or conduct would constitute acts “tantamount to expropriation.” Therefore, the Tribunal shall look to international law in determining the relevant criteria for evaluating this claim.
186. A State may, at its discretion, under Article IV of the Bilateral Treaty and in accordance with general principles of international law, make use of its sovereign power to expropriate private property with the purpose of satisfying a public interest. However, expropriation in any of its modalities requires due process and compensation under international law.
187. Although in scholarly authority two kinds of expropriation are known, we will obviously skip the direct one, understood as the forcible appropriation by the State of the tangible or intangible property of individuals by means of administrative or legislative action. The parties admit that the claim at issue does not involve a direct expropriation. In the case of the Argentine Republic, one could not say that it appropriated Claimants' investment, which is the indispensable requirement if one is to talk of direct expropriation. Instead, we shall limit ourselves to the assumption of the indirect expropriation, one qualified by the Bilateral Treaty itself as “measures tantamount to expropriation.”

188. Generally, the expression “equivalent to expropriation” or “tantamount to expropriation” found in most bilateral treaties, may refer both, to the so-called “creeping expropriation” and to the de facto expropriation. Their common point rests in the fact that the host State’s actions or conduct do not involve “overt taking” but the taking occurs when governmental measures have “effectively neutralize[d] the benefit of property of the foreign owner.”<sup>51</sup> Ownership or enjoyment can be said to be “neutralized” where a party no longer is in control of the investment, or where it cannot direct the day-to-day operations of the investment.<sup>52</sup> As to the differences, it is usual to say that indirect expropriation may show itself in a gradual or growing form—creeping expropriation— or through a sole and unique action, or through actions being quite close in time or simultaneous—de facto expropriation.
189. In order to establish whether State measures constitute expropriation under Article IV(1) of the Bilateral Treaty, the Tribunal must balance two competing interests: the degree of the measure’s interference with the right of ownership and the power of the State to adopt its policies.
190. In evaluating the degree of the measure’s interference with the investor’s right of ownership, one must analyze the measure’s economic impact – its interference with the investor’s reasonable expectations – and the measure’s duration.
191. In considering the severity of the economic impact, the analysis focuses on whether the economic impact unleashed by the measure adopted by the host State was sufficiently severe as to generate the need for compensation due to expropriation. In many arbitral decisions, the compensation has been denied when it has not affected all or almost all the investment's economic value. Interference with the investment's ability to carry on its business is not satisfied where the investment continues to operate, even if profits are diminished.<sup>53</sup> The impact must be substantial in order that compensation may be claimed for the expropriation.

192. The tribunal in Tecmed required a finding that Claimant had been “radically deprived of the economical use and enjoyment of its investments, as if the rights related thereto –such as the income or benefits related to the [investment...]- had ceased to exist.”<sup>54</sup> In other words, if due to the actions of the Respondent, the assets involved have lost their value or economic use for the Claimants and the extent of the loss.<sup>55</sup>
193. Similarly, one must consider the duration of the measure as it relates to the degree of interference with the investor's ownership rights. Generally, the expropriation must be permanent, that is to say, it cannot have a temporary nature, unless the investment's successful development depends on the realization of certain activities at specific moments that may not endure variations.
194. There is no doubt that the facts relating to the severity of the changes on the legal status and the practical impact endured by the investors in this case, as well as the possibility of enjoying the right of ownership and use of the investment are decisive in establishing whether an indirect expropriation is said to have occurred. The question remains as to whether one should only take into account the effects produced by the measure or if one should consider also the context within which a measure was adopted and the host State's purpose. It is this Tribunal's opinion that there must be a balance in the analysis both of the causes and the effects of a measure in order that one may qualify a measure as being of an expropriatory nature. It is important not to confound the State's right to adopt policies with its power to take an expropriatory measure. "This determination is important because it is one of the main elements to distinguish, from the perspective of an international tribunal between a regulatory measure, which is an ordinary expression of the exercise of the state's police power that entails a decrease in assets or rights, and a de facto expropriation that deprives those assets and rights of any real substance."<sup>56</sup>

195. With respect to the power of the State to adopt its policies, it can generally be said that the State has the right to adopt measures having a social or general welfare purpose. In such a case, the measure must be accepted without any imposition of liability, except in cases where the State's action is obviously disproportionate to the need being addressed. The proportionality to be used when making use of this right was recognized in Tecmed, which observed that "whether such actions or measures are proportional to the public interest presumably protected thereby and the protection legally granted to investments, taking into account that the significance of such impact, has a key role upon deciding the proportionality."<sup>57</sup>

196. As is observed by The American Law Institute's Restatement (Third) of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, "a state is not responsible for loss of property or for other economic disadvantage resulting from bona fide general taxation, regulation, forfeiture for crime, or other action of the kind that is commonly accepted as within the police power of the states, if it is not discriminatory..."<sup>58</sup>. This criterion was used by the Tribunal of Iran-United

197. As was stated in the Oscar Chinn affair of 1934, adopted by the Permanent Court of International Justice:

“No enterprise... can escape from the chances and hazards resulting from general economic conditions. Some industries may be able to make large profits during a period of general prosperity, or else by taking advantages of a treaty of commerce or of an alteration in customs duties; but they are also exposed to the danger of ruin or extinction if circumstances change. Where this is the case, no vested rights are violated by the State.”<sup>60</sup>

3. Tribunal’s Conclusion

198. In the circumstances of this case, although the State adopted severe measures that had a certain impact on Claimants’ investment, especially regarding the earnings that the Claimants expected, such measures did not deprive the investors of the right to enjoy their investment. As in Pope & Talbot, the true interests at stake here are the investment’s asset base, the value of which has rebounded since the economic crisis of December 2001 and 2002.
199. Further, it cannot be said that Claimants lost control over their shares in the licensees, even though the value of the shares may have fluctuated during the economic crisis, or that they were unable to direct the day-to-day operations of the licensees in a manner different than before the measures were implemented.
200. Thus, the effect of the Argentine State’s actions has not been permanent on the value of the Claimants’ shares’, and Claimants’ investment has not ceased to exist. Without a permanent, severe deprivation of LG&E’s rights with regard to its investment, or almost complete deprivation of the value of LG&E's investment, the Tribunal concludes that these circumstances do not constitute expropriation.

E. STATE OF NECESSITY

1. Parties' Positions

201. Respondent contends in the alternative that, if Argentina would have breached its Treaty obligations, the state of political, economic and social crisis that befell Argentina allowed it to take action contrary to the obligations it had assumed with respect to the gas-distribution licensees. Thus, even if the measures adopted by the State in order to overcome the economic crisis suffered during the years 1998 through 2003, resulted in a violation of the rights guaranteed under the Treaty to foreign investments, such measures were implemented under a state of necessity and therefore, Argentina is excused from liability during this period.
202. Respondent pleads its defense as a "state of necessity" defense, available under Argentine law, Treaty in Articles XI and IV(3), as well as customary international law.
203. Claimants reject Respondent's contentions regarding the alleged state of necessity defense. Claimants contend that Article XI is not applicable in the case of an economic crisis because the public order and essential security interests elements are intentionally narrow in scope, limited to security threats of a physical nature.

2. General Comments on Article XI

(i) Preliminary Considerations

204. Article XI of the Bilateral Treaty provides:

"This Treaty shall not preclude the application by either Party of measures necessary for the maintenance of public order, the fulfillment of its obligations with respect to the maintenance or restoration of international peace or security, or the protection of its own essential security interests.”

205. The Tribunal’s analysis to determine the applicability of Article XI of the Bilateral Treaty is twofold. First, the Tribunal must decide whether the conditions that existed in Argentina during the relevant period were such that the State was entitled to invoke the protections included in Article XI of the Treaty. Second, the Tribunal must determine whether the measures implemented by Argentina were necessary to maintain public order or to protect its essential security interests, albeit in violation of the Treaty.<sup>61</sup>
206. The Tribunal reiterates that to carry out the two-fold analysis already mentioned, it shall apply first, the Treaty, second, the general international law to the extent that is necessary and third, the Argentine domestic law. The Tribunal underscores that the claims and defenses mentioned derive from the Treaty and that, to the extent required for the interpretation and application of its provisions, the general international law shall be applied (See section V. B supra).

(ii) The Question of Whether Article XI is Self-Judging

207. Before turning to its substantive analysis of Article XI, the Tribunal must determine whether Article XI is self-judging.
208. Respondent has argued that because Article XI is a self-judging provision, it is for the State to make a good faith determination as to what measures are necessary for the maintenance of public order, or the protection of its essential security interests. According to Respondent, under this self-judging exception, the Tribunal must decide only whether Argentina acted in good faith or not.

<sup>61</sup> Respondent has not relied upon the third element of Article XI, “the fulfillment of its obligations with respect to the maintenance or restoration of international peace or security.”

209. Respondent considers Article XI is ambiguous and characterizes such ambiguity as a “strategic ambiguity” on the part of the United States, since it does not clearly define who should determine if the measures to maintain public order or protect essential security interests are necessary. Respondent recognizes that the United States’ 1987 Model BIT, upon which the Argentina–U.S. BIT was based, does not clarify the United States’ position, nor does any of the documentation related to the negotiation or ratification of the Argentina-U.S. BIT. However, Respondent contends that subsequent to the conclusion of the Argentina-U.S. BIT, the United States shifted its position permanently with regard to essential security clauses, stating in 1992 that the United States considered such clauses to be self-judging, presently and retroactively (Slaughter Witness Statement, ¶¶ 12-31).
210. Claimants disagree that Article XI is self-judging, and argue instead that its application requires that the Tribunal conduct its own analysis of whether the conditions necessitated measures to maintain public order or protect Argentina’s essential security interests within the meaning of Article XI.
211. Claimants contend that neither the plain meaning of Article XI, nor the context or purpose of the Treaty suggest that Article XI is self-judging, and that the position of the United States at the time the parties signed the Treaty was that such clauses were not self-judging (Hearing on the Merits, 28 January 2005, Alvarez, Spanish Transcript, p. 925 et seq.). Claimants argue that Respondent has not proven that the parties to the Treaty intended Article XI to be self-judging, which they characterize as “an exceptional thing.” (Hearing on the Merits, 28 January 2005, Alvarez, Spanish Transcript, p. 932 et seq.). Claimants contend that the United States did not consider essential security clauses as self-judging until the Russia-U.S. BIT of 1992 and the 1992 U.S. Model BIT, both of which post-date the Argentina-U.S. BIT, and both of which noted explicitly the change in the United States’ policy that these provisions were to be self-judging.
212. Certainly, the language of the BIT does not specify who should decide what constitutes essential security measures –either Argentina itself, subject to a review under a good faith standard, or the Tribunal. Based on the evidence before the Tribunal regarding the understanding of the Parties in 1991 at the time the Treaty was signed, the Tribunal decides and concludes that the provision is not self-judging.

213. The provisions included in the international treaty are to be interpreted in conformity with the interpretation given and agreed upon by both parties at the time of its signature, unless both parties agreed to its modification. In that case, the date to be considered is November 1991. It is not until 1992, with the ratification of the Russia – US BIT, that the United States begins to consider that the application of the essential security measures are self judging; both instruments post-date the bilateral treaty between the United States and the Argentine Republic and, in both cases, this change was explicitly clarified.
214. Were the Tribunal to conclude that the provision is self-judging, Argentina’s determination would be subject to a good faith review anyway, which does not significantly differ from the substantive analysis presented here.

(iii) Necessary Nature of the Measures Adopted

a. Parties’ Positions

215. Argentina defends the measures it implemented as necessary to maintain public order and protect its essential security interests. It contends that under any interpretation, the financial crisis, riots and chaos of the years 2000 through 2002 in Argentina constitute a national emergency sufficient to invoke the protections of Article XI (Slaughter Witness Statement, ¶ 45).
216. Concerning “public order”, Respondent reinforces its arguments on the necessary nature of the measures it had implemented by pointing to numerous reports of waves of sudden economic catastrophe, massive strikes involving millions of workers, fatal shootings, the shut down of schools, businesses, transportation, energy, banking and health services, demonstrations across the country, and a plummeting stock market, culminating in a “final massive social explosion” in which five presidential administrations resigned within a month (Slaughter Witness Statement, ¶¶ 46-49). Under these circumstances, Argentina argues that price controls by the Argentine Government would have been fully justifiable under the public order provisions of Article XI. Additionally, Respondent argues that actions to freeze price increases in the gas-distribution sector were justifiable to maintain the country’s basic infrastructure, which was dependent on natural gas energy.

217. Argentina also defends its measures as necessary to protect its essential security interests. Argentina asserts that Article XI’s “essential security interests” element encompasses economic and political interests, as well as national military defense interests. Respondent cites several United States’ officials who have propounded a broad interpretation of “essential security interests” (Slaughter Witness Statement, ¶ 38).
218. Respondent attacks Claimants’ basis for asserting that the clause is narrow, reserved only for military actions. Furthermore, in all of the cases cited by Claimants, the point was whether the use of military force was justifiable under international law – a narrow reading of essential security clauses in these cases would be expected.
219. Because economic stability, in Respondent’s view, falls within a State’s essential security interests, Respondent defends the measures it took as necessary to protect its economic interests. Respondent argues that during the crisis period, the health, safety and security of the Argentine State and its people were threatened, and that the economic melt-down had the potential to cause catastrophic state failure. Thus, the public emergency that Argentina declared and the Emergency Law the Government passed altering its financial arrangements were necessary to protect the State’s essential security interests.

220. Claimants identify the four measures at issue here –suspension and abolishment of the PPI adjustment, freezing the gas-distribution tariffs, and abandonment of the calculation of the tariffs in dollars, all taken unilaterally– and contend that Respondent must prove that each measure was necessary in order to maintain public order and protect Argentina’s essential security interests (Reply, ¶ 209). By the term “necessary,” Claimants contend that these measures must have been the only option available to Argentina in order to invoke protection under Article XI.
221. Claimants define public order measures as “actions taken pursuant to a state’s police powers, particularly in respect of public health and safety”. Based on this definition, Claimants state that the measures in dispute in this case were not aimed at bringing calmness to the collapse that was threatening the country. Consequently, such measures cannot be deemed necessary to maintain public order.
222. With respect to “essential security interests,” Claimants reiterate that such interests do not include economic interests –only defense or military concerns. They compare a State’s interest in essential security to a national security threat, while a “national emergency,” the alleged circumstance in which Respondent invokes the protection, has an entirely different meaning. In Claimants’ view, economic crises should not be elevated to an essential security interest, and that doing so would disregard the object and purpose of the Treaty. They argue that an economic crisis is precisely when investors need the protections offered by a BIT.
223. Claimants argue that in any event, Article XI does not relieve Argentina of its obligations to compensate Claimants for damages suffered as a result of breaches of the Treaty.
224. Claimants also reject the possibility of applying the rule provided by Article IV(3) of the Treaty. They are of the opinion that this provision does not apply to economic crises, and it does not authorize the host State to revoke or suspend the protections given to foreign investors (Reply, ¶ 229).

225. Claimants invoke Article 27 of the International Law Commission's Draft Articles on State Responsibility. Claimants contend that even if the state of necessity defense is available to Argentina under the circumstances of this case, Article 27 of the Draft Articles makes clear that Argentina's obligations to Claimants are not extinguished and Argentina must compensate Claimants for losses incurred as a result of the Government's actions. Article 27 provides that "invocation of a circumstance precluding wrongfulness in accordance with this chapter is without prejudice to (a) compliance with the obligation in question... (b) the question of compensation for any material loss caused by the act in question" (Reply, ¶¶ 226-228).

226. In the judgment of the Tribunal, from 1 December 2001 until 26 April 2003, Argentina was in a period of crisis during which it was necessary to enact measures to maintain public order and protect its essential security interests.
227. The Tribunal does not consider that the initial date for the state of necessity is the effective date of the Emergency Law, 6 January 2002, because, in the first place, the emergency had already started when the law was enacted. Second, should the Tribunal take as the initial date the day when the Emergency Law became effective, it might be reasonable to take as its closing date the day when the state of emergency is lifted by the Argentine State, a fact that has not yet taken place since the law has been extended several times.
228. It is to be pointed out that there is a factual emergency that began on 1 December 2001 and ended on 26 April 2003, on account of the reasons detailed below, as well as a legislative emergency, that begins and ends with the enactment and abrogation of the Emergency Law, respectively. It should be borne in mind that Argentina declared its state of necessity and has extended such state until the present. Indeed, the country has issued a record number of decrees since 1901, accounting for the fact that the emergency periods in Argentina have been longer than the non-emergency periods. Emergency periods should be only strictly exceptional and should be applied exclusively when faced with extraordinary circumstances. Hence, in order to allege state of necessity as a State defense, it will be necessary to prove the existence of serious public disorders. Based on the evidence available, the Tribunal has determined that the situation ended at the time President Kirchner was elected.

229. Thus, Argentina is excused under Article XI from liability for any breaches of the Treaty between 1 December 2001 and 26 April 2003. The reasons are the following:
230. These dates coincide, on the one hand, with the Government's announcement of the measure freezing funds, which prohibited bank account owners from withdrawing more than one thousand pesos monthly and, on the other hand, with the election of President Kirchner. The Tribunal marks these dates as the beginning and end of the period of extreme crisis in view of the notorious events that occurred during this period.
231. Evidence has been put before the Tribunal that the conditions as of December 2001 constituted the highest degree of public disorder and threatened Argentina's essential security interests. This was not merely a period of "economic problems" or "business cycle fluctuation" as Claimants described (Claimants' Post-Hearing Brief, ¶ 14). Extremely severe crises in the economic, political and social sectors reached their apex and converged in December 2001, threatening total collapse of the Government and the Argentine State.
232. All of the major economic indicators reached catastrophic proportions in December 2001. An accelerated deterioration of Argentina's Gross Domestic Product (GDP) began in December 2001, falling 10 to 15 percent faster than the previous year. Private consumption dramatically dropped in the fourth quarter of 2001, accompanied by a severe drop in domestic prices. Argentina experienced at this time widespread decline in the prices and in the value of assets located in Argentina. The Merval Index, which measures the share value of the main companies of Argentina listed on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange, experienced a dramatic decline of 60% by the end of December 2001. By mid-2001, Argentina's country risk premium was the highest premium worldwide, rendering Argentina unable to borrow on the international markets, and reflecting the severity of the economic crisis.

233. At this time, capital outflow was a critical problem for the Government. In the fourth quarter of 2001, the Central Bank of Argentina lost US$ 11 billion in liquid reserves, amounting to 40%. The banking system lost 25% of its total deposits.
234. While unemployment, poverty and indigency rates gradually increased from the beginning of 1998, they reached intolerable levels by December 2001. Unemployment reached almost 25%, and almost half of the Argentine population was living below poverty. The entire healthcare system teetered on the brink of collapse. Prices of pharmaceuticals soared as the country plunged deeper into the deflationary period, becoming unavailable for low-income people. Hospitals suffered a severe shortage of basic supplies. Investments in infrastructure and equipment for public hospitals declined as never before. These conditions prompted the Government to declare the nationwide health emergency to ensure the population's access to basic health care goods and services. At the time, one quarter of the population could not afford the minimum amount of food required to ensure their subsistence. Given the level of poverty and lack of access to healthcare and proper nutrition, disease followed. Facing increased pressure to provide social services and security to the masses of indigent and poor people, the Government was forced to decrease its per capita spending on social services by 74%.

235. By December 2001, there was widespread fear among the population that the Government would default on its debt and seize bank deposits to prevent the bankruptcy of the banking system. Faced with a possible run on banks, the Government issued on 1 December 2001 Decree of Necessity and Emergency No. 1570/01. The law triggered widespread social discontent. Widespread violent demonstrations and protests brought the economy to a halt, including effectively shutting down transportation systems. Looting and rioting followed in which tens of people were killed as the conditions in the country approached anarchy. A curfew was imposed to curb lootings.
236. By 20 December 2001, President De la Rúa resigned. His presidency was followed by a succession of presidents over the next days, until Mr. Eduardo Duhalde took office on 1 January 2002, charged with the mandate to bring the country back to normal conditions.
237. All of these devastating conditions –economic, political, social– in the aggregate triggered the protections afforded under Article XI of the Treaty to maintain order and control the civil unrest.
238. The Tribunal rejects the notion that Article XI is only applicable in circumstances amounting to military action and war. Certainly, the conditions in Argentina in December 2001 called for immediate, decisive action to restore civil order and stop the economic decline. To conclude that such a severe economic crisis could not constitute an essential security interest is to diminish the havoc that the economy can wreak on the lives of an entire population and the ability of the Government to lead. When a State’s economic foundation is under siege, the severity of the problem can equal that of any military invasion.
239. Claimants contend that the necessity defense should not be applied here because the measures implemented by Argentina were not the only means available to respond to the crisis. The Tribunal rejects this assertion. Article XI refers to situations in which a State has no choice but to act. A State may have several responses at its disposal to maintain public order or protect its essential security interests. In this sense, it is recognized that Argentina's suspension of the calculation of tariffs in U.S. dollars and the PPI adjustment of tariffs was a legitimate way of protecting its social and economic system.

240. The Tribunal has determined that Argentina's enactment of the Emergency Law was a necessary and legitimate measure on the part of the Argentine Government. Under the conditions the Government faced in December 2001, time was of the essence in crafting a response. Drafted in just six days, the Emergency Law took the swift, unilateral action against the economic crisis that was necessary at the time (Hearing on the Merits, 25 January 2005, Ratti, Spanish Transcript, pp. 415-419).

241. In drafting the Emergency Law, the Government considered the interests of the foreign investors, and concluded that it "could not leave sectors of the economy operating with the brutally dollarized economy –[the] system was in crisis, so we had to cut off that process, and we had to establish a new set of rules for everybody." (Hearing on the Merits, 25 January 2005, Ratti, Spanish Transcript, p. 417). Argentina's strategy to deal with the thousands of public utility contracts that could not be individually assessed during the period of crisis was to implement "across-the-board solutions" and then renegotiate the contracts (Hearing on the Merits, 26 January 2005, Roubini, Spanish Transcript, p. 635). The Tribunal accepts the necessity of approaching enactment of a stop-gap measure in this manner and therefore rejects Claimants' objection that Argentina's unilateral response was not necessary.

242. The Tribunal accepts that the provisions of the Emergency Law that abrogated calculation of the tariffs in U.S. dollars and PPI adjustments, as well as freezing tariffs were necessary measures to deal with the extremely serious economic crisis. Indeed, it would be unreasonable to conclude that during this period the Government should have implemented a tariff increase pursuant to an index pegged to an economy experiencing a high inflationary period (the United States). The severe devaluation of the peso against the dollar renders the Government's decision to abandon the calculation of tariffs in dollars reasonable. Similarly, the Government deemed that freezing gas tariffs altogether during the crisis period was necessary, and Claimants have not provided any reason as to why such measure would not provide immediate relief from the crisis.

243. The Tribunal will now turn to Article IV(3) of the Treaty, which provides:

“Nationals or companies of either Party whose investments suffer losses in the territory of the other Party owing to war or other armed conflict, revolution, state of national emergency, insurrection, civil disturbance or other similar events shall be accorded treatment by such other Party no less favorable than that accorded to its own nationals or companies or to nationals or companies of any third country, whichever is the more favorable treatment, as regards any measures it adopts in relation to such losses.” (Emphasis added)

244. Article IV(3) of the Treaty confirms that the States Party to the Bilateral Treaty contemplated the state of national emergency as a separate category of exceptional circumstances. That is in line with the Tribunal's interpretation of Article XI of the Treaty. Furthermore, the Tribunal has determined, as a factual matter that the grave crisis in Argentina lasted from 1 December 2001 until 26 April 2003. It has not been shown convincingly to the Tribunal that during that period the provisions of Article IV(3) of the Treaty have been violated by Argentina. On the contrary, during that period, the measures taken by Argentina were “across the board.”

245. In the previous analysis, the Tribunal has determined that the conditions in Argentina from 1 December 2001 until 26 April 2003 were such that Argentina is excused from liability for the alleged violation of its Treaty obligations due to the responsive measures it enacted. The concept of excusing a State for the responsibility for violation of its international obligations during what is called a “state of necessity” or “state of emergency” also exists in international law. While the Tribunal considers that the protections afforded by Article XI have been triggered in this case, and are sufficient to excuse Argentina's liability, the Tribunal recognizes that satisfaction of the state of necessity standard as it exists in international law (reflected in Article 25 of the ILC's Draft Articles on State Responsibility) supports the Tribunal's conclusion.<sup>62</sup>

246. In international law, a state of necessity is marked by certain characteristics that must be present in order for a State to invoke this defense. As articulated by Roberto Ago, one of the mentors of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility, a state of necessity is identified by those conditions in which a State is threatened by a serious danger to its existence, to its political or economic survival, to the possibility of maintaining its essential services in operation, to the preservation of its internal peace, or to the survival of part of its territory.<sup>63</sup> In other words, the State must be dealing with interests that are essential or particularly important.<sup>64</sup>

1. "Necessity may not be invoked by a State as a ground for precluding the wrongfulness of an act not in conformity with an international obligation of that State unless the act:
  - a) Is the only way for the State to safeguard an essential interest against a grave and imminent peril; and
  - b) Does not seriously impair an essential interest of the State or States towards which the obligation exists, or of the international community as a whole.
2. In any case, necessity may not be invoked by a State as a ground for precluding wrongfulness if:
  - a) The international obligation in question excludes the possibility of invoking necessity; or
  - b) The State has contributed to the situation of necessity."

The ILC's Draft Articles, after some debate regarding the original prepared under the auspices of the Society of Nations in 1930, was abandoned and then resumed by the General Assembly in 1963. Its definitive version, due mainly to the works of Mssrs. Roberto Ago, Willem Riphagen and Gaetano Arangio-Ruiz, was approved in 1981 and subject to a revision in 1998, which was approved in 2001, during the 85th plenary session of the United Nations' General Assembly. (Session dated 12 December 2001, during the fifty-sixth session, Agenda item 162 of the Program, A/RES/56/83).

247. The United Nations Organization has understood that the invocation of a state of necessity depends on the concurrent existence of three circumstances, namely: a danger to the survival of the State, and not for its interests, is necessary; that danger must not have been created by the acting State; finally, the danger should be serious and imminent, so that there are no other means of avoiding it.
248. The concept of state of necessity and the requirements for its admissibility lead to the idea of prevention: the State covers itself against the risk of suffering certain damages. Hence, the possibility of alleging the state of necessity is closely bound by the requirement that there should be a serious and imminent threat and no means to avoid it. Such circumstances, in principle, have been left to the State's subjective appreciation, a conclusion accepted by the International Law Commission. Nevertheless, the Commission was well aware of the fact that this exception, requiring admissibility, has been frequently abused by States, thus opening up a very easy opportunity to violate the international law with impunity. The Commission has set in its Draft Articles on State Responsibility very restrictive conditions to account for its admissibility, reducing such subjectivity.<sup>65</sup>
249. James Crawford, who was rapporteur of the Draft Articles approved in 2001, noted that when a State invokes the state of necessity, it has full knowledge of the fact that it deliberately chooses a procedure that does not abide an including international waters and founded such decision on the absolute need to adopt immediate provisional measures. In a communication addressed, on the occasion of this incident, by the Russian foreign Minister, Chickline, to the British Ambassador, Morier, the main elements of the state of necessity were established: the absolutely exceptional nature of the alleged situation; the imminent character of the threat against an important State interest; the impossibility of avoiding the risk with other means, and the necessarily temporary nature of this justification, linked to the due danger's persistence. See United Nations, Report of the International Law Commission on the work performed during its 32nd session, p. 87.

international obligation.<sup>66</sup> This deliberate action on the part of the State is therefore subject to the requirements of Article 25 of the Draft Articles, which must concur jointly and without which it is not possible to exclude under international law the wrongfulness of a State's act that violates an international obligation.

250. Taking each element in turn, Article 25 requires first that the act must be the only means available to the State in order to protect an interest. According to S.P. Jagota, a member of the Commission, such requirement implies that it has not been possible for the State to “avoid by any other means, even a much more onerous one that could have been adopted and maintained the respect of international obligations. The State must have exhausted all possible legal means before being forced to act as it does.”<sup>67</sup> Any act that goes beyond the limits of what is strictly necessary “may not be considered as no longer being, as such, a wrongful act, even if justification of the necessity may have been admitted.”<sup>68</sup>

251. The interest subject to protection also must be essential for the State. What qualifies as an “essential” interest is not limited to those interests referring to the State's existence. As evidence demonstrates, economic, financial or those interests related to the protection of the State against any danger seriously compromising its internal or external situation, are also considered essential interests. Roberto Ago has stated that essential interests include those related to “different matters such as the economy, ecology or other.”<sup>69</sup> Julio Barboza affirmed that the threat to an essential interest would be identified by considering, among other things, “a serious threat against the existence of the State, against its political or economic survival, against the maintenance of its essential services and operational possibilities, or against the conservation of internal peace or its territory's ecology.”<sup>70</sup>

252. James Crawford has stated that no opinion may be offered a priori of “essential interest,” but one should understand that it is not the case of the State’s “existence”, since the “purpose of the positive law of self-defense is to safeguard that existence.”<sup>71</sup> Thus, an interest’s greater or lesser essential, must be determined as a function of the set of conditions in which the State finds itself under specific situations. The requirement is to appreciate the conditions of each specific case where an interest is in play, since what is essential cannot be predetermined in the abstract.<sup>72</sup>
253. The interest must be threatened by a serious and imminent danger. The threat, according to Roberto Ago, “must be ‘extremely grave’ and ‘imminent.’”<sup>73</sup> In this respect, James Crawford has opined that the danger must be established objectively and not only deemed possible.<sup>74</sup> It must be imminent in the sense that it will soon occur.
254. The action taken by the State may not seriously impair another State’s interest. In this respect, the Commission has observed that the interest sacrificed for the sake of necessity must be, evidently, less important than the interest sought to be preserved through the action.<sup>75</sup> The idea is to prevent against the possibility of invoking the state of necessity only for the safeguard of a non-essential interest.
255. The international obligation at issue must allow invocation of the state of necessity. The inclusion of an article authorizing the state of necessity in a Bilateral Investment Treaty constitutes the acceptance, in the relations between States, of the possibility that one of them may invoke the state of necessity.

256. The State must not have contributed to the production of the state of necessity. It seems logical that if the State has contributed to cause the emergency, it should be prevented from invoking the state of necessity. If there is fault by the State, the exception disappears, since in such case the causal relationship between the State's act and the damage caused is produced. The Tribunal considers that, in the first place, Claimants have not proved that Argentina has contributed to cause the severe crisis faced by the country; secondly, the attitude adopted by the Argentine Government has shown a desire to slow down by all the means available the severity of the crisis.
257. The essential interests of the Argentine State were threatened in December 2001. It faced an extremely serious threat to its existence, its political and economic survival, to the possibility of maintaining its essential services in operation, and to the preservation of its internal peace. There is no serious evidence in the record that Argentina contributed to the crisis resulting in the state of necessity. In this circumstances, an economic recovery package was the only means to respond to the crisis. Although there may have been a number of ways to draft the economic recovery plan, the evidence before the Tribunal demonstrates that an across-the-board response was necessary, and the tariffs on public utilities had to be addressed. It cannot be said that any other State's rights were seriously impaired by the measures taken by Argentina during the crisis. Finally, as addressed above, Article XI of the Treaty exempts Argentina of responsibility for measures enacted during the state of necessity.
258. While this analysis concerning Article 25 of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility alone does not establish Argentina's defense, it supports the Tribunal's analysis with regard to the meaning of Article XI's requirement that the measures implemented by Argentina had to have been necessary either for the maintenance of public order or the protection of its own essential security interests.

259. Having found that the requirements for invoking the state of necessity were satisfied, the Tribunal considers that it is the factor excluding the State from its liability vis-à-vis the damage caused as a result of the measures adopted by Argentina in response to the severe crisis suffered by the country.
260. With regard to Article 27 of the United Nations' Draft Articles alleged by Claimants, the Tribunal opines that the article at issue does not specifically refer to the compensation for one or all the losses incurred by an investor as a result of the measures adopted by a State during a state of necessity. The commentary introduced by the Special Rapporteur establishes that Article 27 "does not attempt to specify in what circumstances compensation would be payable".<sup>76</sup> The rule does not specify if compensation is payable during the state of necessity or whether the State should reassume its obligations. In this case, this Tribunal's interpretation of Article XI of the Treaty provides the answer.
261. Following this interpretation the Tribunal considers that Article XI establishes the state of necessity as a ground for exclusion from wrongfulness of an act of the State, and therefore, the State is exempted from liability. This exception is appropriate only in emergency situations; and once the situation has been overcome, i.e. certain degree of stability has been recovered; the State is no longer exempted from responsibility for any violation of its obligations under the international law and shall reassume them immediately.

(iv) Consequences of the State of Necessity

262. Three relevant issues arise with respect to the Tribunal's finding Argentina is entitled to invoke the state of necessity as contemplated by Article XI, and general international law.
263. The first issue deals with the determination of the period during which the state of necessity occurred. As previously indicated, in the view of the Tribunal, the state of necessity in this case began on 1 December 2001 and ended on 26 April 2003, when President Kirchner was elected (see the Tribunal's Analysis). All measures adopted by Argentina in breach of the Treaty before<sup>77</sup> and after the period during which the state of necessity prevailed, shall have all their effects and shall be taken into account by the Tribunal to estimate the damages.
264. The second issue related to the effects of the state of necessity is to determine the subject upon which the consequences of the measures adopted by the host State during the state of necessity shall fall. As established in the Tribunal's Analysis, Article 27 of ILC's Draft Articles, as well as Article XI of the Treaty, does not specify if any compensation is payable to the party affected by losses during the state of necessity. Nevertheless, and in accordance with that expressed under paragraphs 260 and 261 supra, this Tribunal has decided that the damages suffered during the state of necessity should be borne by the investor.
265. The third issue is related to what Argentina should have done, once the state of necessity was over on 26 April 2003. The very following day (27 April), Argentina's obligations were once again effective. Therefore, Respondent should have reestablished the tariff scheme offered to LG&E or, at least, it should have compensated Claimants for the losses incurred on account of the measures adopted before and after the state of necessity.

(v) Conclusions of the Tribunal

266. Based on the analysis of the state of necessity, the Tribunal concludes that, first, said state started on 1 December 2001 and ended on 26 April 2003; second, during that period Argentina is exempt of responsibility, and accordingly, the Claimants should bear the consequences of the measures taken by the host State; and finally, the Respondent should have restored the tariff regime on 27 April 2003, or should have compensated the Claimants, which did not occur. As a result, Argentina is liable as from that date to Claimants for damages.

VII. DECISION OF THE TRIBUNAL ON LIABILITY

267. For the foregoing reasons, the Tribunal renders its decision, partially granting LG&E's claims, as follows:
- a. The claim for expropriation of the investment is hereby dismissed.
  - b. Argentina breached the standard of fair and equitable treatment, no less favorable treatment than that to be accorded under the international law, and adopted discriminatory measures, causing damage to LG&E. Argentina's abrogation of the guarantees under the statutory framework, as indicated under paragraph 175 supra, violated its obligations to Claimants' investments, giving rise to liability under the umbrella clause.
  - c. The standard prohibiting the adoption of arbitrary measures is not deemed to have been violated.
  - d. Between 1 December 2001 and 26 April 2003, Argentina was in a state of necessity, for which reason it shall be exempted from the payment of compensation for damages incurred during that period.

- e. The Argentine Republic is liable for damages to Claimants for the aforementioned violations, except during the period of the state of necessity, which damages, including interest, as well as specification of the periods during which Respondent has incurred in violation of its international obligations, shall be determined in a next phase of the arbitration and in respect of which the Tribunal retains jurisdiction.
- f. Any decision on the costs of the arbitration is reserved.

I. PROCEDURE

1. On September 11, 2006, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID” or the “Centre”) received from Joseph Charles Lemire (“Mr. Lemire” or “Claimant”), a citizen of the United States, a request for arbitration (the “Request”) dated September 6, 2006, against Ukraine (“Respondent”).
2. On September 12, 2006, the Centre, in accordance with Rule 5 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings (the “Institution Rules”) acknowledged receipt of the Request and on the same day transmitted a copy thereof to Ukraine with a copy to its Embassy in Washington, D.C.
3. The Request, as supplemented by Claimant’s letter of November 14, 2006, was registered by the Centre on December 8, 2006, pursuant to Article 36(3) of the ICSID Convention. By letter of the same day, the Secretary-General of ICSID, in accordance with Rules 6 and 7 of the Institution Rules, notified the parties of the registration and invited them to proceed to constitute an Arbitral Tribunal as soon as possible.
4. The parties not having reached agreement on the number of arbitrators and the method of their appointment more than 60 days after the registration of the Request, Claimant invoked Article 37(2)(b) of the ICSID Convention by letter of February 8, 2007. Article 37(2)(b) prescribes a Tribunal consisting of three arbitrators, one appointed by each party and the third, who shall be the President of the Tribunal, appointed by agreement of the parties.
5. On February 22, 2007, Claimant appointed Mr. Jan Paulsson of France as arbitrator and on March 7, 2007, Respondent appointed Dr. Jürgen Voss of Germany as arbitrator, each of whom the parties had also appointed in the earlier concluded ICSID Additional Facility case Joseph C. Lemire v. Ukraine (ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/98/1).
6. The Tribunal not having been constituted 90 days after the registration of the request, Claimant requested by letters of March 9, 2007, and March 20, 2007, that the Chairman of the ICSID Administrative Council designate an arbitrator to be the President of the Tribunal, pursuant to ICSID Arbitration Rule 4(1).
7. On June 6, 2007, the Chairman of the ICSID Administrative Council, in consultation with the parties, designated Professor Juan Fernández-Armesto, a national of Spain, as the presiding arbitrator.
8. All three arbitrators having accepted their appointments, the Secretary-General of ICSID, by letter of June 14, 2007, informed the parties that a Tribunal consisting of Professor Juan Fernández-Armesto, Mr. Jan Paulsson and Dr. Jürgen Voss, had been constituted and that the proceeding was deemed to have commenced on that day, pursuant to ICSID Arbitration Rule 6(1).

9. At the time of the filing of the Request, Claimant was represented by the law firm of Salans. From December 2008 to December 2009, Claimant was represented by the law firm of Derains Gharavi & Lazareff in Paris, France, and, subsequently, by the law firm of Derains & Gharavi.
10. By letters of June 25, 2007 and July 9, 2007, Respondent notified the Centre of the appointment of the law firm of White & Case LLP in Paris, France, and of the law firm of Magisters in Kyiv, Ukraine, as its legal representatives in this matter.
11. The first session of the Tribunal was held on July 23, 2007, at the World Bank's offices in Paris, and various aspects of procedure were determined at the session. Present at the session were:

Members of the Tribunal

Prof. Juan Fernández-Armesto, President
Mr. Jan Paulsson, Arbitrator

12. On November 12, 2007, Claimant filed its Memorial on the Merits.
13. On February 25, 2008, Respondent filed a Memorial in Support of Its Objections to Jurisdiction and, on February 26, 2008, Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial on the Merits, dated February 25, 2008.
14. On March 17, 2008, Claimant filed observations on Respondent's Memorial in Support of its Objections to Jurisdiction.
15. On March 26, 2008, the Tribunal notified the parties that it had decided to join the issue of jurisdiction to the merits.

16. Also on March 26, 2008, the parties filed their respective requests for production of documents and, on April 18, 2008, exchanged responses on their respective requests for production of documents. On May 13, 2008, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 1 concerning the requests for production of documents.
17. On July 31, 2008, Respondent filed a further request for production of documents. On August 8, 2008, Claimant filed observations on Respondent's request, and on August 13, 2008, Respondent filed a response to Claimant's observations of August 8, 2008. Claimant answered Respondent's request on August 28, 2008.
18. On August 15, 2008, Claimant filed a request for provisional measures, concerning Ukraine's decision to charge a certain fee for the renewal of Gala's broadcasting licence.
19. On August 20, 2008, Claimant filed its Reply on the Merits.
20. On August 29, 2008, Respondent filed a proposal for the disqualification of Mr. Jan Paulsson as arbitrator, and the proceeding was suspended in accordance with ICSID Arbitration Rule 9(6). Existing deadlines and schedule of the proceeding remained in effect and continued to run during the period of suspension of the proceeding.
21. On September 2, 2008, Respondent filed observations on Claimant's request for provisional measures.
22. On September 10, 2008, Claimant filed a response to Respondent's observations on Claimant's request for provisional measures.
23. On September 23, 2008, the Centre notified the parties that in accordance with Article 58 of the ICSID Convention and ICSID Arbitration Rule 9(4), the proposal for the disqualification of Mr. Jan Paulsson had been decided by the other members of the Tribunal, Prof. Juan Fernández-Armesto and Dr. Jürgen Voss. The proposal for disqualification of Mr. Paulsson was dismissed and the suspension of the proceeding was lifted as of the date of the notification. The reasoned Decision on Respondent's proposal for the disqualification was communicated to the parties on September 29, 2008.
24. On October 22, 2008, Claimant withdrew the request for provisional measures of August 15, 2008.
25. On November 6, 2008, Respondent filed a Rejoinder on the Merits.
26. On November 13 and November 18, 2008, Claimant filed requests for production of witnesses, and on November 14, 2008, the parties filed witness statements.
27. On November 19, 2009, the President of the Tribunal held a pre-hearing conference by telephone with the parties.

28. On November 25, 2008, Respondent filed observations on Claimant's requests of November 13 and 18, 2008, for production of witnesses.
29. On December 1, 2008, the parties filed rebuttal witness statements and on December 3, 2008, the President of the Tribunal held a further pre-hearing conference by telephone with the parties.
30. The hearing on jurisdiction and the merits was held from December 8, 2008 to December 12, 2008, at the at the World Bank's offices in Paris. Present at the hearing were:

31. As decided at the hearing, the parties filed their respective post-hearing briefs on March 4, 2009 and their respective statements of costs on March 20, 2009.
32. Members of the Tribunal deliberated using various means of communication.

II. BASIC FACTS

33. This dispute was submitted to ICSID by Claimant against Respondent under (1) the Treaty between the United States of America and Ukraine Concerning the Encouragement and Reciprocal Protection of Investment, done in Kyiv on October 17, 1996 (the “BIT”) and (2) an agreement between Claimant and Respondent on the settlement of a dispute, dated March 20, 2000 (the “Settlement Agreement”), which was recorded as an award on agreed terms on September 18, 2000 (ICSID No. ARB (AF) 98/1 (the “2000 Award”).
34. Article VI of the BIT entitles any national of a State party to the BIT to submit to ICSID any dispute with the other State party to the BIT relating to either “an investment agreement between that Party and such national” or “an alleged breach of any right conferred or created by this Treaty with respect to an investment”.
35. On November 14, 1997, Claimant filed with ICSID a first arbitration request (the “First Arbitration”) against Respondent, with regard to the same investments that underlie the present arbitration. This First Arbitration eventually led to the Settlement Agreement, which was then recorded in the 2000 Award. Paragraph 31 of the Settlement Agreement provides for the resolution of all disputes arising from or in connection with the Agreement by ICSID Arbitration in accordance with the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules.

III. THE PARTIES

36. Claimant, Mr. Joseph Charles Lemire, is a national of the United States of America residing at 91 Saksagansko St., Office 8,01032 Kiev, Ukraine. Claimant is a majority shareholder, through CJSC “Mirakom Ukraina” (“Mirakom”) of CJSC “Radiocompany Gala” (“Gala”), a closed joint stock company constituted in 1995 under the laws of Ukraine with its principal office located at the same address as Mr. Lemire’s residence. Gala is a music radio station in Ukraine currently licenced to broadcast on various frequencies in Ukraine.
37. Respondent is the State of Ukraine. With respect to the events giving rise to the present arbitration, Respondent has acted through its President, Prime Minister, Parliament, Ministry of Defence, the National Council for Television and Radio Broadcasting (the “National Council”), the Ukrainian State Centre of Radio Frequencies (the “State Centre”), the State Committee on Communications and Information Technology (the “State Committee”), all of which are organs for which Ukraine is responsible under international law.

IV. RELIEF SOUGHT

38. Claimant seeks relief for alleged breaches of the Settlement Agreement/2000 Award and for alleged breaches of the BIT following the 2000 Award. More specifically, Claimant seeks<sup>1</sup>:
- a) a decision declaring that Respondent has breached the 2000 Award and the BIT;
39. b) a decision ordering Respondent to pay Claimant damages in the amount of 55,173 million USD on account of its breaches of the 2000 Award and the BIT which had the effect of preventing Claimant from developing Gala into a full national network as of January 1, 2001 and from establishing two other national networks (an FM radio network as of January 1, 2002 and an AM network as of July 1, 2004); or
- alternatively ordering Respondent to pay Claimant damages in the amount of 51,277 million USD on account of its breaches of the 2000 Award and the BIT which blocked Claimant from developing Gala into a full national network as of January 1, 2004 and developing a second FM national network as of January 1, 2002; or
  - alternatively ordering Respondent to pay Claimant damages in the amount of 34,732 million USD on account of its breaches of the 2000 Award and the BIT which blocked Claimant from developing Gala into a full national network as of January 1, 2001;
- c) a decision ordering Respondent to pay Claimant damages in the amount of one million USD for Respondent's failure to take reasonable measures to correct interference with Gala's 100 FM frequency, in breach of the Award and the BIT from the year 2000 to August 2008;
  - d) a decision ordering Respondent to pay Claimant damages in the amount of 958,000 USD representing loss of profits for Respondent's enactment of the Law on Television and Radio Broadcasting (the "LTR") and/or application thereof in breach of the BIT;
  - e) a decision ordering Respondent to pay Claimant moral damages in the amount of three million USD for Respondent's harassment of Claimant, in breach of the BIT;
  - f) the costs of this arbitration, including all expenses that Claimant has incurred, legal counsel, experts and consultants, as well as Claimant's internal costs in pursuing this arbitration, all of the fees and expenses of the arbitrators, fees for use of the facilities of the Centre;

- g) compound interest at a rate of LIBOR + 3, compounded semi-annually, to be established on the above amounts as of the date these amounts are determined to have been due to Claimant; and
- h) any such other and further relief as the Arbitral Tribunal shall deem appropriate.

40. Respondent seeks<sup>2</sup>:

- a) a decision dismissing all Claimant's claims, or a substantial part thereof, for lack of jurisdiction;
- b) a decision dismissing Claimant's claims in their entirety; and
- c) a decision awarding to Respondent its fees, costs and expenses in connection with this proceeding.

V. JURISDICTION

41. The Tribunal has decided to join Respondent's objections on jurisdiction to the merits of the dispute, in accordance with Article 41(2) of the ICSID Convention.

V.1. POSITIONS OF CLAIMANT AND RESPONDENT

42. Claimant's basic allegations in this arbitration are twofold:

- first, that Respondent's actions constitute a breach of the Settlement Agreement; and
- second, that Respondent has breached the BIT by subjecting Claimant to unfair, inequitable, arbitrary and discriminatory treatment, harassment and creeping expropriation and by enacting a new law in violation of Article II.6 of the BIT.

43. Respondent raises a number of jurisdictional objections<sup>3</sup>:

- that the Centre lacks jurisdiction for claims arising out of the Settlement Agreement;
- that there is no investment underlying the claims related to the tenders for additional frequencies;
- that Claimant's capital invested did not emanate from abroad as required;
- that Claimant has not made out a prima facie case of expropriation.

44. Claimant denies these jurisdictional objections and affirms the Centre's jurisdiction and the Tribunal's competence to decide all claims raised.

V.2. DECISION OF THE TRIBUNAL

45. In order for the Centre to have jurisdiction and for the Tribunal to have competence with regard to these claims, four well known conditions must be met, three deriving from Article 25 of the ICSID Convention and a fourth resulting from the general principle of law of non-retroactivity:

- first, a condition ratione personae: the dispute must oppose a Contracting State and a national of another Contracting State;
- second, a condition ratione materiae: the dispute must be a legal dispute arising directly out of an investment;
- third, a condition ratione voluntatis: the Contracting State and the investor must consent in writing that the dispute be settled through ICSID arbitration;
- fourth, a condition ratione temporis: the ICSID Convention must have been applicable at the relevant time.

46. The jurisdictional requirements of Article 25 of the ICSID Convention must be read in conjunction with those of the BIT. The relevant provisions are Article VI.1 and VI.4 of the BIT, which read as follows:

“VI.1. For purposes of this Article, an investment dispute is a dispute between a Party and a national or company of the other Party arising out of or relating to (a) an investment agreement between that Party and such national or company; (b) an investment authorization granted by that Party’s foreign investment authority to such national or company; or (c) an alleged breach of any right conferred or created by this Treaty with respect to an investment.

[...]

VI.4. Each Party hereby consents to the submission of any investment dispute for settlement by binding arbitration in accordance with the choice specified in the written consent of the national or company under paragraph 3. Such consent, together with the written consent of the national or company when given under paragraph 3 shall satisfy the requirement for:

(a) written consent of the parties to the dispute for purposes of chapter II of the ICSID Convention (Jurisdiction of the Centre) and for purposes of the Additional Facility Rules; and

(b) an “agreement in writing” for purposes of Article II of the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, done at New York, June 10, 1958.”

47. In addition, Article I.1(a) of the BIT defines the term “investment”:

“I.1. For the purposes of this Treaty,

(a) “investment” means every kind of investment in the territory of one Party owned or controlled directly or indirectly by nationals or companies of the other Party, such as equity, debt, and service and investment contracts; ...”

48. Jurisdiction ratione temporis has not been challenged and the Tribunal will not analyze it. It will focus on jurisdiction ratione personae (V.3), materiae (V.4) and voluntatis (V.5).

V.3. JURISDICTION *RATIONE PERSONAE

49. Claimant is, and at all relevant times has been, a national of the United States and thus a “national of another Contracting State” under Article 25 of the ICSID Convention as well as a “national of a Party” under the BIT. Ukraine, since July 7, 2000, is a State Party to both the ICSID Convention and to the BIT.

50. The requirements for ICSID jurisdiction ratione personae are hence satisfied.

V.4. JURISDICTION RATIONE MATERIAE

51. Article 25(1) of the ICSID Convention further requires a “legal dispute arising directly out of an investment”. Claimant submits that he has made investments in Gala Radio and that he is Gala’s major shareholder. It is undisputed that the present dispute is a legal dispute and that it arose directly out of these investments.

Claimant’s investment

52. Gala was not founded by Mr. Lemire – in fact, Ukrainian legislation requires that radio broadcasters be founded by Ukrainian nationals<sup>4</sup>. The law however authorizes foreign investments in the broadcasting sector (Article 12.3 of LTR). Mr. Lemire bought participations in Gala, an existing company, which already had a radio licence, and which had been promoted by a Ukrainian citizen, Mr. Gliub Maliutin<sup>5</sup>, and founded by a Ukrainian company called Provisen. On June 8, 1995, two Investment Agreements were signed by Mr. Lemire providing (somewhat diffusely) for contributions in cash and in kind amounting to 290,000 USD plus 3,000,000 USD<sup>6</sup>.

53. The actual amount contributed by Mr. Lemire is disputed. Respondent’s expert acknowledges that at least 141,000 USD were invested by Mr. Lemire<sup>7</sup> and Respondent has accepted an investment of 236,000 USD<sup>8</sup>. Claimant himself states that his investment amounts to well over 5,000,000 USD<sup>9</sup>. This number seems to include real estate held in Mr. Lemire’s name, and let rent free to Gala, and payments made directly by him on behalf of the company<sup>10</sup>. No document has actually been produced in this arbitration, giving a precise breakdown of Mr. Lemire’s contributions. It seems, moreover, that for accounting purposes, the expenditures made directly by Mr. Lemire on behalf of Gala are not recorded in Gala’s books<sup>11</sup>.

54. Summing up the evidence, the Tribunal has no doubt that Mr. Lemire actually made an investment in Ukraine, although the undisputed total amount is only 236,000 USD. Respondent has not challenged that Mr. Lemire is – at least since 2006 – indirect owner of 100% of the share capital of Gala. The evidence shows that Mr. Lemire has made payments with his own moneys on behalf of Gala. But the record of the actual amounts paid has not been produced, and that the total exceeds 5,000,000 USD is nothing more than affirmation<sup>12</sup>.

55. It is immaterial that Claimant holds his controlling stake in Gala through Mirakom. Article I.1(a) of the BIT accords treaty protection to “every kind of investment in the territory of one Party owned or controlled directly or indirectly by nationals...of the other Party”.

Transfer of funds from abroad

56. Respondent further submits that Claimant has failed to prove the transfer of his invested funds into Ukraine from abroad. However, neither the BIT nor the ICSID Convention includes an origin-of-capital requirement. Nor is such a requirement to be inferred from the purposes of the BIT and/or the ICSID Convention.
57. In setting out the purposes of the BIT, the Preamble emphasises the promotion of investments of nationals of one party in the territory of the other, without any reference to the origin of the funds invested; and Article I.3 of the BIT implies that reinvested earnings qualify as investments under the BIT; these earnings by definition originate within the host country.
58. Moreover, Claimant’s certificate of registration dated September 18, 1995 shows that at least part of his investment capital originates from abroad; this suffices for jurisdictional purposes.
59. Hence, the requirements for ICSID jurisdiction are also satisfied ratione materiae.

V.5. JURISDICTION *RATIONE VOLUNTATIS

60. A singular feature of this arbitration is that consent to ICSID arbitration was formalized in two different legal instruments: the Settlement Agreement and the BIT. Each will be analyzed separately.

A) Jurisdiction With Respect to Claims Based on an Alleged Breach of the Settlement Agreement/2000 Award

61. The Settlement Agreement contains the following dispute resolution provision in clause 31 (the “Arbitration Clause”):

“All the disputes arising from or in connection with this Agreement shall be settled by negotiations. In the event no solution is achieved within 60 days from the date of beginning of negotiations, either party may address to the ICSID its application for settlement under the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules.”

62. Respondent however objects to the Tribunal’s jurisdiction for alleged claims under the Settlement Agreement on two grounds, namely the fact that (a) the Settlement Agreement was recorded as an award, and (b) the Arbitration Clause refers, for settlement of disputes under the Agreement, to the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules, rather than the ICSID Arbitration Rules.

a) Settlement Agreement as an award

63. Respondent argues that the parties voluntarily transformed the Settlement Agreement into an enforceable award, in order to benefit from the jurisdictional effect of such measure. Claimant thus waived his right to the dispute resolution mechanism contained in the original accord<sup>13</sup>. Awards under the ICSID Additional Facility must be enforced through the New York Convention – there is no scope for enforcement through the arbitration clause inserted in the Settlement Agreement.
64. The Tribunal disagrees with Respondent’s theory. It is not supported by the text of the ICSID Convention or applicable arbitration rules, and it is based on a misunderstanding of the differences between disputes arising out of a contract and enforcement of an award.
65. The Settlement Agreement is first and foremost a contract, product of consent expressed by both parties. Settlement agreements, like all contracts, may give rise to disputes. In the Settlement Agreement Mr. Lemire and Ukraine agreed that disputes arising “from or in connection” with this contract should be settled by arbitration.
66. After executing the Settlement Agreement both parties requested, and the Tribunal in the First Arbitration agreed that “the Tribunal shall record the settlement in the form of an award” (as authorized by Article 49(2) of the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules).
67. The precise text of the 2000 Award is as follows:
- “Accordingly the Tribunal orders unanimously that the said agreement between the Parties as set forth below shall be recorded verbatim as an award on agreed terms”.*
- And then the award copies ad pedem literae the full text of the Settlement Agreement, including the Arbitration Clause.
68. Respondent’s basic argument is that, by accepting that the Settlement Agreement be recorded as an award, Claimant was waiving his right to the Arbitration Clause.
69. The Tribunal disagrees. There is no hint that, by requesting the Tribunal to issue the consent award, Claimant proposed and Respondent accepted neutralisation of the Arbitration Clause.
70. It is very telling that the 2000 Award reproduces the complete text of the Settlement Agreement, including the Arbitration Clause. The parties could have requested that the Arbitration Clause be excluded from the 2000 Award. They did not. What the 2000 Award proves is that as of the date of the request of its issuance, each party reiterated its consent that all disputes arising from or in connection with the Settlement Agreement be solved by arbitration.

71. In fact, the purpose and meaning of the consent award is very transparent. What the parties were seeking when they asked for the 2000 Award was twofold:
- on the one hand, they wished to have the possibility of recognition and enforcement of the Settlement Agreement through the New York Convention; i.e. that a Court recognise the legal force and effect of the award and ensure that it is carried out in accordance with its terms;
  - on the other, if any dispute arose from or in connection with the Settlement Agreement, the parties reiterated their agreement that disputes should be resolved by arbitration.
72. With regard to the Settlement Agreement, the relief sought by Claimant in this arbitration is a declaration that Respondent has breached its obligations and an order for payment of damages. The thrust of Claimant's argument is that during the execution of the Settlement Agreement, Respondent has defaulted. Respondent denies such accusation. Consequently, a dispute regarding the execution of the Settlement Agreement has arisen.
73. This dispute can and must be submitted to arbitration in accordance with Clause 31 of the Settlement Agreement:
- first, because that is what the parties bargained for in the Arbitration Clause; and
  - second, because a procedure under the New York Convention before a national Court can only result in the recognition and enforcement of the award, not in resolving a dispute related to the breach of obligations and the determination of damages; if Claimant had submitted the relief sought in this procedure to a national Court, Respondent could have validly raised the defence of Article II.3 of the New York Convention<sup>14</sup>, and requested that the judge refer the dispute to arbitration.
- b) Reference to ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules
74. The Arbitration Clause provides for "settlement under the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules" of "all the disputes arising from or in connection with this Agreement".
75. When the Settlement Agreement was signed on March 20, 2000 Ukraine had not ratified the ICSID Convention, and consequently the Centre could only administer arbitrations involving Ukraine under the Additional Facility Rules (Article 2(a)). Things moved quickly thereafter. On July 7, 2000 the ICSID Convention entered into force in Ukraine. With the effectiveness in Ukraine of the ICSID Convention, the Additional Facility became unavailable and was superseded by arbitration under ICSID Rules. Notwithstanding this fact, the parties requested, and on September 18, 2000 the Tribunal in the First Arbitration issued the 2000 Award, with an unchanged Arbitration Clause.

<sup>14</sup> Article II.3 of the New York Convention provides that: "The Court of a Contracting State, when seized of an action in a matter in respect of which the parties have made an agreement within the meaning of this Article, shall, at the request of one of the parties, refer the parties to arbitration, unless it finds that the said agreement is null and void, inoperative or incapable of being performed".

76. Claimant argues that the reference to the Additional Facility in the Arbitration Clause implicitly includes a reference to ICSID proper, once it became available<sup>15</sup>.
77. Respondent objects and refers to the clear, unambiguous terms of the Arbitration Clause<sup>16</sup>.
78. On this issue the Tribunal sides with Claimant.
79. The Arbitration Clause states that “either party may address to the ICSID its application for settlement”, and then adds “under the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules”. These Rules were available when the Clause was signed, but no longer once the Clause was incorporated into the 2000 Award, and since then they have ceased to be available. They have been superseded by the ICSID Arbitration Rules.
80. Imprecise arbitration clauses are a frequent occurrence in commercial arbitration. They must be interpreted by the arbitrators, in order to restore the true intention of the parties, distorted by the parties’ ignorance of the mechanics of arbitration, error in designating the correct institution or rules, or, as here, supervening legal developments<sup>17</sup>.
81. In our case, the true intent of the parties is very clear: the Arbitration Clause explicitly says that “either party may address to ICSID its application for the settlement” of the dispute. The very wording of the Arbitration Clause evidences the parties’ wish that disputes arising from the Settlement Agreement be settled through arbitration administered by ICSID, and not through any other dispute settlement mechanism, nor by any national Court.
82. Where the parties were unclear is not in the description of the dispute settlement mechanism which they preferred, but in an ancillary point: the precise rules which the institution entrusted with the administration of the arbitration should apply. The parties correctly referred to the Rules which were applicable at the time the Settlement Agreement was executed – the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules. And when the Settlement Agreement was recorded as an award a couple of months later, they did not take into account that in the meantime Ukraine had ratified the ICSID Convention, that the applicable arbitration rules now were the ICSID Arbitration Rules, and that the rules which they were referring to– the ICSID Additional Facility Rules – were in fact no longer available.

83. The ambiguity elided by the parties when they recorded the Settlement Agreement as an award is purely technical and ancillary, and cannot distort the real intent: that any dispute arising from or in connection with the Settlement Agreement be settled by arbitration administered by ICSID, and governed by the appropriate rules approved by the Centre: before Ukraine had ratified the ICSID Convention, the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules; thereafter, the ordinary ICSID Arbitration Rules.

B) Jurisdiction With Respect to Claims Based on an Alleged Violation of the BIT

84. By Article VI.3 of the BIT, Ukraine agreed that investment disputes with American investors be submitted to arbitration administered by the Centre. Claimant accepted the offer by filing this arbitration. Respondent objects to the Centre's jurisdiction and the Tribunal's competence, but not with regard to the claims in toto, but only with regard to some specific claims.

85. These claims, and the reasons for objecting to jurisdiction, are explained in the following paragraphs.

a) Claims related to tenders for frequencies and broadcasting licences

86. Respondent objects to the Tribunal's competence with respect to claims arising out of Claimant's failure in tenders for additional frequencies on the ground that such tenders precede investments and that pre-investment activities fall outside the ICSID Convention. Respondent, however, seems to concede that such pre-investment activities are within the scope of the BIT<sup>18</sup>.

87. Claimant disagrees<sup>19</sup>, arguing that Mr. Lemire established investments in radio networks in Ukraine, and that they were harmed by Respondent's acts and omissions.

88. The Tribunal sides with Claimant.

Pre-investment activities

89. Mr. Lemire's claim related to tenders for frequencies and broadcasting licences does not refer to, and cannot be considered as, a pre-investment activity. Pre-investment activities are those which precede the actual investment. Whether pre-investment activities merit treaty protection is debatable. But it is irrelevant for the purpose of adjudicating Claimant's claims in this arbitration, since the Tribunal has already established that Mr. Lemire has made investments in Gala Radio and is Gala's sole shareholder, and that these investments qualify for protection under the BIT.

90. If an investor claims that his investment, once made, was subsequently denied frequencies and broadcasting licences in violation of Ukraine's obligations as assumed in the BIT, this claim constitutes an "investment dispute" for the purposes of Article VI of the BIT; the Centre has jurisdiction and the Tribunal competence to adjudicate it.

91. This conclusion is confirmed by the text of the BIT. The BIT expressly extends protection to “associated activities” which include “access to ... licences, permits and other approvals...” (see Articles I.1 (e) and II.11 (b) of the BIT). Article II.3 (b) moreover provides that “Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the . . . expansion . . . of investments”. The allocation of frequencies was a condition for Claimant’s ability to expand his investment. Claimant’s allegations related to tenders for frequencies and licences thus fall within the scope of the BIT.

Article 25(1) of the ICSID Convention

92. Respondent submits that disputes related to the allocation of new frequencies, while arguably within the ambit of the BIT, do not arise “directly” out of an investment and therefore fall short of the requirements of Article 25(1) of the ICSID Convention. In Respondent’s view, moreover, the narrower definition in the ICSID Convention prevails over the broader definition in the BIT.
93. The Tribunal sees the force in Respondent’s submission that bilateral treaties cannot extend the scope of the multilateral ICSID Convention. However, where the ICSID Convention is open to interpretation, such interpretation should seek compatibility rather than contradiction.
94. The Tribunal must therefore determine whether disputes related to the allocation of frequencies and issuance of broadcasting licences may be considered as “arising directly out of an investment” within the meaning of Article 25(1) of the ICSID Convention. For this purpose, Claimant’s case must be distinguished from the scenario where an applicant intends to enter a market for the first time. In such scenario, the application for frequencies and licences indeed is a step towards facilitating a planned investment, because no investment exists at the time of the allocation process.
95. In the present case, Claimant had already invested in Gala Radio; and Gala was a going concern at the time of the tenders. The applications for additional frequencies and licences formed an integral part of Gala’s business operations. They were intended to defend and expand Gala’s market share against growing competition and thus enhance the sustainability and profitability of Claimant’s investment. Disputes affecting these objectives thus are directly related to Claimant’s investment as controlling shareholder of Gala.
96. In accordance with the purposes of the ICSID Convention and consistent with its wording, the Tribunal therefore affirms its jurisdiction for disputes arising out of Gala’s treatment in tender proceedings for additional frequencies and licences.
97. For this conclusion, it is immaterial whether the receipt of additional frequencies had already been envisaged in Claimant’s initial business plan and whether Respondent had made any commitment to support such a business plan. It suffices that the additional frequencies were sought by Gala as part of its strategy to defend and/or expand its market share.

98. It is furthermore immaterial whether additional frequencies were sought to extend the reach of Gala's existing program or to access new audiences with newly designed programs. In either case, the applications were part of Gala's business strategy to maintain and enhance its position in the Ukrainian market. They formed an integral part of Gala's overall business operation. The Tribunal's assumption of competence thus extends to applications by Gala for frequencies with a view to creating new networks for young and mature audiences<sup>20</sup>.

b) Claimant has failed to establish a prima facie case of expropriation

99. Respondent has raised the issue that there is an initial threshold that must be crossed by any claimant arguing expropriation: that the facts adduced show at least prima facie the legal requirements of expropriation under international law<sup>21</sup>. And in Ukraine's opinion, the very facts alleged by Claimant are not capable of constituting expropriation, and consequently the Tribunal should dismiss this claim for lack of jurisdiction – as did the Tribunal in the Telenor v. Hungary case<sup>22</sup>.

100. Claimant countered Respondent's objection arguing that for jurisdictional purposes the prima facie test was in fact easily met. As Claimant explained<sup>23</sup>, he was presenting claims for:

- expropriation of a beauty salon;
- expropriation of the rights to the Energy trademark; and
- creeping expropriation of the Gala Radio network, a process that yet has to be completed but which, in Claimant's submission, appears imminent.

101. In the course of the procedure, Claimant has however dropped the claims for expropriation of the beauty salon and of the Energy trademark<sup>24</sup>, and the creeping expropriation of the Gala Radio network is subsumed in the allegation of harassment and a request for moral damages (see paragraph 500 below).

102. Respondent's allegation consequently has become moot.

VI. ALLEGED BREACHES OF THE SETTLEMENT AGREEMENT

103. In the Settlement Agreement of March 20, 2000, Respondent assumed the following obligations:

- Clause 13(a):

“By April 15, 2000 the Commission of experts, appointed by the Respondent, shall examine the quality of broadcasting within the radio frequencies band of FM 100-108. Based on the conclusions of the Commission, the Respondent will take necessary, reasonable among others, technical measures to remove the obstacles (if any) for radio broadcasting of Gala Radio on FM 100 in Kiev by June 1, 2000”.

- Clause 13(b):

“By May 15, 2000 the Respondent in person of the State Committee on Communications and Information Technology, agrees to use its best possible efforts to consider in a positive way the application of Gala Radio to provide it with the licences for radio frequencies (provided there are free frequencies bands) in the following cities: [...]

The Claimant can apply for the radio channels in the above cities to the National Council for TV and Radio Broadcasting (hereinafter called “the National Council”) in a due course in accordance with the current legislation after the National Council has been fully personally formed under the existing law of Ukraine. The Respondent, within the limits of its powers, will assist for the positive consideration of this issue at the National Council.

The granting of licences for radio frequencies and broadcasting channels will be made in accordance with the requirements of Ukrainian legislation upon payment of the licence fees”.

104. Claimant alleges that Respondent has defaulted on both sets of obligations. Respondent’s position, on the contrary, is that it has fully complied with these obligations.

105. Before analysing the parties’ allegation, it is necessary to establish the law applicable to the Settlement Agreement (VI.1), and the criteria to be applied in its construction (VI.2).

VI.1. APPLICABLE LAW

106. Clause 30 of the Settlement Agreement provides that the applicable law shall be that determined by “Article 55 of the ICSID Additional Facility Arbitration Rules”. The relevant article in the Additional Facility Rules is in fact Article 54. The mistake is an obvious typographical error, and the Tribunal has no doubt that the common intent of the parties was to refer to Article 54. In accordance with this rule the Tribunal shall apply “(a) the law determined by the conflict of laws rules which it considers applicable and (b) such rules of international law as the Tribunal considers applicable”.

107. Should the Tribunal make use of this authorization to apply not only a municipal law, determined through conflict of laws rules, but also the “rules of international law ... the Tribunal considers applicable”?
108. The Settlement Agreement contains an extensive chapter called “Principles of Interpretation and Implementation of the Agreement”, which includes Clauses 20 through 26. These Clauses were reproduced, with very light linguistic adjustments, from the 1994 UNIDROIT Principles<sup>25</sup>.
109. It is impossible to place the UNIDROIT Principles – a private codification of civil law, approved by an intergovernmental institution – within the traditional sources of law. The UNIDROIT Principles are neither treaty, nor compilation of usages, nor standard terms of contract. They are in fact a manifestation of transnational law.
110. As the Preamble to the Principles states, they “shall be applied when the parties have agreed that their contract be governed by them” and they “may be applied when the parties have agreed that their contract be governed by ‘general principles of law’, the ‘lex mercatoria’ or the like”.
111. When negotiating the Settlement Agreement, the parties evidently gave thought to the issue of applicable law, and were apparently unable to reach an agreement to apply either Ukrainian or US law. In this situation, what the parties did was to incorporate extensive parts of the UNIDROIT Principles into their agreement, and to include a clause which authorises the Tribunal either to select a municipal legal system, or to apply the rules of law the Tribunal considers appropriate. Given the parties’ implied negative choice of any municipal legal system, the Tribunal finds that the most appropriate decision is to submit the Settlement Agreement to the rules of international law, and within these, to have particular regard to the UNIDROIT Principles.

VI.2. INTERPRETATION

112. The parties have discussed the principles of interpretation to be applied to the Settlement Agreement. This issue is extensively dealt with in Clauses 20 through 26 of the Agreement.
113. Claimant has emphasized Clauses 20 (“good faith and fair dealing in international business”), 22 (“common intent of the Parties”), 23 (especially reference to “preliminary negotiations”) and 26 (non-performance to include “improper performance or late performance”) as well as Articles 1.7 and 4.1 of the 1994 UNIDROIT Principles. Respondent has referred to Clause 27 of the Settlement Agreement, pursuant to which the Settlement Agreement “constitutes the entire agreement between the Parties on the subject matter hereof and supersedes all prior correspondence, negotiations and understandings between them with respect to the matters covered herein”. Ukraine also relies on Article 5.5 of the 1994 UNIDROIT Principles (“the way”).

in which the obligation is expressed in the contract") as the primary factor in determining the scope of an obligation.

114. The Tribunal agrees with Claimant that the "common intent" of the parties determines the scope of contractual obligations. However, the analysis of the common intent must start from the wording of the contract; and it must be presumed that the wording, as understood by a reasonable impartial person, properly reflects the common intent. While this presumption may be rebutted, the party doing so bears the burden of proof that the common intent differs from the wording. "Good faith" and "fairness in the market place" arguments are appropriate for interpreting ambiguous wording and filling lacunae in the text, but they can scarcely prevail against the clear wording of a contractual provision.
115. In accordance with Clause 23 of the Settlement Agreement, preliminary negotiations must – among other factors - be taken into account "for interpreting this Agreement". But Clause 27 provides that the Settlement Agreement "supersedes all prior correspondence, negotiations and understandings". Read together, these Clauses require that expectations raised during the negotiations of the Settlement Agreement must be reflected in the text of the Agreement. The text of the Settlement Agreement is the only source of obligations. The fact that an undertaking was discussed, or even orally agreed to during the negotiation phase, is not enough. The obligation must have been recorded in the Settlement Agreement. If the Settlement Agreement does include an obligation, then the scope of the undertaking can be construed in accordance with the expectations of the parties during the negotiation. Without support in the text, expectations nurtured by Claimant do not give rise to contractual obligations of Respondent.

116. Claimant argues that Respondent has breached its obligations under the Settlement Agreement to correct interferences (VI.3.) and to award 11 FM frequencies (VI.4). Each allegation will be examined separately.

VI.3. RESPONDENT'S FAILURE TO CORRECT INTERFERENCES

117. Clause 13(a) of the Settlement Agreement sets out Respondent's undertaking on this matter as follows:

"By April 15, 2000 the Commission of experts, appointed by the Respondent, shall examine the quality of broadcasting within the radio frequencies band of FM 100-108. Based on the conclusions of the Commission, the Respondent will take necessary, reasonable among others, technical measures to remove the obstacles (if any) for radio broadcasting of Gala Radio on FM 100 in Kiev by June 1, 2000".

118. Claimant argues that Respondent defaulted on its obligations under the above provision by failing to<sup>26</sup>:
- appoint a Commission of experts;
  - examine the quality of broadcasting on FM 100 between March 20, 2000 (execution of the Settlement Agreement) and April 15, 2000; and
  - cure interference with Gala's FM 100 frequency by June 1, 2000.
119. According to Claimant, such interference "has continued unabated from prior to the time of the Settlement Agreement until today"<sup>27</sup> (August 2008), and "there was ongoing work between UCRF personnel and engineers from Gala Radio to attempt to cure the problem and Claimant had indeed continually complained about the existing interference on Gala's 100 FM frequency"<sup>28</sup>.
120. Respondent counters that the function of the "Commission of Experts" was performed by the State Centre, which under Ukrainian law was in charge of detecting interferences with radio frequencies and was adequately equipped for that task. Between January 1999 and March 2000, the State Centre carried out a series of measurements and tests regarding alleged interference with FM 100; and tests on March 9 and 10, 2000 showed that no interference existed at that time with Gala's FM 100.
121. According to Respondent, there was no interference with FM 100 between March 20 (the date of the execution of the Settlement Agreement) and June 1, 2000 (the final date for remedial measures against any interference under Clause 13(a))<sup>29</sup>. Only a total of seven complaints about interferences were received from Claimant, the first on January 30, 2002 and the other between July 2004 and June 2007; no complaint was received in 2000 and 2001. The complaints in January 2002 and thereafter related to incidents that had arisen long after June 2000 and were thus outside the scope of the Settlement Agreement. Claimant consistently cooperated with the State Centre on the matter of interference and, before the institution of the present arbitral proceedings, Claimant never insisted on the appointment of an ad hoc-expert commission for examining interferences with Gala's FM 100.
122. Claimant has presented three specific breaches by Respondent of its obligations under Clause 13(a):
- the State Centre is not the appropriate "Commission of Experts" (A);
  - the interferences were not examined as provided for in the Settlement Agreement (B); and
  - insufficient measures were taken to correct interferences (C).
123. These contentions will be analysed in the following sections.

124. Clause 13(a) of the Settlement Agreement entrusts the duty to examine the interferences to “the Commission of experts, appointed by the Respondent”. It does not require that the commission be constituted ad hoc.
125. Furthermore, Clause 13(a) clearly states that the Commission be appointed exclusively by Respondent, without participation of Claimant in the appointment process. The provision does not include any requirements for the composition of the commission, such as a representation of several agencies, or the inclusion of independent experts. Respondent was therefore free to entrust the tasks under Clause 13(a) to any group of experts with the technical skills to do the job.
126. Respondent chose the State Centre as the “Commission of Experts” with the duty to perform the examinations required under Clause 13(a). Claimant has not pleaded that the State Centre was unfit to examine the alleged interferences. In fact, the State Centre is the public entity which in accordance with Ukrainian legislation supervises interferences in radio frequencies, and it is adequately equipped to perform this task. To the Tribunal, the choice of the State Centre is appropriate, given the wording of the Settlement Agreement, and reasonable, given its experience and scope of activity.
127. There is one further argument: the record shows that Claimant never challenged the State Centre’s role as expert commission before instituting this arbitration, i.e. for some seven years. To the contrary, he has co-operated with the State Centre and addressed his complaints to it. He has thus acquiesced to the role of the State Centre.
128. The Tribunal can hence not find a violation of Clause 13(a) in Respondent’s assignment of the State Centre as expert commission.

129. Pursuant to Clause 13(a), the examination of interferences should have taken place by April 15, 2000. In fact, such examinations were carried out between January 1999 and March 10, 2000, i.e. before execution of the Settlement Agreement on March 20, 2000. Claimant argues that these pre-agreement examinations are not sufficient to comply with the undertaking assumed by Ukraine in Clause 13(a) of the Settlement Agreement.
130. In Respondent’s opinion, the March 2000 tests proved the absence of any interference with Gala’s FM 100, so that any further tests were pointless. The Settlement Agreement had been negotiated since November 1999, and during these negotiations, and as a sign of goodwill, Respondent carried out the examinations required by Clause 13(a), even before the Settlement Agreement was signed and came into force. The Settlement Agreement signed on March 20, 2000 provided that the examination of the quality of broadcasting be performed “by April 15, 2000”. In fact, the examination had thus already been performed, before the signing of the Settlement Agreement.

131. Does this pre-agreement examination imply a default of Clause 13(a)?
132. One begins with the literal wording of the Clause, which requires that the examination be performed “by April 15, 2000”. An examination on March 10, 2000 evidently meets that requirement. But a literal interpretation is just a first approach. In accordance with Clauses 20 and 22 of the Agreement, the guiding principles of any interpretation shall be the common intent of the parties and good faith.
133. Did the common intent of the parties require that the examination be carried out after the signature of the Settlement Agreement? There is a very revealing fact: Claimant never requested that a second examination be performed after the signature of the Settlement Agreement. If he had, good faith would have precluded Respondent from refusing the request. But Mr. Lemire never did so. He accepted, at least tacitly, that the pre-agreement examination complied with the requirements of the Settlement Agreement.
134. Article 1.8 of the 2004 UNIDROIT Principles prohibits inconsistent behaviour:
- “A party cannot act inconsistently with an understanding it has caused the other party to have and upon which that other party reasonably has acted in reliance to its detriment”.*
135. Mr. Lemire did not require a second examination, and Ukraine reasonably understood that Claimant felt satisfied with the first examination, and consequently did not carry out a second one. Mr. Lemire cannot now retrace and argue that Respondent defaulted on its contractual obligations.

C) Adoption of Technical Measures To Remove Interferences

136. Clause 13(a) of the Settlement Agreement obliges Respondent to “take ... technical measures to remove the obstacles (if any) for radio broadcasting of Gala Radio on FM 100 ... by June 1, 2000”. This language clearly limits the scope of the obligation to obstacles that existed before June 1, 2000; obstacles that might have arisen after this date fall outside the scope of the Settlement Agreement. (As to Respondent’s alleged duty to cure such obstacles under the BIT, see paragraph 493 below).
137. To find a breach of the Settlement Agreement, it is therefore crucial that interferences with Gala’s FM 100 preexisted June 1, 2000. Claimant has pleaded this by alleging that interference “has continued unabated from prior to the time of the Settlement Agreement until today”<sup>30</sup>. Respondent, on the other hand, argues that no interference occurred between March 10 and June 1, 2000 and that any interference which occurred long after June 1, 2000 was isolated and cannot be traced back to a cause pre-existing on June 1, 2000<sup>31</sup>.

139. Claimant has submitted seven letters to the State Centre or the National Council complaining about interferences with FM 100<sup>35</sup>. However, these letters date from January 2002 to June 2007; they do not offer any indication, let alone evidence, that the cause pre-dated June 2000. Respondent, on the other hand, has submitted some eighty documents with test results showing that at different times after June 2000, there was no interference with Gala's FM 100<sup>36</sup>.
140. If interferences with FM 100 had been observed between March and June 2000, Claimant could at that time have requested the examinations and remedial measures foreseen in Clause 13(a) of the Settlement Agreement. Yet, there is no record of any complaint or other action of Claimant in this respect during the period March 2000 through January 30, 2002.
141. On the basis of the above record and in light of the language of Clause 13(a), the Tribunal concludes that Claimant has failed to prove a violation of the Settlement Agreement in this respect.

VI.4. ALLOCATION OF FREQUENCIES

142. The second allegation presented by Claimant refers to the granting of frequencies to Gala. Under Clause 13(b) of the Settlement Agreement, Respondent assumed several obligations with respect to the allocation of radio frequencies and broadcasting licences to Gala in 11 cities. The Clause reads as follows:

“By May 15, 2000 the Respondent, in the person of the State Committee on Communications and Information Technology, agrees to use its best possible efforts to consider in a positive way the application of Gala Radio to provide it with the licences for radio frequencies (provided there are free frequencies bands) in the following cities: Kharkiv, Lviv, Donetsk, Zaporizhyya, Lugansk, Simpheropol, Dniepropetrovsk, Odessa, Vynnytsya, Kryviy Rog, Uzhgorod.

The Claimant can apply for the radio channels in the above cities to the National Council for TV and Radio Broadcasting (hereinafter called “the National Council”) in a due course in accordance with the current

Summary of facts

143. Under Ukrainian law, broadcasting requires both (i) a “radio frequency licence” from the State Committee on Communications and Information Technology and (ii) a “broadcasting licence” from the National Council. The National Council is a regulatory body established directly by law<sup>37</sup>, independent of the Government and reporting to both the President and the Parliament of Ukraine.

Delivery of the licences required

144. Claimant obtained all the licences mentioned in Clause 13(b) by October 9, 2002, i.e. within a period of some thirty months from the date of the Settlement Agreement.
145. The 11 radio frequency licences from the State Committee were obtained relatively expeditiously – two of them prior to the Settlement Agreement, four on April 14, 2000, another four on June 13, 2000, and the last on September 1, 2000.
146. The broadcasting licences suffered longer delays: two were received prior to the Settlement Agreement, seven on September 18, 2001, one on March 26, 2002, and the last on October 9, 2002.
147. Two broadcasting licences had already been awarded by the National Council prior to the Settlement Agreement. Thereafter, the National Council was temporarily inoperative. It was reconstituted in June 2000. After building the necessary administrative capacities, it resumed issuance of broadcasting licences in January 2001. Under the Ukrainian Law on Television and Radio Broadcasting, such licences were awarded on the basis of competitive tenders.
148. At its first meeting after its reconstitution on January 1, 2001, the National Council focused on issuing broadcasting licences to companies which were broadcasting on frequencies allocated to them by the State Committee during the time when the National Council was inoperative. Claimant was excluded from this tender. Shortly thereafter, on March 22, 2001, the National Council announced a tender, including eight of the nine frequencies still expected by Claimant under Clause 13(b) of the Settlement Agreement. The broadcasting licences for seven of these frequencies were granted to Gala on September 18,

2001. In March and October 2002, Claimant received the last two outstanding broadcasting licences.

149. Four of the 11 frequencies allocated to Claimant under the Settlement Agreement were subsequently contested by the Armed Forces of Ukraine. These challenges were eventually resolved in 2008.

Violations asserted by Claimant

150. Claimant alleges seven violations of Clause 13(b) of the Settlement Agreement:

- late issuance of frequency licences by the State Committee (A);
- late constitution of the National Council (B);
- award of licences to other companies at National Council's first meeting in January 2001 (C);
- failure of National Council promptly to acknowledge the Settlement Agreement as binding (D);
- late award of broadcasting licences by National Council (E);
- allocation of low powered frequencies (F); and
- allocation of four frequencies which were contested by the Armed Forces of Ukraine (G).

151. Respondent denies all of the alleged violations.

152. Each alleged breach will be analysed seriatim.

A) Issuance of Radio Frequencies by the State Committee

153. Under Clause 13(b), paragraph 1 of the Settlement Agreement, “by May 15, 2000 the Respondent, in the person of the State [Committee] agrees to use its best possible efforts to consider in a positive way the application of Gala Radio to provide it with the licences for [11] radio frequencies [...]”. In accordance with the express terms of this contractual provision, Respondent undertook only to apply its best efforts, so that the applications from Gala to the State Committee would be granted by May 15, 2000 – not to achieve that result.

154. Article 5.1.4 of the 2004 UNIDROIT Principles defines the duty of best efforts in the following terms:

“[...] To the extent that an obligation of a party involves a duty of best efforts in the performance of an activity, that party is bound to make such efforts as would be made by a reasonable person of the same kind in the same circumstances”.

155. For Claimant to establish a violation of this best efforts obligation, it is not sufficient to prove that by May 15, 2000 the 11 radio frequency licences had not been granted – the required test is that he produce evidence showing that Ukraine has failed to make such efforts as would be made by a reasonable government in the same circumstances.

156. What is the factual situation?
157. In accordance with the Settlement Agreement Ukraine had to use its best efforts to grant the frequency licences within two months of signature (signature was on March 20, and the deadline was May 15). Of the 11 licences envisaged, six were granted by the State Committee before the May 15, 2000 deadline, another four by June 13, 2000 (i.e. within one month of May 15) and the last one on September 1, 2000 (within 2 ½ months of the deadline).
158. Ukraine's efforts to induce its State Committee to grant the licences resulted in 11 of the 12 licences being issued within one month of the deadline. One licence was then granted with 2 ½ months delay.
159. In the Tribunal's opinion, these delays do not amount to a violation of Ukraine's best efforts obligation. There is often a gap between political decision and bureaucratic compliance. Paragraph 3 of Clause 13(b) explicitly requires that "the granting of licences ... will be made in accordance with the requirements of Ukrainian legislation". There is no evidence that Ukraine abated its pressure on the State Committee to perform. The State Committee issued the licences within time limits which are not unreasonable in the context of Ukrainian administrative practices.

B) Late Constitution of the National Council

160. It is undisputed that the National Council – which had been founded in 1993 – became inoperative in March 1999, because its members were not appointed. It remained inoperative until it was reconstituted in June 2000.
161. Claimant argues that the time period while the National Council was inoperative was abnormal and could not legitimately be expected<sup>38</sup>. This constitutes, in Claimant's opinion, a violation of the Settlement Agreement, and specifically of Respondent's obligation of good faith and fair dealing (Clause 20 of the Settlement Agreement).
162. The Tribunal is unconvinced.
163. The Settlement Agreement lacks any obligation to reconstitute the National Council, nor even an indication of when this could happen. To the contrary, Clause 13(b), paragraph 2, specifically states that applications for broadcasting licences must be made "after the National Council has been fully personally formed", without referring to any time frame – an explicit acceptance by Claimant that he was aware that the National Council was not operative at the time, and that the political decision to designate new members had to be implemented before the granting of the licences.

164. The National Council was in fact reconstituted in June 2000, three months after the signature of the Settlement Agreement. Nothing in the Settlement Agreement legitimizes an expectation on the part of Claimant of a faster rehabilitation of the National Council. The absence of any time frame, and the explicit warning in Clause 13(b), paragraph 2, that Gala's applications will have to wait for the reconstitution of the National Council, point to the contrary.

C) Failure of National Council To Promptly Acknowledge the Settlement Agreement as Binding

165. When the National Council was eventually reconstituted in June 2000, Claimant immediately made numerous attempts to contact its members and to establish the process for obtaining the frequencies. In Claimant's opinion, the National Council's lack of reaction violated Ukraine's duties to act in good faith (Clause 20) and to cooperate (Clause 24)<sup>39</sup>.

166. Claimant's argument is not totally accurate.

167. It is undisputed that on March 20, 2001 the National Council adopted its Resolution No. 36 in which it decided to "recognize priority position of CJSC Radio Company Gala" in the allocation of broadcasting licences for the cities listed in Clause 13(b). It is immaterial whether the National Council's decision thus acknowledged a legal obligation, or whether it followed political considerations. In any case, it implies an acknowledgement of the Settlement Agreement and it granted Claimant the best position that he could expect.

168. Was this acknowledgement by the National Council unduly late?

169. The National Council had just started in January 2001 the process of organizing tenders for broadcasting licences. Given the complexities surrounding the Gala decision (reconciling "positive consideration" of Claimant's interests under the Settlement Agreement with the independence of the National Council and competing interests of other applicants), the March 20, 2001 decision cannot be considered as unduly late.

D) Award of Licences to Other Companies at National Council's First Meeting in January 2001

170. The Settlement Agreement regulates the issuance of broadcasting licences by the National Council in subparagraphs II and III of Clause 13(b) (reproduced above). These provisions create an obligation by Ukraine to "assist [Claimant] for the positive consideration of this issue [the awarding of licences] by the National Council". This obligation is not absolute, but subject to important caveats:

- first of all, there is no time limit for the awarding of the licences (the May 15, 2000 deadline only works for the licences from the State Committee);
- second, Ukraine's obligation to assist is qualified with the words "within the limits of [Respondent's] power" – thus acknowledging that, in accordance with the law, the National Council is an independent public entity;
- third, Claimant could apply "in a due course ... after the National Council has been fully personally formed";
- fourth, application and granting of the licences were to be "in accordance with the requirements of Ukrainian legislation"; Clause 16 specifically added that "the Agreement shall not be treated as a document granting any rights, benefits or privileges which are different or additional to the ordinary rights and obligations of a foreign investor in Ukraine in accordance with the Ukrainian laws and international treaties to which Ukraine is a party".

171. The National Council held its first tender in January 2001, i.e. some six months after its reconstitution. This time was used by the National Council to build the logistics and administrative capacities for proper tender procedures. No fault can be found in the fact that the National Council gave first priority to creating the enabling logistics and administrative capacities for such proceedings.

172. In its first tender in January 2001, the National Council did not include any of the frequencies for which Gala had received frequencies from the State Committee. Rather, the National Council focused only on frequencies on which radio stations had been broadcasting without a valid broadcasting licence at that time.

173. Claimant submits that the organization of this first tender, from which Gala was excluded, implied a breach of the Settlement Agreement on two different counts:

- first, the National Council should have taken the opportunity of the first meeting to act on the licences for Gala; and
- second, the very existence of the first tender proves that radio stations existed which were broadcasting only with a licence from the State Committee, but without a licence from the National Council; since Gala already had licences from the State Committee, it should have been authorized to broadcast straight away.

174. The Tribunal disagrees with Claimant's first argument. Nothing in the Settlement Agreement implies that the National Council was bound to give first priority to Claimant. The National Council decided first to regularize broadcasting outside the law, which had developed during the time when it had been inoperative. This prioritization cannot be challenged under the Settlement Agreement. (As to the claim for violation of the Fair and Equitable Treatment ("FET") standard defined in the BIT, see paragraph 410 below).

175. The second argument merits a more in-depth analysis. Respondent itself has acknowledged that during the period when the National Council became inoperative, “the State [Committee] became the central authority of the executive power, administering communications and radio frequencies of Ukraine and it developed the practice of granting licences for use of radio frequencies before the tenders for frequencies were announced”<sup>40</sup>. What happened was illegal: under Ukrainian law, a radio station could not start broadcasting until it had obtained the necessary authorization from the National Council. Notwithstanding the legal requirements, during the 15-month period when the National Council was inoperative, certain Ukrainian companies were de facto awarded frequencies and authorized to broadcast, although they had only received the authorization from the State Committee.
176. Given this factual situation, Claimant argues that it could and should have been awarded frequencies and authorized to broadcast, once it had obtained the authorization from the State Committee in the summer of 2000, without having to wait for the reconstitution of the National Council and its formal tender procedure. And that, by not having done so, Ukraine violated its obligations under the Settlement Agreement.
177. After due consideration and some hesitation, the Tribunal rejects Claimant’s argument. In the Settlement Agreement, Ukraine could not undertake to perform acts contrary to Ukrainian law nor to authorise Claimant to operate new frequencies without the licence from the National Council; this would have violated the LTR. And Clause 13(b) specifically refers to the need for the National Council to be reconstituted and to issue the necessary licences.
178. But while it was agreed between Claimant and Respondent to act as required by Ukrainian law, Ukraine de facto authorized domestic radio companies to start broadcasting without the necessary authorizations. This situation was then cured in the first tender organized by the National Council after its reconstitution. While these actions do not constitute a violation of the Settlement Agreement, their status under the BIT will be analysed as such below at paragraph 410.

E) Late Award of Broadcasting Licences by National Council

179. The facts regarding the issuance of the broadcasting licences by National Council can be summarized as follows.

Facts

180. On March 1, 2000 (i.e. before the Settlement Agreement had actually been signed), the Minister of Economy of Ukraine wrote a proposal to the Cabinet of Ministers in order to “entrust the [State Committee] and the [National Council] to allocate to CJSC RC “Gala” the following frequency assignments ...”<sup>41</sup>. The frequencies referred to were five of those mentioned in the Settlement Agreement. Respondent has not provided any similar proposal for the remaining six frequencies promised in the Settlement Agreement, nor has Respondent submitted any decision from the Cabinet of Ministers approving the proposal of the Minister of Economy.

181. The record shows no further documents relating to the National Council, before a letter dated February 22, 2001 sent by Mr. Lemire to the Ministry of the Economy<sup>42</sup>. In the meantime, the State Committee had issued its licences, and the National Council had been reconstituted. Mr. Lemire's letter starts by stating that "we have practically reached finalization of performance of the terms of the Dispute settlement Agreement". This recital is important, because it shows that, at that moment, Claimant was convinced that Ukraine had not breached its obligations. Mr. Lemire then goes on, stating that a "serious problem" has arisen with the National Council because "now this authority says that our frequencies are subject to a tender that will begin in some weeks". He adds "we understand that such situation has arisen due to the fact that the National Council is not properly informed" and asks the Ministry of the Economy to intervene.
182. The record does not show the actions adopted by the Ministry of the Economy, but some advice must have been transmitted from the Ministry of the Economy because it is a fact that three weeks later, on March 20, 2001, the National Council decided to "recognize priority position of CJSC Radio Company Gala" in the allocation of broadcasting licences for the cities listed in Clause 13(b)<sup>43</sup>.
183. Claimant has argued that in a meeting on March 19, 2001 the Chairman of the National Council, Mr. Kholod, did not consider the Settlement Agreement as binding, stating that the National Council is a "constitutional independent body, not subordinated to the government" and "that the government cannot adopt any act influencing the development of TV/radio broadcasting in Ukraine". Claimant has produced a transcript of the meeting, which Mr. Lemire prepared at that time<sup>44</sup>. Mr. Kholod's statement has not been challenged and the Tribunal is inclined to accept it as true. But what is undeniable is that one day after the meeting, the National Council approved an official decision recognizing Gala's priority position to receive the frequencies promised in the Settlement Agreement.
184. Not only that, on March 22, 2001, i.e. only two days after this decision in favour of Gala, the National Council announced a new tender for frequencies, which included eight of the 11 frequencies mentioned in Clause 13(b) of the Settlement Agreement. In meetings in June and July 2001, the National Council decided to allocate seven of these frequencies to Gala; and the seven broadcasting licences were issued on September 18, 2001. Two other licences had already been issued on October 9, 1997 (long before the Settlement Agreement)<sup>45</sup>. Two remained pending – those in Dniepropetrovsk and Lviv - and were eventually issued on March 26 and October 9, 2002, respectively.

185. The frequency in Dnipropetrovsk was put to tender on July 26, 2001, but because of accumulated workload of the National Council, it was not approved until March 2002. As regards Lviv, the frequency under discussion had already been granted to other radio companies, whose rights had first to be cancelled, and this justifies the delay.
186. Summing up, in the end the National Council eventually granted to Gala all 11 broadcasting licences mentioned in Clause 13(b). Two had been issued before the Settlement Agreement, seven were issued in September 2001, one in March 2002 and the final one in October 2002.
187. Claimant alleges that this late performance of the Settlement Agreement is tantamount to non-performance, and asks the Tribunal to declare that Ukraine has breached the terms of the Settlement Agreement.

Ukraine's alleged breach

188. The Tribunal acknowledges that there were delays in the issuance of the broadcasting licences by the National Council. But this is not really the point under discussion. What is relevant is whether Ukraine has breached the terms of the Settlement Agreement and for this, it is paramount to look at the actual text of what was agreed.
189. As noted above, Clause 13(b) of the Settlement Agreement does not establish obligations of the National Council, nor does it create a deadline for the National Council to issue its decisions. It simply states Ukraine's commitment to "assist for the positive consideration of this issue at the National Council".
190. The difference between Clause 13(a) and Clause 13(b) is striking. The first Clause creates a best efforts obligation to issue the State Committee's authorization within an agreed time frame. It proves that when the parties wanted to establish obligations and time limits, they were perfectly capable of doing so in clear and unambiguous terms. Clause 13(b), however, lacks any specific time frame, and only refers to Ukraine's commitment to "assist" Mr. Lemire in his endeavours vis-à-vis the National Council.
191. Did Ukraine comply with its part of the bargain, assisting Claimant "within the limits of its power" and "in accordance with the requirements of Ukrainian legislation" in the obtaining of the licences?
192. The record suggests that the Ministry of the Economy's assistance was helpful indeed. Mr. Lemire wrote for the first time complaining on February 22, 2001. The National Council's initial attitude had been rather negative, as proven by the meeting with its Chairman. This was overcome, undoubtedly because of advice from the Government. On March 19, 2001 – one month after Mr. Lemire's first complaint – the National Council reversed its opinion and acknowledged Claimant's rights to the licences. Two days later, the first tender was launched and nine of the 11 frequencies were duly awarded by September 2001 – not bad a record for an agency which had been recently reconstituted. The two other licences were delayed – one just because of bureaucratic delays, the other because of underlying problems with the entitlement to the frequency.

193. The facts proven in this arbitration do not substantiate Claimant’s claim that Ukraine failed to assist Claimant in his endeavour to obtain the broadcasting licences required from the National Council. In hindsight, it is unfortunate for Claimant that he only bargained for such a weak commitment from the counterparty. But the terms agreed are lex contractus, and it is those terms which the Tribunal must apply.

F) Allocation of Low-Powered Frequencies

194. The power of frequencies allocated to Gala ranged from 0.1 to 4kW with an average of 1,17 kW. On all its frequencies combined, Gala reaches some 22% of the population of Ukraine.

195. Claimant complains that the power of the frequencies allocated to Gala under the Settlement Agreement was far below his legitimate expectations and failed to meet his business purposes<sup>46</sup>. He alleges that in the negotiations of the Settlement Agreement as well as in pre-settlement communications with the National Council and other agencies of Respondent, much higher powers had been envisaged. In this respect, Claimant refers to correspondence between the National Council and State Inspection of Electric Communication of July 18 and October 18, 1995 which suggested the availability of much higher powered frequencies for Claimant<sup>47</sup>.

196. The Settlement Agreement, in any case, is silent on the power of frequencies sought by Claimant. Nor does it include any reference to Claimant’s business purposes – e.g. his desire to cover the whole territory of Ukraine - from which a minimum power could be inferred. While the preliminary negotiations between the parties and the purpose of the Settlement Agreement are to be taken into account in determining the common intent of the parties (per Clauses 23(a) and (d) of the Settlement Agreement), Clause 27 provides that the Settlement Agreement “constitutes the entire agreement between the Parties on the subject matter hereof and supersedes all prior correspondence, negotiations and understandings...”. This disqualifies prior correspondence and negotiations as a basis of obligations deliberately not mentioned in the Settlement Agreement. Claimant can therefore not derive a claim from pre-Settlement Agreement correspondence and negotiations.

197. Furthermore, the power of the frequencies awarded to Claimant was not abnormally low. Claimant has acknowledged that the average power of the frequencies allocated to him matched that of frequencies allocated to major competitors<sup>48</sup>. If Mr. Lemire felt that he was entitled to higher powered

frequencies than his competitors, he would have had to include such entitlement in the Settlement Agreement. That has not happened.

198. Finally, Claimant learned the actual power of the frequencies allocated to him by September 1, 2000, when Gala received the licences from the State Committee. He thus knew the power of the frequencies on September 20, 2000 when the Settlement Agreement was recorded as the 2000 Award. Claimant did not seek any amendment of the Settlement Agreement, nor did he reserve his position.
199. The power of the frequencies was specified in the announcement of the tenders by the National Council. Claimant applied for these frequencies without complaining about the power. Thus, even if Claimant had been entitled to higher powered frequencies (which in the Tribunal's opinion does not derive from the Settlement Agreement), he acquiesced with the power of the allocated frequencies. To claim now that this lack of power gives rise to a breach of the Settlement Agreement denotes inconsistent behaviour, contrary to Article 1.8 of the 2004 UNIDROIT Principles.

G) Allocation of Four Frequencies Which Were Contested by the Armed Forces of Ukraine

200. Claimant finally complains that four of the frequencies allocated to him were contested by the Armed Forces of Ukraine<sup>49</sup>. In Claimant's opinion, Ukraine failed to de-conflict with the Army the frequencies awarded to Gala.
201. Respondent counters that the contests were prompted by Gala itself, which decided to change the location of its radio transmitters in three cities, by a distance of between 4.6 and 1.87 km, and increased the height of its antenna from 55 to 70 m in another<sup>50</sup>. These changes require the approval of the State Centre, which issues such authorization only with the approval by the General Headquarters of the Armed Forces. What happened in these four cases is that the General Headquarters of the Armed Forces refused to approve the changes. Refusal however did not mean that the frequencies became contested – Gala Radio in fact continued to broadcast on them. Gala was required only to change the locations and/or parameters of the transmitters following the recommendations of the State Centre, and obtained all required permits in 2008.
202. In the Tribunal's opinion, the difficulties incurred by Claimant with regard to these four frequencies do not constitute a breach of Respondent's obligations under the Settlement Agreement.
203. Under Clause 13(b) paragraph 2 Ukraine is bound to “assist” Claimant “within the limits of its powers” to obtain the authorization of the National Council. There is no express reference to the Armed Forces. But in an interpretation based on good faith, and bearing in mind that Clause 24 creates an obligation for each party to cooperate with the other, the Tribunal is prepared to admit that the obligation to assist should be extended to encompass not only the National Council, but also any other institution controlled by Ukraine. Consequently, in accordance with the Settlement Agreement, Respondent was under an obligation to assist Mr. Lemire in obtaining or maintaining the necessary authorizations from the Armed Forces.

204. Did Respondent fail to do so?

205. Claimant has argued that a senior manager of the State Centre admitted that Ukraine failed to de-conflict the four frequencies and apologized for the mistake by stating that “unfortunately we failed to coordinate with military department”<sup>51</sup>. An analysis of the evidence submitted by Claimant to prove this allegation does not support the conclusion. Claimant has presented a summary, prepared by his own officers, of a meeting on February 21, 2005 with Mr. Zhebrodski, a senior manager of the State Centre<sup>52</sup>. The exact exchange of words which, in accordance with that summary, took place between the officer of Gala and Mr. Zhebrodski is the following:

“[...] Dima: Also, we have had interferences for the past few months and we have uncertain situation with Donetsk...”

Zhebrodski: I am going to call military department in Donetsk, what happened is back in 2000 we had a straight order to give you licence in Donetsk (107,2 fm) and unfortunately we failed to coordinate it with military dpt. Are they complaining?

Dima: No complaints so far, we have been working there for quite awhile.

Zhebrodski: Good. I am sure we can sort it out at least I am gonna try [...]”.

206. The exchange of words between the officer of Gala and the senior manager of the Centre does not prove a breach by Ukraine of its obligation to assist Claimant. Quite to the contrary. What it shows is that, up to that moment (2005), the Army had not complained about the changes in Donetsk, that Gala was broadcasting there and that the State Centre was offering its help if a problem with the Army eventually arises. The problem afterwards materialized, and it was then, it appears, satisfactorily settled by 2008.

207. Summing up, the Tribunal is of the opinion that the problems which Gala encountered with the Army regarding four frequencies, which were eventually solved, do not amount to a default by Ukraine of its obligations under the Settlement Agreement.

208. For the reasons explained above, the Tribunal concludes that, although Claimant encountered difficulties and delays in the obtaining of the frequencies expected under the Settlement Agreement, and although the end result may not have satisfied all the expectations harboured by Claimant, Respondent did not breach any of the obligations it had assumed in that Agreement.

VII. ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF THE BIT

209. The Tribunal will first summarize Claimant's general allegations (VII.1), then Respondent's (VII.2), before analyzing and deciding the claims:
- in first instance, the Tribunal will study the alleged violation of the FET standard in the awarding of frequencies, and will effectively come to the conclusion that certain actions of Respondent are not compatible with this standard (VII.3);
  - a second section will be devoted to the alleged continuous harassment of Claimant, and his request for moral damages (VII.4);
  - in the next sections the Tribunal will reject Claimant's additional allegations, regarding an alleged violation of the FET standard by other actions performed by Ukraine (VII.5) and the applicability of the "Umbrella Clause" (VII.6); and
  - the Tribunal will then decide whether the 2006 amendment of the LTR and in particular the 50% Ukrainian music requirement amounts to a violation of the BIT (VII.7), and finally devote a short section to other allegations submitted by Claimant (VII.8).

VII.1. CLAIMANT'S GENERAL ALLEGATIONS

210. Claimant's starting point is that, after having made the investment in Gala Radio, he had a legitimate expectation that he would be authorized to increase the size and audience of his radio company, and to establish three radio networks in Ukraine aimed at three different age groups. This plan had been discussed with the National Council members and encouraged by them.
211. As evidence of his expectations, Claimant especially relies on three documents, namely:
- a letter of July 18, 1995 from the Chairman of the National Council to the Chairman of the State Inspection on Electric Communications. This letter advises that "the National Council...considers possibility to issue a licence to radio company GALA" and requests the State Inspection "to consider a possibility to give the company the frequency channels" in 13 cities "up to" a specified power<sup>53</sup>;
  - a letter from the Chairman of the State Inspection on Electronic Communications to Claimant of October 18, 1995 informing of the availability of high power frequencies in the cities concerned and advising that the requisite permissions would be issued after Gala had received the pertinent broadcasting licences from the National Council<sup>54</sup>; and

- a “Plan of Measures” negotiated between Claimant and the National Council in 1997 envisaging the allocation of frequencies to set up the Gala networks.
212. The main thrust of Claimant’s submission is that his legitimate expectations were thwarted by Ukraine’s actions in violation of the BIT. Claimant divides his allegations regarding these violations into four different sections<sup>55</sup>.
213. (i): In the first section, Claimant argues that Ukraine has violated the FET standard applicable to protected investments, and the prohibition of arbitrary and discriminatory measures, established in Article II.3. (a) and (b) of the BIT. Respondent’s specific actions, which have resulted in violation, can be divided in two groups:
- denial by the National Council of nearly 300 applications for frequencies submitted by Gala or Energy (a company also owned by Claimant), and illegal award of frequencies to companies other than Gala, during the period when the National Council was not operative; and
  - other actions performed by Respondent, like failure to correct the interferences on Gala’s 100 FM frequency, failure of the National Council to acknowledge its obligations under the Settlement Agreement; allocation of low powered frequencies to Gala; allocation of frequencies contested by the Army.
214. Of the alleged violations, the first one, the systematic denial of applications, is by far the most important one. Claimant argues that the Ukrainian legal procedure for allocation of frequencies is in itself unfair, inequitable, discriminatory and arbitrary. The procedure was moreover applied by the National Council in an unfair, inequitable and discriminatory fashion. It was tainted by interferences from other political organs of Respondent, including the President of Ukraine. The National Council’s aim was to preclude Gala from establishing multiple networks with national coverage. And it was successful in achieving this.
215. Claimant specifically refers to six tenders for frequencies, from 2002 through 2008, which in his view demonstrate Respondent’s practice in breach of the BIT.
216. (ii): In the second section, Claimant asserts that Respondent is submitting Gala to continuous harassment, in violation of Article II.3 (a) of the BIT. Respondent attempted to rely on the “founder” principle to deny Gala Radio an extension of its licence beyond the expiry date of September 18, 2008. Furthermore, there have been concerted efforts by the National Council to force Claimant out of the radio industry through ongoing actions of harassment and the issuance of unlawful warnings.
217. Claimant acknowledges that Respondent, after a few years of costly and lengthy litigation, ultimately cancelled the warnings, renewed the broadcasting licence and applied the correct fee. But this eventual acceptance of Claimant's rights does not provide Ukraine with immunity from paying damages. Claimant alleges that Respondent's harassment since the Award has inflicted significant moral harm for which Respondent should be held liable in an amount of three million USD.

218. (iii): In the third section, Claimant submits that the 50% local music requirement in the LTR implies a violation of Article II.6 of the BIT, namely of the prohibition to "impose performance requirements ... which specify that goods and services must be purchased locally, or which impose any other similar requirements". Respondent has tried to justify the local music requirement on public policy grounds. In Claimant's opinion, the argument can at best justify an expropriation subject to the payment of the corresponding damages. The abnormal high level of the requirement and its abrupt incorporation caused Claimant to suffer loss for 2008 of advertising revenue, and such loss will continue until the expiration of the licence in 2015.
219. (iv): Finally, Claimant submits that, as a consequence of the Umbrella Clause contained in Article II.3 (c) of the BIT, all the contractual breaches of the Settlement Agreement have also been transformed into violations of the BIT, which entitle Claimant to be compensated for the damages suffered.

VII.2. RESPONDENT'S GENERAL ALLEGATIONS

220. Respondent submits that its legal procedures for tenders involving radio frequencies are consistent with the requirements of the BIT; the implementation of these procedures also conforms with the BIT requirements.
221. The procedures for allocation of frequencies meet the standards of due process and procedural fairness, including the right to be heard. Frequencies are awarded by means of tenders announced in the press; prospective participants may submit their applications within one month of the notice. Such applications must include an information package. Thereafter, the National Council reviews the requests applying statutory criteria, and especially valuing the programming content proposed by each applicant. The meetings of the National Council are public, and the National Council holds briefings with representatives of the radio industry. A frequency is awarded to a radio company if the application receives at least five of the votes of the eight members of the National Council. All decisions of the National Council are published on the National Council's official website. Finally, the decisions of the National Council are subject to judicial review.
222. The National Council is an independent body. Each of its members exercises his or her judgment without external pressure, and Claimant's allegations of corruption and undue pressure are unsupported by any evidence. Furthermore, the LTR was amended in 2006, and since then members may be removed from their functions only by a joint decision from the Parliament and the President. Claimant's allegations of political influence were not corroborated during the hearing. No member of the National Council has been impeached, no one associated with the National Council has been prosecuted for corruption, and no one has been convicted of wrongdoing.

223. Gala Radio was treated in a fair and equitable manner and was not discriminated against during the tenders. Claimant lost the four tenders which were analyzed during the hearing for objective reasons. There is no proof of unfair, inequitable, arbitrary and discriminatory treatment against Claimant.
224. Respondent also addresses Claimant's allegations regarding harassment. In Respondent's opinion, the procedure and practice of monitoring radio companies is consistent with Ukraine's obligations under the BIT. The results of any inspection are reviewed in a meeting of the National Council, where its members listen to a presentation of one of them, review a set of documents, listen to oral explanations from the representative of the radio company, and only thereafter take a decision.
225. All radio stations are continuously monitored. Those inspected and sanctioned are publicly mentioned in the Annual Report of the National Council. None of Gala's inspections was conducted in an unfair, inequitable or abusive manner. The warning issued against Gala on October 5, 2005 sanctioned Gala's refusal to produce documents and materials required for the inspection. This warning was successfully challenged before the Ukrainian Courts. On November 23, 2005 a second warning was issued for violating the quota of broadcasting in Ukrainian, the law on advertising, and the terms of its licence. The second warning was also cancelled by the Kiev Court. In May 2006 a third inspection was carried out. Since Gala had significantly improved its business activities, compared to previous periods, the National Council decided not to issue a third warning. There were subsequent inspections in March and June 2008, but they did not lead to any sanction, although Gala Radio admitted that by accident it had committed violations of the election legislation.
226. Other radio companies have also been inspected and received warnings - some of them three, and the National Council has started court proceedings in five cases in order to cancel the broadcasting licence.
227. The 2006 LTR had been debated by members of Parliament for more than three years, and its purpose was to make Ukrainian Law comply with European requirements. In Respondent's opinion, the LTR must be considered as part of the State's legitimate right to organize broadcasting. The 50% Ukrainian music requirement, which requires that either the author, the composer and/or the performer of 50% of the music broadcast be Ukrainian, was neither abrupt, nor excessive nor unfair. Gala Radio signed in August 2006 a Memorandum proposed by the National Council for the progressive implementation of the 50% requirement, and Gala Radio and all its competitors are presently in compliance. There is no link between the 50% Ukrainian music quota and the decline in Gala Radio's ratings.
228. Respondent finally makes three additional allegations:
- Claimant did not behave as a diligent businessman;

- Gala Radio did not take advantage of available remedies; and
- Claimant abused his position as a foreign investor.

VII.3. CLAIMANT’S FIRST ALLEGATION: THE VIOLATION OF THE FET STANDARD IN THE AWARDING OF FREQUENCIES

229. The main thrust of Claimant’s allegation is that Ukraine has failed to provide fair and equitable treatment to its investment in Gala, and subjected it to arbitrary or discriminatory measures. Ukraine rejects both allegations. The Tribunal will analyze this dispute – which is the basic issue submitted to its adjudication - in a short introduction and three separate sections:

- the first devoted to the concept of FET standard, as defined in the BIT (VII.3.2);
- the second to the procedures for awarding frequencies under Ukrainian law (VII.3.3); and
- the third to the facts surrounding Gala’s applications for frequencies (VII.3.4).

VII.3.1. INTRODUCTION

Claimant

230. Claimant, Mr. Joseph Charles Lemire, is an American citizen residing in Ukraine. By profession, Mr. Lemire is a lawyer, although he also has experience in accounting. He is the owner and chairman of Gala, a closed joint stock company constituted in 1995 under the laws of Ukraine. His participation in Gala is held through another Ukrainian company, Mirakom. He initially purchased 30% of Gala, but since 2006 he indirectly owns 100% of the company<sup>56</sup>. The proven amount of his investment is 236,000 USD. There is circumstantial evidence that Mr. Lemire has made payments with his own monies on behalf of Gala. But the record of the actual amounts paid has not been produced, and Mr. Lemire’s statement that the total exceeds 5,000,000 USD<sup>57</sup> has not been locked up with hard evidence. The personal assets of Mr. Lemire and those of Gala appear to some extent commingled<sup>58</sup>.

Gala

231. Gala is a company which since 1995 operates a contemporary music radio station. It holds a licence to broadcast on two frequencies in Kyiv and on 12 other frequencies in nine areas of Ukraine. Gala Radio applied for and received a licence recognizing its status as a national broadcaster on October 17, 2007<sup>59</sup>. In the late 1990’s, Gala ranked amongst the most popular radio stations in Ukraine. Claimant acknowledges that its market share has declined – and attributes this decline to Respondent’s actions.

232. Gala has been a reasonably successful company. Its revenues have gone up from 600,000 USD in the year 2000 to 1.369,000 USD in the year 2007 (with a profit of 121,000 USD)<sup>60</sup>. As Respondent's expert witness says, "while being small business in a competitive market and risky environment, it is obvious that Gala has become a successful national radio station, and as investor, Joseph Charles Lemire has achieved reasonably good results and revenue growth<sup>61</sup>".
233. On a qualitative basis, Claimant has alleged and Respondent has accepted that Gala won the Radio Company of the year award for brand recognition in 1999, won an award for the best radio program on Olympic News from the Golden Pen competition organized by journalists and that four of the top 10 disk jockeys in Ukraine work for Gala, including the well-known DJ Pascha (the alias of Mr. Pavel Shylko), who testified in this arbitration<sup>62</sup>.

Mr. Lemire's relationship with the National Council

234. Respondent has insisted, throughout the procedure, that Mr. Lemire abused his position as foreign investor and harassed the National Council with rude, disrespectful and to some extent even aggressive conduct<sup>63</sup>. Respondent argues that Mr. Lemire has sent scores of hostile letters to the National Council, copying the former President of Ukraine, the current President of Ukraine, the Vice President of the United States, the US Ambassador and others. He also video-recorded meetings of the National Council.
235. The relation between Mr. Lemire and the National Council was not always tense. At the outset of the investment, in 1995, the relationship seems to have been friendly, and the National Council supported Mr. Lemire's efforts to invest in the Ukrainian radio sector. Suddenly the relationship soured in 1996, for no obvious reason. Asked by the Tribunal why his relationships with the National Council became hostile, Mr. Lemire has declared under oath that the reason was that "at one point I was asked for a bribe and I said I would not pay<sup>64</sup>". No further evidence of this alleged request for bribes has been produced.
236. What is undisputed is that in 1996 Gala Radio sued the National Council before the Ukrainian Courts, because Gala had been removed from the air by a decision of the National Council. On February 26, 1997, the Supreme Arbitration Court of Ukraine ruled in Gala's favor<sup>65</sup>. In 1997, Mr. Lemire initiated the First Arbitration against Ukraine, which eventually led to the Settlement Agreement and 2000 Award. In 2006 Gala challenged before the Ukrainian Courts, and again successfully, two decisions of the National Council to issue warnings<sup>66</sup>. Finally, Mr. Lemire of course started this arbitration, accusing the National Council of having treated him in “an unfair, inequitable, arbitrary and discriminatory manner in breach of its BIT obligations”.

237. The fact that Mr. Lemire challenged a number of decisions of the National Council before the Ukrainian Courts and filed two successive investment arbitrations against Ukraine cannot have helped to improve the climate between Gala Radio, a company acting in a highly regulated and supervised legal environment, and the National Council, its regulator and supervisor. The existence of successive court actions may have been one of the reasons for deterioration of the relationship. The Tribunal is also convinced that on certain occasions, Mr. Lemire felt threatened, and that he was afraid that Gala would be taken off the air by the authorities. There were at least two incidents – the third inspection, which could have led to a third warning and revocation of the licence, and the difficulties in obtaining a renewal of Gala Radio’s licence – where Mr. Lemire’s reaction shows real worry. Mr. Lemire’s tactics vis-à-vis Gala’s regulator and supervisor may seem high handed and sometimes even aggressive, but they may have been the only method available to a small, private radio company in Ukraine owned by a foreigner, to draw attention to its situation.

Respondent

238. Respondent in this arbitration is the Republic of Ukraine. The actions and omissions on which Claimant bases his claims were carried out by the National Council, the State Centre and the State Committee, all of which are organs of Ukraine, for which under international law the Republic is responsible.
239. As Respondent has explained to the Tribunal, Ukraine became an independent State on August 24, 1991, and after independence its political, economic and legal systems underwent a substantial transformation<sup>67</sup>. Ukraine has acknowledged that in the initial years of independence, constant political battles and economic instability caused a lack of coordination in the activities of state bodies and hampered their ability to create an effective system of government.
240. Ukraine is an independent and sovereign state, governed by a Constitution, which entrusts to Parliament, elected by general democratic vote, the task of promulgating laws. The Arbitral Tribunal naturally respects the legislative function of the Ukrainian Parliament. It certainly is not the task of this Arbitral Tribunal, constituted under the ICSID Convention, to review or second-guess the rules which the representatives of the Ukrainian people have promulgated. The powers of this Tribunal are much more limited: they only encompass the authority to decide on a case-by-case basis whether Ukraine has violated certain guarantees, offered to American investors under the BIT, and to establish the appropriate remedies.

241. The respect for Ukraine's sovereignty is reinforced by the sector in which Claimant made his investment: radio broadcasting. In all jurisdictions, Radio and TV are special sectors subject to specific regulation. There are two reasons for this:

- first, radio frequencies are by technical nature scarce assets, and consequently the law must articulate systems for allocating licences to prospective bidders;
- but there is also a second reason: when regulating private activity in the media sector, States can, and frequently do, take into consideration a number of legitimate public policy issues; thus, media companies can be subject to specific regulation and supervision in order to guarantee transparency, political and linguistic pluralism, protection of children or minorities and other similar factors.

242. The exceptional character of media companies, and specifically of radio broadcasting companies, is accepted in the BIT itself. In its Annex, both the United States and Ukraine reserve the right to make or maintain limited exceptions to the national treatment principle (provided for in Article II.1 of the BIT) with regard to radio broadcasting stations. The exception does not affect the principles which are being pleaded by Claimant in this procedure, but it proves the special sensitivity towards the media shown by both States when approving the BIT.

VII.3.2. THE FET STANDARD AS DEFINED IN THE BIT

243. The purpose of this section is to determine the general scope and meaning of the FET standard defined in the BIT.

244. Article II.3 (a) and (b) of the BIT reads as follows:

“3. (a) Investment shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment, shall enjoy full protection and security and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than that required by international law.

(b) Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investments. For purposes of dispute resolution under Articles VI and VII, a measure may be arbitrary or discriminatory notwithstanding the fact that a Party has had or has exercised the opportunity to review such measure in the courts or administrative tribunals of a Party”.

245. The origin of Article II.3 (a) and (b) can be traced to the 1992 and 1994 US Model BIT, which proposed the following wording:

“Investments shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment, shall enjoy full protection and security and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than that required by international law. Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary and discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion or disposal of investments. Each Party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments”<sup>68</sup>.

246. Article II.3 of the BIT was thus taken literally from the US Model BIT which was in force at the time when the BIT was negotiated, with only the addition of the phrase referring to judicial review. It is a rule of Delphic economy of language, which manages in just three sentences to formulate a series of wide ranging principles: FET standard, protection and security standard, international minimum standard and prohibition of arbitrary or discriminatory measures.

A) Customary International Law Minimum Standard and FET Standard

247. A classic debate in investment arbitration law is whether the FET standard established by bilateral or multilateral investment treaties coincides with or differs from the international minimum standard of protection for aliens imposed by customary international law.

248. The starting point of this debate is the very definition of the international minimum standard – a question which is fraught with difficulties<sup>69</sup>. For claims arising from administrative or legislative acts of Governments – which are the type of claims typically submitted in investment disputes – the historic leading case seems to be Roberts<sup>70</sup>, issued by the United States – Mexico General Claims Commission in 1926, which defined the minimum treatment as that required “in accordance with ordinary standards of civilization”. Mr. Roberts, a US citizen, had been imprisoned in Mexico in what he held to be inhumane conditions. Mexico had argued that Mexicans were held in identical conditions. And the Tribunal decided:

“Facts with respect to equality of treatment of aliens and nationals may be important in determining the merits of a complaint of mistreatment of an alien. But such equality is not the ultimate test of the propriety of the acts of authorities in the light of international law. That test is, broadly speaking, whether aliens are treated in accordance with ordinary standards of civilization. We do not hesitate to say that the treatment of Roberts was such as to warrant an indemnity on the ground of cruel and inhumane imprisonment”.

249. Roberts is understood to stand for the propositions that a certain treatment may give rise to international responsibility notwithstanding that it affects citizens and aliens alike, and that administrative and legislative actions may amount to a violation of the customary minimum treatment even if the State did not act in bad faith or with willful neglect of duty<sup>71</sup>.

250. The relationship between FET and customary minimum standard has been the subject of much debate, especially in NAFTA based arbitrations, and has led the NAFTA Free Trade Commission to issue a binding interpretation on July 31, 2001. According to this interpretation:

“2. Minimum Standard of Treatment in Accordance with International Law

1. Article 1105(1) prescribes the customary international law minimum standard of treatment of aliens as the minimum standard of treatment to be afforded to investments of investors of another Party.

2. The concept of ‘fair and equitable treatment’ and ‘full protection and security’ do not require treatment in addition to or beyond that, which is required by the customary international law minimum standard of treatment of aliens. [...]”.

251. The same proposition, that the FET standard should be reduced to the customary international law minimum standard, was afterwards adopted in the new 2004 US Model BIT. Article 5 of this model provides<sup>72</sup>:

1. Each Party shall accord to covered investments treatment in accordance with customary international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.

2. For greater certainty, paragraph 1 prescribes the customary international law minimum standard of treatment of aliens as the minimum standard of treatment to be afforded to covered investments”.

252. Is this principle of assimilation between customary minimum standard and FET standard also applicable to the US – Ukraine BIT?

253. The answer must be in the negative. The BIT was adopted in 1996, and was based on the standard drafting then proposed by the US. The words used are clear, and do not leave room for doubt: “Investments shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment ... and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than that required by international law”. What the US and Ukraine agreed when they executed the BIT, was that the international customary minimum standard should not operate as a ceiling, but rather as a floor. Investments protected by the BIT should in any case be awarded the level of protection offered by customary international law. But this level of protection could and should be transcended if the FET standard provided the investor with a superior set of rights<sup>74</sup>.

254. In view of the drafting of Article II.3 of the BIT, the Tribunal finds that actions or omissions of the Parties may qualify as unfair and inequitable, even if they do not amount to an outrage, to willful neglect of duty, egregious insufficiency of State actions, or even in subjective bad faith.
255. This leads to the next question: what is the exact meaning of the FET standard acknowledged by the BIT?

B) Meaning of Article II.3 of the BIT

256. The words used by the Article II.3. are the following: “Investments shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment [...] Neither party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion or disposal of investments”.
257. These general principles require interpretation in order to give them specific content and this interpretation must comply with the requirements of Article 31.1. of the Vienna Convention – it must be done “in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose”<sup>75</sup>”.
- a) Ordinary meaning
258. An inquiry into the ordinary meaning of the expression “fair and equitable treatment” does not clarify the meaning of the concept. “Fair and equitable treatment” is a term of art, and any effort to decipher the ordinary meaning of the words used only leads to analogous terms of almost equal vagueness.
259. The literal reading of Article II.3 of the BIT is more helpful. In accordance with the words used, Ukraine is assuming a positive and a negative obligation: the positive is to accord FET to the protected foreign investments, and the negative is to abstain from arbitrary or discriminatory measures affecting such investments. Any arbitrary or discriminatory measure, by definition, fails to be fair and equitable. Thus, any violation of subsection (b) seems ipso iure to also constitute a violation of subsection (a). The reverse is not true, though. An action or inaction of a State may fall short of fairness and equity without being discriminatory or arbitrary<sup>76</sup>. The prohibition of arbitrary or discriminatory measures is thus an example of possible violations of the FET standard.
260. The literal interpretation also shows that for a measure to violate the BIT it is sufficient if it is either arbitrary or discriminatory; it need not be both.

261. Discrimination, in the words of pertinent precedents, requires more than different treatment. To amount to discrimination, a case must be treated differently from similar cases without justification<sup>77</sup>; a measure must be “discriminatory and expose[s] the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice”<sup>78</sup>; or a measure must “target[ed] Claimant’s investments specifically as foreign investments”<sup>79</sup>.
262. Arbitrariness has been described as “founded on prejudice or preference rather than on reason or fact”<sup>80</sup>; “...contrary to the law because...[it] shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of juridical propriety”<sup>81</sup>; or “wilful disregard of due process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises a sense of judicial propriety”<sup>82</sup>; or conduct which “manifestly violate[s] the requirements of consistency, transparency, even-handedness and non-discrimination”<sup>83</sup>. Professor Schreuer has defined (and the Tribunal in EDF v. Romania<sup>84</sup> has accepted) as “arbitrary”:
- a. a measure that inflicts damage on the investor without serving any apparent legitimate purpose;
  - b. a measure that is not based on legal standards but on discretion, prejudice or personal preference;
  - c. a measure taken for reasons that are different from those put forward by the decision maker;
  - d. a measure taken in wilful disregard of due process and proper procedure.”
263. Summing up, the underlying notion of arbitrariness is that prejudice, preference or bias is substituted for the rule of law.

b) Context

264. Words used in treaties must be interpreted through their context. The context of Article II.3 is to be found in the Preamble of the BIT, in which the contracting parties state “that fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment...”. The FET standard is thus closely tied to the notion of legitimate expectations - actions or omissions by Ukraine are contrary to the FET standard if they frustrate legitimate and reasonable expectations on which the investor relied at the time when he made the investment<sup>85</sup>.

Legitimate expectations

265. Which were the legitimate expectations of Claimant at the time he made his investment?
266. It must be recalled that when in 1995 Mr. Lemire made his first investment and acquired a controlling stake in Gala Radio, this was a small company in a nascent industry. Historically, before independence and political change, the radio industry in Ukraine had been in the hands of the State. In the mid 1990s the sector began to be privatized, a first Law on TV and Radio having been approved on December 21, 1993. All these factors had a bearing on Claimant's legitimate expectations.
267. On a general level, Claimant could expect a regulatory system for the broadcasting industry which was to be consistent, transparent, fair, reasonable, and enforced without arbitrary or discriminatory decisions. It is true that Ukraine and the United States, when accepting the BIT, had reserved their right to make or maintain limited exceptions to the national treatment in the radio sector<sup>86</sup>. Under this exception, Ukraine could e.g., validly require that the founders of broadcasting companies be Ukrainian nationals. But Mr. Lemire could equally expect that, once he had been awarded the necessary administrative authorization to invest in the Ukrainian radio sector, there would be a level playing field, and the administrative measures would not be inequitable, unfair, arbitrary or discriminatory.
268. And on a more specific and personal level, Mr. Lemire undoubtedly had the legitimate expectation that Gala, which at that time was only a local station in Kyiv, would be allowed to expand, in parallel with the growth of the private radio industry in Ukraine.
269. The actual level of anticipated expansion has been the object of much discussion by the parties. Mr. Lemire has submitted that his intention at that time was to create three radio networks, two in FM, and one in AM, centered around three different age groups<sup>87</sup>. Respondent has challenged this statement, and has referred to the absence of any formal business plan setting out the intended business structure.
270. In the Tribunal's opinion, the available evidence shows that what Mr. Lemire had in mind when he bought into Gala Radio in June 1995, was to convert Gala into a national broadcaster and to create a second AM channel. The idea to create a third radio network – called "Energy" – seems to have been an

afterthought. At the time of the acquisition of Gala, Claimant must have approached the National Council, and asked whether a national licence for Gala and an AM licence could be obtained. The National Council reacted in positive terms, as proven by a letter addressed to the State Centre, in which the National Council states that it is “considering the possibility” of issuing to Gala licences for a nationwide FM channel and for a second AM Band, and enquires whether the frequencies would be available. There is no reference to a third channel<sup>88</sup>. The State Centre reacted positively<sup>89</sup>.

271. Respondent has insisted that Claimant has not been able to produce a formal business plan<sup>90</sup>. That is true. But the Tribunal does not attach too much weight to this omission. Formal business plans are customary in sizeable investments in settled economic and business environments. None of these characteristics applied to Mr. Lemire’s investment in Gala Radio: a small amount was involved and the situation of Ukraine was anything but settled.

c) Object and purpose

272. The object and purpose of the BIT - the third interpretive criterion - is defined in its Preamble: the parties “desir[e] to promote greater economic cooperation between them, with respect to investment by nationals and companies of one Party in the territory of the other Party” and recognize that the BIT “will stimulate the flow of private capital and the economic development of the Parties”. The main purpose of the BIT is thus the stimulation of foreign investment and of the accompanying flow of capital.

273. But this main purpose is not sought in the abstract; it is inserted in a wider context, the economic development for both signatory countries. Economic development is an objective which must benefit all, primarily national citizens and national companies, and secondarily foreign investors. Thus, the object and purpose of the Treaty is not to protect foreign investments per se, but as an aid to the development of the domestic economy. And local development requires that the preferential treatment of foreigners be balanced against the legitimate right of Ukraine to pass legislation and adopt measures for the protection of what as a sovereign it perceives to be its public interest.

C) Pursuit of Local Remedies

274. Respondent has submitted that Gala Radio, although it asserts a list of errors concerning the tenders, never challenged any of the decisions before the Ukrainian Courts<sup>91</sup>. In Respondent’s opinion, Claimant should have taken advantage of the available local remedies that would have been capable of correcting the alleged administrative wrong. Claimant did so when confronted with the warnings issued by the National Council, and successfully challenged two decisions before the Ukrainian Courts. Respondent draws the Tribunal’s attention to the Generation Ukraine award, which stressed the need for the investor to make a reasonable effort to obtain the legal correction of an administrative fault:

“[...]In such instances, an international tribunal may deem that the failure to seek redress from national authorities disqualifies the international claim, not because there is a requirement of exhaustion of local remedies but because the very reality of conduct tantamount to expropriation is doubtful in the absence of a reasonable – not necessarily exhaustive – effort by the investor to obtain correction<sup>92</sup>”.

275. The question which the Tribunal must answer is whether, given the fact that Gala Radio has not challenged the decisions of the National Council, it is now precluded from presenting its claim in this arbitration.

276. The starting point of the Tribunal’s analysis must be the text of the BIT. The BIT – unlike other Treaties – does not include any clause requiring the initiation or exhaustion of local remedies before the filing of an investment arbitration. Quite the contrary: Article II.3 deviates from the standard US Model BIT in only one point, the insertion of the following phrase:

“[...] For purposes of dispute resolution under Articles VI and VII, a measure may be arbitrary or discriminatory notwithstanding the fact that a Party has had or has exercised the opportunity to review such measure in the courts or administrative tribunals of a Party”.

277. The literal meaning of this phrase could not be clearer: even if a party has had (and has not exercised), or has exercised (with whichever outcome) the right to judicial review, such action or omission is irrelevant in an investment arbitration deciding whether the measure is arbitrary or discriminatory. The consequence is that in an arbitration under the US-Ukrainian BIT, the possibility to file a claim against a specific measure, is not burdened by any requirement to previously appeal to the national Courts.

278. This does not mean that an investor can come before an ICSID tribunal with any complaint, no matter how trivial, about any decision, no matter how routine, taken by any civil servant, no matter how modest his hierarchical place. In this case, however, the claim is raised against the conduct of the National Council, that is to say the highest regulatory organ for the broadcasting industry. On this basis, the Tribunal considers that there should be no impediment to Claimant seeking to hold Ukraine accountable for an alleged breach of the BIT.

279. Given the clear language of the BIT, the Tribunal rejects Respondent’s submission that Claimant is precluded from pursuing his claims in the present arbitration, due to his failure to appeal the tender decisions of the National Council.

<sup>92</sup> Generation Ukraine Inc. v. Ukraine, ICSID Case No. ARB/00/9, Award of 16 September 2003, para. 20.30.

Generation Ukraine

280. The Tribunal would like to add that – even if Article II.3 of the BIT had lacked a specific reference to local remedies – the present case has significant differences with Generation Ukraine. In Generation Ukraine, the claim filed by Claimant was based on expropriation, and the appropriate level of compensation - a type of claim which could have been submitted to and decided by the local Courts. In the present arbitration, the situation is quite different: the claim is for damages arising from the violation of the BIT standards, and such claim can only be filed before an international arbitration tribunal.
281. It is true that under Article 30.4 of the LTR, Gala Radio would have had the opportunity to challenge the decisions of the National Council awarding frequencies to other companies. But those claims would only have succeeded in setting aside the National Council’s decision, and forcing that the tender be repeated. Gala Radio would never be certain that in this repeat tender it would be successful. The practical result of an appeal against a tender decision of the National Council is very limited – if the procedure is unfair or the administrative body biased, it could again decide to grant the licence to another contender and not to Gala. The effect is quite different from that of an appeal against a warning – in this case the Court’s decision provokes the immediate setting aside of the measure.
282. The test proposed by Generation Ukraine is based on reasonableness. Claimant is only required to put in a reasonable effort to obtain correction of the wrong decision. In the circumstances of the present case, it would have been unreasonable to require Claimant to have fought in the Ukrainian Courts the National Council’s decisions adjudicating frequencies.
283. The Tribunal is not thereby suggesting that a breach occurs if the National Council makes a decision which is different from the one the arbitrators would have made if they were the regulators. The arbitrators are not superior regulators; they do not substitute their judgment for that of national bodies applying national laws. The international tribunal’s sole duty is to consider whether there has been a treaty violation. A claim that a regulatory decision is materially wrong will not suffice. It must be proven that the State organ acted in an arbitrary or capricious way. A regulatory organ charged with the attribution of licences on a competitive basis plainly violates essential notions of fairness if it refuses to consider the information provided by a qualified applicant, or if it engages in favouritism. And the State itself breaches its obligations under the treaty if it exercises undue influence over the decision-making of regulatory bodies.

D) Summary

284. The FET standard defined in the BIT is an autonomous treaty standard, whose precise meaning must be established on a case-by-case basis. It requires an action or omission by the State which violates a certain threshold of propriety, causing harm to the investor, and with a causal link between action or omission and harm. The threshold must be defined by the Tribunal, on the basis of the wording of Article II.3 of the BIT, and bearing in mind a number of factors, including among others the following:

- whether the State has failed to offer a stable and predictable legal framework;
- whether the State made specific representations to the investor;
- whether due process has been denied to the investor;
- whether there is an absence of transparency in the legal procedure or in the actions of the State;
- whether there has been harassment, coercion, abuse of power or other bad faith conduct by the host State;
- whether any of the actions of the State can be labeled as arbitrary, discriminatory or inconsistent.

285. The evaluation of the State's action cannot be performed in the abstract and only with a view of protecting the investor's rights. The Tribunal must also balance other legally relevant interests, and take into consideration a number of countervailing factors, before it can establish that a violation of the FET standard, which merits compensation, has actually occurred:

- the State's sovereign right to pass legislation and to adopt decisions for the protection of its public interests, especially if they do not provoke a disproportionate impact on foreign investors;
- the legitimate expectations of the investor, at the time he made his investment;
- the investor's duty to perform an investigation before effecting the investment;
- the investor's conduct in the host country.

286. Once the scope and meaning of the FET standard has been defined in the abstract, the Tribunal must establish the facts and decide whether they constitute a violation of such standard. This will be achieved by reviewing the legal procedure created by Ukrainian law for the awarding of licences in the broadcasting sector (VI.3.3), then by analyzing in detail the facts surrounding the allocation of frequencies which affected Gala (VI.3.4).

VII.3.3. PROCEDURE FOR THE AWARDING OF LICENCES IN THE BROADCASTING SECTOR UNDER UKRAINIAN LAW

287. Two fundamental laws regulate the Ukrainian radio sector:

- the Law on National Television and Radio Council of Ukraine (“LNC”), originally issued on September 30, 1998<sup>93</sup>, amended on a number of occasions, the last on January 12, 2006; the scope of this law is the designation and scope of responsibilities of the National Council;
- the Law on Television and Radio Broadcasting (“LTR”), originally issued on December 21, 1993, amended significantly a number of times, lastly on March 1, 2006<sup>94</sup>, and which provides the general rules regarding the functioning of radio and TV in Ukraine.

A) The National Council

288. The LNC establishes the National Council as a “constitutional permanent collegiate agency”<sup>95</sup>. Its activities “shall be based upon the principles of legality, independence, impartiality, transparency...”<sup>96</sup>. The eight members of the National Council are appointed in parity by the President and the Parliament respectively, for five-year terms with the possibility of a single reappointment<sup>97</sup>. Until 2006, the President and the Parliament could at any time disqualify any of their appointees from office. That was no empty threat: on February 2, 2004 the Parliament’s Committee on Freedom of Speech and Information approved a resolution, recommending that Parliament carry out a “credibility impeachment” of all the members of the National Council<sup>98</sup>.

289. Since 2006 the situation has improved because the LNC has been amended, and the National Council in toto can be dismissed only upon a vote of no confidence carried by Parliament and confirmed by the President<sup>99</sup>.

290. The National Council derives its status and mandate directly from a constituent law. Its independence and impartiality is expressly guaranteed by that law. Formally, it thus is independent. The appointment of independent regulators by Parliament and/or the Head of State follows wide-spread practice. Before 2006, the power of the President and the Parliament, respectively, to remove their appointees from office indeed represented a threat to Council members’ independence. With the requirement of a concurring decision of both the President and the Parliament for removing the Council in toto from office, a safeguard against undue political pressure was introduced.

291. The level of political interference with the decisions of the National Council is difficult to gauge from the outside. The only incident which is proven beyond any doubt is the interference of the President of Ukraine with the tender of October 19, 2005, which was awarded to the bidder mentioned in the President's letter to the National Council (which will be analyzed in detail below). During the hearing, Mr. Lyasovsky, a member of the National Council, was directly asked whether National Council members follow the instructions of the political establishment. His answer, under oath, was the following<sup>100</sup>:

“Well, we’re very accustomed to hearing this kind of language, I’ll be honest and frank. Yes, there have been – there are attempts at putting pressure on the council. However, due to the specifics of how the council is formed, such attempts are ineffective, especially since recently, since amendments were made, passed in 2006. Indeed, we now are an independent body and we’re not subject, or rather we’re immune to pressure”.

292. The answer acknowledges that pressure has been exercised on the National Council, but expresses the contention that since 2006 – when the LNC was amended and the Council was given a higher level of independence – the situation has been improving.

B) The Administrative Procedure for the Issuances of Licences

293. The LTR is an extensive law, comprising 75 articles, regulating the creation, licensing, functioning, supervision and sanctioning of companies operating in the TV and radio sectors. Section III of the Law, as it now stands, is devoted to the rules governing the tender procedure and the issuance of broadcasting licences.

294. From a historical perspective, the system for granting radio licences has gone through four phases:

- in a first phase, between 1993 and 1995, licences were issued by the National Council under Article 14 of the 1993 LTR, upon individual application of persons interested in setting up a radio station;
- after 1995, radio frequencies were awarded by means of tender announced in the press<sup>101</sup>;
- the third phase began on December 15, 1998, when the National Council became inoperative because it ceased to have five duly designated members, and consequently could not validly carry decisions; during this interregnum, radio frequencies were awarded directly by the State Committee, in clear violation of the LTR<sup>102</sup>. The situation was solved in June 2000, when the National Council regained all its members, and a first tender in accordance with the LTR was then organized on January 1, 2001;

- since January 2001, licences have all been awarded by way of tenders supervised by the National Council.

295. The LTR contains detailed rules with regard to the organization of tenders. The decision to launch a tender for new frequencies is adopted by the National Council, then published in the press. Prospective bidders have a one-month period to present their applications, which must include information required by Article 24 of the LTR. Applications are then reviewed by the individual members of the National Council. The criteria of review are now those established in Article 25.14 of the LTR:

“While considering the applications the National Council shall prefer TV/radio organization that:

- a) is capable to fulfill the licence conditions to the best extent;*
- b) prefers socially important programs (informational, social and political, children, etc.), satisfies informational needs of national minorities and secures freedom of speech;*
- c) has an advantage in financial and economical as well as professional and technical capabilities for TV/radio broadcasting;”*

296. The system for deciding the winner of the tender is simple: the National Council holds a formal meeting, the various applications for each frequency are presented, each member of the National Council expresses a vote and the licence is awarded to the applicant supported by at least five members of the National Council<sup>103</sup>. If no applicant reaches this threshold, the frequency is not awarded, although it may be put again to tender on a future occasion.

297. The voting system gives rise to three different issues:

- a) Publicity of the vote

298. The first is the publicity of the vote.

299. The LTR contains no provision regarding the formal requirements of the National Council’s decision. Practices seem to have developed. It is undisputed that in an initial phase, the votes would be cast in a private meeting of the Council, behind closed doors, and that there was no transparency of how each member of the National Council had voted. The parties have debated when this phase ended. Claimant has submitted that the change occurred in 1995<sup>104</sup>; while Respondent’s position is that this happened in 2000<sup>105</sup>. The evidence submitted by Respondent in order to support its position are minutes of National Council meetings which took place from December 24, 2003 onwards. These minutes list representatives of participating radio companies as “invited persons” present during the discussions.

300. The Tribunal concludes that from the end of 2003 onwards, the practice of the National Council has been to “invite” interested parties to attend its meetings. This constitutes a significant improvement in the transparency of the decision procedure.

b) Reasoning of the vote

301. The second issue is the reasoning underlying the votes.

302. The LTR does not require that the votes of each member of the National Council, or the National Council’s decision as such, be reasoned. This derives clearly from the drafting of Article 25 of the LTR.

303. In paragraph 8 of this provision, the law specifically establishes that if the National Council is to exclude a person from participating in a tender, such decision must be “reasoned”. In the documents presented in this arbitration there is at least one example of a decision excluding a participant in the tender, and that decision is duly reasoned<sup>106</sup>.

304. The situation is different as regards decision for the awarding of frequencies. Paragraph 13 of the same article describes the procedure for awarding the licence to the winner of the tender:

“A decision on the winner of a tender and on broadcast licence issuance shall be made by the National Council within a 30-day period after application period is finished”.

305. It is very telling that for this decision of awarding frequencies the law omits the requirement that it be “reasoned” – a requirement which the same article of the Law specifically requires for exclusion of applicants.

306. The administrative practice of the National Council when awarding frequencies adhered to the principle established in the LTR. Respondent has presented a great number of minutes of decisions taken by the National Council. These minutes simply state in favour of whom each member is casting his vote. And if a participant received five votes, the frequency was awarded to him. The minutes do not include any discussion among the members or the reasoning of the decision.

307. The evidence presented in this arbitration does not indicate that before the National Council’s meeting, either the administrative staff of the Council, or its members, prepared a reasoned and researched report with a valuation and ranking of the applications submitted. This is surprising, since Article 25.14 of the LTR orders that in considering the application, the National Council “shall prefer” radio organizations that offer socially important programs, satisfy minorities, secure freedom of speech, have better financial resources or professional or technical capabilities. The evidence submitted seems to show that the National Council made no formal effort to measure to what extent each application complied with the requirements of the Law<sup>107</sup>.

308. Respondent has acknowledged that “the members of the National Council are not obliged by the existing legislation to explain the details of their reasoning during the voting process”<sup>108</sup>. But Respondent has added that in practice the members of the National Council did explain their reasoning at the meeting, during debates with the candidates and during the discussions with other members of the National Council, and after the meetings at briefings with the press. In the opinion of the Arbitral Tribunal, these informal explanations, which started in 2004, although certainly a step forward, do not off-set the absence of any reasoning justifying the vote of each Council Member, and the corporate decision of the National Council as a body.
309. The absence of reasoning of the decision represents a significant weakness in the administrative procedure for the issuance of licences.
310. Thus, a participant who has lost cannot ascertain why his application was rejected, how he was ranked with regard to other participants, and what he could do to improve his chances to be successful in the next bidding.
311. The absence of reasoning also jeopardizes the possibilities of public scrutiny and of judicial review. A Court cannot judge the reasonableness of the National Council’s decision to award the tender to one participant or the other, if there is no formal explanation of the reasons which prompted the decision. Absence of reasoning de facto reduces the causes of judicial review to procedural irregularities during the tender.
312. In April 2007, three Deputies from the parliamentary majority proposed to Parliament the creation of an Investigating Committee centred on the activities of the National Council, including the “transparency and publicity of broadcasting licences issuing and renewal”<sup>109</sup>. Although the proposal of the three Deputies may also have had political motivations, the mere fact that it was presented – it is unclear from the record if the Committee was actually set up<sup>110</sup> – proves the existence of significant unease with the degree of transparency and publicity of the procedure for awarding broadcasting licences.

c) Lack of knowledge of ultimate owners

313. A third characteristic of the system for allocation of frequencies is that participants were under no obligations to disclose the ultimate owners of their companies. While the direct controlling owners of companies bidding for frequencies were registered with the National Council, the owners of the owners were not. The Council members, who deposed as witnesses, when asked on several occasions by counsel to Claimant and by the Tribunal, were not able to provide any information regarding the beneficial owners of the radio companies to whom they had awarded significant numbers of licences<sup>111</sup>.
314. Politically influential individuals are thus able to beneficially own radio stations, which participate in tenders for new frequencies, and to hide behind “ownership chains”, so that their interest in the decision remains undisclosed. This lack of transparency clearly represents a shortcoming of the system. The LTR does not require information about ultimate owners, and the National Council apparently never asked any of the participants to disclose the names of their controlling shareholders. This is especially troubling, since the legal criteria which National Council should apply when selecting the winner must include freedom of speech and financial and economic capability of the applicants – criteria difficult to apply if there is no transparency regarding beneficial owners of radio stations. It also makes it difficult for the public – and for judicial bodies – to determine whether there has been undue influence.

315. The Tribunal has already stated its respect for Ukraine’s sovereignty and for Ukraine’s right to promulgate the laws which its Parliament deems are best suited to further the Nation’s public interest. The powers of this Tribunal are limited to judging whether Respondent has acted in ways that affect Claimant and breach the FET standard enshrined in the BIT. But in order to value specific measures, the Tribunal must analyze the general legal framework within which specific conduct took place. That analysis has revealed that the procedure presents some shortcomings, which in essence affect:
- the independence of members of the National Council;
  - the existence of an interregnum, during which licences were awarded without tender procedure;
  - the absence of formal valuation of the applications for licences against clearly established criteria;
  - the absence of reasoning for National Council decisions, whether collectively or for individual votes; and
  - the lack of transparency of ultimate owners of radio companies.
316. While none of the above features alone stigmatizes the entire tender process as arbitrary, there is a risk that the shortcomings may end up mutually reinforcing each other. Members of the National Council, by virtue of the designation system, tend to have political affiliations and interests. Deficient disclosure and transparency requirements ease the misuse of discretionary powers by Council members to accommodate political or personal interests. In sum, the procedure for allocating frequencies by the National Council is fraught with shortcomings that facilitate arbitrary decision making.

317. A final note is important: Ukraine gained its independence only in 1991 and still is in the process of developing its institutional framework. During this formative period, legal imperfections are to be expected. Ukrainian law has improved, and after the 2006 amendments of the LTR, a significant number of weaknesses have been ameliorated.

VII.3.4 GALA'S APPLICATIONS FOR ADDITIONAL FREQUENCIES

318. In the preceding section the Tribunal has concluded that the tender procedure for the issuance of licences presents certain shortcomings, which although falling short of disqualifying the entire system as arbitrary, remain relevant for the assessment of the National Council's measures. In this section the Tribunal will establish the facts surrounding Gala's applications for additional frequencies, and will decide whether the actions or omissions of Respondent amount to a violation of the FET standard guaranteed in the BIT to protected investors.

A) Overview of Gala's Participation in Tenders for Additional Frequencies

319. It is undisputed that between 2001 and 2007 Gala Radio participated in a great number of tenders for broadcasting licences, additional to those that were awarded to Gala pursuant to the Settlement Agreement. The exact number of frequencies for which Gala applied, however, is debated. Claimant states that the number of applications amounts to more than 200 for Gala, plus 100 more for Energy (a second chain of radio stations which Claimant tried to create)<sup>112</sup>. Respondent accepts 180 applications for Gala<sup>113</sup> and 71 for Energy<sup>114</sup>.
320. What is not disputed is that all those applications were unsuccessful – with one exception: Claimant was awarded the frequency in Chechelnyk, a village of 5,000 inhabitants without any satellite receiver (which implies that the station cannot be linked to Gala's network). It is undisputed that the business relevance of this frequency is minimal. Claimant adds that the National Council's decision to reward Gala's continuing efforts with the awarding of this local frequency in a remote, unconnected village was intended to rub salt in the wound<sup>115</sup>.

Claimant's argument

321. Claimant argues that Gala's dismal record in receiving frequencies stands in stark contrast with that of its competitors, all controlled by powerful and well-connected personalities. Claimant gives the following examples<sup>116</sup>:
- Radio Era applied for 93 frequencies and was awarded 38 (41% success rate); the station is allegedly owned by Mr. Derkach, who is said to be a supporter of the current President of Ukraine;
  - Hit Radio applied for 139 frequencies and was awarded 42 (30%); Claimant alleges that it is owned by Mr. Bagrayev, a Deputy (i.e. member of Parliament) and member of the National Council 2000-2002;
  - NBM Radio applied for 205 frequencies and was awarded 56 (27%); it is allegedly owned by Mr. Poroshenko, also an ally of the current President;
  - Russkoe Radio applied for 111 and was awarded 31 (28%); allegedly also owned by Mr. Bagrayev<sup>117</sup>.
322. Claimant has produced circumstantial evidence to substantiate that these radio chains are actually owned by the above-mentioned individuals<sup>118</sup>. During the hearing, Claimant asked the members of the National Council who deposed, to clarify the ownership structure of these radio stations. They all declined, in essence arguing that information regarding beneficial owners is not available to the National Council. The Tribunal also notes that Respondent has not produced any evidence contradicting Claimant's allegations.

Respondent's arguments

323. Respondent's main argument is that Claimant cannot assert a breach of the BIT while remaining at a "macro-statistical" level. Each tender is different from the next, and each applicant is different from the rest. As regards the statistics themselves, Respondent submits that of the 180 frequencies Gala applied for, only 68 were destined for broadcasting a music format that could be similar to Gala Radio's program concept<sup>119</sup>. Respondent also states that in some tenders which it eventually lost, Gala received the favourable votes of some of the Council members – but it never received the five votes necessary for the awarding of the licence.
324. The main thrust of Respondent's argument is that Gala Radio did not win tenders because it "is an average radio station"<sup>120</sup> and that it is not at the top level of the overall Ukrainian broadcasting market. Its programming concept is no longer as popular and innovative as it used to be. This would, in Respondent's assertion, justify the National Council's decision to deny new licences to Gala.

The Tribunal's position

325. The Tribunal agrees with Respondent that mere statistics are insufficient for maintaining a claim for violation of the FET standard. But on the other side, statistics do give an overview of how the facts have developed and may provide valuable insight into patterns of behaviour.
326. If an impartial bystander looks at the gross, macro-statistical numbers, an impact cannot be avoided. In six years Gala Radio, a radio company in good standing, although it tried insistently, has not been able to obtain additional frequencies (except in a small village in rural Ukraine and except for the frequencies allocated pursuant to the Settlement Agreement). Whether one takes Claimant's numbers (200 applications for all types of frequencies) or Respondent's (68 applications for music format frequencies similar to Gala's) is really irrelevant. Respondent's number is in fact even more striking, because it refers to cases where the National Council denied Gala an additional frequency for the type of programming it was already offering, and with good success.
327. It is undisputed that Gala's main competitors – Era, Hit, NMB, Russkoe – were much more successful than Gala: they received between 38 and 56 frequencies. Respondent has tried to justify this differential treatment stating that Gala “is an average radio station”, that its programming concept is stale and that other competitors offer better broadcasting.
328. The problem with Respondent's argument is that, since the National Council does not reason or explain its decisions, it is totally impossible for a third party (be it a local judge or this Tribunal) to verify whether Gala's applications were rejected because its programming concept was worse than that of its competitors (as Respondent now submits), or due to some other cause, and whether this cause was good, arbitrary or discriminatory.
329. A suspicion in any case remains: if Gala, as Respondent readily admits, “is an average radio station”, the natural consequence would seem to be that Gala should have had an average success rate in its tenders. And the record shows that it had a success rate which was much below average.
330. Summing up, the Tribunal feels that the macro-statistical analysis cannot provide conclusive evidence that Respondent has violated the FET standard; but the overall numbers, the absence of any reasonable explanation, the strikingly different success rates of Gala and of its competitors, the impossibility of verifying the reasons why Gala was rejected, are all factors which cast doubts on the decisions of the National Council.
331. In order to substantiate these doubts, it is necessary that the Tribunal analyze each of the tenders in particular. This will be done in the next sections.

B) The Tender of October 19, 2005 and the Interference of the President of Ukraine

Undisputed facts

332. On July 2004 the National Council announced a tender for 15 frequencies, with the special condition that the channel thus created be used solely for “informational broadcasting”. Radio channels which exclusively or predominantly broadcast music, like Gala or Kiss, are of limited political relevance. Informational channels, however, are politically more sensitive, since they represent important elements for the formation of public opinion.
333. It is an undisputed fact that on July 20, 2004, i.e. four days after the announcement of the tender, the President of Ukraine sent a “Doruchennya” to Mr. Shevchenko, the Chairman of the National Council, which literally stated as follows<sup>121</sup>:

“DORUCHENNYA OF THE UKRAINIAN PRESIDENT

To: O. SHEVCHENKO
O. GAJDUK*

In accordance with the set procedure to consider the matter relating to the allocation of the frequency resource to “Radio Era” and “Radio Kokhannya” Signed V. YUSCHENKO”.

334. The “Doruchennya” included a further paragraph, addressed to top officials of the Ukrainian Government and the City of Kiev, asking for support for the activities of TRC “Era” and “Radio Era”.
335. Radio Era was an already existing talk radio, broadcasting informational programs. Claimant has alleged that Radio Era (and Radio Kokhannya) are widely reported to be owned by Mr. Derkach, a political ally and supporter of the current President of the Ukraine.
336. There has been some discussion about the precise translation of the word “Doruchennya”. During the hearing the Chairman of the National Council Mr. Shevchenko was questioned regarding the precise meaning, and it was agreed that the best English translation would be “instruction”, not “order”<sup>122</sup>.
337. The “Instruction” was followed up by a letter sent on August 2, 2005, in which the “First Deputy State Secretary of Ukraine” asked Chairman Shevchenko to “inform the Secretariat of the President of Ukraine of status of the task commissioned by the Head of the State”<sup>123</sup>.

338. The record shows no letter from either Mr. Shevchenko or the National Council reacting either to the “Instruction” or to the Secretariat’s reminder.
339. On October 19, 2005 the National Council decided to award the 15 frequencies on tender to Radio Era. It is undisputed that during the discussion which led to the Council’s decision, a deputy of the Ukrainian Parliament called Derkach attended the meeting. Radio Kokhannya was later on awarded 12 frequencies more.

Claimant’s position

340. In Claimant’s view, Gala lost the tender to Radio Era due to the President’s intervention and then later due to the physical presence of a Parliamentary Deputy at the tender meeting itself. The tender was procedurally improper, and the outcome was unfair, inequitable, arbitrary and discriminatory. As a consequence of these measures, Claimant lost the opportunity to establish a separate talk radio format in an FM format that solely focused on news, informational programs, culture, education and sports<sup>124</sup>.

Respondent’s position

341. Respondent asserts<sup>125</sup> that the channel was awarded to Radio Era in view of the latter’s supremacy in information broadcasting. The message of the President, in Respondent’s view, did not constitute an order. Deputy Derkach does not own Radio Era and did not intervene in the National Council’s deliberation. Thus, no undue influence was exercised on the National Council’s tender decision.

The Tribunal’s position

342. The National Council was established by the LNC as a “constitutional permanent collegiate agency”; and its activities “shall be based on the principles of legality, independence, impartiality, transparency...” (Articles 1 and 3 of the LNC). Decisions on the allocation of radio frequencies in particular are to be made in accordance with a tender process and tender evaluation criteria prescribed by law (see Article 25 of the LTR). Independence and impartiality of National Council members from other State bodies is pivotal to the integrity of the system.
343. Any interference by a State body in the statutory tender process and the supposedly independent and impartial evaluation of tenders must therefore be considered as violating both the LNC and the LTR. This applies especially to any interference by the President, who appoints and reappoints half of the members of the National Council. It must also be remembered that at the time of the Instruction, members of the National Council could be removed by a decision of the President.

344. Taken literally, the “Instruction” of the President only states that the Chairman of the National Council shall “in accordance with the set procedure [...] consider the matter relating to the allocation of the frequency resource to “Radio Era” and “Radio Kokhannya””. Respondent, supported by the deposition of Messrs. Shevchenko and Kurus, tries to depict the message as a routine call by the President on the National Council to do its job.
345. The Tribunal does not have to decide whether the message qualified as a Presidential order which must be obeyed. As noted before, it is sufficient if it constituted an interference with the independent and impartial decision-making process of the National Council, i.e. an indication of the President’s expectations with respect to the pertinent decisions.

Impact of the “Instruction”

346. Did the “Instruction” from the President amount to interference?
347. Respondent submits that the “Instruction” should be construed exclusively on the basis of its plain language, and that it amounts to no more than an admonition to the National Council to do its job. No explanation has, however, been given why the National Council needs such an admonition. In the hearings of the present case, National Council members Shevchenko and Kurus could not refer to any similar action of the President, before or after this incident. Its singularity draws attention to the Presidential message and heightens its potential to influence decision making.
348. Moreover, the message was written in the context of an instruction to other State officials to “remove obstacles” to Radio Era’s activities and “report on the measures taken” within seven days. The different language used for addressing these officials, who do not enjoy independence guaranteed by law, and the National Council Chairman, respectively, shows the President’s awareness of the National Council’s independence. Yet, it also reflects the President’s standing in support of Radio Era.
349. An additional factor to be borne in mind is that within two weeks of the Presidential “Instruction”, but before the pertinent tender decision, the Secretariat enquired on the status of the “task commissioned” by the President. This letter is a clear indication of the President’s support of Radio Era’s offer and his expectation that his message would be duly taken into account in the process.
350. In these circumstances, the attendance at the decisive National Council meeting on October 19, 2005 by Deputy Derkach is clearly more than a routine participation of a deputy in a Council meeting. It appears as a demonstration of vigilance, intended to remind Council members that their decisions are watched.

Deputy Derkach

351. It has proven impossible for the Tribunal to ascertain whether Mr. Derkach actually owns or is somehow connected to Era Radio, as alleged by Claimant. Specifically asked by the Tribunal, Chairman Shevchenko could not confirm whether Mr. Derkach was the owner of Era Radio, nor could he give any information regarding the person or persons who controlled this radio station<sup>126</sup>. It is highly implausible that the Chairman of the National Council, who had been twice elected as a Parliamentary Deputy, who had received an “Instruction” from the President to consider Era’s application favourably, and who voted in favour of awarding Era the licences to strengthening it as a leading broadcaster in Ukraine, should remain completely unaware of the ownership structure of this company.
352. In any case, for present purposes it suffices to record that, as documented by Claimant, Mr. Derkach has been reported in the media as being associated with Era Radio<sup>127</sup>, so that his presence at the National Council meeting must have been perceived as a supporter of this radio station. It can also remain open whether he has expressed his support by his body language, as maintained by Claimant. His mere attendance at this meeting in conjunction with his publicly reported association with Radio Era constitutes an action in support of this applicant.

Respondent’s counter-argument

353. Respondent has asserted that the President’s “Instruction” was inconsequential, because the channel of frequencies in question had been reserved for informational broadcasting and Radio Era was the national champion in this market segment. Even Claimant concedes that according to a market survey (the so-called “SIREX Report”) Radio Era was the national leader on information broadcasting, with an established track record, while Gala intended to set up a new “talk format radio network” in order to satisfy the tender condition. Claimant adds, however, that in accordance with the SIREX Report Gala was number two (after Radio Era) in news broadcasting, and Radio Era’s closest competitor<sup>128</sup>.
354. The Arbitral Tribunal is again confronted with the impossibility of reviewing the reasons underlying the National Council’s decision. A decision in favour of the established leader in the relevant field over a newcomer may under certain circumstances be appropriate. But Article 25.14 (b) of the LTR also orders the National Council to take into account the objective of “securing freedom of speech”. Since Radio Era already had a radio network, pluralism could arguably be better served if the new channel was awarded to a different company. Gala had a realistic prospect of winning this tender against Radio Era, and such opportunity was taken away by the Presidential interference.

355. The President’s “Instruction” referred not only to the tender applications of Radio Era, but also to those of Radio Kokhannya. It is undisputed that radio Kokhannya received 12 frequencies from July 2005 through January 2006<sup>129</sup>, in tenders in which Gala also participated.

Decision

356. In light of the aforementioned circumstances, the Tribunal concludes that the President’s “Instruction” amounted to interference with the independent and impartial decision of the National Council in favour of two of Claimant’s competitors – Radio Era and Radio Kokhannya. It thus constituted a violation of applicable Ukrainian legislation, namely the LNC and LTR, which meets the Saluka test, since it “manifestly violate[s] the requirements of consistency, transparency, even-handedness and non-discrimination” and thus amounts to an “arbitrary or discriminatory measure” within the meaning of Article II.3 (b) of the BIT. Furthermore, the apparently politically motivated preference for one competitor represents a discrimination against Claimant, who was applying in the same tender processes for the same frequencies.
357. In conclusion, the Tribunal determines that when the National Council at the meeting of October 19, 2005 granted 15 frequencies for an information broadcasting channel to Radio Era, and subsequently awarded 12 frequencies to Radio Kokhannya, such decisions violated the FET standard established by Art II.3 of the BIT.

C) The Tender of May 26, 2004 for an AM Frequency

358. In May 2004 Gala applied for an AM frequency for Kiev, together with two competitors (Odessa Legal Academy and Charity Public Fund Radio). In the National Council meeting on May 26, 2004, the two competitors received each four votes and Gala secured one vote. As no application was supported by the requisite five votes, the National Council cancelled this tender, convened a new tender and awarded the frequency to NART TV.
359. Gala has been broadcasting on FM frequencies, which are appropriate for a program based fundamentally on music. The AM frequency is not suitable for music programs but only for talk and information programs.

Claimant’s position

360. Claimant submits that with the AM frequency for which it was applying, Gala had intended to establish a new talk radio format<sup>130</sup>. Gala was the only qualified applicant in the May 26, 2004 tender, as its competitors lacked the necessary financial resources, radio experience and management capability. Notwithstanding Gala’s qualifications, in an arbitrary and discriminatory decision the National Council decided not to award the frequency to Claimant, to retender it and to issue to NART TV, a company which had the correct political connections.

Respondent's position

361. Respondent contests Gala's assertion that it was the only qualified applicant in the May 26, 2004 tender<sup>131</sup>. In Respondent's view, Gala's competitors did have adequate resources and capabilities and Gala's failure can be explained by the lack of experience in informational talk programs and the perception by Council members that Gala was a music channel, without an information broadcasting concept.

The Tribunal's position

362. The Tribunal has already established (see paragraph 271 above) that Mr. Lemire's expectations, when in 1995 he started his investments in the Ukrainian radio sector, were to create two channels, one in FM and the other in AM. The concepts for both programs would have been different: the FM channel would be based on music, the AM channel structured as a talk radio (because AM technically is not appropriate to broadcast music in a quality format).
363. In May 2006 the National Council put to tender an AM frequency in Kiev with 50 kW. This was an important tender, since AM frequencies are powerful and have an extensive range of coverage. Claimant has asserted<sup>132</sup> that the frequency to be awarded actually covered a radius of 800 to 1000 km around Kyiv, i.e. the entire Ukrainian territory. Whoever won the tender for this frequency would be able to create a talk radio network, and broadcast news and information to the entire nation.
364. It is undisputed that the only participants in the tender, in addition to Gala, were the Odessa Legal Academy (a University) and Charity Fund Radio. In its meeting of May 26, 2006 the National Council rejected all three applications. The reasons for the Tribunal's decision have never been made public. The only document in the file referring to the decision is the minutes (not the transcript) of the meeting of the National Council<sup>133</sup>. These minutes state only that the two other applicants received four votes each and Gala only one. There is no explanation of the decision, not even a summary of the presentations made by the applicants.
365. During the hearing Chairman Schevchenko was expressly asked about the reasons underlying the National Council's decision. His explanation was very vague<sup>134</sup>:

"But in this particular case, I must say that Gala Radio had fewer chances to become a winner of this contest because in many indicators was lagging behind the other contestants. Therefore the results of this voting is not accidental. I can explain to you my motives in voting this way, but it did not win this competition due to objective reasons".

366. In its Post-Hearing Memorial, Respondent justifies the National Council's decision by saying that the National Council was under the impression that Gala intended to broadcast music on the AM frequency, since Gala never presented to the National Council a different concept. As evidence of this assertion, Respondent only relies on a statement from Chairman Shevchenko. Claimant has submitted that it presented a talk radio proposal for the AM channel<sup>135</sup>. In the Tribunal's opinion, Claimant's position is more plausible. It makes no business sense to broadcast a music program through an AM channel, and it seems unlikely that Mr. Lemire, an experienced radio operator, would be proposing such a business plan. Unfortunately, with the evidence presented by Respondent in this procedure, it is impossible to ascertain what Mr. Lemire actually told the National Council with regard to his plans. Mr. Lemire had the opportunity to speak at the Council's meeting, but Respondent has only produced the minutes, not the transcripts of this meeting.
367. Summing up, the Tribunal accepts as proven that Gala proposed to create a radio channel with talk radio format, and that for reasons which have not been explained, the National Council decided not to award the frequency to Claimant.
368. There is a second important factual element: the National Council decided, in the same meeting in which it rejected Gala's bid, to retender the same frequency (and this decision was carried unanimously). Only four months thereafter, in September 2004, the new tender was announced. The frequency was awarded on December 21, 2004 to NART TV, through a tender in which Gala did not participate. Claimant has asserted, and has presented circumstantial evidence<sup>136</sup> proving that NART TV is associated with Mr. Tretwakov, the head of financial affairs in the campaign of President Yuschenko<sup>137</sup>. After obtaining the frequency, NART TV never used it. The National Council cancelled it and announced new tenders in 2007 and 2008, in which Gala did not participate.

Decision

369. The Tribunal must decide whether the National Council's decision in May 26, 2004, denying Gala the AM frequency in Kyiv, and then immediately thereafter retendering the frequency, and awarding it in December 2004 to NART TV, violates the FET standard, by constituting an arbitrary or discriminatory measure. After due consideration, and not without some hesitation, the Tribunal comes to the conclusion that there is a preponderance of evidence showing that the National Council's decisions indeed were arbitrary and discriminatory.
370. The decisions of the National Council in May/December 2004, to reject Claimant's application and award the frequency to NART TV, must be viewed together with the decision of October 2005, denying Gala's application for a FM channel, and granting it to Radio Era. Both decisions affected talk radio channels devoted to information. In both, Claimant was denied the licence, and in both the licence was awarded to radio companies which – in accordance with circumstantial evidence – are owned by or associated with persons closely connected with the Government. The Tribunal has already decided that the October 2005 decision, in which 15 FM frequencies were granted to Radio Era, violated the FET standard. The same consideration must be extended to the decision of the National Council affecting the AM frequency and adopted in the period May/December 2004.

371. The Saluka test requires that the National Council’s decision “manifestly violate[s] the requirements of consistency, transparency, even-handedness and non-discrimination”. The Tribunal finds that the National Council’s decisions to award the AM frequency to NART TV and to deny it to Gala, meets these requirements. In reaching this conclusion, the Tribunal relies on the following factors:

- Claimant’s expectation that it would be awarded an AM licence and that it would be granted the possibility of setting up a talk radio channel;
- the utter absence of any reasoning justifying why the National Council denied Claimant’s request to be awarded the AM frequency in the initial tender;
- the immediate decision of the National Council of retendering of the frequency, the announcement of the new tender four months thereafter and the subsequent issuance of the licence in favour of NART TV; and
- the total lack of official information regarding the ultimate ownership of NART TV.

372. The findings of the Tribunal are not affected by Claimant’s failure to participate in the second tender. In his deposition, Mr. Lemire explained that he had decided not to participate, because he deemed the effort futile<sup>138</sup>. The justification is reasonable. Given that Gala had been unsuccessful in the first tender, in which the other participants were weak and inexperienced operators, its chances of succeeding in the retender, in which a high profile company like NART TV participated, were likely nonexistent. The arbitrary and discriminatory nature of the Council’s decisions arises from the rejection of Claimant’s initial application, the immediate retender and the awarding of the channel to a politically influential applicant. Whether Claimant participated or not in the second tender is immaterial for the Tribunal’s decision.

D) The Tender of February 6, 2008 With 40% Ukrainian Language Requirement

373. The tender of February 6, 2008 had a singular characteristic: the frequencies to be awarded were subject to an additional language requirement, namely that 40% of the program had to be in the Ukrainian language (this being in addition to the 50% Ukrainian music requirement under the 2006 LTR).

Claimant's position

374. Claimant submits that Gala competed with Kiss FM radio (the station whose ultimate owner allegedly is Mr. Bagrayev) for a number of frequencies in this tender<sup>139</sup>. At that time, Gala was broadcasting 37% of its program in Ukrainian language and thus fell 3% short of the tender condition. (Additionally Gala was meeting a second requirement introduced by the 2006 amendment to the LTR: in more than 50% of the music broadcast, the author, the composer or the performer were Ukrainian). When in the February 6, 2008 meeting of the National Council Mr. Lemire tried to explain how Gala would reach compliance with the 40% tender condition, he was cut off by Council member Kurus with the words: "It's very straightforward, I must say. According to the tender requirements, you must have no less than 40 percent". Mr. Lemire was not allowed to give any further explanation.
375. During the same meeting, a member of the National Council Secretariat reported the corresponding figures of Kiss: share of songs in Ukrainian language 1%, share of music by Ukrainian authors and performers 11%. Nevertheless, Kiss received three frequencies in the February 6, 2008 tender, and Gala received none.
376. When National Council Chairman Shevchenko, in the December 8 – 12, 2008 hearings of the present case, was confronted with the transcript of the February 6, 2008 Council meeting, he explained that applicants were not required to comply before the tender with the 40% Ukrainian language condition, but that they had to demonstrate how they would meet this condition in the future ("what they had before the competition doesn't matter"). In Claimant's interpretation, Mr. Shevchenko, who voted for Kiss FM, has admitted that his decision was pre-determined before the National Council meeting discussed the case.

Respondent's position

377. Respondent, without refuting Claimant's allegations in detail, argues that Mr. Shevchenko's testimony as relied on by Claimant with respect to the February 8, 2008 tender "is of no probative value"<sup>140</sup>. In Respondent's view, Claimant confused Mr. Shevchenko by referring him to parts of the transcript relating to tenders other than those won by Kiss. Kiss FM had won the tender for the frequency 89.0 for Ternopil against 14 competitors, while Mr. Shevchenko had been referred to the discussions of the tenders for frequencies for Sumy and Ivano-Frankivsk. Notably the record of Kiss FM was reported in the context of Ivano-Frankivsk. As Mr. Shevchenko's testimony did not relate to the discussion of a tender won by Kiss FM, it cannot provide the basis for a comparison of the treatment of Kiss and Gala, respectively.

378. Respondent does not, however, explicitly refute Claimant's allegation that all tenders discussed in the February 8, 2008 meeting were equally subject to the 40% Ukrainian language condition.

The Tribunal's position

379. Since there are divergencies between the parties regarding the facts, it is important that, as a preliminary step, the Tribunal establish as precisely as possible what actually happened.

380. On February 6, 2008 the National Council met, in order to award a large number of frequencies. Mr. Kurus, a member of the National Council, has deposed during the hearing that every frequency to be issued during that meeting was subject to the requirement that at least 40% of its programming be broadcast in Ukrainian<sup>141</sup>.

381. An official transcript of the meeting, prepared by the National Council itself, and consequently of high probative value<sup>142</sup>, reveals the following incidents:

- Mr. Lemire was asked to speak during the tender for the frequencies in Sumy Oblast; although Gala had applied for a number of frequencies, the transcript shows that not all participants were invited to speak at each of the tenders; this tender was the only occasion when Mr. Lemire was authorized to speak; he explained that Gala Radio was complying with the 50% Ukrainian music requirement, and that the Ukrainian language percentage was 37%. He was interrupted by Mr. Kurus, a member of the National Council, who said: "It is very straight forward, I must say. According to the tender requirements you must have no less than 40%";
- during the tender for Ivano-Frankivsk – in which Gala, Kiss and many other radio stations participated – President Shevchenko requested Mr. Sokur, a civil servant from the National Council, to provide the relevant statistics for Kiss (the official name of which is Utar TV and Radio Broadcasting UC); his answer was the following: "We have statistics for Utar TV and Radio Broadcasting UC as a competitor. And the figures are the worst. The share of music by national authors and performers is only 11% and the share of songs in Ukrainian 1%";
- during the hearing, Chairman Shevchenko was cross examined with regard to this statement; he accepted that statistic prepared by National Council staff were correct<sup>143</sup> and that if it were proven that Kiss was only broadcasting 11% Ukrainian music, this would constitute a violation of the law<sup>144</sup>; as regards the 1% Ukrainian language content, his explanation was that the percentage before the tender was irrelevant,

<sup>141</sup> Mr. Kurus, Hearing Transcript 4, p 42, at 12; Mr. Shevchenko, when asked the same question, answered that there "could be different conditions for different frequencies" (Tr. 3, p. 138, 6); the Tribunal, after reviewing the transcript of the National Council meeting, coincides with Mr. Kurus' opinion, because references to the 40% requirement appear repeatedly when discussing various frequencies.

what was important was that the bidder had a good program concept, and in future could reach the 40% threshold<sup>145</sup>.

382. There has been some discussion among the parties regarding which radio company won which frequencies during the February 6, 2008 National Council meeting. It is undisputed that Kiss won the frequency for Ternopil with seven of the eight votes, because a copy of the official transcript clearly states so<sup>146</sup>. Claimant submits that Kiss won two additional tenders. Respondent has not provided clear evidence for this fact (because the transcript is not complete). It is undisputed that Gala was awarded no frequency.
383. At the core of Claimant's grievance is the unequal treatment of Gala and Kiss with respect to the Ukrainian language tender condition. This condition applied to all tenders – including the tender for Ternopil won by Kiss FM and all the tenders lost by Gala. But it was interpreted in a completely different way when applied to Gala as compared to Kiss. Respondent has tried to defend the National Council's record, stressing that the different interpretations were voiced in different tenders. The argument is unconvincing, because all tenders had the same basic requirement. And the fact remains that Kiss has been awarded (at least) a frequency, despite its nearly nil Ukrainian language record and its violation of the 50% Ukrainian music requirement (known to the National Council), while Gala has been disqualified on the basis of a much stronger record.
384. As noted before, a measure violates Article II.3 (b) of the BIT if it is either “discriminatory” or “arbitrary”. It is readily apparent from the record that Gala and Kiss were treated differently in a similar case (i.e. on the same issue in the same tender proceeding, although not necessarily for the same frequency) without justification and, worse, in violation of applicable tender conditions. According to Article 25.14 (a) of the LTR, in its tender decisions the National Council must prefer applicants “capable to fulfil the licence conditions to the best extent”. The Ukrainian language requirement was a highly relevant condition for all the tenders, and Gala's capability of fulfilling that condition was far superior to that of Kiss. While Kiss won at least a tender, Gala's record was pretextually discounted in order to exclude it from further consideration.
385. Although not every violation of domestic law necessarily translates into an arbitrary or discriminatory measure under international law and a violation of the FET standard, in the Tribunal's view a blatant disregard of applicable tender rules, distorting fair competition among tender participants, does. In conclusion, the Tribunal considers that when the National Council at its meeting of February 6, 2008 decided to award at least a frequency to Kiss, and to deny all applications submitted by Gala, such decision violated the FET standard required by Article II.3 of the BIT.

E) The Tender of November 20, 2002 in Which Claimant Was the Only Applicant

386. On November 20, 2002, the National Council denied Gala's application for a frequency for the city of Zhytomir, although Gala was the only applicant in this tender. The National Council's decision to reject Claimant's application for Zhytomir was not reasoned. Without providing further specifics, Claimant regards this decision as a violation of the FET standard<sup>147</sup>.

The Tribunal's position

387. Claimant is only alleging two circumstances in order to prove the arbitrary or discriminatory character of the National Council's decision to reject the Zhytomir application:

- that Gala was the only applicant; and
- that the decision was not reasoned.

Factual situation

388. Before analyzing these circumstances in more detail, it is important to stress that the factual situation asserted by Claimant with respect to this tender was quite different from that pleaded and decided in section C). In the case of the AM channel, what happened was that Claimant's application was denied, and immediately thereafter the same frequency was assigned to a competitor, who apparently enjoyed privileged political connections. In the Zhytomir decision there is no allegation that the channel was afterwards retendered and awarded to a third party, in circumstances which could represent a violation of applicable rules. Nor does Claimant make any other indication of impropriety with regard to the actions of the National Council.

389. The starting point of the Tribunal's analysis must be whether the Zhytomir decision violated Ukrainian Law. In accordance with the practice of the National Council, which conforms with the LNC (Article 26.4), every allocation of a broadcasting licence required the affirmative vote of a majority of members, i.e. five. The same rule applied for tenders with only one participant. The single applicant had to secure five supportive votes in order to win the tender; otherwise the frequency was not allocated at all.

390. The lack of reasoning does not by itself constitute a violation of the LTR. As has already been explained (see paragraph 303 above), the LTR only requires reasoning for the National Council's decisions not to allow a company to participate in a tender (Article 25.8) – but not for the decision to award or deny the frequency (Article 25.13).

391. Against these rules, Gala's position as the single applicant did not ipso iure entitle it to the Zhytomir frequency, but only to an unbiased consideration of the application in accordance with the statutory guidelines. The burden of proof that the decision was discriminatory or arbitrary (or otherwise violated the FET standard) lies with Claimant.

The National Council's decision

392. The National Council's decision denying Gala's application could never be considered discriminatory, because in this case no third party existed which benefited from it.
393. It could nevertheless be arbitrary.
394. After due consideration, the Tribunal rejects Claimant's assertion, for want of sufficient evidence. Under Ukrainian law, the National Council was entitled to deny a licence, even if the applicant was the only entity applying, and Ukrainian law does not require that decisions be reasoned. The Tribunal has already indicated that the absence of reasoning represents a significant weakness in the administrative procedure for the issuance of licences (see paragraph 312 above). But this weakness does not imply ipso iure that all unreasoned decisions of the National Council are arbitrary. For a decision to be considered arbitrary, an additional element of lack of probity must have been pleaded and proven. Claimant has not succeeded to do so in the case of the Zhytomir frequency, and consequently Claimant's challenge to the National Council's decision fails.

F) The Tender of October 19, 2005 in Favour of NMB Radio

395. On July 16, 2005 the National Council announced a tender for 29 frequencies grouped in a channel, which was to broadcast in Ukrainian only, with 100% Ukrainian language content. On October 19, 2005, NBM Radio was awarded this channel in a tender with 14 applicants, including Gala.

Claimant's position

396. According to Claimant, NBM Radio is owned by Mr. Poroshenko, a friend and political ally of the President. Claimant asserts<sup>148</sup> that the outcome of the tender was pre-determined and that the channel of 29 frequencies was specifically calculated for NBM Radio, as evidenced by the fact that NBM Radio was the only one of the 14 applicants for this channel that had no overlap in its coverage with the frequencies allocated for tender. Claimant has also produced minutes of a meeting in Gala on February 21, 2003 where Mr. Zhebrodki, a manager of the State Centre, allegedly stated that the State Centre had received applications for frequencies from NBM and had "to do something about it, since Mr. Poroshenko has become a National Security Advisor"<sup>149</sup>.

Respondent's position

397. Respondent pleads ignorance regarding Mr. Poroshenko's ownership of NBM Radio<sup>150</sup> and submits that some 15 companies had participated in the tender (rather than 14 as alleged by Claimant), that these applications were discussed in meetings of the National Council during October 19 – 26, 2005, and that Radio NBM was awarded the channel because it best promised compliance with a key tender condition. This condition was to broadcast in Ukrainian language only with a 100% "Ukrainian content". While Claimant in the hearing of the National Council had criticized this tender condition, NBM Radio had promised full compliance and referred to its already superior record in this respect.

The Tribunal's position

398. Claimant submits that the October 19, 2005 National Council decision awarding 29 frequencies in favour of NMB Radio was arbitrary and discriminatory; the evidence presented is the following:

- (i) NMB Radio is owned by Mr. Poroshenko, a close ally of the President;
- (ii) the channel was specifically calculated to fit with NMB's present coverage;
- (iii) a statement from Mr. Zhebrodki, Manager of the State Centre; and
- (iv) a threat of prosecution from the National Council against Mr. Lemire.

399. The Tribunal will analyse each piece of evidence separately.

Valuation of the evidence

400. (i): As regards the ownership of NMB Radio, the Tribunal has again been unable to ascertain the ultimate owner because all the members of the National Council have deposed that they lack this information<sup>151</sup>. The deposition is so implausible, that the Tribunal – in the absence of any convincing evidence to the contrary - is prepared to accept the circumstantial evidence presented by Claimant and assume that Mr. Pereshenko is indeed the owner of NMB Radio. But even if this is assumed, and also that he is an ally of the President of Ukraine, these circumstances give rise to some suspicion but, in the absence of any further evidence of political interference, fall short of indicating a manipulation of the tender process.
401. (ii) and (iii): Claimant further alleges that the channel of 29 frequencies had been specifically calculated for NBM Radio to enhance its national coverage. The only evidence submitted to prove this point is the statement from Mr. Zhebrodski (a manager of the State Centre)<sup>152</sup>. This statement was apparently made during a private meeting at Gala's premises held with certain

officers of the company, identified simply as “Natalie, Dima, Kid”. Neither Natalie, Dima nor Kid have appeared as witnesses in this arbitration or even submitted a witness statement. Then, after the meeting, some unidentified person prepared a transcript, translating what undoubtedly was spoken in Ukrainian into English. This two page English transcript is what has been presented, and there Mr. Zhebrodski is quoted as saying. “Right now we have applications from NMB and Channel 5 and we have to do something about it, since Poroshenko has become a National Security Advisor”<sup>153</sup>.

402. This evidence is weak. There is no certainty that Mr. Zhebrodski actually used these words, that they were correctly recorded and then correctly translated into English. But even if arguendo the quotation is accepted as true, Mr. Zhebrodski only indicates that the prominent position of Mr. Pereshenko (not necessarily his relationship with the President) added some sense of urgency for the State Centre to perform its duties (i.e. to calculate frequencies in the presence of applications); it did not necessarily imply any manipulation.
403. (iv): Finally, there is the alleged threat of prosecution by the National Council. What happened is that on September 15, 2005, Mr. Lemire sent a letter to the National Council, asking for a general suspension of tenders in view of allegations of corruption against the Ukrainian Government and also against the National Council<sup>154</sup>. As a reaction to this letter, on September 21, 2005, the National Council adopted a decision declaring Mr. Lemire’s allegations “groundless and far-fetched” and “consider[ing] them as the tool of exerting pressure on the National Council management”, and informing the public of the “blackmail efforts” undertaken<sup>155</sup>.
404. The documentary record does not evidence any threat of prosecution from the National Council. What seemed to have happened is that Claimant sent a strongly worded letter (to use an understatement) to the National Council, with copies to the President and the Prime Minister and to the American Ambassador, and that the National Council reacted with a decision, also drafted in strong terms, rejecting the accusations and describing Claimant’s behaviour as blackmail.
405. Summing up, the Tribunal considers that each piece of evidence submitted by Claimant, by itself, is not sufficient to support an allegation that the tender decision was arbitrary or discriminatory. The Tribunal has finally considered whether the evidence in the aggregate might establish conclusive evidence of a manipulation of the tender process, even if none of these circumstances did so by itself. Such a conclusion might be appropriate in the absence of a plausible explanation for the result of the tender decision. Thus, it is necessary that the Tribunal analyse the details of the National Council’s decision.

The decision to award the frequencies

406. The record of this arbitration includes the transcript of the meeting of the National Council on October 19, 2006, in which both Gala and NBM (among various others) made presentations to defend their applications<sup>156</sup>. NMB spoke first, explaining that NBM Radio had started 10 years ago, and that it was the first radio station that conducted and continued to conduct the broadcasting exclusively in Ukrainian<sup>157</sup>. Gala, who spoke afterwards, accepted that the tender “is an entirely different format, not the format of Gala radio Company<sup>158</sup>” and declared that it would comply with the requirements of the National Council “that all DJ’s must speak Ukrainian, there should be Ukrainian music, and thus shape and form Ukrainian culture”. Mr. Lemire finally added a phrase which could be understood to express some challenge to the National Council’s determination that the channel should be 100% Ukrainian: “We should allow the audience to determine what it wants and we think that since Ukraine is seeking the status of a country with a market-economy, it should not introduce Ukrainian culture by force – it needs to be developed<sup>159</sup>”.
407. The National Council had defined as a fundamental condition for the new channel that it be 100% in Ukrainian. This was a legitimate decision, based on a public interest choice to extend the use of Ukrainian in the media. When awarding licences, the first criterion which the National Council must take into consideration is whether the winner will be able to fulfil the conditions to the best extent (Article 25.14 (a) of the LTR). Applying this criterion to the present tender, it seems both plausible and legitimate that NMB’s and Gala’s different experience and attitude towards broadcasting 100% in Ukrainian, swayed the Council members’ votes in favour of Radio Era.
408. Against the satisfactory explanation of the tender decision, the four circumstances alleged by Claimant cannot be accepted as evidence of a manipulation of the tender process amounting to a violation of the FET standard defined in Article II.3 of the BIT.

G) The Award of Frequencies During the Time When the National Council Was Not Operative

409. The National Council became inoperative in March 1999, because its members were not appointed, and remained in this situation until June 2000<sup>160</sup>. Claimant submits that during this period, Respondent developed the practice of illegally awarding frequencies to companies other than Gala. The National Council then held its first tender on January 1, 2001, at which Claimant was not authorized to participate, and at which preferential treatment was given to the companies which had been illegally given licences during the National Council’s black out period.

The Tribunal's position

410. It is undisputed that between March 16, 1999 and June 9, 2000 the National Council did not function, because its members had not been appointed. After Parliament appointed its members on May 18, 2000 and the President made his appointment on June 9, 2000, a newly constituted National Council was able to resume its functions. It is also undisputed that on January 1, 2001 the first tender organized by the new National Council was held, and that Gala was not permitted to participate, because it was reserved for companies who had been affected by the National Council's black-out period.
411. There is an important dispute among the parties regarding the precise scope of companies which had access to this special tender.
412. Respondent submits that the tender was reserved to broadcasters whose licence had expired while the National Council was inoperative<sup>161</sup>. Claimant's explanation is totally different: during the interregnum Ukraine had developed the practice that the State Committee grant licences for radio broadcasting, in violation of the LTR, through a non-transparent and closed procedure that was not available to Claimant<sup>162</sup>. And the first tender was organized to legitimize these beneficiaries.
413. There is strong evidence that Claimant's explanation is the correct one.
414. First of all, the renewal of licences under the LTR does not require a tender (Article 24.9). Extension is a "right" of the licence holder, and the National Council can reject the application for extension only in very limited circumstances (Article 33.7). Respondent's explanation of what happened seems a legal impossibility, and is at any rate entirely implausible.
415. Secondly, there is a letter sent on September 28, 1999 by S. Aksenenko, a member of the National Council, to the Vice Prime Minister of Ukraine<sup>163</sup>, in which Mr. Aksenenko protests that other institutions of the executive branch are usurping the National Council's powers, taking advantage of the fact that it is not operative.
416. Finally, Mr. Lemire has presented the transcript of a meeting held on March 19, 2001 with Mr. Koholod, the then chairman of the National Council, who acknowledged that during the interregnum "some bad things [were] happening" and that the State Committee, and not the National Council, had been issuing the licences<sup>164</sup>.
417. The Tribunal concludes that during the period between March 16, 1999 and June 9, 2000, when the National Council was not operative, Respondent developed the practice that certain licences for radio broadcasting were issued directly by the executive branch of Government, without transparency or publicity and without meeting the requirements of or following the procedures established in the LTR. The de facto situation was then legalized through the first tender, convened by the National Council exclusively with this purpose. Claimant was excluded from this procedure.

418. In the opinion of the Tribunal, Respondent's above described practice constitutes a violation of the FET standard established in Article II.3 of the BIT, because it facilitates the secret awarding of licences, without transparency, with total disregard of the process of law and without any possibility of judicial review. The practice must be considered arbitrary, since it meets the Saluka test of "manifestly violat[ing] the requirements of consistency, transparency, even-handedness and non-discrimination"<sup>165</sup>. The lack of propriety is such that – as the test was articulated in Tecmed and Loewen - the practice also "shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of juridical propriety"<sup>166</sup>.

VII.3.5. CONCLUSIONS REGARDING THE AWARDING OF RADIO LICENCES

419. As a starting point the Tribunal has studied the administrative procedure defined in Ukrainian Law for the issuance of radio frequencies. The conclusion reached by the Tribunal is that the procedure was marred by significant shortcomings (although these have been ameliorated after the 2006 amendment to the LTR). These weaknesses facilitated arbitrary or discriminatory decision-taking by the National Council.
420. In six years Gala Radio, although it tried insistently, and presented more than 200 applications for all types of frequencies, was only able to secure a single licence (in a small village in rural Ukraine). Gala's main competitors were much more successful and each received between 38 and 56 frequencies. Although this macro-statistical analysis does not provide conclusive evidence that Respondent, when awarding radio licences, has been violating the FET standard, there are factors (the strikingly different success rates of Gala and of its competitors, the inexistence of any information regarding the real owners of the competing stations, the impossibility of verifying the reasons why Gala was rejected) which can be construed as indications that at least some of the decisions of the National Council when it awarded frequencies were arbitrary and/or discriminatory.
421. To confirm or reject these indications, the Tribunal then looked in detail at five tenders for radio frequencies and at the administrative practice for awarding licences in the interregnum while the National Council was not operative between 1999 and 2000. The Tribunal came to the conclusion that the following decisions did not meet the FET standard provided for in the BIT:

- the National Council's decision adopted on October 19, 2005 granting an FM information channel to Radio Era, and the subsequent decisions to award 12 frequencies to radio Kokannya;
- the National Council's decision of May 26, 2004 denying Gala Radio the licence for an AM channel, and the decision of December 21, 2004 granting such licence to NART TV;
- the National Council's decision of February 6, 2008 denying Gala's application and accepting the application of Kiss Radio;
- Respondent's practice of awarding radio licences while the National Council's was not operative between March 16, 1999 and June 9, 2000, and the National Council's decision of January 1, 2001 to legalize the licences illegally granted during the interregnum.

422. On the other hand, the Tribunal is unconvinced by Claimant's allegation that the National Council's decisions of November 20, 2002 and of October 19, 2005 represented a breach of the FET standard.

VII.3.6 POSTPONEMENT OF DECISION REGARDING DAMAGES

423. Claimant has presented extensive allegations regarding damages, and an expert report prepared by Goldmedia. Respondent has submitted a counter report prepared by EBS. Both experts deposed during the hearing.

424. In its Post-Hearing Memorial, Respondent has added<sup>167</sup> that the damage reports were prepared in the summer of 2008, that since then the economic basis has completely changed, and that the Ukrainian economy has shifted from a high growth rate to a sharp drop. There have also been significant changes in the parity of the UAH vis-à-vis the USD. Ukraine asserts that its economy "has been devastated by the worldwide economic crisis" and that it will shrink dramatically in the future. These changes in the overall economic climate, according to Ukraine have a significant impact on the DCF analysis presented by the experts.

425. The Tribunal agrees with Respondent that the changes suffered by the Ukrainian and the world economy since the dates when the expert reports were prepared, and its effects on the quantum of the damage, require further investigation. Furthermore, the assumptions underlying the experts' reports do not coincide with the conclusions reached by the Tribunal in this Decision, and the quantum evidence therefore requires recalibration in accordance with the present decision. Consequently, the question of the appropriate redress of the breach, including the quantification of the damages, will be addressed in a short second phase of this arbitration. After hearing the parties, the Tribunal will issue a Procedural Order for the continuation of the procedure.

VII.4. CLAIMANT’S SECOND ALLEGATION: THE CONTINUOUS HARASSMENT BY RESPONDENT AND THE REQUEST FOR MORAL DAMAGES

VII.4.1. CLAIMANT’S ALLEGATIONS

426. Claimant submits<sup>168</sup> that the National Council, in a concerted effort to force Claimant out of the radio industry, has:
- abusively monitored and inspected Gala from 2005 through 2008;
  - issued two warnings to Gala and threatened issuance of a third warning with the purpose of revoking Gala’s licence;
  - threatened Gala with non-renewal of its licence on the basis of the 2006 LTR disqualifying foreigners as “founders” of radio stations;
  - delayed the decision on the renewal of Gala’s licence with a view to imposing a tenfold licence fee under a newly enacted formula; and
  - allowed only an unrealistically short period for payment for an exorbitant licence fee.
427. Claimant adds that Gala was the first radio company which complied with the 50% Ukrainian music requirement, despite the negative effects on its ratings. This notwithstanding, in September 2005 the National Council inspected Gala and, as a result, issued a first warning on October 5, 2005. This warning was voided on April 4, 2006 by the Kyiv Economic Court, with the National Council’s appeal dismissed on September 26, 2006.
428. In October and November 2005, Gala was again repeatedly monitored and inspected, with a second warning (dated November 23, 2005) as a result. Due process defence against this warning was denied to Claimant. Upon Gala’s redress, the second warning was also voided by the Kyiv Economic Court and the National Council’s appeal against that decision was again dismissed on February 15, 2007.
429. In May/June 2006 Gala was monitored and inspected yet again; and on July 19, 2006, the National Council met to decide on a third warning. Under the new 2006 LTR, a third warning would have enabled the National Council to institute court proceedings for revoking Gala’s licence. Against this threat, the meeting was attended by five Gala executives, Gala’s local and international attorneys, and the First Secretary of the US Embassy in Ukraine. In view of this presence, the National Council shied away from issuing a third warning.
430. The two warnings and the threat of a third, terminal warning were based on frivolous grounds. Claimant refers to other radio stations which were rarely inspected and did not receive warnings despite graver violations.
431. Claimant further submits that the Chairman and other representatives of the National Council have repeatedly threatened to reject the renewal of Gala’s broadcasting licence, which expired on September 18, 2008. They referred to Claimant’s US citizenship and to Article 12(2) of the LTR, which prohibited the “foundation” of TV/radio stations by “foreign legal entities and physical persons”, although a similar prohibition already existed in the historic 1993 LTR. Besides the National Council representatives knew that Claimant had acquired his controlling share in Gala from the Ukrainian company Provisen and thus had not been Gala’s founder.

432. While Gala had applied for an extension of its licence on March 13, 2008, the National Council delayed its final decision until July 19, 2008. It then applied a new formula for calculating the licence fee, which had been adopted by the Council of Ministers just on July 9, 2008. To make matters worse, the new formula was applied wrongly to Gala’s detriment. As a result, Gala was invoiced a renewal fee of the equivalent of 1,039 million USD, more than ten times the fee that would have been due under the previous formula. Gala was allowed only 16 days for payment of this unexpectedly high fee. Other radio companies (e.g., HIT FM and Russkoye Radio owned by Mr. Bagrayev, a political ally of the President) had applied for a renewal of their licence later than Gala, but received the renewal before Gala, at a fee calculated under the previous formula.
433. On August 15, 2008, Claimant requested a Provisional Measure from the Tribunal, suspending ultimate payment of the renewal fee until the Final Award in this arbitration. On August 19, 2008, Respondent requested that Mr. Paulsson resign as an arbitrator in the present case, due to the involvement of his law firm in another case with Respondent as a party; this request and a subsequent official challenge by Respondent to Mr. Paulsson’s impartiality, delayed the Tribunal’s decision on the requested Provisional Measures.
434. The National Council finally reassessed the renewal fee to the amount expected by Claimant. This reassessment was prompted by an advice from the Ministry of Justice that the previous formula (rather than the new formula) was applicable to Gala’s renewal fee.
435. Claimant acknowledges that the harassment finally has not been successful, because the broadcasting licences have been extended with the payment of the correct fees, Gala has not been fined and the warnings have been quashed by the Ukrainian Courts. But Claimant submits that this does not provide Claimant with immunity from paying damages for the harassment and moral harm that Ukraine’s malicious acts have caused. Invoking the precedent of DLP v. Yemen<sup>169</sup>, Claimant requests that Respondent “be held to be liable to reparation for the injury suffered by Claimant, whether bodily, moral or material in nature”. Respondent’s harassment has inflicted significant moral harm, including anxiety, pain and suffering, for which Respondent should be held liable in the amount of three million USD.

VII.4.2. RESPONDENT'S ALLEGATIONS

436. Respondent denies<sup>170</sup> that the National Council had any intention, let alone concerted action strategy, to shut down Gala and force Claimant out of the radio industry in Ukraine. All monitoring, inspections and other actions advanced by Claimant were performed by the National Council in the exercise of its regulatory and supervisory responsibilities as per the parameters and guidance provided in applicable legislation.
437. Statistics refute Claimant's allegation that Gala had been targeted for excessive monitoring and inspections. During 2004 – 2008, the National Council ordered a total of 1438 inspections and issued a total of 288 warnings. The five inspections of and two warnings to Gala are not egregious. Other broadcasters similarly had experienced between three and six inspections; and five broadcasters had even received three warnings and presently face court proceedings for cancellation of their licences.
438. The procedures for monitoring and inspections are not inequitable, arbitrary or discriminatory, and are equally applied to all broadcasters under the jurisdiction of the National Council. As a matter of administrative routine, broadcasters are continuously monitored to check whether they comply with applicable legislation and with their licences. Monitoring is based on an evaluation of the programmes broadcast; it does not involve the companies and does not interrupt their business. Inspections are ordered by the National Council if monitoring reveals indications of violations; they are carried out at the premises of the radio station and last one business day at most. Inspection reports are immediately shared with the broadcasters concerned and submitted for decision to the National Council. If the inspection reveals violations of either applicable legislation or the terms of a broadcaster's licence, the National Council may impose sanctions. These range from warnings (lightest sanction) and monetary penalties to court proceedings and revocation of licence. Sanctions imposed can be appealed to Ukrainian Courts.
439. Gala was monitored in September 2005, together with several other broadcasters, in accordance with the normal administrative process. Since violations of applicable legislation were detected (with respect to Ukrainian language and advertising rules), the National Council by letter of September 27, 2005 informed Gala of its decision to conduct a first inspection on September 30, 2005. When the National Council experts tried to perform this inspection, Gala representatives denied them access to Gala's premises. The National Council thereupon issued a first warning on October 5, 2005 and, at the same time, decided to repeat the inspection within two weeks. On April 4, 2006 this first warning was quashed by the Kiyv Economic Court, on the ground that the National Council had failed to prove receipt by Gala of the Council's aforementioned letter of September 27, 2005.

440. Gala was inspected again on October 19, 2005. This inspection detected violations of broadcasting and advertising legislation, and of the terms of Gala's licence regarding children's and educational programs. On November 2, 2005 the National Council discussed the inspection results with Gala and gave it two weeks to cure the violations. After negative results of a subsequent monitoring, the National Council issued a second warning on November 23, 2005, requiring Gala to cure the violations within six months. This second warning was also quashed by the Kiev Economic Court, on the ground that it was based on an inspection prompted by the first warning, which had been voided previously by the Court.
441. On May 27, 2006, i.e. six months after the second warning, a monitoring revealed that Gala had not ceased in its violations. Thereupon, a third inspection was carried out on June 2, 2006. It confirmed continuing violations as per the monitoring report, but also noted that Gala had rectified its previous violations regarding broadcasting in Ukrainian language. In view of this improvement, the National Council abstained from issuing a third warning.
442. In 2008, Gala was inspected twice, in April as a routine matter in advance of the pending renewal of Gala's licence and on June 3 after monitoring detected a violation of Ukrainian election legislation. The April inspection was inconsequential, while the June inspection confirmed the violation. Nevertheless, the National Council, in its meeting on June 18 accepted Claimant's explanation that the violation was accidental, did not issue a warning but rather proceeded with the renewal of Gala's licence.
443. National Council representatives have never threatened to deny the renewal of Gala's licence due to Claimant's US citizenship.
444. The licence was renewed on July 19, 2008 in due time before its expiry on September 18, 2008. The processing time was required for clarification of outstanding issues.
445. The renewal fee had initially been calculated under the new formula on the National Council's understanding that the Cabinet decree had entered into force at the date of its receipt by the National Council on July 11, 2008. Since the renewal had been granted thereafter (July 16), the Council had applied the new formula in good faith. Nevertheless, the National Council had sought the guidance of the Cabinet of Ministers on the issue as early as August 11, 2008, i.e. before Claimant's request for Provisional Measures challenging the fee. The Cabinet had referred the matter to the Ministry of Justice, which on September 15, 2008 advised the National Council that the formula entered into force only with the publication of the decree in the Official Bulletin of Ukraine on July 18, 2008, i.e. after the renewal of Gala's licence on July 16. In light of this advice, the National Council promptly recalculated the fee under the previous formula, more advantageous to Claimant, and informed the Tribunal accordingly.

446. The challenge of Mr. Paulsson as an arbitrator in the present proceeding had been prompted by disagreements between Claimant and Respondent regarding implications of the issue for the status of the final award. It had nothing to do with Claimant's request for provisional measures and/or the calculation of the renewal fee.
447. The fact that the two warnings against Gala have been set aside by Ukrainian Courts shows, in Respondent's view, that the Ukrainian system provided adequate redress against administrative error, in compliance with the FET standard under the BIT.
448. Claimant had suffered no harm as a result of the National Council's actions wrongly described by Mr. Lemire as harassment. All inspections together have taken at most four business days over a four-year period. Claimant is still operating a profitable business – a fact which according to Respondent precludes any claim on the basis of "creeping expropriation" or violation of "full protection and security".

VII.4.3. THE TRIBUNAL'S DECISION

A) Introduction

449. Claimant's basic line of reasoning is that, behind the individual facts of this case, an overall aim appears: the Ukrainian authorities' desire to get rid of an annoying American investor, by systematically denying any application for further frequencies, thwarting plans to create new channels, and harassing him with irregular inspections and difficulties for the renewal of his licence.
450. Respondent has vehemently denied the accusation. Chairman Shevchenko has stated that the National Council never resorted to procedures aimed at any revocation of the Gala Radio licence and has not even contemplated such steps<sup>171</sup>.
451. The Tribunal has already come to the conclusion that Respondent's practice regarding the allocation of frequencies is not compatible with the FET standard defined in the BIT. As a consequence of the violation of the BIT Claimant is entitled to be indemnified for the economic damages he has suffered. As has already been stated (see paragraph 426 above), this issue will be addressed in a subsequent phase of this arbitration.
452. Claimant is now asking that the Tribunal decide whether the harassment which he allegedly suffered, entitles him to receive an additional indemnification, further to the economic loss, for the moral damage suffered. The harassment in itself cannot constitute additional violations of the BIT because, as Claimant himself acknowledges, in the end the inspections led to no sanctions and the licence was correctly extended. For this reason, Claimant restricts his prayer for relief to a request that the Tribunal indemnify Claimant for the moral harm he has suffered, caused by Respondent's continuing harassment.

453. In order to decide this claim, the Tribunal has to analyze the two separate issues submitted by Claimant, the inspection of Gala Radio (B) and the renewal of the licence (C), leading to the Tribunal's conclusions (D).

B) The Inspection of Gala Radio

454. The National Council is the supervisor and regulator of the TV and radio sector in Ukraine (Articles 13 and 14 of the LNC). As such, the Council has the power to monitor and inspect radio companies, including Gala Radio. The procedure of inspection is defined in Articles 70 to 75 of the LTR, and in an Instruction of the National Council, issued in 2003 and amended in subsequent years<sup>172</sup>. Monitoring is a process of recording and analyzing the broadcasting of a radio company, and is done directly by the National Council, without involvement of the radio station. An inspection is a more serious review, which requires access to the company's premises. Inspections can be scheduled – i.e. in accordance with a plan approved by the National Council – or unscheduled – i.e. motivated by some exceptional circumstance.

455. The results of an inspection are formalized in an inspection report; the affected company has access to the report, and is entitled to give explanations, to provide evidence and to file claims (Article 73.3 of the LTR). The inspection report, prepared by the National Council staff, is submitted to the National Council which has the right either to close the file without sanction, or to issue a warning, to impose a penalty or to appeal to a Court in order to revoke the licence (Article 72.6 of the LTR). The practice of the National Council is to listen during the meeting to an oral explanation of the representative of the radio company<sup>173</sup>.

456. It is undisputed that until 2005 Gala was never inspected. Since then, Gala has suffered five inspections, four of which were unscheduled<sup>174</sup>.

The first warning

457. The first inspection took place on September 28, 2005, and it has been described in detail in the report prepared by the inspectors<sup>175</sup>. The day before the inspection, the inspectors had sent a fax to Radio Gala, announcing their visit for the next day. When they arrived, a female employee told them that the management of the company was outside Kyiv, and would not return until October 17, 2005. The employee stated that she “was not authorized to provide any information or documents”.

458. A week later, on October 5, 2005 the National Council decided to issue a warning to Gala because the personnel of Gala Radio “prevented [National Council representatives] from carrying out their legitimate actions”<sup>176</sup>, by refusing to produce the documents and materials required for conducting the inspection. The decision was abusive, because the inspectors' report did not reflect any refusal to cooperate, only the absence of management, and because the advance notice had been unreasonably short. Besides, there is no evidence that Gala was heard before the decision was adopted, and the LTR does not typify the refusal to produce documents as a sanctionable wrong. Gala successfully challenged the warning before the Kyiv Economic Court, and it was set aside by this Court on April 11, 2006. The National Council appealed, the appeal was rejected on February 14, 2008.

The second warning

459. On October 14, 2005 the National Council informed Gala that an inspection would be performed on October 19, 2005. The inspection took place on this date, in the presence of Mr. Lemire, who refused to sign the inspection report<sup>177</sup>. The inspection report reflects the following:

- the language of programs is Ukrainian;
- the language of commercials is predominantly Ukrainian, although two commercials were in Russian, which represents a violation of the Law on Advertising;
- there is one instance where a commercial was not separated from other elements of the program, in violation of the Law on Advertising;
- the air time devoted to information programs, to educational programs and to children programs were significantly less than the figures mentioned in the licence.

460. On November 2, 2005 the National Council met, heard representatives of Gala, and decided to postpone their vote for two weeks<sup>178</sup>. On November 23, the National Council met again and issued a warning against Gala, for the reasons set forth in the inspectors' report. The warning was cancelled by the Kyiv Economic Court on February 15, 2007, because the Court considered the inspection illegal<sup>179</sup>.

The June 2006 inspection

461. With two warnings against Gala in the appeal Courts, on May 29, 2006 Chairman Shevchenko ordered the Control and Monitoring Department of the National Council to conduct a new inspection, which was carried out on June 2, 2006. Inspector Leliukh has declared that the inspection was conducted in a hostile environment, and that Mr. Lemire was accompanied by four lawyers and a representative of the American Embassy. The inspection report came to the following conclusions<sup>180</sup>:

- the advertising exceeded the 20% legal maximum per hour (i.e. 12 minutes maximum) in four hourly time periods: from 9 am to 10 am, by 18 seconds, from 12 pm to 1 pm, by 14 seconds, from 1 pm to 2 pm, by 3 seconds and from 5 pm to 6 pm by 12 seconds;
- Gala was basically complying with the licence conditions, it had broadcast 6.36 h. of cultural programs, when the licence required 3.50 h.; Gala had however failed to broadcast children's programs, as required by the licence;
- Gala was complying with the 50% Ukrainian music percentage;
- language is 100% Ukrainian, including advertisements;
- two advertisements were not clearly separated from the other elements of the program.

462. Claimant asserts that the inspection team, headed by Inspector Leliukh, included in its submission to the National Council a proposal that a third warning be issued. A third warning would have blocked the renewal process for the licence, which was then under discussion and might have triggered an action to revoke Claimant's licence (although this is not a must: the LTR does not require that a third warning triggers a procedure of licence revocation). Claimant was sufficiently worried about the prospect of a third warning and its consequences that he asked for the assistance of US Embassy officials and of his international lawyers at the meeting of July 19, 2006 to lobby against the issuance of the third warning.

463. Inspector Leliukh, asked by the Tribunal if he had recommended issuing a third warning, answered: "I do not remember whether or not I recommended a warning<sup>181</sup>". And under cross examination, asked whether the draft resolution would be in the record of the National Council, he stated that "as a rule a draft resolution is not maintained – resolutions themselves are archived, not draft resolutions<sup>182</sup>".

464. Although Inspector Leliukh does not remember, there is clear evidence in the file showing that a third warning was indeed proposed. Respondent has submitted the transcript of the July 19, 2006 session<sup>183</sup>, and there it is clearly stated that Shevchenko put the draft decision for issuing a warning to the vote. The decision received one vote in favour (from Chairman Shevchenko) and five members abstained, and consequently it was rejected. Immediately thereafter, a new decision was tabled and carried unanimously. This decision states that the National Council:

- takes knowledge of the report resulting from Gala's inspection;
- obligates the management of Gala to bring its activities in line with the licence, Deputy Chairman Kurus being in charge of control of this obligation; and
- informs the founders of Gala that in accordance with Article 12 of the LTR foreigners are prohibited from being the founders of radio stations.

465. The reference to the founding of Gala, and to Article 12 of the LTR, is especially troubling. In accordance with the records, which must have been available to the National Council, Gala Radio had not been founded by Mr. Lemire, but by Provisen, an Ukrainian company, and Claimant subsequently bought a controlling stake in the company. The prohibition of foreign foundership of radio stations was already included in Article 13 of the 1993 LTR, and was then taken over into Article 12 of the 2006 LTR. Consequently, it existed when the National Council authorized Mr. Lemire's purchase of the control in Gala.
466. The July 19, 2006 decision of the National Council "informs" the founders of Gala that foreigners are prohibited from being founders of radio stations. This statement is difficult to understand, because:
- it seems incongruous in a decision regarding the imposition of a sanction to Gala;
  - it is unnecessary, if it is just a reminder of a legal rule which had existed since 1993;
  - it is without purpose, because a company can never retroactively change its founders;
  - if it purports to be an anticipation of what the National Council would decide in the future (the licence will not be renewed, because Mr. Lemire is American), it is legally incorrect, because Mr. Lemire is not the founder and his investment had been duly authorized.

The 2008 inspections

467. In April 2008 Gala was subject to a further, scheduled inspection, which resulted in a conclusion that there was no irregularity.
468. Then, in June 3, 2008 an additional unscheduled inspection took place, which led to a decision of the National Council on June 18, 2008. What had happened was that on the day of the Municipal Elections, a candidate had spoken on Gala Radio, starting his words by saying "I will not promote myself ... I will not advertise either. All I wanted to say is that everyone has to come". Hereafter, he made a short presentation why citizens should vote in his favour. The inspection report prepared by the National Council inspection team stated that the broadcasting of these declarations violated the Ukrainian Election Law which requires that "campaigning" cease 24 hours before the vote<sup>184</sup>.

C) Renewal of the Licence

470. Gala Radio's licence was due for renewal on September 18, 2008. Claimant applied for renewal on March 13, 2008. The National Council reacted with a number of documentary requests, to which Gala duly responded<sup>187</sup>. The licence was eventually issued on July 16, 2008, on the last possible meeting of the National Council.
471. On July 25, 2008 Gala received an invoice for more than one million USD, which represented a 10 fold increase with regard to the renewal fee which would have been applicable in accordance with the guidelines approved in 1995. The new methodology for calculating had been approved by the National Council on November 22, 2006, but required a confirmation decision from the Cabinet of Ministers. On July 9, 2008 the Cabinet adopted the necessary decree, and the National Council at its meeting of July 16, 2008 declared that the new methodology would be used to calculate its fees – the same meeting which approved the extension of Gala's licence.
472. In Claimant's opinion, the National Council on purpose delayed the application process, in order to be able to charge the higher fee<sup>188</sup>. Claimant further alleges that Russkoie Radio and Hit FM – both allegedly owned by Mr. Bagrayev, National Council member until 2002 - applied for their renewal after Gala, but were awarded their licence on May 28, 2008, seven weeks before Gala<sup>189</sup>. This statement has not been denied by Respondent.
473. Claimant finally was only required to pay the lower, historic fee. The reason for this is that when the National Council issued the one million USD plus invoice, it failed to take into consideration, that on the date of Gala' renewal the decree had not yet been published in the Official Bulletin, and consequently it had not entered into force and could not be applied to the Gala licence renewal.
474. Claimant filed a request for interim measures in this arbitration, Ukraine eventually accepted Claimant's arguments and modified the licence renewal fee to the historic figure, which Claimant accepted and duly paid, desisting from the Request.

D) Decision of the Arbitral Tribunal

475. The Tribunal is in this case confronted with a request for moral damages, which Claimant allegedly has suffered as a consequence of harassment by the National Council. The moral damages – as alleged by Claimant – include anxiety, pain and suffering, and they are estimated at three million USD, a figure which is deemed "very conservative ... in light of the long duration, that it was all by accident, and we agree with this point, advising the company to take this fact into account as a warning" intensive and diverse harassment to which Respondent has subjected Claimant<sup>190</sup>”.

Moral damages in investment arbitrations

476. In most legal systems, damages which can be recovered by the aggrieved include not only the damnum emergens and lucrum cessans, but also moral damages. The Tribunal shares the conclusions reached in Desert Line Projects<sup>191</sup>:

“Even if investment treaties primarily aim at protecting property and economic values, they do not exclude, as such, that a party may, in exceptional circumstances, ask for compensation for moral damages”.

477. The circumstances in Desert Line Projects were very exceptional indeed. Claimant had been subject to physical duress and suffered a siege by the armed forces of Respondent.

478. Can moral damages be applied in the factual situation of this case in which Claimant is not making any allegation of physical duress?

479. Claimant in essence is submitting that the National Council incurred in systemic bias against Gala Radio. Not only did the National Council reject the 200 applications made by the radio station for new frequencies, jeopardizing Gala’s plans to expand its activities, but it also maliciously subjected Gala to a series of inspections, with the hidden agenda to close it down, and then in bad faith delayed the renewal of the licence, until a new regulation had come into force, which increased the renewal fee by 10.

480. Claimant’s accusations are very grave indeed.

481. The National Council is Radio Gala’s lawful supervisor and regulator, entrusted by Ukrainian law with authorizing, monitoring, inspecting and sanctioning TV and radio stations. Agencies with powers analogous to those of the National Council exist in most jurisdictions, because they have proven necessary in order to guarantee correct assignment of scarce frequencies, protection of rights of viewers and listeners and defence of liberty of information and plurality of opinions. Regulatory agencies, provided by law with wide powers to intervene, must act with absolute independence and impartiality. And regulated entities have an obligation to cooperate with their supervisor, to follow their supervisor’s instructions and to comply with applicable rules.

482. In all jurisdictions regulated entities are also required to respect and cooperate with their lawful regulatory agencies. Mr. Lemire’s behaviour vis-à-vis the National Council, and his extensive use of the Courts to obtain redress for his grievances and of the American Embassy to secure protection, may have looked rude and disrespectful to the Ukrainian authorities. But the personal behaviour of the regulated should never impair on the impartiality of the supervisor.

483. Another important aspect to bear in mind is whether the Ukrainian legal system affords an efficient system for appealing the regulator's decisions before a Court. That right also exists in Ukraine, and it has worked. The Courts have twice quashed (in first instance and then on appeal) illegal decisions of the National Council. And in the case of the renewal fees, the Ministry of Justice has sided with Claimant against the National Council.
484. The Tribunal has analyzed in detail the relationship between Gala Radio and the National Council and certain facts stand out:
- Gala was never inspected until 2005, and in the next three years it was the object of five inspections, of which four were unscheduled;
  - the first warning issued by the National Council against Gala was clearly abusive, and was correctly set aside by the Ukrainian Courts;
  - the second warning was issued for alleged infractions which to an impartial bystander look petty; this warning was again set aside by the Courts;
  - the draft resolution of the National Council proposed the issuance of a third warning, and Chairman Shevchenko voted in favour; the underlying inspection report showed that most of the infractions which led to the second warning had been cured, and only found some very minor infringements;
  - the third warning was rejected, but the National Council adopted a decision which seemed to imply that Mr. Lemire, as an American, was prohibited by law from being the rightful owner of Gala;
  - the facts which led to the 2008 inspection probably did not merit the commencement of an inspection procedure, since similar actions had been committed by other TV and radio stations, which were not inspected;
  - Gala's application for extension of its licence was delayed in comparison with other applications; it was approved in the same session when the National Council approved a 10 fold increase in the renewal fees.
485. If these facts are added to the National Council's rejection of all (bar one) of Gala's applications for new licences, the resulting overall picture is that Gala has received a one-sided treatment from its regulator. Gala's reaction, consisting in a vehement defence of its rights, presence of US Embassy officials, protest before the National Council and successive appeals to the Ukrainian Courts, seem to have exacerbated the National Council's stance.
486. Since the Tribunal has already decided that certain of Respondent's actions related to awarding radio frequencies are not compatible with the FET standard defined in the BIT, Claimant will in any case be entitled to an economic indemnification. Whether the facts of the case constitute "exceptional circumstances", which merit the awarding of moral damages, is a question which the Tribunal will decide in a future phase of this procedure when it may have the benefit of further insights, notably into context and causation.

VII.5. CLAIMANT'S THIRD ALLEGATION: THE VIOLATION OF THE FET STANDARD BY OTHER ACTIONS PERFORMED BY RESPONDENT

487. Claimant's main allegation is that the allocation of frequencies has given rise to a violation of the FET standard. In addition, Claimant submits an ancillary claim: that a number of other actions or omissions, which primarily constitute a breach of the Settlement Agreement, are also unfair, inequitable, arbitrary or discriminatory<sup>192</sup>. In Claimant's opinion these actions or omissions constitute not only a breach of the Settlement Agreement, but also a violation of the FET standard defined in the BIT.

488. The actions alleged by Claimant are the following:

- (i) the failure of the National Council to acknowledge its obligations under the Settlement Agreement<sup>193</sup> or to acknowledge the Settlement Agreement as legal or binding<sup>194</sup>;
- (ii) the State Centre's decision to allocate low powered and contested frequencies<sup>195</sup>; and
- (iii) Respondent's failure to correct interferences.

489. The Tribunal has already analysed whether these actions and omissions represented defaults under the Settlement Agreement, and come to the conclusion that they did not. It will now review, albeit rather summarily, whether these actions conceivably could imply an international law delinquency of Ukraine and a violation of the BIT.

First and second claim

490. (i) and (ii): Since the Tribunal has come to the conclusion that Respondent did not breach its obligations under the Settlement Agreement, and that frequencies allocated were appropriate (see paragraph 209 above), Claimant's allegation that the failure to acknowledge the Settlement Agreement or the allocation of frequencies could conceivably constitute an international wrong has no chance of succeeding.

491. Claimant's first and second claims are dismissed.

Failure to correct interferences

492. (iii): There is a final type of action or failure to act, which Claimant submits amounts to a violation of the FET standard, and which merits a more in-depth analysis. This is Respondent's alleged failure to correct the interferences on Gala 100 FM. Such failure would have related to interferences that occurred after the conclusion of the Settlement Agreement and would thus not have been affected by the Tribunal's decision that Respondent has performed its obligations under the Settlement Agreement.

493. Claimant's argument runs as follows<sup>196</sup>: Respondent, as the host state and as issuing authority and regulator of frequencies, has the duty to ensure that any investor can enjoy the normal operation and use of his investment. This includes – in Claimant's assertion - an obligation to provide a frequency that is free of interference, however caused, and an obligation to monitor and regulate other radio companies.
494. The Tribunal disagrees with Claimant's reasoning.
495. Interference occurs when other radio stations which are also broadcasting do not remain within the prescribed deviation level. The record shows that Claimant on seven occasions between 2000 and 2007 complained to the State Centre, protesting that Gala's signal was suffering interference. The complains were made in 2002, 2004, 2005, 2006 (2) and 2007 (2)<sup>197</sup>. The record shows that the State Centre reacted, at least trying to solve the problems. On August 17, 2004 the State Centre ordered two radio stations which were causing interference to cease doing so<sup>198</sup>. The State Centre monitored the 100 FM frequencies during the year 2007, and found no interference<sup>199</sup>. Finally, as Claimant acknowledges, after an extensive period of monitoring during the autumn 2008, the problem has now been – to use Claimant's words - "significantly reduced"<sup>200</sup>.
496. Claimant's allegation that Ukraine's conduct with regard to the interferences constitutes a violation of the BIT is bound to fail. The State Centre may have been performing the public service of monitoring and supervising radio frequencies with more or less diligence; the solution adopted in 2008 probably could have been anticipated; but even if Claimant's allegations were accepted to be true, they would never give rise to an international delinquency of Ukraine, nor amount to the violation of the FET and full protection standards defined in the BIT. Not every malfunctioning of a public service, suffered by a foreign investor, not every lack of diligence by a supervisory authority opens the door to a claim under the BIT. As has already been explained, the violation of the FET standard requires significantly more, namely that the actions of the State trespass a certain standard of propriety. The evidence does not support that in this instance the threshold has been surpassed.

VII.6. CLAIMANT'S FOURTH ALLEGATION: THE "UMBRELLA CLAUSE"

497. Article II.3 (c) of the BIT includes the so called Umbrella Clause:

“Each party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments”.

498. The Tribunal agrees with Claimant’s submission that Article II.3 (c) of the BIT brings the Settlement Agreement into the ambit of the BIT, so that any violation of the private law agreement becomes ipso iure a violation of the international law BIT. This, however, exhausts the effect of the Umbrella Clause; the Umbrella Clause has no impact on the meaning or scope of the Settlement Agreement. In other words, any violation of the Umbrella Clause presupposes a breach of the Settlement Agreement. Since the Arbitral Tribunal has already come to the conclusion that Respondent has not breached its obligations under the Settlement Agreement, the Umbrella Clause of the BIT is moot and Respondent cannot have violated the BIT on this footing.

VII.7. CLAIMANT’S FIFTH ALLEGATION: THE PROHIBITION OF LOCAL PURCHASE

A) Allegation of the Parties

499. Claimant’s final allegation<sup>201</sup> is that the 2006 LTR, by imposing a 50% Ukrainian music requirement, breaches Article II.6 of the BIT which does not allow the host state to “impose performance requirements as a condition ...” Claimant acknowledges that Respondent has tried to justify the legal imposition on public policy grounds. Yet, even assuming its validity, this argument can, in Claimant’s opinion, at best justify the breach, subject to the payment of the corresponding damages. And the damages sustained by Gala were significant, because its program concept is based 100% on hits. The high level of the local source requirement and its abrupt incorporation caused Claimant to lose advertising revenue, resulting in a damage of 958,000 USD.
500. Respondent disagrees<sup>202</sup>. A change in the host’s State’s regulatory framework does not equate with a breach of the BIT. The protection of the legitimate expectations must be balanced with the need to maintain a reasonable degree of regulatory flexibility on the part of the host State in order to respond to changing circumstances in the public interest. The imposition of a Ukrainian music requirement is neither abrupt, excessive nor unfair, and did not breach Claimant’s legitimate expectations.

B) Decision of the Tribunal

501. The facts of this allegation are rather straightforward. Article 9.1 of the 2006 LTR required that “... music produced in Ukraine shall constitute at least 50% of general broadcasting time of each ... radio organization”. This requirement applies to all broadcasters in Ukraine, not only to Gala Radio. “Music produced in Ukraine” includes any music where the author, the composer and/or the performer is Ukrainian.

502. The implementation of this new requirement was not immediate, but in steps. On July 21, 2006 the National Council and certain radio companies signed a memorandum<sup>203</sup>, which provided that the requirement would be implemented in stages from October 1, 2006 through February 1, 2007. Gala adhered to this memorandum in August 2006.
503. Gala's basic criticism<sup>204</sup> with regard to the new Ukrainian music requirement is that there are too few hits of Ukrainian music, and since its formula is 100% hits, it must continuously replay the same few Ukrainian hits. In Claimant's opinion, the 50% Ukrainian music requirement violates Article II.6 of the BIT, which provides as follows:
- “Neither party shall impose performance requirements as a condition of establishment, expansion or maintenance of investments, which require or enforce commitments to export goods produced, or which specify that goods and services must be purchased locally, or which impose any other similar requirements”.*
504. The Tribunal disagrees with Claimant's contention.
505. As a sovereign State, Ukraine has the inherent right to regulate its affairs and adopt laws in order to protect the common good of its people, as defined by its Parliament and Government. The prerogative extends to promulgating regulations which define the State's own cultural policy. The promotion of domestic music may validly reflect a State policy to preserve and strengthen cultural inheritance and national identity. The “high measure of deference that international law generally extends to the right of domestic authorities to regulate matters within their own borders”<sup>205</sup> is reinforced in cases when the purpose of the legislation affects deeply felt cultural or linguistic traits of the community.
506. The desire to protect national culture is not unique to Ukraine. France requires that French radio stations broadcast a minimum of 40% of French music<sup>206</sup>, Portugal has a 25 – 40% Portuguese music quota<sup>207</sup> and a number of other countries impose similar requirements<sup>208</sup>. The Tribunal in Plama reasoned that a rule cannot be said to be unfair, inadequate, inequitable or discriminatory, when it has been adopted by many countries around the world<sup>209</sup>. If one adds that the 50% Ukrainian music rule is applied to all broadcasters, the necessary conclusion is that it is compatible with the FET standard defined in the BIT.

507. But this conclusion is really obiter dicta, because Claimant challenges the 50% Ukrainian music requirement not as a violation of the FET standard, but rather as a breach of the local content rule contained in Article II.6 which prohibits “performance requirements ... which specify that goods or services must be purchased locally”. Is this rule applicable to a cultural restriction like the 50% Ukrainian music requirement?
508. The answer to this question requires that Article II.6 be interpreted “in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose” (Article 31.1. Vienna Convention)<sup>210</sup>.
509. The ordinary meaning of the terms used by a treaty provides the first criterion of interpretation. The BIT prohibits that local law specify that “goods or services ... must be purchased locally”. It can be argued that the LTR does not fall foul of this rule: the law does not specify that radio stations must purchase any goods or services locally, but rather that a certain percentage of the music broadcast should be authored, composed or produced by Ukrainian artists. The argument, however, is not decisive, because it might be reasoned de adverso that although the LTR does not prohibit radio stations from obtaining Ukrainian music from non-Ukrainian sources, de facto the market for Ukrainian-authored, -composed or -produced music is located in Ukraine.
510. The object and purpose of Article II.6 sheds more light on its correct interpretation. The object of the BIT is to “promote greater economic cooperation” between the Parties (Preamble II). And the purpose of Article II.6 is trade-related: to avoid that States impose local content requirements as a protection of local industries against competing imports. When in 2006 Ukraine amended the LTR, the underlying reasons were not to protect local industries and restrict imports, but rather to promote Ukraine’s cultural inheritance, a purpose which is compatible with Article II.6 of the BIT.
511. In conclusion, the Tribunal finds that Article 9.1 of the 2006 LTR, which requires that “[...] music produced in Ukraine shall constitute at least 50% of general broadcasting time of each ... radio organization” does not amount to a violation of the local content rule contained in Article II. 6 of the BIT which prohibits “performance requirements ... which specify that goods or services must be purchased locally”.

VII.8. OTHER ALLEGATIONS

512. In his Memorial, Claimant included alleged additional violations of the BIT, referring to affiliation agreements, trademarks and the expropriation of a beauty salon. This last claim has been specifically withdrawn, and the other two have not been addressed either at the hearing or in the Post-Hearing Memorial, and seem to have been tacitly dropped. To the extent that these claims may still be alive, the Tribunal finds that Respondent's conduct with regard to Gala's affiliation agreements or to its request for trademark protection does not amount to a violation of the BIT.

VIII. DECISION

513. In view of the foregoing reasons, the Tribunal unanimously as regards Sections I through VI, and by majority as regards some aspects and conclusions of Section VII, decides as follows:
1. to dismiss Respondent's objections to the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal;
  2. to declare that Respondent has not breached any obligations assumed in the Settlement Agreement;
  3. to declare that Respondent, in the manner in which it dealt with the award of radio frequencies as described in paragraph 422 of this Decision, breached Article II.3 of the BIT; and
  4. to dismiss all other claims regarding the merits submitted by Claimant.
514. The question of the appropriate redress of the breach, including questions of quantum, will be addressed in a second phase of this arbitration, for which the Tribunal retains jurisdiction. The Tribunal will issue a Procedural Order for the continuation of the procedure. The question of costs is reserved until the Award.

1. Introduction

1.1 Purpose, Application and Structure

This Procurement Manual (PM) serves as operational guidance for all staff members involved in any stage of the procurement process by describing procurement (and related) processes and procedures. The PM is expected to be applied with professional discretion and expertise by procurement practitioners and other offices involved in the acquisition and procurement process in accordance with the applicable regulations, rules and policies of the Organization. Regulations, rules and policies of the Organization that are applicable to the procurement process are set out in the various Secretary-General's bulletins (for example, the United Nations Financial Regulations and Rules and Secretary-General's bulletin on the delegation of authority in the administration of the Financial Regulations and Rules, including the applicable delegation of authority instrument, establishes the authority of staff members granted procurement delegation. In addition, various administrative instructions prescribe the instructions and procedures for the implementation of the Financial Regulations and Rules, the Staff Regulations and Rules, and Secretary-General's bulletins applicable to the procurement process. For the sake of clarity, nothing in this Manual shall bind the United Nations to any particular process, outcome or course of action in relation to any particular procurement process or otherwise.

The PM is divided into fifteen (15) chapters and follows the structure – with minor deviations – of the standardized table of contents for United Nations procurement manuals, as endorsed by the High-Level Committee Management, Procurement Network (HLCM-PN), with the purpose of harmonizing procurement practices and increasing collaboration among UN entities.

There are three overall sections:

- a. Chapters 1 to 3 cover, respectively: introduction, organization of procurement, and vendor registration and management.
- b. Chapters 4 to 13 cover the steps of the acquisition process.
- c. Chapter 14 covers cooperation topics and Chapter 15 addresses cross-cutting topics, such as the United Nations Global Compact, emergency procurement procedures, and risk management.

Each chapter ends with a resources section, which references relevant policies, guidance materials, and templates.

1.2 Update and Maintenance

The PM will be updated from time to time to ensure that it remains relevant to UN operations and up to date with best practices in public procurement.

Comments or suggestions for improvement should be directed to the Procurement Division (PD, Office of Supply Chain Management (OSCM)) at UNHQ via email at dos-pd@un.org.

1.3 Procurement Framework

Staff members are bound to comply with the Charter of the United Nations, the Staff Regulations and Rules, the Financial Regulations and Rules and all other relevant administrative issuances.

Requests for clarifications to any of the provisions of the PM shall be referred to the Director, PD.

This PM replaces and supersedes entirely all the previous versions of the Procurement Manual.

1.4 Procurement Principles and Client Centricity

As a steward of the funds entrusted to its care by the Member States, it is necessary for the UN to achieve Best Value for Money (BVM) in procuring goods, services, and works, according to mandates given to the UN by the General Assembly. It must do so, and be seen to be doing so, with fairness, integrity, and transparency. These principles are the foundation of UN procurement. Staff members are expected to comply with these procurement principles in performing their work with a high level of care and professionalism.

Financial Regulation 5.12 requires that the following general principles shall be given due consideration:

- a. Best Value for Money
- b. Fairness, integrity, and transparency
- c. Effective international competition
- d. The interest of the UN

In addition to the principles contained in Financial Regulation 5.12, Procurement Officials must also ensure that the procurement actions they undertake are taken in a manner that always strives to meet the needs of the client in the most efficient and effective manner possible. Accordingly, client orientation and the adoption of a client service approach are key principles that must guide how Procurement Officials conduct and organize their work daily (see section 1.4.5).

The following chapters provide an outline of each principle and the related expectations towards those involved in the procurement process and its principles.

1.4.1 Best Value for Money

'Best Value for Money' shall be understood as the optimization of the total cost of ownership and quality needed to meet the user's requirements, while taking into consideration potential risk factors and resources available. The Best Value for Money solution may not necessarily offer the lowest cost.

In order to obtain Best Value for Money, Requisitioners and Procurement Officials should:

- a. Plan for demand in a timely manner and define an acquisition strategy based on an analysis of the demand and supply market;
- b. Strive to maximize competition;
- c. Conduct the procurement exercise after good planning and pursuant to clear specifications;
- d. Carefully establish the evaluation criteria prior to the issuance of the solicitation document (in order to select the offer to meet needs in accordance with the evaluation parameters set forth in the solicitation documents);
- e. Ensure that all costs are considered within the total cost of ownership, including transportation costs, installation costs, operating costs, maintenance costs, disposal costs, etc.;
- f. Ensure that benefits are optimized, and financial and operational risks and any other adverse impacts are minimized;
- g. Ensure impartial and comprehensive evaluation of offers, in a timely manner and in accordance with the pre-established criteria;
- h. Ensure that the vendor whose offer is considered can satisfy the requirements.

1.4.2 Fairness, Integrity and Transparency

To achieve BVM, the procurement process must protect the Organization from proscribed practices and be conducted on the basis of clear and appropriate regulations, rules, and procedures that are applied consistently to all potential vendors. Further, the way the procurement process is undertaken must provide all internal and external stakeholders of the Organization with assurances that the process is fair and transparent, and that integrity has been maintained.

Application of the fairness principle means, among other things, that the UN must offer equal opportunities to all bidders by sharing the same information with all bidders at the same time and communicating the same contents on a specific procurement. In the context of public procurement, a fair process is free from favoritism, self-interest, or preference in judgment.

Integrity requires an Organization or individual to exhibit probity in their actions. Probity means having strong moral principles and honesty and decency in dealing with others. Integrity is reflected in truthfulness that is apparent in professional and personal undertakings and adherence to commonly accepted moral and ethical standards.

Transparency for the purpose of this Manual means that all information on procurement policies, procedures, opportunities, and processes is clearly defined, made public, and/or provided to all interested parties concurrently. A transparent system has clear mechanisms to ensure compliance with established rules (unbiased specifications, objective evaluation criteria, standard solicitation documents, equal information to all parties, the confidentiality of offers, etc.). Those mechanisms include records that are open, as appropriate, to inspection by auditors. Unsuccessful vendors for eligible bids can be briefed on the strengths and weaknesses of their own offers. Award information, as determined by the UN, is disclosed publicly. Transparency ensures that any deviations from fair and equal treatment are detected early in the process, making such deviations less likely and thus protecting the integrity of the process and the interests of the Organization.

1.4.3 Effective International Competition

By fostering effective international competition among vendors, the UN applies the principles of fairness, integrity, and transparency to achieve Best Value for Money.

- a. Adequate notification should be given to as geographically broad as possible vendor community to ensure that there is sufficient time to participate in the procurement processes;
- b. There should be no restriction of competition through over-specification (e.g. the inclusion of unjustified or unrealistic requirements in the specifications and/or Terms of Reference (TOR) or Statement of Work (SOW)) or under-specification (e.g. the omission of essential information in the specifications and/or TOR/SOW);
- c. Economies of scale (i.e., quantity/volume discounts, fewer resources invested, and reduced administrative costs) can be achieved when procurement volumes for identical or similar requirements are consolidated in a single solicitation.

For more details see section 6.2.1.

1.4.4 Best Interest of the United Nations

All procurement activities will be carried out in compliance with the applicable legislative framework. In this regard, the Financial Regulations and Rules (Financial Regulation 5.12) require that due consideration be given, among others, to the interest of the United Nations when exercising the procurement functions of the United Nations. The best interest of the United Nations shall be determined by the professional judgment of the appropriate official with the authority to make such a determination.

1.4.5 Client Centricity

At their core, all procurement activities serve to meet ongoing and future requirements of the United Nations. Accordingly, Procurement Officials must ensure that they always adopt a client service approach and maintain proper client orientation throughout the procurement process. While recognizing the procedures for proper segregation of duties and the need to maintain the confidentiality of information, Procurement officials must ensure that clients are informed of, and where necessary, involved in all key decisions as well outcomes thereof. In return, procurement Officials must ensure that they are fully informed of the client's needs and objectives and that they always foster close cooperative relationships. As a result, Procurement Officials empower the United Nation's supply chain to deliver what clients need, where they need it at the best possible price.

1.5 Ethical Standards

All procurement transactions must be conducted in a professional manner and in accordance with the highest ethical standards. When fraudulent and corrupt practices occur, the damage extends far beyond financial losses, posing serious threats to the Organization's credibility and to its ability to achieve its operational and programmatic objectives.

1.5.1 Standards of Conduct

Staff members must demonstrate the highest standards of efficiency, competence, and integrity. Integrity includes, but is not limited to, probity, impartiality, fairness, honesty, and truthfulness in all matters affecting their work and status. In accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, the Staff Rules and Regulations and the Standards of Conduct for the International Civil Service, staff members should refrain from any action which might adversely reflect on their status as international civil servants responsible only to the Organization or on the integrity, independence, and impartiality that are required by that status.

Each UN staff member must take an Oath of Office to the Organization, to "[...] solemnly declare and promise to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted [...] as an international civil servant of the United Nations, to discharge these functions and regulate conduct with the interests of the United Nations only in view, and not to seek or accept instructions in regard to the performance of duties from any Government or other source external to the Organization." Furthermore, staff members "[...] also solemnly declare and promise to respect the obligations [...] set out in the Staff Regulations and Rules."

All staff members must observe the highest ethical standards throughout the procurement process. The process must allow all bidders to compete on an equal and transparent basis. All staff members that are associated with the acquisition process are responsible for protecting the integrity and fairness of the process.

Procurement Officials must mitigate the risks of conflicts of interest, fraud, and corrupt practices at all stages of the acquisition process. To do so, they must implement measures to identify conflicts of interest, fraudulent and corrupt practices, and deploy appropriate responses to prevent these improprieties. All staff members whose principal duties involve the procurement of goods and services for the Organization are required to participate in the United Nations Financial Disclosure Programme. During the pre-solicitation phase, staff members involved in the acquisition process must not allow bidders access to specific, privileged information of a technical, financial, or other nature, before it is publicly available to the business community at large. In the preparation of solicitation documents, such as the SOW or TOR, staff members should not use restrictive specifications that may discourage competition. Staff members may not disclose proprietary and source selection information, directly or indirectly, to any individual who is not authorized to receive such information at any time prior to or after the selection and contracting process.

Proper standards of conduct must be enforced during emergency situations, where the pressure to achieve rapid results may increase the risks of actual or possible conflicts of interest, fraud, or corruption.

Further guidance on the ethical and professional obligations of UN staff members may be obtained from the following sources:

- a. Staff Rules & Regulations (ST/SGB/2018/1);
- b. Standards of Conduct;
- c. Status, Basic Rights and Duties of United Nations Staff Members (ST/SGB/2016/9);

1.5.2 Conflict of Interest

Staff Regulations 1.2(m) and 1.2(n) and Staff Rule 1.2(q) outline the duties of staff members regarding the management of actual or possible conflicts of interest. In order to avoid conflicts of interest, staff members who have a financial interest in a bidder are prohibited from involvement in any procurement process involving such bidder. Financial interest includes, but is not limited to, interest in a business consisting of any stock, stock option, or similar ownership interest, but excludes any interest solely by means of investment in a business through a mutual, pension, or other institutional investment fund over which the staff member does not exercise control. Financial interest also includes the receipt of, or the right or expectation to receive, any income in one or more of the following forms: consulting fees, honoraria, salary, allowance, forbearance, debt forgiveness, interest in real or personal property, dividends, royalties derived from the licensing of technology or other processes or products, rent, or capital gains, job offers to family members, etc. A staff member who is involved in his or her official capacity in any matter relating to a profit-making business or other concern in which s/he holds a financial interest, directly or indirectly, should disclose that interest to the Head of Office and have the conflict of interest resolved in the best interests of the Organization.

The staff member should either dispose of that financial interest or formally recuse himself/herself from the procurement matter which might give rise to the conflict of interest, in accordance with Staff Regulation 1.2(m) and Staff Rule 1.2(q).

Staff members with a personal or professional interest in a bidder are also prohibited from any involvement in the acquisition process. Personal or professional interests include, but are not limited to, affiliations with any organization or enterprise over which the staff member, alone or together with an immediate family member (i.e., employee's spouse or domestic partner, and dependent children), exercises a controlling interest. These interests may also involve any corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship, firm, franchise, association, organization, holding company, joint-stock company, receivership, business or real estate trust, or any other nongovernmental legal entity organized for-profit, non-profit, or charitable purposes. Interest may also involve any executive position or membership on the bidder's board regardless of compensation, or any position that includes responsibilities for a significant segment of the bidder's operation or management of a business.

Staff members involved in the acquisition process should promptly notify the Head of Office of any case where a conflict of interest may arise. They may also seek confidential advice from the Ethics Office. The Head of Office must review the facts and determine whether the staff member may perform any functions related to the solicitation. When in doubt, heads of office are advised to consult with the Ethics Office on any case where a conflict of interest may arise. To prevent a conflict of interest, vendors, contractors, and consultants are prohibited from bidding for procurement contracts if they, or their affiliates, provided consulting services for the preparation and implementation of a project.

Staff members should not be actively associated with the management of, or hold a financial interest in, any profit-making business or other concern if it were possible for the staff member or the profit-making business or other concern to benefit from such association or financial interest by reason of his or her UN position.

In accordance with Staff Rules 1.2(j) and 1.2(k) and ST/AI/2010/1 on Reporting, Retaining, and Disposing of Honours, Decorations, Favours, Gifts or Remuneration from Governmental and Non-governmental Sources, staff members must not accept any honour, decoration, favour, or gift from a Government. If the refusal of an unexpected honour, decoration, favour, or gift from a Government would cause embarrassment to the Organization, the staff member may receive it on behalf of the Organization and then report and entrust it to the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General will either retain it for the Organization or arrange for its disposal for the benefit of the Organization or for a charitable purpose.

UN staff members who perform any function in the acquisition process should not accept any form of hospitality; gifts; inducements, including bribes; or incentives such as free or discounted goods and private services. The UN operates a zero-tolerance policy in this regard.

Staff members must fully respond to requests for information from the Organization, including staff members and other officials of the Organization who are authorized to investigate the possible misuse of funds, waste or abuse.

Collusion between UN staff members or between UN personnel and vendors may influence UN personnel to restrict the list of vendors or otherwise manipulate the procurement process in order to obtain illegal financial rewards, including kickbacks or bribes. To mitigate these risks, UN personnel should not perform critical steps of the procurement process alone, including negotiating with vendors, attending bidders' conferences, or evaluating technical criteria.

When different vendors have the same owners or are otherwise associated, competition may not be meaningful or fair. Improper granting of 'sole vendor' status reduces competition. To promote genuine competition, it is important to ensure a large pool of competitive vendors and minimize exceptions to the requirement for competitive bidding or waiver cases, especially on a 'sole sourcing' basis. In many supply markets, there may be limited sources, which pose a risk to competition. In such cases, staff members should perform a thorough and carefully documented supply market analysis.

1.5.3 Ethical Behavior of Vendors

1.5.3.1 Ethical Behavior of Vendors and the Supplier Code of Conduct

The UN expects all vendors who wish to do business with the Organization to comply with the United Nations Supplier Code of Conduct, which reflects the core values outlined in the Charter of the United Nations. As such, an acknowledgment of the United Nations Supplier Code of Conduct is a requirement to register as a vendor in the United Nations Global Marketplace (UNGM). The United Nations Supplier Code of Conduct includes principles of the United Nations Global Compact on Labour, Human Rights, Environment and Ethical Conduct (see Chapter 15.1 The United Nations Global Compact), and sets the minimum requirements expected by vendors across their supply chain.

Vendors have the obligation to comply with the UN General Conditions of Contracts, which contain specific prohibitions on mines, child labour, sexual exploitation, and the fundamental rights of workers. The UN General Conditions of Contracts form an integral part of every contract between the UN and a vendor.

1.5.3.2 Proscribed Practices by Vendors and Vendor Sanctions

The UN strives to promote the public good in the area of peace and security. In spending public funds, the UN aims to meet the highest standards of integrity and competency and demands no less from those who wish to work with the UN.

The UN shall impose sanctions on vendors that have engaged or attempted to engage in proscribed practices, as set forth in Chapter 3.5 of this Procurement Manual.

1.5.3.3 Vendor Conflict of Interest

To avoid any distortion of competition and ensure a fair process, the UN requires that vendors participating in a procurement process shall not have a conflict of interest.

Vendors must disclose any actual or potential conflict of interest in their bid submissions, which renders them ineligible for that procurement process unless the conflict of interest is resolved in a manner acceptable to the UN. Failure to disclose any actual or potential conflict of interest may lead to the vendor being sanctioned.

2. Organization of Procurement

2.1 Overview of the Procurement Process

2.1.1 Definition of Procurement

Procurement is defined in Financial Regulation 5.12 as all actions necessary for the acquisition, by purchase or lease, of property, including products and real property, and of services, including works.

For the purpose of this PM, and unless specifically mentioned, the term 'procurement' is limited to the acquisition of goods, services, works, or real property via competitive bidding or through the exceptions outlined in Financial Rules 105.16 and 105.17, including but not limited to sole sourcing, standardization, cooperation (including Letters of Assist), use of administrative project or programme support services from UN entities outside of the UN Secretariat, and informal methods of solicitation. This PM also covers income-generating contracts, with income deriving from the sale of assets or other commercial arrangements such as PX and catering contracts.

2.1.2 Outline of the Procurement Process

Practitioners should note that the procurement process is part of the overall acquisition process, which in turn, is a key component of end-to-end supply chain management. The acquisition process refers to the steps necessary to acquire goods and services, inter alia, through identification and development of requirements, planning, budgeting, conducting solicitations, obtaining approvals, entering into contract negotiations, and carrying out contract fulfillment.

The acquisition process entails, amongst other elements:

- a. The gathering and analyzing of initial demand data;
- b. Acquisition planning;
- c. Design of specifications;
- d. The procurement action;
- e. Delivery/freight forwarding;
- f. Receipt & Inspection (R&I);
- g. Payment;
- h. Contract management and contract administration.

This document is designed to provide practical guidance and support on all aspects related to the acquisition process. This manual constitutes authoritative guidance on functions and elements for the procurement process and provides a summary overview of the associated steps that are part of the broader acquisition process. Other manuals and policy documents may be available, including as part of the Supply Chain Operational Guidance (SCOG). For those areas outside of the actual procurement process, such other guidance documents shall prevail over the guidance provided in this PM.

The provisions in this PM are to be considered and applied by procurement practitioners with professional expertise and discretion. The PM also provides guidance to Requisitioners, Tender Opening Committee (TOC) members, Vendor Review Committee/ electronic Special Approval Committee (e-SAC) members, and any other involved stakeholders.

2.1.3 Category Management

Category Management (CM) is a concept in which the range of goods and services an entity acquires is divided into groups of similar or related products called categories. It defines a systematic approach to managing those goods and services with a much greater understanding of client needs and those specific supply markets. The implementation of CM is a key pillar of the UN Secretariat's new integrated supply chain management (SCM) strategy and will deliver long-term value for the organization by making the acquisition and delivery of goods and services more effective, agile, cost-effective and by delivering innovative solutions for clients (e.g. takeback inclusion).

CM consists of three core elements:

- a. Segmentation of SCM operations into discrete categories of goods and services (e.g. Aviation, Medical, Ground Transport, etc.);
- b. A process of developing and implementing individual strategies tailored to a specific category (there is no one size fits all);
- c. Establishing multi-functional category teams to leverage the best market knowledge and technical and procurement expertise.

Category strategies typically include a tailored acquisition process and incorporate technology and innovation or waste-minimization considerations (e.g. improved packaging and production, take back schemes), as well as the most cost-effective delivery methods with solutions that deliver Best Value for Money, now and in the future. CM is an ongoing process involving continuous updates and reassessment of the supply market and the organization's needs. In order to succeed, category managers must:

- a. Have a clear view on spend categories and volumes;
- b. Engage in regular analysis of user needs and supply markets;
- c. Keep their focus on value creation to improve the total cost of ownership and consider quality, innovation, the safety of supply, and risk management;
- d. Adopt a proactive stance in the development of category strategies;
- e. Assign clear responsibilities and processes for category strategy development, implementation of such strategies, stakeholder involvement, and vendor management.

Category Managers will have responsibility for defining the relevant strategies for their categories, and these will be executed either centrally or locally, dependent upon the category. Effective category management is built on relevant multi-functional teams collaborating across the Organization as well as other United Nations entities.

2.2 Responsibilities of Organizational Units and Key Roles for the Procurement Process

The following are key organizational units and roles that relate to the procurement function of the UN Secretariat:

- a. Under-Secretary-General, Department of Operational Support (DOS);
- b. Assistant Secretary-General, OSCM;
- c. Director, PD;
- d. PD: Under the authority of its Director, PD shall be responsible for:
  - i. Overall strategic management of UN procurement activities;
  - ii. Articulating operational strategy, formulating guidance, and proposing innovative solutions for procurement, including the development of category management strategies and implementation of approved strategies, jointly with the technical experts such as Logistics Division (LD), Office of Information and Communications Technology (OICT), etc.;
  - iii. Managing procurement in a transparent, accountable, and efficient manner in order to execute the Organization's supply chain management strategy and support its mandates;

- iv. Establishing and maintaining instructions, procedures, processes, control mechanisms, and supporting guidance on procurement activities;
- v. Making the Procurement Manual, processes, and tools available to Procurement Officials at UNHQ and in other entities, analyze instances in which such guidance and processes have been disregarded or not properly implemented, and provide advice on any required changes;
- vi. Providing the necessary guidance so that Technical Experts, Category Managers, Requisitioners, and other stakeholders in the procurement process act consistently with the procurement framework outlined in Chapter 1.3;
- vii. Enabling the operationalization and managerial oversight of the UN's procurement activities through appropriate systems and reports;
- viii. Supporting the identification and development of opportunities for the provision of procurement services for clients and other UN organizations, and ensure appropriate modalities for service delivery;
- ix. Strengthening the knowledge, skills, and career development of procurement practitioners, including identifying mandatory training and setting standards for internal and external certification;
- x. Providing clearance for personnel at UNHQ and for all procurement officers in other UN Secretariat entities prior to recruitment in order to facilitate recruitment and to create a roster of procurement profiles;
- xi. Establishing and maintaining proper entry points and mechanisms to address complaints from or against vendors.
- e. Procurement Official: see a detailed description of responsibilities under Chapter 2.3 Procurement Official below;
- f. Requisitioner: see a detailed description of responsibilities under Chapter 2.4 Requisitioner below.

In addition to the above, the following functions and roles are important in conducting, reviewing, and/or evaluating the proper conduct of acquisitions and procurement processes:

Review Committees on Contracts: Further to Financial Rule 105.13 (b), the Under-Secretary-General for the Department of Management Strategy, Policy and Compliance (DMSPC) has established review committees, at Headquarters and other locations, to render written advice on procurement actions leading to the award or amendment of procurement contracts, including agreements or other written instruments that involve income to the United Nations. The composition and the terms of reference of such review committees are defined in ST/AI/2011/8<sup>1</sup>. Refer to Chapter 9 for further details, including the scope of review and monetary thresholds.

DMSPC/Business Transformation and Accountability Division (BTAD), Monitoring and Evaluation Service (MES) is responsible for managing delegations of authority to heads of entity, monitoring the exercise of delegated authorities under the Staff Regulations and Rules and the Financial Regulations and Rules, reporting on organizational performance and developing self-evaluation tools for use across the UN Secretariat. MES formulates or reviews proposals for policy enhancements to meet organizational needs and provides advice to heads of entity in order to support them in discharging their delegated authorities correctly. MES works in close collaboration with relevant stakeholders to ensure that policies are aligned with the operational aspects and support delivery in the area of procurement.

DOS, Enabling and Outreach Service (EOS) in OSCM: this Service includes several functions which are critical to support the end-to-end supply chain management process, including elements of the procurement process, such as vendor registration, outreach, operational reporting, performance management, and the tender opening function.

Vendor Review Committee (see Chapter 3.3).

Award Review Board (see Chapter 10.2.3).

2.3 Procurement Official

Procurement activities can only be undertaken by Procurement Officials, as the staff members responsible for the procurement process. The dedicated procurement of goods and services is carried out by professional staff with proper training, knowledge, and experience, or by administrative staff with the appropriate procurement expertise, training, and qualifications if approved by the ASG, OSCM. Only the relevant classified job descriptions should be utilized to recruit procurement officials, unless otherwise approved by the ASG, OSCM in advance.

The Procurement Official, in conjunction with the Requisitioner, is also responsible for ensuring that the category management process is carried out in a manner that achieves economies of scale, innovative approaches to meeting client needs from a supply market perspective, consolidation of requirements where possible, and segregation of duties (see Chapter 2.9).

The responsibilities of a Procurement Official in a procurement process are the following:

- a. Defining solicitation strategies in collaboration with the Requisitioner, upon review of the acquisition plan and in alignment with the respective category management strategy;
- b. Reviewing the requirements and evaluation criteria and ensuring that they are appropriate from a procurement perspective;
- c. Leading the sourcing process and conducting supply market analysis, including issuing Requests for Expression of Interest (REOI);
- d. Developing pricing structures and commercial evaluation models that allow for transparency in costs and effective competition;
- e. Preparing solicitation documents, as well as facilitating and managing the solicitation process;
- f. Reviewing the technical evaluation to ensure that it was conducted in accordance with the pre-established technical evaluation criteria and that the narrative of the report corresponds with the matrix and the scoring/rating;
- g. Carrying out the commercial evaluation of bids as per pre-defined evaluation criteria;
- h. Preparing the recommendation for an award and submitting the case to the committee on contracts, if applicable;
- i. Preparing and issuing contracts and purchase orders;
- j. Requesting and ensuring the safeguarding and return of any performance securities, as applicable;
- k. Performing contract administration duties in coordination with the Requisitioner and staff responsible for contract management, as applicable, in support of the Requisitioner;
- l. Performing contract closeout activities.

To be considered “qualified” in the context of this delegation instrument, completion of relevant procurement training is required (<https://procuretrainingcampus.dfs.un.org/login/index.php>), in addition to meeting requirements in the relevant classified job descriptions. As of 1 January 2021, all Procurement Officials (excluding the Director/Chief of Mission Support/Administration or equivalent) must be professionally certified by an internationally recognized procurement certification authority (such as CIPS Level 4 or equivalent) to the required level, as authorized by the Under-Secretary-General for Operational Support.

2.4 Requisitioner

A Requisitioner is an individual who initiates a request for a requisition/shopping cart in UMOJA, the UN's Enterprise Resource Planning (ERP) system, i.e., a request for goods and/or services. A Requisitioner has primary responsibility for capturing demand data, consolidating needs from end-users and stakeholders, defining generic and clear specifications, and managing resources.

Within the category management framework, a Requisitioner may hold the role of the Category Manager. Please refer to Chapter 2.1.3.

Responsibilities of a Requisitioner in the procurement process (some of these can be delegated to other personnel) are as follows:

- a. Preparing the demand plan, ensuring that proposed expenditures are in accordance with the mandate of the relevant entity, and ensuring that sufficient time is available to undertake a procurement exercise;
- b. Drafting the requirements in the form of specifications, SOWs, or TORs, as well as associated technical evaluation criteria;
- c. Raising and approving shopping carts in UMOJA, unless this is being undertaken by the Acquisition Management function in certain entities;
- d. Ensuring that sufficient funds are available for the requirement. The Requisitioner is responsible for securing specific funding allocated only to the applicable procurement, both at the time of contract award and during the entire life of the contract;
- e. Conducting technical evaluations of Submissions received if appointed to the technical evaluation committee;
- f. Accepting goods and/or services delivered by vendors, and creating Receiving and Inspection reports in UMOJA;
- g. Leading contract management duties including vendor performance evaluation, where appropriate, in coordination with the end-user, if applicable.

All Requisitioners must complete the mandatory UMOJA training courses designed for this role and are strongly encouraged to complete the following courses in the UN Procurement Training Campus before assuming responsibilities in the acquisition process (available at <https://procuretrainingcampus.dfs.un.org/login/index.php>):

- a. Fundamentals of Procurement
- b. Best Value for Money
- c. Ethics & Integrity in Procurement
- d. Acquisition Planning and Contract Management

2.5 Procurement Approving Authority

A Procurement Official who has been formally issued a delegation of authority for procurement (DOA) will be referred to as a Procurement Approving Authority, up to the threshold of delegated procurement authority applicable to their grade, level, or position. Procurement Approving Authorities must exercise their duties and responsibilities under their designated Delegation of

IMPORTANT NOTE

Under no circumstances shall requirements be split (or contract terms be reduced) to circumvent the procurement or review process. If an overall requirement amount exceeds delegated authorities, the requirement shall be submitted for procurement action through the established procedures and appropriate review process.

Authority (DOA) with the utmost care, efficiency, impartiality, and integrity. They are responsible for:

- a. Approving procurement activities within their designated DOA level (noting that the approving authority in UMOJA may be unlimited for certain senior procurement officers as stipulated in the “Document Processing and Approval Matrix” included in the delegation instrument);
- b. Ensuring, prior to any commitment being made, that the procurement activity strictly complies with the UN Procurement Framework documents as outlined in Chapter 1.3;
- c. Providing reports in accordance with their DOA and as stipulated in this Procurement Manual.

2.6 Procurement Authority

2.6.1 Delegation of Authority

The delegation framework effective 1 January 2019 provides an enhanced level of flexibility to support client mandates. Delegations were issued directly by the Secretary-General to heads of entity, on the basis of guidance from the DMSPC, in consultation with the DOS.

The Secretary-General has delegated to Heads of Entity and other appropriate officials the procurement authority allowing them to perform procurement functions (referred to as Authorized Officials). The responsibilities of an Authorized Official in a procurement process include, but are not limited to, approving or rejecting recommendations of a Review Committee, where applicable, putting in place measures to identify fraudulent and corrupt practices, and deploying appropriate responses to prevent these improprieties.

2.6.2 Exercise of DOA

Delegation for non-Strategic Goods and Services is unlimited for formal methods of solicitations under Financial Rule 105.15. However, it is contingent upon the entity having adequate procurement capacity.

The Director, PD, must technically clear Procurement Officers prior to selection.

RESOURCES

Annex 1—Document Processing and Approval Matrix (Annex B)

2.6.3 Procuring Agent

If adequate procurement capacity and infrastructure, as detailed above, does not exist in the entity, another UN Secretariat entity may be assigned by the USG, DOS in consultation with USG, DMSPC and the head of entity, to undertake procurement on the entity's behalf.

In this case, the sub-delegation of procurement authority to the tasked entity (Procuring Agent) is not required. The Procuring Agent shall undertake the procurement activity, and the resulting Review Committee Minutes shall be submitted for review/approval of the Authorized Official in the Procuring Agent.

2.6.4 Local Procurement Authority (LPA)

Under the new DOA framework, certain goods and/or services have been classified as strategic (Strategic Goods and Services Matrix). The Strategic Goods and Services fall into one of the two following categories:

1. Goods and/or services that fall, for reasons such as safety and security, within the scope of a center-led approach (e.g., aviation, ammunition, counter rocket and artillery radars, information, surveillance and reconnaissance systems, food rations or body armor etc.) and for which the authority to undertake procurement is retained by the Department of Operational Support for requirements of any amount (above the threshold for Low Value Acquisitions).
2. Goods and/or services needed by a broad range of clients to meet commonly required, high volume needs, which lend themselves to center-led procurement for reasons of economies of scale, standardization or other reasons, and that are usually available under Long Term Agreements. These goods and/or services can be procured by any UN Secretariat entity up to the threshold stated in the Strategic Goods and Services Matrix. Product and process economic considerations are advised to be applied when purchasing outside of such Long Terms Agreements, which is a decision that is at the sole discretion of each entity, to obtain the best value for the Organization. To arrive at a completely transparent cost comparison, factors to consider include the price of the good or service, installation, maintenance and freight costs, as well as internal administrative costs associated with the acquisition process, from development of requirements to contract management. Over the threshold stated in the Strategic Goods and Services Matrix , the authority to undertake procurement for this type of goods and/or services is retained by the Department of Operational Support.

The Strategic Goods and Services Matrix also provides guidance for those Information and Communication Technology goods and/or services included in such Matrix that require technical clearance from OICT prior to the commencement of any procurement action by a UN Secretariat entity.

The Strategic Goods and Services Matrix may be revised from time to time.

All entities are free to undertake procurement for goods and/or services which are either below the thresholds of the goods and/or services listed in the Strategic Goods and Services Matrix and for any goods and/or services not included in the Strategic Goods and Services Matrix. Local Procurement Authority is only required in cases where entities wish to pursue local procurement of goods and/or services classified as strategic in accordance to the paragraphs above.

The single most important factor in eliminating ad-hoc LPA requests is the active participation by each entity into Organization-wide planning. The planning process needs to be a deeply collaborative exercise resulting in a jointly agreed upon sourcing plan, which eliminates the need for LPA once a sourcing option has been identified as local procurement for the duration of the planning/budget cycle. Entities should aim to identify their requirements in a timely fashion and include them in their Annual Supply Chain Plan in order to minimize ad-hoc LPA requests. The Annual Global Supply Chain Acquisition Plan as authorized by the ASG OSCM is valid for the relevant annual planning cycle.

LPAs can also be requested at the time an ad-hoc requirement emerges as described below.

Actions to be taken by the requesting entity: The requesting entity is accountable to self-certify the justification for the request and to provide the necessary background documentation. Entities must ensure that the information contained in the self-certification is accurate. The self-certification of the requesting entity must be submitted electronically in Unite Self Service using catalogue item "Request for Local Procurement Authority (LPA) - Ad-hoc Request" which is available under Client Service Centre, Source to Acquire, Procurement and include at a minimum

- a. The rationale for requesting an LPA (an explanation of the requirements/circumstances that make the strategic good or the service - if it is available in existing local inventory, existing commercial contracts and/or through noncommercial contracts -unsuitable);
- b. The estimated total cost of the potential award (in US$);
- c. Anticipated duration of the contract, if applicable;
- d. Confirmation of funds availability;
- e. Detailed definition of the requirement (SOR/SOW, technical requirement, technical evaluation criteria, design drawings, etc.) compliant with established, relevant UN (technical) standards and policies;
- f. Confirmation of technical capacity relevant to the strategic category within the requesting office to carry out the procurement process;
- g. Confirmation of availability of (or access to) procurement capacity and infrastructure, including the following: Bid receiving and safeguarding; Tender Opening Committee; Local Committee on Contracts; At least two fully dedicated, trained and qualified United Nations Procurement Officials of which one staff shall be a Procurement Officer or a United Nations official as otherwise cleared to conduct procurement functions at the appropriate level for the potential award;
- h. Identification of the envisaged financial rule for the resulting award. In case of exceptions to the use of formal methods of solicitation, the justification for such exception;
- i. Confirmation that the entity has not been in receipt of audit reports with rating "unsatisfactory" in the last three (3) years.

The requesting entity must attach to the following documents to their Request for LPA in Unite Self Service:

- a. Annex A -Scope of Requirements (SOR/SOW), Technical Evaluation Criteria, design drawings, etc. compliant with established technical standards and policies;
- b. Annex B -Cost Breakdown.

Actions to be taken by UNGSC:

Upon receipt of the ad-hoc request for LPA, UNGSC will conduct an initial review of the submission. This review will include the following:

- a. Confirm that LPA is required. If the requirement does not require LPA, the client entity will be informed accordingly and the RFS and associated work orders will be closed, indicating the reason for closure within one working day. UNGSC shall inform PD electronically;
- b. Confirm that submission, including the above mentioned supporting self-certified information, is complete. If the submission is not complete, the requesting entity will be informed accordingly and the RFS and associated work orders will be closed, indicating the reason for closure within one working day. UNGSC shall inform PD electronically;
- c. Verify that alternative sourcing options of the requirements have been fully explored, including global surplus and stocks reserve, where feasible to fulfil the requirement.

Based on this check:

- (i) If it is determined that the requirement cannot be met from global surplus and stocks reserves, UNGSC shall inform PD electronically by closing the work order assigned to UNGSC within one working day.
- (ii) if it is determined that the requirement(s) can be met from global surplus and stocks reserve, UNGSC shall inform electronically within one working day, the requesting entity of the available options. The client entity shall respond within three working days.
  - If the offered solution is accepted, UNGSC shall inform the technical offices, PD and the client entity of the outcome of the review and close the RFS and associated work orders. The client entity will update their annual supply chain plan;
  - If the requesting entity confirms that the LPA is still the preferred option, UNGSC will complete the review and submit its recommendation (concurrence or non-approval) to PD electronically by closing the work order assigned to UNGSC with a brief explanation within one working day of the receipt of the entity's response;
  - In the absence of a response from the requesting entity, the RFS and associated work orders will be closed, indicating the reason for the closure.

In addition, UNGSC will provide assistance to the requesting entity, also in case of non-approval, and monitor the implementation of the LPA within the context of the Integrated Business Planning (IBP).

Actions to be taken by PD: Upon receipt of UNGSC's concurrence to the request for LPA, PD will:

- a. Analyze if the requirement can be met through any other sourcing options (in addition to the ones analyzed by UNGSC), including ways of potentially meeting the requirement through the category management approach, cooperation between United Nations system entities as well as other sourcing capacities available in the Secretariat;
- b. Benchmark the cost reasonableness of the requested amount for the desired goods and services; and,
- c. Undertake a risk assessment, if warranted/indicated, including areas such as audit ratings and observations, the basis for the request as well as for the exception to competition, capacity in terms of the number of formal solicitations handled by the perspective case officer, DMSPC inputs, etc.

Upon conclusion of the review, and no later than 2 working days upon receipt of the UNGSC concurrence, Director, PD (or another Procurement Official authorized by Director, PD to perform this task) will inform all parties of her/his decision to grant or reject the request for LPA. In case the LPA is granted, its validity for other requirements for the same nature will extend to the end of the planning cycle. Should the LPA not be approved, the client entity and PD will work together on how to best meet the requirement.

Actions to be taken by the expert technical office: Upon approval of an LPA, expert technical offices will provide initial technical advice to the client entity within two (2) working days of the issuance of the LPA. In the case of highly complex requirements, technical offices may request a longer time for providing technical advice. Such expert technical offices may be in Headquarters or away from Headquarters, in accordance to the corresponding category management strategy. The client entity will be informed by technical offices in advance on exactly how many days are requested and the reason why.

For cases under F.R. 105.16 (a) (vii) Exigency (as defined in General Assembly decision 54/468, “an exceptional compelling and emergent need, not resulting from poor planning or management or from concerns over the availability of funds, that will lead to serious damage, loss or injury to property or persons if not addressed immediately”), LPA is not required for Strategic Goods and Services

Entities have unlimited authority to place call off orders against systems contracts established by the UN Secretariat regardless of the nature of the requirement.

Authority to enter into cooperation with a Government, non-Governmental organization or other non-UN public international organizations for the provision of goods and services under FR 105.17 (b) is retained by DOS.

2.7 Delegation for Amendments

2.7.1 Increase of the NTE Subsequent to Review Committee (20% Rule)

The procurement delegation instrument provides that the relevant delegation holders (see Document Processing and Approval Matrix (Annex B) to the Delegation of Authority in the Administration of Financial Regulations and Rules) have the authority to increase the Not-to-Exceed (NTE) amount for contracts previously reviewed by a Review Committee by 20% or by US $500,000, whichever is lower. The intention of the 20% rule is to allow some flexibility in addressing changes in requirements, unexpected delays during the tender process, or operational urgencies not due to poor planning. Please refer to Chapter 9 Review by Committee on Contracts.

2.7.2 Extension of Duration of a Contract Subsequent Review Committee (8-Month Rule)

The procurement delegation instrument provides that the relevant delegation holders (See Document Processing and Approval Matrix (Annex B) to the Delegation of Authority in the Administration of Financial Regulations and Rules) have the authority to extend contracts previously reviewed by a Review Committee for up to 8 months, subject to the limitations set forth in Chapter 9 Review by Committee on Contracts.

The 8-month and 20% Rules can be used separately or combined, as outlined above and in the table below. Both rules can be applied to all written contracts including Letters of Assist.

Modification	Requires Review Committee?
Extension by up to 8 months	No
Increase of NTE up to 20% or US$ 500,000.00 (whichever is lower)	No
Extension by up to 8 months and simultaneous increase of NTE up to 20% or US$ 500,000.00 (whichever is lower)	No
Extension by more than 8 months	Yes
Increase of NTE by more than 20% or US$ 500,000.00 (whichever is lower)	Yes

2.7.3 Contract Awards

An award means the authorization is given by the Authorized Official (following Review Committee recommendation if required) or the Procurement Approving Authority, as applicable, to establish a contractual commitment on behalf of the UN. It includes the issuance of contracts, Long Term Agreements (LTAs), Letters of Assist (LOAs), purchase orders, or amendments thereof.

2.7.4 Calculation of Cumulative Amounts for Assessment of Required DOA

For a contract or series of contracts, including amendments thereof, awarded to the same vendor for the same requirement or a series of related requirements or purpose, the cumulative amount for the entire period of the proposed award must be considered when determining the level of DOA required for approval.

The ‘same requirement’ means the award of a contract or series of contracts to the same vendor, including amendments thereof, in the context of/resulting from a single solicitation process. Therefore, the amount of all contracts, purchase orders, or amendments resulting from the same solicitation process for the same purpose must be accumulated for the purpose of determining the relevant Procurement Approving Authority.

2.8 Accountability

All UN personnel involved in the procurement process are accountable to the Secretary-General for the actions undertaken by them in the course of their official duties. UN personnel who take any action that is contrary to the Financial Regulations and Rules or to other relevant legislative instruments or policies and procedures may be held personally responsible and financially liable for the consequences of such action.

As the UN utilizes public funds in the procurement process, these funds must be applied solely for their intended use. Individuals holding a DOA must be particularly careful to ensure their actions, or those undertaken by persons under their supervision, comply with the Financial Regulations and Rules and other relevant legislative instruments.

2.9 Segregation of Duties

Segregation of duties is an internal control mechanism used to assure that no single individual or organizational unit is given responsibility for more than one related function within a single process.

There are two areas where segregation of duties is applied in the acquisition process as part of internal controls: The first area refers to authorities for various functions in the acquisition process in UMOJA:

- a. Budgeting Authority— responsibility for managing the resources being spent, normally performed by the Requisitioner or end-user;
- b. Requisitioning Authority— responsibility to raise a requisition (shopping cart) and convey such requisition to the procurement function;
- c. Procurement Approving Authority— approval of purchase orders after the Procurement Official has created them;
- d. Disbursing Authority— approval of the payment of invoices.

Personnel are granted profiles in UMOJA consistent with their roles, and the following segregation of duties measures are enforced by the system:

- a. Personnel that create purchase orders cannot approve them;
- b. Personnel that create requisitions/shopping carts cannot approve them;
- c. Personnel that approve requisitions/shopping carts and personnel that approve purchase orders cannot approve payments;
- d. The Procurement Official cannot undertake the receipt of goods and services pursuant to purchase orders or contracts;
- e. Personnel that create or modify vendor records cannot approve them. The right to approve new vendors in the system is separated from the procurement function and performed by the vendor registration function in the EOS, OSCM and the Master Data Management team in UNGSC in Brindisi;
- f. Any justified combination of roles is to be documented and approved by the ASG, OSCM.

The second area refers to steps in the procurement process outside UMOJA. The following segregation of duties applies:

- a. 'Needs definition' authority— the responsibility to define a requirement in the form of a Statement of Requirement and convey such need to the procurement function; a process which is undertaken by the Requisitioner or Technical Expert Category Manager;
- b. Opening of offers for formal solicitations must be conducted by at least one official who has no involvement in the subsequent stages of the procurement process;
- c. An evaluation committee is formed hereof (as per Chapter 8.2);
- d. The Procurement Approving Authority shall not award contracts or purchase orders or amendments thereto in instances where the Procurement Approving Authority has directly and personally conducted the procurement process. In such cases, all contract documents and purchase orders must be referred upwards to the next DOA level.

Notwithstanding the above, Procurement Officials may exercise the remaining activities under their delegated authorities (e.g. approve the List of Invitees, sign solicitation documents) in instances where they have undertaken responsibility for the procurement process.

3. Vendor Registration and Management

The UN Secretariat maintains two vendor databases: The UNGM (www.ungm.org), which includes vendors that are interested in doing business with the UN, and the UMOJA database, which includes vendors that have been registered as Business Partners.

In order to maximize economy and efficiency, Procurement Officials and staff in EOS OSCM should continually strive to identify new technically and financially sound vendors. In particular, the UN shall actively work to increase its sources of supply from developing countries and countries with economies in transition.

3.1 Vendor Registration

UNGM acts as a single-window through which potential vendors may register with the entities of the United Nations system, including the UN Secretariat. The vendor registration function in EOS is responsible for any aspects related to vendor registration, establishment and maintenance of vendor files, and assistance to vendors and Procurement Officials in related matters. The Master Data Management Team in UNGSC is responsible for synchronizing the UNGM vendor registration data into UMOJA as Business Partners. VRO/EOS may also synchronize UNGM vendor registration data into UMOJA as Business Partners.

3.1.1 Registration in UNGM

Vendors wishing to participate in solicitation exercises conducted by the UN Secretariat must have completed the process of self-registration at the Basic Level in the UNGM portal, including confirmation of the acknowledgment of the United Nations Supplier Code of Conduct. Unless otherwise indicated in the Request for Expression of Interest (REOI) or solicitation instructions, a completed registration at the Basic Level suffices to participate in UN Secretariat solicitation exercises.

Vendors that are not registered at the Basic Level in UNGM or have been suspended (even if they are in the process of being reinstated) shall not be invited to participate in solicitation exercises and shall not be eligible to submit a bid or even receive the solicitation materials.

Furthermore, vendors are required to be registered at the appropriate level prior to contract award. Contracts shall only be awarded to eligible vendors that are registered with the United Nations Global Marketplace, unless specific exceptions apply (please see Chapter 3.1.4).

The UN evaluates vendor applications to determine whether the application complies with established UN requirements as set forth below and whether vendors are thus eligible for registration. Successful and eligible applicants are duly registered as UN Secretariat vendors.

Under exceptional circumstances (e.g. the vendor cannot access UNGM or has insufficient knowledge of any of the languages supported by UNGM) or as requested by the Director, PD or Chief, Enabling and Outreach Service, the UN may assist a vendor in completing the registration process in UNGM. In such instances, a signed vendor registration form shall be obtained from the vendor, including an Eligibility Form and statement that the vendor accepts the Supplier Code of Conduct and the UN payment terms.

3.1.2 Synchronization in UMOJA

Information about a vendor in UNGM, as maintained by the vendor, is replicated in UMOJA when required. Authorized staff members initiate the replication manually, and the information is thereafter replicated automatically from UNGM to UMOJA. This action is typically taken when Procurement Officials have determined that vendors not yet replicated in UMOJA need to be added to the List of Invitees.

3.1.3 Overview of Registration Levels

The UN's vendor registry consists of three (3) levels, each with distinct risk profiles and registration requirements: Basic Level, Level 1 and Level 2.

Vendor Registration Level	Award Amount
Basic Level	< US$ 150,000
Level 1	≥ US$ 150,000 and ≤ US$ 500,000
Level 2	> US$ 500,000

Registration at the Basic Level is a fully automated process in UNGM and can be completed online by the vendor. This allows the vendor to be invited to participate in solicitations. To be synchronized in UMOJA, at the Basic Level, the UN reviews compliance of the vendor with the Pre-requisites for Eligibility.

It is only at the time of contract award that the vendor under consideration needs to be registered at registration Level 1 or 2 for awards above US$ 150,000. However, no vendor may participate in any solicitation exercise unless it is fully registered, at a minimum, at the Basic Level, at the time of the issuance of the solicitation. If within a period of time following the issuance of the solicitation, a vendor registers at Basic Level, the Procurement Official may, at his/her sole discretion, include the vendor in the List of Invitees. With regards to joint ventures, please refer to Chapter 3.1.4.1.

Registrations at Levels 1 and 2 shall be initiated by the vendor but require evaluation by the UN before they come into effect.

Registration as a vendor is subject to the following:

- a. All information provided to the UN must be certified as true and correct. The UN may unilaterally seek at any time to clarify and/or conduct further research on any concern it may have regarding the eligibility of a vendor and to take such action that it may deem appropriate under the circumstances.
- b. Registration of a vendor in UNGM indicates that the vendor is eligible to participate in UN Secretariat tender activities (subject to evaluation of eligibility criteria). Registration does not guarantee an invitation to a solicitation exercise or contract award.

3.1.4 Criteria for Vendor Registration

3.1.4.1 Pre-Requisites for Eligibility

To become registered vendors to be able to participate in UN solicitation exercises and receive solicitation materials, applicants are required to declare that:

- a. They are not a company, or associated with a company or individual, under procurement prohibition by the United Nations, including but not limited to prohibitions derived from the Compendium of United Nations Security Council Sanctions Lists;
- b. They are not currently removed from the registered vendor list or suspended as registered vendors by the United Nations or any other entity of the UN system including the World Bank;
- c. They are not under formal investigation, nor have been sanctioned within the preceding three (3) years, by any national authority of a United Nations Member State for engaging or having engaged in proscribed practices, including but not limited to: corruption, fraud, coercion, collusion, obstruction, or any other unethical practice;
- d. They have not declared bankruptcy, are not involved in bankruptcy or receivership proceedings, and there is no judgment or pending legal action against them that could impair their operations in the foreseeable future;
- e. They do not employ, or anticipate employing, any person(s) who is or has been a UN staff member within the last one year (12 months), if said UN staff member has or had prior professional dealings with the vendor in his/her capacity as UN staff member within the last three years (36 months) of service with the UN (in accordance with UN post-employment restrictions contained in ST/SGB/2006/15); and
- f. They undertake not to engage in proscribed practices (including but not limited to: corruption, fraud, coercion, collusion, obstruction, or any other unethical practice) with respect to the UN or any other party, and to conduct business in a manner that averts any financial, operational, reputational or other undue risk to the UN.

When a consortium or joint venture submit a joint proposal as a single bidder on behalf of all of its members, all of the members of the consortium/joint venture must meet the criteria requirements described in this chapter. If in the judgment of the Procurement Official an award is considered, the Procurement Official shall submit a request for special approval of the joint venture to the e-SAC. In addition, should the contract be awarded to the consortium/joint venture, risk mitigation measures in the form of liability provisions, warranties, and/or other assurances are to be included into the contract as appropriate, in consultation with OLA. It preferred and strongly recommended that contracts be signed with a prime vendor. Any partners acting as subcontractors in joint ventures can give rise to legal risk. If a joint venture is considered for an award, it is necessary for the Director PD or CPO - who may consult the Office of Legal Affairs (OLA) - to provide advice before a decision is taken.

In the case that a vendor's situation changes with regard to any of the statements listed under paragraphs 3.1.4.1 a-f, the vendor shall immediately inform the UN Secretariat (e-mail to register@un.org).

3.1.4.2 Registration Levels

To be registered at a certain level, vendors must provide the following information and documents:

Basic Level registration:

- a. Vendor information such as officially registered company name, owners, address, contact information, telephone, e-mail, etc.;
- b. Declaration of meeting the Pre-requisites for Eligibility;
- c. Acceptance of UN Supplier Code of Conduct;
- d. Selection of United Nations Standard Products and Services Code (UNSPSC) Commodity Codes of goods/services offered.

Level 1 registration

- a. Basic registration criteria;
- b. Proof that the vendor has been in business for a minimum of 3 years<sup>2</sup>;
- c. Current certificate of incorporation or equivalent document verifying legal status;
- d. Identification of at least three (3) independent, non-affiliated clients/companies with whom the vendor has conducted business over the previous 12 months, including details of the projects (client name and contact details, description of the project/work undertaken, start and completion date, and if feasible, the contract value of the project);
- e. Name of owner(s) and principals (including the parent company, subsidiaries/affiliates, CEO/Managing Director, and those with controlling interest, if applicable, including under any former corporate incarnation; and
- f. The names of intermediaries, agents and/or consultants (if any) employed in relation to United Nations contracts or bids/proposals.

Level 2 registration

- a. Basic and Level 1 registration criteria;
- b. Audited / Certified financial statements for the previous three financial cycles, consisting of Audit Report / Review Report (Statement of Opinion) by independent and accredited Audit / Accounting firm, Income Statement, and Balance Sheet. For privately held companies who do not have audited financial statements, the VRO will request certified financial statements (consisting of Income Statement and Balance Sheet accompanied by Review Report by independent / accredited Accounting firm) with a statement of opinion or a

<sup>2</sup> Vendors that have not been in incorporated for a minimum of three years but were incorporated as a different entity (e.g. under a different name) prior to the date of incorporation of the current company, shall provide sufficient proof thereof. The Vendor Review Officer (VRO) may accept such application, provided that both the current and the prior company meet the pre-requisites for eligibility and other requirements for registration at a specific level.

compilation report which will be considered in exceptional circumstances for review by the e-SAC; and

- c. Three reference letters from non-affiliated clients/companies with whom the vendor has conducted business with over the past year (12 months). The letters must be on the Reference company's letterhead and signed by an authorized official of the Reference company.

3.1.4.3 Special Considerations and Requirements for Specific Vendor Types

3.1.4.3.1 Air Operators

The United Nations only awards contracts for long-term air charter requirements and short-term passenger movements to air operators in a possession of an Air Operator Certificate (AOC) authorizing them to operate in the area of interest to the UN, with all types of aircraft required by the UN. Prospective contractors for such aircraft charter services are required to demonstrate their ability to comply with the requirements of the United Nations and have sufficient technical and financial resources to conduct safe operations.

The process to become a registered Air Operator of the UN Secretariat for the services described above consists of two-steps: a technical application and an administrative/commercial application. A technical evaluation of each vendor to determine the potential contractor's capabilities to perform the services is required and is typically conducted by OSCM. As is the case for all vendors, the administrative/commercial application is submitted and conducted online through the UNGM platform where Air Operators must register at Level 2. The review of administrative/commercial applications will be conducted for those vendors whose technical application is considered to be compliant.

Air transportation companies interested in participating in solicitations and being considered for UN contracts must comply with relevant air operator registration requirements. (<https://www.un.org/Depts/ptd/aviation>).

The technical aviation vendor registration team reserves the right to impose additional aviation safety risk-mitigating measures on air operators applying for UN flight service vendor registration, and technically cleared flight service vendors. This is to benefit aviation safety in UN air transport services and to limit the Organization's exposure to potential legal, financial, reputational and other liabilities.

Registered Air Operator vendors must maintain full compliance with the technical and administrative/commercial requirements for registration as Air Operators with the United Nations Secretariat. EOS/VRO, upon determination that a vendor has failed to remain in full compliance with the technical and/or administrative/commercial criteria may approve and carry out the removal from the list of registered United Nations Air Operators prequalified to participate in UN solicitations, and such status will be reflected in the corresponding Umoja and UNGM records; EOS/VRO shall notify the vendor accordingly. This shall render the Air Operator ineligible to participate in or be invited to future solicitations and awards until such time that full reinstatement efforts in line with relevant compliance requirements have been made by the vendor and the respective UN offices endorses the reinstatement.

3.1.4.3.2 Sole Proprietorships

Due to exposure of sole proprietors to personal liability, the United Nations typically does not enter into a contractual relationship with this type of legal entity.

In cases where local business practices and/or the nature of relevant requirements demands, sole proprietorships applying for registration at the Basic Level shall be approved by the Chief, VRO based on a written justification from the Procurement Official, in view of local business practices and the nature of goods and/or services solicited.

In cases where local business practices and/or the nature of requirements demands, sole proprietorships applying for registration above the Basic Level shall be referred to the e-SAC for special consideration of approval. Sole Proprietors require a BP in Umoja.

Sole proprietorships cannot be contracted to provide consulting services.

3.1.4.3.3 Low Value Acquisition Vendors

Low value acquisition vendors for requirements of up to US $10,000 are not required to be registered in UNGM, however they are checked against the list of UN sanctioned vendors and require a commercial BP in Umoja.

3.1.4.3.4 Special Commercial Categories

When not feasible, Hotels/conference centers and utility companies are not required to be registered in UNGM, however other appropriate commercially prudent verifications are to be conducted and they are also to be checked against the list of UN sanctioned vendors prior to establishing a commercial BP in Umoja.

Individual landlords are not required to be registered in UNGM, however other appropriate commercially prudent verifications are to be conducted and they are also to be checked against the list of UN sanctioned vendors prior to establishing a commercial BP in Umoja.

3.2 Vendor Management

The Chief, EOS shall designate Vendor Registration Officers (VRO/VROs) who are responsible to evaluate vendor registration applications, create and maintain vendor records, and provide support service to the UN Secretariat for matters involving vendor registration.

3.2.1 Evaluation of Vendor Registration Applications

The evaluation of vendor registration applications is conducted by the VRO based on the criteria stated in this chapter. The VRO either approves the registration application, requests additional information/documentation as deemed necessary to complete the review process or denies the application.

Registrations at Level 2 require a thorough review of the applicant's financial status (i.e., revenue, profitability and liquidity). During the review, the VRO analyses information from documents submitted by the vendor (i.e., financial statements), information obtained through business information services and other sources as appropriate. The VRO shall use the standard financial review methodology as established by the Chief, EOS.

The VRO, using established financial assessment criteria, shall evaluate whether a vendor registering at Level 2 is in sound financial condition. Failure to submit the required financial data shall disqualify the vendor for registration at Level 2.

Exceptionally, an applicant may be registered as a UN Secretariat vendor despite not meeting all registration criteria. In such cases, the Procurement Official may submit a request to the VRO for 'special approval' if in the professional judgment of the Procurement Official such request is warranted. The VRO shall submit the case for the review of the e-SAC (see Chapter 3.6 below).

Annex 4— Special Approval Request Form for Registration

3.2.2 Vendor Registration Maintenance and Updating of Vendor Documentation

Following the evaluation and uploading of vendor documentation into UNGM, the VRO shall maintain documentation in an electronic platform, which shall be available upon request for review by Procurement Officials. Performance Evaluation Reports received from the Requisitioner should be submitted/forwarded by Procurement Officials to the VROs to be maintained in their respective vendor files.

3.2.3 Updating of Vendor Information

All registered vendors are required to update UNGM and inform the UN immediately - in writing - of any material change in the information or documentation provided to the UN, setting out all relevant details. All vendors must immediately update their online application in UNGM, uploading additional documentation. A follow-up communication or alert may be in the form of an online application update, letter, fax or email, and shall include all relevant documentation.

Upon the UN's request, which may occur as part of a pre-qualification or solicitation exercise or through UNGM automated periodical notifications, registered vendors are required to submit their updated financial statements and other relevant documentation.

If a vendor undergoes a legal name change, the vendor is required to upload to the UNGM certified true copies of all legal documents relevant to the transactions that led to the name change, including new certificate of incorporation, or documents relevant to a merger, takeover, etc.

All exchange of information and documentation in support of the vendor registration should be conducted online through UNGM. The vendor is likewise informed of the status of their application through the UNGM e-mail notification system.

The VRO, shall review compliance with the Pre-requisites for Eligibility and related documentation, to assess the continued eligibility of vendors both at the time of registration and after they have been registered with the UN Secretariat.

3.3 Vendor Review Committee

The Vendor Review Committee (VRC) is an internal administrative body tasked with making recommendations to the Under-Secretary-General for the DMSPC regarding possible sanctions against, and possible reinstatement of, vendors following the review of cases related to:

- a. Vendors who may have engaged or attempted to engage in proscribed practices (including but not limited to corruption, fraud, coercion, collusion, obstruction, sexual exploitation or any other unethical or anti-competitive practice);
- b. Vendors who have failed to perform in accordance with the terms and conditions of their contract(s) with the UN to the extent that it would warrant suspension;
- c. Prior to registration, a failure to (a) meet any of the applicable "Pre-Requisites for Eligibility" set forth in Chapter 3.1.4 above, (b) submit a Declaration of Eligibility, or (c) accept the UN Supplier Code of Conduct;

- d. Following registration, non-compliance with (a) any of the applicable “Pre-Requisites for Eligibility” set forth in Chapter 3.1.4 above, (b) statements made in the Declaration of Eligibility, or (c) the undertakings contained in the UN Supplier Code of Conduct;
- e. Vendors who requested reinstatement and have satisfactorily completed the reinstatement process.

The VRC will recommend to the USG, DMSPC whether to censure, suspend, remove, accept or reject registration or reinstate a previously suspended or removed vendor.

The VRC has a quorum when three members, including the Chairperson, are present. The membership of the VRC is comprised as follows:

- a. Director, BTA, DMSPC, or her/his officer-in-charge, who serves as Chairperson;
- b. A representative from the Office of Programme Planning, Finance and Budget, who will also act as alternate chair in the absence of the Chairperson;
- c. A representative from DOS;
- d. A representative from the Department of Economic and Social Affairs.

Representatives of the procurement office responsible for the administration of the associated contract(s), the requisitioning office responsible for the management of the associated contract, or a representative of Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS), OLA or the Ethics Office may be invited to attend meetings of the VRC in an ex officio capacity.

The VRC will be supported by a secretariat responsible for preparing and presenting the case to the VRC members, taking minutes of meetings, circulating minutes and related documents for clearance of the members and signature by USG, DMSPC. The secretariat is a supportive function of the VRC and does not participate in the substantive discussions of the VRC.

The VRC does not communicate or meet directly with vendors. The decision of the USG, DMSPC is communicated to the vendor once taken, by Chief, EOS.

3.4 Review by the Vendor Review Committee

Where the UN has received evidence that one of the instances described in Chapter 3.3 a (i)-(v) has occurred, the secretariat of the VRC will be requested to submit the case for review by the VRC. Upon receipt of a case presentation from the secretariat, the VRC reviews the information and documentation and may seek additional expert advice from relevant, substantive UN offices, such as OLA or the Ethics Office. The deliberations of the VRC and the decision of the USG, DMSPC are recorded in writing and kept in the vendor file in the form of approved minutes.

Evidence of a vendor’s failure to perform under a contract with the UN should not automatically result in a submission to the VRC with a recommendation to sanction such vendor. Instances of performance issues that do not, in the UN’s view, materially affect the vendor’s compliance with the contract or otherwise warrant suspension should be handled in accordance with Chapter 13.

Upon examination, the VRC makes a recommendation to the USG, DMSPC on whether to sanction or reinstate a vendor in UNGM, seek clarifications and consultation, accept or reject a vendor’s registration or take no action. The VRC may also determine specific conditions under which a suspension can be lifted.

If the VRC recommends that the vendor be sanctioned, the period of time and any associated conditions recommended for such sanction should be clearly defined.

The VRC meets in person (which includes video links) to deliberate on the case presented.

All VRC recommendations to the USG, DMSPC are made in writing. The VRC secretariat maintains a repository of the minutes of the VRC and written decisions of the USG, DMSPC in the applicable vendor file. A copy of such decisions and minutes will be communicated by the VRC secretariat to the Chief, Enabling and Outreach Service, the Director, Procurement Division, the relevant requisitioner, and the procurement office responsible for the administration of the associated contract(s), immediately upon signature.

3.5 Vendor Sanctions

The Model Policy Framework (MPF) on Vendor Sanctions is the set of policies and guidelines that UN organizations follow in order to sanction vendors in the UNGM that have been involved in proscribed practices such as fraud, corruption, collusion, coercion, unethical practices, and obstruction. The MPF allows UN agencies and entities to establish sanction procedures that meet their specific requirements while at the same time allowing for the harmonization of efforts throughout the UN system.

Each UN organization nominates an officer to the role of Ineligibility List Administrator (ILA) to administer, maintain and update the list of ineligible vendors. For the UN Secretariat, this role will be performed by the Secretary of the VRC.

Upon receipt of the recommendation of the VRC, the USG, DMSPC decides whether to sanction a vendor. The vendor shall be notified in writing as appropriate by Chief, EOS.

The USG, DMSPC, upon recommendation by the Vendor Review Committee, may impose any of the following sanctions or a combination of them:

- a. Censure: A reprimand in relation to a vendor's conduct. Censure does not affect the vendor's eligibility, but its existence will be an aggravating factor for imposing sanctions in future proceedings.
- b. Suspension: A decision that, for a period of time determined by the UN, a vendor has become ineligible to: be awarded UN contracts; partake in UN procurement solicitations; conduct new business with the UN as agent, representative or subcontractor of other vendors; partake in entering into direct negotiations with the UN regarding new contracts. At the conclusion of the set time period, the vendor's status will be reviewed by the VRC, and a recommendation made to the USG, DMSPC that the vendor either be reinstated (with or without conditions), the suspension period be extended, or the vendor removed from the UN vendor register.
- c. Removal: A decision that a vendor shall be removed from the register and rendered ineligible to participate in any aspect of UN procurement including to: be awarded UN contracts; partake in UN procurement solicitations; conduct new business with the UN as an agent, representative or subcontractor of other vendors; partake in entering into direct negotiations with the UN regarding new contracts. A vendor that has been removed from the register may apply for reinstatement if the conditions giving rise to the removal have materially changed. It is within the UN's sole purview to determine the veracity of such a claim and determine the action to be taken.
- d. Other Sanctions: Any other sanctions that the VRC finds appropriate under the circumstances of a case, including but not limited to, a recommendation that would subject existing or future contracts to special conditions, etc. These other sanctions may be imposed in addition to or in place of censure or suspension or removal.

The notice of sanction advises the vendor of the UN's decision to sanction them, either for a specific period of time or by its removal from the UN vendor register and specifies the reasons for the decision. In addition, the notice informs the vendor that it may request a review of the decision. If applicable, the notice also should list any relevant corrective action that the vendor must take in order to be considered for reinstatement.

Notices are sent by mail, with return receipt requested, or by email with a confirmation of transmission requested. A copy of the return receipt or confirmation of transmission is kept in the vendor's file. The vendor is entitled to a maximum period of 30 days following the UN's receipt thereof to request a review of a UN decision imposing a sanction. Upon receipt of the vendor's request for review, the VRC makes a recommendation to the USG, DMSPC, who determines whether to maintain, reverse, or amend the decision.

In cases where the VRC recommends suspension of a vendor that has an ongoing contractual relationship with the UN, the recommendation will specify whether to terminate or allow continuation of an existing contract(s), to ensure that the best interests of the UN, including but not limited to operational needs and the security of UN personnel and property, are duly protected. In such cases, the USG, DMSPC, shall take note of the VRC recommendation in relation to the existing contract(s), and may decide to refer the recommendation on such contracts to the relevant Authorized Official for decision.

The Requisitioner is notified of such cases and shall consult with PD on action to be taken, such as termination of the contract. PD or the CPO, as appropriate, and in consultation with OLA, ensures that the interests of the UN are duly protected in connection with any termination of a contract, taking into account considerations including but not limited to operational needs and the security of UN personnel and property.

If a vendor requests reinstatement, whether following a finite period of suspension or in other instances, the VRC shall review the request. This review includes but is not limited to evaluating whether any special conditions, if applicable, have been met and if sufficient evidence is presented to support the vendor's request. In addition, the VRC may recommend additional conditions in order for the vendor to be considered for reinstatement.

Upon receipt of the recommendation of the VRC, the USG, DMSPC also decides whether a vendor which has been subject to a sanction should be reinstated. Any such decisions by USG DMSPC will be communicated to the vendor in writing by Chief EOS.

3.6 Electronic Special Approval Committee (e-SAC)

The e-SAC reviews cases related to vendors that do not meet the registration criteria required for the respective level of registration. This Committee is an internal body within OSCM tasked to evaluate and determine the eligibility of a vendor to be registered as or remain registered at the desired qualification level.

The review of the e-SAC is directed towards an exceptional special approval of a vendor at the desired qualification level when the vendor does not meet all necessary criteria for the appropriate registration level. The reasons for such special approval will subsequently be documented in the vendor registration file maintained by EOS.

e-SAC Review Process. As soon as a recommendation of award is evident, in case the vendor is not registered at the appropriate level the Procurement Official, as needed, will draft and submit to the VRO a request for special approval based on the template attached in Chapter 3.2.1. The VRO will review the request and seek clarification, if any, with the Procurement Official. The case for consideration of the e-SAC for special approval will be submitted by the VRO to all members of the e-SAC via email, with a recommendation pertaining to the registration level of a vendor. The e-SAC is an internal review body and does not communicate or meet directly with vendors. The e-SAC's deliberations are conducted electronically, and the e-SAC's recommendation(s) take full effect only upon approval from the Chief, EOS.

The e-SAC has a quorum with three voting members present, including the Chairperson. The membership of the e-SAC is comprised as follows:

- a. Chairperson of e-SAC (Chief of Service, PD);
- b. a representative from the PD;
- c. a representative from a requisitioning office.

Representatives from PD and the requisitioning office will serve on a rotating basis and will not be invited to the e-SAC for those cases where they or their section are involved.

A vendor's failure to meet or continue to meet the criteria for the respective level of registration, as based on substantial and documented evidence, will give cause for consideration whether to grant special approval for a level of registration and adjust the respective level of the vendor's registration in UNGM.

The e-SAC reviews the case and recommends whether to either accept or reject the vendor's registration level or accept the vendor's registration level for a specific contract(s) only, taking into consideration the published criteria for registration and other factors including the potential financial risk to the Organization. The e-SAC makes certain that the standards are set at reasonable levels to ensure that small and medium-sized applicants from developing countries and countries with economies in transition are not unduly rejected, while all measures must be taken to mitigate risk for the Organization. Any special approvals of registration for a specific contract shall detail if it includes all optional extensions. Any subsequent extensions beyond those originally submitted to the e-SAC shall be submitted for its review.

Upon receipt of a case presentation from the VRO for the review of a vendor's registration status, the e-SAC reviews all relevant evidence, taking the factors above into consideration. The e-SAC may recommend granting special approval for a vendor for multiple or single solicitations and/or award(s). Once a determination is made by Chief, EOS for special approval of a vendor, the vendor relevant data in UMOJA will be enriched to reflect the approved level. The vendor's registration level in UNGM will remain unchanged.

4. Demand Planning, Acquisition Planning, Procurement Strategy and Requirements Definition

4.1 Demand Planning and Acquisition Planning

Acquisition planning is an essential phase in the overall acquisition process and a necessary prerequisite to the procurement process. It seeks to effectively and systemically forecast the Organization's requirements, based on demand plans generated by the end-user/requisitioner. Acquisition planning supports the timely and efficient fulfillment of mandates.

Acquisition planning necessarily includes procurement forecasting geared towards the timely delivery of goods and services. It requires that consideration be given to logistics, finance and resource management. Requisitioners are responsible for developing acquisition plans in cooperation with Procurement Officials in a timely manner. Ideally, acquisition plans should be developed in advance of each budgetary cycle to allow the concerned procurement office the necessary lead time to develop its procurement strategies, including the consolidation of requirements to leverage economies of scale.

Requisitioners may perform short-term acquisition planning for requirements to be fulfilled in the current budgetary period. In order to ensure that the UN obtains high-quality goods and/or services at competitive prices and within the time frame required, Requisitioners need to ensure the optimal use of funds throughout the budgetary period.

In the case of emergencies, such as natural disasters or other situations where there is a risk of injury or loss of life, the timing and sequencing of procurement activities may be modified in order to deal with the emergency (see Chapter 15.4 Emergency Procurement Procedures).

Requisitioners and Procurement Officials shall meet at least annually to review acquisition plans for the forthcoming budgetary period(s) and typically update the acquisition plans on a quarterly basis as required. In certain UN Secretariat entities, such review may be conducted between the Acquisition Management Section or the Supply Chain Planning Service at UNHQ, together with Requisitioner and the Procurement Official through regular Integrated Business Planning (IBP) meetings. The relevant procurement office shall advise on what can be realistically achieved during the acquisition plan period.

The demand plan shall contain the following information:

- a. Item number. (i.e., a numerical identifier);
- b. Type of goods or services, using nomenclature according to the UNSPSC;
- c. Estimated quantity (number of units) or term (number of months or years);
- d. Estimated value in US dollars, funding source, and budget reference;

- e. Delivery date or quarter when the goods are required to be delivered or the services are required to commence and be completed;
- f. Any other relevant information, including locations where goods or services are required if different from the Requisitioner's location.

The planning function of an entity is responsible for the consolidated acquisition plan and will issue appropriate instructions for action. Further, the planning function will initiate and facilitate acquisition planning by establishing a planning template. The acquisition plan is based on estimates of requirements to be procured in the next twelve months. It is understood that some procurement needs cannot be anticipated, and sometimes plans may not be entirely accurate. Nonetheless, entities are expected to provide their best estimates based on available information at the time of reporting.

The Supply Chain Planning Service in LD at UNHQ and equivalent functions in other at UN entities shall be responsible for: i) preparing the operational guidance that drives the formulation of the demand, source and delivery plans, by identifying resource priorities and fit-for-purpose sourcing solutions; ii) compiling and analyzing the data in order to confirm or determine optimal courses of action; iii) enabling the review of such information by the respective procurement and requisitioning offices and taking appropriate action, in alignment with the category management strategy for the respective goods and services. To alert the vendor community of forthcoming procurement requirements and to uphold the basic procurement principles, the consolidated annual acquisition plan will be uploaded to the UNPD website.

PROCUREMENT STRATEGY & CATEGORY MANAGEMENT

Category management will focus on supply market capabilities to improve the total cost of ownership. The strategic approach for each category organizes procurement (and technical) resources to focus on specific areas of spend-and-supply

4.2 Procurement Strategy

Developing a strategic approach to procurement is a key element for the successful acquisition of goods and services and is necessary for the timely implementation of projects or operations. It requires an understanding of the nature of the requirements, the capacity of the contractors, the complexity of the operating environment, the risks involved, and the available internal UN capacities and resources. Enabling an effective procurement process requires professional judgment as well as an understanding of the above factors.

Procurement planning is the process of scheduling procurement activities per identified procurement strategies and in alignment with the relevant category management strategy. As such, procurement strategy, category strategy development, acquisition planning and procurement planning are closely linked.

4.3 Procurement Planning and Source Selection Plan

Procurement planning for an individual procurement activity includes establishing the timelines required to perform each step of the procurement process per the identified solicitation method, contract type, and method of solicitation. Advantages of procurement planning include:

- a. Improved sourcing, ensuring appropriately qualified vendors and an adequate number of vendors, leading to increased competition, and, potentially stronger offers at lower prices;
- b. Less waste of resources on last-minute actions;

- c. Early identification and management of risks;
- d. Reduction of delays and lead times due to the ability to perform tasks proactively;
- e. Better planning and monitoring of procurement activities;
- f. Identification of time periods when a high percentage of procurement actions are required (which can be useful in planning and distributing the workload);
- g. Early consideration of logistics aspects and factors for the procurement of goods and equipment.

Planning for a single procurement exercise, formal or informal, should be reflected in the corresponding Source Selection Plan (SSP). The SSP describes critical components of the sourcing process and provides justification for sourcing decisions in order to achieve Best Value for Money. It also provides an objective approach to the methodology of selecting the best source to fulfill the established need. (See sample Source Selection Plan in Annex 5).

For complex requirements, procurement planning should begin at least six months before the goods or services are required. Accordingly, Requisitioners and Procurement Officials should communicate with each other early in the planning process.

The SSP is an internal and collaborative document, under the leadership of the Procurement Official, which describes critical components of the procurement process and provides justification for sourcing and procurement decisions in order to achieve the Best Value for Money principle. It documents assumptions, decisions, and justifications and provides an objective approach to the methodology of selecting the best source to fulfill the established need. The Procurement Official and the Requisitioner are jointly responsible for contributing to, preparing, finalizing, and obtaining any required approvals for the SSP before the solicitation documents are issued. The Procurement Official must ensure that the SSP is approved prior to the issuance of any solicitation (excluding LVAs). Amendments or changes to the SSP after signature must be duly justified and placed in the case file.

Depending on the complexity of the procurement, the SSP may be summarized in a few lines or consist of detailed and precise descriptions of the steps of the evaluation necessary to ensure Best Value for Money. The estimated value of the requirement may be an indication for the complexity of the procurement, which would require a more detailed SSP; the technical complexity or nature of the requirement may also warrant a more detailed SSP. The following are elements that would be appropriate to include in the SSP:

- a. Description of the requirement (including operational circumstances, timeline, etc.);
- b. Solicitation Method and justification thereof;
- c. Method for identifying vendors (particular attention should be given to attract vendors from developing countries and from countries with economies in transition) and details thereof of the UNSPSC;
- d. The contractual instrument to be used;
- e. Evaluation Committees responsible for commercial and technical evaluation;
- f. Evaluation Criteria for commercial and technical evaluation and reasonable minimum criteria, such as minimum passing score and mandatory requirements, as well as how optional requirements will be evaluated;
- g. Weighting (i.e., the relative importance of each of the Evaluation Criteria), if applicable;
- h. Market conditions;
- i. Planning and procurement activity schedule;
- j. Rating and scoring system;
- k. Required level of expertise and Requisitioner resource capacity;
- l. Risk factors that should be assessed during the evaluation and potential remedies;
- m. Any relevant information with regard to the forthcoming contract management capacity and expertise, staff training, equipment maintenance, after-sale service, disposal, etc.

The evaluation criteria in the SSP shall not unduly disqualify vendors from developing countries and countries with economies in transition and should be based on the principles of fairness and equity. Any rating system for the evaluation of submissions, both commercial and technical, shall include all relevant details determined appropriate by the Procurement Official and Requisitioner.

As the basis of a procurement strategy, the SSP shall be made available to the Headquarters Committee on Contracts (HCC) and/or the relevant Local Committee on Contracts (LCC) for all cases submitted for the Committees' review. It is therefore critical for Procurement Officials to develop expertise in drafting Source Selection Plans and engage the Requisitioner to fully contribute to this exercise. Please refer to Annex 5 for a sample SSP.

When procurement planning is consolidated for more than one procurement activity, other strategic initiatives can be enacted towards the aim of economies of scale and reductions in transaction costs, such as:

- a. Consolidating various requirements into a single tender;
- b. Establishing Blanket Purchase Orders (BPOs), or LTAs;
- c. Undertaking joint procurement initiatives with other United Nations organizations pursuant to Financial Rule 105.17(a).

RESOURCES

Annex 5 – Sample Source Selection Plan

4.4 Requirements Definition

Requirements definition is a systematic approach to define the procurement requirements included in the requisition and/or shopping cart, which should be in the form of a Statement of Work, Terms of Reference, with technical specifications outlining the needs of the Organization.

It is the first step in the implementation of procurement activity and an integrated step in its planning. However, it is often done in parallel with sourcing and supply-market research, which includes the assessment of market conditions and industry practices, in order to allow such information to help develop the requirements definition. Significant deviations from standard industry practices shall be justified and documented in the case file. Requirements definition and market research and analysis are also known as pre-solicitation activities.

The Requisitioner carries the sole responsibility for defining the requirements, while the Procurement Official is responsible for the procurement process, the assessment of the requirements, and the evaluation criteria, to ensure that they are generic and appropriate from a competition perspective, unless exceptions apply (e.g. branding without justification, over-specification, unrealistic delivery dates, and restricted competition should not be included in the requirement). Where necessary, the Procurement Official must clearly communicate to the Requisitioner that an adequate SOW/TOR should be provided in order to allow the solicitation exercise to be conducted. Where necessary, the Procurement Official shall advise the Requisitioner of possible better solutions to meet the stated need through the category management approach or other modalities. To incorporate environmental considerations when applicable, the Requisitioner shall consult with the relevant environmental official within their entity, as well as the Environmental Technical Support Unit (ETSU) in UNGSC, when defining the appropriate technical specifications and selection criteria (see Chapter 15.2). To provide an inclusive environment for persons with disabilities, the Requisitioner shall ensure, within reason, that accessibility considerations are factored into the requirements definition and that new acquisitions do not create new barriers.

In addition, if the solicitation process is being undertaken for the purpose of establishing an LTA) or a BPO, it should be explained in the SOW, TOR, SSP or in the Special Instructions as appropriate.

Statement of Works/Requirements may include:

- a. Technical specifications, SOWs, and TORs. Depending on the nature of the procurement activity, the requirements are stated in the form of technical specifications, SOWs, and TORs (for guidance on writing requirements, see Chapter 4.4.2 Characteristics of Well-Defined Requirements).
- b. In order to prevent misunderstandings and disagreements with vendors at the time of contract execution, it is important to clearly state and describe the performance expected from the vendor, including any Key Performance Indicators (KPIs) that will be measured during contract execution. Ambiguous performance requirements may also lead to increased costs, as bidders may have to factor into their bid/proposal a contingency or risk buffer.
- c. A confirmed delivery date for goods or starting/completion/mobilization dates for the provision of services/ works if firm requirements exist or time is of the essence.
- d. When procuring goods, the destination(s) and mode(s) of transport shall be included. For services and works, destination/location shall be specified.
- e. When purchasing goods, a copy of the relevant packing and shipping instructions may be included with the solicitation documents. The packing and shipping instructions are important to the vendor when bidding, as they include instructions about packaging, marking and numbering of the shipment, notification of shipment, documentation required for customs clearance and payment purposes, and invoicing. Where the solicitation is for goods of different size and shape, the vendor shall be asked to provide weight, dimensions and volume of each item which does not require packaging. Vendors should be requested to include the number of items and total weight to be loaded in a 20ft container. For packaged items, the vendor shall provide weight, dimensions and volume of the outer package. Containerization, volume and weight details shall be then reflected in the contract to easily estimate freight requirements;
- f. Delivery terms: Incoterms 2010 shall be used to specify the responsibilities regarding the delivery of goods procured by the UN (see Chapter 12 Logistics).

IMPORTANCE OF WELL-DEFINED REQUIREMENTS

The clear definition of requirements by Requisitioners is crucial in every procurement activity. Requirements form the basis for the solicitation and set the goals of the procurement action. It also informs potential vendors of the product requirements necessary in order to fulfill the UN's needs. The definition of requirements has a lasting and substantial effect throughout the entire procurement process.

4.4.1 The Purpose of Requirements Definition

All requirements that are determining factors in the evaluation of offers must be clearly stated in the solicitation documents.

All applicable technical, financial, commercial, legal, and operational factors must be stated in the solicitation documents and must be in accordance with the approved SSP.

4.4.2 Characteristics of Well-Defined Requirements

In order to define requirements, there should be an analysis of the goods, and services that are to be procured and of their purpose, performance requirements, characteristics, objectives, and/or expected output.

All requirements definitions should describe the needs without over-specification. Over-specification may increase prices and/or decrease the number of offers, as it leads to offers for more advanced products than those needed. The converse is true of under-specification, and therefore, it is essential for the cost-effective use of funds that the requirements define the minimum requirements considered essential in a manner that provides certainty to the prospective vendors whilst maximizing competition.

Requirements must be generic and defined with the aim of engendering competition; no specific brands, unless for standardization purposes, or other unnecessary restrictions can be requested. However, if brand names are necessary to define functional, performance, and/or conformance requirements, they must only be used to define the required product standard. Further, brand names must never be used without also specifying the minimum requirements of the brand. Finally, the specification should clearly invite offers of equivalent products, i.e., products meeting similar functional, performance, and/or technical standards. In the event that the requirement specifies a particular brand for the purpose of standardization or is related to a requirement for spare parts for existing equipment, the rationale for this requirement should be briefly stated in the solicitation document in order to avoid negative perceptions of any bias on the part of the UN.

Where possible, requirements should include KPIs to be monitored during contract management stage (see Chapter 13 Contract Management and Contract Administration). KPIs and/or Service Level Agreements (SLAs) are essential tools to express and measure performance against agreed targets, and these are particularly recommended for complex contracts of goods and services, including long-term agreements. These have to be identified at the requirements definition stage, in order to be incorporated in the solicitation documents and then into the contract. This will enable monitoring of the KPIs at the contract management stage.

Examples of KPIs for goods and services include:

Delivery/Performance

- a. Delivery of goods/services on time;
- b. Delivery of goods/services in full;

Quality

- a. Quality of goods/services delivered (in accordance with specifications/TOR);
- b. Technical competence;
- c. Adherence to warranty provisions;

Communication

- a. Responsiveness of vendor (requests, complaints, etc.);
- b. Appropriate handling and timely submission of documents (reports, invoices, shipping documents, etc.);
- c. Introduction of innovative solutions;
- d. Cost savings to the UN initiated by the contractor;

Compliance with Contract Requirements

- a. Environmental indicators (e.g. compliance with environmental principles to maximize resources efficiency and minimize risk, waste diverted from landfill via reduction in waste volume, periodic checks on chemicals being used and maintenance of records, reduction in packaging and avoidance of plastic packaging, proportion of recycled/ recyclable / re-usable content, product reuse or take back, minimize use of hazardous substances, reduced air emissions, etc.);
- b. Labour indicators (e.g. compliance with minimum wage, etc.).

Best practices in setting up KPIs include:

- a. Requisitioner, in consultation with Procurement Official, shall determine KPIs during requirements definition stage;
- b. Requisitioner, in consultation with Procurement Official, shall ensure KPIs are SMART (Specific, Measurable, Achievable, Relevant, Time-bound);
- c. When issuing the contract, Procurement Official ensures inclusion of KPI targets, as well as performance credits associated (where possible) with such KPIs;
- d. Development of KPIs should be specific to a solicitation and the contract should be aligned with the overall Supply Chain Management Performance Management Framework, as developed and maintained by EOS in OSCM.

4.4.3 Technical Specifications

Technical specifications are mainly used for the procurement of goods, but may also apply to straightforward, quantifiable services. Specifications are typically the description of the technical requirements for a material or product. They usually refer to defined requirements for materials or products, but in some instances can also relate to requirements for services. Specifications give a description of what the Organization wants to buy and what the vendor is required to provide. Specifications can be simple or complex, depending on the need.

The specification forms part of the invitation to bid, request for proposal, or request for quotation.

Three types of defining needs (or a combination of the three) can be included in the specification:

- a. Functional specifications, defining what the goods/services are required to do;
- b. Performance specifications, defining the output of the goods/services; or
- c. Conformance specifications, defining the physical characteristics and dimensions of the goods.

4.4.4 Terms of Reference (TOR)

A TOR is a description of the scope of work for services, generally indicating the work to be performed, the level of quality and effort, the timeline, and the deliverables. TORs are mostly used to define the performance requirements for expert and advisory services, which are not easily quantified, e.g. where a solution to a requirement is offered.

The TOR is often the vendor's first and main introduction to the requirements. Clear, uncontradictory TORs will limit the risks to the vendor and enable them to prepare a clear and detailed proposal. This should lead to successfully implemented projects and limit the risk of dispute or claims.

The TOR typically includes the following information:

- a. Background for requesting the service;
- b. The objective of the service and overall impact;
- c. Expected and clearly defined output from the service;

- d. Activities required to reach this output;
- e. Inputs required to perform activities;
- f. Deliverables;
- g. Timelines.

4.4.5 Statement of Work (SOW)

The SOW is a requirement specification for work assignments outlining the specific services, and/or goods a contractor is expected to provide, generally indicating the type, level, and quality of service, as well as the time schedule. The SOW usually includes detailed requirements for the goods and the services to be provided.

4.5 Shopping Cart

A Shopping Cart is a written or computerized requisition in UMOJA from an internal user/customer for the fulfillment or procurement of goods and/or services. It is mandatory to initiate all procurement activities with a shopping cart unless the Procurement Official with DOA grants a special case-by-case waiver to issue the solicitation for a justified reason (emergency, etc.).

A requisition/shopping cart must at a minimum include:

- a. A detailed description of the goods, or services being sought;
- b. Product ID (This is critical to ensure quality of data and reporting);
- c. Confirmation of funds availability for the requested purchase;
- d. Quantity to be procured;
- e. Required delivery date or start-up/completion date;
- f. Delivery location or location of services to be performed;
- g. Estimated price;
- h. Any additional information (e.g. standardization, the preferred method of shipment).

The Requisitioner bears the responsibility for requesting new UMOJA product IDs. Please click on this link ( https://iseek-external.un.org/departmental\_page/master-data-maintenance-0) for additional guidance on how to submit requests for new product IDs, and when an indication of Product Categories suffices.

5. Sourcing

5.1 Sourcing of Vendors

Sourcing is the process of identifying suitable suppliers, including vendors, that could provide the required goods or services. The sourcing process also provides valuable information about products and specifications.

Sourcing is carried out using several main methodologies, as described below.

Supply market research and analysis, including through internal and external sources;

Advertisement of business opportunities through sourcing methods, such as Request for Information (RFI), REOI, and pre-qualification.

Vendors Recommended by Requisitioners:

- a. As a general rule, Requisitioners, substantive offices, and consultants engaged by Requisitioners or substantive offices may not recommend vendors for inclusion on the List of Invitees, as such practice may be perceived as undermining the principle of segregation of responsibilities between requisitioning and procurement entities. However, it is recommended that staff involved in procurement activities encourage vendors to register with the UNGM;
- b. If vendor recommendations are received, Procurement Officials shall carefully evaluate the desirability and propriety of including the recommended vendor on the invitee list. However, unless the Procurement Official is fully satisfied that the recommended vendor will bring special knowledge or expertise that will be beneficial to the proposed procurement, the recommended vendor should be excluded but may be encouraged to register for future or other solicitations;
- c. If the Procurement Official believes that a vendor should be invited to tender, then the concurrence of the Director, PD or CPO must first be obtained, and the individual recommending the vendor will have to ensure and declare that there is no potential conflict of interest between the vendor and him/herself;
- d. A consultant engaged to prepare or review technical specifications, TOR, or SOW and/or to assist in the evaluation of Bids or Proposals concerning a requirement shall not be allowed to submit a Bid or a Proposal for the same requirement;
- e. If a Vendor approaches the Requisitioner for inclusion on the List of Invitees, the Requisitioner shall direct the Vendor to the Procurement Official concerned.

5.2 Market Research

Market research is the process of collecting and analyzing information about industry sector capabilities and overall market supply. It helps to identify goods, services, and vendors, assists in the development of technical specifications, TORs, SOWs and allows the collection of product and pricing information on available technology, solutions, etc. Market research is an essential exercise conducted by the Procurement Official in the quest to satisfy the Organization's needs and is instrumental for any successful sourcing process, particularly if the goods or services have not been procured previously. When done through means such as seminars or events, market research may also be considered an outreach activity which assists the UN in disseminating information about its requirements and identifying new sources of supply.

Market research can be done through the use of external and/or internal sources. Market research should not rely solely on any one of the below sources, as several can be used in conjunction before deciding on the solicitation approach. The outcome of the market research, i.e. a list of suitable vendors, types of products available, etc. should be documented in the procurement case file and shared with the Requisitioner.

The following external sources are valuable sources of information in the search for potential vendors:

- a. UNGM (www.ungm.org);
- b. Other UN organizations/lead agencies specialized in the procurement of goods or services within a particular field if this constitutes Best Value for Money and more efficient use of resources (e.g. UNHCR for refugee supplies, UNICEF for vaccines, UNFPA for contraceptives, WHO for pharmaceuticals and medical equipment, UNEP for environmental technologies and services);
- c. Commercial/specialized journals and magazines;
- d. Chambers of commerce, trade delegations, embassies;
- e. End-users, clients;
- f. Business seminars, vendor catalogs, professional journals, trade publications, or the Internet.

The following internal sources can also be a good starting point in the search for potential vendors:

- a. Existing LTAs, BPO and, if existing for a certain need, pre-qualified lists of vendors;
- b. Vendors who have had prior contracts with the UN;
- c. Previous lists of invitees within the same field;
- d. Consultation with other Procurement Officials;
- e. Available communication platforms and other mailing lists.

Furthermore, care should be taken to ensure that small- and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), not-for-profit, minority-, women-owned businesses, and/or disability-inclusive suppliers are not excluded from the market research. Due consideration should be given to communication channels in the local language(s) to reach this specific audience and ensure effective international competition.

It is important to periodically reassess the market, particularly for products and services that are rapidly evolving in certain geographical areas and industries. During the development of Category Strategies as part of Category Management, extensive market research is conducted which can be drawn upon for individual solicitations where relevant.

5.3 Advertisement for Business Opportunities

Advertisement for business opportunities can be done by either one of the below methods:

- a. RFI – see Chapter 5.4 Request for Information
- b. REOI – see Chapter 5.5 Request for Expression of Interest \(REOI\), which may entail pre-qualification of vendors, if applicable and suitable (see Chapter 5.6 Pre-Qualification of Vendors)

Business opportunities over US$ 150,000, must be advertised on UNGM and PD's website unless a waiver is granted by the corresponding Procurement Approving Authority for reasons of, for example, maintaining the confidentiality of information concerning sensitive requirements or security concerns. They should be advertised or distributed as appropriate, in a manner that would lead to the most beneficial responses according to the nature and circumstances of the required product, such as announcements on local or regional radio, advertisement on websites of other organizations, in local or regional newspapers, or in specialized journals.

5.4 Request for Information (RFI)

The RFI is an instrument to conduct a market survey to obtain information that can be used to identify available or potential solutions/suppliers to fulfill identified needs. RFIs may include information on cost and delivery times and are generally executed prior to finalizing the Statement of Works, Terms of Reference, or technical specifications.

The information received in response to an RFI is not used for the purpose of qualifying vendors. Primarily, it helps identify generic descriptions of available or potential alternatives for fulfilling a defined requirement or outcome, as well as the possible costs and delivery time. The RFI is oriented toward seeking a technical alternative, option, solution, or cost estimate, rather than a direct response in the form of an offer from the market or industry.

An RFI is an effective and efficient tool to help identify a possible solution for a specific requirement and to gauge the commercial environment for the requirement. RFIs are also used to identify potential vendors.

The RFI shall be advertised on the entity's website, UNPD website, UNGM, and in any other media considered appropriate by the Procurement Official. It should be advertised or distributed in a manner that, depending on the nature and complexity of the requirement would lead to the most beneficial responses.

5.5 Request for Expression of Interest (REOI)

A Request for EOI is an advertisement prepared by the Procurement Official, in consultation with the Requisitioner, to identify vendors that wish to participate in a solicitation. Vendors are requested to express interest by a specified deadline by submitting the detailed information requested in the REOI, for example, to demonstrate experience and qualifications in provision of the relevant goods/services. The information provided by interested vendors is assessed, and vendors are considered for inclusion on the List of Invitees.

An REOI is a cost-effective method to identify suitable vendors. However, it requires the allocation of additional time, as vendors should be given a sufficient interval to respond to the REOI. Depending on the complexity and nature of the goods or services being procured, a recommended minimum of ten working days should be granted for responses. When shorter deadlines are specified, or when the Procurement Approving Authority waives the posting of an REOI for Request for Proposals (RFPs) and Invitations to Bid (ITBs), the reasons must be properly explained and documented in the case file.

Evaluation of REOI responses must be performed by the Requisitioner and/or a Procurement Official. As appropriate. In addition, the Procurement Official may actively approach potential vendors, identified through analysis of the supply market or registered in the UNGM database, to seek their interest to participate in the forthcoming solicitation.

The REOI shall be advertised on the entity's website, UNPD website, UNGM, and in any other media considered appropriate by the Procurement Official. It should be advertised or distributed in a manner that, depending on the nature and complexity of the required need, would lead to the most beneficial responses.

5.6 Pre-Qualification of Vendors

Pre-qualification is a formal method of assessing vendors against pre-determined criteria, and only vendors that meet established criteria are invited to a tender (shortlist). Therefore, pre-qualification exercises should be applied only in such instances where the need to limit the List of Invitees has been clearly determined and the Procurement Approving Authority has authorized the pre-qualification exercise. This is done through the REOI process. The use of a pre-qualification exercise should be noted in the Source Selection Plan of the relevant solicitation, including the rationale for using the pre-qualification exercise.

The process guarantees that solicitation documents are issued only to vendors with adequate capabilities and resources. Adequate time must be allowed for potential vendors to prepare responsive applications. The period between the invitation for pre-qualification and the deadline for submission of a response shall be no less than ten working days unless a written justification has been provided and approved by the Director, PD or the Chief Procurement Officer. Such approval shall be kept in the procurement case file. Invitations for pre-qualification must be advertised on the UNGM and PD website and any other relevant media. Pre-qualification is a formal process where vendor appraisal is done prior to issuing the solicitation documents. If prequalification is done for a specific procurement activity, all vendors submitting applications and meeting the prequalification criteria shall be invited to tender. Pre-qualification does not preordain a contract award.

Pre-qualification is recommended when:

- a. The high costs of preparing detailed bids could discourage competition (such as custom-designed equipment, design and build projects, or specialized services).
- b. The requirement involves complex technical components for which the vendor needs to have minimum technical capability and capacity to complete the works to the required quality standard such as construction works;
- c. As determined necessary to achieve the best outcome for the procurement process for highly complex or otherwise appropriate needs, subject to approval by the Director, PD or Chief Procurement Officer. The criteria for the prequalification, the process, and the staff involved in the prequalification evaluation shall be established before the REOI is advertised. It shall be outlined in a separate document, and signed and dated by the Requisitioner, and cleared and signed by the Procurement Official.

5.7 Creation of Lists of Invitees

The identification of vendors using the tools described above enables the creation of the list of potential vendors eligible to receive the solicitation documents.

Generally, the Procurement Official should invite all vendors that expressed interest through an REOI, and that are registered at least at the basic level in UNGM at the time of issuance of the solicitation. The UN is under no obligation to invite all companies who expressed interest through a request for EOI or having replied to an RFI; such decision shall be documented in the SSP. Similarly, there is no obligation for the UN to limit the List of Invitees to companies that expressed interest or replied to an RFI. Where additional companies are added, the evaluation committee should assess the same information for each vendor as was requested in the EOI or RFI.

If there is only a limited number of vendors in the market (e.g. oligopoly market conditions) and/or the Procurement Official has not been able to otherwise identify the minimum required number of invitees specified below despite adequate market research, this should be clearly documented and explained to the Procurement Approving Authority not below the Chief of Section in a procurement office or to the CPO when requesting approval of the List of Invitees.

Otherwise, the List of Invitees for formal methods of solicitation should normally include (depending on the industry and nature of the requirement) a minimum required number of ten (10) invitees for tenders below US$ 1,000,000 and fifteen (15) invitees for tenders estimated at a value above US$ 1,000,000. For Request for Quotations (RFQs), a minimum of five invitees is required, however the Procurement Official shall ensure sufficient number of invitees to generate more than five quotations but no less than a minimum of three quotations (see Chapter 6.3.3).

If a pre-qualification stage has been undertaken, vendors that are ineligible must not be included in the List of Invitees. In such cases, the minimum recommended number of vendors do not apply.

5.8 Approval of List of Invitees

The List of Invitees must include all vendors who will be invited to tender. If the minimum recommended number of vendors, as per Chapter 5.7, cannot be achieved, the rationale should be justified in writing in the procurement file and must be authorized by the appropriate Procurement Approving Authority based on the value of the procurement exercise, up to the threshold of the Director, PD or Chief Procurement Official. This justification may be written in or attached to the List of Invitees. The solicitation document can be issued only after this justification has been provided.

5.9 Amendment of List of Invitees

Amendments to the List of Invitees may be made by removing or adding vendors who will be invited to tender. Vendors may be added to the List of Invitees upon approval of the Procurement Approving Authority. The decision is based on the professional judgment of the Procurement Official at the CPO level or Chief of Section as to whether the vendor may be reasonably expected to provide a competitive bid and is duly registered in UNGM. In the case of additions to correct omissions and errors in distribution by the UN, an extension to the bid submission deadline may be considered.

INTERNATIONAL COMPETITION

One of the core principles of procurement, international competition aims to solicit offers from a wide and diverse range of vendors and provides equal access and fair opportunity to compete for contracts for required goods or services.

Requests from invited vendors to revise the entity included in the List of Invitees, to reflect such things as subsidiary structures or joint venture engagements, shall be considered on the basis of professional judgment of the Procurement Official at the CPO level or Chief of Section and subsequent approval by the Procurement Approving Authority (see also Chapter 3.1.4.1 \(b\) on joint ventures). In such cases, the Procurement Official shall ensure that such entities are registered at the basic level in UNGM at the time of invitation.

6. Solicitation

6.1 Overview

After requirements have been clearly and completely defined (see Chapter 4.4 Requirements Definition) and sourcing of vendors has been undertaken (see Chapter 5 Sourcing), the next step in the procurement process is a solicitation. The solicitation process is the method used to communicate a procurement requirement and request an offer from potential vendors.

Further to the market and vendor information identified in the sourcing process, Procurement Officials should ensure consistent alignment of the solicitation with the existing category management strategy. Unless exceptions to the use of formal methods of solicitation are justified, procurement contracts shall be awarded based on competition, which includes:

- a. Acquisition planning for developing an overall procurement strategy and methodology, an analysis of demand and supply market data, in alignment with an existing category management strategy (if applicable);
- b. Market research for identifying a potential vendor;
- c. Formal methods of solicitation or informal methods of solicitation;
- d. Consideration of prudent commercial practices.

6.2 Competition

6.2.1 Effective International Competition

Ensuring effective competition is a core principle of UN procurement. Competition should be internationally based. A key purpose of international competition is to provide a wide and diverse range of potential vendors. Procurement Officials must comply with the UN's principle of encouraging international competition and, in doing so, should encourage equal access and fair opportunity for all qualified vendors globally to compete for UN contracts for goods or services.

The following conditions are conducive to achieving effective international competition:

- a. Market analysis and advertisement is conducted to identify prospective bidders;
- b. Requirements are specified in a generic manner, allowing for competition between multiple bidders;
- c. A sufficient number of prospective contractors are identified and effectively invited to compete;
- d. Prospective contractors are from as wide a geographical distribution as possible and practicable;
- e. Prospective vendors act independently of each other;
- f. Prospective vendors compete for the same business opportunity under the same conditions.

A low number of offers received from prospective contractors in response to a solicitation is not necessarily an indication of an absence of effective international competition, given that industries, geographical markets, and individual requirements may have idiosyncrasies that affect the number of viable and responsive competitors.

Financial Rule 105.14 provides that the UN's procurement contracts shall be awarded on the basis of effective competition unless exceptions to the use of formal methods of solicitation pursuant to Financial Rule 105.16 are justified. To that end, the competitive process requires:

- a. Acquisition planning for developing an overall procurement strategy and procurement methodologies;
- b. Market research for identifying potential vendors;
- c. Consideration of prudent commercial practices;
- d. Formal methods of solicitation, utilizing ITBs or requests for proposals on the basis of the advertisement or direct solicitation of invited vendors, or informal methods of solicitation, such as requests for quotations.

6.2.2 Special Considerations for List of Invitees

While international competition should be pursued in principle, there are some circumstances where limiting the pool of vendors may be appropriate. This may apply when the solicitation process is restricted to a shortlist of vendors selected in a nondiscriminatory manner from rosters (e.g. list of authorized resellers), pre-qualifications, market research, or other means of sourcing.

For example, limited tendering may be considered in the following circumstances:

- a. When the requirement is in a national context and it is not reasonably possible that international vendors would be able to address it (e.g. advertising services in national newspapers, local licenses required to operate, etc.);
- b. For reasons of safety and security;
- c. When the estimated value of the requirement is less than US$ 150,000;
- d. Any other equivalent, exceptional reason that prevents international competition.

If the Procurement Official, using professional judgment, believes that limiting the pool of vendors should be applied to a particular solicitation process, then the use of a limited pool must be approved by a Procurement Approving Authority at or above the CPO level (if not at UNHQ) or the Section Chief level (if at UNHQ). Such approval must be given at the time of shortlisting approval (by signing the corresponding field in the List of Invitees). Furthermore, the basis for the decision to limit international competition must be justified in writing by the Procurement Approving Authority responsible for approving the solicitation document and recorded in the applicable procurement case file.

6.2.3 Risk of Collusion

To ensure good and fair competition in the solicitation process, Procurement Officials should do their best to identify any circumstances that may indicate risk of collusion by potential vendors (i.e., vendors uniting for common profit and defeating the purpose of competition).

6.3 Solicitation Methods

6.3.1 Formal Methods and Informal Methods

Unless exceptions to formal methods of solicitation are justified in accordance with the Financial Regulations and Rules, formal methods of solicitation must be used. See Financial Rule 105.15 (Formal methods of solicitation) and Financial Rule 105.16 (Exceptions to the use of formal methods of solicitation).

The table below summarizes the four primary methods of solicitation. A more detailed explanation of the four methods is set forth in the immediately following chapters.

Solicitation Method	Estimated Value	Requirement	Evaluation Method	Envelope System
LVA (informal)	≤US$ 10,000	Off-the-shelf goods, standard specification, simple services	Lowest priced, technically acceptable offer	No requirement for sealed offers
RFQ (informal)	≤US$ 150,000	Goods or services which are clear and specific	Lowest priced, technically acceptable offer	No requirement for sealed offers. Upon introduction of e-tendering, offers will be secured until the deadline for all Submissions. Procurement Officials should undertake their best efforts to ensure that 5 or more quotations are received. However, should fewer than 3 quotations be received, the Director, PD or CPO must authorize the release of the quotations received. In an entity without a CPO, the approval of the official with the highest delegated procurement authority shall be sought.

ITB (formal)	> US$ 150,000	Goods or services which are clearly and completely specified	Lowest priced, substantially conforming bid	One envelope
RFP (formal)	> US$ 150,000	Goods or services that cannot be expressed quantitatively and qualitatively, or complex requirements that may be met in a variety of ways	Cumulative/weighted analysis; award based on the most responsive proposal	Two envelopes

The four main solicitation methods are ITBs, RFPs, RFQs, or LVAs. These four methods of solicitation, as well as other exceptions to formal methods of solicitation, are discussed in detail below.

ITBs and RFPs are “formal” methods of solicitation. ITBs and RFPs are governed by Financial Rule 105.15.

Low Value Acquisitions (LVAs) and RFQs are “informal” methods of solicitation. LVAs and RFQs are exceptions to the use of formal methods and are governed by Financial Rule 105.16.

Several factors, such as market conditions, the complexity and nature of the requirement (i.e., goods, services, or works), an estimated monetary value, influence the choice of solicitation method. Location and urgency might also influence the choice of solicitation method and the procedures followed.

6.3.2 Low Value Acquisition (LVA)

An LVA is a direct form of purchasing undertaken by the Requisitioner or a Procurement Official and not conducted via a formal solicitation. An LVA is used for procuring readily available, off-the-shelf or standard specification goods or services up to or equal to US$ 10,000, or simple works or services up to or equal to the value of US$ 10,000.

6.3.2.1 Criteria of an LVA

LVAs are awarded based on the ‘lowest-priced, technically acceptable offer’ and are approved by a Procurement Official or a Certifying Officer (CO), subject to the following conditions:

- a. Under no circumstances shall the requirements be split into multiple solicitations or combined between RFQs and LVAs for the same or related requirement to avoid a formal method of solicitation. If the estimated value of the requirements exceeds US$ 10,000 (or the equivalent amount, as per UN Operational Rates of Exchange on the quotation date), the requirement shall be submitted for procurement action through the established procedures;
- b. The LVA must comply with the four principles stated in Financial Regulation 5.12 (i.e., Best Value for Money; fairness, integrity and transparency; effective international competition; the interest of the United Nations);
- c. The LVA should not be used to buy goods or services that are recurring requirements in the procurement pipeline, unless it is required to cater for unforeseen requirements or if UN stock is unavailable, or it is used to order from an established BPO;

- d. Should an entity identify that LVAs are being used repeatedly within the same year to buy similar requirements by the same office or several offices pertaining to such entity, efforts should be made to aggregate the requirements and conduct a bidding exercise, with the aim to replace the use of LVAs with a Contract or a Blanket Purchase Order as soon as possible.
- e. specifications used to describe the requirement shall be generic in nature. For proprietary goods or services (e.g. spare parts), or for goods or services that cannot be described in a generic manner due to operational requirements (e.g. size-specific items to fit in an existing structure), the Requisitioner shall provide a written justification and obtain the CO's approval prior to seeking quotations. The CO's approval not to use generic specifications is to be uploaded in UMOJA;
- f. LVAs for non-standardized software/hardware require the technical review from OICT<sup>3</sup>. LVAs for standardized software/hardware do not require technical review;
- g. Regarding LVAs and purchase orders for software, the LVAs or purchase order (PO) instrument must clearly indicate that only the United Nations General Terms and Conditions of Contract (UNGCC) are to apply and that no additional terms or changes to UNGCC are to be accepted. Provisions that may be included on vendors' websites, product schedules or other ordering documents, or in 'shrink wrap/click-wrap' agreements, are not to be incorporated into the LVA or PO instruments because such provisions may conflict with the terms of the UNGCC. In this context, LVAs and purchase orders for software shall be accompanied by the language contained in the attached Annex 10 (LVA Guidelines) when sent to vendors. In case of objections from a vendor, such language may be negotiated only with the assistance of a Procurement Official;
- h. LVAs cannot be used for blood or blood products;
- i. No Existing Contracts: LVAs should not be used to purchase goods or services that are available (e.g. with a similar or equivalent function) in a current global or local systems contract or, if subject to UN standardization, unless it can be demonstrated that such purchase constitutes Best Value for Money. The Procurement Official or the Requisitioner must record such an assessment in a written note in UMOJA including any required technical review note as per paragraph e. and g. above. If an LVA is used to purchase from an existing system contract, the LVA should be linked to the relevant system contract in UMOJA and be consistent with terms and conditions of the system contract;
- j. The Procurement Official or the Requisitioner shall obtain a minimum of three quotations from vendors, via phone, e-mail, fax, in person, or online. If a Requisitioner or Procurement Official is not able to produce at least three quotations despite its best efforts, a written explanation of the reasons must be recorded in UMOJA for the approval of the CO or Procurement Approving Authority. The quotations must be sought from competitive vendors for a quantitatively and qualitatively similar requirement. Quotation via phone or in person shall be obtained only when it is not possible to obtain written quotations;
- k. Quotations should cover price, quantity, quality (using generic specifications, unless authorized by the CO), delivery place and time, warranties, after-sale support, and any other reasonable requirements, as applicable. In all but the most exceptional circumstances, quotations must be in writing from the vendors. If quotations are not in writing, the Requisitioner or Procurement Official shall prepare a written record thereof;
- l. Quotations should allow a like-for-like comparison to achieve Best Value for Money by selecting the lowest quotation. If the Requisitioner or Procurement Official determines that the quotation offering Best Value for Money does not constitute the lowest cost, a written explanation must be recorded in UMOJA for the CO's or Procurement Approving Authority's approval. Quotations must be uploaded in UMOJA;

- m. Cash advances should not be made. Advance payment terms should not be accepted unless normal commercial practice or the interest of the United Nations requires it. Approval from the delegation holder in accordance with Financial Rule 105.19 is necessary;
- n. Ex post facto cases should be rare exceptions, and when they occur, written justification shall be provided to explain the reasons why timely submission of the case was not possible. Such justification should identify the reasons for the ex post facto situation and propose how to address the root cause in order to avoid reoccurrence

Requisitioners or Procurement Officials shall not enter into any LVA commitments with vendors unless the LVA's PO is approved by the CO or Procurement Approving Authority.

All LVA purchases should be in writing (stating price, quantity, brand/model, delivery place/time, warranties, after-sale support, etc., as applicable), with receipts obtained. Receipt, inspection, and payment shall follow the normal process as for goods/services acquired via a formal procurement exercise.

COs and Procurement Officials must ensure that an audit trail is recorded in UMOJA. In case of doubt, the COs or Procurement Officials should consult with PD or their respective Chief Procurement Officer.

Annex 10 – Language to accompany LVAs and purchase orders for software

6.3.2.2 Exceptions to LVAs

The following requirements cannot be purchased through an LVA and shall be processed via procurement, regardless of value:

- a. Firearms and ammunition;
- b. Blood or blood products;
- c. Software to be run in data centres.

For easy reference, click the link to the “Business Partner Commercial Companies” to create UMOJA LVA vendors: https://iseek-newyork.un.org/departamental\_page/master-data-maintenance-0.

IPSAS Compliance: LVAs for goods that are considered “assets” as defined by IPSAS must be properly identified in Shopping Carts in order to allow the appropriate downstream process in relation to capitalizing cost, inventory, etc. (see training material “SC318 – UMOJA Requisitioning”, and User Guide “UMOJA Requisitioning”).

6.3.3 Request for Quotation (RFQ)

An RFQ is an informal method of solicitation. It is used for low-value procurement (equal to or below US$ 150,000) where the requirement for goods or services is clear and specific, and the estimated value is up to US$ 150,000. The RFQ process shall comply with the four principles stated in Financial Regulation 5.12.

RFQs are awarded based on the technically acceptable offer that is the lowest price. RFQs are subject to the following conditions:

- a. Under no circumstances shall the requirement be split into multiple solicitations or combined with other RFQs or LVAs for the same or related, in order to avoid a formal method of solicitation. The RFQ solicitation process can only be conducted by a qualified Procurement Official who was delegated such authority;
- b. Prior to commencing the RFQ, the Procurement Official will estimate the total value of the goods and/or services and substantiate such estimate in the Source Selection Plan.
- c. A minimum of five invitees to an RFQ is required. However, the Procurement Official shall ensure that sufficient number of invitees are invited to generate more than five quotations but no less than a minimum of three quotations. Should it not be possible to invite five vendors, the reason must be recorded in writing and signed by the Procurement Official;
- d. Procurement Officials should undertake their best efforts to ensure that 5 or more quotations are received. An RFQ should generate a minimum of three offers. If a Procurement Official is not able to obtain at least three (3) quotations despite his/her best efforts, a written explanation of the reasons must be recorded in the relevant system for the approval by the Director, PD or the CPO, to allow award based on lower number of offers;
- e. The use of the RFQ templates is mandatory in all cases, except when there is a justifiable reason not to use them (such as when the RFQ is issued in a language for which a template does not exist). RFQs must have a clearly defined submission deadline, which must be specified in the RFQ document and communicated to all prospective bidders. Quotations in response to an RFQ must be received in writing to a centralized, dedicated e-mail address as established by each Procurement Office and released to the Procurement Official simultaneously. Gradually, the e-tendering process will be expanded to RFQ requirements;
- f. Quotations should be uploaded in UMOJA for monitoring and audit purposes. Alternatively, quotations may also be filed electronically, e.g. in sharepoint, as long as monitoring and audit requirements will be met;
- g. Should the RFQ process result in a contract value exceeding the threshold for informal methods of solicitation, the Procurement Approving Authority shall consider and determine on a case-by-case basis whether to re-issue the solicitation under the appropriate solicitation method. If the final contract value exceeds the threshold by a significant amount, or if the contract is not urgently needed, preference should be given to rebid the requirement under the appropriate solicitation method unless there are justifiable reasons not to.
- h. Awards are made based on the “lowest-priced, technically acceptable offer” evaluation methodology and based on Financial Rule 105.16 (a)(x) (see Chapter 8 Evaluation of Submissions).

6.3.4 Invitation to Bid (ITB)

An ITB is a formal method of solicitation where vendors are invited to submit a bid for the provision of goods or services. It is normally used when the requirements for goods/services are i) simple and straightforward, ii) can be expressed well quantitatively and qualitatively at the time of solicitation, and iii) can be provided in a straightforward way. For UN procurements above US$ 150,000, one of the two formal methods of solicitation (i.e. ITB or RFP) must be used unless there is an exception to the normal process, in accordance with Financial Rule 105.16. ITB can also be used for lower value procurement equal to or below US$ 150,000 if the Procurement Official determines it appropriate to the particularities of the requirement.

Criteria of an ITB: ITBs are awarded based on the technically acceptable offer that is the lowest price. ITBs are subject to the following conditions:

- a. The use of the ITB templates is mandatory in all cases. ITBs must have a clearly defined submission deadline, which must be specified in the ITB document and communicated to all prospective bidders. Bids in response to an ITB must be received in writing;
- b. ITBs are based on a one-envelope system, i.e., the financial and the technical components of a bid are combined in one single document. ITBs are subject to the bid receipt and opening procedures outlined in Chapter 7: Management of Submissions;
- c. An ITB can either define the minimum requirements to be met, or outline a range of acceptable requirements. During the evaluation, a bid is compliant based on pass/fail criteria;
- d. Applicable Financial Rule: Awards are based on the lowest-priced, substantially conforming bid evaluation methodology, including delivery terms, and any other technical requirements stated in the ITB Financial Rule 105.15 (a) (See Chapter 8: Evaluation of Submissions).

6.3.5 Request for Proposal (RFP)

An RFP is a formal method of solicitation. It is used for procurement of goods and services when requirements cannot be expressed quantitatively and qualitatively (e.g. consulting or similar services) at the time of solicitation or for the purchase of complex goods and/or services where the requirements may be met in a variety of ways and, accordingly, an evaluation based on cumulative/weighted analysis is most appropriate. In this case, the UN prepares Solicitation Documents, which describe the Requirement for goods/services and requests that vendors submit proposals with solutions and associated pricing for the goods/services that the UN is requiring. For UN procurements above US $150,000, one of the two formal methods of solicitation (i.e., ITB or RFP) must be used (unless there is an exception to the normal process in accordance with Financial Rule 105.16). An RFP is only required for procurement above US$ 150,000 but can also be used for lower value procurement (equal to or below US$ 150,000) if requirements are complex or if the Procurement Official otherwise determines it appropriate.

Criteria of an RFP: RFPs are subject to the following conditions:

- a. An RFP requests that bidders submit a technical proposal that offers a solution to the requirements specified in the solicitation documents. Bidders are also to submit a separate financial proposal indicating all costs that the bidder will charge in carrying out the technical proposal. In response to an RFP, vendors must submit the technical and financial proposals in separate sealed envelopes (two-envelope system). The purpose of the two-envelope system is to make sure the technical evaluation focuses solely on the contents of the technical proposals, without influence from the financial proposals.
- b. RFPs are subject to the bid receipt and opening procedures outlined in Chapter 7, including the requirement for separate opening sessions for technical proposals (all proposals received) and financial proposals (only for those whose proposals are deemed technically compliant after evaluation).

- c. The evaluation criteria for an RFP are to be expressly stated in the SSP and in the Solicitation Documents. Both the technical and the financial (i.e. commercial) evaluation factors shall be described. Mandatory evaluation criteria (if any) must also be described.
- d. The weight of technical factors versus financial factors must also be indicated.

Proposals are evaluated, ranked, and awarded according to the 'cumulative/weighted analysis' evaluation methodology, defining best value as the paramount overall benefit when considering technical and financial factors. The contract is awarded to the qualified vendor whose proposal is considered to be most responsive to the requirements in the solicitation and offers the best value (technical and financial) (Financial Rule 105.15 (b)).

To give bidders a sense of what the UN deems important in the evaluation process, the technical and commercial criteria shall be listed in the RFP Solicitation Documents in priority order of their weight. However, the exact weights of each technical and financial sub-criterion may not be disclosed to bidders in the Solicitation Documents or otherwise.

In order to further assist bidders in determining the appropriate quality of goods or services that the UN seeks, the Procurement Official may choose to include estimates of personnel and other input required in order to reach the expected results. In exceptional circumstances, it also can be envisaged to include an indication of the available budget; however, the potential drawback is that information about the available budget may lead bidders to align their financial proposals to the budget disclosed. Such disclosure may be only done upon approval from the Director, PD or the CPO.

The weighting of technical proposal vs. financial proposal should be considered as follows:

- a. The applicable balance between the technical and commercial evaluation criteria must be established before the RFP is issued, and expressly stated in the SSP and in the Solicitation Documents. Weighting needs to be considered on a case-by-case basis to achieve the appropriate balance.
- b. Weightings of technical and financial proposals can be in the proportion of either 80%-20%, 70%-30%, 60%-40%, or 50%-50%, or as deemed appropriate by the Procurement Official, depending on whether the technical elements or the financial element have been determined to have higher importance. The lower the complexity of the technical requirements, the higher the weight that should be given to the financial element. If the financial element is difficult to reliably foresee or control over the course of the contract, then the weight given to the financial element may be lower.
- c. Each technical and commercial evaluation criterion needs to have a pre-established weight unless the criterion is a mandatory requirement (If it is a mandatory requirement, then the bidders' compliance with the criterion will be evaluated on a pass/fail basis).

TIPS FOR RFP

Weighting of technical and financial proposals needs to be considered on a case-by-case basis to achieve the appropriate balance.

The technical and commercial criteria in the RFP shall be listed in the priority order of their weight, while the exact weights of each technical and financial sub-criterion may not be disclosed in the solicitation document.

Each technical and commercial evaluation criterion needs to have a pre-established weight, unless they are

In the SSP and in the RFP, a minimum passing threshold in terms of percentage of the total points of the technical proposal (normally 60% or 70% of total points) must be indicated. If a bidder's technical proposal passes this minimum threshold and meets all mandatory requirements, the proposal will be deemed technically compliant to the RFP. If it is technically responsive, then the bidder's financial proposal will be subject to the financial evaluation. If it is not deemed technically compliant, then the bidder's proposal will not be further considered for purposes of being awarded a contract pursuant to the RFP.

6.3.5.1 Multi-Stage RFPs

A multi-stage RFP procurement process may be chosen in exceptional cases and only upon approval by the ASG, OSCM or his or her designate, as the method of solicitation.

Two-Step Process: The multi-stage RFP is similar to a standard RFP process. However, in a multi-stage RFP procurement process, bidders are to submit interim proposals. Prior to submission of their interim proposals for evaluation, the UN enters into discussion/dialogue with all prequalified bidders. The evaluation may result either in all bidders being permitted to the next stage or some bidders being eliminated from further consideration if their proposals are deemed clearly unsuitable for the needs of the UN. On an individual basis, the UN will enter into discussion/dialogue with those bidders that passed the interim evaluation to enable them to submit final proposals in response to the RFP.

Prototypes or Proof-of-Concept Elements: Pursuant to the SSP, the RFP may require the proposals to include prototypes or proof of concept elements. The interim proposals and, if applicable, the prototype/proof of concepts will be evaluated based on pre-established technical criteria that are clearly indicated in the SSP. The technical criteria should not be changed during the solicitation process. Please note that prototypes or proof-of-concepts may be incorporated into normal RFPs as well as multi-stage RFPs.

Amendments to the RFP: In connection with the evaluation of the interim proposals and the subsequent dialogues, the RFP may be amended to clarify the terms of the requirements. The amended RFP should be issued to all remaining bidders. It should be noted, however, that the requirements outlined in the original RFP cannot be materially changed. Furthermore, the technical and financial evaluation criteria cannot be materially changed at this stage.

Criteria: The multi-stage RFP is an exceptional process which may be selected if

- i. The means of delivering the requirement of the UN cannot be met without adaptation of readily available solutions.
- ii. The UN's needs are for complex and innovative solutions that cannot be defined in sufficient detail in a SOW; and
- iii. Other methods of solicitation do not allow for the required level of collaboration between the UN and bidders to develop a suitable solution (i.e., the use of a standard RFP has been assessed and determined to be not appropriate or constitutes an unacceptable level of high risk).

The fact that the requirement entails aspects of innovation does not in itself justify the use of a multi-stage RFP.

Resource-intensive Process: The multi-stage RFP process is a detailed, resource-intensive process that needs to be properly managed for its benefits to be fully realized while maintaining the principles of fairness and integrity. Its use and suitability for a specific requirement should be justified in the SSP.

Negotiations: Procurement Officials should note that the use of multi-stage RFPs does not preclude negotiations with the vendor recommended for award. However, the technical criteria as well as the requirement should not be changed during negotiations.

Probity Monitor: To ensure that the multi-stage RFP process is done consistent with the applicable UN Financial Regulations and Rules and recognized best practices, an independent Probity Monitor may be appointed by the ASG, OSCM to provide probity assurance services throughout the process. The Probity Monitor should not have any decision-making role in the RFP process. The Probity Monitor should be an independent party and should not report to Procurement or the Requisitioning Office; it should report to ASG, OSCM.

6.4 Solicitation Documents

6.4.1 Overview

UN standard solicitation templates should be used when soliciting offers from vendors through RFQs, ITBs, or RFPs and which will contain all information necessary to prepare a suitable offer. The standard solicitation documents are templates that include mandatory requirements, terms and conditions customized to fit the specific requirements (goods/services), and the procurement method undertaken (informal/formal). The templates are to be completed with the details applicable to each solicitation process.

While the details and complexity of solicitation documents may vary according to the nature and value of the requirements, each set of solicitation documents must contain all information and appropriate provisions that are necessary for bidders to understand the UN's needs and to prepare a competitive offer. Thus, the solicitation documents must include all information concerning a specific solicitation process and be as concise as possible. New requirements cannot be introduced, and existing ones cannot be changed after the solicitation documents have been issued unless amended in line with Chapter 6.6.

The standard paragraphs of the solicitation documents, including the annexes, cannot be amended except for Annex B, which includes the SOW or TOR. Furthermore, solicitation documents should not include any text, requirements, or conditions that contradict the UNGCC.

UN solicitation documents usually consist of the following components:

- a. Letter of Invitation (main tender document);
- b. Acknowledgment Letter;
- c. Statement of Works/Requirements;
- d. Special Instructions and Evaluation Criteria;
- e. Performance Security Form (if applicable);
- f. Form of Contract and relevant UNGCC.

The following articles (Chapters 6.4.2 through 6.4.9) describe the information that is typically part of each of the components mentioned above. However, in some cases, the Procurement Official may alter the composition of some of the components if, in the professional judgment, the documents provide a clear and complete description of the requirements and instructions to bidders.

6.4.2 Letter of Invitation

The solicitation documents should include on the first page a letter (a “Letter of Invitation”) inviting vendors to submit quotations/bids/proposals. The Letter of Invitation should include the following, among other elements:

- a. A reference to the specific procurement activity (title and reference number);
- b. A list of the sections that make up the solicitation documents and the supporting documents to be issued as part of the solicitation documents;
- c. Name and contact details of the UN Procurement Official in charge of the solicitation and for the clarifications process. Alternatively, it can include a generic email address from the procurement unit or the mechanism by which clarifications are handled on an e-tendering system (if the solicitation process is done via e-tendering);
- d. The solicitation documents should stipulate that any additional information, clarification, correction of errors, or modifications of bidding documents will be distributed and detailed in a written notification to bidders prior to the deadline for receipt, in order to enable bidders to take appropriate actions;
- e. Similarly, all vendors should be informed of the right to modify or make corrections to quotations, bids, or proposals, provided that any such modification or corrections are received by the UN in writing prior to the deadline for Submissions in the same manner of submission, as instructed in the Letter of Invitation;
- f. Vendors should be requested to keep their offers valid for a specified number of days, allowing time for evaluation of offers and award of contract. Typically, a vendor should be requested to keep its offer valid for a period of 60 or 180 days for ITBs and RFPs, and for 30-60 days for RFQs, but the timeframe could be reduced if the price of the good/service to be procured fluctuates rapidly (e.g. raw materials, petroleum products, etc.);
- g. The Letter of Invitation shall indicate in which currency the prices of the offer should be quoted or if vendors can determine the currency. Further, the instructions should state that the contract will be issued in the currency determined by the UN in the bidding document or in the bidder’s offer (as the case may be), and the payment will be issued in the currency of the contract;
- h. If receipt of offers is permitted in another currency, the UN shall convert prices to a single currency using the United Nations operational rate of exchange, applicable on the deadline date for receipt of offers;
- i. Article II, Section 7 of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities provides, inter alia, that the United Nations is exempt from all direct taxes, except charges for public utility services, and is exempt from customs restrictions, duties, and charges of a similar nature, in respect of articles imported or exported for its official use;
- j. The solicitation document should state that all bids shall be submitted net of any direct taxes and any other taxes and duties payable for the purpose of bid evaluation. Therefore, the Delivered Duty Paid (DDP) Incoterm must not be used in solicitation documents for goods and OLA or an entity’s Legal Advisor must approve exceptions to this rule;
- k. The Special Instructions shall indicate whether Bid Security is to be required. If Bid Security is required, then the amount and form of the Bid Security should be indicated. (See Chapter 6.4.8 for more information on Bid Security requirements);
- l. The solicitation documents shall stipulate that the bidder must identify any subcontractors that will be material to the vendor’s performance under the contract. The use of subcontractors does not relieve the vendor with whom the UN has a contract of its responsibility to fulfill the terms and conditions of the contract. The UN reserves the right

- to obtain from the subcontractors the same level of information as from the prime contractor, for the sake of due diligence (security, capacity, financial strength, etc.). However, it must be clear that the UN will not enter into a contractual relationship with any subcontractors, and as such, holds no liability to subcontractors. Once a contract is awarded, the UN's consent is required to replace subcontractors;
- m. The solicitation documents, as well as the offers, are to be prepared in English and/or official UN languages, as needed and subject to the capacity of the office;
  - n. Translation of the solicitation documents into a local language may be necessary and is encouraged to facilitate access to business opportunities by local vendors if deemed appropriate. If such need and corresponding capacity exist, optional translations into other languages may be undertaken. Regardless of whether a translated version of the solicitations documents is provided for convenience purposes, the English version of the solicitation documents (including the UNGCC and the model form of contract, included as part of the solicitation document) alone shall govern the contractual relations between the UN and the bidder. The translated version(s) is provided for convenience only and is not to be relied upon as having any force and effect for contractual purposes. A statement to this effect should be included in any document that is translated;
  - o. Deadline:
    - i. The date, time and place for submission of offers must be clearly stated, together with the location, date, and time for the opening of offers (if public);
    - ii. The deadline for submission should allow a vendor a sufficient number of days to prepare and submit an offer. Consult the below table for the recommended minimum solicitation periods (excluding the issue date but including the closing date);
    - iii. If due cause exists, the Procurement Approving Authority can authorize a shorter solicitation period. However, the Procurement Official must justify the decision for waiving the minimum period requirement in a note to the file that describes the reasons and explains how the requirement for the competition will be met, despite the shortened solicitation period. The note to the file must also confirm the availability of the evaluation committee members immediately after the end of the solicitation period. Such note must be included in the procurement case file;

Solicitation Method	Requirement	Minimum Solicitation Period (in calendar days)
RFQ	All	5
ITB	Goods	21 (15 days without a requirement for samples)
ITB and RFP	Works or services	21

TABLE 2: GUIDELINES FOR THE RECOMMENDED MINIMUM SOLICITATION PERIOD

- p. In order to convey all relevant instructions governing the preparation and submission of offers, the solicitation documents must include a list of documents required to form a complete offer, as well as notice to bidders that non-compliant offers may be rejected. A compliant offer is one that meets the formal criteria by conforming substantially to all terms, conditions, and specifications in the solicitation documents. Further, the Invitation Letter should always include:
- i. Mode of submission (email, fax, hand-delivered, mail, UN e-tendering system);
  - ii. Address/fax number/email;
  - iii. Instructions on offer packaging, (e.g. sealed, number of copies, the requirement in RFPs to submit technical and financial offers separately (two-envelope system), etc.).
- q. Information will be included about whether a public tender opening of bids will be held, and, if so, details for the same (date, time, venue). For details, refer to Chapter 7 Management of Submissions;
- r. The Letter of Invitation will indicate whether Performance Security is required. If Performance Security is required, then the amount and form of the Performance Security should be indicated. (See Chapter 6.4.8 Bid/ Advance Payment/ Performance Security Forms and Requirements for more information on Performance Security requirements.);
- s. The solicitation documents must specify the payment terms:
- i. The payment terms are usually net 30 days upon receipt of invoice with all required documents deemed to be satisfactory by the UN, as well as receipt and acceptance of goods or services, or upon receipt of required shipping documentation, depending on the Incoterm used (see Chapter 13: Contract Management and Contract Administration);
  - ii. No advance payments should be made, except when the conditions outlined in Financial Rule 105.19 apply. The Procurement Official shall record the reasons for advance or progress payments in the procurement case file. Under certain conditions, the UN may agree to pay for partial delivery of the goods or upon completion of clearly defined milestones for services or works, provided adequate security for the advance or progress payment is established. In such cases, the Procurement Official should consider establishing specially developed payment terms, taking payment flows into consideration, provided such terms are approved by the Director, PD or the CPO and are tailored to the specific procurement. Where advance payments are necessary the approval thresholds of the relevant DOA must be complied with;
  - iii. Lease payments paid in the same month to which they relate, regardless if they are paid on the first or last day of the month, are not considered advance payments. However, lease payments paid prior to the month to which they relate are considered advance payments.

6.4.3 Annex A: Acknowledgment Letter

The Acknowledgment Letter serves as a notification by the vendors, advising the Procurement Official whether they intend to submit a proposal/bid and/or attend the public tender opening.

6.4.4 Annex B: Scope of Work/Requirements

The Scope of Work for the Requirements should be included so that the bidders have all information necessary to prepare a responsive and meaningful offer (See Chapter 4.4 Requirements Definition). The Scope of Work and the Form of Contract are drafted in a way that they are coherent with each other.

6.4.5 Annex C: Special Instructions and Evaluation Criteria

Annex C is the 'Special Instructions and Evaluation Criteria' Annex. It is intended to give the bidders a detailed overview of the solicitation process, including a description of how bids are to be evaluated. The components of the Special Instructions are described below. The components of the Evaluation Criteria are described in the next chapter (i.e., Chapter 6.4.6 Evaluation Criteria \(i.e., Part of Annex C\)).

6.4.5.1 Pricing Requirements

Annex C shall include price information and additional information, such as whether a contract will be signed based on fixed price/lump-sum, or cost reimbursement in suitable cases (such as for travel/DSA).

Commodities: If the price of the commodities is likely to fluctuate over time, (e.g. petroleum products, metal products) and it is the UN's intention to issue a contract based on a price formula that may include variable components (such as the Platts Index or London Metal Exchange), then the price formula should be clearly specified in Annex C; the wording for the same may be cleared in advance by OLA or a Legal Advisor.

UN Right to Change Quantities of Goods or Services: If applicable, it should be stated, in Annex C and in the Form of Contract, that the UN reserves the right to increase or decrease the quantity of goods and/or services originally specified in the solicitation documents, without any change from bidders in the unit prices or conditions. Alternatively, the solicitation documents may also specify that the quantities of goods and services are estimates, and that no obligation to buy a minimum quantity exists for the UN.

6.4.5.2 Site Visits and Bidders' Conferences

The Special Instructions Annex in the solicitation documents should communicate to the bidders any information about the location, date, and time of any bidders' conference or site-visits that will be conducted for the tender. If a solicitation contemplates site visits as well as a bidders' conference, the site visits should generally take place prior to the bidders' conference, to allow bidders to include any questions about the sites.

Site Visits: The purpose of site visits is to enhance the understanding of the requirement by allowing bidders to examine the physical sites where they are being asked to provide services.

- a. Attendance of the site visits may be mandatory or non-mandatory. The Procurement Official, in consultation with the Requisitioner, will apply sound judgment to establish when site visits are necessary and if participation should be mandatory for all participating bidders;
- b. Participation in site visits should only be mandatory in those cases in which the Procurement Official, in consultation with relevant Requisitioner, deems that the bidders could not understand the scope and breadth of the requirement based only on the information shared in the solicitation documents, or in those cases in which it has been determined that the quality of the Submissions would greatly improve by providing a forum for bidders to observe the actual conditions on the ground;
- c. In the case that site visits are non-mandatory and the bidder chooses not to attend, the bidder is implicitly renouncing all the benefits of a better knowledge of the physical conditions on the ground. For that reason, lack of knowledge of such conditions will not be accepted as grounds not to comply with any of the contractual obligations of the resulting contract;
- d. Site visits can be guided and/or non-guided. The solicitation documents will clearly indicate which type of site visits the UN will allow in each case, and the procedures to follow to participate:

- i. Guided Site Visits: The UN will organize an itinerary and an agenda, which will be shared with all bidders prior to the start of the site visits. Bidders are requested to fully comply with the agenda and itinerary in order for their attendance to be certified;
- ii. Non-Guided Site Visits: The UN will provide a time window of a few days in which the bidder, at its own initiative, may visit the site. The bidder must announce its visit in advance for security purposes, as detailed in the solicitation documents. Unguided site-visits will not be facilitated by any of the UN personnel directly involved in the solicitation, but by other personnel on the site. No information will be shared in such visits other than a tour of the facilities, so the bidder can observe the conditions on the ground. All bidders will be afforded the same tour;
- e. In cases when site visits are not practical, or when otherwise the Procurement Official, in consultation with relevant Requisitioner, deems it appropriate, the Procurement Official may consider the use of videos or other electronic means during the bidders' conference. This is especially recommended for non-mandatory site visits;
- f. Prospective bidders shall bear all costs related to their participation in site visits;
- g. See sub-clause (iii) below regarding additional requirements applicable to mandatory site visits and mandatory bidders' conferences.

Bidders' Conferences: The purpose of a bidders' conference is to enhance the understanding of the requirement among the participating bidders in a solicitation:

- a. The Procurement Official, in consultation with relevant requisitioner, should apply sound judgment to establish when a bidders' conference is necessary and if participation should be mandatory for all participating bidders. Participation in bidders' conferences should only be mandatory in those cases in which the Procurement Official, in consultation with the relevant Requisitioner, deems that the bidders could not understand the scope and breadth of the requirement based only on the information shared in the solicitation documents, or in those cases in which it has been determined that the quality of the Submissions would greatly improve by providing a forum for bidders' to interact with the UN. In all other cases, which include most solicitations for the provision of standard goods, participation in bidders' conferences, if any, should be left to the prerogative of the bidder (e.g. non-mandatory);
- b. The Procurement Official is encouraged to use electronic means to organize bidders' conferences, as it makes it easier for bidders, from a time and economic perspective, to participate. This is especially recommended for non-mandatory bidders' conferences;
- c. Bidders should be requested to send questions and comments about the solicitation documents in writing prior to the bidders' conference so they can be addressed in an orderly fashion. The Procurement Official may, at his or her own discretion, allow for further questions and comments spontaneously raised during the bidders' conferences or encourage discussions, if those may contribute to clarify the requirement and are aligned with the purpose of the bidders' conference;
- d. Information shared during the bidders' conferences is for informational purposes only. If any information is shared that modifies or provides further details on any of the conditions of the solicitation documents, such modification and/or clarification is only valid if it is confirmed via a formal amendment to the solicitation documents;
- e. The Procurement Official is not obligated to address all questions raised during a bidders' conference, only those that, in his or her opinion, in consultation with the relevant Requisitioner, are helpful to clarify the Requirement. All questions formally submitted in writing within the stipulated time frame prior to the bidders' conference must be formally answered to all bidders in writing. In some cases, the Procurement Official may allow more questions to be submitted in writing after the bidders' conference;
- f. In case of non-mandatory bidders' conferences, the Procurement Official will also keep in the file a record of which bidders attended:

- i. Only bidders that are sent a Letter of Invitation directly by the UN (see Chapter 6.4.1) have permission to attend bidders' conferences. The Procurement Official may, on an exceptional basis, allow other bidders to attend if a revised List of Invitees including such additional bidders is submitted to the Approval Authority for approval prior to the bidders' conference. A bidder must specify which person(s) is/are designated an employee or representative to attend the bidders' conference on its behalf. A single representative may not represent two or more companies at a bidders' conference. The Procurement Official may allow for an exception if two companies are two subsidiaries of the same group (e.g. the parent company and the local subsidiary). The Procurement Official may limit the number of participants per bidder for reasons of space and logistics;
- ii. Prospective bidders shall bear all costs related to their participation in bidders' conferences;
- iii. See sub-clause (iii) below regarding additional requirements applicable to mandatory site visits and mandatory bidders' conferences.

Mandatory Site Visits and Mandatory Bidders' Conferences: In case of bidders' conferences or site visits for which participation is mandatory, the following will apply:

- a. Participation of all sessions of the bidders' conference or site visits is mandatory. Bidders that miss one session (e.g. the first morning, the last day, etc.) will not be marked as having attended. Arriving slightly delayed to one or more sessions will not be considered as non-participation;
- b. It is the bidders' sole responsibility to arrive at the bidders' conference and the site visits. The UN cannot take any responsibility for any event that may preclude the bidder from participating, such as missed flights, problems with visas, problems with security clearance, etc. Bidders are encouraged to plan in advance in order to minimize the risks of non-attendance;
- c. For an in-person bidders' conference, all participants must sign an attendance sheet per session/day, which must be kept on file by the Procurement Official. For electronic bidders' conferences, other means may be used to certify attendance;
- d. In some cases, and if requested by the bidder well in advance, the United Nations may be able to facilitate a letter to the bidder for the purpose of obtaining visas from the host country to attend the bidder's conference. However, this is not an obligation for the UN, and the bidder should rely on its own means to obtain the necessary visas;
- e. Bidders that did not participate in mandatory site visits and/or bidders' conferences and who therefore are not eligible for the award will be excluded from any further communication about the solicitation, such as amendments to the solicitation process or notices.

SPLIT AWARDS

If the requirements are divided into several lots, the solicitation documents should indicate the UN's right to award the contract to the vendor offering the best offer for all lots or per lot.

Requirements cannot be split into separate tenders to avoid thresholds for formal competition.

The appropriate Procurement Approving Authority must approve the issuance of separate tenders for a related or linked requirement for the cumulative estimated value of the total requirement.

6.4.5.3 Partial Bids/Split Award

Information about whether partial offers, often segregated in the solicitation document into so-called "lots", are acceptable should be included in the solicitation document.

If the requirements are divided into several components or lots, the solicitation should indicate (i) whether bidders must submit bids on all of the lots or whether bidders have the right to submit proposals/bids on just some of the lots (i.e., partial bids) and (ii) whether the UN will be awarding one contract to the bidder that has the best overall bid with respect to all components/lots or whether the UN has the right to award multiple contracts to more than one bidder based on the best proposal/bid submitted per component/lot (i.e., split award).

When determining whether to split the award, possible savings from purchasing items at a lower price should be considered and the resource requirements for administering and placing several contracts and the supply chain, logistical and other risks related to having multiple contracts in place should be considered.

Requirements cannot be split into separate solicitation processes to avoid thresholds for formal competition. Equally, awards following a single solicitation process should not be split with the sole purpose of avoiding the review by a Review Committee or approval by an appropriate Procurement Approving Authority. The appropriate Procurement Approving Authority for the cumulative estimated value of the total requirement must approve the issuance of separate tenders for a related or linked requirement.

6.4.5.4 Advance Payment Security

The UN does not agree to pay advance payments (i.e., payments in advance of the contractor's performance under a contract) unless the conditions of Financial Rule 105.19 apply, and, as provided in Financial Rule 105.19, the decision to make an advance payment has been recorded in writing. If the UN has decided to inform bidders to a solicitation process that the UN has decided to allow for advance payment(s) for the contract that is to be awarded, then the Procurement Official should indicate in Annex C whether the winning bidder will be required to deliver to the UN a guarantee of performance security instrument in connection with the UN's advance payment(s) as a condition for the awarding of the contract. If an Advance Payment Security is required, then bidders would need to factor this into the pricing of their proposals/bids. In addition, a guarantee for advance payment can be requested by the UN when the vendor requests an advance payment and this request has exceptionally been approved as per Financial Rule 105.19 by the appropriate Procurement Approving Authority.

6.4.5.5 Other

If there are elements to the solicitation process that are either not obvious from the SOW or are worthy of highlighting, then they should be clarified in Annex C (e.g. the need for samples or inspections prior to contract signature). For example, if the solicitation process is being undertaken to establish an LTA or BPO, the Procurement Official could choose to highlight this in Annex C.

If samples of goods are required for the evaluation, the solicitation documents shall state the number, size and other detailed specifications of the required samples, as well as a description of the tests that will be performed. The solicitation documents shall specify that failure to provide the required samples renders the Submission non-compliant and will lead to its rejection. If a vendor voluntarily provides samples without being requested, the samples shall either be disregarded or, if considered of value to the evaluation, all invited vendors shall be requested to provide samples. The solicitation documents shall state that samples shall be provided by the invited vendors free of charge with no guarantee that they will be returned by the UN unless the vendor agrees to take them back in "as-is" condition and pays for their return. The UN shall give no guarantee as to the condition of the samples upon completion of the designated tests and technical evaluation. If any sample is not returned, it shall become part of the regular UN inventory. The UN may require that the vendors give a demonstration of offered goods as part of the evaluation. The solicitation documents shall state the scope of such demonstrations. Such demonstrations shall be provided free of charge, and the UN shall not accept any liability for any damage to or loss of the goods in connection with such demonstrations.

6.4.6 Evaluation Criteria (i.e., Part of Annex C)

Annex C is the 'Special Instructions and Evaluation Criteria' Annex. It is intended to give the bidders a detailed overview of the solicitation process, including a description of how bids are to be evaluated. The components of the evaluation criteria are described below. The components of the special instructions are described in the chapter above (i.e., Chapter 6.4.5 Annex C: Special Instructions and Evaluation Criteria).

Overview: Annex C of the solicitation documents must state the evaluation method, according to the solicitation method designated in the SSP (i.e., RFQ, ITB, or RFP). In addition, the solicitation documents must state the evaluation criteria, including as applicable:

- a. Preliminary Screening resulting in a compliant bid;
- b. Mandatory criteria;
- c. Technical criteria;
- d. Financial criteria.

The evaluation criteria shall be appropriate to the type, nature, market conditions, and complexity of what is being procured, and should be clearly specified in detail in the solicitation document. Evaluation criteria should be designed to enable the UN to achieve Best Value for Money.

The evaluation must be carried out pursuant to the formal criteria specified in the solicitation documents and the SSP. Should there be the need to make changes to solicitation documents during the solicitation process and before the closing date and time, any such amendments will be made in accordance to Chapter 6.6 Amendments to Solicitation Documents, and amendments to the SSP are to be issued accordingly.

6.4.6.1 Preliminary Screening

During preliminary screening (see Chapter 8.5 Preliminary Screening), the Procurement Official shall review the compliance of the submission with the solicitation documentation and related criteria.

Examples of such formal criteria are:

- a. The offer is accompanied by the required documentation, including the bid submission form, with signatures in the key portion of the bid form when this is clearly specified in the tender;
- b. The offer is accompanied by the required securities, when applicable;
- c. In cases of RFPs, the offer is submitted in two separate envelopes: one containing the technical proposal and the other containing the financial proposal;
- d. The offer covers the requirement in full or in part, specifically for partial bids;
- e. The offer includes evidence of acceptance of other important conditions specified in the solicitation documents (e.g. performance security);
- f. The bidder does not have a conflict of interest, as defined in Chapter 1.5.3.3 Vendor Conflict of Interest;
- g. The bidder is included in the List of Invitees.

6.4.6.2 Mandatory and Technical Criteria

Mandatory and technical criteria are evaluated during technical evaluation.

Mandatory Criteria:

- a. Mandatory criteria when included in a solicitation document are evaluated on a pass/fail basis, regardless whether the solicitation process is an RFQ, ITB or RFP.
- b. The extent of the mandatory criteria must have a rational basis related to the fundamental purpose of the requirement. Also, in deciding whether there should be mandatory criteria, the Procurement Official, together with the Requisitioner, should consider the value of the contract and the complexity of the solicitation process. The Procurement Official should ensure that mandatory criteria are not used to limit competition. The following aspects are examples of factors that could be considered mandatory criteria:
  - i. Legal and regulatory requirements such as registration certificates, licenses, standards, etc.;
  - ii. Minimum requirements regarding the value of previous contracts;
  - iii. Availability of after-sales services or agents in the country of delivery;
  - iv. Qualification and experience of proposed personnel;
  - v. No adverse reports of any aspect considered relevant to the requirement in a specified last number of years;
  - vi. Evidence that, during a number of years prior to the tender opening date, the bidder is in continuous business of providing similar goods/ services to those offered;
  - vii. Institutional and workload capability, such as capacity and availability of production site, staff, etc.;
  - viii. Financial capability, such as annual sales turnover of a minimum amount during one/multiple past years and minimum financial profitability and liquidity ratios.
- c. A bidder must meet all mandatory criteria for the respective lot for which it is recommended for award. The UN will award each of the lots in a manner which achieves the best overall value-for-money combination for the UN.

Technical Criteria:

- a. Technical criteria are developed for evaluation according to a pass/fail basis, regarding the compliance to the specifications and other requirements (in RFQs and ITBs) and/or the cumulative weighted analysis evaluation method (in RFPs);
- b. The cumulative weighted analysis evaluation method consists of allocating points using weighted criteria. When using the cumulative weighted analysis evaluation method, technical evaluation criteria are related to the approach and methodology proposed to reach the expected results or solve the identified problem, as described in the requirement definition (TOR or SOW). In these cases, the SSP must clearly state the breakdown of percentages or points allocated to each overall criterion (e.g. experience: [xx] points, approach and methodology: [xx] points, qualifications and competence of proposed personnel: [xx] points). In the solicitation documents, the technical criteria should be listed in order of priority given their allocated scores and weights (i.e., the technical criteria with the highest maximum points should be listed first, without identifying the weight given to each criterion);
- c. In addition, with respect to RFPs, the UN may consider including a number of technical points for interviews/oral presentations for all bidders or those that have achieved a minimum number of points upon evaluation of the documentation submitted. This should be done only when it is of relevance to determine the overall quality of the proposal and where it is normal commercial practice. The criteria for the interview need to be pre-established and objective in nature. It is important to manage the process properly and ensure the RFP includes wording on the purpose of the interview/oral presentations. Normally, the purpose of the interviews/oral presentations is to validate the information provided by the bidders in their proposal and to test the bidder's understanding of the requirement. It is encouraged to state in the solicitation documents the approximate dates when such interviews/oral presentations will take place if the date can be reasonably estimated.

Rating Each Technical Criterion

- a. The Requisitioner, in consultation with the Procurement Official, shall establish a rating system as part of the SSP that can be used to evaluate the submission in an objective manner. The scored technical evaluation criteria should, within reason and where possible, be established in a way that allows bidder's responses to be assessed by measurable and quantifiable indicators. The rating system shall be relevant to the requirement and involve numerical scoring, and it shall be accompanied by a description of the rating defined in narrative form, supplemented by an explanation of such scoring;
- b. As an example, the following rating system could be used:

Score	Narrative/Description
10	More than 10 years of experience in providing the requirements
7	Between 6-10 years of experience in providing the requirements
4	Between 3-5 years of experience in providing the requirements
0	Less than 3 years of experience in providing the requirements

TABLE 3: SAMPLE NUMERICAL SCORING SYSTEM

6.4.6.3 Financial Criteria

Price is an important evaluation criterion, but the weight of the price depends on the chosen evaluation methodology (see Chapter 8.4 Evaluation Methodologies). It is important to clearly state in the solicitation documents which price factors will be used for evaluation. Various factors such as freight cost, operational cost, incidental or start-up costs, as well as life cycle costs, can be taken into consideration.

In all cases, required breakdown of pricing, as well as evaluation criteria, should be clearly stated in the solicitation documents.

Only the factors stated in the solicitation documents will be considered in the financial evaluation.

In order to further assist bidders in determining the appropriate quality of goods or services, the UN may choose to include estimates of personnel and other input required in order to reach the expected results. However, it is strongly recommended that the UN not disclose the available budget for the contract. Such disclosure may be only done upon approval from the Director, PD or the CPO.

Life-Cycle Costs:

- a. The UN may state in the solicitation document that the financial evaluation will consider the full life-cycle cost. The full life-cycle cost of a product typically considers costs associated with the purchase and use of the product and may include:
  - i. Product cost (initial cost);
  - ii. Freight cost;
  - iii. Operational cost over the useful life of the product (e.g. electricity, fuel, consumables);
  - iv. Installation and training cost;

- v. Maintenance cost over the useful life of the product (e.g. after-sales services, repair, spare parts, human resources);
- vi. Disposal cost (including handling and treatment and takeback if included) or residual value at the end of use.

Life cycle costing should be included in the financial evaluation when the costs of operation and/or maintenance over the specified life of the goods are estimated to be considerable, in comparison with the initial cost and may vary among different offers received. Selection of the lowest-priced offer based on life cycle costing analysis can lead to win-win situations when cost savings go hand-in-hand with better overall sustainability.

When using life cycle costing, the solicitation document shall specify:

- a. A minimum number of years for the life cycle cost consideration, (i.e., the number of years that the product or service is expected to be used);
- b. The methodology to be used for calculating the operational, maintenance costs, including the information to be provided by bidders in their offers.

Freight Costs:

- a. When including freight in the requirements, an evaluation must be made on the total cost delivered to the final destination (“landed cost”) and may require bidders to quote prices on FCA/FOB/EXW Incoterms basis, with freight cost quoted separately, and CPT/DAT/DAP Incoterms basis prices. In cases where the UN requests prices on FCA/FOB/EXW basis, the UN reserves the right to seek freight quotations from its freight forwarders with which there is an LTA in place and to issue the award to the bidder whose landed cost is lowest after adding their FCA/FOB/EXW price to the freight quotation obtained by the UN;
- b. For more information on Incoterms please refer to Chapter 12 Logistics;

6.4.6.4 Evaluation Criteria for Joint Ventures

A bidder may submit an offer in association with other entities, particularly with an entity in the country where the goods and/or services are to be provided. It is the preference and strong recommendation that contracts be signed with a prime vendor and for any partners to act as subcontractors, as joint ventures can give rise to legal risks. In the case of a joint venture or consortium,

- a. All parties of a joint venture or consortium shall be jointly and severally liable to the UN for any obligations arising from their offer and the contract that may be awarded to them as a result of the solicitation process;
- b. The offer shall clearly identify the entity designated to act as the contact point to deal with the UN, as detailed in the bid/proposal. Such entity shall have the authority to make binding decisions upon the joint venture or consortium during the solicitation process, and any such authority shall not be altered during the solicitation process (and, with respect to the winning bidder, during the term of the contract) without the prior consent of the UN;
- c. The composition or the constitution of the joint venture or consortium shall not be altered without the prior consent of the UN.

Where joint ventures are anticipated in a solicitation process, the solicitation document should state how each evaluation criterion would be applied. In particular, it should be clear regarding each criterion whether:

- a. All joint venture members combined must meet it;
- b. Each joint venture member must meet it;
- c. At least one of the joint venture members must meet it.

Normally, mandatory criteria, such as specific experience requirements and turnover requirements, refer to all joint venture partners combined, whilst eligibility criteria are per each joint venture partner (non-inclusion in ineligibility lists, etc.).

6.4.7 Requisite Forms/Schedules for Bidders

The solicitation document should include specific forms/schedules to be filled out by bidders and included in the bidders' bids/proposals. The number and specific forms/schedules to be included should be in accordance with the complexity of the requirements and solicitation method selected.

Once the bidders have completed the requested information as specified in the solicitation document and a contract has been awarded, the information contained in the bid/proposal and in these schedules of the successful bidder will be extracted from the bid/proposal and incorporated into the contract to be signed. The bid/proposal itself is not ordinarily to be included in the contract as an attachment.

6.4.8 Bid/Advance Payment/Performance Security Form and Requirements

If applicable, Procurement Officials shall include in the solicitation documents the appropriate forms for Bid Security or Advance Payment Security, if required pursuant to the SSP. If performance security is required of the winning bidder, then the form of performance security also should be included in the solicitation documents. The Procurement Officials shall ensure that, as part of their offers, bidders accept the provision of such security.

Bid Security Form and Requirements

The purpose of Bid Security is to discourage frivolous and irresponsible offers with an adverse impact on the procurement process, which may lead to additional cost for re-tendering and evaluation, and/or possible delays in implementation of mandates. Bid/proposal securities can be requested by the UN to mitigate the following bidder-related risks:

- a. Withdrawal or modification of a bid or proposal after the bid receipt deadline;
- b. Failure to sign the contract;
- c. Failure to provide the required security for the performance under the contract after a bid or proposal has been accepted;
- d. Failure to comply with any other conditions specified in the solicitation documents, prior to signing the contract.

Bid Security is not always required for a solicitation exercise. It is recommended to require bid security in the following circumstances:

- a. The high value of goods/services to be purchased;
- b. The urgency of the request (e.g. goods must be in the country or construction works must be performed before the rainy season);
- c. Emergencies (i.e., life and death situations);
- d. High risk of offer withdrawal due to market conditions, increasing raw material prices, country instability, etc.;
- e. The contract cannot be placed within a relatively short period).

The obligation to furnish a bid security may be a deterring factor preventing bidders from doing business with the United Nations, especially for awards estimated in low amounts, therefore Procurement Officials may exercise discretion in determining when it is advisable to request it.

If Bid Security is required, the amount and form of the bid security shall be specified in the solicitation documents. Furthermore, the bid security shall remain valid for a period that provides sufficient time to the UN in the event the security has to be cashed (i.e., until the date of expected contract signature).

Bid security shall be released to unsuccessful bidders once the contract has been signed with the winning bidder.

Calculation of the value of Bid Security should consider various elements, amongst them the costs of evaluating offers and re-tendering and the estimated value of the contract. For reference purposes, the value of the Bid Security could range between 0.5% and 4% of the expected contract amount; however, the Bid Security must always be stated as a specific lump sum rather than as a percentage of the bid amount (to avoid signaling the budget estimate), except for solicitation processes with multiple lots, if this approach is not practical. Bid security represents a cost to the bidder, and therefore, it is essential that the bid security is set at a level that will not discourage participation in the solicitation process. The bid security is normally in the form of a bank guarantee. Other forms of bid security (e.g. a bond, demand draft, cashier's cheques, or irrevocable cheques certified by a bank) may be used either with prior review by OLA or a Legal Advisor or upon approval by the Director, PD or the Chief Procurement Officer. The acceptable formats should be indicated in the solicitation document along with relevant templates.

In UN office locations where it is difficult for bidders to obtain Bid Security or it is not a normal market requirement, it can be replaced by a 'bid securing declaration', which is a non-monetary statement committing the bidder to sign the contract if awarded. In these cases, a standard template must be used, and PD's guidance sought prior to using it in that template in the first solicitation exercise, and approval must be obtained from the relevant Procurement Approving Authority.

Performance Security Requirements

Performance security may be requested in solicitation documents by the UN from the winning bidder as a requirement to be provided, following an award, in order to mitigate the risk of non-performance and breach of contractual obligations (such as the delivery of all equipment, services rendered, and works completed as per the contract).

The performance security is normally to be in the form of an unconditional and irrevocable on-demand bank guarantee. Other forms of performance security (e.g. a bond, a demand draft, cashier's cheques, or irrevocable cheques certified by a bank) may be used with prior review by OLA or a Legal Advisor. The acceptable formats should be indicated in the solicitation document along with relevant templates.

The value of the performance security may vary, depending on the nature, risk, and magnitude of the services or goods to be provided under the contract (e.g. large variety of products to be covered under the contract with a risk of failure to deliver or delicate products with a high risk of damage during handling). The performance security should reflect the value of the assessed risk and subsequent loss to the UN should the contractor fail to fully perform under the respective contract. This would be dependent on the market, situation, local conditions, and/or political and economic situation of the location of the end-user. It is recommended that the total value of the performance security should normally not exceed ten percent (10%) of the contract value. The higher the percentage, the less attractive may be for bidders to participate in the tender exercise, to the point that it may become a deterrent for some prospective bidders; also, the bidders' financial proposals are likely to cost more if the performance security is higher.

6.4.9 Form of Contract and UN General Conditions of Contract

A copy of the applicable Form of Contract and the relevant UNGCC should either be included with the solicitation documents or else reference should be made to the UNGCC, available on the UNPD's public website. Including a form of contract allows bidders to know the terms and conditions of the specific agreement before submitting a bid/proposal and allows them to understand what they would be expected to sign if selected as the winning bidder. Several forms of model contracts can be found on the OLA website. For complex requirements for which the standard UN model contracts might need some tailoring to meet the needs of the Requirement, the Procurement Official may wish to consult with OLA.

The solicitation documents should state that bidders are requested to accept the UNGCC and the applicable form of the contract included in the solicitation document. The solicitation documents should further provide that if a bidder has any comments or reservations to the UNGCC or form contract, they must submit such comments or reservations with their bids. Failure to submit such comments or reservations will be deemed by the UN as acceptance of all contract terms. Submission of comments or reservations does not, however, mean that the UN will automatically accept them should they be awarded the contract. The solicitation documents should specify whether a bidder's failure to accept the UNGCC and the form contract, as is, may lead to the bidder's disqualification or affect the bidder's weighted score.

In any specific procurement action in which modifications are proposed to the UNGCC, the proposals should be carefully reviewed and only undertaken upon review and advice of the applicable UN Legal Advisor. If necessary, OLA should be consulted prior to reaching any agreement to modify the standard terms and conditions of the UNGCC. The Procurement Official must obtain such clearance prior to issuance of the solicitation documents or signature of a contract. Any such modifications should be considered as applying to the specific procurement action in question only and should not be regarded as setting a precedent for other procurement actions or as a reformulation of the specific provisions of the UNGCC.

Whenever changes are required to be made to the UNGCC, such changes should be reflected in the main agreement and not on the form of the UNGCC themselves

6.5 Invitation of Vendors

After the solicitation documents have been prepared and completed, the following steps must be undertaken before the documents are distributed.

Approval of Solicitation Documents

The solicitation documents must be approved by the Procurement Approving Authority at the appropriate level, with the corresponding level of delegated procurement authority, prior to issuance and each time they are amended.

Distribution of Solicitation Documents

The solicitation documents shall be issued and distributed simultaneously to all potential vendors included in the List of Invitees, duly signed by the Procurement Approving Authority at the appropriate level with the corresponding level of delegated procurement authority so that all bidders are given the same opportunity to respond. The list should be comprised of vendors identified during market research, via EOI, prequalification, or other means of supply market analysis. They may also be made available to all interested vendors upon request if the request is made within a reasonable time prior to bid closing and would not lead to a delay (i.e., an extension of the bid closing deadline), provided they register at the basic level before the solicitation documents are issued to them.

If the solicitation documents are issued electronically, the Procurement Official should ensure that the documents are issued in limited editing format. In addition, the solicitation document must include a clause stating that the UN takes no responsibility for effective delivery of the electronic document.

A signed copy of the solicitation documents and List of Invitees must be kept on file by the Procurement Official together with documentation on where and how long it was posted (e.g. printouts of screenshots from e-tendering solution), and to whom it was issued (e.g. fax receipts, copies of emails, courier receipts, etc.) to facilitate an audit of the process.

Confidentiality of the List of Invitees:

In order to safeguard the principle of competition, the UN shall not disclose the names of any invited companies.

6.6 Amendments to Solicitation Documents

At any time before the deadline for submission of offers, the UN may, for any reason, whether on its own initiative or following a request for clarification by a vendor, modify the solicitation documents by issuing a formal amendment to the solicitation.

Questions submitted by bidders in writing by the established deadline and their corresponding answers, as well as any relevant documents shared with the vendors during the bidders' conference, shall be included into the solicitation and considered an integral part of it via formal solicitation amendment. The appropriate Procurement Approving Authority must approve amendments to solicitation documents.

The amendment must be made within a reasonable time before the deadline for submission of offers, in order for vendors to address changes in their offers. In certain cases, amendments may justify an extension of the submission deadline. This should be assessed on a case-by-case basis.

In order to ensure that all vendors have the same information, amendments of solicitation documents must be sent simultaneously in writing to all invited vendors.

Bidders that did not attend a mandatory bidders' conference, and are therefore not eligible for an award, are not required to receive the amendments to the solicitation unless a new opportunity to attend is provided for through an amendment.

Should the amendment to the solicitation include the introduction of new requirements or a substantial change to the nature of the requirements, the Procurement Official will give due consideration to cancelling the procurement process and issuing a new one, as allowed by the operational environment, as a change of requirements may potentially have an impact on the interest of the market for the solicitation.

6.7 Cancellation of the Solicitation Process

The UN reserves the right to cancel a solicitation without recourse at any time prior to the contract award. The relevant Procurement Approving Authority must approve all cancellations. Conditions that may give rise to cancellation are:

- a. The justification for the initial solicitation is no longer valid;
- b. The requirements require material revision.

In the event a solicitation exercise is cancelled, all bidders must receive written notification and offers will be made available for collection by the respective bidder. The UN shall reserve the right to discard such offers unopened without further notice to the bidders. The UN shall not bear any costs associated with returning offers to bidders. The Procurement Official must make sure that all bid securities are returned to the bidders.

6.8 Direct Contracting Under Sole Source

When direct contracting under sole sourcing is justified, an offer is requested only by the appropriate Procurement Official from only one vendor following approval by the appropriate Procurement Approving Authority, in accordance with Financial Rule 105.16(a).

Although the direct contracting modality waives the competitive process, this method does not diminish the responsibilities and accountabilities of personnel involved in the procurement process. Under the direct contracting modality, a contract must still be awarded to a vendor whose offer substantially conforms to the requirements at a reasonable price.

The following procurement actions shall still be required:

- a. Seeking the necessary approvals to commence the procurement action under the relevant Financial Rule;
- b. Writing the requirements definition;
- c. An advertisement of a synopsis of the requirement should be posted in the form of a request for EOI. If the Procurement Official decides not to post a request for EOI because the circumstances of the case do not warrant it, s/he shall document the reasons in a note to the case file;
- d. Soliciting an offer from the selected vendor based on the requirements definition, the applicable Form of Contract, and the UNGCC;
- e. Evaluating the offer (see Chapter 8.8 Further Aspects of Evaluation) and carrying out negotiations, if applicable (see Chapter 8.9 Negotiations);
- f. Awarding the contract at the level of the Procurement Approving Authority, including prior review by a committee on contracts, as applicable.

Since there is no competition in a direct contracting approach, the use of standard solicitation documents (RFQ, RFP, ITB,) when requesting an offer is not necessary. However, to facilitate the evaluation process, Procurement Officials should request the vendor to provide information that would allow for a comprehensive assessment of its offer based on pre-established evaluation criteria and ensure that it meets the needs of the UN.

6.9 Solicitation of Offers Against LTAs

If a long-term agreement (LTA) has been established by the UN (see Chapter 11.6 Long-Term Agreement \(LTA\)) for the goods or services required in a specific case, offers should be solicited as follows from vendors, depending on the LTA's set-up:

Single-Vendor LTA, or Multiple-Vendor LTA Without Secondary Bidding: Procurement Officials shall contact the contractor directly to confirm the call-off in accordance with the prices and other terms and conditions of the LTA and inquire about shipping costs, if applicable. (See Chapter 11 regarding Call-Off Orders).

Multiple-vendor LTA with secondary bidding: for all secondary bidding exercises, the following shall apply:

DIRECT CONTRACTING

Although the direct contracting modality waives the competitive process, this method does not diminish the responsibilities and accountabilities of personnel involved in the procurement process. Under the direct contracting modality, a contract must still be awarded to a vendor whose offer substantially conforms to the requirements at a reasonable price.

- a. It is highly recommended to use a standard template (which could be a simplified version of the standard RFQ template for goods and services);
- b. The item description should include the item reference, as included in the LTA;
- c. Offers resulting from a secondary bidding exercise do not need to be submitted to a secure email/fax number or sent in a sealed envelope, regardless of their value, unless so decided by the Procurement Official;
- d. A note to the file, signed by the relevant Procurement Official, justifying the final selection decision should be included in the file to document the approval of the resulting call-off order(s).

LTAs can be used only for ordering the goods or services specified in that LTA. If other goods or services are required from that vendor, then other solicitation methods must be followed, unless a sole source decision can be justified. Extending the scope of the LTA in order to meet additional requirements (such as new licenses to replace depreciated version) requires either an award issued pursuant to a new solicitation or a properly justified sole-source decision.

6.10 Communication with Vendors

During the tender period, no communication regarding the contents of the solicitation documents or proposals is permitted between vendors and the UN Procurement Official, except through the methods of handling queries, as described below, and seeking clarifications from bidders during the evaluation process.

Queries from vendors must be handled through written correspondence and/or by a bidders' conference, followed up by written minutes made available to all potential bidders. Vendors requiring clarifications to the solicitation documents must submit their queries in writing to the UN to the point of contact indicated in the solicitation documents. The UN will prepare and dispatch written replies to such queries and make all replies known, together with the text of the queries, to all vendors at the same time, without referencing the source of the queries.

Furthermore, meetings with vendors, as well as attendance to conferences, trade exhibitions or similar, should be carried out in consultation with procurement officials.

Requisitioners may contact contractors (i.e., awarded vendors) for matters relating to the execution and management of an existing contract within the scope of that contract. Requisitioners should keep Procurement Officials informed, as appropriate, of their communications with contractors and keep records thereof, in case of any future disputes. On the other hand, Procurement Officials shall undertake all actions related to contract administration, as defined in Chapter 13.1.2 below.

Any requests to the contractor that amends the terms of a contract must be negotiated by Procurement Officials and formally agreed via a contract amendment signed by the authorized Procurement Official, to avoid claims resulting from the Requisitioner's apparent authority to amend the contract.

6.11 Exceptions to Formal Methods of Solicitation

Financial Rule 105.16 sets forth the circumstances in which the Procurement Approving Authority may determine, for a particular procurement action, that using formal methods of solicitation is not in the best interest of the UN. Those reasons are set forth below, along with further analysis and examples. The examples provided for invoking each of the exceptions are not exhaustive and may include other situations that can be justified under such exceptions. Before commencing a procurement action under Financial Rule 105.16, the Procurement Official shall obtain approval from the relevant Procurement Approving Authority or Authorized Official, as the case may be, in accordance with the DOA Annex B.

For exceptions under Financial Rules 105.16(a)(iii) and 105.17, please refer to Chapter 14.

6.11.1 No Competitive Marketplace

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when there is no competitive marketplace for the requirement, such as where a monopoly exists, where prices are fixed by legislation or government regulation, or where the requirement involves a proprietary product or service (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(i)).

6.11.2 Fixed Prices or Rates

If fixed prices/rates are the justification why formal methods of solicitation are not to be employed, the Procurement Official should document the name of the regulatory body or law that controls rates or established prices within the request for award for designated vendor and, if available, a current price/rate schedule should be provided in the request for approval.

6.11.3 Proprietary Product or Service

Proprietary product or service refers to situations where only one source can reasonably meet the needs of the UN, such as:

- a. Proprietary items subject to legal restrictions (i.e., patents and copyrights) are to be procured;
- b. Matters involving defense or security render single-source procurement the most appropriate method of procurement;
- c. The goods or services are available only from a particular vendor or contractor, or a particular vendor or contractor has exclusive rights in respect of the goods or services and no reasonable alternative or substitute exists.

If there is to be an exemption to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of no competitive marketplace, fixed prices or proprietary product/service, then the Procurement Official must document the reasons, including demonstration of reasonableness of price (e.g. comparison with previous purchase prices).

6.11.4 Previous Determination or need for Standardization

An exception to using formal methods of solicitation can be made when there has been a previous determination, or when there is a need to standardize the requirement (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(ii)).

Previous determination means the product to be purchased is determined by a previous purchase, e.g. a piece of equipment was previously purchased and components that can only be obtained from the manufacturer must now be replaced, or complex services were purchased from a vendor and only the vendor who performed the initial services can realistically provide the required additional services.

Standardization shall be acceptable when identical goods, equipment, or technology have recently been purchased from an existing or previous UN contractor, and it is determined that there is a need for compatibility with existing goods, equipment or technology, or works. The effectiveness of the original procurement in meeting the needs of the UN, the limited size of the proposed procurement in relation to the original procurement, the reasonableness of the price, and the unsuitability of alternatives to the goods in question shall always be considered and justified. In any case, an appropriate technical authority, such as the ICTB, shall officially establish standardization.

MUTUAL RECOGNITION

If the proposed procurement contract is a call-off order against another UN organization's LTA pursuant to Financial Rule 105.17(a), no further review of the procurement process leading to the original Branding alone is not necessarily a justification for exceptions. A competitive process should be undertaken if multiple sources of supply exist.

If there is to be an exemption to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of previous determination or standardization, then the Procurement Official must document the rationale for this exception, including, as applicable, the previous determination or reasons for requiring standardization, the terms of the standardization signed by the appropriate technical authority (e.g. the ICTB), and reasonableness of prices (e.g. comparison with previous purchase prices and comparison with prices of equipment from other vendors equivalent in performance).

6.11.5 Cooperation

The proposed procurement contract is the result of cooperation with other organizations of the United Nations system, pursuant to Financial Rule 105.17(a) or governments and organizations other than those of the United Nations system, pursuant to Financial Rule 105.17(b).

The Procurement Approving Authority for Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iii), in conjunction with Financial Rule 105.17(a), may, in appropriate cases, authorize cooperation with a United Nations organization in respect of procurement activities. Please refer to Chapter 14.

Should the requirement to be sourced through cooperation relate to Strategic Goods and Services, a request for LPA shall be sought from the Director, PD as per section 2.6.4.

6.11.6 Identical Requirements

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when offers for identical requirements have been obtained competitively within a reasonable period, and the prices and conditions offered by the bidders remain competitive (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iv)). The reasonable period in relation to the use of a previous competitive method of solicitation should not exceed one (1) year after the contract signature date unless otherwise justified, considering the specific market.

For goods where the price fluctuates rapidly (raw material, petroleum products, some IT equipment, etc.), the competitiveness of the price should always be properly justified.

This provision may not be applied if the respective offer has been obtained using Emergency Procurement Procedures (“EPP”), unless the new requirement is for a follow-on requirement for the original emergency, or is a requirement supporting a response to a new emergency (see Chapter 15.4 regarding EPP).

If there is to be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of identical Requirements, then the Procurement Official must document the use of a previous formal method of solicitation and its outcome, and the reasonableness of price and prevalent market rates in the area.

6.11.7 No Satisfactory Results from Previous Formal Methods of Solicitation

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when a formal solicitation has not produced satisfactory results within a reasonable prior period (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(v)).

The ‘prior period’ refers to the time elapsed since the closing date for Submissions of the failed competitive solicitation process and shall be limited to six months. In relying on this clause, the Procurement Official should ensure that market research was done and be fully satisfied that a new solicitation process, again using formal methods of solicitation, will not yield satisfactory results.

If there is to be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of unsatisfactory results from formal methods, then the Procurement Official is to document the failed competitive process and its outcome, the rationale as to why using formal methods again will not yield satisfactory results, the reasonableness of price, and the applicable prevalent market rates for the requirement.

6.11.8 Real Estate

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when the proposed procurement contract is for the purchase or lease of real estate property (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(vi)).

Selection of location is based on security considerations.

It should be noted that, technically, “leasing” does not include occupying hotel rooms. The correct term for occupying hotel rooms is “licensing”. However, because of reasons such as security, the interpretation of “lease” in the context of Financial Rule 105.16 is extended to include the right to occupy hotel rooms, as it is unrealistic to expect hotels to take part in a formal bidding process for hotel occupancy arrangements.

If there is to be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of real estate, the Procurement Official, in justifying the choice of the premises, is to document the reasonableness of price (e.g. contacting companies specialized in commercial real estate services); demonstrate that a market survey or similar evaluation has been conducted; confirm MOSS compliance, clearance from UNDSS, etc.; provide evidence of market research into available premises; evidence Best Value for Money for the selected real estate.

6.11.9 Exigency

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when there is an exigency for the requirement (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(vii)).

The exigencies of the requirement must be beyond the control of the UN. An exigency is an exceptional, compelling, and emergent need, not resulting from poor planning or management or from concerns over the availability of funds. An exigency exists if the lack of action will lead to serious damage, loss, or injury to property or persons if not addressed immediately, (i.e., emergency situations or force majeure, or other compelling circumstances which are not due to lack of planning or slow administrative process within the UN). The requirement must fit the definition of exigency situations as per General Assembly decision 54/468. Please refer to Chapter 15.4 Emergency Procurement Procedures \(EPP\) for instructions relating to the solicitation process under EPP.

If there is to be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of exigency, then the Procurement Official must document how exceptions to formal methods of solicitation will meet the schedule and the adverse impact, such as damage, loss, or injury to property or persons if formal solicitation was to take place. The Procurement Official should also confirm the reasonableness of price (e.g. through comparing prices with previous purchase prices, etc.) and the justification for selecting a particular vendor over any other.

6.11.10 Services Cannot Be Evaluated Objectively

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when the proposed procurement contract relates to obtaining services that cannot be evaluated objectively (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(viii)).

This exemption can be applied to the requirement for research, experiment, study, or development leading to the procurement of a prototype, except where the requirement includes the production of goods in quantities sufficient to establish their commercial viability or to recover research and development costs.

This exemption can be applied to the requirement for services of specific vendors to obtain cutting-edge technology or other new methodologies where there is no means of determining a basis for reliable comparison.

If there is to be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation for reasons of inability to evaluate the desired services objectively, then the Procurement Official is to document to why this specific requirement can only be obtained via this exception and why there is no possibility to evaluate those services objectively. In addition, the Procurement Official should document either a benchmark for the price quoted or how the reasonableness of price has been established.

6.11.11 Formal Methods Will Not Produce Satisfactory Results

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when the authorized official with the corresponding delegated authority otherwise determines that a formal solicitation will not produce satisfactory results (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(ix)).

Reasons for such exceptions shall be included and due diligence conducted.

6.11.12 Below Monetary Threshold

There can be an exception to using formal methods of solicitation when the value of the procurement is below a specified monetary threshold established for formal methods of solicitation (Financial Rule 105.16(a)(x)).

For requirements up to the monetary threshold of US$ 150,000, an informal method of solicitation may be used.

7. Management of Submissions

7.1 Tender Opening Committee

A Tender Opening Committee (TOC) is an entity responsible for the handling of submissions in response to formal solicitation exercises. Their responsibilities shall include the receiving, recording, and safeguarding of Submissions, as well as conducting formal tender opening meetings. In case of informal solicitation exercises conducted through e-tendering, the TOC will also be responsible of releasing offers to the Procurement Officials.

To ensure the integrity of the procurement process, a TOC must consist of a minimum of two appointed staff members who are not otherwise involved in the procurement process.

As of 1 January 2019, the Chief of the Enabling and Outreach Service, OSCM will appoint the TOC members at UN Headquarters. At all other United Nations Secretariat duty stations, the TOC members are appointed, in writing, by the Chief of Administration/Director of Administration or the Chief Mission Support/Director Mission Support (CMS/DMS) or equivalent function.

Tender Opening Committees may be established and staffed permanently, or they may be designated temporarily to serve during a limited time (e.g. assigned to a specific tender).

No substantive information, except for Solicitation Documents, amendments thereto, questions, clarifications, and answers to vendor inquiries, shall be disclosed by the TOC or any other UN staff members to any individual or otherwise made public, unless otherwise explicitly written in this chapter.

7.2 Receipt and Safeguarding of Submissions

It is the responsibility of vendors to ensure that offers are submitted to the UN in accordance with the stipulations in the solicitation documents.

The solicitation documents shall clearly indicate the chosen method of delivery and time of receipt. Submissions may be received by hand delivery, courier service, mail, facsimile, e-mail, or e-tendering system, as specified in the solicitation documents. Submissions that are not received in strict accordance with instructions as specified in the solicitation documents may be rejected.

Receipt and safeguarding of submissions, in response to formal solicitation exercises, shall be performed by TOC members. In order to facilitate receipt of submissions, the Procurement Official shall provide in advance (i.e., immediately following the issuance of a solicitation to the invitees) to the TOC a summary of the solicitation details, which shall contain, inter alia, the tender closing and opening dates, tender reference and title, solicitation method, list of invited vendors, and bid abstract in case of an ITB. Upon receipt of a Submission, the TOC member must record time of receipt and ensure that satisfactory evidence of the time of receipt is secured (e.g. hand delivery receipt signed by both parties, courier tracking information, facsimile/e-tendering log files). All hard copies of tenders should be recorded with a date and time stamp.

Immediately upon receipt, submissions must be secured in a restricted area, where they shall remain sealed until the formal opening time. From the time of receipt until the time of their formal opening, only the designated individuals (i.e., TOC members) shall have access to the restricted area where the submissions are stored. Exceptional access required by others (e.g. maintenance personnel) shall be limited in time and under escort by a TOC member. TOC members shall take all necessary measures to ensure the confidentiality of the Submissions received.

A submission that is inadvertently opened before the submission opening date and time shall be brought to the attention of the Director PD or CPO and shall be noted in the procurement file. If the Director, PD or CPO decides to accept the submission, it shall immediately be placed in a sealed envelope and be marked.

7.3 Receipt and Safeguarding of Submissions Delivered by Hand, Courier or Mail

The TOC shall ensure that Submissions by hand delivery, courier, or mail can be received during the duty station's normal business hours and in accordance with tender instructions. Submissions shall be delivered in a sealed envelope with the name of the vendor, tender number, and tender opening date and time marked on the outside. For Submissions delivered by hand, the vendor representative shall be provided with a copy of the receipt time-stamped and signed by both parties.

Prior to securing a submission in a restricted area, the TOC shall review the envelope to ensure it is marked completely and verify the vendor's eligibility to participate in the tender by checking the list of invited vendors and marking date and time of receipt as well as any security instruments (e.g. bid bonds) received as part of the Submission.

The TOC shall ensure that all security instruments are carefully recorded, tracked, and securely stored as would be typically required for instruments with monetary value. The Procurement Official shall submit the original bid bonds to the TOC through the Bid Bond form detailing all bid bonds received in relation to the solicitation for onward safekeeping with Treasury.

7.4 Receipt and Safeguarding of Facsimile Submissions

Facsimile Submissions shall be received on a dedicated fax line only accessible to TOC members, preferably located in the same restricted area where tender Submissions are securely stored until opening.

Facsimile Submissions must be treated with the same degree of control as other Submissions. The TOC will check the list of invited vendors to ensure participation eligibility and mark the date and time Submissions have been received against the List of Invitees. The Submission shall be placed in a sealed envelope(s) with tender reference number, vendor name, date/time received, the tender opening date and time, and the TOC member's initials marked on the outside of the envelope. The TOC will not issue an acknowledgment of receipt for facsimile Submissions.

If the fax is incomplete or illegible, the TOC will issue a memorandum to the appropriate Approving Authority to decide whether to accept/reject the submission and/or request the vendor to resubmit via facsimile or alternate means.

7.5 Receipt and Safeguarding of E-tendering or E-mail Submissions

E-tendering is a system that enables Procurement Officials and vendors to manage the tender process and the associated exchange of documents online through the Internet.

Electronic Submissions are legally binding as long as they are signed off by the authorized representative of the bidder and are submitted in a file format, as determined by the UN, in the tender documentation.

Electronic submissions received via e-mail shall only be received on a dedicated email account, accessible to TOC members only, to be accessed only from a dedicated terminal located in the restricted area where tender Submissions are securely stored till their opening.

While the UN Secretariat shall take every reasonable step to ensure that it does not upload corrupt or unsafe tender documents, bidders should check any documents downloaded from the e-tendering system for viruses prior to opening them. The UN will not be liable or responsible for the loss, damage, destruction, corruption, or illegibility of documents in any electronic submission, however caused. The UN is also not able to consider electronic documents that are corrupt, infected, or otherwise unreadable.

The TOC shall ensure that e-Submissions are not opened until the time of the tender opening. It is important to note that the tender submission deadline stated in the solicitation document applies equally to hard copy and electronic tender Submissions. In the case of Submissions via electronic means, the receipt timestamp is the date and time the submission has been received, as indicated by the log files of the relevant IT platform(s). It is the sole responsibility of bidders to ensure that the UN Secretariat receives their Submission on or before the prescribed deadline.

Electronic means of data interchange are permitted, provided that the electronic means uphold the procurement principles and allow for an adequate audit trail of the procurement process.

In case of informal methods of solicitations conducted through e-tendering that resulted in less than three (3) offers, the TOC shall release submissions only following the written approval of the Director, PD or CPO. In an entity without a CPO, the approval of the official with the highest delegated procurement authority shall be sought.

7.6 Modification of Submissions

Submissions may be modified by bidders in writing prior to the closing date and time of the solicitation.

In the case of modified Submissions, the latest submitted offer prior to the Submission deadline is the binding one. The modification shall be submitted as per the original Submission instructions as stated in the solicitation documents and shall be treated like any other offer.

If the modified Submission is received after the Submission closing date and time, it shall not be considered, and the Procurement Official will notify the bidder in writing. The UN is not responsible for errors in price made by the vendor, and the vendor is bound by the prices provided. If there are discrepancies between totalling prices and unit prices, unit prices shall govern unless it is clear that the unit prices contain a typographical error or mistake.

If it is considered to be in the best interest of the Organization, the Procurement Official, in consultation with the Procurement Approving Authority, may request any missing documentation/data/information (See Chapter 8.8.1 for details). If the bidder does not furnish the documentation/data/information within a specified period of time after it has been requested, normally five (5) UN business days, the submission may be rejected, and the bidder shall be notified accordingly in writing.

7.7 Withdrawal of Submissions

Submissions may be withdrawn by bidders in writing prior to the closing date and time of the solicitation. Withdrawal of a submission by a bidder can only be accepted if the UN is notified in writing prior to the announced deadline for submission of offers. Immediately after receipt of the formal withdrawal by a vendor, the TOC shall separate the withdrawn offer from the other submissions and ensure that the withdrawn offer is not opened during the opening ceremony. After receiving agreement in writing from bidder and Procurement Official, the TOC shall destroy the unopened submission or return it to the bidder at its cost, if so requested.

7.8 Modification or Withdrawal of Submissions After Closing

If received after the submission deadline, the UN Secretariat should not honour withdrawal of, or modifications to, submissions and shall open the submission together with the other submissions and shall notify the vendor in writing.

If the bidder has furnished bid security with the submission, the UN Secretariat shall withhold that bid security, with the intention to invoke the security instrument in case the submission is selected after evaluation and the bidder is not willing to provide the goods/services offered in its Submission. The Procurement Official shall ensure the bid security remains valid. If no bid security was requested, the issue should be resolved through negotiations. OLA's advice should be sought as appropriate before taking action on the bid security as needed. The procedures of Chapter 3.3 on the VRC may be applicable.

If the bidder can justify the withdrawal of its submission, the UN may accept a withdrawal after the submission deadline. It should be considered whether it is in the interest of the UN to hold the vendor to its Submission after the request for withdrawal. The appropriate Procurement Approving Authority up to the level of Director, PD or CPO, should make this consideration prior to the final decision.

Any bid security instruments provided in connection to a withdrawn bid can be cashed in full by the Organization

7.9 Late Submissions

It is the responsibility of the bidder to ensure timely delivery and receipt of their Submissions. Submissions received after the submission deadline need not be accepted by the Organization.

Submissions received after the designated date and time should be rejected and noted as such in the tender opening report by the TOC, unless a decision is made to accept the submission or offer based on a holistic evaluation of the circumstances that led to the late delivery and the best interests of the Organization. When deciding to accept or reject a late submission, the following circumstances shall be duly considered, among other considerations:

- a. The extent of the delay;
- b. There is clear evidence to establish that it was received at the tender opening location of the UN Secretariat entity or under the UN Secretariat's physical control prior to the tender closing deadline;
- c. If an emergency or other event interrupts normal UN Secretariat processes and operations so that submissions cannot be received at the designated location by the closing deadline; or
- d. Whether best efforts were made by the vendor to provide the submission or offer in time.

Acceptance of late Submissions shall be on a case-by-case basis. In case of late receipt, the Director, PD or the CPO may accept Submissions received after the closing date specified in the tender document as long as it is received prior to initiation of the evaluation process by the evaluation team. This is only permissible where it is established that the delay was not under the control of the vendor and the acceptance of the submission does not create the appearance of, or an actual, unfair advantage to the vendor.

The TOC must submit immediately, for consideration by the Director, PD or the CPO, the relevant details of any late submission and keep a record of the Director, PD or the CPO's decision, which will subsequently be communicated to the bidder by the Procurement Official.

Submissions that have been rejected shall remain unopened and shall be forwarded to the Procurement Official. The bidder shall be officially notified in writing of the rejection upon such decision. The submission shall be destroyed or returned to the bidder at the bidder's own cost, is so requested.

7.10 Unsolicited Submissions

Unsolicited Submissions from vendors that the UN has not invited shall be rejected by the Director, PD or the CPO, and the vendor shall be advised of such rejection in writing unless a decision is made to accept the submission on an exceptional basis, as further described below. Such unsolicited Submissions shall remain unopened and shall be destroyed or returned by the TOC to the vendor, at its own cost, if so requested.

Submissions from vendors whose names are not on the List of Invitees but appear to be related to a vendor included in the List of Invitees, should be brought to the attention of the Procurement Official, who shall contact the original invitee to seek clarification.

In cases where Submissions were made by vendors that are related business entities of the original invitees, due to their business arrangements in place, Submissions from such vendors may be accepted upon documented and supporting evidence of the corporate relationship. Submissions from vendors who are appointed by the original invitee as sales, export, or local representatives of the original invitees, and are not financially and legally affiliated with the original invitee in terms of ownership, may be accepted, provided that the invitees inform the UN Secretariat of their appointment in advance with a proof of appointment prior to the submission deadline. Such acceptance is subject to approval by the most senior Procurement Official in an office.

Unsolicited submissions may be accepted at the discretion of the Director, PD or CPO where professional judgment leads to the belief that doing so would be in the interest of the Organization. A decision to accept or reject an unsolicited submission shall rely on professional judgment and a holistic analysis of the potential benefits of the submission.

Proper care should be taken to identify how the submitting vendor obtained information relating to the solicitation. It is important that the Procurement Official, in collaboration with the Vendor Registration and TOC function, ascertains that the vendor is a bona fide vendor and meets all the registration prerequisites and status.

7.11 Opening and Recording of Submissions

Submissions for ITBs or RFPs shall be opened by the TOC consisting of duly authorized personnel.

7.12 Attendance at Tender Openings

Tender openings of ITBs and RFPs are conducted during a formal meeting at a time and location specified in the solicitation instructions. It may be transmitted via webcast for those bidders who have submitted an offer. Only those vendors who have submitted an offer (i.e., bidder) may designate one representative to attend, in an observing capacity, the tender opening of a specific ITB or RFP. The representative may be an employee or agent of the bidder, a local representative designated by the bidder, including appointed personnel from a law firm, or an officer of a Permanent Mission to the UN, a Trade Office of a UN Member State, or other diplomatic office.

The bidders shall advise the TOC in advance of the names of its representatives who will be attending the tender opening meeting using the tender acknowledgment letter.

Every individual attending the meeting shall have his or her name, title, and proper representation for a submitting vendor verified and recorded prior to the start of the tender opening meeting.

The appropriate Procurement Approving Authority may authorize other parties to attend tender openings in an observing capacity.

The bidders' representatives and other parties attending the tender opening shall act solely as observers and not as active participants in the opening process. At no time during the tender opening can UN staff or attending parties engage in discussions or other forms of information exchange other than the formal announcement of opening proceedings and results by the TOC.

7.13 Opening of Bids (ITBs)

All bids received in response to an ITB shall be opened and recorded by the TOC during a tender opening meeting at the time and location specified in the solicitation instructions.

During the meeting, the TOC shall record and announce for each bid the bidders' names and, in the case of an ITB, may also include the grand total price of each bid. At the discretion of the TOC, more detailed pricing information at the subcategory or line-level may be announced and recorded.

Submissions cannot be rejected or invalidated at the time of opening by the Tender Opening Committee. The TOC shall reflect any inconsistencies (e.g. late Submissions) in the tender opening report and mention during the public tender opening that inconsistencies are brought forward to the Director, PD or the CPO for deciding how to proceed.

After the conclusion of the tender opening meeting, one member of the TOC shall escort the bidders' representatives and other parties attending the meeting out of the meeting room. All TOC members shall certify the tender opening procedure by signing the tender opening report. All paper submissions shall be marked or perforated with an indication of the tender reference number and opening date.

7.14 Opening of Proposals (RFPs)

Only the technical proposals received in response to an RFP shall be opened and recorded by the TOC during a tender opening meeting at the time and location specified in the solicitation instructions. The financial proposals shall remain sealed and the contents undisclosed until after the technical evaluation of the proposals has been completed<sup>4</sup>.

During the meeting, the TOC shall record and announce, for each bid, the bidder's name.

Submissions cannot be rejected or invalidated at the time of opening by the TOC. The TOC shall reflect any inconsistencies (e.g. late Submissions) in the tender opening report and mention during the public tender opening that inconsistencies are brought forward to the Director, PD or the CPO for deciding how to proceed.

After the conclusion of the tender opening meeting, one member of the TOC shall escort the bidders' representatives and other parties attending the meeting out of the meeting room. All TOC members shall certify the tender opening procedure by signing the tender opening report. All paper documents contained in the technical Submissions, except catalogues and brochures, shall be marked or perforated with an indication of the tender reference number and opening date.

<sup>4</sup> For RFPs for movement services for COE, Financial and Technical Proposals are opened simultaneously, as an exception to the Opening procedures for RFPs.

7.15 Rejection of Submissions

The UN shall reserve the right to reject any or all Submissions received which do not comply with the Solicitation Documents instructions, or whenever such rejection is in the interest of the Organization in accordance with Financial Rule 105.15(c).

7.16 Post-Opening of Bids

Following the tender opening for ITBs, Submissions shall be kept secure and their access limited to authorized TOC members only, until formal handover of Submissions to the Procurement Official. The original tender opening report and all Submissions shall be handed over to the Procurement Official who signs for receipt. The TOC shall retain a copy of the tender opening report.

7.17 Post-Opening of Proposals

Following the tender opening for RFPs, the original tender opening report and all technical Submissions shall be handed over to the Procurement Official who signs for receipt. The financial Submissions shall be kept sealed in a secure location under the custody of the TOC, pending completion of the technical evaluation.

Upon receipt of confirmation from the Procurement Official that the technical evaluation has been completed, the TOC shall open the financial envelopes of those Submissions that have been found to be technically compliant. In the case of a paper-based solicitation exercise, the TOC shall mark or perforate with the tender number and the date of the request said financial proposals and hand over to the Procurement Official both the aforementioned financial submissions and sealed financial envelopes of technically non-compliant Submissions. The Procurement Official then signs for receipt of the Submissions. In the case of an e-tendering solicitation exercise, only the financial files of technically compliant Submissions are handed over to the Procurement Official in the system. For Submissions received through dedicated secured e-mail address, the TOC shall forward the financial Submissions to the Procurement Official and save an electronic copy with the TOC for audit trail.

7.18 Other Post-Opening Procedures

The Procurement Official shall provide the appointed evaluation committees with relevant Submission documents to conduct the evaluation of the ITB or RFP.

The tender opening reports for ITBs and RFPs shall be available for consultation by vendors for a period of thirty (30) days from the tender opening date. A vendor may consult only those tender opening reports for which the vendor has submitted a tender.

The Procurement Official shall verify the vendor registration status of all bidders that submitted a bid or proposal in response to the solicitation. In case that any bidder does not have the appropriate registration level for the upcoming award, the Procurement Official will send a reminder to the bidder to submit all required information in UNGM. The Procurement Official will advise Vendor Registration Officials of the upcoming registration requests.

SOP on Management of Submissions in Response to Formal Solicitations

8. Evaluation of Submissions

8.1 Overview

Evaluation is the process of assessing and comparing Submissions in accordance with the evaluation methodology and criteria in the solicitation documents and in the SSP. The aim is to determine the offer that best fits the evaluation criteria and thus represents the best value for the UN. An objective, fair, and well-executed evaluation process is critical, as it results in a recommendation and a request for an award of contract.

In general, the UN evaluates all offers based on the principles enshrined in Financial regulation 5.12 including the principle of Best Value for Money, i.e., the ideal combination of technical and financial factors.

Upon receipt and opening of offers, the evaluation of offers must be conducted according to the evaluation criteria and method defined in the SSP and clearly established in the solicitation documents. New or revised evaluation criteria cannot be introduced during the evaluation of offers nor can the method of evaluation be changed.

The evaluation process comprises the following main steps (described later in this chapter):

- a. Preliminary screening (see 6.4.6.1);
- b. Technical evaluation;
- c. For RFPs: completion of the technical evaluation report and opening of financial proposals;
- d. Financial evaluation, including justification of reasonableness of price (if applicable);
- e. Clarifications, if required;
- f. Finalization of the evaluation report.

As offers must be valid at the time of contract issuance, evaluation of offers must be completed before the validity of the offers expire. Procurement Officials should also take into account the time required for obtaining approval and for issuing the contract. In the event that these conditions are unlikely to be met, Procurement Officials may request bidders in writing to extend the validity of their bid or proposal.

8.2 Evaluation Committees

The purpose of the Evaluation Committees is to verify that vendors and their offers satisfy the requirements of the solicitation documents and to evaluate offers according to the evaluation criteria predefined in the SSP. The SSP describes critical components of the Sourcing process and provides justification for Sourcing decisions in order to achieve Best Value for Money. It provides an objective approach to the methodology of selecting the best source to fulfil the established need.

The Evaluation Committees are divided into a Technical Evaluation Committee, responsible for the technical evaluation, and a Financial Evaluation Committee (or Procurement Official), responsible for the financial evaluation. The decision of who participates as a member of the technical and financial evaluation committees rests with the requisitioning and the procurement functions, respectively; this decision is to be documented in the SSP.

The Evaluation Committees are responsible for assessing the ability of the potential vendors to meet the UN's stated minimum requirements and provides a basis for determining the relative merits of competing bids and proposals based on predetermined evaluation criteria.

To conduct a fair and unbiased evaluation of Submissions, the SSP shall include the formation of the Technical Evaluation Committee consisting of at least two (2) members (i.e., at least one of whom shall be from the Requisitioner's office, and the other(s) shall be qualified UN staff members). A superior and subordinate may not serve together on the Technical Evaluation Committee. To ensure a clear segregation of duties, Procurement Officials cannot serve as members of a Technical Evaluation Committee, unless, exceptionally, they are acting as Requisitioners for a specific case, in which case they cannot act as Procurement Officials for that solicitation. The actual number of people on the evaluation team will depend on the nature, complexity, and value of the procurement activity, but should normally not exceed five (5) members.

The Technical Evaluation Committee is a collegial body that shall always endeavor to achieve a consensus in their final decision. Where a consensus cannot be achieved despite all efforts, the chairperson may call a simple majority vote to settle an issue or disagreement. Should the votes be equally divided, the average of the scores will be applied. Once a final decision is achieved, the members shall uphold the final decision achieved by the team.

In particularly complicated procurement processes (e.g. complex specifications, high value bids, complex pre-qualification criteria, etc.), external subject-matter experts may be contracted onto the evaluation committee as observers in an ex-officio non-scoring advisory capacity. If deemed appropriate, members of the oversight bodies (OIOS, Board of Auditors, Joint Inspection Unit) external to the procurement process may participate as independent observers in technical evaluations and record their observations in writing. Committee members and observers must immediately indicate if they are in a potential conflict of interest situation with any of the vendor (e.g. owning shares in the company, family relationship with vendors, etc.), in which case they shall be replaced.

Main Tasks of the Chairperson During the Technical Evaluation:

- a. Perform a facilitative role in the technical evaluation committee, strive for consensus, and settle any issues or disagreements (if applicable), and
- b. Remind the Technical Evaluation Committee that its deliberations are strictly confidential. Information about the content of the Submissions or the evaluation process is not to be revealed outside the evaluation committee. In particular, (i) during the evaluation, access to offers is restricted to the evaluation committee and to observers, and (ii) correspondence with bidders must be through the Procurement Official and must not be shared outside the evaluation committee.

Main Tasks of the Technical Evaluation Committee:

- a. Conduct the technical evaluation and prepare a written report thereof, describing the score of the competing Submissions and ranking the Submissions from best to worst, in order to establish a competitive range of most responsive Submissions
- b. The report shall also set forth:
  - i. The basis of evaluation (i.e., the SSP as applied to the evaluation criteria and their relative weight);
  - ii. An analysis of whether Submissions are technically acceptable and, if unacceptable, the reasons thereof, including an assessment of each vendor's ability to satisfy the technical requirement(s) and a description of each Submission's strengths and weaknesses;
  - iii. A summary of the findings, matrix, or quantitative ranking of each technical proposal relative to the best rating possible;
  - iv. Observations made by independent observers, if applicable.

Main Tasks of the Financial Evaluation Committee/Procurement Official During the Evaluation Process:

- a. Obtain signatures of affidavits of confidentiality and no conflict of interest from the technical evaluation committee;
- b. Brief the Technical Evaluation Committee about its role and ensure its familiarity with the solicitation process and evaluation criteria;
- c. Prepare financial evaluation matrix;
- d. Manage requests for clarifications with bidders, if applicable;
- e. Upon receipt of the technical evaluation report, the Procurement Official or the Financial Evaluation Committee shall conduct and review the financial evaluation, make a final comparison of the competing proposals in accordance with the terms of the solicitation documents and the SSP, record its findings, and advise the Evaluation Committee of the recommendation of award.

8.3 Evaluation Criteria

Evaluation criteria are divided into the following categories, which are explained in Chapter 6 Solicitation and which are assessed during the evaluation process:

- a. Formal criteria (see Chapter 6.4.6.1 Evaluation Criteria) – assessed during preliminary screening (see Chapter 8.5 Preliminary Screening)
- b. Mandatory and Technical Criteria (see Chapter 6.4.6.2 Mandatory and Technical Criteria) – assessed during technical evaluation (see Chapter 8.6 Technical Evaluation), and
- c. Financial Criteria (see Chapter 6.4.6.3 Financial Criteria) – assessed during financial evaluation (see Chapter 8.7 Financial Evaluation)

8.4 Evaluation Methodologies

There are three (3) different evaluation methodologies that can be utilized depending on the solicitation method selected, as summarized in the below Table.

Solicitation method	Evaluation method
LVA	Lowest priced, technically acceptable
RFQ	Lowest priced, technically acceptable
ITB	Lowest priced, substantially conforming bid
RFP	Cumulative weighted analysis, award based on the most responsive proposal

TABLE 4: SOLICITATION METHODS AND CORRESPONDING EVALUATION METHODS

8.4.1 Lowest Priced, Technically Acceptable Offer

This method of evaluation is used when the solicitation is made through informal methods: LVA or RFQ (see Chapter 4.5 Shopping Cart and Chapter 6.3.3 Request for Quotation).

To provide a more flexible method for selecting vendors for procurement of relatively low value (equal to or below US$ 150,000), the evaluation methodology allows various considerations to be taken into account. The lowest-priced, technically acceptable offer methodology consists of the following steps (These apply mostly to RFQ. As for LVA, all these steps are compressed):

- a. Preliminary screening of quotations, including an assessment of whether quotations comply with the formal and eligibility criteria stated in the solicitation document;
- b. Technical evaluation of quotations, determining which are compliant to the mandatory criteria (if included in the solicitation document), and substantially compliant to the technical criteria;
- c. For financial evaluation, quotations that are found to be technically compliant shall be evaluated based on the lowest price;

- d. The selection of a vendor other than the one offering the lowest priced option requires proper justification. This must be documented and attached in UMOJA for monitoring and audit purposes, and reasons for not choosing the lowest pricing option must be included in the request for award signed by the appropriate Procurement Official (or CO, in the case of LVA).

8.4.2 Lowest Priced, Substantially Conforming Bid

This method of evaluation is used when the solicitation is conducted through an ITB (see Chapter 6.3.4 Invitation to Bid), and price serves as the overriding evaluation criterion upon which to award a contract. The lowest-priced, substantially conforming bid methodology consists of the following steps:

- a. Preliminary screening of bids, including an assessment of whether bids comply with the formal and eligibility criteria stated in the solicitation document. All bids substantially compliant at this stage will go through the evaluation of technical and financial aspects;
- b. Technical evaluation of bids, determining which are compliant with the mandatory criteria (if included in the solicitation document) and substantially conforming with the technical criteria, and rejecting non-compliant bids. Only bids meeting or exceeding the criteria shall be considered substantially conforming;
- c. Financial evaluation of bids, by selecting for award the lowest priced bid among the substantially compliant bids, as per financial criteria in the solicitation document. Nevertheless, since an ITB is a one-envelope procedure, the financial evaluation shall include all prices of both compliant and non-compliant bids to be presented to the Procurement Approving Authority.

8.4.3 Cumulative/Weighted Analysis

This method of evaluation is used when the solicitation is made through an RFP (see Chapter 6.3.5 Request for Proposal) and the evaluation is based on criteria other than price in order to ensure Best Value for Money. The combined analysis methodology consists of the following steps:

- a. Preliminary screening of proposals, including an assessment of whether proposals comply with the formal and eligibility criteria stated in the solicitation documents. All proposals deemed compliant at this stage will go through the technical evaluation step;
- b. Technical evaluation (mandatory criteria), determining which proposals are compliant with the mandatory criteria (if included in the solicitation document) and rejecting non-compliant proposals. Only proposals meeting or exceeding the mandatory criteria shall be considered compliant;
- c. Technical evaluation (technical criteria) determining the technical points achieved by each proposal as per the maximum points assigned per criterion included in the solicitation document and in the SSP. Only proposals that meet the minimum technical threshold indicated in the solicitation document (normally 60% or 70%) shall be deemed compliant;
- d. The Financial Evaluation Committee/Procurement Official shall review the technical evaluation report for accuracy and ensure it was conducted in line with the pre-established criteria and complies with procurement principles under Financial Regulation 5.12. Any discrepancies shall be communicated to the Technical Evaluation Committee for amendment of the report (see Chapter 8.7 Financial Evaluation);
- e. Upon acceptance of the technical evaluation report, the Procurement Official shall request the TOC to open the financial proposals of the offers that achieved the minimum technical threshold. The maximum number of points for the financial proposals, as stated in the solicitation document and the SSP, will be allocated to the lowest price financial proposal;
- f. Combined analysis, whereby the proposal obtaining the overall highest score after combining the scores of the technical and the financial proposals may be considered to constitute Best Value for Money. However, the recommendation for the award shall not be solely dependent on the total number of points, but also consider risk factors, quality considerations, and other suitable factors.

8.5 Preliminary Screening

To avoid spending further resources on the evaluation of invalid offers, offers containing material deviation may be rejected at an early stage of the evaluation process by performing a preliminary examination of offers against the formal criteria stipulated in the solicitation document.

Examples of formal compliance criteria are included in Chapter 6.4.6.1.

Offers may be rejected in the following situations (see Chapters 8.8.1 Clarifications from Vendors and Chapter 8.8.2 Material Deviations: Material Deviations, in particular regarding the types of missing information that the bidder could be given the opportunity to provide):

- a. Absence of required bid/proposal security when applicable, or if it has been determined it is not compliant in terms of amount or validity period. A change in wording that is consistent with the prescribed format is not a material deviation. If there are concerns about the authenticity of the bid/proposal security, the Procurement Official should contact the issuing bank directly. If the issuing bank is unable to confirm the validity and/or authenticity of the document submitted as security, the chairperson of the evaluation committee must immediately report it to the Procurement Official, who shall in turn report to the VRC;
- b. Absence of bid or proposal submission form or lack of signature of the bid or proposal when this is clearly specified in the tender document as a requirement. Change in the wording that is consistent with the prescribed format is not a material deviation. A duly authorized signatory must sign the vendor's offer for it to be legally binding. If the bid or proposal do not contain the required signature, and provided that the signature of an authorized representative appears on a letter of transmittal or on another document attached thereto, and in the case of ITBs, the signature appears on the document where the total price of bid is stipulated, the UN shall assume that the omission was unintentional. However, the Procurement Official shall ask the duly authorized signatory to immediately confirm that the offer is legally binding and obtain the required signature. If the confirmation and signature is provided as requested, the UN may then accept the offer;
- c. Substantial financial information is included in the technical proposal envelope when conducting an RFP, and such information is related to the financial proposal unless approval from Director, PD or CPO has been obtained to accept the proposal.

Bidders can be held ineligible further to the provisions in Chapter 3.

8.6 Technical Evaluation

All Submissions found compliant with the formal and eligibility criteria under Chapter 8.5 Preliminary Screening will go through to technical evaluation, which consists of two sub-steps: (i) evaluation of mandatory criteria (if included in the solicitation document) and (ii) evaluation of technical criteria.

Evaluation of Mandatory Criteria:

If the solicitation included mandatory criteria, they must be evaluated at this stage. This is to ensure that the bidder is qualified and capable of successfully completing the contract, i.e., the entity meets legal and regulatory requirements, has the required minimum technical capability and experience, and is financially capable. Mandatory criteria, when included in a solicitation document, are evaluated on a pass/fail basis, regardless of whether these are included in an RFQ, ITB, or RFP.

Technical Evaluation of Bids:

Bids received in response to an ITB must be assessed against the technical criteria specified in the solicitation document (specifications, TOR, SOW, and other requirements) on a pass/fail basis and must be rejected when they contain material deviation, i.e., when the specifications of the items quoted vary in one or more significant aspect(s) from the minimum required technical specifications and other requirements.

Technical Evaluation of Proposals:

Proposals received in response to an RFP must be rated as per the criteria specified in the SSP and solicitation document. The technical proposal submitted by any bidder will be disqualified if the proposal does not obtain the minimum required number of points to qualify, as per the threshold stated in the solicitation document and the SSP. The corresponding financial proposal shall be retained unopened in the procurement file. However, any bid security or guarantee must be returned. The Procurement Official in charge of the solicitation exercise should ensure that the bid security contained in any unsuccessful submission is returned to the bidder promptly, following a contract award to the selected bidder.

RESOURCES

Annex 11— Request for Technical Evaluation

8.7 Financial Evaluation

All proposals deemed technically compliant with the mandatory and technical criteria will go through to financial evaluation. Financial evaluation is the process of comparing the offers with the financial criteria stipulated in the solicitation document and determining the price upon which to base the evaluation.

Price is an important financial evaluation criterion, but the weight of the price depends on the evaluation methodology and financial criteria stated in the solicitation document, which may include life-cycle-cost analysis.

Taxes and duties should not be taken into account for the purpose of financial evaluation, unless included in the solicitation documents.

The Procurement Official, prior to financial evaluation, shall correct mathematical errors with the intent to arrive at the most accurate and reasonable interpretation through, e.g., professional judgment, correction of typographical errors and omissions, and through clarifications from the vendor. Such errors should be clarified with the bidder through official written communications authorized by the Procurement Approving Authority. While the correction of errors may lead to revised totals, the vendor may not use the opportunity to increase or lower prices, but rather to reflect the correct prices and totals as intended in the initial submission. Bidders shall be given a reasonable amount of time to respond to such clarifications.

In the case of an ITB, if there is a discrepancy between the unit price and the line item total that is obtained by multiplying the unit price by the quantity, the unit price shall prevail and the line item total shall be corrected, unless, in the opinion of the UN there, is an obvious misplacement of the decimal point in the unit price. In such a case, the line item total as quoted shall govern, and the unit price shall be corrected.

After price correction has been completed, discounts, when applicable, should be evaluated; currency conversion into one base currency (as specified in the solicitation document) should also be completed.

Quantity discounts may be considered in the evaluation where quantities can be estimated with reasonable reliability in advance. The final price comparison, in one single currency, must consider corrected errors, quantity discounts, and any required adjustments.

For the procurement of goods, if offers were received under both FCA and other Incoterms, the evaluation report should explain how the evaluation team established that the selected Incoterm for the award is the most advantageous for the UN.

During the financial evaluation, a deviation would be considered material in any of the following situations:

- a. The bidder, during requests for clarifications by the Procurement Official, does not accept the required price correction, as per the condition of the solicitation document;
- b. The bidder offers less quantity than is required unless the tender allows for split awards and allows quotations in lots.

In the case of an RFP, generally the proposal with the lowest overall price receives the maximum score allocated to the financial evaluation. Other proposals receive a financial score that is pro-rated, in comparison with the lowest cost proposal.

Assessment of the Reasonableness of Quoted Prices:

In general, an assessment of the reasonableness of quoted prices is always recommended to establish Best Value for Money. However, it is mandatory when the response rate or rate of technical compliance is abnormally low. This is to ensure the price comparison is done between adequate comparators; for example, prices would tend to be lower from bidders that are not compliant (i.e., lower quality goods or services, longer delivery times than requested, etc.).

Several comparators can be used to determine whether the price is fair and reasonable, such as:

- a. Comparison with market price (i.e., prices offered by other vendors of the same or similar product or service);
- b. Comparison with valid LTA prices;
- c. Historical price (i.e., compare the current price to a price paid in the past for the same or a similar product, taking market trends into consideration);
- d. If the offer is custom-built, whether the cost breakdown of the offer shows that the price is fair and reasonable.

If, after price/cost analysis, the evaluation team does not consider the price to be fair and reasonable, the UN may seek to re-solicit the requirement or negotiate with the vendor(s) in an attempt to lower the price.

Generally, if a Submission is found to be technically non-compliant, the financial proposal is neither opened nor evaluated. However, in some circumstances, in order to ensure that the Organization is obtaining Best Value for Money, it may be prudent to open the financial proposal of a non-compliant Submission to undertake further due diligence and mitigate risk. For example, if only a low number of Submissions have been found to be technically compliant, then the Procurement Official may open one or more financial proposals of non-compliant Submissions in order to establish pricing benchmarks and verify that the pricing offered by the technically compliant Submission is fair and reasonable and provides Best Value for Money. The results of such a benchmark can be used in making a decision to cancel and rebid the solicitation or seeking negotiations with the bidders with technically compliant bids. In this situation, the Procurement Official should also consider whether to review the technical specifications with the Requisitioner and other sources of technical expertise to ascertain whether the technical specifications are excessive or otherwise unnecessarily stringent. Opening of a technically non-compliant Submission's financial proposal may only be done on an exceptional basis, after obtaining authorization, in writing, to do so from the Director, PD or the CPO and providing an explanation of the reasons for requesting the exemption. If such authorization is granted, the opening should also be disclosed to the Contracts Committee, together with documented rationale.

8.8 Further Aspects of Evaluation

Only the Procurement Official shall be authorized to seek clarifications from bidders during evaluation. Direct contact between Requisitioners and bidders is prohibited and may give cause to cancel the solicitation process or reject the related bids.

8.8.1 Clarifications from Vendors

Offers shall be evaluated based upon the information provided in the offer. However, after the Submission of offers and upon preliminary examination, clarifications to the offers are sometimes required from bidders to conduct a proper evaluation process.

The Procurement Official shall apply professional judgment as to when clarification is warranted and when it is not. On the one hand, it is in the interest of the Organization to ensure that as many offers as possible are compliant with the needs of the UN for effective competition. On the other hand, the principle of fairness to bidders that presented good and timely offers must be observed.

Clarification requests should aim to:

- a. Clarify ambiguous aspects of an offer;
- b. Modify minor mistakes or oversights in offers;
- c. Ensure that administrative errors do not cause the disqualification of an otherwise potentially good offer;
- d. Rectify statements made in the offer that do not reflect the spirit of the solicitation documents;
- e. Request missing information.

Examples of when the Procurement Official may consider that a request for clarification is warranted are:

- a. When the bid bond was not found in the offer;
- b. When the bid bond contains language that deviates from the standard bid bond language required in the solicitation;
- c. When the technical proposal contains financial information, however, such information does not seem likely to be part of the financial proposal (e.g. pricing of ancillary equipment is mentioned in the technical proposal; however, it is not clear that it is the price offered to the UN as part of the financial proposal);
- d. When a bidder does not include proof of some important elements (e.g. a quality standard), while it is stated in their proposal that they are in the possession of such element;
- e. When a bidder does not include some specific self-contained piece of information that makes them miss a mandatory requirement or lose a significant number of points in the technical evaluation, and it could be easily obtained (e.g., within five (5) business days). Examples of this could be a missing CV of the project manager, a missing reference of a client, etc.;
- f. When a bidder does not "check a box" or omits to provide a confirmation statement;

- g. When a bidder includes statements in the financial proposal that go against the spirit of the solicitation and it would cause the disqualification of its proposal. For example, the solicitation may require fixed prices, and the bidder may state in their financial proposals that prices will depend on the cost of raw materials. To make a comparison to other offers, the bidder may be requested to clarify whether the offer is in compliance with the instructions in the solicitation;
- h. When it is in the UN's interest to eliminate minor irregularities, informalities, or apparent clerical mistakes in the Submission.

However, clarification requests should not be aimed at allowing bidders a second chance to resubmit significant parts of their offer after the submission deadline, since this would not be fair to bidders that submitted a complete proposal in time.

Examples of when a Procurement Officer should not request clarification from a bidder:

- a. When a significant part of the bidder's offer is missing, the bidder should not be given the chance to supplement such significant part after the closing time;
- b. When the offer is manifestly lacking in many aspects, it should be avoided to send multiple clarification requests covering a multitude of aspects.

To ensure that clarifications remain focused on specific aspects and do not become overly general, a limited time to respond should be given to the bidder. In no case should the bidder be allowed more than five (5) business days to respond to the request for clarification. Should the bidder respond after the deadline set by the Procurement Official, their response should generally not be taken into consideration unless exceptional circumstances apply.

Clarifications should be sought and preferably received via formal communication since they will become part of the bidder's offer. Any communications with bidders during the solicitation process must be kept in the case file. All correspondence with vendors will be in writing (email is acceptable but should be authorized by the Procurement Approving Authority that signed the solicitation documents or by his/her authorized designee) and must form part of the procurement record.

8.8.2 Material Deviations

The UN must maintain fairness and transparency and ensure that offers are rejected only when a deviation from the requirements is material. In some cases, a substantially conforming or technically compliant offer could contain non-material deviations. To achieve Best Value for Money, it is important not to disqualify offers solely for non-material (minor) deviation(s). A material deviation is one that:

- a. Would affect in any substantial way the scope, quality, or performance of the goods and related services specified in the contract;
- b. Would limit in any substantial way, by contradicting the bidding documents, the UN's rights or the bidder's obligations under the contract;
- c. If rectified, would unfairly affect the competitive position of other bidders presenting substantially responsive bids.

To this end, the Technical Evaluation Committee chairperson and the Procurement Official responsible for the respective procurement exercise must have a clear understanding of what represents a material deviation. During the evaluation of the offers, consistency must be applied when determining whether a deviation is a material. The evaluation report must identify any deviations encountered during each step of the evaluation process.

8.8.3 Apparent Errors in Price

The UN is not responsible for errors in price made by bidders. However, the UN shall verify prices in cases where it believes there is an error (e.g. a specific item price that is very high or very low). The vendor shall then be informed that revision of the original price is prohibited, and that non-compliance shall result in rejection of the offer. If the vendor confirms that the original price is correct, the evaluation can proceed. Should the vendor acknowledge that the price is incorrect and the price is material to the selection of the vendor, the offer may be rejected in order to adhere to the principle of fair and equal treatment of all vendors, unless the Procurement Approving Authority considers it in the best interest of the UN to accept such bid/proposal; otherwise, the offer shall be rejected. The communication with the vendor and any internal decisions must be in writing and kept on file for the record to facilitate audits.

8.8.4 Abnormally Low Offers or Submissions

An abnormally low offer or submission is one where the price, in relation to the scope, methodology, technical solution, and requirements, appears so unreasonably low that it raises concerns regarding the bidder's ability to perform the contract successfully.

When an abnormally low offer or submission is identified, the Procurement Official shall seek written clarifications from the bidder, including detailed price analysis of how its financial offer or submission correlates with the scope, proposed methodology, schedule, and allocation of risks and responsibilities, without changing the original submission.

After the evaluation of the information and detailed price analyses presented by the bidder, the Procurement Official may:

- a. Accept the offer or submission;
- b. If appropriate, require that the amount of the performance security be increased at the expense of the bidder to a level sufficient to protect the UN against financial loss in the event of default of the successful bidder under the contract;
- c. Reject the offer or submission.

8.8.5 Evaluation by Lots

Where the solicitation document states in the Special instructions and evaluation criteria that evaluation will be done by lot, the evaluation must be done as per the provisions stated under the evaluation criteria section of the SSP and the solicitation document. The SSP and the special instructions and evaluation criteria shall include details on how the UN will award lots. Such criteria shall allow evaluation of each lot(s).

8.8.6 Review of Offers Received in Situations of Direct Contracting or Sole Sourcing

When direct contracting under sole sourcing is justified and an offer has been requested further to Chapter 6.9, such offer should be evaluated. In order to facilitate the evaluation process, Procurement Officials should request the vendor to provide information that would allow for a comprehensive assessment of its offer based on pre-established evaluation criteria and that would ensure it meets the needs of the UN.

The purpose of such evaluation is to assess whether the offer is of acceptable quality at a justifiable price. To ensure the quality of the offer, it should be evaluated as compliant/non-compliant, and the offer should only be accepted if considered compliant. The evaluation must be carried out by technical and financial evaluation committees composed of technical experts and Procurement Officials, respectively.

Further to the evaluation process, negotiations are usually recommended in direct contracting situations to ensure Best Value for Money. See Chapter 8.9 Negotiations for details.

8.8.7 Complaints and Representations

Replies to representations and complaints made by bidders during (and after) the evaluation process must be in line with what may or may not be disclosed, as stated in the solicitation document. Depending on the nature of the complaints and representations received, the Procurement Official should consider seeking advice from OLA or a Legal Advisor before replying. Whenever a complaint warrants senior management's attention, the Procurement Official should always send the complaints immediately to the procurement head of the relevant UN Secretariat entity, with a copy to Director, PD. These complaints and representations are to be distinguished from procurement challenges submitted following a solicitation process, in accordance with Chapter 10 on procurement challenges.

8.8.8 Indications of Potential Proscribed Practices

While conducting an evaluation of Submissions, the technical evaluation committee and the Procurement Official should satisfy itself that there is no indication of fraud, collusion, or suspicious actions by some bidders, including those that might point to the existence of a cartel.

The following are typical 'red flags' indicating risks of potential proscribed practices.

Patterns of Potential Fraud:

- a. Bid/proposal securities submitted show apparent irregularities (e.g. logos or names or issuing banks);
- b. Registration certificates show inconsistencies, e.g. in terms of dates, registration institution, etc., or frequent changes of the company name;
- c. Quality certificates are issued by dubious providers;
- d. Bank account information provided on the vendor form is under the name of an individual and not a company;
- e. Staff members are involved in the bidder's corporate structure or are named as beneficiaries of related bank accounts.

Patterns of collusion are hard to detect because agreements are secret in nature. These may include bid-rigging (competitors agree in advance who will submit the winning bid) and price-fixing (agreement by competitors to raise, fix, or maintain the price for goods or services), as detailed below.

Patterns of Potential Bid Rigging:

- a. The same vendors submit bids and each company seems to take a turn being the successful bidder;
- b. Some bids are much higher than published price lists, previous bids by the same firms, or cost estimates;
- c. A company appears to be bidding substantially higher on some bids than on other bids, with no apparent cost differences to account for the disparity;
- d. Bid prices drop whenever a new or infrequent bidder submits a bid;
- e. A successful bidder subcontracts work to competitors that submitted unsuccessful bids for the same project;
- f. A company withdraws its successful bid and subsequently is subcontracted work by the new winning contractor;
- g. Schedules are split between bidders (i.e., one bidder is lowest for schedule one, the other for schedule two, or one bidder quoted for schedule one only, another bidder for schedule two only, etc.);
- h. Bank guarantees submitted by different bidders have been issued by the same bank and have almost identical reference numbers (e.g. A-123 and A-124);

- i. Details regarding ownership and management in respect of several bidders show that these bidders have the same key personnel, such as directors, partners, owners, etc.

Patterns of Potential Price Fixing:

- a. Prices of multiple bidders are identical, especially when prices stay identical for long periods of time and prices were previously different;
- b. Price increases do not appear to be supported by increased costs;
- c. Discounts are eliminated, especially in a market where discounts historically were given;
- d. The proposals or bid forms submitted by different bidders contain irregularities, such as identical calculations or spelling errors, similar handwriting, or similar stationery. This may indicate that the designated low bidder may have prepared all or part of the losing bidder's offer;
- e. Bid or price documents contain white-outs or other physical alterations indicating last-minute price changes;
- f. A company submits a bid when it is incapable of successfully performing the contract (likely a complementary bid).

When there is an indication of potential proscribed practice, Procurement Officials must report this immediately to the Director, PD or the CPO with a copy to the VRC and OIOS. Unless the alleged proscribed practice is completely evident, the Procurement Official should not reject bids received until OIOS does a first assessment of the case. If OIOS decides to carry out a formal investigation (because there is sufficient evidence to substantiate the allegations), then the Procurement Official shall seek the decision of the Director, PD or the Chief Procurement Official whether to reject such bids, without waiting for the outcome of the full OIOS investigation and the VRC's determination.

8.8.9 Best and Final Offer (BAFO)

The "Best and Final Offer" (BAFO) is an optional step in the selection of offers that has the objective of enhancing competition and thus ensuring Best Value for Money for the UN. BAFO shall be applied only once during the solicitation process.

Sound professional judgment should be applied when determining the circumstances in which the use of BAFO is justified. In such cases, approval must be sought from a Procurement Approving Authority. This will usually be the same authority that approved the issuance of the solicitation documents. The request for approval will specify the reasons why a BAFO is justified and will be kept on file.

Bidders are cautioned to propose their best possible offers at the outset of the original proposal process, as there is no guarantee that any offer will be allowed an opportunity to submit a Best and Final Offer. When submitting their offers in response to a solicitation, bidders should not rely on BAFO being requested by the UN at a later stage, as this may or may not happen for reasons that are outside of the bidders' control. Procurement Officials should be aware that excessive use of BAFO might encourage bidders to regularly keep a margin of safety in their initial offers. A BAFO shall be used sparingly for the reasons indicated below.

There are two scenarios in which BAFOs may be used:

Two or More Offers are "Commercially Tied":

The Procurement Official will apply sound judgment to determine when two offers are commercially tied; such determination will greatly depend on the type of commodity/market for each requirement. Offers may be considered "commercially tied" when either (i) the financial evaluations or (ii) the Best Value for Money calculation (a reflection of the value of the offer) are within a very close range of 5%. Where industry characteristics, recent changes in the market or past experiences with solicitations in the same industry give reason to believe that a BAFO would meaningfully improve the outcome of the solicitation, a BAFO may also be considered in situations where the Best Value for Money calculation or price differentials exceed 5%.

In this scenario:

- a. Only bidders that are considered to be 'commercially tied' will be invited to participate in the BAFO;
- b. Bidders will be requested to submit only an updated financial proposal; the technical proposal will continue being valid;
- c. The BAFO shall state that Bidders may only decrease prices, increase discounts, or provide other benefits to the UN, or leave prices all unaltered;
- d. An extended bid validity may be requested.

There are changes in the conditions of the solicitation that require bidders to refine their offers:

Sometimes, in the course of a solicitation, the Procurement Official may be informed of changes in the underlying assumptions of the scope of requirements (e.g. a change in the estimated number of required units, of the required delivery terms, etc.). In rare circumstances, it may be required to request supplemental information from bidders to address some changes in the requirements that could not be contemplated at the time of issuance of the solicitation. In addition, there may be a need to correct factual errors in the solicitation documents or clarify the requirements.

Should those changes affect the scope of the requirements substantially, the solicitation should be cancelled and re-tendered. However, in the case that the changes do not substantially affect the scope of requirements, in the interest of time, the Procurement Official may consider the use of BAFO prior to finalizing the solicitation upon the approval of the Director, PD or CPO. The Procurement Official will be mindful, though, that this use of BAFO shall not be utilized to limit competition.

Prior to issuing a BAFO, the Procurement Official will determine how the offers will be assessed to determine Best Value for Money, in line with the methodology established in the SSP. As such, the Procurement Officer will determine if the Technical Evaluation Committee may need to reconvene in order to refine the Technical Evaluation Report in light of the newly provided information, or if this is not necessary. The method of evaluation, as stipulated in the SSP, will continue to apply.

The following principles apply:

- a. All bidders that may have a reasonable chance of winning the award will be invited to participate in the BAFO. This may be limited to technically compliant bidders only or may be extended to all bidders that submitted offers at the judgment of the Procurement Official;
- b. Bidders will be informed of the documents that they need to submit.

The BAFO request will establish a new closing date and time for the Best and Final Offers. The receipt of the Best and Final Offers will be done by the Tender Opening Committee, which will disclose all offers to the Procurement Official at the same time, after the closing time. BAFO openings are not public, and the UN may use electronic means to receive them in the interest of time (e.g. to a dedicated e-mail TOC address).

The Procurement Official may not receive the responses to BAFO on his or her personal e-mail. In case of receipt of a BAFO by a Procurement Official, it will be communicated promptly to the Procurement Approving Authority that approved the issuance of the solicitation. This may lead to disqualification of the bidder or the offer at the sole discretion of the UN.

Procurement Officials should take the following into account:

- a. BAFO may only be used once for each competitive process to avoid the impression among bidders that the procedure is being used to favour any vendor. In the extremely rare

- circumstance that a second BAFO round may be strictly necessary, the Procurement Official may consider other options, such as initiating a rebid or requesting to enter into direct negotiations;
- b. Bidders are not obligated to alter their proposals as a result of the request of BAFO;
  - c. The Procurement Official will not disclose the reasons why a BAFO is being requested, the number of bidders from which it is being requested, or any information about the technical or financial evaluation of each bid;
  - d. The Procurement Official will keep the results of the financial evaluation strictly confidential during the BAFO process;
  - e. Letters of regret for bidders that were not invited to the BAFO will be issued at the same time as all other letters of regret, following signature of the awarded contract.

8.9 Negotiations

Negotiations are discussions with a potential vendor after consideration for award recommendation, either:

- a. Following HCC/LCC review leading to a rejection of bids under Financial Rule 105.15(c) by the Authorized Official;
- b. Following the rejection of bids by the Procurement Approving Authority under Financial Rule 105.15(c);
- c. In instances in which negotiations would be justified, such as sole source or Letters of Assist (see Chapter 6.8 and Chapter 14.3.1). Approval to enter into negotiations needs to be obtained from the appropriate Procurement Approving Authority as per FR 105.16(a) or Authorized Official;
- d. In case of a need to amend a contract, such as extensions or increase in NTE amount under Financial Rule 105.13(b). ;
- e. When following a recommendation for an award in the professional judgment of the Procurement Official, more advantageous terms to the United Nations could be achieved that are not material to the award decision. In such a case, the recommendation of the Review Committee or approval of the Authorized Official to negotiate is not necessary. The Financial Rule used for the award will, therefore, remain Financial Rules 105.15(a) or 105.15(b), as the case may be;
- f. Following HCC/LCC review leading to an award where there is an additional recommendation to conduct negotiations.

The following procedures should be followed when conducting negotiations:

- a. It is recommended that in complex cases, prior to the start of negotiations, the negotiation team prepares a strategy and plan with a brief outline of the expected negotiation outcomes (not to be shared with the bidder) and that each individual is given specific roles and responsibilities in the process (see Chapter 8.9.2);
- b. While negotiations are usually conducted in person or telephonically, in some cases, the Procurement Official may determine that it is in the best interest of the United Nations to obtain written offers as the starting point of the negotiations. The Procurement Official may request vendors to follow certain formats to submit their offers;
- c. In cases in which negotiations are conducted with more than one vendor, it is recommended that offers be received through the dedicated e-mail address of the Tender Opening Committee. The TOC will release all offers to the Procurement Official at the same time;
- d. The Procurement Official may conduct as many rounds of negotiations as necessary until the efforts seem to be exhaustive;

- e. UN staff members should treat all vendors involved in a negotiation process fairly and in an equitable manner;
- f. Negotiations are confidential between the UN and the vendor, and neither party may reveal information relating to the negotiations. Vendors should be informed of the same upon initiating the negotiations;
- g. When physical meetings or teleconferences are required, a minimum of two UN staff must be involved. Amongst the two personnel, one must be the Procurement Official;
- h. The Procurement Official shall lead the negotiations. Other participants may be required to attend, depending on the envisaged character of the negotiations. Such participants may include technical experts, legal officers, etc.;
- i. Meetings shall be recorded in writing; the minutes should be placed in the case file, and the results of the negotiations must be recorded in a note to the file or similar document.

8.9.1 Negotiations in Case of Sole Source

In instances where direct contracting is justified, negotiations are normally recommended in order to ensure Best Value for Money. Since no competitive solicitation process has been carried out, the UN has no immediate evidence that the product offers acceptable price and quality. Therefore, the UN needs to make every effort to justify the selection and ensure the reasonableness of price by attempting to obtain the most favourable terms and conditions for every aspect of the vendor's offer. Proper costing studies, market research, expert consultations, and verification of client references are key activities to be performed prior to such negotiations. Please refer also to Chapter 6.8.

8.9.2 Negotiation Strategy

In complex cases, prior to negotiations, the Procurement Official may establish the negotiation strategy in a document, which should be marked "Commercially in Confidence" and must be restricted only to the Procurement Official, Requisitioner, and legal officer involved in the case, to ensure the integrity of the process. Such a document may include the following information:

- a. List of vendors invited to the negotiations;
- b. List of UN staff participating in the negotiations;
- c. The objectives of the negotiations, including the desired outcomes in order of importance;
- d. The scope of the negotiations (financial, technical, legal, etc.);
- e. The timelines for negotiations;
- f. The techniques that will be used to obtain the desired results;
- g. The Best Alternative to a Negotiated Agreement;
- h. The decision-making criteria that will be considered for the award, if negotiations are being conducted with more than one bidder;
- i. Other relevant information.

8.10 Final Evaluation and Recommendation for Award

The results of the technical evaluation shall be documented in a technical evaluation report. The level of detail of the technical evaluation report should be commensurate with the complexity of the process. Although the use of evaluation tables is best practice, it is not mandatory for informal methods of solicitation, such as LVA and RFQ. When evaluation tables are used, a signed copy of the filled in technical evaluation table must be submitted to the Procurement Official with the submission date and the tender number clearly identified. The submission must be signed by the Chairperson of the technical evaluation committee or the Section Chief or other official that signed the SSP.

The technical evaluation report must be dated, identify the tender number and description of the goods and/or services to which it relates, and the name of each technical evaluation member must be printed under the signature. It shall be signed by all the members of the technical evaluation committee, initialed on every page by at least two members of an evaluation team, and kept on file for future reference. The report shall describe the application of the technical evaluation criteria stipulated in the SSP in relation to each bidder's submission. This should include narratives for each criterion evaluated, whether scored or assessed on a pass/fail basis. The narrative must sufficiently outline the rationale for the decision taken by the Technical Evaluation Committee.

Upon receipt of the technical evaluation report, the Procurement Official or the Financial Evaluation Committee shall perform the financial evaluation, make a final comparison of the competing proposals in accordance with the terms of the solicitation documents and the SSP, record its findings, and advise the Evaluation Committee of the recommendation of award.

The findings will later be used as the basis for the recommendation of award. The recommendation for the award shall contain a summary of the evaluation process, as well as details of the evaluation steps performed and key criteria therein (i.e., preliminary examination, technical and financial evaluation). When the solicitation method is an RFP, the technical evaluation section must include a clear narrative supporting the points allocated to each technical proposal. Any rejection, non-compliance, and clarifications of offers must be clearly stated, including a list with the final ranking of the offers and the reasoning behind the selection of the winning offer.

All unsuccessful bids should be retained in the procurement file. However, any bid security or guarantee must be returned. The Procurement Official in charge of the solicitation exercise must ensure that the bid security contained in any unsuccessful submission be returned to the bidder promptly following contract award to the selected bidder.

Unsuccessful bidders will be notified only after the contract is awarded and all contract documents are duly executed.

In the case when the evaluation methodology is "lowest-priced technically acceptable offer" or "lowest-priced substantially conforming offer," attention should be given to ensure that the reasons for disqualifying offers with prices lower than the selected offer are clearly stated in the technical evaluation report and in the case presentation.

9. Review by Committees on Contracts

9.1 Mandate of Committee on Contracts

Pursuant to the provisions of Financial Rule 105.13 (b), Review Committees on contracts are established at Headquarters (HQ) and other locations to render written advice on proposed procurement actions. In accordance with Financial Rule 105.13 (c), where the advice of a Review Committee is required, no final action leading to the award or amendment of a procurement contract may be taken before such advice is received. The terms of reference and the rules for the composition, work, and authority of review committees on contracts are set forth in the applicable administrative issuance.

The primary responsibility of the Review Committees is to ensure that proposed procurement actions are based, inter alia, on compliance with the Financial Rules and Regulations, relevant Secretary-General's Bulletins and Administrative Instructions taking into consideration the guidance provided by the Procurement Manual. The Review Committees are not responsible for reviewing or providing advice on the adequacy or necessity of the requirement being met under the proposed procurement action, but may ask questions and make observations, on the adequacy or necessity of the requirements of the proposed procurement action.

9.2 Thresholds for the Headquarters Committee on Contracts (HCC)

In any of the following cases, irrespective of whether the procurement action originated at HQ or in another UN Secretariat entity, in accordance with the Financial Regulations and Rules, the recommendation of the HCC, and the approval of the relevant Authorized Official shall be obtained prior to any contractual commitment being made:

- a. Any award to a single contractor in respect of a single requisition or a series of related requisitions that exceeds US$ 1,000,000 based on the contract value or gross revenue to the contractor during the term of the contract including any optional extension periods;
- b. Any contract or series of related contracts that involve income to the Organization, including contracts for the disposal of UN property through sale, that during the term of the contract including any optional extension periods exceed US$ 1,000,000 based on the income to the Organization;
- c. Any LOAs with the Member States where the value exceeds US$ 1,000,000 during the term of the agreement<sup>5</sup>;
- d. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract previously reviewed by the HCC where the modification increases the originally approved contract value or gross revenue to the contractor by more than 20% or US$ 500,000, whichever amount is lower;
- e. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract previously reviewed by the HCC that involve income to the Organization, including contracts for the disposal of UN property through sale, where the modification decreases the originally approved income to the Organization by more than 20% or US$ 500,000, whichever amount is lower;
- f. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract, including contracts that involve income to the Organization and the disposal of UN property through sale, previously reviewed by the HCC where the modification increases the originally approved contract duration by more than eight months;
- g. In the case that both the contract value (including approved revenue to the contractor and income to the Organization) and the duration of the contract are modified, either simultaneously or sequentially, review by the HCC is not required when the (cumulative)

- increase (or decreased in the case of income to the Organization) in value does not change the originally approved value by more than 20% or US$ 500,000, whichever amount is lower, and the (aggregated) extension period does not exceed the originally approved contract duration by more than eight months. If either of these thresholds is exceeded, the review of the HCC is required;
- h. Once the originally approved contract value of a contract previously reviewed by the HCC (including approved revenue to the contractor and income to the Organization) has been amended by more than 20% or US$ 500,000, whichever amount is lower, and/or the originally approved contract duration has been extended by more than 8 months, no further amendments can be made without review by the HCC;
  - i. Any outcome of the negotiations resulting from the HCC recommendation to reject all bids and negotiate in accordance with the Financial Rule 105.15 (c), where the proposed contract award exceeds US$ 1,000,000;
  - j. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract, including contracts that involve income to the Organization and disposal of UN property through sale, not previously reviewed by the HCC where the aggregate contract value (including approved revenue to the contractor and income to the Organization) now exceeds US$ 1,000,000;
  - k. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract, including contracts that involve income to the Organization and disposal of the UN property through sale, previously reviewed by the HCC where, in the judgment of the Director, PD or CPO, such amendment would have significantly affected the procurement process that led to the original contract award, the criteria on which the original award was made, or the original contractual terms. The committee shall review such proposed modification with reference to the criteria on which the original award was approved;
  - l. Any other matter referred by an authorized official relating to a contract award or modification;
  - m. Any contract or amendments thereof established under Financial Rule 105.17(a) shall not be subject to the review by the HCC except in cases of common procurement actions carried out together by the United Nations and other organizations where the United Nations acts as a lead agency.

9.3 Thresholds for Local Committees on Contracts

In any of the following cases, in accordance with the Financial Regulations and Rules, the recommendation of the LCC and the approval of the relevant Authorized Official shall be obtained prior to any contractual commitment being made:

- a. Any award to a single contractor in respect of a single requisition or a series of related requisitions that exceeds the delegation of authority of the CPO based on the contract value or gross revenue to the contractor during the term of the contract including any optional extension periods but does not exceed US$ 1,000,000;
- b. Any contract or series of related contracts that involve income to the Organization, including contracts for the disposal of UN property through sale, that exceeds the delegation of authority of the CPO during the term of the contract including any optional extension periods based on the income to the Organization but does not exceed US$ 1,000,000;
For cases requiring review by the HCC, Authorized Officials at their sole discretion may request prior review by an LCC;
- c. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract previously reviewed by the LCC where the modification increases the originally approved contract value or gross revenue to the contractor by more than 20% or the delegation of authority of the CPO, whichever amount is lower;

- d. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract previously reviewed by the LCC that involves income to the Organization, including contracts for the disposal of UN property through sale, where the modification decreases the originally approved income to the Organization by more than 20% or the delegation of authority of the CPO, whichever amount is lower;
- e. Any amendment, modification or renewal of a contract, including contracts that involve income to the Organization and the disposal of UN property through sale, previously reviewed by the LCC where the modification increases the originally approved contract duration by more than eight months;
- f. In the case that both the contract value (including approved revenue to the contractor and income to the Organization) and the duration of the contract are modified, either simultaneously or sequentially, review by the LCC is not required when the (cumulative) increase (or the decrease in case of income to the Organization) in value does not change the originally approved value by more than 20% or the delegation of authority of the CPO, whichever amount is lower, and the (aggregated) extension period does not exceed the originally approved contract duration by more than eight months. If either of these thresholds is exceeded, the review of LCC is required;
- g. Once the originally approved contract value of a contract previously reviewed by the LCC (including approved revenue to the contractor and income to the Organization) has been amended by more than 20% or the delegation of authority of the CPO, whichever amount is lower, and/or the originally approved contract duration has been extended by more than 8 months, no further amendments can be made without the review by the LCC ;
- h. Any outcome of the negotiations resulting from the LCC recommendation to reject all bids and negotiate in accordance with the Financial Rule 105.15 (c), where the proposed contract award exceeds the delegation of authority of the CPO;
- i. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract, including contracts that involve income to the Organization and disposal of the UN property through sale, not previously reviewed by the LCC where the aggregate contract value (including approved revenue to the contractor and income to the Organization) now exceeds the delegation of authority of the CPO;
- j. Any amendment, modification, or renewal of a contract, including contracts that involve income to the Organization and disposal of the UN property through sale, previously reviewed by the LCC where, in the judgment of the CPO, such amendment would have significantly affected the procurement process that led to the original contract award, the criteria on which the original award was made, or the original contractual terms. The committee shall review such proposed modification with reference to the criteria on which the original award was approved;
- k. Any other matter referred by an Authorized Official relating to a contract award or modification;
- l. Any contract or amendments thereof established under Financial Rule 105.17(a) shall not be subject to the review by the LCC except in cases of common procurement actions carried out together by the United Nations and other organizations where the United Nations acts as a lead agency.

9.4 Submission to Review Committees on Contracts

For all procurement actions that require review by a Review Committee, the Director, PD, or the Chiefs of Service in PD, or the CPOs, or their duly designated representative, in consultation with the relevant Requisitioners, shall submit cases through an electronic submission system to the respective Review Committee by the established deadline. Such deadline shall be established by each Review Committee and communicated to the Director PD, or the CPOs as appropriate.

The Chairperson of a Review Committee may, at his/her sole discretion and in accordance with guidelines established by the Review Committee, accept the late submission of presentations (i.e., after the established time for submission of cases for regularly scheduled meetings) for procurement actions arising out of an emergency, exigent situations, or unforeseen operational urgency. Such Submissions are usually referred to as “Walk-In” cases. The terms of reference and responsibilities set forth in this chapter regarding normally submitted cases apply equally to “Walk-In” submissions. Justification shall be provided in writing to the Chairperson of the Review Committee from the relevant requisitioner in consultation with the Director PD or the CPO. A complete submission in accordance with standard requirements shall be presented to the Review Committee for any “Walk-In” cases.

Procurement Officials shall ensure that submissions to a Review Committee are comprehensive, factually accurate, and clear to facilitate the review of the procurement action. Procurement Officials shall also ensure that the recommended vendor is registered at the required level before submission of the case to a Review Committee. Submissions shall be in sufficient detail to enable the Review Committee to obtain an accurate and complete description of the procurement actions taken and the basis for the proposed award.

The Director, PD, or the CPOs and the requisitioning office shall ensure that relevant procurement and requisitioning staff are present at the Review Committee’s meetings to answer questions and provide clarifications when required.

In case of urgent procurement actions, the requisitioning office may request the Chairperson of the Review Committee that the minutes of the Review Committee recommendations be issued on an expedited basis. This request may be accepted or rejected at the sole discretion of the Chairperson of the Review Committee.

In cases of split awards, the entire procurement process and all awards, including those that individually do not exceed the threshold that requires submission to a Review Committee (LCC or HCC), shall be referred only to one Review Committee (either LCC or HCC) based on the recommended award with the highest NTE amount. Following the recommendation rendered by the Review Committee, the Authorized Official approves all award(s) deriving from the same procurement process, including those that fall below the threshold for Review Committees.

Field Missions, OAHs, Regional Commissions or Tribunals, or other UN Secretariat entities may be given LPA to undertake the procurement of Strategic Goods and Services. Procurement actions for Strategic Goods and Services with a value in excess of US$ 1,000,000 shall be reviewed by the HCC and the Authorized Official shall send the case to the Director, PD for PD’s review before the case is forwarded to the HCC’s attention. The Director, PD or his/her duly designated representative, may request the CPO to provide clarifications and will submit the presentation to the HCC with PD’s comments. The CPO, the Requisitioner or their duly designated representative in the field, and the Procurement Official from Headquarters shall jointly present such cases to the HCC.

After the HCC’s review of such cases, the recommendations of the HCC will be submitted for the consideration of the Head of Entity of the requisitioning office.

9.5 Facilitation of the Review by the HCC/LCC

Procurement Officials are responsible for the following:

- a. Ensuring, in cooperation with the requisitioner, accurate, timely, and comprehensive presentations to the Review Committee, including a written justification for the proposed award(s) and a brief description of the purpose of the goods or services to be acquired. Presentations to Review Committees shall include, at a minimum, the documents set forth in Annex 13 (PD SOP No. 001 Quality Assurance Programme for HCC Presentations

- implemented at UN/PD) as appropriate. The Review Committees may also request additional documents, as they may deem appropriate;
- b. Providing to the Review Committees, upon request and in a timely manner, clarifications and/or additional information in connection with a case presentation in consultation with the Requisitioner as appropriate;
  - c. Ensuring that the procurement action is undertaken in accordance with the Financial Rules and Regulations, established procurement practices and procedures, applicable SGBs, and AIs.

9.6 Ex Post Facto Presentations to Review Committees

A submission to the Review Committee may be ex post facto in the following two cases, namely, (a) fully “ex post facto” cases and (b) partially “ex post facto” cases, defined as follows:

- a. Fully Ex Post Facto Case: A procurement action, whether a written contractual instrument exists or not, in which the UN entered into a commitment for the provision of goods and/or services in full prior to submission of the procurement action to the relevant Review Committee(s) for its recommendation to the Authorized Official;
- b. Partially Ex Post Facto Case: A procurement action, whether a written contractual instrument exists or not, in which the UN entered into a commitment for the provision of goods or services in part prior to submission of the procurement action to the relevant Review Committee(s) for its recommendation to the Authorized Official.

Although ex post facto cases are not specifically addressed in the Financial Rules and Regulations, they may be accepted by the Organization under exceptional circumstances, provided all other UN procurement practices and procedures have been followed. However, ex post facto cases should be rare exceptions, and when they occur, written justification shall be provided in the case presentation to explain the reasons why timely submission of the case was not possible. Such justification should identify the reasons for the ex post facto situation and propose how to address the root cause in order to avoid reoccurrence.

Procedures for Ex Post Facto Cases Submitted to the HCC:

- a. Ex post facto presentations submitted to the Review Committee shall be submitted in accordance with the procedures set forth in Chapter 9.4;
- b. If PD determines that the presentation for Strategic Goods and Services is ex post facto and not presented as such by a UN Secretariat entity, PD may reject the case or accept the case and inform the HCC of such. The HCC may reject the presentation as non-compliant or note and forward the submission to the Authorized Official for a decision on how to proceed. The breakdown of the recommended amount shall detail the ex post facto portion;
- c. The Review Committee may take note of ex post facto cases submitted to it, or not take note and request clarification, and issue observations on the propriety of the action taken.

10. Awards

10.1 Award and Finalization

Contracts are awarded by the relevant Procurement Approving Authority and, when applicable, following the approval of the appropriate Authorized Official given subsequent to recommendations by a Review Committee as may be required. Refer to Chapter 2.6.1 Delegation of Authority and Chapter 9 Review by Committees on Contracts. Approvals for awards cannot be made by the Procurement Approving Authority or by the Authorized Official to vendors that are not registered at the appropriate Level with the UN Secretariat and/or are otherwise sanctioned, with the exception of joint ventures whose incorporation is reliant on the award, all in accordance with Chapter 3.

An award may be made following the approval by the appropriate Authorized Official, further to Review Committee recommendation, as applicable. The UN can enter into a contractual obligation with a vendor only after official award of a contract by the relevant Authorized Official (in case of Review Committee recommendation) or Procurement Approving Authority and fulfillment of any conditions to that award, such as a successful prototype inspection, request for parent guarantee, etc.

Contracts shall be awarded within the offer validity period. If it is not possible to award the contract within the original period of offer validity, an extension of the offer validity period must be requested from all bidders. A bidder may refuse the request without forfeiting its bid/proposal security. Bidders agreeing to the request will not be permitted to modify their bids/proposals but will be required to extend the validity of their bid/proposal securities (if applicable) for the period of the extension. As such, extensions should be requested as early as possible to allow bidders sufficient time to produce a new valid bid/proposal security before the expiration of the original.

The relevant Procurement Official must keep a note to the file or a Statement of Award on file for future reference, including the signed award decision or the justification not to award, as applicable. For cases reviewed by a Review Committee, minutes of the relevant Review Committee meeting and signed recommendations by the Authorized Official must be kept in accordance with established records retention policy (see Chapter 13.9 Maintenance of Files).

Although ex post facto cases are not specifically addressed in the Financial Rules and Regulations, they may be accepted by the Organization under exceptional circumstances, provided all other UN procurement practices and procedures have been followed. However, ex post facto cases should be rare exceptions, and when they occur, written justification shall be provided in the case presentation to explain the reasons why timely submission of the case was not possible. Such justification should identify the reasons for the ex post facto situation and propose how to address the root cause in order to avoid reoccurrence.

10.1.1 Prototype Inspections

In the case where the complexity or type of goods so requires, a prototype or a first unit inspection prior to the signature of the contract may be conducted.

The purpose of this risk-mitigating measure is to ensure that the representations made by the bidder in its written technical proposal correspond to their actual product, quality assurance plan, or manufacturing environment, among other considerations. In such cases, therefore, prototype inspections should not be conducted as part of the Technical Evaluation but following a final review of the relevant Review Committee and approval by the Authorized Official. Prototype inspections should take place prior to contract signature to limit the legal exposure to the UN.

If a prototype inspection is relevant for a certain requirement, the Source Selection Plan and the solicitation documents shall indicate so. Bidders should be requested to assume all costs related to the construction of the prototype for inspection, while the UN will incur the related costs of the appointed inspectors.

Inspections of prototypes/first units shall be conducted by the Requisitioner or a third party hired by the UN in the presence of a Procurement Official, as needed. Such inspections shall be documented in detail with all information and pictures, including subcomponents, etc. so that the same can be used by Receipt and Inspection Units to ensure the compliance of the goods throughout the life of the contract.

If during the inspection it is found that minor deviations between the written technical proposal and the actual product exist, but at the UN's sole discretion such deviations can be easily and quickly rectified, the bidder may be given the opportunity to do so in a timely manner prior to contract signature.

If on the other hand, the deviations are numerous or critical in nature, the UN may, at its sole discretion, disqualify the bidder from further consideration and reconsider its recommendation of award. In such a case, a new recommendation for the award should be submitted to the relevant Review Committee or Procurement Approving Authority. When the bidder fails to pass the inspection, the UN reserves the right to claim damages from the bidder for any costs incurred (e.g. third-party inspector, travel costs, etc.) and to refer the bidder to the VRC for consideration of suspension as a UN vendor.

10.2 Vendor Notification, Debriefing and Protest

10.2.1 Posting of Awarded Contracts

The UN posts on its website (<https://www.un.org/Depts/ptd/>, under the "Awards" link) information about all awarded contracts and purchase orders resulting from formal methods of solicitation for UN Secretariat entities. The notice of awarded contracts should contain a brief description of the contract, a reference to the solicitation number, the contract or NTE amount, the date of the contract/award, and the name and country of the vendor.

Procurement Officials shall issue written notification to the unsuccessful bidders, informing them of their unsuccessful submission ("Letter of Regret").

RESOURCES

Annex 15— Sample Letter of Regret

10.2.2 Debrief Procedures

The UN Secretariat offers UN vendors who participated in solicitations resulting in awards above US$ 200,000 an opportunity to obtain additional information on their unsuccessful proposals or bids through the debrief process described below.

The debrief is not an adversarial proceeding; rather, it is a collaborative learning opportunity for unsuccessful bidders and for the UN to exchange additional information on the reasons why the bid/proposal was not successful.

The purpose of the debrief is to discuss the unsuccessful bidder's submission in response to the solicitation documents and the applied evaluation process and procedure. It is not a forum to discuss the submissions of other bidders. In addition, it is not a forum for other issues or complaints, which the bidder may raise according to the provisions in Chapter 8.8.

The scope of the debrief is to identify the strengths, deficiencies, or weaknesses of the bidder's bid/proposal. Debriefings do not discuss the following:

- a. Trade secrets or other proprietary information, including the methodology or approach of other bidders;
- b. Financial or cost information about other bidders;
- c. Other bidders' details.

An unsuccessful bidder may request a debrief in writing within a period of ten (10) business days after receipt of the Letter of Regret only. Upon timely receipt of such request, the UN will notify the bidder of the scope of the debrief as well as the date, time, and place for the debrief.

A debrief is a one-time event. Bidders will receive only one debrief per eligible solicitation. This will normally last for a maximum of up to one (1) hour, and no follow-up debriefs will take place.

The debrief meeting is generally conducted in person but can also be held via teleconference or videoconference. The debrief will be conducted in English, but translators and other special arrangements will be considered, if requested by the bidder and deemed necessary by the UN, as long as the bidder pays for any associated costs and arrangements.

In the case a solicitation has been issued by PD, the written request should be addressed to:

United Nations Procurement Division
To the attention of: Director, Procurement Division
United Nations Headquarters, New York, NY-10017, USA

Or by email: dos-pd@un.org.

For other procurement offices, the letter of request for a debrief shall be addressed to the CPO of the respective entity.

The Procurement Official will invite and inform the unsuccessful bidder of the administrative details for the debrief. Should an invitation from the Procurement Official arrive later than ten (10) days after receipt of the request for debrief, the UN will ensure that a debrief is scheduled as a matter of priority. A delay does not entitle the bidder to submit a procurement challenge without a prior debrief meeting.

Bidders who have been formally debriefed and remain unsatisfied may file a procurement challenge within ten (10) business days of the debrief meeting. If the challenge is received later than ten (10) business days after the meeting, it is not receivable.

Procurement challenges are defined in this context as any complaint made post-award and post-official debrief by a bidder with respect to the technical and/or financial evaluation of their offer by the UN. A procurement challenge must not contain allegations against the successful vendor. A procurement challenge is not the right instrument to allege ethical violations. Such allegations should be directly reported to the Head of an Entity, the Director, PD, or OIOS and will be pursued outside of the scope of the Award Review Board.

10.2.3 Award Review Board

The Award Review Board (ARB) will review procurement challenges by unsuccessful bidders. The ARB is a UN administrative board that renders independent advice to the Under-Secretary-General for Management Strategy, Policy and Compliance (DMSPC).

The Registrar of the ARB will make an initial assessment of the procurement challenge and determine its receivability and eligibility for a review by the ARB. The Registrar's determination is final and not subject to appeal by any party.

Following a review of the case and upon receipt of the recommendation by the ARB, the USG, DMSPC takes a final decision, which is final and not subject to appeal by any party. Further details on the scope, composition of the ARB, its Secretariat, and any further rights and remedies are outlined in the TORs for the ARB (Annex 16).

It should be noted that the only financial compensation that may be granted to an unsuccessful bidder whose procurement challenge is deemed justified is the reimbursement of reasonable costs of the procedure (excluding legal costs, which shall not be compensated) up to a maximum of US $50,000.

Should a procurement challenge be sustained, the awarded contract will not be suspended but may be limited in duration in case it is a multi-year contract. Further potential remedies are outlined in the TOR of the ARB. All bidders must be informed of the possibility to submit a procurement challenge in the solicitation documents.

11. Contract Finalization and Issuance Contractual Instruments

11.1 Contract Finalization and Issuance

A contract is a written, legally binding agreement between the UN and a contractor, which establishes the terms and conditions, including the rights and obligations of the Organization and the contractor.

11.1.1 Contract Preparation

After a solicitation process in which the UN has defined the requirements, a vendor may be selected based on an offer, and such vendor will be required to enter into a contract by the UN.

UN Standard Form of Contracts based on model templates approved by OLA should be attached in the solicitation as well as used for contract formation, which shall be completed using contract-specific data.

Modifications and/or additions to the UN Form of Contracts, including annexes, should be made after consultation with OLA or a Legal Advisor for legal terms and the Procurement Official for financial terms. Care must be taken not to include any requirements or conditions that contradict the UNGCC or the standard text of any of the documents.

Further to Financial Rule 105.18, written procurement contracts shall be used to formalize any award following a procurement activity.

11.1.2 Letter of Intent

A Letter of Intent (LOI) is a written statement of the intention to enter into a formal agreement and may be exceptionally used to allow vendors to mobilize for contract implementation before signature of the final contract can be affixed.

The LOI is a contractual instrument that entails substantial risk and must, therefore, be used only after a careful risk assessment and only by Procurement Officials with substantial and relevant contracting experience, in cooperation with Requisitioners with significant technical experience. Responsibility for risk assessment rests with the Procurement Approving Authority, which shall be held accountable. Advice on assessing the risk may be sought from the ASG, OSCM, OLA, or a Legal Advisor.

If an LOI is intended for use, the LOI must be cleared by OLA, limiting the UN's responsibility and allowing the UN to withdraw from the LOI with minimum legal and financial consequences.

An LOI shall only be issued after an award has been approved, and only when all financial terms have been completely agreed upon with the vendor and all contract costs are known to the UN. Thus, an LOI can only be used to initiate work while allowing additional time to finalize contract details, such as detailed timeline, details of personnel, negotiation of non-financial contract clauses, etc.

11.1.3 Contract Finalization Discussions with Vendors

The purpose is to clarify any remaining issues that are not defined by the requirements in the solicitation documents or by the vendor's offer, but which are essential for proper implementation of the contract(s). Contract discussions should result in a clear understanding of terms and conditions agreed upon by the parties and their respective responsibilities under the contract.

Certain key areas, such as detailed delivery plan, milestones, and in certain cases, special terms and conditions, may form part of the contract discussions. However, this should not be confused with negotiations, as these should be conducted prior to award, according to Chapter 8.9.

There are no strict rules as to how to discuss pending details to be included in contracts. It is important to note that the UN should inform the vendor it discusses or negotiates with that the UN only accepts offers in writing. Else, by law, the results of verbal contract negotiations could form a contract and the vendor could begin performance.

No negotiations of significant contract terms and conditions should take place following contract award, as the modification of certain material provisions (e.g. limitation of liability, insurance, and liquidates damages) may disadvantage other bidders and expose the UN to bid protests.

11.1.4 Advance or Progress Payments

No advance payments should be made, except when the conditions outlined in Financial Rule 105.19 apply. The Procurement Official shall record the reasons for advance or progress payments in the procurement case file.

Under certain conditions, the UN may agree to pay for partial delivery of the goods or upon completion of clearly defined milestones for services or works, provided adequate security for the advance or progress payment is established. In such cases, the Procurement Official should consider establishing specially developed payment terms taking payment flows into consideration, provided such terms are approved by the Director, PD or the CPO and are tailored to the specific procurement.

Lease payments paid in the same month to which they relate are not considered advance payments, regardless of whether they are paid on the first or last day of the month. However, lease payments paid prior to the month to which they relate are considered advance payments.

11.2 Performance Securities

Performance securities can be requested by the UN from the selected vendor in order to mitigate the risk of vendor non-performance and breach of contractual obligations (such as the delivery of all equipment, services rendered, and works completed, as per the contract). Securities and guarantees are normally issued in the form of an unconditional and irrevocable on-demand bank guarantee. However, bonds, demand drafts, cashier's cheques, or irrevocable cheques certified by a bank can be accepted in lieu of guarantees if approved by OLA. This should be specified in the tender documents, along with UN templates for the same, if applicable.

If performance security is required, the vendor shall provide security for performance of the contract within a specified period of time of contract signature, in an amount that usually corresponds with a percentage of the total contract value (normally 5-10%). The proceeds of the security (an established amount) shall become payable to the UN in the event of the vendor's failure to perform.

Upon receipt of performance security, the Procurement Official will provide the security to the TOC together with the form attached as Annex 20 (Request for Safekeeping of Performance Bond). Subsequently, the TOC official shall submit the security to the Treasury to be kept in custody.

The UN shall return the performance security to the vendor after certification by Requisitioner or Final User of completion of the vendor's performance obligations under the contract, including any warranty obligations, if applicable.

A bank guarantee received on bank letter headed paper should follow the OLA-approved form and include the following:

- a. A definition of the parties involved: Principal, Issuing Bank, and Beneficiary;
- b. A reference to the underlying transaction/contract;
- c. The guarantee amount: the maximum amount payable and the currency in which it is payable;
- d. The period of validity;
- e. Documentation: Any demand for payment under the guarantee should be in writing and in addition to other documents that may be specified in the guarantee;
- f. Effective Clause: A guarantee enters into effect on the date of issuance unless the terms of the guarantee expressly provide that such entry into effect is to be at a later date or is subject to conditions specified in the guarantee and determinable by the Guarantor. In Advance Payment Guarantees, there should be a condition that allows for the guarantee to come into effect when the Principal/Applicant has received the advance payment;

- g. Reference to Applicable Rules: ICC Uniform Rules for Demand Guarantees \(URDG758\), ICC International Standard Practices \(ISP98\);
- h. Conditions for a Bank Guarantee Exercise, in particular: disbursement upon initial request (initially) without any objections; being irrevocable; being unconditional; being non-transferable;
- i. A form of exercise of the beneficiary to the guarantee (bank), namely a written request (beneficiary's affirmation), sent as a registered letter;
- j. Information that a partial and multiple fulfilments is allowed, up to the maximum amount of the sum guaranteed;
- k. There are no unauthorized provisions;
- l. The guarantee is signed by authorized signatories.

Annex 20 - Request for Safekeeping of Performance Bond

11.3 Signature, Issuance and Documentation

All contracts must be signed by a Procurement Approving Authority on behalf of the UN and by a duly authorized individual on behalf of the vendor. A contract will come into force once both contracting parties have signed it in writing.

The contract should be issued to the vendor, and the vendor should be instructed to return a signed scanned copy to the UN. The relevant official with the appropriate level of delegation of procurement authority shall countersign the copies, and the UN will send one copy to the vendor. The signed contract must be kept on record for future reference.

All pages of all the documents forming part of a contract or agreement to which the UN is a party, including all attachments, need to be initialed by duly authorized representatives of the parties, except for the page that contains the full signature block, which shall be signed by such representatives.

In all cases, care must be taken to ensure that the signatories to the contract are legal persons for the purposes of contractual relations and have the ability to represent and capacity to bind the respective contracting parties to the obligations thereunder.

Once a contract has been signed, it may be amended only if the contract provisions allow modifications and if additional related goods and/or services are to be provided/rendered by the same vendor in furtherance of the execution of the original contract. Each contract amendment must be in writing and must comply with applicable contractual terms and conditions and the UN's procurement procedures. All other situations call for a new solicitation process and establishment of a new contract.

11.4 Standard Contract Elements

A contract for goods or services between the UN and a vendor must, at a minimum, include:

- a. An instrument of agreement;

- b. UNGCC for goods, services, or goods and services as appropriate;
- c. Technical specifications, TOR, SOW, pricing (fees and rates, as applicable) and payment terms, template for performance securities, delivery requirements, etc. as well as any special conditions that may be required.

11.4.1 Instrument of Agreement

The instrument of agreement must contain the following elements:

- a. Identification of the parties contracted, as well as the person authorized to act on behalf of the contracted party, including name, address, and contact details. In the event that the contract is the result of a joint offer, the UN will usually contract with one entity, which should always be the lead entity;
- b. Scope of the goods/ services being procured, and the quantity being provided, as well as entry into force and time limits of the contract;
- c. A reference to the contract documents (i.e., Special Conditions, UNGCC, etc.);
- d. Price and payment terms. Contracts should be denominated in the currency indicated in the bidder's offer, provided it was allowed for in the solicitation document. It is important to establish tangible indicators for payments, linked to milestones in the delivery of services or completion of works. For service contracts involving works, it is common to have interim progress payments based on a regular measure of the works completed. Final payment must always be based upon acceptance of documentation for completion of services or works or delivery of goods;
- e. A 'lump sum' contract is used whenever it is possible to determine with sufficient precision the quantity and scope of the goods/services required from the contractor;
- f. The 'unit price' contract should be used only when the nature of the services/ goods makes it impossible to determine, with sufficient precision, the quantity of the services/ goods required from the contractor. In this case, the contract sets a maximum amount for both the total amount and the provision of each component of the services (e.g. rate per workday, cost of each round-trip, etc.), and establishes the applicable unit price. The maximum amount cannot be exceeded.

Contracts valid over a longer period (over 12 months) may contain price adjustments linked to officially published price indices to cover changes in work rates. The increase may also be estimated and incorporated as a fixed rate over the entire life of the contract. Contracts for commodities whose price may fluctuate over time (e.g. petroleum products, metal products, etc.) may be based on commodities/mercantile exchange prices (e.g. Platts index or LME), provided this is clearly specified in the solicitation document. For such contracts, it is good practice to specify in the contract that the final price shall not exceed a specified maximum amount and that the contractor should adjust the quantity accordingly so that the contract amount is not exceeded. However, where possible, it is strongly recommended to avoid using price escalation; this is the default setting for all UN contracts for works, specifically.

Duration of the Contract: Starting and completion dates, as well as milestones for successful performance, must be precisely defined. Contracts for goods and services also should specify the name of key personnel and their input in terms of estimated man-days/weeks/months.

As for any litigious matters arising out of contract execution, the parties shall first attempt to resolve their dispute amicably through negotiations. If the dispute cannot be resolved amicably, the matter shall be resolved in accordance with the current UNCITRAL arbitration rules. No choice of law-clause shall be included in the contract documents unless special authorization is provided by OLA. Instead, the arbitration provision shall state that in deciding the dispute, the arbitral tribunal shall be guided by general principles of international commercial law.

As a mandatory condition of doing business with the UN, it is necessary that vendors, as well as their subsidiaries, agents, intermediaries, and principals, cooperate with the OIOS, as well as with other investigative bodies authorized by the UN as and when required. Such cooperation shall include, but not be limited to, the following: access to all employees, representatives, agents, and assignees of the vendor, as well as the production of all documents requested, including financial records. Failure to fully cooperate with investigations will be considered sufficient grounds to allow the UN to repudiate and terminate the contract and to debar and remove the vendor from the UN's list of registered vendors.

11.4.2 General Conditions of Contract (UNGCC)

The UN has developed UNGCC for goods, services, goods and services, and works (depending on the nature of the procurement), establishing a legal framework that forms part of every contract. The UNGCC may not be changed. If modifications or additions are required, those shall be made in the form of particular conditions in consultation with OLA.

The UNGCC contain specific provisions on mines, child labour, sexual exploitation, and the fundamental rights of workers. Vendors signing UN contracts automatically agree to abide by these conditions. Procurement Officials should bring these clauses to the attention of the vendor at the time of signing the contract.

The UNGCC apply to all UN contracts and form part of the contractual agreement between the UN and the vendor.

The UN generally does not agree to the use of the general terms and conditions of the other party. If requested to do so, please refer to Chapter 6.4.9.

11.4.3 Technical Specifications, TOR, SOW

Technical specifications, TORs, SOWs, and other specifications should always be attached as an Annex to the contract or their contents included in the contractual document.

Care must be taken that the content of the annexes is consistent with the general and particular conditions of the contract.

11.5 Purchase Order (PO)

A PO is a type of contract that documents the purchase of goods and/or services. The standard PO originated from UMOJA should always be used.

A PO is accompanied by a copy of the relevant packing and shipping instructions, as well as the UNGCC for goods and/or services (or reference is made to the UNGCC on the UN website).

11.6 Long-Term Agreement (LTA)

An LTA is a written agreement between an organization of the United Nations system and a vendor that is established for a defined period of time for specific goods or services at prescribed prices or pricing provisions and with no legal obligation to order any minimum or maximum quantity. LTAs are used to safeguard a reliable source of supply for goods and services at a competitive price, in accordance with pre-defined terms and conditions. Goods and/or services available under LTAs serve a broad range of clients to meet commonly required, high-volume needs in the most time and cost-efficient manner (e.g., generators, uniforms, freight forwarding, etc.). Product and process economic considerations are advised to be applied when purchasing outside of such Long Terms Agreements, which is a decision that is at the sole discretion of each entity, to obtain the best value for the Organization. To arrive at a completely transparent cost comparison, factors to consider include the price of the good or service, installation, maintenance and freight costs, as well as internal administrative costs associated with the acquisition process, from development of requirements to contract management. Such costs will vary on a case by case basis, but concepts like the cost of inspecting prototypes, conducting a solicitation, staff time, etc. can be considered as appropriate by each Entity.

The below provisions apply to LTAs issued by the UN Secretariat (which may also be referred to as systems contracts). Please refer to Chapter 14 for guidance on utilization of LTAs issued by other UN system organizations.

Since procurement through LTAs is a very efficient way to carry out procurement, all Procurement Officials should keep abreast of existing LTAs and assess if an LTA could be used for requirements. An online catalogue of existing LTAs (including managed turnkey contracts) has been developed by the Office of Supply Chain Management.

In addition, Procurement Officials should always consider whether the procurement actions they are undertaking themselves could potentially be the basis of an LTA. When establishing an LTA further to formal methods of solicitation, the tender document must make it clear that an LTA will be established as well as cover the following points: type of LTA and geographical or other coverage, description of the goods and/or services, duration, price adjustment methods (if applicable), and the award methodology, especially when it is expected to award more than one vendor.

11.6.1 Benefits and Risks of Establishing LTAs

LTAs can achieve significant benefits, including:

Competitive prices: Aggregating the volume over the life of the LTA may lead to lower prices for some types of goods/services, based on the principle of economies of scale. LTAs can enable the UN to fully leverage its market position, taking advantage of its size, procurement volume, and geographical presence in order to obtain Best Value for Money. For instance, LTAs might include a provision that vendors must pass on any price reductions obtained through bulk purchase to the UN. The same may apply to pre-defined discount schemes in the contract once the UN has purchased a certain volume.

A simplified business process leading to reduced transaction cost: An LTA established by a single procurement process allows call-off orders at any time during the life of the LTA, thus avoiding the time and resources needed for repetitive procurement actions for the same set of goods or services.

Consistency in quality and reliability of the source of supply: By having established quality standards in the LTA, the time spent on inspection and possibility of rejection of goods/outputs are reduced.

Standardization of requirements: Promotes standardization of requirements across offices, which could contribute to a reduction in operation and maintenance costs and other efficiencies.

BENEFITS OF LTAS

LTAs offer benefits such as competitive prices through economies of scale and consolidation, simplified processes, consistency in quality and reliability of supply, and standardization of requirements, as well as reduced lead-time.

They are also useful in start-up and emergency scenarios.

LTAs that are well set-up from a quality delivery timeline and cost perspective will also offer value to other organizations in the UN System, thus fostering cooperation.

Reduced delivery lead-time: As many aspects are pre-agreed and specified in the LTA, the lead-time between the call-off and delivery is significantly shortened, and this is particularly relevant during emergencies. LTAs are particularly useful for goods that can be stocked, or services set up for immediate mobilization or deployment.

11.6.2 Types of LTAs

There are three (3) main types of LTAs:

(i) Single-Vendor LTA: One vendor is supplying the total requirements for a given type of goods/services.

(ii) Multiple-Vendor LTAs Without Secondary Bidding: Two or more vendors are supplying the same requirements. Among others, the reasons for having multiple LTAs in place can be related to securing supplies at times of high demand through several sources, geographical location of the vendor (landed costs, shorter transit time, etc.), ability to provide after-sales service and support of the goods, or provision of the services at the specified location, etc.

Wherever the UN has established multiple LTAs with different vendors for the same product or services, Procurement Officials shall make sure they select the LTA which best suits the specific requirement in the respective area of operations. Such a decision should be consistent with the four principles of procurement under Financial Regulation 5.12.

The reasons for selecting a specific LTA for the issuance of call-off orders shall be documented in the procurement file including value for money assessment.

(iii) Multiple-Vendor LTAs With Secondary Bidding: Two or more vendors are supplying similar or identical requirements, and the final placement of each call-off is determined through secondary bidding. If secondary bidding is considered, it shall only apply to those components of a requirement with prices that are not fixed in the LTA (e.g. freight) or that are subject to ceiling prices. Other aspects, such as vendor capacity, delivery time, and mobilization time at the time of the request, may also be subject to secondary bidding.

Note: Some LTAs might include a combination of types (ii) and (iii) above, i.e., particular items, locations, or conditions where orders can either be placed directly to one of the LTA holders or be subject to secondary bidding. Instructions for usage of these types of LTAs must be clearly laid out.

The above types of LTAs can be further classified based on their geographical coverage:

- a. Country-Specific LTA: established for use by a specific entity to procure goods or services required in a specific country only. The LTA is set up and managed by the respective entity in that country. An LTA that has been set up in one country for goods and services sourced from within that country should not be used in another country, as the market conditions may vary between the two countries and usage across countries may not reflect value for money;
- b. Regional LTA: for use by several entities in a specific region of the UN's operation, to procure goods or services required in a specific region. Such LTAs may be set up and managed either by PD, a Regional Centre or an entity within that region;
- c. Global LTA: for use by all UN entities. Such LTAs are normally created and managed centrally by PD.

For the use of other UN Entity's LTAs, please refer to Chapter 14.1 Cooperation with UN Organizations.

11.6.3 Establishment of a New LTA

The suitability of an LTA shall be considered during the category management strategy development and implemented at the procurement planning stage.

PD must be informed about upcoming LTAs that go beyond a local scope in advance (i.e., prior to initiating the procurement process) and, as necessary, will provide guidance on establishing the LTAs. As an LTA is created for a long duration and requires both upfront and long-term resources and expertise to set up and manage effectively, the decision to create an LTA should be based on a brief business case, which should outline the following elements:

- a. Description of goods/services required;
- b. Type of LTA and geographical coverage;
- c. Past spend data in the category and planned spend;
- d. Expected duration of the LTA(s);
- e. Price adjustment method, if any;
- f. Expected benefits and risks of the LTA;
- g. Results of market research: number of potential vendors, location, etc.;
- h. Procurement strategy: solicitation method, type of competition;
- i. Procurement process timelines.

11.6.4 Duration of LTAs

To ensure fairness and competitive terms and conditions, LTAs are typically valid for a period of three (3) years. LTAs may be extended for an additional period of up to 24 months, if provided for in the contract and subject to satisfactory vendor performance (to be documented in a vendor performance evaluation see Chapter 13), continuing requirement of the goods and services covered, and if the prices offered are within the current market range (e.g. the cost of IT equipment often falls over time and it might not be in the best interest of the organization to extend such an agreement). Foreseen durations beyond this maximum period of five (5) years (3+2) should be outlined in the business case and/or SSP, along with a justification of the need for such extended period, and be approved in advance by the Director, PD or the CPO.

11.6.5 Call-Off Orders Against an LTA

A call-off order refers to an order issued against an existing LTA. Call-off orders are not subject to review and recommendation by a Review Committee; however, such orders require approval by the relevant Procurement Approving Authority with the corresponding level of delegation. It is to be noted that the principles of cumulative/aggregate amounts do not apply to call-off orders.

In addition to ensuring that the Procurement Approving Authority has the required authority to approve the call-off order, she/he should also be satisfied that the instructions related to the applicability of the LTA have been followed. In particular:

- a. If the issuance of the call-off order is the result of a secondary bidding exercise, the Procurement Official must ensure that the ceiling prices specified in the LTA have not been exceeded;
- b. If the issuance of the call-off order is further to a multiple vendor LTA without secondary bidding, that value for money is achieved;
- c. The Procurement Official should be satisfied that any specific conditions of the LTA are met, such as the existence of maximum value for call-off orders, the maximum cumulative value per year, etc.;
- d. If the LTA, whether established by the UN or by another United Nations entity, is based on an exception to formal methods of solicitation, the Procurement Official should verify at the time of reviewing the call-off order that valid reasons exist for standardization, accelerated delivery, etc.

Call-off orders must state the details of the relevant LTA, such as the LTA reference number or other specifics that facilitate future reference.

11.7 Blanket Purchase Order

Upon request, the Procurement Office may arrange for certain departments and offices to order limited quantities of specified products and services through a BPO. The BPO is basically a simplified form of LTA. This instrument is usually reserved for repetitive orders up to a maximum total amount of US$ 100,000 per year when items of low-value are not held in stock by the UN, services are required on short notice, or prices conform to a set pattern in the trade (e.g. prices found in catalogs). BPOs should not be used for large volumes of items even when they are of low value. All efforts should be made to use (or replace BPOs with) local systems contracts (with discounts on catalogs, if necessary) or service contracts (including applicable mechanisms for pricing services, e.g. repairs) with pre-agreed price structures and terms.

The Procurement Official shall establish BPOs on an annual basis for specific items based on Requisitions received from the departments or offices concerned. The procedures described in Chapter 5 and Chapter 6 shall be followed in selecting vendors to participate.

To prevent exceeding the BPO threshold, the same vendor should not be awarded more than one BPO at the time.

BPOs for goods and/or services can be entered into with multiple vendors. The UN has less cost control over the Vendor when using a BPO in that the initial market survey only gives a relative indication of prices for a representative sample of goods or services in a category. Essentially, the vendor may charge as it sees fit at the time an actual order is placed. Therefore, BPOs should only be used to purchase items that are difficult to specifically identify and quantify. Examples include spare parts, electrical components, engineering workshops components such as nails, bolts, etc. BPOs shall include a specified term (duration), a maximum NTE contract amount, instructions about procedures/authorization for ordering against the BPO, specifications about delivery procedures and terms of payment, provisions for possible price escalations, and other appropriate terms and conditions. UMOJA product category contracts may be used if a UMOJA catalog cannot be created due to a large number of items required.

The Requisitioner must identify the types of goods or services that may be needed under the BPO. The requirements should include a sample "shopping list" indicating as wide a range of products or services as possible, maximum delivery lead time, and, if appropriate, relative maximum quantities of those items. The Procurement Office will use the sample "shopping list" to perform a market survey, the result of which will be used to select a Vendor. The Requisitioner is not locked into ordering the items on the sample "shopping list" but may place orders for any item that falls into the product/service category covered by BPO.

The Procurement Official shall evaluate each BPO at the end of the year to determine whether it should be renewed. The Section Chief/ Director, PD or the CPO may approve the issuance of a BPO to the same Vendor, if so requested by the departments or offices concerned, for up to three consecutive years without having a new Solicitation for the items or services covered by the BPO.

Requirements for technical review and LPA shall continue to apply.

In Writing: All BPOs shall be in writing (stating price, quantity, brand/model, delivery place/time, warranties, after-sale support, etc., as applicable), with receipts obtained. Receipt, inspection and payment shall follow the usual UN terms/UNGCC.

11.8 Call-Off Orders Against a BPO

After a BPO has been issued in UMOJA by the Procurement Official through a regular Shopping Cart issued by the Requisitioner, the departments or offices concerned may proceed to order from the selected vendor, in accordance with the terms of the BPO, by issuing LVA Purchase Orders. All such orders must include the BPO number, the Product ID for each item, and the terms and conditions of the BPO shall govern the purchase in all respects. The CO is required to check that the goods/services ordered meet the UN's requirement at fair and reasonable prices. In such cases, the CO (or the Procurement Official as applicable) is responsible to link all such LVA Purchase Orders to the correct UMOJA BPO contract and to verify that orders are in accordance with agreed prices and other contract terms. A call-off order against a BPO shall be used by a Procurement Official in case its overall value exceeds US $10,000.

In order to maintain proper administrative and financial controls, it is strongly recommended that authorization of LVAs be limited to the CO responsible for that cost centre. It is the responsibility of the Requisitioner to keep records of expenditures against, and the unspent balance of, a BPO.

Invoices against a BPO should reference both the BPO contract number and the Work Order/Task Order number. In most other respects, the ordering and administrative procedures, including receiving and inspection, property control, and inventory and invoice processing are the same for a BPO as they are for other forms of Contracts and Purchase Orders.

The total sum drawn upon a BPO shall be limited to a maximum of US $100,000 per year and shall not exceed the face value of the BPO. The BPO shall specify the term for which it is valid. In order to replace an expired BPO, a new BPO shall be issued.

12. Logistics

12.1 Aviation & Other Transport

Transport is the movement of passengers and/or goods from one location to another. To this end, the UN charters aircraft and vessels, contracts freight forwarders, vehicles, and other logistics providers, with the purpose of providing logistics solutions in support of the mandate(s) of UN Secretariat entities, particularly field missions. The mode of transport depends on a variety of factors, including the urgency of the requirement, geography, infrastructure, and cost considerations. The procurement of transport services shall be conducted in compliance with UN Financial Regulations and Rules, as well as relevant international regulations, such as ICAO, Incoterms, etc., and is often characterized by tight schedules requiring special procurement practices, as follows. Such services are listed in the Strategic Goods and Services Matrix under the category of Aviation & Transportation.

12.1.1 Air Transportation Services

Air transportation is a critical component of field support to UN peacekeeping and special political missions and provides logistical assistance to other entities of the UN System. Due to its highly specialized and strategic nature, as well as aviation safety considerations, air transportation services are procured centrally at UNHQ.

12.1.2 Air Operator Vendor Registration (AOVR)

Please refer to Chapter 3.1.4.3.1 of this PM.

12.1.3 Short-Term Air Charter

Short-term air charter requirements fall under the Strategic Movement element of the Movement Control operations of Peacekeeping Operations. The Movement Control Manual defines Strategic Movements as the worldwide movement of personnel and/or their equipment between their home country's national mounting base and/or their (sea and) airports of embarkation to or from the UN mission Area of Operations (AO). The procurement of short-term air charter services, inter alia, facilitates such movements.

For passenger short-term air charters, only Air Operator Vendor Registration vendors are eligible to participate in solicitation exercises.

A separate vendor list is maintained for cargo AOC holders. These carriers, plus brokers and freight forwarders, are invited to participate in solicitations for cargo air charter services.

A standing REOI for both air passenger and cargo requirements should be maintained publicly (e.g. on the PD website and UNGM).

12.1.4 Long-Term Air Charter

Field missions conduct day-to-day air operations using a wide range of fixed-wing and rotary-wing aircraft operated by civil air operators under commercial contracts. These commercially chartered planes and helicopters (complemented by military aircraft under Letters of Assist) make up an extensive long-term fleet of aircraft continuously supporting UN operations worldwide.

Typical air transportation services to be provided include logistical re-supply, passenger flights, VIP liaison, aeromedical/casualty evacuation (MEDEVAC/CASEVAC), troop deployment/rotations, and transportation of cargo and equipment. Air operators providing air transport services to the UN are required to continuously adhere to the UN Aviation Standards for Peacekeeping and Humanitarian Air Transport Operations (UN AVSTADS), which are published on the PD website.

UN air charter contracts are based on standard Forms of Contracts developed for such requirements by OLA. Contractors are typically required to provide aircraft, crew, maintenance, and insurance. For air transport services provided within the operations area of a UN field mission, the UN normally provides aviation fuel (Jet A-1) and ground support services. When performing flights for the UN outside of a mission area, air operators are required to be self-sufficient.

UN contracting modalities for air transportation services include full-time/dedicated long-term air charter contracts, as well as on-call/standby air charter contracts.

12.1.5 Military Aviation

In achieving their mandates, UN peacekeeping missions may require military aviation support, provided by Troop Contributing Countries (TCCs) under LOAs. Military aviation units include light-armed helicopters, light, medium, or heavy utility helicopters, as well as attack helicopters and tactical transport fixed-wing aircraft.

LOA terms and conditions shall be based on a reasonable and justifiable reimbursement for the use of the military aircraft, to be agreed upon between the UN and the TCC, which are intended to cover the direct operating costs (i.e., excluding capital investment or expenses that would be incurred regardless of the contribution to UN peacekeeping). PD shall always be involved in negotiating the financial terms and conditions of LOAs.

Aviation LOA reimbursement is normally on a per-flight-hour basis with no minimum guaranteed hours. As an exception, attack helicopters are reimbursed on a monthly rental basis, due to the unique role of such aircraft whose availability alone serves as deterrence and show of force and, as such, benefits UN peacekeeping operations with specialized military mandates. Aviation LOAs may include ancillary reimbursement items to cover other costs incurred by the TCC that are not covered by the related Memorandum of Understanding (MOU).

12.2 Freight Forwarding & Third-Party Logistics (3PL)

The UN Secretariat procures a wide range of freight forwarding services in support of UN operations worldwide. These services include, inter alia, multimodal freight of United Nations Owned Equipment (UNOE) and Contingent Owned Equipment (COE). Generally, shipments are conducted via multimodal sea/surface freight, airfreight, or air cargo charters.

Multimodal Sea/Surface freight forwarding services are further defined as the movement of UNOE or COE from Origin (Door or Port) to Destination (Door or Port) via sea/surface freight. This may include full vessel charter, part cargo, liner service, etc., as well as inland transportation, inland ground waterway transportation, etc., as needed.

Air Cargo Charters are further defined as the movement of UNOE or COE from Origin to Destination via full aircraft charter.

Airfreight is defined as follows as the booking of UNOE freight on commercial or freighter aircraft.

PD maintains a roster of pre-approved freight forwarders who are invited to bid on all freight solicitations for shipment of both UNOE and COE processed by PD. A standing REOI form for entry into the PD "Freight Forwarding Vendor Roster" (FFVR) is posted on both the UNPD website and the UNGM. Interested companies must first register as vendors with UNGM (www.ungm.org) and then complete the REOI. The FFVR is updated on a quarterly basis, and UNPD reserves the right to remove any company from the FFVR that is deemed inactive.

12.3 Strategic Movements – Contingent Owned Equipment (COE)

COE refers to the actual equipment provided by the troop-contributing countries to carry out their day-to-day peacekeeping operations. It includes vehicles (trucks, trailers, armored vehicles, etc.), dangerous cargo of various classes, generators, road-making equipment, drilling equipment, etc. The nature and configuration of the COE dictate the type of vessel required. Most ships are designed to carry specific cargo and to load and unload in a particular way. For example, a Roll-On/Roll-Off is required to transport large numbers of vehicles. In addition, due to the military nature of COE and its political considerations, direct sailing without transshipment is usually required.

The COE Manual and the Movement Control Manual regulate requirements for Strategic Movements of COE and passengers. Strategic Movements include shipments of COE by surface transport (road, sea, and river) and air (short-term air charter), plus short-term transportation of passengers by air and road. Requirements for Strategic Movements are generally time-sensitive and are based on the tempo of the peacekeeping operations.

RFPs are typically used for the procurement of movement services for COE. As process turnaround times (and validities of vendors' proposals) can be as short as 24 hours, technical and financial proposals are opened simultaneously, as an exception to the Opening procedures for RFPs. In addition, the Director, PD has special approval authority for these procurement cases.

Movement of COE and passengers are critical strategic components necessary for the successful execution of UN Peacekeeping operations, as both operations entail the transportation of peacekeepers (troops) and their equipment into the theatre of operations.

12.4 Strategic Movements – UN Owned Equipment (UNOE)

UNOE is defined as commercial goods that are either purchased from a UN commodity vendor for delivery to a UN entity or goods that are already in the possession of the UN (e.g., mission-to-mission cargo transfers). The Incoterm indicated in the commodity Purchase Order shall guide the procurement of freight services for UNOE commodities (see Chapter 12.5, below).

Procurement of freight-forwarding services for shipment of UNOE can be undertaken either on an individual shipment basis or through the establishment of non-exclusive freight forwarding systems contracts with a select number of freight forwarders.

12.5 Incoterms

International Commercial Terms (Incoterms) are prepared by the International Chamber of Commerce and are standardized, widely recognized trade terms to be included, by agreement of the parties, in contracts for the sale of goods. Their objective is to provide standard contractual provisions for contracts for the sale of goods by clarifying the costs, risks, and responsibilities of the parties to the contract, particularly in relation to the shipment and delivery of the goods from sellers

USE OF INCOTERMS

The Requisitioner and the Procurement Official shall jointly make the determination and selection of the appropriate Incoterms to use. The chosen Incoterm shall be appropriate to the goods, to the means of transport, to the desired level of risk acceptable to the UN, and to whether the parties intend to put additional obligations on the vendor or the UN.

to buyers. Incoterms do not apply to the contracts of carriage (e.g. freight forwarding) but only to the delivery of goods under a sales contract.

The Requisitioner and the Procurement Official shall jointly make the determination and selection of the appropriate Incoterms to use. The chosen Incoterm shall be appropriate to the goods, to the means of transport, to the desired level of risk acceptable to the UN, and to whether the parties intend to put additional obligations (e.g. the obligation to organize carriage or insurance) on the seller or the buyer.

When establishing systems contracts for commodities, Procurement Officers shall use FCA, FOB or EXW as the default Incoterm, with DAP/DAT included on an exceptional basis, unless it is a turnkey contract. Due to the typically higher costs associated with DAP/DAT shipments, the usage of DAP/DAT under a subsequent commodity Purchase Order should also be undertaken on an exceptional basis only, with FCA/FOB/EXW the preferred Incoterm. Approved category strategies may also indicate the preferred incoterm based on a thorough analysis conducted during the strategy development process.

12.6 Global Cargo Insurance

The UN Secretariat maintains a global cargo insurance policy that covers organizational shipments of UNOE and COE up to the limits set forth in the policy. For information regarding coverage limitations, PD's Freight Forwarding experts can be consulted at forwarding@un.org.

Due to the existence of this global cargo insurance policy, it is generally not necessary to purchase additional insurance from a freight forwarder, except in the rare instances whereby the value of the cargo exceeds the coverage outlined in the global cargo insurance policy. As such, solicitations for freight forwarding services shall not request additional insurance. However, any UN-appointed freight forwarder must maintain their own liability insurance to cover losses/damages due to their negligence. A copy of the insurance policy/certificate to cover the loss and/or damage of the contracted cargo in accordance with Clause 6 of the UNGCC shall be kept in the case file by the UN entity ordering the freight forwarding services.

In the event that an insurance claim is necessary, all relevant shipping documentation (airway bill, bill of lading, packing list, UN freight, and commodity purchase orders, etc.) shall be maintained in the case file by the UN entity ordering the freight forwarding services. Procedures for Filing Cargo Claims for Organizational Shipments are attached in Annex 21.

12.7 Goods Inbound to UNHQ

Goods arriving at UNHQ for UN official use ("Inbound Goods") must complete a multi-step customs clearance process in coordination with the host government of the United States of America. The Freight Forwarding (FF) experts in the PD facilitate this process. However, each UN Secretariat entity is responsible for ensuring that its commodity Purchase Order(s) covers delivery to "Door" of their

New York office. For airfreight shipments, the importing UN entity should immediately provide the FF experts in PD with shipping documents required for clearance (commercial invoice, air waybill, and arrival notice) upon arrival of the cargo. The process for clearance generally takes four to seven (4-7) business days. As such, appointed freight forwarders should be instructed to move cargo upon arrival to a Container Freight Station (CFS) to minimize storage charges. For sea shipments, Importer Security Filing (ISF) must be completed prior to the shipment departing the origin point to avoid possible penalties from US Customs & Border Protection (CBP) or other similar authorities. For information related to Inbound Goods, the Procurement Division's Freight Forwarding experts can be consulted at forwarding@un.org.

13. Contract Management and Contract Administration

13.1 Overview

This chapter describes the key activities required for effective contract management and administration.

13.1.1 Contract Management

Contract Management refers to all actions undertaken after the award of a contract and covers activities such as vendor performance monitoring, payments, contract closure, record retention, and maintenance of the contract file. The primary goal of contract management is to ensure that quality goods and services, in the right quantity, are delivered on time and in accordance with the agreed-upon contract terms.

Depending on the nature of the contract, the Contract Management function is the responsibility of either staff directly assigned to oversee and manage the implementation of the contract, the Requisitioner, or the end-user (hereinafter collectively referred to as “responsible contract management staff” or RCMS). The RCMS is responsible for monitoring the performance of the contractor and for receiving, accepting, and approving the deliverables specified in the contract.

The responsible Procurement Official should be informed by the RCMS of any not-accepted deliverable to ensure proper recording in the procurement case file and to permit action on any necessary contract administration matters.

Acceptance is carried out as follows, per type of requirement:

- a. Goods: Upon receipt of the procured goods, the RCMS will record the goods receipt, along with a Receipt and Inspection report (R&I), in UMOJA. This confirms receipt of all goods as per the packing list, as well as documenting, in detail, the condition of the goods received and their compliance with the stated specifications. The applicable UMOJA forms for receipt of goods must be used for this purpose.
- b. Services: If services have been satisfactorily received, the RCMS must record in UMOJA that the services have been satisfactorily completed in accordance with the terms specified in the contract.

Delivery has different meanings depending on the type of purchase (i.e., goods, services, or works). Furthermore, with goods, delivery is recognized at different points of time and place depending on the Incoterm used in the contract. RCMS are reminded to consider the relevant Incoterms and contract terms to determine whether delivery is considered complete.

13.1.2 Contract Administration

The Contract Management function is supported by the contract administration activities undertaken by the Procurement Official in charge of the procurement process. Contract Administration is comprised of all actions undertaken by Procurement Officials following the award of a contract that relate to the administrative aspects of the contract, such as contract amendment or extension, contract closure, record retention, maintenance of the contract file, handling security instruments (e.g. Performance Security), and liaising with OLA on any contractual disputes or claims. Issues relating to the interpretation of contract provisions shall be referred by the RCMS to the Procurement Official that issued the contract. Moreover, if the RCMS are not able to resolve a dispute with the vendor, they shall inform the Procurement Official thereof promptly. The Procurement Official shall act in accordance with Chapter 13.3 when seeking to resolve such disputes.

13.2 Vendor Performance Evaluation

The RCMS should conduct an evaluation of the vendor's performance, supported by the Procurement Official if necessary. The evaluation must consider the experience with the vendor during the entire contract period. It is important to carefully document contract performance and to be able to produce evidence of same in the event of disputes, in order to form an institutional memory, and for audit purposes.

There are five types of Vendor Performance Rating (VPR) forms:

- a. Short-Form Specialist Report (Annex 22);
- b. Supplier Performance Report (Annex 23);
- c. Contractor Performance Report (Annex 24). This form is used for contracts that exceed US$ 200,000 or long-term contracts of two or more years in duration where performance reports are required once a year;
- d. Contractor Performance Report for Short-Term Air Charter Services (Annex 25);
- e. Contractor Performance Report for Short-Term Sea Transport Services (Annex 26).

In order to ensure contract compliance, the RCMS is expected to monitor performance on an ongoing basis through reports, meetings, and, if applicable, inspections. The following topics can be addressed in evaluating performance:

- a. Fulfillment of delivery schedule/timely delivery;
- b. Quality of goods or services provided in accordance with the contract;
- c. Compliance with contractual terms and conditions (including the Supplier code of conduct when issues arise);
- d. Adherence to warranty provisions;
- e. Timely response to UN requests;
- f. Undue delay of the performance under the contract;
- g. Any frivolous claims against the UN;
- h. Failure to disclose information relevant to performance and vendor eligibility, which should then be raised with the responsible officials for vendor registration (e.g. bankruptcy, ongoing litigation, etc.).

Depending on the nature of the procurement, a process to evaluate vendor performance may include the following approaches:

- a. Using questionnaires, which require a sound knowledge of what will be measured to ensure the relevance of the result;
- b. Undertaking site visits;
- c. Using metrics and key performance indicators for contracts;
- d. Developing and using supplier scorecards to measure the cost of poor quality, customer social responsibility, etc.;
- e. Measuring performance against SLAs.

If a contractor has shown significant or persistent deficiencies in performance that led to early termination, application of damages, or similar actions, the RCMS may, in consultation with the Procurement Official, refer the case of such contractor for potential sanctioning to the VRC, along with supporting documentation and justification explaining such performance failures.

The RCMS shall ensure that contract management is conducted as follows:

- a. The RCMS shall develop the performance measurement criteria, which should be included in the solicitation documents and in the contract;

- b. The RCMS shall monitor and evaluate the vendor's performance against the agreed performance measurement criteria or contract milestones;
- c. The RCMS shall notify the vendor promptly in case the performance does not meet the agreed performance standard(s) and shall request remedial action. RCMS shall also apply for performance credits as described in the contract to the vendor's invoices/payments. In case of recurring or continuing a sub-standard performance, the RCMS shall notify the concerned Procurement Official and provide documented proof of such performance and any remedial actions taken;
- d. The RCMS shall complete the Vendor Performance Rating (VPR) form/report, notify the Procurement Official as to whether the vendor is performing adequately, and submit a copy of the VPR form to the Procurement Official and Vendor Registration and Outreach Section in DOS.

The Procurement Official shall administer the VPR form/report as follows:

- a. The Procurement Official shall ensure that a copy of any VPR form/report is included in the procurement case file;
- b. In case the Procurement Official is notified of a vendor's sub-standard performance, he/she shall assess the situation based on the information received from the RCMS and shall recommend an appropriate action to be taken. Depending on the situation, possible actions may include further escalation, dispute resolution, use of remedies, (temporary) suspension, exclusion from future solicitations, or any other remedial action deemed appropriate for the specific situation. Recommended actions shall be submitted to the Director, PD or CPO for approval, who shall request a review by the VRC;
- c. The Procurement Official shall notify the staff in charge of Vendor Management and/or the VRC of any non-compliance or poor performance issues in writing.

Procurement Officials and RCMS should ensure that a VPR form is on file before processing any extension to an existing Contract. If the VPR does not show a satisfactory result, plans should be made to address the performance shortcomings or to retender the requirement.

13.3 Dispute Resolution

Contracts should be clear, and the responsibilities and obligations of the parties clearly stated therein. However, no matter how well a contract is drafted and its performance managed, disputes may arise. The United Nations is committed to fair, orderly, and prompt resolution of disputes with vendors. Moreover, the United Nations is required to make provisions for appropriate modes of settlement of disputes arising out of contracts or other disputes of a private law character to which the United Nations is a party (see 1946 Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations).

Contractual disputes are to be addressed as follows:

Amicable Settlement: With a view to providing appropriate means of settlement of disputes, UN contracts provide for a resolution of disputes by way of amicable settlement (e.g. direct discussion between the parties to the contract). Consultation with the OLA or, if the entity is away from headquarters, the Legal Adviser within the entity is required when such amicable settlement results in agreeing to make payment for costs outside the scope of the contract).

Seeking Legal Advice: When it becomes apparent that a dispute with a vendor has arisen and cannot be resolved by the RCMS and/or by the Procurement Official, the Procurement Official shall send a memorandum to OLA or the applicable Legal Advisor seeking their advice. The memorandum shall include, but not be limited to, a detailed description of the vendor's claims and all relevant information concerning the dispute, including a fully signed version of the applicable contract and all signed amendments, a chronology of events, the status of the dispute, possible consequences of the dispute if it is not settled (e.g. financial, operational, political, reputation/image of the UN), and all applicable correspondence between the contractor and the United Nations in relation to the claim. The memorandum shall also include copies of all relevant documentation and, if the matter is urgent, the reasons for the urgency therefore, should be communicated to OLA or the Legal Adviser.

Conduct of Amicable Settlement: Following receipt of the legal opinion, the relevant Procurement Official authorized to conduct discussions with the vendor shall ensure that any preliminary agreement reached considers the legal opinion. Any discussions shall be conducted by a minimum of two Procurement Officials, at least one of whom is experienced and senior in grade, and minutes should be made of such discussions for UN internal purposes. The Requisitioner should be requested to participate in any discussions involving operational issues. If the vendor requests to have legal representation present in negotiations, the Organization must have legal representation (i.e., OLA or the entity's Legal Advisor). If an amicable agreement is reached with the vendor, its terms shall be transmitted to the Director, PD for contracts established by PD, and to the CPO for contracts established by entities; who shall review it and seek the relevant approvals. The vendor shall be advised that any agreement reached is subject to UN internal approvals.

Authority to Settle Commercial Claims: The amicable settlement of commercial claims up to the equivalent of US $50,000 is the responsibility of the Authorized Official of the procuring entity, after consultation with OLA<sup>6</sup>. If the amount of the dispute exceeds the equivalent of US $50,000, the Head of Entity shall refer the case to Under-Secretary-General for Operational Support<sup>7</sup>, after consulting with the Office of Legal Affairs. The Under-Secretary-General for Management Strategy, Policy and Compliance has delegated authority to settle commercial claims above US$ 50,000 upon the recommendation of the Under-Secretary-General for Operational Support<sup>8</sup>. ASG for Supply Chain Management is the designated authorized representative of the Under-Secretary-General for Operational Support for the review of commercial claims<sup>9</sup>.

Settlement and Release Agreement: Upon receipt of all required approvals, the Procurement Official shall consult with OLA in the preparation of a settlement and release agreement. The Procurement Official shall forward the draft settlement and released agreement to the vendor for signature, following which the official with the appropriate authority shall countersign the agreement.

Arbitration: In the absence of an amicable settlement, the contractor may seek to arbitrate the matter in accordance with the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules, as provided for in the UNGCC. Should a Notice of Arbitration be received from a vendor, such Notice must be brought to the immediate attention of the Office of Legal Affairs.

File Management: The RCMS and Procurement Official are each responsible for ensuring that the respective case file contains a description of their dispute resolution activities stating exactly what was discussed and how the dispute was resolved, including any executed settlement and release agreement.

13.4 Payments

Payment entails the timely payment of invoices consistent with the terms of the contract.

The Finance Officer shall ensure that the terms and conditions of payment are consistent with those specified in the contract document. The following examples contain standard payment terms for goods, works, and services, but the specific payments terms are outlined in each contract.

It is a standard contractual provision unless otherwise amended by the parties of the contract, that the UN is obligated to pay for goods or services net thirty (30) days upon the vendor's satisfactory completion of its delivery obligations, in accordance with the delivery terms (e.g. Incoterms). When a normal commercial practice or the interests of the UN so require, payment or payment on account in advance may be agreed upon in accordance with Financial Rule 105.19(a) (e.g. for real estate leasing, subscription-type services, etc.). It is a general practice that progress payments are implemented in accordance with Financial Rule 105.19(b). Thus, under certain conditions, the UN may agree to pay progress or advance payments for delivery of the goods/services or upon completion of clearly defined milestones for goods/services, provided adequate security for the advance or progress payment is established. In such cases, the Procurement Officer should consider establishing specially-developed payment terms that take payment flows into consideration, provided such terms are approved by the Director, PD or the CPO and are tailored to the specific procurement.

It is important to be aware of the specific payment terms applicable to each contract. The contracts should also include details of all documentation that must be submitted before any payments are made.

The payment request is transmitted through UMOJA, and the responsible person shall effect the payment in order to uphold the segregation of duties between procuring personnel conducting the procurement process and personnel effecting the payment. This separation of the procuring and payment functions is a key factor in the principle of segregation of duties (see Chapter 2.9 Segregation of Duties) and must be adhered to for all payments.

13.4.1 Third-Party Payments

The general and normal practice is that the UN does not make any third-party payments (i.e., payment to parties other than the entity that holds the contract).

13.4.2 Taxes

Article II, Section 7 of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations provides, inter alia, that the United Nations, including its subsidiary organs, is exempt from all direct taxes (except charges for public utility services) and is exempt from customs restrictions, duties, and charges of a similar nature in respect of articles imported or exported for its official use. In the event any governmental authority refuses to recognize the exemptions of the United Nations from such taxes, restrictions, duties, or charges, the contractor should be required to immediately consult with the United Nations to determine a mutually acceptable procedure. Under the relevant contract, the contractor should be required to authorize the UN to deduct from the contractor's invoices any amount representing such taxes, duties, or charges, unless the contractor has consulted with the UN before the payment thereof and the UN has, in each instance, specifically authorized the contractor to pay such taxes, duties, or charges under written protest. In that event, the contractor should be required to provide the UN with written evidence that payment of such taxes, duties, or charges has been made and appropriately authorized, and the UN should reimburse the contractor for any such taxes, duties, or charges so authorized by the UN and paid by the contractor under written protest.

13.4.3 Advance Payments

Please refer to Chapter 11.1.4 for details.

13.5 Amendments, Extensions and Renewal

The contract modification is the handling of changes that arise following contract execution, typically involving variations in prices or requirements that were not originally anticipated.

It is the responsibility of Procurement Officials as part of their contract administration duties, in consultation with the Requisitioner, to:

- a. Negotiate the appropriate contract changes regarding price, schedule, quality, and performance, and ensure that the contract is amended so that, at all times, it defines the agreed expectations of both parties under the contract;
- b. Ensure that the change conditions are reasonable and justifiable in terms of price, time, and quality;
- c. Any such amendment should be requested, reviewed, approved, and signed prior to the expiry date of the original contract. Retroactive contract extensions after contract expiry are not possible.

The amendments must be approved by the corresponding Procurement Approving Authority in accordance with the DOA and documented in the contract file.

In some cases, contract amendments may require prior review by a Review Committee in accordance with the DOA. The following contract amendments require a waiver from formal methods of solicitation from the relevant Authorized Official prior to presenting the contract amendment to a Review Committee or to engaging in formal negotiations with the vendor with the aim of amending the contract:

- a. Contracts originally established after a formal solicitation process or under FR 105.16 after obtaining an exception to the use of formal methods of solicitation from the Procurement Approving Authority, if the amendment will change the scope of the contract, extend its duration for more than 8 months or increase the NTE for more than 20% or $500,000, whichever is lower (see Chapters 9.2 (d), (h), (j) and 9.3 (c), (g) and (i)).

13.6 Use of Subcontractors

Article 5 of the UNGCC provides that contractors shall obtain prior written approval and clearance from the UN for all subcontractors, with the understanding that such approval and clearance does not relieve the contractor of any of its obligations under its contract with the UN. Subcontractors shall only be approved where their use reflects standard business practice or is otherwise justified by the nature of the goods, services, or works to be delivered. UN Staff (Procurement, Requisitioner, RCMS) responsible for Contract Administration and Management should not deal directly with subcontractors, given that the UN's contractors are solely responsible for all services and obligations performed by its subcontractors.

13.7 Contract Completion

Contract completion includes the confirmation that all obligations have been met, identification of any residual obligations and completion steps, settlement of final payments, assessment of contractor, and the administrative closing of files.

Procurement Officials should verify that the following activities have been carried out:

- a. All products and/or services required have been provided to the Requisitioner;
- b. Documentation in the contract file adequately shows the receipt and formal acceptance of all contract items;
- c. No claims or investigations are pending on the contract;
- d. All actions related to contract price revisions and changes have been concluded;
- e. All outstanding subcontracting issues have been settled;
- f. If a partial or complete termination was involved, the action is complete;
- g. The final invoice has been submitted and all invoices paid;
- h. Any security (e.g. Performance Security) shall be returned in accordance with the terms of the Contract and the security instrument. In addition, any equipment or unused material supplied by the UN must be promptly returned to the UN.

13.8 Property Disposal

13.8.1 Property Survey Boards

Financial Rule 105.22 states: "Sales of supplies, equipment, or other property declared surplus or unserviceable shall be based on competitive bidding unless the relevant Property Survey Board (See Financial Rule 105.21 a.) Estimates that the sales value is less than an amount to be specified by the Under-Secretary-General, Department of Management; b.) Considers that the exchange of property in partial or full payment for replacement equipment or supplies is in the best interest of the Organization; c.) Deems it appropriate to transfer surplus property from one project or operation for use in another and determines the fair market value at which the transfer(s) shall be effected; d.) Determines that the destruction of the surplus or unserviceable material will be more economical or is required by law or by the nature of the property; e.) Determines that the interests of the United Nations will be served through the disposal of the property by gift or sale at a nominal price to an intergovernmental organization, a Government or governmental agency, or some other non-profit organization".

Such sale shall be on the basis of payments on or before delivery to the purchaser, except as otherwise provided for in Financial Rules 105.22 and 105.23.

13.8.2 Disposal of Property through Sales— Procedures

Development of Solicitation Documents: The Procurement Officer shall issue Solicitation Documents to prospective purchasers, ensuring adequate competition. Generally, the minimum number of invitees to the solicitation should be established using the guidelines set forth in Chapter 5.7. Such Solicitation Documents shall refer to the relevant approved Property Survey Board (PSB) recommendation that authorizes disposal through a sale.

In order to maximize the return for the UN, the Property may be sold individually or in lots.

At a minimum, the Solicitation Documents shall include:

- a. An itemized list of the Property;
- b. A complete description of the Property;
- c. The location of the Property and place of inspection to encourage the potential purchaser to inspect the Property;
- d. The condition of the Property (i.e., whether it is damaged, useable, serviceable, in need of repairs, etc.);
- e. Reference to the relevant approved Property Survey Board recommendation;
- f. Terms of the solicitation (see Sample Sale of Surplus Property Form attached as Annex 27);
- g. Date and time of Tender opening;
- h. A statement that the Property shall be sold on an “as -is, where-is” basis and without recourse or warranties, express or implied, of any kind;
- i. The requirement to deposit, upon submission of an offer, an amount of no less than ten percent (10%) of the total offer value, which, if such deposit exceeds US$ 1,000, must be in the form of a certified check;
- j. The time period within which the invoice issued to the successful Bidder shall be settled;
- k. The time period within which the successful Bidder shall remove the Property;
- l. Any other relevant matters.

RESOURCES

Annex 27 - Sample Sale of Surplus Property Form

13.8.3 Treatments of Offers

The UN shall treat offers for the purchase of Property in the same manner as Submissions for the purchase of goods by the UN. Chapter 10 of this PM applies to purchases of Property, subject to appropriate changes as the context may require.

The offers shall be itemized, and the Property shall be sold to the Bidder offering the best value to the Organization.

Successful Bidders shall be notified in writing, and items awarded shall be listed in a contractual sale instrument.

13.8.4 Review by the Committees on Contracts

Prior to the issuance of the contractual instrument, the relevant Review Committees shall review the proposed awards based on the applicable thresholds. Please refer to the Chapter 9 Review by Committees on Contracts.

13.8.5 Contractual Instruments for the Sale of Goods

The disposal by sale shall be affected by the issuance of a Contract for the sale of goods. The Contract for the sale of goods shall, inter alia, list and describe the Property to be sold, the agreed price, and any deposit paid.

The UN may elect to enter into a Systems Contract if it foresees a continuing sale of items over a period of time, provided that this is advantageous to the Organization. In that case, the contractor shall be tasked in writing for each underlying sale, with a reference to the applicable Systems Contract. Please also refer to Chapter 11.6 Long-Term Agreement \(LTA\).

13.8.6 Exceptions to Solicitation

Negotiation or "Spot Sales": When the sales value is estimated to be under the threshold amount for an LVA, which is currently up to or equal to US $10,000, the sale can take place without formal issuance of Solicitation Documents. Prospective Bidders can be invited to survey the Property and thereafter submit Bids, either oral or written, within a set time limit. The awarded contractor shall be notified in writing of the sale.

Trade-In: If there is an offer to exchange Property in partial or in full payment for the UN Property, the disposal may be effected by the issuance of a Contract for the sale of goods by the UN or Contract for the Procurement of Replacement Goods, provided it is in the best interest of the Organization, as provided for in Financial Rule 105.22 (b).

13.8.7 Deposits

Bidders shall be required to deposit an amount of no less than 10% of the total offer value with the submission of any offer. Any deposit exceeding US $1,000 must be submitted to the UN in the form of a certified check.

Upon acceptance of an offer by the UN, the deposit shall not be returned to the Bidder except with the written approval of the Director, PD or CPO. The return of the deposit shall take place after full payment for the goods has been received and the Bidder has completed all contractual obligations.

All deposits received from unsuccessful bidders shall be returned with a letter indicating that the Bidder was not successful.

13.8.8 Notice of Award Billing

The Director, PD or the CPO shall sign the Purchase Order or applicable contractual instrument (e.g. Bill of Sale) recording the sale and the final bill, which are then issued to the successful Bidder. Such bill shall be settled no later than five (5) business days after the notice unless otherwise set forth in the Solicitation Documents.

13.8.9 Removal of Property

A limited time, usually five (5) business days, shall be allowed following the sale for removal of the Property unless otherwise set forth in the Solicitation Documents.

13.8.10 Disposition of Assets of Peacekeeping Operations

United Nations Financial Regulation 5.14 states: "Following the liquidation of a peacekeeping operation, equipment and other property shall be disposed of in accordance with the Financial Regulations and Rules and the manner indicated below:

- a. Equipment in good condition that conforms to established Standardization or is considered compatible with existing equipment will be redeployed to other peacekeeping operations or will be placed in reserve to form start-up kits for use by future missions;
- b. Equipment not required for current or future peacekeeping operations may be redeployed to other United Nations activities funded from assessed contributions, provided that there is a demonstrated need for the equipment;
- c. Equipment not required for current or future peacekeeping operations, or other United Nations activities funded from assessed contributions, but which may be useful for the operations of other United Nations agencies, international organizations or non-governmental organizations may be sold to such agencies or organizations;
- d. Any equipment or property not required or which it is not feasible to dispose of in accordance with subparagraphs (b), (c) or (d) above or which is in poor condition will be

- subject to commercial disposal in accordance with the procedures applicable to other United Nations equipment or property;
- e. Any assets that have been installed in a country and which, if dismantled, would set back the rehabilitation of that country, shall be provided to the duly recognized Government of that country in return for compensation in a form to be agreed by the Organization and the Government. This refers in particular to airfield installations and equipment, buildings, bridges, and mine-clearing equipment. Where such assets cannot be disposed of in this manner, or otherwise, they will be contributed free of charge to the Government of the country concerned. Such contributions require the prior approval of the General Assembly;
  - f. A report on the final disposition of assets for each such liquidated peacekeeping operation shall be submitted to the General Assembly.”

13.8.11 Sale of Real Property

Any proposed sale of real or immovable property owned by the United Nations shall be authorized in accordance with the delegation of authority in property management

13.9 Handling and Maintenance of Files

For both contract management and contract administrations purposes, the responsible officials (RCMS and Procurement Officials, respectively) must ensure that all documents containing commercial information are treated with confidentiality, that such documents are classified accordingly as confidential material and that such documents are handled in accordance with ST/SGB/2007/6.

Responsible officials and Procurement Officials must also establish and maintain a file for each contract. In addition to information documenting the procurement process, the file must include all information required to successfully administer/manage the contract. Any issues of clarification or change of the contract must be fully documented in this file.

In line with the procurement principles of transparency and accountability, and in order to facilitate internal and external audits of UN operations, every step in the contract management process shall be documented and kept on file (hard copy or electronic).

A standard filing system, as well as a numbering system to enable tracking of files, should be established in every contract management and contract administration offices in order to create an audit trail.

Procurement Officials must open a procurement file for each case, either physically or electronically. Procurement files must be retained in accordance with the applicable retention policy.

The good administration and maintenance of the procurement file are required to assure clarity over actions taken during the course of the contract. Procurement Officials should document events that occur during the life of the contract, which may affect, at a later date, any decision or revision of the contract. A good audit records trail is critical to prevent confusion in the management of files due to the dynamic nature of the procurement function and the mobility of the Procurement Staff. In addition, staff should adopt and maintain discipline in the filing and indexing of contract files, which may be done in physical or electronic filing systems. The file shall at a minimum contain the documents (inclusive of relevant correspondence) relating to the following phases of the procurement process (if relevant):

- a. Pre-Solicitation: Specifications (inclusive of TOR, SOW, RFI/REOI, Market Research, Evaluation Criteria, and weighting), SSP, and provisional registration/special approval form;
- b. Solicitation: signed List of Invitees, RFQ/ITB/RFP, clarifications/amendments to RFQ/ITB/RFP, and inquiries;

- c. Submissions: acknowledgments, Submission Opening attendance register, the record of Submission receipt, technical proposals, financial proposals, and copies of Bid Security;
- d. Evaluation: Request for technical evaluation, technical evaluation, financial evaluation, approved presentation to a Review Committee and agenda, Review Committee minutes containing recommendations, Dunn & Bradstreet report, and relevant correspondence;
- e. Award: Notice of Award, Regret Letters, vendor's signed acceptance of Award, documents related to Contract preparation, and copy of Performance Security (originals to be kept in the safe);
- f. Post-award: Signed contracts, copies of insurance certificates and guarantees provided for in the contract;
- g. Contract Administration documents: amendments, Statements of Award, and Vendor Performance Report/Evaluation/ checklist for closed files.

Contract management files must be kept after contract closure for the period required in accordance with the applicable retention policy. Typically, contract management files will include the following relevant information/documentation:

- a. Signed contract/purchase order;
- b. Minutes of the concerned Review Committee meeting and decision on its award, recommendations by the concerned Authorized Official (e.g. ASG, OSCM);
- c. Copies of any advance payment guarantee or performance security received from the vendor;
- d. Correspondence with the contractor (e.g. emails, meeting minutes) regarding the management of the contract;
- e. Signed notes from meetings, phone calls, etc.;
- f. Amendments to contracts/POs with relevant Review Committee minutes when applicable;
- g. The documented decision regarding claims, disputes including amicable resolution, conciliation, mediation, or arbitration;
- h. Any required progress reports and/or other proof of delivery of milestones as provided for in the contract;
- i. Insurance claims;
- j. Proof of payment;
- k. Completed vendor performance evaluation form and meeting minutes, including compliance with KPIs and SLAs.

14. Cooperation

Cooperation in procurement among organizations of the UN system can result in significant benefits due to economies of scale, reduced transaction costs, agility and improved relations with suppliers. It can also be instrumental in supporting the UN Secretariat's operations in areas of the world where no or little internal procurement capacity exists and, vice versa, support other UN organizations with their requirements.

Utilizing cooperation to meet the UN's requirements does not release Procurement Officials from ensuring that the transaction represents the best value for money and is fully in line with the principles enshrined in Financial Regulation 5.12. Accordingly, cooperation is an alternative sourcing option which must be duly justified as an alternative to carrying out a competitive solicitation or a sole-source decision by the Organization itself.

In the context of this chapter, the term UN Organization refers to any organization of the UN system (excluding UN Secretariat entities).

Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iii), in conjunction with Financial Rule 105.17 (Cooperation), provides the following possibilities for cooperation, which are covered in Chapter 14.1 and Chapter 14.2.

14.1 Cooperation with UN Organizations

"Delivering as One" and other UN reform initiatives have accelerated efforts among organizations of the UN system to collaborate and cooperate on procurement. The High-level Committee on Management's Procurement Network (HLCM-PN) has also endorsed specific guidance to facilitate collaborative procurement. Moreover, the issuance of the "Mutual Recognition" statement in 2019 formalizes the commitment of organizations of the UN system to use or rely on other organizations of the UN system's policies, procedures, system contracts and related operational mechanisms for the implementation of activities without further evaluation checks or approvals being required, to the greatest extent practicable.

The purpose of this section of the Manual is to provide the guiding principles for the UN Secretariat's procurement cooperation with other UN Organizations.

The Procurement Approving Authority for Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iii) in conjunction with Financial Rule 105.17(a) may determine that cooperation with other UN Organizations is appropriate to meet the procurement requirements of a UN Secretariat Entity and may authorize it in writing.

Cooperation may be considered appropriate to, inter alia, obtain volume discounts or achieve process or operational efficiencies. In taking a decision to make an award under FRR 105.17 (a), the Procurement Approving Authority shall ensure that both the decision and the justification for such decision are recorded in writing.

Cooperation with UN Organizations may take the following forms, in accordance with Financial Rule 105.17 (a):

- a. Carrying out common procurement actions together, i.e. establishing and using joint LTAs and contracts (joint solicitation, lead agency agreement);
- b. The UN Secretariat entering into a contract relying on a procurement decision of another UN Organization (using LTAs or contracts of other UN Organizations, i.e. piggybacking);
- c. Requesting another UN Organization to carry out procurement activities on behalf of the UN Secretariat (using procurement services of other UN Organizations).

Should the requirement to be sourced through cooperation relate to Strategic Goods and Services, a request for LPA shall be sought the Director, PD (see section 2.6.4).

14.1.1 Carrying out common procurement actions together with other UN Organization(s)

A UN Secretariat entity may undertake joint procurement activities with one or more UN Organizations if so approved by the Procurement Approving Authority for Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iii) in conjunction with Financial Rule 105.17(a). This method of cooperation ensures that the business volumes and requirements of all participating Organizations are taken in consideration at the solicitation stage, so it is preferable over piggybacking. UN Secretariat Entities should plan joint procurement exercises with sufficient time to allow for coordination of requirements and business volumes across UN Organizations.

Generally, one organization will lead the solicitation process under its own financial regulations and rules. Cooperating UN Organizations will jointly agree on the Solicitation documents and evaluation criteria and may jointly evaluate the Submissions. The Solicitation documents should clearly specify the expected contractual form for effecting the procurement. Joint Solicitations are subject to the review requirements of the lead UN Organization only, except in those cases where the applicable evaluation criteria or the resulting award differs from that of the lead UN Organization.

The Procurement Official should ensure that the resulting contract drafted by the Lead UN Organization contains all the information required for the UN Secretariat to be able to order and obtain goods and/or services as per the contract. Alternatively, the Procurement Official may choose to draft a separate contract for the UN Secretariat based on the results of the joint solicitation, if there are reasons to believe that this would be advantageous despite the additional efforts and administrative costs.

14.1.2 The UN Secretariat entering into a contract relying on a procurement decision of another UN Organization (using LTA or contracts of other UN Organizations and/or using other UN Organization's solicitation results – piggybacking)

A UN Secretariat entity may use a contract (including purchase orders and/or long-term agreements) concluded by another UN Organization, provided that the contract satisfies the UN Secretariat entity's requirements, specifically in terms of value for money and fit-for-purpose. Such an assessment should be determined and guided by the following:

- a. The value of the UN Secretariat entity's requirement is less than or equal to the value of the contract of the UN Organization. A contract should not be used to order disproportionately higher volumes than intended, especially for goods/services with volume discounts not reflected in the contract; and

- b. The vendor offers goods or services to the UN Secretariat entity at the same (or lower) price than in the contract and with the same terms and conditions. Procurement Officials shall conduct price negotiations as applicable; and
- c. The UN Secretariat entity's requirements are equivalent to those included in the contract;

For each procurement requirement, approval to commence procurement action shall be sought from the Procurement Approving Authority for Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iii) in conjunction with Financial Rule 105.17(a)

The Procurement Official shall ensure that Best Value for Money is obtained when piggybacking on a contract already established by another UN Organization. In terms of the time lapsed from the procurement action of the UN Organization, the UN Secretariat entity may consider piggybacking on said contract, if either one of the two following conditions are met:

- a. The contract of the UN Organization is valid;
- b. The award by the UN Organization was made within the 12 months prior to the proposed award by the UN Secretariat entity. For some categories, like freight forwarding, fuel requirements, etc. the reasonable time lapsed from the award by the UN Organization may in practice be more limited and Procurement Officials shall exercise due diligence to ensure that the UN Secretariat is obtaining Best Value for Money when piggybacking.

If the UN Secretariat entity is satisfied that the financial regulations and rules of the UN Organization are consistent with that of the UN and that the contract has been established in accordance with the procedures established in the respective UN Organization, a review of the award by a UN Secretariat Review Committee shall not be required. The UN Secretariat entity shall ensure that:

- a. The UN Organization has authorized in writing the use of its contract by the UN Secretariat entity (e.g. through a signed HLCM-PN-endorsed LTA information sheet (see Annex 28)). In addition, the UN Secretariat entity must obtain a signed copy of the UN Organization's contract (including purchase orders or LTA).
- b. The vendor on the UN Organization's contract is eligible with respect to the UN Secretariat's requirements on vendor eligibility and registered at the correct level;
- c. The vendor accepts the UNGCC.

A separate agreement, typically in the format of a purchase order or a contract, must be signed and counter-signed between the vendor and the UN Secretariat entity. The approval of the Procurement Approving Authority in the UN Secretariat under Financial Rule 105.17(a) shall be obtained prior to signature of the separate agreement; its term should not exceed the term of the UN Organization's contract.

LTAs of other UN Organizations are available at www.ungm.org, and more specifically under the following link: <https://www.ungm.org/UNUser/LongTermAgreement/SearchLTAs>.

14.1.3 Another UN Organization to carry out procurement activities on behalf of the UN Secretariat Entity

Under certain circumstances it may be advantageous or necessary to request a UN Organization to carry out certain procurement activities on behalf of a UN Secretariat entity. Those activities should be carried out on the basis of an appropriate legal instrument. For each procurement requirement, approval to commence procurement action shall be sought from the Procurement Approving Authority for Financial Rule 105.16(a)(iii) in conjunction with Financial Rule 105.17(a). Such engagement of another UN Organization to carry out procurement activities on behalf of the UN Secretariat entity may be considered in the following situations:

- a. Expertise. When the UN Secretariat entity acknowledges the existence and validity of the particular expertise of another UN Organization in the procurement of specific goods, works or services, the Procurement Approving Authority may authorize such UN Organization to carry out procurement activities for the specific goods, works or services and designate such UN Organization as the procurement agent for the UN Secretariat entity.

- b. Procurement / Administrative Capacity. When the UN Secretariat entity does not have the necessary procurement and/or administrative capacity in a country nor the UN Secretariat can provide the necessary support locally, from PD or from a DOS-assigned service provider, procurement actions may be undertaken on behalf of the UN Secretariat entity by the representative of a UN Organization with the necessary procurement and administrative capacity (e.g. representative of the local United Nations Development Programme), in accordance with the regulations and rules of that UN Organization.

14.2 Cooperation with Governments and Non-UN Organizations

In accordance with Financial Rule 105.17(b), “the UN “may, to the extent authorized by the General Assembly, cooperate with a Government, nongovernmental organization or other public international organization in respect of procurement activities and, as appropriate, enter into agreements for such purposes.”

14.3 Other Contractual Instruments

Any other contractual instruments used under the provisions of Financial Rule 105.17(b), such as Memoranda of Understanding, Letters of Assist involving payment to a government or to a non-governmental organization or other public international organizations for goods and/or services has to follow the procurement principles outlined in Financial Regulation 5.12.

Procurement delegation for such instruments under Financial Rule 105.17(b) lies with the Director, PD for any instruments issued up to a value of US$ 1,000,0000 and with the ASG, OSCM for those exceeding US$ 1,000,0000 only.

14.3.1 Letters of Assist

Letters of Assist can only be considered if a commercial sourcing solution cannot meet the requirements, and cover the following:

- a. Goods with associated services of a strictly uniformed capability nature or use;
- b. Goods and/or services not strictly of uniformed capability nature or use but unavailable through commercial solutions, existing stock;
- c. Transportation services for the movement of UN uniformed personnel and/or goods to or from a Mission area which are provided by the respective Troop/Police Contributing Countries at the Member States prerogative, subject to compliance with the operational

- requirements, including timeline and deployment location, and at a rate not to exceed what it would cost the Organization to conduct through commercial, or other competitive means;
- d. Dietary or other requirements unique to a contingent that are available only from the country of the individual contingent, and procurement of which is facilitated or expedited by procurement through the government of the contingent, provided that the cost to the UN of such procurement is not higher than the cost of the same items if procured through commercial sources;
  - e. Ammunition, if a commercial solution is not available or feasible;
  - f. The financial negotiations for the terms and conditions of LOAs shall always involve the PD. A submission to the HCC is required for all LOA cases exceeding US$ 1,000,000. The use of LOAs shall be discontinued when circumstances or conditions that gave rise to their use no longer exist.

15. Transverse Topics

15.1 The United Nations Global Compact

Procurement Officials and Requisitioners should be aware that the United Nations encourages vendors to participate in the UN Global Compact. The UN Global Compact is a voluntary international corporate network established to support the participation of both private and public-sector actors in advancing responsible corporate citizenship and universal social and environmental principles to meet the challenges of globalization.

The Ten Principles of the UN Global Compact are as follows:

Human Rights

Principle 1. Businesses should support and respect the protection of internationally proclaimed human rights;

Principle 2. Make sure that they are not complicit in human rights abuses.

Labour

Principle 3. Businesses should uphold the freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining;

Principle 4. The elimination of all forms of forced and compulsory labour;

Principle 5. The effective abolition of child labour;

Principle 6. The elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation.

Environment

Principle 7. Businesses should support a precautionary approach to environmental challenges; Principle 8. Undertake initiatives to promote greater environmental responsibility;

Principle 9. Encourage the development and diffusion of environmentally friendly technologies.

Anti-Corruption

Principle 10. Businesses should work against all forms of corruption, including extortion and bribery.

The UN strongly encourages all vendors to actively participate in the UN Global Compact. To that end, the UN Supplier Code of Conduct has been developed with recognition of the importance of the Ten Principles of the UN Global Compact, and it is viewed as an important means of integrating the Compact's principles into the operations of the UN.

RESOURCES

The Ten Principles of the UN Global Compact

15.2 Sustainability Considerations

Given the scale of its procurement activities, the UN has the potential, within its existing legislative framework and procurement guiding principles, to motivate markets to innovate and contribute to achieving global goals. The UN itself has been encouraged by the Member States to integrate sustainable development practices into its operations in support of the sustainable development agenda.

Requisitioners and Procurement Officials should be aware of the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) and inter-agency initiatives on procurement practices that incorporate the social, economic and environmental principles of sustainable development in support of SDG 12 and target 12.7.

Integrating the economic dimension of the sustainable agenda means to strive for the best value for money and, in particular, the whole life costs of a product or service, as well as for wider support for economic development.

Considering its environmental dimension is to strive for reduction of the negative environmental impact a product or service has over its whole life-cycle, including issues such as water, land and air pollution, waste generation and disposal options, environmental risks from wastewater and hazardous waste, and greenhouse gas emissions that contribute to climate change, preservation of natural ecosystems, waste reduction and management, and air and water pollution.

The social dimension of the sustainable agenda considers the promotion of human rights, elimination of child labour, fair labour conditions, gender equality, and wider ethical issues in the supply chain. For instance, to enable the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, as well as the achievement of the Sustainable Development Goals, the United Nations Disability Inclusion Strategy calls for specific action to raise the standards of the United Nations performance on disability inclusion across its operations, such as the inclusion of accessibility considerations into relevant procurement activities.

A number of General Assembly and Security Council resolutions have requested the Organization to address and minimize the environmental impact of its operations, including through the establishment of Environmental Management Systems (EMSs). The main priorities of the EMSs are improved waste and water management, increased energy efficiency, the progressive transition to renewable energy and an overall reduction of greenhouse gas emissions.

Factoring sustainability considerations at the requirements definition stage can provide added value to the Organization, by promoting resource efficiency, leveraging innovation and advancing the SDGs. Requirements must be transparent, measurable and proportionate to what the market can reasonably offer and must not restrict international competition. Category Strategies may also provide guidance on incorporating sustainability considerations into the sourcing solutions for certain goods and services.

In general, Requisitioners, Procurement Officials and contract managers are expected to encourage UN vendors to adopt sustainable and socially responsible policies aligned with the UN Global Compact's ten principles in the areas of human rights, labour, the environment, and anti-corruption in accordance with the UN Supplier Code of Conduct.

Any integration of sustainability considerations must be undertaken within existing legislative frameworks, particularly Financial Regulation 5.12.

15.3 Risk Management

Risk Management can be defined as the set of policies, procedures, and practices involved in the identification, analysis, assessment, control, avoidance, minimization, or elimination of unacceptable risks. The following UN policies address risk management elements and are particularly relevant to procurement:

- a. UN Financial Regulations and Rules;
- b. Staff Regulations and Rules of the United Nations (ST/SGB/2018/1);
- c. Financial Disclosure Programme (ST/SGB/2006/6);
- d. ST/AI on Review Committees (to be issued shortly);
- e. This Procurement Manual;
- f. Enterprise Risk Management and Internal Control Policy \(issued May 2011\);
- g. Anti-Fraud and Anti-Corruption Framework (ST/IC/2016/25);
- h. Delegations of Authority in the administration of the Staff Regulations and Rules and the Financial Regulations and Rules (ST/SGB/2019/2);
- i. Debrief Guidelines; and
- j. ARB Terms of Reference.

The above policies and this PM provide for, amongst others, the following risk management measures:

- a. Framework for delegation of authority in procurement (see Chapter 2.6 Procurement Authority);
- b. Identification of other critical roles in the procurement process and linkages of these roles to specific procurement training requirements;
- c. Review of procurement processes by Review Committees;
- d. Procedures for an independent internal investigation of fraud and other proscribed practices by OIOS, and mechanisms to determine sanctions for vendors;
- e. Bid protest/procurement challenge mechanisms for vendors (see Chapter 10.2.2 Debrief Procedures);
- f. Solicitation and contract templates adjusted to critical requirements, such as food, fuel, aviation, etc.;
- g. Risks in procurement can originate in any stage of the procurement process. At the procurement process level, the Requisitioner should work closely with the Procurement Official in identifying potential risks, assessing impact and probability to understand the consequences, and putting in place appropriate mitigation measures. The table below shows some examples of procurement risks, their possible consequences, and potential risk mitigation actions to be put in place.

Stage	Risk	Possible Consequences	Risk Mitigation Actions
Planning and Strategy	Delay in procuring critical requirements for the project	Delay in project outputs and outcomes, impacting other stakeholders Higher prices	Early planning of procurement processes Adoption of appropriate strategies, including usage of LTAs if appropriate
Requirements Definition	Restrictive requirements definition	Limited vendor response Claims by vendors of unfairness and lack of transparency	Improved product and market understanding through market research Include generic functional and performance specifications

Solicitation	Low interest in the procurement process	Delays (if need to re-tender) Higher prices (if perceived there is no competition)	Publish tender widely and with ample tender period Conduct pre-bid meeting
Evaluation	Selecting vendors with unethical past conduct	Damage UN reputation	Check all vendors against ineligibility lists Conduct background check on recommended vendor, prior to award
Contract Management	Failure of vendor to perform the contract	Contract disputes Inadequate quality of goods, services, or works Delays	Include adequate evaluation criteria in solicitation document Employ active contract management actions Conduct regular inspections and progress reports

15.4 Emergency Procurement Procedures

In 2016, in response to the recommendations of the High-level Independent Panel on Peace Operations, the Secretary-General established standing administrative measures for start-up and crisis situations to achieve faster deployment and more agile support to field operations. The Secretary-General, on the advice of the relevant senior officials, can activate the standing administrative measures, which apply for six months on a renewable basis, upon the establishment of a peace operation or certification of a crisis or emergency in the field. These measures are intended to enable the Organization and managers to respond quickly and accountably, as required in each specific situation, to extraordinary requirements through increased levels of delegation of authority, piggybacking on any contracts established by other Secretariat offices or other UN entities while remaining in full compliance with Regulations and Rules of the Organization.

Other mechanisms available to respond to exigent procurement situations are the personal delegation of procurement authority for emergency situations to the Director, PD in the amount of US $10 million and the application of the Financial Rule 105.16(vii) – when there is an exigency for the requirement. The personal delegation of procurement authority for emergency situations to the Director, PD needs to be activated by the ASG, OSCM or USG, DOS.

All UN procurement must be undertaken in compliance with the Financial Regulations and Rules, other relevant applicable legislative instruments, and this PM. The EPP allows the UN to use simplified processes to facilitate rapid response during an emergency situation without compromising the principles of Financial Regulation 5.12. The use of EPPs is limited to only those defined under this Chapter 15.4.

All other situations of importance and urgency must be dealt with through the application of regular procurement procedures.

Financial Regulations and Rules allow exceptions where the exigencies of UN operations do not permit procurement to be undertaken through formal methods of solicitation. However, reasonable efforts should be made during an emergency situation to still follow a process wherein several offers are compared to ensure Best Value for Money for the UN.

The EPP described in the following sections permit a solicitation process using RFQs and associated procedures.

Definition of Emergency Situation: For the purposes of this chapter, emergencies are defined as “urgent situations in which there is clear evidence that an event or a series of events has occurred which imminently threatens human life/lives or livelihoods, and where the event or a series of events produces disruption in the life of a community on an exceptional scale.” The event or a series of events can comprise any of the following:

- a. Sudden calamities such as earthquakes, floods, locust infestations, and similar unforeseen disasters;
- b. Human-made emergencies resulting in an influx of refugees or the internal displacement of populations, or in the suffering of otherwise affected populations;
- c. Drought, crop failures, pests, and diseases that result in an erosion of communities and vulnerable populations’ capacity to meet their basic needs;
- d. Sudden economic shocks, market failures, or economic collapse resulting in an erosion of communities’ and vulnerable populations’ capacity to meet their basic needs;
- e. A complex emergency for which the government of the affected country or the Head of Agency of a UN organization has requested the support of the UN;
- f. Other event(s) that, in the opinion of the ASG, OSCM or USG, DOS, would fall under the definition of a genuine emergency situation.

Approval of the Use of Emergency Delegation of Procurement Authority:

Request for approval of the activation of Special Delegation for Emergencies must be presented by the Director, PD to the ASG, OSCM and shall include the background information and justification for its use, as well as a description, approximate value, quantity, and requirements of the estimated procurement needs under the specific operation. Approval requests must also provide justification that none of the discretionary authority of the respective Procurement Approving Authority will achieve the procurement needs of the emergency operation.

The approval for use of EPP is time-bound, limited to a specific operation, and may also be limited to the procurement of defined products in relation to a specific operation. This delegation, when activated, is envisaged exclusively for the Director, PD. However, Heads of Entity are fully empowered to take action in accordance with financial rule 105.16 (a) (vii) in cases of exigency as defined by the General Assembly decision 54/468 (see section 6.11.9). Such action can be undertaken regardless of the strategic nature of the goods and/or services and, where justified by the circumstances at hand, without any prior approval.

Reporting and Monitoring:

- a. The UN monitors the use of EPP and keeps a record of its use, which will be audited regularly;
- b. The Director, PD shall submit a report of all procurement conducted under the emergency delegation of authority every week from its issuance to the ASG, OSCM with a copy to HCC Chairperson. The obligation to report every week holds even if no purchases have been executed during the previous seven calendar days. All cases exceeding the usually delegated authority of Director, PD shall be submitted to the HCC for review on an ex post facto basis;
- c. PD shall submit a report on the status of each requirement to the Requisitioners or to the Emergency Task Force (as the case may be) on a periodic basis, depending on the severity of the emergency and the reporting requirements of the Emergency Task Force or management;
- d. If there is a need to issue purchase orders and/or contracts outside of UMOJA, Procurement Officials shall record such purchase orders/contracts into a consolidated report. At the earliest of the (i) conclusion of the emergency period or (ii) when funds become available in UMOJA and upon issuance of a Shopping Cart by the Requisitioner, the Procurement Official shall issue the purchase order/contract in UMOJA.

Strategic Planning of Emergency Procurement:

By definition, emergencies are often caused by unforeseen events, and therefore procurement needs may change and cannot be anticipated. However, proactive measures can be taken to ensure preparedness to carry out emergency operations. Planning for emergencies is an important part of UN regular procurement planning. The following activities are examples of proactive measures that can facilitate EPP:

- a. Advance identification and registration of suitable vendors of products frequently requested in emergency operations, including confirmation by vendors of willingness to respond to solicitations on short notice;
- b. Development of standard specifications/TORs/SOWs for goods, services, or works typically requested in emergency operations;
- c. Establishment of LTAs with vendors of products typically requested in emergency operations, and specifying in LTAs the need for stock availability and emergency preparedness;
- d. Identification of relevant LTAs from other United Nations organizations.

PD will work continuously on the above in order to help ensure that the organization is prepared for emergency situations. To make strategic planning relevant, it is of the utmost importance that UN Procurement Officials involved in emergencies provide input and lessons learned after each emergency operation. Strategic planning measures as listed above are also relevant in certain decentralized UN offices.

15.4.1 Emergency Task Force

In all emergency situations, the business unit concerned should liaise with the Director, PD in order to guarantee early information exchange and proactive measures to be taken. Further, lessons learned should be codified, as they form crucial input to process improvements and help better the management of future emergency situations.

Emergency Procurement Procedures:

During emergency operations, Procurement Officials may alter the regular procurement procedures as outlined in this section. When faced with an emergency procurement activity, Procurement Officials should, as feasible:

- a. Conduct backward planning, i.e., plan procurement activities starting from the time the goods have to be delivered, counting backward to determine the maximum length of time required for each procurement step (solicitation, evaluation, award, contract issuance, etc.);
- b. Determine proactively the likely availability of team members for evaluation;
- c. Issue urgent notifications to relevant stakeholders involved in the process so that they can be prepared to respond faster (e.g. Chairperson of HCC, ASG OSCM, etc.).

Emergency Procurement Procedures (EPP) are less formal and offer more flexibility than the regular procurement procedures applicable in non-emergency situations. At the discretion of the Director, Procurement Division, more conservative procedures might be imposed through the issuance of written instructions to the business unit. For example, this might include requiring the transmittal of receipt of offers to a secure email address or fax number, if available.

15.4.2 Funds and Issuance of Solicitations

In emergency situations, it will often be necessary to initiate solicitation processes prior to receiving the funds. However, in emergency situations, the severe impact of delays may justify the commencement of the process prior to the confirmation of the availability of funds. The market must be informed of the UN right to cancel the solicitation and reject all offers received.

Similarly, in such situations, it may be necessary to issue purchase orders and sign contracts outside UMOJA.

Under no circumstances should an order be placed, or a contract signed prior to the confirmation of funds by the Requisitioner.

15.4.3 Needs Assessment and Requirement Definition

The assessment of the functions, performance requirements, characteristics, objectives, and/or expected outputs of the product to be procured are no less important when procured under EPP. To the extent possible, the regular procedures for requirements definition specified in Chapter 4.4 of this PM should be followed. However, since emergency procurement is often done under time constraints and the RFQ method of solicitation allows more flexibility, less formality can be accepted for requirement definition in emergency situations. The following points should be considered:

The use of brand names in requirement specifications, which is generally not allowed under the regular procedures, may be used in emergency procurement if it aids description of the required product. To avoid restricting competition, the words 'or equivalent' should be added unless a particular brand is required for standardization purposes. It should also be stated that the equivalent brand name products would be accepted. Standardization is particularly sensitive in emergencies: requirement of a specific brand might delay the delivery, while other brands could be readily available or ex-stock;

Product instructions and standard specifications/TOR previously developed and available through the UN;

Existing LTAs can provide useful specifications and should also be checked for compliance with the current need. If LTAs exist for the requested product, and the LTA can adequately cover the need in terms of stock availability and delivery times, orders should be placed against the existing LTA.

15.4.4 Sourcing

Under EPP, priority should be given to vendors experienced in supplying the UN system in emergency operations in order to reduce lead-times and the risk of contract failure. Strategic sourcing undertaken upfront by the PD should always be checked, as it could provide useful input.

For solicitations undertaken through the use of the RFQ method of solicitation, there are no specific requirements to prepare a shortlist. However, in order to comply with basic audit requirements, the procurement file must contain a brief explanation as to which vendors were considered and why.

While vendors do not have to be registered in UNGM at the Basic Level to participate in a solicitation during the emergency period, the Procurement Official shall ensure that vendors are registered in UNGM at the appropriate Level at the time of contract signature. In case where a vendor registration at the appropriate level requires Special Approval, Chief, EOS may decide to waive such review by the e-SAC and approve the registration of the vendor, considering the due diligence performed by the VRO. In particular, in cases of high-value contract, appropriate diligence shall be exercised.

Chief, EOS shall report such Special Approvals to ASG, OSCM on a weekly basis during the period of the emergency.

15.4.5 Solicitation Method

Under EPP, an RFQ may be used for the solicitation of offers, regardless of the value of the procurement, and shall be deemed to be a formal method of solicitation. Procurement Officials should ensure competition by requesting at least three quotations, if feasible.

Solicitation

- a. RFQs can be used regardless of the value of emergency procurement. When using an RFQ in emergency situations, no absolute deadline or specific template is required (except for procurement for works). However, vendors should be given a realistic timeframe to respond to the request. The request should contain enough information to enable vendors to give an informative quote, meaning all requirements should be communicated clearly and in the same manner to all vendors along with the method of evaluation. If feasible, the Director, PD or CPO, may decide that a submission deadline be set. The Director, PD or CPO may determine in their sole discretion whether the offers will be submitted through the TOC;
- b. If time allows, RFQs shall be issued by using the corporate templates, as this supports the transparency of the process by ensuring that all vendors receive the same information at the same time;
- c. Additional Considerations of RFQs under EPP:
  - i. Additional vendors may be added at any stage of the process;
  - ii. It is always advisable to check multiple markets for fallback options and to reconfirm availability before placing an order;
  - iii. The vendor offering the lowest-priced, technically acceptable offer might not be able to supply all requested goods or the full quantity requested. Therefore, the possibility and option to make split orders should always be made clear in an RFQ for emergencies. Split orders can ensure availability of all requested items and safeguard economy by placing a partial order with the vendor offering the lowest price for the respective item. In cases where the full quantity requested cannot be provided by one vendor, an additional order can be placed with the vendor offering the second-lowest priced.

Tender Opening Procedures:

- a. Bid/proposals submissions: Depending on the situation, the UN may decide to only solicit submissions of bid and proposals via electronic means. This may be implemented in one or more offices depending on the emergency. The solicitation documents issued by Procurement Officials of the UN Secretariat will identify such mode of submission. In such case the UN will only accept such submissions received via electronic means.

- b. Public Bid (Tender) Openings: Depending on the situation, the UN may decide to cancel all public bid openings. In such case upon request from vendors who submitted bids as a result of Invitation to Bids, the UN will provide the Bid Abstract Sheet (which includes the List of Vendors who submitted bids and the total price of their bids) within 30 days from the date of the Tender opening via email to pdbidsubmission@un.org. Similarly, upon request from vendors who submitted proposals as a result of a Request for Proposals, the UN will provide the List of Vendors who submitted proposals within 30 days from the date of the Tender opening via email to pdbidsubmission@un.org.

Evaluation:

- a. Offers received based on an RFQ during an emergency operation should be assessed against the requirements stated in the RFQ. At least two (2) individuals should be involved in the evaluation of offers, one on the technical side and a Procurement Official on the financial side. Contracts are awarded according to the 'lowest-priced, technically acceptable offer' evaluation methodology, and an evaluation report should be prepared. When using this methodology, price serves as the overriding evaluation criterion upon which to award a contract.
- b. However:
  - i. The technical advantages offered by a higher-priced quotation may in certain cases justify the selection of an offer other than the lowest priced;
  - ii. Further, the RFQ modality allows selection of the most technically acceptable offer in cases where none of the offers fully meet the requirement specification (where regular formal methods of solicitation would require retendering);
- c. The selection of a vendor other than the one offering the lowest priced option requires proper justification be documented and kept on file. See Chapter 8 Evaluation of Submissions for further guidance. The following points should be considered:
  - i. Whilst evaluation is conducted according to the 'lowest-priced, technically acceptable' methodology, and no exact evaluation criteria should be determined in the RFQ, Procurement Officials still have an obligation to present all vendors with the same information regarding UN requirements, delivery dates, and any other factors that will be assessed during evaluation and selection;
  - ii. With a lack of firm evaluation criteria, particular emphasis should be placed on creating a written record of the evaluation process and the justification for vendor selection;
  - iii. The evaluation team shall have the right, for reasons of expediency and subject to equal treatment of bidders, to decide not to ask bidders for missing documents;
  - iv. Given the time constraints and thus limited extent to which background checks can be performed, Procurement Officials may request performance security from the vendor. The willingness of bidders to provide performance security is a positive indication regarding the financial position of the company. This is not a mandatory requirement;
  - v. RFQs issued during an emergency operation constitute a formal method of solicitation. Hence, negotiations can be undertaken with a potential vendor, after selection of the vendor and in accordance with Chapter 8.9 Negotiations.

15.4.6 Award

The Procurement Approving Authority with the delegated authority (DOA) for the value of the procurement activity (see Chapter 2.6.1 Delegation of Authority) will award contracts further to an EPP activity. Where the ASG, OSCM or USG, DOS has granted authorization to use EPP, the use of an RFQ process shall be deemed to constitute a 'formal method of solicitation' for the purposes of Financial Rule 105.15. The resulting award to the winning offer is made on the basis of the use of formal methods of solicitation and respective DOA thresholds for awards apply.

15.4.7 Contracts

Due to the risk involved, the procedures for contract preparation and issuance, as well as contract administration, remain the same as under normal conditions. Standard UN Forms of Contracts are used when contracting vendors during emergency operations. The UN requires written contracts to be signed for all procurement activities with values equal to or above US $2,500.

The UN never enters into oral contracts. Each UN contract must be in writing and duly signed by the parties, as set forth in this manual. Care must be taken to avoid exposing the UN to the risk of inadvertently entering into a binding oral agreement (see Chapter 11 Contract Finalization and Issuance and Contractual Instruments).

15.4.8 Contract Administration

Contract administration of emergency contracts is a combined responsibility of the procuring unit and the personnel responsible for emergency operations (see Chapter 13 Contract Management and Contract Administration for further guidance).

Proper documentation of the procurement process in a procurement file is a requirement for each procurement exercise. The use of the EPP allows more flexibility in the procurement process than UN regular procedures. This increases the responsibility of Procurement Officials, as well as involved managers, to document that the procurement has been conducted consistent with the procurement principles and in accordance with the Financial Regulations and Rules. Procurement Officials are reminded that proper filing also protects the individual undertaking the procurement activity from undue suspicion and ensures that actions can be justified to auditors.

In order to document the EPP and to justify decisions and choices made when selecting the vendor and awarding contract, all steps in the process must be documented in the procurement file. In the event of a dispute, the file is critical: it documents the procedure, establishes an institutional memory, forms the basis of a lessons learned process, and is essential for audit purposes.

Please refer to Chapter 13.9 Maintenance of Files for filing requirements. In addition to documents identified therein, for processes under EPP, the file should also include the request for approval, as well as approval of the use of EPP.

16. Glossary

This section contains a glossary of relevant terms within this procurement manual. Terms in the glossary that have a commonly used abbreviation in this manual are marked with an asterisk (*) and defined in the Abbreviations table below.

Accountability	The obligation to:  a) Demonstrate that work has been conducted in accordance with agreed rules and standards; b) Report fairly and accurately on performance results vis-à-vis mandated roles and/or plans.
Acquisition Plan	The work plan regulating the acquisition activities over the course of a year.
Acquisition Process	The steps necessary to acquire goods and services, inter alia, through identification and development of requirements, planning, budgeting, conducting solicitations, obtaining approvals, entering into contract negotiations and carrying out contract fulfilment.
Administrative Instruction (AI)*	An administrative instrument used by the UN to establish instructions, procedures, and business process maps for implementation of superior United Nations legislation applicable to the UN.
Award Review Board (ARB)	The Award Review Board is a UN administrative board which independently reviews complaints by unsuccessful bidders who challenge contracts awards made by the UN.
Audit Trail	Clear and concise documentation in a suitable format, normally a written log, describing the actions and decisions taken throughout the handling of a case, thereby enabling a reviewer of the case to establish that it has been handled in accordance with the applicable regulations, rules and procedures.
Authorized Official	An individual who has been delegated procurement authority and who is overall responsible for the procurement function of an entity, either at Headquarters or other locations. This may be a head of the entity or head of a department.
Award	The authorization given by an Authorized Official following Review Committees recommendation or by a Procurement Approving Authority, as applicable, to establish a commitment.
Bank Guarantee for Advance Payment	An unconditional and on-demand bank guarantee from the contractor to the UN for advance payment enabling the contractor to commence works. Such advances arrive at first interim payment.

Bank Guarantee for Performance	A bank guarantee obtained from the contractor to protect the UN from non-performance by the contractor of its contractual obligations. It is a promise from a bank that it will pay the UN the amount of the guarantee if the contractor fails to perform any of the terms, provisions, or conditions of the contract.
Best Value for Money	The optimization of total cost of ownership and quality needed to meet the user's requirements, while taking into consideration potential risk factors and resources available.
Best and Final Offer (BAFO)*	A negotiation tool that can be used during the final evaluation phase of the procurement process.
Bid/Proposal/Offer	a) An offer in response to a method of solicitation; b) A response to a solicitation from a vendor or supplier
Bid Security (Bid Bond)	A security from a supplier securing obligations, resulting from a Submission with the intention to avoid (i) the withdrawal or modification of an offer after the deadline for submission of such documents, (ii) failure to sign the contract or failure to provide the required security for the performance of the contract after an offer has been accepted, or (iii) failure to comply with any other conditions precedent to signing the contract specified in the solicitation documents.
Bidder/Proposer/Offeror	An entity that submits an offer in response to a solicitation. Normally, the term 'bidder' is used to refer to the entity responding to an EOI, RFI, ITB, RFQ, or RFP.
Bid Protest/Procurement Challenge	A post-award complaint against the methods employed or decisions made by the UN in a process leading to the award of a contract.
Bill of Lading	A carrier's contract and receipt for goods; it agrees to transport from one place to another and to deliver to a designated recipient (consignee).
Blanket Purchase Order (BPO) *	BPOs are typically issued at the local level to satisfy straightforward, low-value, and recurring operational requirements of a support nature.
Business Partner (BP)	A person or an organization that has a business interest with the UN. A BP can be a commercial vendor that supplies goods and/or services to the UN but also a UN agency, Member or staff members, etc.
Call-Off Orders/Purchase Orders	Orders against an established long-term agreement.
Cartel	A small group of competing producers/suppliers of a good or a service who agree to regulate the production, price, and/or marketing in an effort to control or manipulate the market.

Catalogue	An organized list of goods or services specifying the description, price, unit of measure, and other attributes. A catalogue may be available as a document or in an electronic format.
Certifying Officer (CO)	See Financial Rule 105.5. The CO is the UN official responsible for managing the utilization of resources, in accordance with the purposes for which those resources were approved and the principles of efficiency, effectiveness and the Financial Regulations and Rules. CO review the requests issued by the Requisitioner, ensure that the technical specifications are generic and that funds are available for the procurement. Certifying authority and responsibility are assigned on a personal basis and cannot be delegated. A CO cannot exercise the approving function under Financial Rule 105.6.
Closing Date	The deadline for all bid/proposal submissions.
Collaborative Procurement/Common Procurement	A procurement arrangement in which several UN organizations combine their efforts to undertake procurement in cooperation or share the outcome of a procurement process, thereby achieving benefits for the group in its entirety. The objective of collaborative procurement is to achieve reduced price or better service through economies of scale and to reduce inefficiency and duplication across the UN organizations.
Commitment	The anticipated or contingent liability against funds allocated for the current or future year(s).
Competitive Bidding	A procurement method in which offers from competing suppliers are invited by open advertisement and provided with the scope, specifications, and terms and conditions of the proposed contract, as well as the criteria by which the offers will be evaluated. The objectives of competitive bidding are to obtain goods or services at the lowest cost or best value through open and fair competition.
Contract	In the context of UN procurement, a contract is a written, legally-binding agreement between the organization and a supplier that establishes the terms and conditions, including the rights and obligations of the organization and the supplier. A contract may take many different forms (e.g. agreement, purchase order, memorandum of understanding, letters of assist).
Contract Administration	All actions undertaken after the award of a contract relating to the administrative aspects of the contract, such as contract amendment, contract closure, record retention, maintenance of the contract file, handling disputes or claims, and handling of security instruments (e.g. performance security).

Contract Management	The ongoing monitoring and management of the supplier's performance regarding the promised goods or services, as well as assuring compliance with all other terms and conditions of a contract, such as a price and discounts. It includes managing the relationship between the supplier, the procuring unit, the requisitioner, and/or the end-user, as well as feedback to the supplier regarding its performance if necessary.
Contract Modification	Any written change in the terms of the contract. Contract modifications only become effective when executed in writing by both parties through a contract amendment.
Contractor	Any party to a procurement contract with the organization. A contractor may take various forms, including an individual person, a company (whether privately or publicly held), a partnership, or a government agency.
Cost Estimate	An approximate calculation of charges or costs to supply goods and/or services.
Default	A failure by a contracting party to meet one or more of its obligations under the contract.
Delegation of Authority (DOA)*	The written instruments stating the conditions, procedures, and terms for a delegate to exercise authority in the respective area.
Delivery Time	The time taken to deliver goods from the date of order to the time when the supplier makes the goods available to the buyer at the agreed place as per the delivery terms.
Disposal	The process of removing something from a location, typically the removal of scrap, surplus, excess, obsolete and waste items from an organization's premises.
E-tendering	Electronic procurement that occurs when the activities of the purchasing process are conducted electronically, typically over the Internet, to shorten the cycle time and lower the transaction costs of the acquisition process.
Exigency	An exceptional, compelling, and emergent need or situation of force majeure, not resulting from poor planning or management or from concerns over the availability of funds, that will lead to serious damage, loss, or injury to property or persons, if not addressed immediately.
Expression of Interest (EOI)*	A response to a Request for Expression of Interest (REOI) expressing interest in participating in a solicitation.

Incoterms	Incoterms rules are standardized and widely-recognized trade terms, prepared by the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC), to be included in contracts for the sale of goods and to provide standard contractual provisions that clarify the costs, risks, and responsibilities of the parties to the contract, particularly in relation to the shipment and delivery of the goods from sellers to buyers. Refer to the ICC website ( www.iccwbo.org ) for more information about these terms and their definitions, which are copyrighted by the ICC.
Internal Control	A process carried out by the UN's management and other personnel, designed to provide reasonable assurance regarding robust risk management and the achievement of objectives and goals. This process aims to increase the effectiveness and efficiency of operations, the reliability of financial reporting, and compliance with applicable laws and regulations.
Invitation to Bid (ITB)*	A formal method of solicitation where prospective suppliers are requested to submit a bid for the provision of goods or services. An ITB is normally used when the requirements are clearly and completely specified and the basis for the award is the lowest cost.
Invoice	Supplier's demand for payment setting out the amount for payment by the buyer with respect to goods delivered or services rendered.
Lease	A contract whereby, in return for a payment or series of payments, the lessor conveys to the lessee the right to use an asset for an agreed-upon period of time. There are two types of leases, namely, (i) a finance lease, which transfers substantially all risks and rewards incident to ownership of an asset while the title may or may not be eventually transferred, and (ii) an operating lease, which is a lease other than a finance lease.
Legal Obligation	An obligation that derives from:  a) A contract (through its explicit or implicit terms); b) Legislation;/or c) Other operation of law.
Liability	Any obligation incurred as a result of law, rule, or agreement; being legally obliged and responsible; a debt or an obligation to another party.
Life Cycle Cost/Whole Life Cost/Total Cost of Ownership	The sum of all recurring and one-time (non-recurring) costs over the full life span or specified period of a good, service, structure, or system. It includes purchase price, installation cost, operating costs, maintenance and upgrade costs, and remaining residual or salvage value at the end of ownership or its useful life.

Logistics	The process of planning, implementing and controlling the efficient, cost-effective flow and storage of goods and related information from point of origin to point of consumption for the purpose of conforming to customer requirements.
Long-Term Agreement (LTA)*	A written agreement between an organization of the United Nations system and a supplier that is established for a defined period of time for specific goods or services at prescribed prices or pricing provisions.
Offer/Submission	A generic term for bids, quotations, and proposals received from a supplier in response to solicitation documents.
Price Escalation	The practice of having a mechanism to increase unit prices throughout the contract life that should reflect inflation, usually on large contracts in areas with significant inflation.
Procurement	The acquisition by purchase or lease of goods, services, real property, and works.
Procurement Approving Authority	A Procurement Official who has been formally delegated authority for procurement (DOA) and will be referred to as a Procurement Approving Authority, up to their level of delegated authority.
Procurement Authority	The delegation from the Secretary-General to Heads of Entity and other appropriate officials to perform procurement functions.
Procurement Official	Procurement staff dedicated for procuring goods and services, with proper training, knowledge, and experience, or administrative staff with the appropriate procurement expertise, training, and qualification, if approved by the ASG, OSCM.
Procuring Agent	Another UN Secretariat entity that may be assigned by the USG, DOS in consultation with USG, DMSPC and the head of entity, to undertake procurement on the entity's behalf if the entity does not have sufficient procurement capacity.
Product	The use of the word 'product' in the context of this manual is used to cover goods, works, and services.
Proposal	An offer in response to an RFP.
Purchase Order (PO)*	A type of contract that documents the purchase of goods and/or services.

Quotation	An offer in response to a Request For Quotation. However, if it is in response to an enquiry, it is simply a statement of price and availability.
Request for Expression of Interest (REOI)*	An advertisement to identify suppliers that wish to participate in a forthcoming solicitation (see also 'expression of interest (EOI)').
Request for Information (RFI)*	An instrument to conduct a market survey in order to obtain information from the market that can be used to identify potential vendors, as well as available or potential solutions for fulfilling identified needs that may also include information on cost and delivery time.
Request for Proposal (RFP)*	A formal method of solicitation where prospective suppliers are requested to submit a proposal for the provision of goods, works, or services, based on the specifications, statement of work (SOW), or terms of reference (TOR) included in the solicitation documents. An RFP is normally used in cases where the requirements are complex and/or cannot be clearly or completely specified, where detailed technical evaluations are to be performed, and/or where pricing or cost may not be the sole basis of the award.
Request for Quotation (RFQ)*	An informal method of solicitation whereby suppliers are requested to submit a quotation for the provision of goods or services. An RFQ is normally used for standard, off-the-shelf items where the value of the procurement falls below the established threshold for formal methods of solicitation.
Requisition/Shopping Cart	A written or computerized request from an internal user/customer for the fulfilment or procurement of goods, services, or works.
Requisitioner	A UN staff initiating a purchase requisition (i.e., a request for goods, works or services).
Review Committees*	HCC and LCCs are committees (committees on contracts) to review procurement processes, thus verifying whether procurement has been undertaken in accordance with established procedures and in line with the Financial Regulations and Rules.
Sealed Offer	An offer that has been submitted in a sealed envelope to prevent its contents from being revealed or known before the deadline for the submission and opening of all offers.
Security Instruments	Financial instruments that are intended to provide the UN with security against expenses and losses that result from a failure by a supplier to perform its obligations. They are intended to ensure that funding is available to compensate the UN for such failure and are not intended as a punishment. The main security instruments are (i) bid security and (ii) performance security. Security can take the form of bank guarantees, surety bonds, standby letters of credit, and cheques on which a bank is primarily liable.

Segregation of Duties	An internal control mechanism used to assure that no single individual or organizational unit is given responsibility for more than one related function.
Solicitation	Generic term for a request to vendors to offer a quotation, bid, or proposal.
Solicitation Documents	Documents issued by the UN to describe procurement requirements and to invite vendors to submit a bid, quotation, or proposal.
Solicitation Method	The method used to solicit offers from vendors. ITB, RFP, RFQ, and LVAs are methods of solicitation.
Source Selection Plan (SSP)*	The SSP describes critical components of the procurement process and provides justification for the decision in order to achieve Best Value for Money. It provides an objective approach to the methodology of selecting the best source to fulfil the established need.
Sourcing	The process of identifying suitable suppliers that could provide the required products or services for the acquiring organization.
Specifications	A description of the technical requirements for a material, product, or service. Specifications usually refer to the defined requirements for materials or products but can also relate to the requirements for services (terms of reference (TOR)).
Standardization	The process of agreeing on a standard specification for a specific product or line of products. This is usually conducted to achieve economies of scale, compatibility with other products, facilitation of operation, maintenance and repair of already purchased goods, etc. Standardization could result in sole or limited source situations; this should be a consideration in the decision for standardization.
Statement of Award	A written record of the basis on which an award was made.
Statement of Work (SOW)*	Requirement specifications for work assignments outlining the specific services a contractor is expected to perform, generally indicating the type, level, and quality of service, as well as the time schedule required.
Submission	Along with 'offer', this is a generic term for bids, quotations, and proposals received from a supplier in response to solicitation documents.

Supplier/Vendor	An entity that potentially or actually provides goods or other products (including intellectual property), services, and/or works to the organization. For the purpose of this manual, the terms 'supplier' and 'vendor' are considered equivalent and used interchangeably.
Tender	A term for bids, quotations, and proposals received from a supplier in response to solicitation documents.
Tender Opening Committee /Member	The committee or TOC member who has been delegated authority to receive and open submissions.
Terms of Reference (TOR)*	A description of the scope of work for services generally indicating the work to be performed, the level of quality and effort, the timeline, and the deliverables.
UMOJA	UN Secretariat ERP system.
United Nations General Terms and Conditions of Contract (UNGCC)*	The UN general conditions of contract (sometimes referred to as 'general terms and conditions') are a set of standard contractual provisions that are incorporated into virtually every commercial contract that the UN, including its funds and programmes, concludes. The general conditions of contract cover a range of issues, including the contractor's status vis-à-vis the Organization, the use of sub-contractors, indemnification, intellectual property rights, use of the name, emblem or seal of the United Nations, termination and events of force majeure, dispute settlement, privileges and immunities, standards of conduct, and amendments.
United Nations Global Compact	Voluntary international corporate citizenship network initiated by the Secretary-General to support the participation of both the private sector and other social actors; the UN Global Compact aims to advance responsible corporate citizenship and universal social and environmental principles to meet the challenges of globalization. It is based on 10 principles related to human rights, labour, environment, and anti-corruption. See http://www.unglobalcompact.org for more information.
United Nations Global Marketplace (UNGM)*	Internet portal used by more than twenty-five (25) United Nations agencies, including the UN Secretariat. The UNGM includes, among other types of information, tender notices and an inter-agency vendor registration system. See http://www.ungm.org for more information.
UNSPSC*	The United Nations Standard Products and Services Code, a coding system for classifying products (e.g. goods, works and services).
UNCITRAL*	The United Nations Commission on International Trade Law.

Vendor	See definition of 'supplier' above.
Vendor Registration Officer (VRO)	The staff that are responsible for evaluating vendor registration applications, creating and maintaining vendor records, and providing support service to the UN Secretariat for matters involving vendor registration.
Warranty	An assurance (expressed or implied) by the supplier that the material, product, or workmanship being sold is as represented or promised (e.g. free of defects or will be repaired or replaced free of charge) or according to conditions set out in the warranty.

[on the report of the Sixth Committee (A/66/471)]

66/95. United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Public Procurement

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 2205 (XXI) of 17 December 1966, by which it established the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law with the purpose of furthering the progressive harmonization and unification of the law of international trade in the interests of all peoples, in particular those of developing countries,

Noting that procurement constitutes a significant portion of public expenditure in most States,

Recalling its resolution 49/54 of 9 December 1994 recommending the use of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Procurement of Goods, Construction and Services,<sup>1</sup>

Observing that the 1994 Model Law, which has become an important international benchmark in procurement law reform, sets out procedures aimed at achieving competition, transparency, fairness, economy and efficiency in the procurement process,

Observing also that, despite the widely recognized value of the 1994 Model Law, new issues and practices have arisen since its adoption that have justified revision of the text,

Recognizing that at its thirty-seventh session, in 2004, the Commission agreed that the 1994 Model Law would benefit from being updated to reflect new practices, in particular those resulting from the use of electronic communications in public procurement, and the experience gained in the use of the 1994 Model Law as a basis for law reform, not departing, however, from the basic principles behind it and not modifying the provisions whose usefulness had been proved,

Noting that the revisions to the 1994 Model Law were the subject of due deliberation and extensive consultations with Governments and interested international organizations, and that thus it can be expected that the revised Model Law, to be called the “United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Public Procurement”, would be acceptable to States with different legal, social and economic systems,

Noting also that the revised Model Law is expected to contribute significantly to the establishment of a harmonized and modern legal framework for public procurement that promotes economy, efficiency and competition in procurement and, at the same time, fosters integrity, confidence, fairness and transparency in the procurement process,

Convinced that the revised Model Law will significantly assist all States, in particular developing countries and countries with economies in transition, in enhancing their existing procurement laws and formulating procurement laws where none presently exist, and will lead to the development of harmonious international economic relations and increased economic development,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law for developing and adopting the draft United Nations Commission on International Trade Law Model Law on Public Procurement;<sup>2</sup>
2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the text of the Model Law to Governments and other interested bodies;
3. Recommends that all States use the Model Law in assessing their legal regimes for public procurement and give favourable consideration to the Model Law when they enact or revise their laws;
4. Calls for closer cooperation and coordination among the Commission and other international organs and organizations, including regional organizations, active in the field of procurement law reform, in order to avoid undesirable duplication of efforts and inconsistent, incoherent or conflicting results in the modernization and harmonization of public procurement law;
5. Endorses the efforts and initiatives of the secretariat of the Commission aimed at increasing the coordination of, and cooperation on, legal activities concerned with public procurement reform.

UNCITRAL Model Law on Public Procurement

(United Nations document, A/66/17, annex I)

(As adopted by the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law on 1 July 2011)

Preamble

WHEREAS the [Government] [Parliament] of ... considers it desirable to regulate procurement so as to promote the objectives of:

- (a) Maximizing economy and efficiency in procurement;
- (b) Fostering and encouraging participation in procurement proceedings by suppliers and contractors regardless of nationality, thereby promoting international trade;
- (c) Promoting competition among suppliers and contractors for the supply of the subject matter of the procurement;
- (d) Providing for the fair, equal and equitable treatment of all suppliers and contractors;
- (e) Promoting the integrity of, and fairness and public confidence in, the procurement process;
- (f) Achieving transparency in the procedures relating to procurement.

Be it therefore enacted as follows:

CHAPTER I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1. Scope of application

This Law applies to all public procurement.

Article 2. Definitions

For the purposes of this Law:

(a) “Currency” includes the monetary unit of account;

(b) “Direct solicitation” means solicitation addressed directly to one supplier or contractor or a restricted number of suppliers or contractors. This excludes solicitation addressed to a limited number of suppliers or contractors following pre-qualification or pre-selection proceedings;

(c) “Domestic procurement” means procurement limited to domestic suppliers or contractors pursuant to article 8 of this Law;

(d) “Electronic reverse auction” means an online real-time purchasing technique utilized by the procuring entity to select the successful submission, which involves the presentation by suppliers or contractors of successively lowered bids during a scheduled period of time and the automatic evaluation of bids;

(e) “Framework agreement procedure” means a procedure conducted in two stages: a first stage to select a supplier (or suppliers) or a contractor (or contractors) to be a party (or parties) to a framework agreement with a procuring entity, and a second stage to award a procurement contract under the framework agreement to a supplier or contractor party to the framework agreement:

- (i) “Framework agreement” means an agreement between the procuring entity and the selected supplier (or suppliers) or contractor (or contractors) concluded upon completion of the first stage of the framework agreement procedure;
- (ii) “Closed framework agreement” means a framework agreement to which no supplier or contractor that is not initially a party to the framework agreement may subsequently become a party;
- (iii) “Open framework agreement” means a framework agreement to which a supplier (or suppliers) or a contractor (or contractors) in addition to the initial parties may subsequently become a party or parties;
- (iv) “Framework agreement procedure with second-stage competition” means a procedure under an open framework agreement or a closed framework agreement with more than one supplier or contractor in which certain terms and conditions of the procurement that cannot be established with sufficient precision when the framework agreement is concluded are to be established or refined through a second-stage competition;

- (v) “Framework agreement procedure without second-stage competition” means a procedure under a closed framework agreement in which all terms and conditions of the procurement are established when the framework agreement is concluded;
- (f) “Pre-qualification” means the procedure set out in article 18 of this Law to identify, prior to solicitation, suppliers or contractors that are qualified;
- (g) “Pre-qualification documents” means documents issued by the procuring entity under article 18 of this Law that set out the terms and conditions of the pre-qualification proceedings;
- (h) “Pre-selection” means the procedure set out in paragraph 3 of article 49 of this Law to identify, prior to solicitation, a limited number of suppliers or contractors that best meet the qualification criteria for the procurement concerned;
- (i) “Pre-selection documents” means documents issued by the procuring entity under paragraph 3 of article 49 of this Law that set out the terms and conditions of the pre-selection proceedings;
- (j) “Procurement” or “public procurement” means the acquisition of goods, construction or services by a procuring entity;
- (k) “Procurement contract” means a contract concluded between the procuring entity and a supplier (or suppliers) or a contractor (or contractors) at the end of the procurement proceedings;
- (l) “Procurement involving classified information” means procurement in which the procuring entity may be authorized by the procurement regulations or by other provisions of law of this State to take measures and impose requirements for the protection of classified information;
- (m) “Procurement regulations” means regulations enacted in accordance with article 4 of this Law;
- (n) “Procuring entity” means:

Option I

- (i) Any governmental department, agency, organ or other unit, or any subdivision or multiplicity thereof, that engages in procurement, except ...; [and]

Option II

- (i) Any department, agency, organ or other unit, or any subdivision or multiplicity thereof, of the [Government] [other term used to refer to the national Government of the enacting State] that engages in procurement, except ...; [and]

- (ii) [The enacting State may insert in this subparagraph and, if necessary, in subsequent subparagraphs other entities or enterprises, or categories thereof, to be included in the definition of “procuring entity”];

(o) “Socio-economic policies” means environmental, social, economic and other policies of this State authorized or required by the procurement regulations or other provisions of law of this State to be taken into account by the procuring entity in the procurement proceedings. [The enacting State may expand this subparagraph by providing an illustrative list of such policies.];

(p) “Solicitation” means an invitation to tender, present submissions or participate in request-for-proposals proceedings or an electronic reverse auction;

(q) “Solicitation document” means a document issued by the procuring entity, including any amendments thereto, that sets out the terms and conditions of the given procurement;

(r) “Standstill period” means the period starting from the dispatch of a notice as required by paragraph 2 of article 22 of this Law, during which the procuring entity cannot accept the successful submission and during which suppliers or contractors can challenge, under chapter VIII of this Law, the decision so notified;

(s) “A submission (or submissions)” means a tender (or tenders), a proposal (or proposals), an offer (or offers), a quotation (or quotations) and a bid (or bids) referred to collectively or generically, including, where the context so requires, an initial or indicative submission (or submissions);

(t) “Supplier or contractor” means, according to the context, any potential party or any party to the procurement proceedings with the procuring entity;

(u) “Tender security” means a security required from suppliers or contractors by the procuring entity and provided to the procuring entity to secure the fulfilment of any obligation referred to in paragraph 1 (f) of article 17 of this Law and includes such arrangements as bank guarantees, surety bonds, standby letters of credit, cheques for which a bank is primarily liable, cash deposits, promissory notes and bills of exchange. For the avoidance of doubt, the term excludes any security for the performance of the contract.

Article 3. International obligations of [this State] relating to procurement [and intergovernmental agreements within [this State]]<sup>3</sup>

To the extent that this Law conflicts with an obligation of this State under or arising out of any:

(a) Treaty or other form of agreement to which it is a party with one or more other States; [or]

(b) Agreement entered into by this State with an intergovernmental international financing institution[,] [; or]

[(c) Agreement between the federal Government of [name of federal State] and any subdivision or subdivisions of [name of federal State] or between any two or more such subdivisions,] the requirements of the treaty or agreement shall prevail, but in all other respects the procurement shall be governed by this Law.

Article 4. Procurement regulations

The [name of the organ or authority authorized to promulgate the procurement regulations] is authorized to promulgate procurement regulations to fulfil the objectives and to implement the provisions of this Law.

Article 5. Publication of legal texts

1. This Law, the procurement regulations and other legal texts of general application in connection with procurement covered by this Law, and all amendments thereto, shall be promptly made accessible to the public and systematically maintained.

2. Judicial decisions and administrative rulings with precedent value in connection with procurement covered by this Law shall be made available to the public.

Article 6. Information on possible forthcoming procurement

1. Procuring entities may publish information regarding planned procurement activities for forthcoming months or years.

2. Procuring entities may also publish an advance notice of possible future procurement.

3. Publication under this article does not constitute a solicitation, does not oblige the procuring entity to issue a solicitation and does not confer any rights on suppliers or contractors.

Article 7. Communications in procurement

1. Any document, notification, decision or other information generated in the course of a procurement and communicated as required by this Law, including in connection with challenge proceedings under chapter VIII or in the course of a meeting, or forming part of the record of procurement proceedings under article 25 of this Law shall be in a form that provides a record of the content of the information and that is accessible so as to be usable for subsequent reference.
2. Direct solicitation and communication of information between suppliers or contractors and the procuring entity referred to in article 16, paragraph 1 (d) of article 17, paragraphs 6 and 9 of article 18, paragraph 2 (a) of article 41 and paragraphs 2 to 4 of article 50 of this Law may be made by means that do not provide a record of the content of the information, on the condition that immediately thereafter confirmation of the communication is given to the recipient of the communication in a form that provides a record of the content of the information and that is accessible so as to be usable for subsequent reference.
3. The procuring entity, when first soliciting the participation of suppliers or contractors in the procurement proceedings, shall specify:
  - (a) Any requirement of form;
  - (b) In procurement involving classified information, if the procuring entity considers it necessary, measures and requirements needed to ensure the protection of classified information at the requisite level;
  - (c) The means to be used to communicate information by or on behalf of the procuring entity to a supplier or contractor or to any person, or by a supplier or contractor to the procuring entity or other entity acting on its behalf;
  - (d) The means to be used to satisfy all requirements under this Law for information to be in writing or for a signature; and
  - (e) The means to be used to hold any meeting of suppliers or contractors.
4. The procuring entity may use only those means of communication that are in common use by suppliers or contractors in the context of the particular procurement. In any meeting held with suppliers or contractors, the procuring entity shall use only those means that ensure in addition that suppliers or contractors can fully and contemporaneously participate in the meeting.
5. The procuring entity shall put in place appropriate measures to secure the authenticity, integrity and confidentiality of information concerned.

Article 8. Participation by suppliers or contractors

1. Suppliers or contractors shall be permitted to participate in procurement proceedings without regard to nationality, except where the procuring entity decides to limit participation in procurement proceedings on the basis of nationality on grounds specified in the procurement regulations or other provisions of law of this State.
2. Except when authorized or required to do so by the procurement regulations or other provisions of law of this State, the procuring entity shall establish no other requirement aimed at limiting the participation of suppliers or contractors in procurement proceedings that discriminates against or among suppliers or contractors or against categories thereof.
3. The procuring entity, when first soliciting the participation of suppliers or contractors in the procurement proceedings, shall declare whether the participation of suppliers or contractors in the procurement proceedings is limited pursuant to this article and on which ground. Any such declaration may not later be altered.
4. A procuring entity that decides to limit the participation of suppliers or contractors in procurement proceedings pursuant to this article shall include in the record of the procurement proceedings a statement of the reasons and circumstances on which it relied.
5. The procuring entity shall make available to any person, upon request, its reasons for limiting the participation of suppliers or contractors in the procurement proceedings pursuant to this article.

Article 9. Qualifications of suppliers and contractors

1. This article applies to the ascertainment by the procuring entity of the qualifications of suppliers or contractors at any stage of the procurement proceedings.
2. Suppliers or contractors shall meet such of the following criteria as the procuring entity considers appropriate and relevant in the circumstances of the particular procurement:
  - (a) That they have the necessary professional, technical and environmental qualifications, professional and technical competence, financial resources, equipment and other physical facilities, managerial capability, reliability, experience and personnel to perform the procurement contract;

- (b) That they meet ethical and other standards applicable in this State;
- (c) That they have the legal capacity to enter into the procurement contract;
- (d) That they are not insolvent, in receivership, bankrupt or being wound up, their affairs are not being administered by a court or a judicial officer, their business activities have not been suspended and they are not the subject of legal proceedings for any of the foregoing;
- (e) That they have fulfilled their obligations to pay taxes and social security contributions in this State;
- (f) That they have not, and their directors or officers have not, been convicted of any criminal offence related to their professional conduct or the making of false statements or misrepresentations as to their qualifications to enter into a procurement contract within a period of ... years [the enacting State specifies the period of time] preceding the commencement of the procurement proceedings, or have not been otherwise disqualified pursuant to administrative suspension or debarment proceedings.

3. Subject to the right of suppliers or contractors to protect their intellectual property or trade secrets, the procuring entity may require suppliers or contractors participating in procurement proceedings to provide appropriate documentary evidence or other information to satisfy itself that the suppliers or contractors are qualified in accordance with the criteria referred to in paragraph 2 of this article.

4. Any requirement established pursuant to this article shall be set out in the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, and in the solicitation documents and shall apply equally to all suppliers or contractors. A procuring entity shall impose no criterion, requirement or procedure with respect to the qualifications of suppliers or contractors other than those provided for in this Law.

5. The procuring entity shall evaluate the qualifications of suppliers or contractors in accordance with the qualification criteria and procedures set out in the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, and in the solicitation documents.

6. Other than any criterion, requirement or procedure that may be imposed by the procuring entity in accordance with article 8 of this Law, the procuring entity shall establish no criterion, requirement or procedure with respect to the qualifications of suppliers or contractors that discriminates against or among suppliers or contractors or against categories thereof, or that is not objectively justifiable.

7. Notwithstanding paragraph 6 of this article, the procuring entity may require the legalization of documentary evidence provided by the supplier or contractor presenting the successful submission so as to demonstrate its qualifications for the particular procurement. In doing so, the procuring entity shall not impose any requirements as to the legalization of the documentary evidence other than those provided for in the laws of this State relating to the legalization of documents of the type in question.

8. (a) The procuring entity shall disqualify a supplier or contractor if it finds at any time that the information submitted concerning the qualifications of the supplier or contractor was false or constituted a misrepresentation;

(b) A procuring entity may disqualify a supplier or contractor if it finds at any time that the information submitted concerning the qualifications of the supplier or contractor was materially inaccurate or materially incomplete;

(c) Other than in a case to which subparagraph (a) of this paragraph applies, a procuring entity may not disqualify a supplier or contractor on the ground that information submitted concerning the qualifications of the supplier or contractor was inaccurate or incomplete in a non-material respect. The supplier or contractor may, however, be disqualified if it fails to remedy such deficiencies promptly upon request by the procuring entity;

(d) The procuring entity may require a supplier or contractor that was pre-qualified in accordance with article 18 of this Law to demonstrate its qualifications again in accordance with the same criteria used to pre-qualify such supplier or contractor. The procuring entity shall disqualify any supplier or contractor that fails to demonstrate its qualifications again if requested to do so. The procuring entity shall promptly notify each supplier or contractor requested to demonstrate its qualifications again as to whether or not the supplier or contractor has done so to the satisfaction of the procuring entity.

Article 10. Rules concerning description of the subject matter of the procurement and the terms and conditions of the procurement contract or framework agreement

1. (a) The pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, shall set out a description of the subject matter of the procurement;

(b) The procuring entity shall set out in the solicitation documents the detailed description of the subject matter of the procurement that it will use in the examination of submissions, including the minimum requirements that submissions must meet in order to be considered responsive and the manner in which those minimum requirements are to be applied.

2. Other than any criterion, requirement or procedure that may be imposed by the procuring entity in accordance with article 8 of this Law, no description of the subject matter of a procurement that may restrict the participation of suppliers or contractors in or their access to the procurement proceedings, including any restriction based on nationality, shall be included or used in the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, or in the solicitation documents.

3. The description of the subject matter of the procurement may include specifications, plans, drawings, designs, requirements, testing and test methods, packaging, marking or labelling or conformity certification, and symbols and terminology.

4. To the extent practicable, the description of the subject matter of the procurement shall be objective, functional and generic. It shall set out the relevant technical, quality and performance characteristics of that subject matter. There shall be no requirement for or reference to a particular trademark or trade name, patent, design or type, specific origin or producer unless there is no sufficiently precise or intelligible way of describing the characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement and provided that words such as “or equivalent” are included.

5. (a) Standardized features, requirements, symbols and terminology relating to the technical, quality and performance characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement shall be used, where available, in formulating the description of the subject matter of the procurement to be included in the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, and in the solicitation documents;

(b) Due regard shall be had for the use of standardized trade terms and standardized conditions, where available, in formulating the terms and conditions of the procurement and the procurement contract or the framework agreement to be entered into in the procurement proceedings, and in formulating other relevant aspects of the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, and solicitation documents.

Article 11. Rules concerning evaluation criteria and procedures

1. Except for the criteria set out in paragraph 3 of this article, the evaluation criteria shall relate to the subject matter of the procurement.

2. The evaluation criteria relating to the subject matter of the procurement may include:

(a) Price;

(b) The cost of operating, maintaining and repairing goods or of construction; the time for delivery of goods, completion of construction or provision of services; the characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement, such as the functional characteristics of goods or construction and the environmental characteristics of the subject matter; and the terms of payment and of guarantees in respect of the subject matter of the procurement;

(c) Where relevant in procurement conducted in accordance with articles 47, 49 and 50 of this Law, the experience, reliability and professional and managerial competence of the supplier or contractor and of the personnel to be involved in providing the subject matter of the procurement.

3. In addition to the criteria set out in paragraph 2 of this article, the evaluation criteria may include:

(a) Any criteria that the procurement regulations or other provisions of law of this State authorize or require to be taken into account;

(b) A margin of preference for the benefit of domestic suppliers or contractors or for domestically produced goods, or any other preference, if authorized or required by the procurement regulations or other provisions of law of this State. The margin of preference shall be calculated in accordance with the procurement regulations.

4. To the extent practicable, all non-price evaluation criteria shall be objective, quantifiable and expressed in monetary terms.

5. The procuring entity shall set out in the solicitation documents:

(a) Whether the successful submission will be ascertained on the basis of price or price and other criteria;

(b) All evaluation criteria established pursuant to this article, including price as modified by any preference;

(c) The relative weights of all evaluation criteria, except where the procurement is conducted under article 49 of this Law, in which case the procuring entity may list all evaluation criteria in descending order of importance;

(d) The manner of application of the criteria in the evaluation procedure.

6. In evaluating submissions and determining the successful submission, the procuring entity shall use only those criteria and procedures that have been set out in the solicitation documents and shall apply those criteria and procedures in the manner that has been disclosed in those solicitation documents. No criterion or procedure shall be used that has not been set out in accordance with this provision.

Article 12. Rules concerning estimation of the value of procurement

1. A procuring entity shall neither divide its procurement nor use a particular valuation method for estimating the value of procurement so as to limit competition among suppliers or contractors or otherwise avoid its obligations under this Law.
2. In estimating the value of procurement, the procuring entity shall include the estimated maximum total value of the procurement contract or of all procurement contracts envisaged under a framework agreement over its entire duration, taking into account all forms of remuneration.

Article 13. Rules concerning the language of documents

1. The pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, and the solicitation documents shall be formulated in [the enacting State specifies its official language or languages] [and in a language customarily used in international trade, unless decided otherwise by the procuring entity in the circumstances referred to in paragraph 4 of article 33 of this Law].
2. Applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection, if any, and submissions may be formulated and presented in the language of the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, and solicitation documents, respectively, or in any other language permitted by those documents.

Article 14. Rules concerning the manner, place and deadline for presenting applications to pre-qualify or applications for pre-selection or for presenting submissions

1. The manner, place and deadline for presenting applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection shall be set out in the invitation to pre-qualify or for pre-selection and in the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, as applicable. The manner, place and deadline for presenting submissions shall be set out in the solicitation documents.
2. Deadlines for presenting applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection or for presenting submissions shall be expressed as a specific date and time and shall allow sufficient time for suppliers or contractors to prepare and present their applications or submissions, taking into account the reasonable needs of the procuring entity.
3. If the procuring entity issues a clarification or modification of the pre-qualification, pre-selection or solicitation documents, it shall, prior to the applicable deadline for presenting applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection or for presenting submissions, extend the deadline if necessary or as required under paragraph 3 of article 15 of this Law in order to afford suppliers or contractors sufficient time to take the clarification or modification into account in their applications or submissions.

4. The procuring entity may, at its absolute discretion, prior to a deadline for presenting applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection or for presenting submissions, extend the applicable deadline if it is not possible for one or more suppliers or contractors to present their applications or submissions by the deadline initially stipulated because of any circumstance beyond their control.

5. Notice of any extension of the deadline shall be given promptly to each supplier or contractor to which the procuring entity provided the pre-qualification, pre-selection or solicitation documents.

Article 15. Clarifications and modifications of solicitation documents

1. A supplier or contractor may request a clarification of the solicitation documents from the procuring entity. The procuring entity shall respond to any request by a supplier or contractor for clarification of the solicitation documents that is received by the procuring entity within a reasonable time prior to the deadline for presenting submissions. The procuring entity shall respond within a time period that will enable the supplier or contractor to present its submission in a timely fashion and shall, without identifying the source of the request, communicate the clarification to all suppliers or contractors to which the procuring entity has provided the solicitation documents.

2. At any time prior to the deadline for presenting submissions, the procuring entity may for any reason, whether on its own initiative or as a result of a request for clarification by a supplier or contractor, modify the solicitation documents by issuing an addendum. The addendum shall be communicated promptly to all suppliers or contractors to which the procuring entity has provided the solicitation documents and shall be binding on those suppliers or contractors.

3. If as a result of a clarification or modification issued in accordance with this article, the information published when first soliciting the participation of suppliers or contractors in the procurement proceedings becomes materially inaccurate, the procuring entity shall cause the amended information to be published in the same manner and place in which the original information was published and shall extend the deadline for presentation of submissions as provided for in paragraph 3 of article 14 of this Law.

4. If the procuring entity convenes a meeting of suppliers or contractors, it shall prepare minutes of the meeting containing the requests submitted at the meeting for clarification of the solicitation documents and its responses to those requests, without identifying the sources of the requests. The minutes shall be provided promptly to all suppliers or contractors to which the procuring entity provided the solicitation documents, so as to enable those suppliers or contractors to take the minutes into account in preparing their submissions.

Article 16. Clarification of qualification information and of submissions

1. At any stage of the procurement proceedings, the procuring entity may ask a supplier or contractor for clarification of its qualification information or of its submission, in order to assist in the ascertainment of qualifications or the examination and evaluation of submissions.

2. The procuring entity shall correct purely arithmetical errors that are discovered during the examination of submissions. The procuring entity shall give prompt notice of any such correction to the supplier or contractor that presented the submission concerned.

3. No substantive change to qualification information or to a submission, including changes aimed at making an unqualified supplier or contractor qualified or an unresponsive submission responsive, shall be sought, offered or permitted.

4. No negotiations shall take place between the procuring entity and a supplier or contractor with respect to qualification information or submissions, nor shall any change in price be made pursuant to a clarification that is sought under this article.

5. Paragraph 4 of this article shall not apply to proposals submitted under articles 49, 50, 51 and 52 of this Law.

6. All communications generated under this article shall be included in the record of the procurement proceedings.

Article 17. Tender securities

1. When the procuring entity requires suppliers or contractors presenting submissions to provide a tender security:

(a) The requirement shall apply to all suppliers or contractors;

(b) The solicitation documents may stipulate that the issuer of the tender security and the confirmer, if any, of the tender security, as well as the form and terms of the tender security, must be acceptable to the procuring entity. In cases of domestic procurement, the solicitation documents may in addition stipulate that the tender security shall be issued by an issuer in this State;

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (b) of this paragraph, a tender security shall not be rejected by the procuring entity on the grounds that the tender security was not issued by an issuer in this State if the tender security and the issuer otherwise conform to requirements set out in the solicitation documents, unless the acceptance by the procuring entity of such a tender security would be in violation of a law of this State;

(d) Prior to presenting a submission, a supplier or contractor may request the procuring entity to confirm the acceptability of a proposed issuer of a tender security or of a proposed confirmer, if required; the procuring entity shall respond promptly to such a request;

(e) Confirmation of the acceptability of a proposed issuer or of any proposed confirmer does not preclude the procuring entity from rejecting the tender security on the ground that the issuer or the confirmer, as the case may be, has become insolvent or has otherwise ceased to be creditworthy;

(f) The procuring entity shall specify in the solicitation documents any requirements with respect to the issuer and the nature, form, amount and other principal terms and conditions of the required tender security. Any requirement that refers directly or indirectly to the conduct of the supplier or contractor presenting the submission may relate only to:

- (i) Withdrawal or modification of the submission after the deadline for presenting submissions, or before the deadline if so stipulated in the solicitation documents;
- (ii) Failure to sign a procurement contract if so required by the solicitation documents; and
- (iii) Failure to provide a required security for the performance of the contract after the successful submission has been accepted or failure to comply with any other condition precedent to signing the procurement contract specified in the solicitation documents.

2. The procuring entity shall make no claim to the amount of the tender security and shall promptly return, or procure the return of, the security document after the earliest of the following events:

(a) The expiry of the tender security;

(b) The entry into force of a procurement contract and the provision of a security for the performance of the contract, if such a security is required by the solicitation documents;

- (c) The cancellation of the procurement;
- (d) The withdrawal of a submission prior to the deadline for presenting submissions, unless the solicitation documents stipulate that no such withdrawal is permitted.

Article 18. Pre-qualification proceedings

1. The procuring entity may engage in pre-qualification proceedings with a view to identifying, prior to solicitation, suppliers and contractors that are qualified. The provisions of article 9 of this Law shall apply to pre-qualification proceedings.
2. If the procuring entity engages in pre-qualification proceedings, it shall cause an invitation to pre-qualify to be published in the publication identified in the procurement regulations. Unless decided otherwise by the procuring entity in the circumstances referred to in paragraph 4 of article 33 of this Law, the invitation to pre-qualify shall also be published internationally, so as to be widely accessible to international suppliers or contractors.
3. The invitation to pre-qualify shall include the following information:
  - (a) The name and address of the procuring entity;
  - (b) A summary of the principal required terms and conditions of the procurement contract or the framework agreement to be entered into in the procurement proceedings, including the nature, quantity and place of delivery of the goods to be supplied, the nature and location of the construction to be effected or the nature of the services and the location where they are to be provided, as well as the desired or required time for the supply of the goods, the completion of the construction or the provision of the services;
  - (c) The criteria and procedures to be used for ascertaining the qualifications of suppliers or contractors, in conformity with article 9 of this Law;
  - (d) A declaration as required by article 8 of this Law;
  - (e) The means of obtaining the pre-qualification documents and the place where they may be obtained;
  - (f) The price, if any, to be charged by the procuring entity for the pre-qualification documents and, subsequent to pre-qualification, for the solicitation documents;
  - (g) If a price is to be charged, the means of payment for the pre-qualification documents and, subsequent to pre-qualification, for the solicitation documents, and the currency of payment;
  - (h) The language or languages in which the pre-qualification documents and, subsequent to pre-qualification, the solicitation documents are available;

(i) The manner, place and deadline for presenting applications to pre-qualify and, if already known, the manner, place and deadline for presenting submissions, in conformity with article 14 of this Law.

4. The procuring entity shall provide a set of pre-qualification documents to each supplier or contractor that requests them in accordance with the invitation to pre-qualify and that pays the price, if any, charged for those documents. The price that the procuring entity may charge for the pre-qualification documents shall reflect only the cost of providing them to suppliers or contractors.

5. The pre-qualification documents shall include the following information:

(a) Instructions for preparing and presenting pre-qualification applications;

(b) Any documentary evidence or other information that must be presented by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications;

(c) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the pre-qualification proceedings without the intervention of an intermediary;

(d) References to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the pre-qualification proceedings, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;

(e) Any other requirements that may be established by the procuring entity in conformity with this Law and the procurement regulations relating to the preparation and presentation of applications to pre-qualify and to the pre-qualification proceedings.

6. The procuring entity shall respond to any request by a supplier or contractor for clarification of the pre-qualification documents that is received by the procuring entity within a reasonable time prior to the deadline for presenting applications to pre-qualify. The procuring entity shall respond within a time period that will enable the supplier or contractor to present its application to pre-qualify in a timely fashion. The response to any request that might reasonably be expected to be of interest to other suppliers or contractors shall, without identifying the source of the request, be communicated to all suppliers or contractors to which the procuring entity has provided the pre-qualification documents.

7. The procuring entity shall take a decision with respect to the qualifications of each supplier or contractor presenting an application to pre-qualify. In reaching that decision, the procuring entity shall apply only the criteria and procedures set out in the invitation to pre-qualify and in the pre-qualification documents.

8. Only suppliers or contractors that have been pre-qualified are entitled to participate further in the procurement proceedings.

9. The procuring entity shall promptly notify each supplier or contractor presenting an application to pre-qualify whether or not it has been pre-qualified. It shall also make available to any person, upon request, the names of all suppliers or contractors that have been pre-qualified.

10. The procuring entity shall promptly communicate to each supplier or contractor that has not been pre-qualified the reasons therefor.

Article 19. Cancellation of the procurement

1. The procuring entity may cancel the procurement at any time prior to the acceptance of the successful submission and, after the successful submission is accepted, under the circumstances referred to in paragraph 8 of article 22 of this Law. The procuring entity shall not open any tenders or proposals after taking a decision to cancel the procurement.

2. The decision of the procuring entity to cancel the procurement and the reasons for the decision shall be included in the record of the procurement proceedings and promptly communicated to any supplier or contractor that presented a submission. The procuring entity shall in addition promptly publish a notice of the cancellation of the procurement in the same manner and place in which the original information regarding the procurement proceedings was published, and return any tenders or proposals that remain unopened at the time of the decision to the suppliers or contractors that presented them.

3. Unless the cancellation of the procurement is a consequence of irresponsible or dilatory conduct on the part of the procuring entity, the procuring entity shall incur no liability, solely by virtue of its invoking paragraph 1 of this article, towards suppliers or contractors that have presented submissions.

Article 20. Rejection of abnormally low submissions

1. The procuring entity may reject a submission if the procuring entity has determined that the price, in combination with other constituent elements of the submission, is abnormally low in relation to the subject matter of the procurement and raises concerns with the procuring entity as to the ability of the supplier or contractor that presented that submission to perform the procurement contract, provided that the procuring entity has taken the following actions:

(a) The procuring entity has requested in writing from the supplier or contractor details of the submission that gives rise to concerns as to the ability of the supplier or contractor to perform the procurement contract; and

(b) The procuring entity has taken account of any information provided by the supplier or contractor following this request and the information included in the submission, but continues, on the basis of all such information, to hold concerns.

2. The decision of the procuring entity to reject a submission in accordance with this article, the reasons for that decision, and all communications with the supplier or contractor under this article shall be included in the record of the procurement proceedings. The decision of the procuring entity and the reasons therefor shall be promptly communicated to the supplier or contractor concerned.

Article 21. Exclusion of a supplier or contractor from the procurement proceedings on the grounds of inducements from the supplier or contractor, an unfair competitive advantage or conflicts of interest

1. A procuring entity shall exclude a supplier or contractor from the procurement proceedings if:

(a) The supplier or contractor offers, gives or agrees to give, directly or indirectly, to any current or former officer or employee of the procuring entity or other governmental authority a gratuity in any form, an offer of employment or any other thing of service or value, so as to influence an act or decision of, or procedure followed by, the procuring entity in connection with the procurement proceedings; or

(b) The supplier or contractor has an unfair competitive advantage or a conflict of interest, in violation of provisions of law of this State.

2. Any decision of the procuring entity to exclude a supplier or contractor from the procurement proceedings under this article and the reasons therefor shall be included in the record of the procurement proceedings and promptly communicated to the supplier or contractor concerned.

Article 22. Acceptance of the successful submission and entry into force of the procurement contract

1. The procuring entity shall accept the successful submission unless:

(a) The supplier or contractor presenting the successful submission is disqualified in accordance with article 9 of this Law;

(b) The procurement is cancelled in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law;

(c) The submission found successful at the end of evaluation is rejected as abnormally low under article 20 of this Law; or

(d) The supplier or contractor presenting the successful submission is excluded from the procurement proceedings on the grounds specified in article 21 of this Law.

2. The procuring entity shall promptly notify each supplier or contractor that presented submissions of its decision to accept the successful submission at the end of the standstill period. The notice shall contain, at a minimum, the following information:

(a) The name and address of the supplier or contractor presenting the successful submission;

(b) The contract price or, where the successful submission was ascertained on the basis of price and other criteria, the contract price and a summary of other characteristics and relative advantages of the successful submission; and

(c) The duration of the standstill period as set out in the solicitation documents and in accordance with the requirements of the procurement regulations. The standstill period shall run from the date of the dispatch of the notice under this paragraph to all suppliers or contractors that presented submissions.

3. Paragraph 2 of this article shall not apply to awards of procurement contracts:

(a) Under a framework agreement procedure without second-stage competition;

(b) Where the contract price is less than the threshold amount set out in the procurement regulations; or

(c) Where the procuring entity determines that urgent public interest considerations require the procurement to proceed without a standstill period. The decision of the procuring entity that such urgent considerations exist and the reasons for the decision shall be included in the record of the procurement proceedings.

4. Upon expiry of the standstill period or, where there is none, promptly after the successful submission was ascertained, the procuring entity shall dispatch the notice of acceptance of the successful submission to the supplier or contractor that presented that submission, unless the [name of court or courts] or the [name of the relevant organ designated by the enacting State] orders otherwise.

5. Unless a written procurement contract and/or approval by another authority is/are required, a procurement contract in accordance with the terms and conditions of the successful submission enters into force when the notice of acceptance is dispatched to the supplier or contractor concerned, provided that the notice is dispatched while the submission is still in effect.

6. Where the solicitation documents require the supplier or contractor whose submission has been accepted to sign a written procurement contract conforming to the terms and conditions of the accepted submission:

(a) The procuring entity and the supplier or contractor concerned shall sign the procurement contract within a reasonable period of time after the notice of acceptance is dispatched to the supplier or contractor concerned;

(b) Unless the solicitation documents stipulate that the procurement contract is subject to approval by another authority, the procurement contract enters into force when the contract is signed by the supplier or contractor concerned and by the procuring entity. Between the time when the notice of acceptance is dispatched to the supplier or contractor concerned and the entry into force of the procurement contract, neither the procuring entity nor that supplier or contractor shall take any action that interferes with the entry into force of the procurement contract or with its performance.

7. Where the solicitation documents stipulate that the procurement contract is subject to approval by another authority, the procurement contract shall not enter into force before the approval is given. The solicitation documents shall specify the estimated period of time following dispatch of the notice of acceptance that will be required to obtain the approval. A failure to obtain the approval within the time specified in the solicitation documents shall not extend the period of effectiveness of submissions specified in the solicitation documents or the period of effectiveness of the tender security required under article 17 of this Law, unless extended under the provisions of this Law.

8. If the supplier or contractor whose submission has been accepted fails to sign any written procurement contract as required or fails to provide any required security for the performance of the contract, the procuring entity may either cancel the procurement or decide to select the next successful submission from among those remaining in effect, in accordance with the criteria and procedures set out in this Law and in the solicitation documents. In the latter case, the provisions of this article shall apply mutatis mutandis to such submission.

9. Notices under this article are dispatched when they are promptly and properly addressed or otherwise directed and transmitted to the supplier or contractor or conveyed to an appropriate authority for transmission to the supplier or contractor by any reliable means specified in accordance with article 7 of this Law.

10. Upon the entry into force of the procurement contract and, if required, the provision by the supplier or contractor of a security for the performance of the contract, notice of the procurement contract shall be given promptly to other suppliers or contractors, specifying the name and address of the supplier or contractor that has entered into the contract and the contract price.

Article 23. Public notice of the award of a procurement contract or framework agreement

1. Upon the entry into force of the procurement contract or conclusion of a framework agreement, the procuring entity shall promptly publish notice of the award of the procurement contract or the framework agreement, specifying the name of the supplier (or suppliers) or contractor (or contractors) to which the procurement contract or the framework agreement was awarded and, in the case of procurement contracts, the contract price.

2. Paragraph 1 is not applicable to awards where the contract price is less than the threshold amount set out in the procurement regulations. The procuring entity shall publish a cumulative notice of such awards from time to time but at least once a year.

3. The procurement regulations shall provide for the manner of publication of the notices required under this article.

Article 24. Confidentiality

1. In its communications with suppliers or contractors or with any person, the procuring entity shall not disclose any information if non-disclosure of such information is necessary for the protection of essential security interests of the State or if disclosure of such information would be contrary to law, would impede law enforcement, would prejudice the legitimate commercial interests of the suppliers or contractors or would impede fair competition, unless disclosure of that information is ordered by the [name of the court or courts] or the [name of the relevant organ designated by the enacting State] and, in such case, subject to the conditions of such an order.

2. Other than when providing or publishing information pursuant to paragraphs 2 and 10 of article 22 and to articles 23, 25 and 42 of this Law, the procuring entity shall treat applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection and submissions in such a manner as to avoid the disclosure of their contents to competing suppliers or contractors or to any other person not authorized to have access to this type of information.

3. Any discussions, communications, negotiations or dialogue between the procuring entity and a supplier or contractor pursuant to paragraph 3 of article 48 and to articles 49 to 52 of this Law shall be confidential. Unless required by law or ordered by the [name of the court or courts] or the [name of the relevant organ designated by the enacting State], no party to any such discussions, communications, negotiations or dialogue shall disclose to any other person any technical, price or other information relating to these discussions, communications, negotiations or dialogue without the consent of the other party.

4. Subject to the requirements in paragraph 1 of this article, in procurement involving classified information, the procuring entity may:

(a) Impose on suppliers or contractors requirements aimed at protecting classified information; and

(b) Demand that suppliers or contractors ensure that their subcontractors comply with requirements aimed at protecting classified information.

Article 25. Documentary record of procurement proceedings

1. The procuring entity shall maintain a record of the procurement proceedings that includes the following information:

(a) A brief description of the subject matter of the procurement;

(b) The names and addresses of suppliers or contractors that presented submissions, the name and address of the supplier (or suppliers) or contractor (or contractors) with which the procurement contract is entered into and the contract price (and, in the case of a framework agreement procedure, the name and address of the supplier (or suppliers) or contractor (or contractors) with which the framework agreement is concluded);

(c) A statement of the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity for the decision as regards means of communication and any requirement of form;

(d) In procurement proceedings in which the procuring entity, in accordance with article 8 of this Law, limits the participation of suppliers or contractors, a statement of the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity for imposing such a limit;

(e) If the procuring entity uses a method of procurement other than open tendering, a statement of the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity to justify the use of such other method;

(f) In the case of procurement by means of an electronic reverse auction or involving an electronic reverse auction as a phase preceding the award of the procurement contract, a statement of the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity for the use of the auction and information about the date and time of the opening and closing of the auction;

(g) In the case of a framework agreement procedure, a statement of the reasons and circumstances upon which it relied to justify the use of a framework agreement procedure and the type of framework agreement selected;

(h) If the procurement is cancelled pursuant to paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law, a statement to that effect and the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity for its decision to cancel the procurement;

(i) If any socio-economic policies were considered in the procurement proceedings, details of such policies and the manner in which they were applied;

(j) If no standstill period was applied, a statement of the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity in deciding not to apply a standstill period;

(k) In the case of a challenge or appeal under chapter VIII of this Law, a copy of the application for reconsideration or review and the appeal, as applicable, and a copy of all decisions taken in the relevant challenge or appeal proceedings, or both, and the reasons therefor;

(l) A summary of any requests for clarification of the pre-qualification or pre-selection documents, if any, or of the solicitation documents and the responses thereto, as well as a summary of any modifications to those documents;

(m) Information relative to the qualifications, or lack thereof, of suppliers or contractors that presented applications to pre-qualify or for pre-selection, if any, or submissions;

(n) If a submission is rejected pursuant to article 20 of this Law, a statement to that effect and the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity for its decision;

(o) If a supplier or contractor is excluded from the procurement proceedings pursuant to article 21 of this Law, a statement to that effect and the reasons and circumstances relied upon by the procuring entity for its decision;

(p) A copy of the notice of the standstill period given in accordance with paragraph 2 of article 22 of this Law;

(q) If the procurement proceedings resulted in the award of a procurement contract in accordance with paragraph 8 of article 22 of this Law, a statement to that effect and of the reasons therefor;

(r) The contract price and other principal terms and conditions of the procurement contract; where a written procurement contract has been concluded, a copy thereof. (In the case of a framework agreement procedure, in addition a summary of the principal terms and conditions of the framework agreement or a copy of any written framework agreement that was concluded);

(s) For each submission, the price and a summary of the other principal terms and conditions;

(t) A summary of the evaluation of submissions, including the application of any preference pursuant to paragraph 3 (b) of article 11 of this Law, and the reasons and circumstances on which the procuring entity relied to justify any rejection of bids presented during the auction;

(u) Where exemptions from disclosure of information were invoked under paragraph 1 of article 24 or under article 69 of this Law, the reasons and circumstances relied upon in invoking them;

(v) In procurement involving classified information, any requirements imposed on suppliers or contractors for the protection of classified information pursuant to paragraph 4 of article 24 of this Law; and

(w) Other information required to be included in the record in accordance with the provisions of this Law or the procurement regulations.

2. The portion of the record referred to in subparagraphs (a) to (k) of paragraph 1 of this article shall, on request, be made available to any person after the successful submission has been accepted or the procurement has been cancelled.

3. Subject to paragraph 4 of this article, or except as disclosed pursuant to paragraph 3 of article 42 of this Law, the portion of the record referred to in subparagraphs (p) to (t) of paragraph 1 of this article shall, after the decision on acceptance of the successful submission has become known to them, be made available, upon request, to suppliers or contractors that presented submissions.

4. Except when ordered to do so by the [name of court or courts] or the [name of the relevant organ designated by the enacting State], and subject to the conditions of such an order, the procuring entity shall not disclose:

(a) Information from the record of the procurement proceedings if its non-disclosure is necessary for the protection of essential security interests of the State or if its disclosure would be contrary to law, would impede law enforcement, would prejudice the legitimate commercial interests of the suppliers or contractors or would impede fair competition;

(b) Information relating to the examination and evaluation of submissions, other than the summary referred to in subparagraph (t) of paragraph 1 of this article.

5. The procurement entity shall record, file and preserve all documents relating to the procurement proceedings, according to procurement regulations or other provisions of law of this State.

Article 26. Code of conduct

A code of conduct for officers or employees of procuring entities shall be enacted. It shall address, inter alia, the prevention of conflicts of interest in procurement and, where appropriate, measures to regulate matters regarding personnel responsible for procurement, such as declarations of interest in particular procurements, screening procedures and training requirements. The code of conduct so enacted shall be promptly made accessible to the public and systematically maintained.

CHAPTER II. METHODS OF PROCUREMENT AND THEIR CONDITIONS FOR USE; SOLICITATION AND NOTICES OF THE PROCUREMENT

Section I. Methods of procurement and their conditions for use

Article 27. Methods of procurement<sup>4</sup>

1. The procuring entity may conduct procurement by means of:

---

<sup>4</sup>States may choose not to incorporate all the methods of procurement listed in this article into their national legislation, although an appropriate range of options, including open tendering, should be always provided for. On this question, see the Guide to Enactment of the UNCITRAL Model Law on Public Procurement. States may consider whether, for certain methods of procurement, to include a requirement for high-level approval by a designated organ. On this question, see the Guide to Enactment.

- (a) Open tendering;
- (b) Restricted tendering;
- (c) Request for quotations;
- (d) Request for proposals without negotiation;
- (e) Two-stage tendering;
- (f) Request for proposals with dialogue;
- (g) Request for proposals with consecutive negotiations;
- (h) Competitive negotiations;
- (i) Electronic reverse auction; and
- (j) Single-source procurement.

2. The procuring entity may engage in a framework agreement procedure in accordance with the provisions of chapter VII of this Law.

Article 28. General rules applicable to the selection of a procurement method

1. Except as otherwise provided for in articles 29 to 31 of this Law, a procuring entity shall conduct procurement by means of open tendering.
2. A procuring entity may use a method of procurement other than open tendering only in accordance with articles 29 to 31 of this Law, shall select the other method of procurement to accommodate the circumstances of the procurement concerned and shall seek to maximize competition to the extent practicable.
3. If the procuring entity uses a method of procurement other than open tendering, it shall include in the record required under article 25 of this Law a statement of the reasons and circumstances upon which it relied to justify the use of that method.

Article 29. Conditions for the use of methods of procurement under chapter IV of this Law (restricted tendering, requests for quotations and requests for proposals without negotiation)

1. The procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of restricted tendering in accordance with article 45 of this Law when:

- (a) The subject matter of the procurement, by reason of its highly complex or specialized nature, is available only from a limited number of suppliers or contractors; or

(b) The time and cost required to examine and evaluate a large number of tenders would be disproportionate to the value of the subject matter of the procurement.

2. A procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of a request for quotations in accordance with article 46 of this Law for the procurement of readily available goods or services that are not specially produced or provided to the particular description of the procuring entity and for which there is an established market, so long as the estimated value of the procurement contract is less than the threshold amount set out in the procurement regulations.

3. The procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of request for proposals without negotiation in accordance with article 47 of this Law where the procuring entity needs to consider the financial aspects of proposals separately and only after completion of examination and evaluation of the technical, quality and performance characteristics of the proposals.

Article 30. Conditions for the use of methods of procurement under chapter V of this Law (two-stage tendering, requests for proposals with dialogue, requests for proposals with consecutive negotiations, competitive negotiations and single-source procurement)

1. A procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of two-stage tendering in accordance with article 48 of this Law where:

(a) The procuring entity assesses that discussions with suppliers or contractors are needed to refine aspects of the description of the subject matter of the procurement and to formulate them with the detail required under article 10 of this Law, and in order to allow the procuring entity to obtain the most satisfactory solution to its procurement needs; or

(b) Open tendering was engaged in but no tenders were presented or the procurement was cancelled by the procuring entity pursuant to paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law and where, in the judgement of the procuring entity, engaging in new open-tendering proceedings or a procurement method under chapter IV of this Law would be unlikely to result in a procurement contract.

2. [Subject to approval by the [name of the organ designated by the enacting State to issue the approval]],<sup>5</sup> a procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of request for proposals with dialogue in accordance with article 49 of this Law where:

<sup>5</sup>The enacting State may consider enacting the provisions in brackets if it wishes to subject the use of this procurement method to a measure of ex ante control.

(a) It is not feasible for the procuring entity to formulate a detailed description of the subject matter of the procurement in accordance with article 10 of this Law, and the procuring entity assesses that dialogue with suppliers or contractors is needed to obtain the most satisfactory solution to its procurement needs;

(b) The procuring entity seeks to enter into a contract for the purpose of research, experiment, study or development, except where the contract includes the production of items in quantities sufficient to establish their commercial viability or to recover research and development costs;

(c) The procuring entity determines that the selected method is the most appropriate method of procurement for the protection of essential security interests of the State; or

(d) Open tendering was engaged in but no tenders were presented or the procurement was cancelled by the procuring entity pursuant to paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law and where, in the judgement of the procuring entity, engaging in new open-tendering proceedings or a procurement method under chapter IV of this Law would be unlikely to result in a procurement contract.

3. A procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of request for proposals with consecutive negotiations in accordance with article 50 of this Law where the procuring entity needs to consider the financial aspects of proposals separately and only after completion of examination and evaluation of the technical, quality and performance characteristics of the proposals, and it assesses that consecutive negotiations with suppliers or contractors are needed in order to ensure that the financial terms and conditions of the procurement contract are acceptable to the procuring entity.

4. A procuring entity may engage in competitive negotiations, in accordance with the provisions of article 51 of this Law, in the following circumstances:

(a) There is an urgent need for the subject matter of the procurement, and engaging in open-tendering proceedings or any other competitive method of procurement, because of the time involved in using those methods, would therefore be impractical, provided that the circumstances giving rise to the urgency were neither foreseeable by the procuring entity nor the result of dilatory conduct on its part;

(b) Owing to a catastrophic event, there is an urgent need for the subject matter of the procurement, making it impractical to use open-tendering proceedings or any other competitive method of procurement because of the time involved in using those methods; or

(c) The procuring entity determines that the use of any other competitive method of procurement is not appropriate for the protection of essential security interests of the State.

5. A procuring entity may engage in single-source procurement in accordance with the provisions of article 52 of this Law in the following exceptional circumstances:

(a) The subject matter of the procurement is available only from a particular supplier or contractor, or a particular supplier or contractor has exclusive rights in respect of the subject matter of the procurement, such that no reasonable alternative or substitute exists, and the use of any other procurement method would therefore not be possible;

(b) Owing to a catastrophic event, there is an extremely urgent need for the subject matter of the procurement, and engaging in any other method of procurement would be impractical because of the time involved in using those methods;

(c) The procuring entity, having procured goods, equipment, technology or services from a supplier or contractor, determines that additional supplies must be procured from that supplier or contractor for reasons of standardization or because of the need for compatibility with existing goods, equipment, technology or services, taking into account the effectiveness of the original procurement in meeting the needs of the procuring entity, the limited size of the proposed procurement in relation to the original procurement, the reasonableness of the price and the unsuitability of alternatives to the goods or services in question;

(d) The procuring entity determines that the use of any other method of procurement is not appropriate for the protection of essential security interests of the State; or

(e) [Subject to approval by the [name of the organ designated by the enacting State to issue the approval] and,] following public notice and adequate opportunity to comment, procurement from a particular supplier or contractor is necessary in order to implement a socio-economic policy of this State, provided that procurement from no other supplier or contractor is capable of promoting that policy.

Article 31. Conditions for use of an electronic reverse auction

1. A procuring entity may engage in procurement by means of an electronic reverse auction in accordance with the provisions of chapter VI of this Law, under the following conditions:

(a) It is feasible for the procuring entity to formulate a detailed description of the subject matter of the procurement;

(b) There is a competitive market of suppliers or contractors anticipated to be qualified to participate in the electronic reverse auction, such that effective competition is ensured; and

(c) The criteria to be used by the procuring entity in determining the successful submission are quantifiable and can be expressed in monetary terms.

2. A procuring entity may use an electronic reverse auction as a phase preceding the award of the procurement contract in a procurement method, as appropriate under the provisions of this Law. It may also use an electronic reverse auction for award of a procurement contract in a framework agreement procedure with second-stage competition in accordance with the provisions of this Law. An electronic reverse auction under this paragraph may be used only where the conditions of paragraph 1 (c) of this article are satisfied.

Article 32. Conditions for use of a framework agreement procedure

1. A procuring entity may engage in a framework agreement procedure in accordance with chapter VII of this Law where it determines that:

(a) The need for the subject matter of the procurement is expected to arise on an indefinite or repeated basis during a given period of time; or

(b) By virtue of the nature of the subject matter of the procurement, the need for that subject matter may arise on an urgent basis during a given period of time.

2. The procuring entity shall include in the record required under article 25 of this Law a statement of the reasons and circumstances upon which it relied to justify the use of a framework agreement procedure and the type of framework agreement selected.

Section II. Solicitation and notices of the procurement

Article 33. Solicitation in open tendering, two-stage tendering and procurement by means of an electronic reverse auction

1. An invitation to tender in open tendering or two-stage tendering and an invitation to an electronic reverse auction under article 53 of this Law shall be published in the publication identified in the procurement regulations.

2. The invitation shall also be published internationally, so as to be widely accessible to international suppliers or contractors.

3. The provisions of this article shall not apply where the procuring entity engages in pre-qualification proceedings in accordance with article 18 of this Law.

4. The procuring entity shall not be required to cause the invitation to be published in accordance with paragraph 2 of this article in domestic procurement and in procurement proceedings where the procuring entity decides, in view of the low value of the subject matter of the procurement, that only domestic suppliers or contractors are likely to be interested in presenting submissions.

Article 34. Solicitation in restricted tendering, request for quotations, competitive negotiations and single-source procurement: requirement for an advance notice of the procurement

1. (a) When the procuring entity engages in procurement by means of restricted tendering on the grounds specified in paragraph 1 (a) of article 29 of this Law, it shall solicit tenders from all suppliers and contractors from which the subject matter of the procurement is available;

(b) When the procuring entity engages in procurement by means of restricted tendering on the grounds specified in paragraph 1 (b) of article 29 of this Law, it shall select suppliers or contractors from which to solicit tenders in a non-discriminatory manner, and it shall select a sufficient number of suppliers or contractors to ensure effective competition.

2. Where the procuring entity engages in procurement by means of request for quotations in accordance with paragraph 2 of article 29 of this Law, it shall request quotations from as many suppliers or contractors as practicable, but from at least three.

3. Where the procuring entity engages in procurement by means of competitive negotiations in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 30 of this Law, it shall engage in negotiations with a sufficient number of suppliers or contractors to ensure effective competition.

4. Where the procuring entity engages in single-source procurement in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 30 of this Law, it shall solicit a proposal or price quotation from a single supplier or contractor.

5. Prior to direct solicitation in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 1, 3 and 4 of this article, the procuring entity shall cause a notice of the procurement to be published in the publication identified in the procurement regulations. The notice shall contain at a minimum the following information:

(a) The name and address of the procuring entity;

(b) A summary of the principal required terms and conditions of the procurement contract or the framework agreement to be entered into in the procurement proceedings, including the nature, quantity and place of delivery of the goods to be supplied, the nature and location of the construction to be effected or the nature of the services and the location where they are to be provided, as well as the desired or required time for the supply of the goods, the completion of the construction or the provision of the services;

- (c) A declaration pursuant to article 8 of this Law; and
- (d) The method of procurement to be used.

6. The requirements of paragraph 5 of this article shall not apply in cases of urgent need as referred to in paragraphs 4 (a), 4 (b) and 5 (b) of article 30 of this Law.

Article 35. Solicitation in request-for-proposals proceedings

1. An invitation to participate in request-for-proposals proceedings shall be published in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 33 of this Law, except where:

(a) The procuring entity engages in pre-qualification proceedings in accordance with article 18 of this Law or in pre-selection proceedings in accordance with paragraph 3 of article 49 of this Law;

(b) The procuring entity engages in direct solicitation under the conditions set out in paragraph 2 of this article; or

(c) The procuring entity decides not to cause the invitation to be published in accordance with paragraph 2 of article 33 of this Law in the circumstances referred to in paragraph 4 of article 33 of this Law.

2. The procuring entity may engage in direct solicitation in request-for-proposals proceedings if:

(a) The subject matter to be procured is available from only a limited number of suppliers or contractors, provided that the procuring entity solicits proposals from all those suppliers or contractors;

(b) The time and cost required to examine and evaluate a large number of proposals would be disproportionate to the value of the subject matter to be procured, provided that the procuring entity solicits proposals from a sufficient number of suppliers or contractors to ensure effective competition and selects suppliers or contractors from which to solicit proposals in a non-discriminatory manner; or

(c) The procurement involves classified information, provided that the procuring entity solicits proposals from a sufficient number of suppliers or contractors to ensure effective competition.

3. The procuring entity shall include in the record required under article 25 of this Law a statement of the reasons and circumstances upon which it relied to justify the use of direct solicitation in request-for-proposals proceedings.

4. The procuring entity shall cause a notice of the procurement to be published in accordance with the requirements set out in paragraph 5 of article 34 of this Law when it engages in direct solicitation in request-for-proposals proceedings.

CHAPTER III. OPEN TENDERING

Section I. Solicitation of tenders

Article 36. Procedures for soliciting tenders

The procuring entity shall solicit tenders by causing an invitation to tender to be published in accordance with the provisions of article 33 of this Law.

Article 37. Contents of invitation to tender

The invitation to tender shall include the following information:

- (a) The name and address of the procuring entity;
- (b) A summary of the principal required terms and conditions of the procurement contract to be entered into as a result of the procurement proceedings, including the nature, quantity and place of delivery of the goods to be supplied, the nature and location of the construction to be effected or the nature of the services and the location where they are to be provided, as well as the desired or required time for the supply of the goods, the completion of the construction or the provision of the services;
- (c) A summary of the criteria and procedures to be used for ascertaining the qualifications of suppliers or contractors, and of any documentary evidence or other information that must be submitted by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications, in conformity with article 9 of this Law;
- (d) A declaration pursuant to article 8 of this Law;
- (e) The means of obtaining the solicitation documents and the place where they may be obtained;

- (f) The price, if any, to be charged by the procuring entity for the solicitation documents;
- (g) If a price is to be charged for the solicitation documents, the means and currency of payment;
- (h) The language or languages in which the solicitation documents are available;
- (i) The manner, place and deadline for presenting tenders.

Article 38. Provision of solicitation documents

The procuring entity shall provide the solicitation documents to each supplier or contractor that responds to the invitation to tender in accordance with the procedures and requirements specified therein. If pre-qualification proceedings have been engaged in, the procuring entity shall provide a set of solicitation documents to each supplier or contractor that has been pre-qualified and that pays the price, if any, charged for those documents. The price that the procuring entity may charge for the solicitation documents shall reflect only the cost of providing them to suppliers or contractors.

Article 39. Contents of solicitation documents

The solicitation documents shall include the following information:

- (a) Instructions for preparing tenders;
- (b) The criteria and procedures, in conformity with the provisions of article 9 of this Law, that will be applied in the ascertainment of the qualifications of suppliers or contractors and in any further demonstration of qualifications pursuant to paragraph 5 of article 43 of this Law;
- (c) The requirements as to documentary evidence or other information that must be presented by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications;
- (d) A detailed description of the subject matter of the procurement, in conformity with article 10 of this Law; the quantity of the goods; the services to be performed; the location where the goods are to be delivered, construction is to be effected or services are to be provided; and the desired or required time, if any, when goods are to be delivered, construction is to be effected or services are to be provided;
- (e) The terms and conditions of the procurement contract, to the extent that they are already known to the procuring entity, and the form of the contract, if any, to be signed by the parties;

(f) If alternatives to the characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement, the contractual terms and conditions or other requirements set out in the solicitation documents are permitted, a statement to that effect and a description of the manner in which alternative tenders are to be evaluated;

(g) If suppliers or contractors are permitted to present tenders for only a portion of the subject matter of the procurement, a description of the portion or portions for which tenders may be presented;

(h) The manner in which the tender price is to be formulated and expressed, including a statement as to whether the price is to cover elements other than the cost of the subject matter of the procurement itself, such as any applicable transportation and insurance charges, customs duties and taxes;

(i) The currency or currencies in which the tender price is to be formulated and expressed;

(j) The language or languages, in conformity with article 13 of this Law, in which tenders are to be prepared;

(k) Any requirements of the procuring entity with respect to the issuer and the nature, form, amount and other principal terms and conditions of any tender security to be provided by suppliers or contractors presenting tenders in accordance with article 17 of this Law, and any such requirements for any security for the performance of the procurement contract to be provided by the supplier or contractor that enters into the procurement contract, including securities such as labour and material bonds;

(l) If a supplier or contractor may not modify or withdraw its tender prior to the deadline for presenting tenders without forfeiting its tender security, a statement to that effect;

(m) The manner, place and deadline for presenting tenders, in conformity with article 14 of this Law;

(n) The means by which, pursuant to article 15 of this Law, suppliers or contractors may seek clarification of the solicitation documents and a statement as to whether the procuring entity intends to convene a meeting of suppliers or contractors at this stage;

(o) The period of time during which tenders shall be in effect, in conformity with article 41 of this Law;

(p) The manner, place, date and time for the opening of tenders, in conformity with article 42 of this Law;

(q) The criteria and procedure for examining tenders against the description of the subject matter of the procurement;

(r) The criteria and procedure for evaluating tenders in accordance with article 11 of this Law;

(s) The currency that will be used for the purpose of evaluating tenders pursuant to paragraph 4 of article 43 of this Law and either the exchange rate that will be used for the conversion of tender prices into that currency or a statement that the rate published by a specified financial institution and prevailing on a specified date will be used;

(t) References to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the procurement proceedings, including those applicable to procurement involving classified information, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;

(u) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the procurement proceedings without the intervention of an intermediary;

(v) Notice of the right provided under article 64 of this Law to challenge or appeal decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity that are allegedly not in compliance with the provisions of this Law, together with information about the duration of the applicable standstill period and, if none will apply, a statement to that effect and the reasons therefor;

(w) Any formalities that will be required, once a successful tender has been accepted, for a procurement contract to enter into force, including, where applicable, the execution of a written procurement contract and approval by another authority pursuant to article 22 of this Law, and the estimated period of time following the dispatch of the notice of acceptance that will be required to obtain the approval;

(x) Any other requirements established by the procuring entity in conformity with this Law and the procurement regulations relating to the preparation and presentation of tenders and to other aspects of the procurement proceedings.

Section II. Presentation of tenders

Article 40. Presentation of tenders

1. Tenders shall be presented in the manner, at the place and by the deadline specified in the solicitation documents.
2. (a) A tender shall be presented in writing, signed and:
  - (i) If in paper form, in a sealed envelope; or
  - (ii) If in any other form, according to the requirements specified by the procuring entity in the solicitation documents, which shall ensure at least a similar degree of authenticity, security, integrity and confidentiality;

(b) The procuring entity shall provide to the supplier or contractor a receipt showing the date and time when its tender was received;

(c) The procuring entity shall preserve the security, integrity and confidentiality of a tender and shall ensure that the content of the tender is examined only after it is opened in accordance with this Law.

3. A tender received by the procuring entity after the deadline for presenting tenders shall not be opened and shall be returned unopened to the supplier or contractor that presented it.

Article 41. Period of effectiveness of tenders; modification and withdrawal of tenders

1. Tenders shall be in effect during the period of time specified in the solicitation documents.

2. (a) Prior to the expiry of the period of effectiveness of tenders, the procuring entity may request suppliers or contractors to extend the period for an additional specified period of time. A supplier or contractor may refuse the request without forfeiting its tender security;

(b) Suppliers or contractors that agree to an extension of the period of effectiveness of their tenders shall extend or procure an extension of the period of effectiveness of tender securities provided by them or provide new tender securities to cover the extended period of effectiveness of their tenders. A supplier or contractor whose tender security is not extended, or that has not provided a new tender security, is considered to have refused the request to extend the period of effectiveness of its tender.

3. Unless otherwise stipulated in the solicitation documents, a supplier or contractor may modify or withdraw its tender prior to the deadline for presenting tenders without forfeiting its tender security. The modification or notice of withdrawal is effective if it is received by the procuring entity prior to the deadline for presenting tenders.

Section III. Evaluation of tenders

Article 42. Opening of tenders

1. Tenders shall be opened at the time specified in the solicitation documents as the deadline for presenting tenders. They shall be opened at the place and in accordance with the manner and procedures specified in the solicitation documents.

2. All suppliers or contractors that have presented tenders, or their representatives, shall be permitted by the procuring entity to participate in the opening of tenders.
3. The name and address of each supplier or contractor whose tender is opened and the tender price shall be announced to those persons present at the opening of tenders, communicated on request to suppliers or contractors that have presented tenders but that are not present or represented at the opening of tenders, and included immediately in the record of the procurement proceedings required by article 25 of this Law.

Article 43. Examination and evaluation of tenders

1. (a) Subject to subparagraph (b) of this paragraph, the procuring entity shall regard a tender as responsive if it conforms to all requirements set out in the solicitation documents in accordance with article 10 of this Law;

(b) The procuring entity may regard a tender as responsive even if it contains minor deviations that do not materially alter or depart from the characteristics, terms, conditions and other requirements set out in the solicitation documents or if it contains errors or oversights that can be corrected without touching on the substance of the tender. Any such deviations shall be quantified, to the extent possible, and appropriately taken account of in the evaluation of tenders.

2. The procuring entity shall reject a tender:

- (a) If the supplier or contractor that presented the tender is not qualified;
- (b) If the supplier or contractor that presented the tender does not accept a correction of an arithmetical error made pursuant to article 16 of this Law;
- (c) If the tender is not responsive;
- (d) In the circumstances referred to in article 20 or 21 of this Law.

3. (a) The procuring entity shall evaluate the tenders that have not been rejected in order to ascertain the successful tender, as defined in subparagraph (b) of this paragraph, in accordance with the criteria and procedures set out in the solicitation documents. No criterion or procedure shall be used that has not been set out in the solicitation documents;

- (b) The successful tender shall be:
  - (i) Where price is the only award criterion, the tender with the lowest tender price; or

- (ii) Where there are price and other award criteria, the most advantageous tender ascertained on the basis of the criteria and procedures for evaluating tenders specified in the solicitation documents in accordance with article 11 of this Law.

4. When tender prices are expressed in two or more currencies, for the purpose of evaluating and comparing tenders, the tender prices of all tenders shall be converted to the currency specified in the solicitation documents according to the rate set out in those documents, pursuant to subparagraph (s) of article 39 of this Law.

5. Whether or not it has engaged in pre-qualification proceedings pursuant to article 18 of this Law, the procuring entity may require the supplier or contractor presenting the tender that has been found to be the successful tender pursuant to paragraph 3 (b) of this article to demonstrate its qualifications again, in accordance with criteria and procedures conforming to the provisions of article 9 of this Law. The criteria and procedures to be used for such further demonstration shall be set out in the solicitation documents. Where pre-qualification proceedings have been engaged in, the criteria shall be the same as those used in the pre-qualification proceedings.

6. If the supplier or contractor presenting the successful tender is requested to demonstrate its qualifications again in accordance with paragraph 5 of this article but fails to do so, the procuring entity shall reject that tender and shall select the next successful tender from among those remaining in effect, in accordance with paragraph 3 of this article, subject to the right of the procuring entity to cancel the procurement in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law.

Article 44. Prohibition of negotiations with suppliers or contractors

No negotiations shall take place between the procuring entity and a supplier or contractor with respect to a tender presented by the supplier or contractor.

CHAPTER IV. PROCEDURES FOR RESTRICTED TENDERING, REQUESTS FOR QUOTATIONS AND REQUESTS FOR PROPOSALS WITHOUT NEGOTIATION

Article 45. Restricted tendering

1. The procuring entity shall solicit tenders in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 5 of article 34 of this Law.

2. The provisions of chapter III of this Law, except for articles 36 to 38, shall apply to restricted-tendering proceedings.

Article 46. Request for quotations

1. The procuring entity shall request quotations in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 2 of article 34 of this Law. Each supplier or contractor from which a quotation is requested shall be informed whether any elements other than the charges for the subject matter of the procurement itself, such as any applicable transportation and insurance charges, customs duties and taxes, are to be included in the price.

2. Each supplier or contractor is permitted to give only one price quotation and is not permitted to change its quotation. No negotiations shall take place between the procuring entity and a supplier or contractor with respect to a quotation presented by the supplier or contractor.

3. The successful quotation shall be the lowest-priced quotation meeting the needs of the procuring entity as set out in the request for quotations.

Article 47. Request for proposals without negotiation

1. The procuring entity shall solicit proposals by causing an invitation to participate in the request-for-proposals-without-negotiation proceedings to be published in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 35 of this Law, unless an exception provided for in that article applies.

2. The invitation shall include:

(a) The name and address of the procuring entity;

(b) A detailed description of the subject matter of the procurement, in conformity with article 10 of this Law, and the desired or required time and location for the provision of such subject matter;

(c) The terms and conditions of the procurement contract, to the extent that they are already known to the procuring entity, and the form of the contract, if any, to be signed by the parties;

(d) The criteria and procedures to be used for ascertaining the qualifications of suppliers or contractors and any documentary evidence or other information that must be presented by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications, in conformity with article 9 of this Law;

(e) The criteria and procedures for opening the proposals and for examining and evaluating the proposals in accordance with articles 10 and 11 of this Law, including the minimum requirements with respect to technical, quality and performance characteristics that proposals must meet in order to be considered responsive in accordance with article 10 of this Law, and a statement that proposals that fail to meet those requirements will be rejected as non-responsive;

(f) A declaration pursuant to article 8 of this Law;

(g) The means of obtaining the request for proposals and the place where it may be obtained;

(h) The price, if any, to be charged by the procuring entity for the request for proposals;

(i) If a price is to be charged for the request for proposals, the means and currency of payment;

(j) The language or languages in which the request for proposals is available;

(k) The manner, place and deadline for presenting proposals.

3. The procuring entity shall issue the request for proposals:

(a) Where an invitation to participate in the request-for-proposals-without-negotiation proceedings has been published in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 35 of this Law, to each supplier or contractor responding to the invitation in accordance with the procedures and requirements specified therein;

(b) In the case of pre-qualification, to each supplier or contractor pre-qualified in accordance with article 18 of this Law;

(c) In the case of direct solicitation under paragraph 2 of article 35 of this Law, to each supplier or contractor selected by the procuring entity; that pays the price, if any, charged for the request for proposals. The price that the procuring entity may charge for the request for proposals shall reflect only the cost of providing it to suppliers or contractors.

4. The request for proposals shall include, in addition to the information referred to in subparagraphs (a) to (e) and (k) of paragraph 2 of this article, the following information:

(a) Instructions for preparing and presenting proposals, including instructions to suppliers or contractors to present simultaneously to the procuring entity proposals in two envelopes: one envelope containing the technical, quality and performance characteristics of the proposal, and the other envelope containing the financial aspects of the proposal;

(b) If suppliers or contractors are permitted to present proposals for only a portion of the subject matter of the procurement, a description of the portion or portions for which proposals may be presented;

(c) The currency or currencies in which the proposal price is to be formulated and expressed, the currency that will be used for the purpose of evaluating proposals and either the exchange rate that will be used for the conversion of proposal prices into that currency or a statement that the rate published by a specified financial institution and prevailing on a specified date will be used;

(d) The manner in which the proposal price is to be formulated and expressed, including a statement as to whether the price is to cover elements other than the cost of the subject matter of the procurement itself, such as reimbursement for transportation, lodging, insurance, use of equipment, duties or taxes;

(e) The means by which, pursuant to article 15 of this Law, suppliers or contractors may seek clarification of the request for proposals, and a statement as to whether the procuring entity intends to convene a meeting of suppliers or contractors at this stage;

(f) References to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the procurement proceedings, including those applicable to procurement involving classified information, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;

(g) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the procurement proceedings without the intervention of an intermediary;

(h) Notice of the right provided under article 64 of this Law to challenge or appeal decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity that are allegedly not in compliance with the provisions of this Law, together with information about the duration of the applicable standstill period and, if none will apply, a statement to that effect and the reasons therefor;

(i) Any formalities that will be required, once the successful proposal has been accepted, for a procurement contract to enter into force, including, where applicable, the execution of a written procurement contract and approval by another authority pursuant to article 22 of this Law, and the estimated period of time following the dispatch of the notice of acceptance that will be required to obtain the approval;

(j) Any other requirements that may be established by the procuring entity in conformity with this Law and the procurement regulations relating to the preparation and presentation of proposals and to the procurement proceedings.

5. Before opening the envelopes containing the financial aspects of the proposals, the procuring entity shall examine and evaluate the technical, quality and performance characteristics of proposals in accordance with the criteria and procedures specified in the request for proposals.

6. The results of the examination and evaluation of the technical, quality and performance characteristics of the proposals shall immediately be included in the record of the procurement proceedings.
7. The proposals whose technical, quality and performance characteristics fail to meet the relevant minimum requirements shall be considered to be non-responsive and shall be rejected on that ground. A notice of rejection and the reasons for the rejection, together with the unopened envelope containing the financial aspects of the proposal, shall promptly be dispatched to each respective supplier or contractor whose proposal was rejected.
8. The proposals whose technical, quality and performance characteristics meet or exceed the relevant minimum requirements shall be considered to be responsive. The procuring entity shall promptly communicate to each supplier or contractor presenting such a proposal the score of the technical, quality and performance characteristics of its respective proposal. The procuring entity shall invite all such suppliers or contractors to the opening of the envelopes containing the financial aspects of their proposals.
9. The score of the technical, quality and performance characteristics of each responsive proposal and the corresponding financial aspect of that proposal shall be read out in the presence of the suppliers or contractors invited, in accordance with paragraph 8 of this article, to the opening of the envelopes containing the financial aspects of the proposals.
10. The procuring entity shall compare the financial aspects of the responsive proposals and on that basis identify the successful proposal in accordance with the criteria and the procedure set out in the request for proposals. The successful proposal shall be the proposal with the best combined evaluation in terms of: (a) the criteria other than price specified in the request for proposals; and (b) the price.

CHAPTER V. PROCEDURES FOR TWO-STAGE TENDERING, REQUESTS FOR PROPOSALS WITH DIALOGUE, REQUESTS FOR PROPOSALS WITH CONSECUTIVE NEGOTIATIONS, COMPETITIVE NEGOTIATIONS AND SINGLE-SOURCE PROCUREMENT

Article 48. Two-stage tendering

1. The provisions of chapter III of this Law shall apply to two-stage-tendering proceedings, except to the extent that those provisions are derogated from in this article.

2. The solicitation documents shall call upon suppliers or contractors to present, in the first stage of two-stage-tendering proceedings, initial tenders containing their proposals without a tender price. The solicitation documents may solicit proposals relating to the technical, quality or performance characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement, as well as to contractual terms and conditions of supply and, where relevant, the professional and technical competence and qualifications of the suppliers or contractors.

3. The procuring entity may, in the first stage, engage in discussions with suppliers or contractors whose initial tenders have not been rejected pursuant to provisions of this Law concerning any aspect of their initial tenders. When the procuring entity engages in discussions with any supplier or contractor, it shall extend an equal opportunity to participate in discussions to all suppliers or contractors.

4. (a) In the second stage of two-stage-tendering proceedings, the procuring entity shall invite all suppliers or contractors whose initial tenders were not rejected in the first stage to present final tenders with prices in response to a revised set of terms and conditions of the procurement;

(b) In revising the relevant terms and conditions of the procurement, the procuring entity may not modify the subject matter of the procurement but may refine aspects of the description of the subject matter of the procurement by:

- (i) Deleting or modifying any aspect of the technical, quality or performance characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement initially provided and adding any new characteristics that conform to the requirements of this Law;
- (ii) Deleting or modifying any criterion for examining or evaluating tenders initially provided and adding any new criterion that conforms to the requirements of this Law, only to the extent that the deletion, modification or addition is required as a result of changes made in the technical, quality or performance characteristics of the subject matter of the procurement;

(c) Any deletion, modification or addition made pursuant to subparagraph (b) of this paragraph shall be communicated to suppliers or contractors in the invitation to present final tenders;

(d) A supplier or contractor not wishing to present a final tender may withdraw from the tendering proceedings without forfeiting any tender security that the supplier or contractor may have been required to provide;

(e) The final tenders shall be evaluated in order to ascertain the successful tender as defined in paragraph 3 (b) of article 43 of this Law.

Article 49. Request for proposals with dialogue

1. The procuring entity shall solicit proposals by causing an invitation to participate in the request-for-proposals-with-dialogue proceedings to be published in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 35 of this Law, unless an exception provided for in that article applies.
2. The invitation shall include:
  - (a) The name and address of the procuring entity;
  - (b) A description of the subject matter of the procurement, to the extent known, and the desired or required time and location for the provision of such subject matter;
  - (c) The terms and conditions of the procurement contract, to the extent that they are already known to the procuring entity, and the form of the contract, if any, to be signed by the parties;
  - (d) The intended stages of the procedure;
  - (e) The criteria and procedures to be used for ascertaining the qualifications of suppliers or contractors and any documentary evidence or other information that must be presented by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications, in conformity with article 9 of this Law;
  - (f) The minimum requirements that proposals must meet in order to be considered responsive in accordance with article 10 of this Law and a statement that proposals that fail to meet those requirements will be rejected as non-responsive;
  - (g) A declaration pursuant to article 8 of this Law;
  - (h) The means of obtaining the request for proposals and the place where it may be obtained;
  - (i) The price, if any, to be charged by the procuring entity for the request for proposals;
  - (j) If a price is to be charged for the request for proposals, the means and currency of payment;
  - (k) The language or languages in which the request for proposals is available;
  - (l) The manner, place and deadline for presenting proposals.
3. For the purpose of limiting the number of suppliers or contractors from which to request proposals, the procuring entity may engage in pre-selection proceedings. The provisions of article 18 of this Law shall apply mutatis mutandis to the pre-selection proceedings, except to the extent that those provisions are derogated from in this paragraph:

(a) The procuring entity shall specify in the pre-selection documents that it will request proposals from only a limited number of pre-selected suppliers or contractors that best meet the qualification criteria specified in the pre-selection documents;

(b) The pre-selection documents shall set out the maximum number of pre-selected suppliers or contractors from which the proposals will be requested and the manner in which the selection of that number will be carried out. In establishing such a limit, the procuring entity shall bear in mind the need to ensure effective competition;

(c) The procuring entity shall rate the suppliers or contractors that meet the criteria specified in the pre-selection documents according to the manner of rating that is set out in the invitation to pre-selection and the pre-selection documents;

(d) The procuring entity shall pre-select suppliers or contractors that acquired the best rating, up to the maximum number indicated in the pre-selection documents but at least three, if possible;

(e) The procuring entity shall promptly notify each supplier or contractor whether it has been pre-selected and shall, upon request, communicate to suppliers or contractors that have not been pre-selected the reasons therefor. It shall make available to any person, upon request, the names of all suppliers or contractors that have been pre-selected.

4. The procuring entity shall issue the request for proposals:

(a) Where an invitation to participate in the request-for-proposals-with-dialogue proceedings has been published in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 35 of this Law, to each supplier or contractor responding to the invitation in accordance with the procedures and requirements specified therein;

(b) In the case of pre-qualification, to each supplier or contractor pre-qualified in accordance with article 18 of this Law;

(c) Where pre-selection proceedings have been engaged in, to each pre-selected supplier or contractor in accordance with the procedures and requirements specified in the pre-selection documents;

(d) In the case of direct solicitation under paragraph 2 of article 35 of this Law, to each supplier or contractor selected by the procuring entity; that pays the price, if any, charged for the request for proposals. The price that the procuring entity may charge for the request for proposals shall reflect only the cost of providing it to suppliers or contractors.

5. The request for proposals shall include, in addition to the information referred to in paragraphs 2 (a) to (f) and (l) of this article, the following information:

(a) Instructions for preparing and presenting proposals;

(b) If suppliers or contractors are permitted to present proposals for only a portion of the subject matter of the procurement, a description of the portion or portions for which proposals may be presented;

(c) The currency or currencies in which the proposal price is to be formulated and expressed, the currency that will be used for the purpose of evaluating proposals and either the exchange rate that will be used for the conversion of proposal prices into that currency or a statement that the rate published by a specified financial institution and prevailing on a specified date will be used;

(d) The manner in which the proposal price is to be formulated and expressed, including a statement as to whether the price is to cover elements other than the cost of the subject matter of the procurement itself, such as reimbursement for transportation, lodging, insurance, use of equipment, duties or taxes;

(e) The means by which, pursuant to article 15 of this Law, suppliers or contractors may seek clarification of the request for proposals and a statement as to whether the procuring entity intends to convene a meeting of suppliers or contractors at this stage;

(f) Any element of the description of the subject matter of the procurement or term or condition of the procurement contract that will not be the subject of dialogue during the procedure;

(g) Where the procuring entity intends to limit the number of suppliers or contractors that it will invite to participate in the dialogue, the minimum number of suppliers or contractors, which shall be not lower than three, if possible, and, where appropriate, the maximum number of suppliers or contractors and the criteria and procedure, in conformity with the provisions of this Law, that will be followed in selecting either number;

(h) The criteria and procedure for evaluating the proposals in accordance with article 11 of this Law;

(i) References to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the procurement proceedings, including those applicable to procurement involving classified information, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;

(j) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the procurement proceedings without the intervention of an intermediary;

(k) Notice of the right provided under article 64 of this Law to challenge or appeal decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity that are allegedly not in compliance with the provisions of this Law, together with information about the duration of the applicable standstill period and, if none will apply, a statement to that effect and the reasons therefor;

(l) Any formalities that will be required, once the successful offer has been accepted, for a procurement contract to enter into force, including, where applicable, the execution of a written procurement contract and approval by another authority pursuant to article 22 of this Law, and the estimated period of time following dispatch of the notice of acceptance that will be required to obtain the approval;

(m) Any other requirements that may be established by the procuring entity in conformity with this Law and the procurement regulations relating to the preparation and presentation of proposals and to the procurement proceedings.

6. (a) The procuring entity shall examine all proposals received against the established minimum requirements and shall reject each proposal that fails to meet these minimum requirements on the ground that it is non-responsive;

(b) Where a maximum limit on the number of suppliers or contractors that can be invited to participate in the dialogue has been established and the number of responsive proposals exceeds that limit, the procuring entity shall select the maximum number of responsive proposals in accordance with the criteria and procedure specified in the request for proposals;

(c) A notice of rejection and the reasons for the rejection shall be promptly dispatched to each respective supplier or contractor whose proposal was rejected.

7. The procuring entity shall invite each supplier or contractor that presented a responsive proposal, within any applicable maximum, to participate in the dialogue. The procuring entity shall ensure that the number of suppliers or contractors invited to participate in the dialogue, which shall be at least three, if possible, is sufficient to ensure effective competition.

8. The dialogue shall be conducted by the same representatives of the procuring entity on a concurrent basis.

9. During the course of the dialogue, the procuring entity shall not modify the subject matter of the procurement, any qualification or evaluation criterion, any minimum requirements established pursuant to paragraph 2 (f) of this article, any element of the description of the subject matter of the procurement or any term or condition of the procurement contract that is not subject to the dialogue as specified in the request for proposals.

10. Any requirements, guidelines, documents, clarifications or other information generated during the dialogue that is communicated by the procuring entity to a supplier or contractor shall be communicated at the same time and on an equal basis to all other participating suppliers or contractors, unless such information is specific or exclusive to that supplier or contractor or such communication would be in breach of the confidentiality provisions of article 24 of this Law.

11. Following the dialogue, the procuring entity shall request all suppliers or contractors remaining in the proceedings to present a best and final offer with respect to all aspects of their proposals. The request shall be in writing and shall specify the manner, place and deadline for presenting best and final offers.

12. No negotiations shall take place between the procuring entity and suppliers or contractors with respect to their best and final offers.

13. The successful offer shall be the offer that best meets the needs of the procuring entity as determined in accordance with the criteria and procedure for evaluating the proposals set out in the request for proposals.

Article 50. Request for proposals with consecutive negotiations

1. The provisions of paragraphs 1 to 7 of article 47 of this Law shall apply mutatis mutandis to procurement conducted by means of request for proposals with consecutive negotiations, except to the extent that those provisions are derogated from in this article.

2. Proposals whose technical, quality and performance characteristics meet or exceed the relevant minimum requirements shall be considered to be responsive. The procuring entity shall rank each responsive proposal in accordance with the criteria and procedure for evaluating proposals as set out in the request for proposals and shall:

(a) Promptly communicate to each supplier or contractor presenting a responsive proposal the score of the technical, quality and performance characteristics of its respective proposal and its ranking;

(b) Invite the supplier or contractor that has attained the best ranking, in accordance with those criteria and procedure, for negotiations on the financial aspects of its proposal; and

(c) Inform other suppliers or contractors that presented responsive proposals that their proposals may be considered for negotiation if negotiations with the supplier (or suppliers) or contractor (or contractors) with a better ranking do not result in a procurement contract.

3. If it becomes apparent to the procuring entity that the negotiations with the supplier or contractor invited pursuant to paragraph 2 (b) of this article will not result in a procurement contract, the procuring entity shall inform that supplier or contractor that it is terminating the negotiations.
4. The procuring entity shall then invite for negotiations the supplier or contractor that attained the second-best ranking; if the negotiations with that supplier or contractor do not result in a procurement contract, the procuring entity shall invite the other suppliers or contractors still participating in the procurement proceedings for negotiations on the basis of their ranking until it arrives at a procurement contract or rejects all remaining proposals.
5. During the course of the negotiations, the procuring entity shall not modify the subject matter of the procurement; any qualification, examination or evaluation criterion, including any established minimum requirements; any element of the description of the subject matter of the procurement; or term or condition of the procurement contract other than financial aspects of proposals that are subject to the negotiations as specified in the request for proposals.
6. The procuring entity may not reopen negotiations with any supplier or contractor with which it has terminated negotiations.

Article 51. Competitive negotiations

1. Paragraphs 3, 5 and 6 of article 34 of this Law shall apply to the procedure preceding the negotiations.
2. Any requirements, guidelines, documents, clarifications or other information relative to the negotiations that is communicated by the procuring entity to a supplier or contractor before or during the negotiations shall be communicated at the same time and on an equal basis to all other suppliers or contractors engaging in negotiations with the procuring entity relative to the procurement, unless such information is specific or exclusive to that supplier or contractor or such communication would be in breach of the confidentiality provisions of article 24 of this Law.
3. Following completion of negotiations, the procuring entity shall request all suppliers or contractors remaining in the proceedings to present, by a specified date, a best and final offer with respect to all aspects of their proposals.
4. No negotiations shall take place between the procuring entity and suppliers or contractors with respect to their best and final offers.

5. The successful offer shall be the offer that best meets the needs of the procuring entity.

Article 52. Single-source procurement

Paragraphs 4 to 6 of article 34 of this Law shall apply to the procedure preceding the solicitation of a proposal or price quotation from a single supplier or contractor. The procuring entity shall engage in negotiations with the supplier or contractor from which a proposal or price quotation is solicited unless such negotiations are not feasible in the circumstances of the procurement concerned.

CHAPTER VI. ELECTRONIC REVERSE AUCTIONS

Article 53. Electronic reverse auction as a stand-alone method of procurement

1. The procuring entity shall solicit bids by causing an invitation to the electronic reverse auction to be published in accordance with article 33 of this Law. The invitation shall include:

- (a) The name and address of the procuring entity;
- (b) A detailed description of the subject matter of the procurement, in conformity with article 10 of this Law, and the desired or required time and location for the provision of such subject matter;
- (c) The terms and conditions of the procurement contract, to the extent they are already known to the procuring entity, and the form of the contract, if any, to be signed by the parties;
- (d) A declaration pursuant to article 8 of this Law;
- (e) The criteria and procedures to be used for ascertaining the qualifications of suppliers or contractors and any documentary evidence or other information that must be presented by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications in conformity with article 9 of this Law;
- (f) The criteria and procedure for examining bids against the description of the subject matter of the procurement;
- (g) The criteria and procedure for evaluating bids in accordance with article 11 of this Law, including any mathematical formula that will be used in the evaluation procedure during the auction;

(h) The manner in which the bid price is to be formulated and expressed, including a statement as to whether the price is to cover elements other than the cost of the subject matter of the procurement itself, such as any applicable transportation and insurance charges, customs duties and taxes;

(i) The currency or currencies in which the bid price is to be formulated and expressed;

(j) The minimum number of suppliers or contractors required to register for the auction in order for the auction to be held, which shall be sufficient to ensure effective competition;

[(k) If any limit on the number of suppliers or contractors that can be registered for the auction is imposed in accordance with paragraph 2 of this article, the relevant maximum number and the criteria and procedure, in conformity with paragraph 2 of this article, that will be followed in selecting it;]

(l) How the auction can be accessed, including appropriate information regarding connection to the auction;

(m) The deadline by which suppliers or contractors must register for the auction and the requirements for registration;

(n) The date and time of the opening of the auction and the requirements for identification of bidders at the opening of the auction;

(o) The criteria governing the closing of the auction;

(p) Other rules for the conduct of the auction, including the information that will be made available to the bidders in the course of the auction, the language in which it will be made available and the conditions under which the bidders will be able to bid;

(q) References to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the procurement proceedings, including those applicable to procurement involving classified information, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;

(r) The means by which suppliers or contractors may seek clarification of information relating to the procurement proceedings;

(s) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the procurement proceedings before and after the auction without the intervention of an intermediary;

(t) Notice of the right provided under article 64 of this Law to challenge or appeal decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity that are allegedly not in compliance with the provisions of this Law, together with information about the duration of the applicable standstill period and, if none will apply, a statement to that effect and the reasons therefor;

(u) Any formalities that will be required after the auction for a procurement contract to enter into force, including, where applicable, ascertainment of qualifications or responsiveness in accordance with article 57 of this Law and the execution of a written procurement contract pursuant to article 22 of this Law;

(v) Any other requirements established by the procuring entity in conformity with this Law and the procurement regulations relating to the procurement proceedings.

[2. The procuring entity may impose a maximum limit on the number of suppliers or contractors that can be registered for the electronic reverse auction only to the extent that capacity constraints in its communications system so require, and shall select the suppliers or contractors to be so registered in a non-discriminatory manner. The procuring entity shall include a statement of the reasons and circumstances upon which it relied to justify the imposition of such a maximum limit in the record required under article 25 of this Law.]

3. The procuring entity may decide, in the light of the circumstances of the given procurement, that the electronic reverse auction shall be preceded by an examination or evaluation of initial bids. In such case, the invitation to the auction shall, in addition to information listed in paragraph 1 of this article, include:

(a) An invitation to present initial bids, together with instructions for preparing initial bids;

(b) The manner, place and deadline for presenting initial bids.

4. Where the electronic reverse auction has been preceded by an examination or evaluation of initial bids, the procuring entity shall promptly after the completion of the examination or evaluation of initial bids:

(a) Dispatch the notice of rejection and reasons for rejection to each supplier or contractor whose initial bid was rejected;

(b) Issue an invitation to the auction to each qualified supplier or contractor whose initial bid is responsive, providing all information required to participate in the auction;

(c) Where an evaluation of initial bids has taken place, each invitation to the auction shall also be accompanied by the outcome of the evaluation, as relevant to the supplier or contractor to which the invitation is addressed.

Article 54. Electronic reverse auction as a phase preceding the award of the procurement contract

1. Where an electronic reverse auction is to be used as a phase preceding the award of the procurement contract in a procurement method, as appropriate, or in a framework agreement procedure with second-stage competition, the procuring entity shall notify suppliers or contractors when first soliciting their participation in the procurement proceedings that an auction will be held, and shall provide, in addition to other information required to be included under provisions of this Law, the following information about the auction:

(a) The mathematical formula that will be used in the evaluation procedure during the auction;

(b) How the auction can be accessed, including appropriate information regarding connection to the auction.

2. Before the electronic reverse auction is held, the procuring entity shall issue an invitation to the auction to all suppliers or contractors remaining in the proceedings, specifying:

(a) The deadline by which the suppliers or contractors must register for the auction and requirements for registration;

(b) The date and time of the opening of the auction and requirements for the identification of bidders at the opening of the auction;

(c) Criteria governing the closing of the auction;

(d) Other rules for the conduct of the auction, including the information that will be made available to the bidders during the auction and the conditions under which the bidders will be able to bid.

3. Where an evaluation of initial bids has taken place, each invitation to the auction shall also be accompanied by the outcome of the evaluation as relevant to the supplier or contractor to which the invitation is addressed.

Article 55. Registration for the electronic reverse auction and the timing of the holding of the auction

1. Confirmation of registration for the electronic reverse auction shall be communicated promptly to each registered supplier or contractor.

2. If the number of suppliers or contractors registered for the electronic reverse auction is insufficient to ensure effective competition, the procuring entity may cancel the auction. The cancellation of the auction shall be communicated promptly to each registered supplier or contractor.

3. The period of time between the issuance of the invitation to the electronic reverse auction and the auction shall be sufficiently long to allow suppliers or contractors to prepare for the auction, taking into account the reasonable needs of the procuring entity.

Article 56. Requirements during the electronic reverse auction

1. The electronic reverse auction shall be based on:

(a) Price, where the procurement contract is to be awarded to the lowest-priced bid; or

(b) Price and other criteria specified to suppliers or contractors under articles 53 and 54 of this Law, as applicable, where the procurement contract is to be awarded to the most advantageous bid.

2. During the auction:

(a) All bidders shall have an equal and continuous opportunity to present their bids;

(b) There shall be automatic evaluation of all bids in accordance with the criteria, procedure and formula provided to suppliers or contractors under articles 53 and 54 of this Law, as applicable;

(c) Each bidder must receive, instantaneously and on a continuous basis during the auction, sufficient information allowing it to determine the standing of its bid vis-à-vis other bids;

(d) There shall be no communication between the procuring entity and the bidders or among the bidders, other than as provided for in subparagraphs (a) and (c) of this paragraph.

3. The procuring entity shall not disclose the identity of any bidder during the auction.

4. The auction shall be closed in accordance with the criteria specified to suppliers or contractors under articles 53 and 54 of this Law, as applicable.

5. The procuring entity shall suspend or terminate the auction in the case of failures in its communication system that put at risk the proper conduct of the auction or for other reasons stipulated in the rules for the conduct of the auction. The procuring entity shall not disclose the identity of any bidder in the case of suspension or termination of the auction.

Article 57. Requirements after the electronic reverse auction

1. The bid that at the closure of the electronic reverse auction is the lowest-priced bid or the most advantageous bid, as applicable, shall be the successful bid.

2. In procurement by means of an auction that was not preceded by examination or evaluation of initial bids, the procuring entity shall ascertain after the auction the responsiveness of the successful bid and the qualifications of the supplier or contractor submitting it. The procuring entity shall reject that bid if it is found to be unresponsive or if the supplier or contractor submitting it is found unqualified. Without prejudice to the right of the procuring entity to cancel the procurement in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law, the procuring entity shall select the bid that was the next lowest-priced or next most advantageous bid at the closure of the auction, provided that that bid is ascertained to be responsive and the supplier or contractor submitting it is ascertained to be qualified.

3. Where the successful bid at the closure of the auction appears to the procuring entity to be abnormally low and gives rise to concerns on the part of the procuring entity as to the ability of the bidder that presented it to perform the procurement contract, the procuring entity may follow the procedures described in article 20 of this Law. If the procuring entity rejects the bid as abnormally low under article 20, it shall select the bid that at the closure of the auction was the next lowest-priced or next most advantageous bid. This provision is without prejudice to the right of the procuring entity to cancel the procurement in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 19 of this Law.

CHAPTER VII. FRAMEWORK AGREEMENT PROCEDURES

Article 58. Award of a closed framework agreement

1. The procuring entity shall award a closed framework agreement:

(a) By means of open-tendering proceedings, in accordance with provisions of chapter III of this Law, except to the extent that those provisions are derogated from in this chapter; or

(b) By means of other procurement methods, in accordance with the relevant provisions of chapters II, IV and V of this Law, except to the extent that those provisions are derogated from in this chapter.

2. The provisions of this Law regulating pre-qualification and the contents of the solicitation in the context of the procurement methods referred to in paragraph 1 of this article shall apply mutatis mutandis to the information to be provided to suppliers or contractors when first soliciting their participation in a closed framework agreement procedure. The procuring entity shall in addition specify at that stage:

(a) That the procurement will be conducted as a framework agreement procedure, leading to a closed framework agreement;

(b) Whether the framework agreement is to be concluded with one or more than one supplier or contractor;

(c) If the framework agreement will be concluded with more than one supplier or contractor, any minimum or maximum limit on the number of suppliers or contractors that will be parties thereto;

(d) The form, terms and conditions of the framework agreement in accordance with article 59 of this Law.

3. The provisions of article 22 of this Law shall apply mutatis mutandis to the award of a closed framework agreement.

Article 59. Requirements for closed framework agreements

1. A closed framework agreement shall be concluded in writing and shall set out:

(a) The duration of the framework agreement, which shall not exceed the maximum duration established by the procurement regulations;

(b) The description of the subject matter of the procurement and all other terms and conditions of the procurement established when the framework agreement is concluded;

(c) To the extent that they are known, estimates of the terms and conditions of the procurement that cannot be established with sufficient precision when the framework agreement is concluded;

(d) Whether, in a closed framework agreement concluded with more than one supplier or contractor, there will be a second-stage competition to award a procurement contract under the framework agreement and, if so:

(i) A statement of the terms and conditions of the procurement that are to be established or refined through second-stage competition;

(ii) The procedures for and the anticipated frequency of any second-stage competition, and envisaged deadlines for presenting second-stage submissions;

(iii) The procedures and criteria to be applied during the second-stage competition, including the relative weight of such criteria and the manner in which they will be applied, in accordance with articles 10 and 11 of this Law. If the relative weights of the evaluation criteria may be varied during the second-stage competition, the framework agreement shall specify the permissible range;

(e) Whether the award of a procurement contract under the framework agreement will be to the lowest-priced or to the most advantageous submission; and

(f) The manner in which the procurement contract will be awarded.

2. A closed framework agreement with more than one supplier or contractor shall be concluded as one agreement between all parties unless:

(a) The procuring entity determines that it is in the interests of a party to the framework agreement that a separate agreement with any supplier or contractor party be concluded;

(b) The procuring entity includes in the record required under article 25 of this Law a statement of the reasons and circumstances on which it relied to justify the conclusion of separate agreements; and

(c) Any variation in the terms and conditions of the separate agreements for a given procurement is minor and concerns only those provisions that justify the conclusion of separate agreements.

3. The framework agreement shall contain, in addition to information specified elsewhere in this article, all information necessary to allow the effective operation of the framework agreement, including information on how the agreement and notifications of forthcoming procurement contracts thereunder can be accessed and appropriate information regarding connection, where applicable.

Article 60. Establishment of an open framework agreement

1. The procuring entity shall establish and maintain an open framework agreement online.

2. The procuring entity shall solicit participation in the open framework agreement by causing an invitation to become a party to the open framework agreement to be published following the requirements of article 33 of this Law.

3. The invitation to become a party to the open framework agreement shall include the following information:

(a) The name and address of the procuring entity establishing and maintaining the open framework agreement and the name and address of any other procuring entities that will have the right to award procurement contracts under the framework agreement;

(b) That the procurement will be conducted as a framework agreement procedure leading to an open framework agreement;

(c) The language (or languages) of the open framework agreement and all information about the operation of the agreement, including how the agreement and notifications of forthcoming procurement contracts thereunder can be accessed and appropriate information regarding connection;

(d) The terms and conditions for suppliers or contractors to be admitted to the open framework agreement, including:

(i) A declaration pursuant to article 8 of this Law;

[(ii) If any maximum limit on the number of suppliers or contractors that are parties to the open framework agreement is imposed in accordance with paragraph 7 of this article, the relevant number and the criteria and procedure, in conformity with paragraph 7 of this article, that will be followed in selecting it;]

(iii) Instructions for preparing and presenting the indicative submissions necessary to become a party to the open framework agreement, including the currency or currencies and the language (or languages) to be used, as well as the criteria and procedures to be used for ascertaining the qualifications of suppliers or contractors and any documentary evidence or other information that must be presented by suppliers or contractors to demonstrate their qualifications in conformity with article 9 of this Law;

(iv) An explicit statement that suppliers or contractors may apply to become parties to the framework agreement at any time during the period of its operation by presenting indicative submissions, subject to any maximum limit on the number of suppliers or contractors and any declaration made pursuant to article 8 of this Law;

(e) Other terms and conditions of the open framework agreement, including all information required to be set out in the open framework agreement in accordance with article 61 of this Law;

(f) References to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the procurement proceedings, including those applicable to procurement involving classified information, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;

(g) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the procurement proceedings without the intervention of an intermediary.

4. Suppliers or contractors may apply to become a party or parties to the framework agreement at any time during its operation by presenting indicative submissions to the procuring entity in compliance with the requirements of the invitation to become a party to the open framework agreement.
5. The procuring entity shall examine all indicative submissions received during the period of operation of the framework agreement within a maximum of ... working days [the enacting State specifies the maximum period of time], in accordance with the procedures set out in the invitation to become a party to the open framework agreement.
6. The framework agreement shall be concluded with all qualified suppliers or contractors that presented submissions unless their submissions have been rejected on the grounds specified in the invitation to become a party to the open framework agreement.
- [7. The procuring entity may impose a maximum limit on the number of parties to the open framework agreement only to the extent that capacity limitations in its communications system so require, and shall select the suppliers or contractors to be parties to the open framework agreement in a non-discriminatory manner. The procuring entity shall include in the record required under article 25 of this Law a statement of the reasons and circumstances upon which it relied to justify the imposition of such a maximum limit.]
8. The procuring entity shall promptly notify the suppliers or contractors whether they have become parties to the framework agreement and of the reasons for the rejection of their indicative submissions if they have not.

Article 61. Requirements for open framework agreements

1. An open framework agreement shall provide for second-stage competition for the award of a procurement contract under the agreement and shall include:
  - (a) The duration of the framework agreement;
  - (b) The description of the subject matter of the procurement and all other terms and conditions of the procurement known when the open framework agreement is established;
  - (c) Any terms and conditions of the procurement that may be refined through second-stage competition;
  - (d) The procedures and the anticipated frequency of second-stage competition;

(e) Whether the award of procurement contracts under the framework agreement will be to the lowest-priced or the most advantageous submission;

(f) The procedures and criteria to be applied during the second-stage competition, including the relative weight of the evaluation criteria and the manner in which they will be applied, in accordance with articles 10 and 11 of this Law. If the relative weights of the evaluation criteria may be varied during second-stage competition, the framework agreement shall specify the permissible range.

2. The procuring entity shall, during the entire period of operation of the open framework agreement, republish at least annually the invitation to become a party to the open framework agreement and shall in addition ensure unrestricted, direct and full access to the terms and conditions of the framework agreement and to any other necessary information relevant to its operation.

Article 62. Second stage of a framework agreement procedure

1. Any procurement contract under a framework agreement shall be awarded in accordance with the terms and conditions of the framework agreement and the provisions of this article.

2. A procurement contract under a framework agreement may be awarded only to a supplier or contractor that is a party to the framework agreement.

3. The provisions of article 22 of this Law, except for paragraph 2, shall apply to the acceptance of the successful submission under a framework agreement without second-stage competition.

4. In a closed framework agreement with second-stage competition and in an open framework agreement, the following procedures shall apply to the award of a procurement contract:

(a) The procuring entity shall issue a written invitation to present submissions, simultaneously to:

- (i) Each supplier or contractor party to the framework agreement; or
- (ii) Only to those suppliers or contractors parties to the framework agreement then capable of meeting the needs of that procuring entity in the subject matter of the procurement, provided that at the same time notice of the second-stage competition is given to all parties to the framework agreement so that they have the opportunity to participate in the second-stage competition;

(b) The invitation to present submissions shall include the following information:

- (i) A restatement of the existing terms and conditions of the framework agreement to be included in the anticipated procurement contract, a statement of the terms and conditions of the procurement that are to be subject to second-stage competition and further detail regarding those terms and conditions, where necessary;
- (ii) A restatement of the procedures and criteria for the award of the anticipated procurement contract, including their relative weight and the manner of their application;
- (iii) Instructions for preparing submissions;
- (iv) The manner, place and deadline for presenting submissions;
- (v) If suppliers or contractors are permitted to present submissions for only a portion of the subject matter of the procurement, a description of the portion or portions for which submissions may be presented;
- (vi) The manner in which the submission price is to be formulated and expressed, including a statement as to whether the price is to cover elements other than the cost of the subject matter of the procurement itself, such as any applicable transportation and insurance charges, customs duties and taxes;
- (vii) Reference to this Law, the procurement regulations and other laws and regulations directly pertinent to the procurement proceedings, including those applicable to procurement involving classified information, and the place where those laws and regulations may be found;
- (viii) The name, functional title and address of one or more officers or employees of the procuring entity who are authorized to communicate directly with and to receive communications directly from suppliers or contractors in connection with the second-stage competition without the intervention of an intermediary;
- (ix) Notice of the right provided under article 64 of this Law to challenge or appeal decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity that are allegedly not in compliance with the provisions of this Law, together with information about the duration of the applicable standstill period and, if none will apply, a statement to that effect and the reasons therefor;
- (x) Any formalities that will be required once a successful submission has been accepted for a procurement contract to enter into force, including, where applicable, the execution of a written procurement contract pursuant to article 22 of this Law;
- (xi) Any other requirements established by the procuring entity in conformity with this Law and the procurement regulations relating to the preparation and presentation of submissions and to other aspects of the second-stage competition;

(c) The procuring entity shall evaluate all submissions received and determine the successful submission in accordance with the evaluation criteria and the procedures set out in the invitation to present submissions;

(d) The procuring entity shall accept the successful submission in accordance with article 22 of this Law.

Article 63. Changes during the operation of a framework agreement

During the operation of a framework agreement, no change shall be allowed to the description of the subject matter of the procurement. Changes to other terms and conditions of the procurement, including to the criteria (and their relative weight and the manner of their application) and procedures for the award of the anticipated procurement contract, may occur only to the extent expressly permitted in the framework agreement.

CHAPTER VIII. CHALLENGE PROCEEDINGS<sup>6</sup>

Article 64. Right to challenge and appeal

1. A supplier or contractor that claims to have suffered or claims that it may suffer loss or injury because of the alleged non-compliance of a decision or action of the procuring entity with the provisions of this Law may challenge the decision or action concerned.

2. Challenge proceedings may be made by way of [an application for reconsideration to the procuring entity under article 66 of this Law, an application for review to the [name of the independent body] under article 67 of this Law or an application or appeal to the [name of the court or courts]].

[3. A supplier or contractor may appeal any decision taken in challenge proceedings under article 66 or 67 of this Law in the [name of the court or courts]].

<sup>6</sup>Certain options are presented in this Chapter in square brackets. See the Guide to Enactment of the UNCITRAL Model Law on Public Procurement for guidance on those options.

Article 65. Effect of a challenge

1. The procuring entity shall not take any step that would bring into force a procurement contract or framework agreement in the procurement proceedings concerned:

(a) Where it receives an application for reconsideration within the time limits specified in paragraph 2 of article 66;

(b) Where it receives notice of an application for review from the [name of the independent body] under paragraph 5 (b) of article 67; or

(c) Where it receives notice of an application or of an appeal from the [name of the court or courts].

2. The prohibition referred to in paragraph 1 shall lapse ... working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after the decision of the procuring entity, the [name of the independent body] or the [name of the court or courts] has been communicated to the applicant or appellant, as the case may be, to the procuring entity, where applicable, and to all other participants in the challenge proceedings.

3. (a) The procuring entity may at any time request the [name of the independent body] or the [name of the court or courts] to authorize it to enter into the procurement contract or framework agreement on the ground that urgent public interest considerations so justify;

(b) The [name of the independent body], upon consideration of such a request [, or of its own motion,] may authorize the procuring entity to enter into the procurement contract or framework agreement where it is satisfied that urgent public interest considerations so justify. The decision of the [name of the independent body] and the reasons therefor shall be made part of the record of the procurement proceedings, and shall promptly be communicated to the procuring entity, to the applicant, to all other participants in the challenge proceedings and to all other participants in the procurement proceedings.

Article 66. Application for reconsideration before the procuring entity

1. A supplier or contractor may apply to the procuring entity for a reconsideration of a decision or an action taken by the procuring entity in the procurement proceedings.

2. Applications for reconsideration shall be submitted to the procuring entity in writing within the following time periods:

(a) Applications for reconsideration of the terms of solicitation, pre-qualification or pre-selection or decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity in pre-qualification or pre-selection proceedings shall be submitted prior to the deadline for presenting submissions;

(b) Applications for reconsideration of other decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity in the procurement proceedings shall be submitted within the standstill period applied pursuant to paragraph 2 of article 22 of this Law, or, where none has been applied, prior to the entry into force of the procurement contract or the framework agreement.

3. Promptly after receipt of the application, the procuring entity shall publish a notice of the application and shall, not later than three (3) working days after receipt of the application:

(a) Decide whether the application shall be entertained or dismissed and, if it is to be entertained, whether the procurement proceedings shall be suspended. The procuring entity may dismiss the application if it decides that the application is manifestly without merit, the application was not submitted within the deadlines set out in paragraph 2 of this article or the applicant is without standing. Such a dismissal constitutes a decision on the application;

(b) Notify all participants in the procurement proceedings to which the application relates about the submission of the application and its substance;

(c) Notify the applicant and all other participants in the procurement proceedings of its decision on whether the application is to be entertained or dismissed;

(i) If the application is to be entertained, the procuring entity shall in addition advise whether the procurement proceedings are suspended and, if so, the duration of the suspension;

(ii) If the application is to be dismissed or the procurement proceedings are not suspended, the procuring entity shall in addition advise the applicant of the reasons for its decision.

4. If the procuring entity does not give notice to the applicant as required in paragraphs 3 (c) and 8 of this article within the time-limit specified in paragraph 3 of this article, or if the applicant is dissatisfied with the decision so notified, the applicant may immediately thereafter commence proceedings [in the [name of the independent body] under article 67 of this Law or in the [name of the court or courts]]. Where such proceedings are commenced, the competence of the procuring entity to entertain the application ceases.

5. In taking its decision on an application that it has entertained, the procuring entity may overturn, correct, vary or uphold any decision or action taken in the procurement proceedings to which the application relates.

6. The decision of the procuring entity under paragraph 5 of this article shall be issued within ... working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after receipt of the application. The procuring entity shall immediately thereafter communicate the decision to the applicant, to all other participants in the challenge proceedings and to all other participants in the procurement proceedings.

7. If the procuring entity does not communicate its decision to the applicant in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs 6 and 8 of this article, the applicant is entitled immediately thereafter to commence proceedings [in the [name of the independent body] under article 67 of this Law or in the [name of the court or courts]]. Where such proceedings are commenced, the competence of the procuring entity to entertain the application ceases.

8. All decisions of the procuring entity under this article shall be in writing, shall state the action taken and the reasons therefor, and shall promptly be made part of the record of the procurement proceedings, together with the application received by the procuring entity under this article.

Article 67. Application for review before an independent body

1. A supplier or contractor may apply to the [name of the independent body] for review of a decision or an action taken by the procuring entity in the procurement proceedings, or of the failure of the procuring entity to issue a decision under article 66 of this Law within the time limits prescribed in that article.

2. Applications for review shall be submitted to the [name of the independent body] in writing within the following time periods:

(a) Applications for review of the terms of solicitation, pre-qualification or pre-selection or of decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity in pre-qualification or pre-selection proceedings shall be submitted prior to the deadline for presenting submissions;

(b) Applications for review of other decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity in the procurement proceedings shall be submitted:

(i) Within the standstill period applied pursuant to paragraph 2 of article 22 of this Law; or

(ii) Where no standstill period has been applied, within ... working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after the time when the applicant became aware of the circumstances giving rise to the application or when the applicant should have become aware of those circumstances, whichever is earlier, but not later than ...

working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after the entry into force of the procurement contract or the framework agreement [or a decision to cancel the procurement];

(c) Notwithstanding subparagraph (b) (i) of this paragraph, a supplier or contractor may request the [name of the independent body] to entertain an application for review filed after the expiry of the standstill period, but not later than ... working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after the entry into force of the procurement contract or the framework agreement [or a decision to cancel the procurement], on the ground that the application raises significant public interest considerations. The [name of the independent body] may entertain the application where it is satisfied that significant public interest considerations so justify. The decision of the [name of the independent body] and the reasons therefor shall promptly be communicated to the supplier or contractor concerned;

(d) Applications for review of the failure of the procuring entity to issue a decision under article 66 of this Law within the time limits prescribed in that article shall be submitted within ... working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after the decision of the procuring entity should have been communicated to the applicant in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs 3, 6 and 8 of article 66 of this Law, as appropriate.

3. Following receipt of an application for review, the [name of the independent body] may, subject to the requirements of paragraph 4 of this article:

[(a)] Order the suspension of the procurement proceedings at any time before the entry into force of the procurement contract; [and

(b) Order the suspension of the performance of a procurement contract or the operation of a framework agreement that has entered into force;]

if and for as long as it finds such a suspension necessary to protect the interests of the applicant unless the [name of the independent body] decides that urgent public interest considerations require the procurement proceedings[, the procurement contract or the framework agreement, as applicable,] to proceed. The [name of the independent body] may also order that any suspension applied be extended or lifted, taking into account the aforementioned considerations.

4. The [name of the independent body] shall:

(a) Order the suspension of the procurement proceedings for a period of ten (10) working days where an application is received prior to the deadline for presenting submissions; and

(b) Order the suspension of the procurement proceedings [or the performance of a procurement contract or the operation of a framework agreement, as the case may be] where an application is received after the deadline for presenting submissions and where no standstill period has been applied; unless the [name of the independent body] decides that urgent public interest considerations require the procurement proceedings[, the procurement contract or the framework agreement, as applicable,] to proceed.

5. Promptly upon receipt of the application, the [name of the independent body] shall:

(a) Suspend or decide not to suspend the procurement proceedings [or the performance of a procurement contract or the operation of a framework agreement, as the case may be] in accordance with paragraphs 3 and 4 of this article;

(b) Notify the procuring entity and all identified participants in the procurement proceedings to which the application relates of the application and its substance;

(c) Notify all identified participants in the procurement proceedings to which the application relates of its decision on suspension. Where the [name of the independent body] decides to suspend the procurement proceedings [or the performance of a procurement contract or the operation of a framework agreement, as the case may be], it shall in addition specify the period of the suspension. Where it decides not to suspend them, it shall provide the reasons for its decision to the applicant and to the procuring entity; and

(d) Publish a notice of the application.

6. The [name of the independent body] may dismiss the application and shall lift any suspension applied, where it decides that:

(a) The application is manifestly without merit or was not presented in compliance with the deadlines set out in paragraph 2 of this article; or

(b) The applicant is without standing.

The [name of the independent body] shall promptly notify the applicant, the procuring entity and all other participants in the procurement proceedings of the dismissal and the reasons therefor and that any suspension in force is lifted. Such a dismissal constitutes a decision on the application.

7. The notices to the applicant, the procuring entity and other participants in the procurement proceedings under paragraphs 5 and 6 of this article shall be given no later than three (3) working days after receipt of the application.

8. Promptly upon receipt of a notice under paragraph 5 (b) of this article, the procuring entity shall provide the [name of the independent body] with effective access to all documents relating to the procurement proceedings in its possession, in a manner appropriate to the circumstances.

9. In taking its decision on an application that it has entertained, the [name of the independent body] may declare the legal rules or principles that govern the subject matter of the application, shall address any suspension in force and shall take one or more of the following actions, as appropriate:

(a) Prohibit the procuring entity from acting, taking a decision or following a procedure that is not in compliance with the provisions of this Law;

(b) Require the procuring entity that has acted or proceeded in a manner that is not in compliance with the provisions of this Law to act, to take a decision or to proceed in a manner that is in compliance with the provisions of this Law;

[(c) Overturn in whole or in part an act or a decision of the procuring entity that is not in compliance with the provisions of this Law [other than any act or decision bringing the procurement contract or the framework agreement into force];

(d) Revise a decision by the procuring entity that is not in compliance with the provisions of this Law [other than any act or decision bringing the procurement contract or the framework agreement into force];

(e) Confirm a decision of the procuring entity;

(f) Overturn the award of a procurement contract or a framework agreement that has entered into force in a manner that is not in compliance with the provisions of this Law and, if notice of the award of the procurement contract or the framework agreement has been published, order the publication of notice of the overturning of the award;]

(g) Order that the procurement proceedings be terminated;

(h) Dismiss the application;

(i) Require the payment of compensation for any reasonable costs incurred by the supplier or contractor submitting an application as a result of an act or decision of, or procedure followed by, the procuring entity in the procurement proceedings that is not in compliance with the provisions of this Law, and for any loss or damages suffered[, which shall be limited to the costs of the preparation of the submission or the costs relating to the application, or both]; or

(j) Take such alternative action as is appropriate in the circumstances.

10. The decision of the [name of the independent body] under paragraph 9 of this article shall be issued within ... working days [the enacting State specifies the period] after receipt of the application. The [name of the independent body] shall immediately thereafter communicate the decision to the procuring entity, to the applicant, to all other participants in the application for review and to all other participants in the procurement proceedings.

11. All decisions of the [name of the independent body] under this article shall be in writing, shall state the action taken and the reasons therefor and shall promptly be made part of the record of the procurement proceedings, together with the application received by the [name of the independent body] under this article.

Article 68. Rights of participants in challenge proceedings

1. Any supplier or contractor participating in the procurement proceedings to which the application relates, as well as any governmental authority whose interests are or could be affected by the application, shall have the right to participate in challenge proceedings under articles 66 and 67 of this Law. A supplier or contractor duly notified of the proceedings that fails to participate in such proceedings is barred from subsequently challenging under articles 66 and 67 of this Law the decisions or actions that are the subject matter of the application.

2. The procuring entity shall have the right to participate in challenge proceedings under article 67 of this Law.

3. The participants in challenge proceedings under articles 66 and 67 of this Law shall have the right to be present, represented and accompanied at all hearings during the proceedings; the right to be heard; the right to present evidence, including witnesses; the right to request that any hearing take place in public; and the right to seek access to the record of the challenge proceedings subject to the provisions of article 69 of this Law.

Article 69. Confidentiality in challenge proceedings

No information shall be disclosed in challenge proceedings and no public hearing under articles 66 and 67 of this Law shall take place if so doing would impair the protection of essential security interests of the State, would be contrary to law, would impede law enforcement, would prejudice the legitimate commercial interests of the suppliers or contractors or would impede fair competition.

REVISED AGREEMENT ON GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT

Preamble

The Parties to this Agreement (hereinafter referred to as "the Parties"),

Recognizing the need for an effective multilateral framework for government procurement, with a view to achieving greater liberalization and expansion of, and improving the framework for, the conduct of international trade;

Recognizing that measures regarding government procurement should not be prepared, adopted or applied so as to afford protection to domestic suppliers, goods or services, or to discriminate among foreign suppliers, goods or services;

Recognizing that the integrity and predictability of government procurement systems are integral to the efficient and effective management of public resources, the performance of the Parties' economies and the functioning of the multilateral trading system;

Recognizing that the procedural commitments under this Agreement should be sufficiently flexible to accommodate the specific circumstances of each Party;

Recognizing the need to take into account the development, financial and trade needs of developing countries, in particular the least developed countries;

Recognizing the importance of transparent measures regarding government procurement, of carrying out procurements in a transparent and impartial manner and of avoiding conflicts of interest and corrupt practices, in accordance with applicable international instruments, such as the United Nations Convention Against Corruption;

Recognizing the importance of using, and encouraging the use of, electronic means for procurement covered by this Agreement;

---

Desiring to encourage acceptance of and accession to this Agreement by WTO Members not party to it;

Hereby agree as follows:

Article I

Definitions

For purposes of this Agreement:

- a) commercial goods or services means goods or services of a type generally sold or offered for sale in the commercial marketplace to, and customarily purchased by, non-governmental buyers for non-governmental purposes;
- b) Committee means the Committee on Government Procurement established by Article XXI:1;
- c) construction service means a service that has as its objective the realization by whatever means of civil or building works, based on Division 51 of the United Nations Provisional Central Product Classification (CPC);
- d) country includes any separate customs territory that is a Party to this Agreement. In the case of a separate customs territory that is a Party to this Agreement, where an expression in this Agreement is qualified by the term "national", such expression shall be read as pertaining to that customs territory, unless otherwise specified;
- e) days means calendar days;
- f) electronic auction means an iterative process that involves the use of electronic means for the presentation by suppliers of either new prices, or new values for quantifiable non-price elements of the tender related to the evaluation criteria, or both, resulting in a ranking or re-ranking of tenders;

- g) in writing or written means any worded or numbered expression that can be read, reproduced and later communicated. It may include electronically transmitted and stored information;
- h) limited tendering means a procurement method whereby the procuring entity contacts a supplier or suppliers of its choice;
- i) measure means any law, regulation, procedure, administrative guidance or practice, or any action of a procuring entity relating to a covered procurement;
- j) multi-use list means a list of suppliers that a procuring entity has determined satisfy the conditions for participation in that list, and that the procuring entity intends to use more than once;
- k) notice of intended procurement means a notice published by a procuring entity inviting interested suppliers to submit a request for participation, a tender, or both;
- l) offset means any condition or undertaking that encourages local development or improves a Party's balance-of-payments accounts, such as the use of domestic content, the licensing of technology, investment, counter-trade and similar action or requirement;
- m) open tendering means a procurement method whereby all interested suppliers may submit a tender;
- n) person means a natural person or a juridical person;
- o) procuring entity means an entity covered under a Party's Annex 1, 2 or 3 to Appendix I;
- p) qualified supplier means a supplier that a procuring entity recognizes as having satisfied the conditions for participation;
- q) selective tendering means a procurement method whereby only qualified suppliers are invited by the procuring entity to submit a tender;

- r) services includes construction services, unless otherwise specified;
  - s) standard means a document approved by a recognized body that provides for common and repeated use, rules, guidelines or characteristics for goods or services, or related processes and production methods, with which compliance is not mandatory. It may also include or deal exclusively with terminology, symbols, packaging, marking or labelling requirements as they apply to a good, service, process or production method;
  - t) supplier means a person or group of persons that provides or could provide goods or services; and
  - u) technical specification means a tendering requirement that:
    - i. lays down the characteristics of goods or services to be procured, including quality, performance, safety and dimensions, or the processes and methods for their production or provision; or
    - ii. addresses terminology, symbols, packaging, marking or labelling requirements, as they apply to a good or service.

Article II Scope and Coverage

Application of Agreement

1. This Agreement applies to any measure regarding covered procurement, whether or not it is conducted exclusively or partially by electronic means.
2. For the purposes of this Agreement, covered procurement means procurement for governmental purposes:
  - a) of goods, services, or any combination thereof:
    - i. as specified in each Party's annexes to Appendix I; and

- ii. not procured with a view to commercial sale or resale, or for use in the production or supply of goods or services for commercial sale or resale;
  - b) by any contractual means, including: purchase; lease; and rental or hire purchase, with or without an option to buy;
  - c) for which the value, as estimated in accordance with paragraphs 6 through 8, equals or exceeds the relevant threshold specified in a Party's annexes to Appendix I, at the time of publication of a notice in accordance with Article VII;
  - d) by a procuring entity; and
  - e) that is not otherwise excluded from coverage in paragraph 3 or a Party's annexes to Appendix I.
3. Except where provided otherwise in a Party's annexes to Appendix I, this Agreement does not apply to:
- a) the acquisition or rental of land, existing buildings or other immovable property or the rights thereon;
  - b) non-contractual agreements or any form of assistance that a Party provides, including cooperative agreements, grants, loans, equity infusions, guarantees and fiscal incentives;
  - c) the procurement or acquisition of fiscal agency or depository services, liquidation and management services for regulated financial institutions or services related to the sale, redemption and distribution of public debt, including loans and government bonds, notes and other securities;
  - d) public employment contracts;
  - e) procurement conducted:
    - i. for the specific purpose of providing international assistance, including development aid;

- ii. under the particular procedure or condition of an international agreement relating to the stationing of troops or relating to the joint implementation by the signatory countries of a project; or
  - iii. under the particular procedure or condition of an international organization, or funded by international grants, loans or other assistance where the applicable procedure or condition would be inconsistent with this Agreement.

4. Each Party shall specify the following information in its annexes to Appendix I:

- a) in Annex 1, the central government entities whose procurement is covered by this Agreement;
- b) in Annex 2, the sub-central government entities whose procurement is covered by this Agreement;
- c) in Annex 3, all other entities whose procurement is covered by this Agreement;
- d) in Annex 4, the goods covered by this Agreement;
- e) in Annex 5, the services, other than construction services, covered by this Agreement;
- f) in Annex 6, the construction services covered by this Agreement; and
- g) in Annex 7, any General Notes.

5. Where a procuring entity, in the context of covered procurement, requires persons not covered under a Party's annexes to Appendix I to procure in accordance with particular requirements, Article IV shall apply mutatis mutandis to such requirements.

Valuation

6. In estimating the value of a procurement for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is a covered procurement, a procuring entity shall:

- a) neither divide a procurement into separate procurements nor select or use a particular valuation method for estimating the value of a procurement with the intention of totally or partially excluding it from the application of this Agreement; and
- b) include the estimated maximum total value of the procurement over its entire duration, whether awarded to one or more suppliers, taking into account all forms of remuneration, including:
  - i. premiums, fees, commissions and interest; and
  - ii. where the procurement provides for the possibility of options, the total value of such options.

7. Where an individual requirement for a procurement results in the award of more than one contract, or in the award of contracts in separate parts (hereinafter referred to as "recurring contracts"), the calculation of the estimated maximum total value shall be based on:

- a) the value of recurring contracts of the same type of good or service awarded during the preceding 12 months or the procuring entity's preceding fiscal year, adjusted, where possible, to take into account anticipated changes in the quantity or value of the good or service being procured over the following 12 months; or
- b) the estimated value of recurring contracts of the same type of good or service to be awarded during the 12 months following the initial contract award or the procuring entity's fiscal year.

8. In the case of procurement by lease, rental or hire purchase of goods or services, or procurement for which a total price is not specified, the basis for valuation shall be:

- a) in the case of a fixed-term contract:
  - i. where the term of the contract is 12 months or less, the total estimated maximum value for its duration; or
  - ii. where the term of the contract exceeds 12 months, the total estimated maximum value, including any estimated residual value;
- a) where the contract is for an indefinite period, the estimated monthly instalment multiplied by 48; and
- b) where it is not certain whether the contract is to be a fixed-term contract, subparagraph (b) shall be used.

Article III

Security and General Exceptions

1. Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to prevent any Party from taking any action or not disclosing any information that it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests relating to the procurement of arms, ammunition or war materials, or to procurement indispensable for national security or for national defence purposes.

2. Subject to the requirement that such measures are not applied in a manner that would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between Parties where the same conditions prevail or a disguised restriction on international trade, nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to prevent any Party from imposing or enforcing measures:

- a) necessary to protect public morals, order or safety;
- b) necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health;

- c) necessary to protect intellectual property; or
- d) relating to goods or services of persons with disabilities, philanthropic institutions or prison labour.

Article IV

General Principles

Non-Discrimination

1. With respect to any measure regarding covered procurement, each Party, including its procuring entities, shall accord immediately and unconditionally to the goods and services of any other Party and to the suppliers of any other Party offering the goods or services of any Party, treatment no less favourable than the treatment the Party, including its procuring entities, accords to:

- a) domestic goods, services and suppliers; and
- b) goods, services and suppliers of any other Party.

2. With respect to any measure regarding covered procurement, a Party, including its procuring entities, shall not:

- a) treat a locally established supplier less favourably than another locally established supplier on the basis of the degree of foreign affiliation or ownership; or
- b) discriminate against a locally established supplier on the basis that the goods or services offered by that supplier for a particular procurement are goods or services of any other Party.

Use of Electronic Means

3. When conducting covered procurement by electronic means, a procuring entity shall:

- a) ensure that the procurement is conducted using information technology systems and software, including those related to authentication and encryption of information, that are generally available and interoperable with other generally available information technology systems and software; and

---

- b) maintain mechanisms that ensure the integrity of requests for participation and tenders, including establishment of the time of receipt and the prevention of inappropriate access.

Conduct of Procurement

4. A procuring entity shall conduct covered procurement in a transparent and impartial manner that:

- a) is consistent with this Agreement, using methods such as open tendering, selective tendering and limited tendering;
- b) avoids conflicts of interest; and
- c) prevents corrupt practices.

Rules of Origin

5. For purposes of covered procurement, a Party shall not apply rules of origin to goods or services imported from or supplied from another Party that are different from the rules of origin the Party applies at the same time in the normal course of trade to imports or supplies of the same goods or services from the same Party.

Offsets

6. With regard to covered procurement, a Party, including its procuring entities, shall not seek, take account of, impose or enforce any offset.

Measures Not Specific to Procurement

7. Paragraphs 1 and 2 shall not apply to: customs duties and charges of any kind imposed on, or in connection with, importation; the method of levying such duties and charges; other import regulations or formalities and measures affecting trade in services other than measures governing covered procurement.

Article V

Developing Countries

1. In negotiations on accession to, and in the implementation and administration of, this Agreement, the Parties shall give special consideration to the development, financial and trade needs and circumstances of developing countries and least developed countries (collectively referred to hereinafter as "developing countries", unless specifically identified otherwise), recognizing that these may differ significantly from country to country. As provided for in this Article and on request, the Parties shall accord special and differential treatment to:

- a) least developed countries; and
- b) any other developing country, where and to the extent that this special and differential treatment meets its development needs.

2. Upon accession by a developing country to this Agreement, each Party shall provide immediately to the goods, services and suppliers of that country the most favourable coverage that the Party provides under its annexes to Appendix I to any other Party to this Agreement, subject to any terms negotiated between the Party and the developing country in order to maintain an appropriate balance of opportunities under this Agreement.

3. Based on its development needs, and with the agreement of the Parties, a developing country may adopt or maintain one or more of the following transitional measures, during a transition period and in accordance with a schedule, set out in its relevant annexes to Appendix I, and applied in a manner that does not discriminate among the other Parties:

- a) a price preference programme, provided that the programme:
  - i. provides a preference only for the part of the tender incorporating goods or services originating in the developing country applying the preference or goods or services originating in other developing countries in respect of which the developing country applying the preference has an obligation to provide national treatment under a preferential agreement, provided that where the other developing country is a Party to this Agreement, such treatment would be subject to any conditions set by the Committee; and

- ii. is transparent, and the preference and its application in the procurement are clearly described in the notice of intended procurement;
  - b) an offset, provided that any requirement for, or consideration of, the imposition of the offset is clearly stated in the notice of intended procurement;
  - c) the phased-in addition of specific entities or sectors; and
  - d) a threshold that is higher than its permanent threshold.
4. In negotiations on accession to this Agreement, the Parties may agree to the delayed application of any specific obligation in this Agreement, other than Article IV:1(b), by the acceding developing country while that country implements the obligation. The implementation period shall be:
- a) for a least developed country, five years after its accession to this Agreement; and
  - b) for any other developing country, only the period necessary to implement the specific obligation and not to exceed three years.
5. Any developing country that has negotiated an implementation period for an obligation under paragraph 4 shall list in its Annex 7 to Appendix I the agreed implementation period, the specific obligation subject to the implementation period and any interim obligation with which it has agreed to comply during the implementation period.
6. After this Agreement has entered into force for a developing country, the Committee, on request of the developing country, may:
- a) extend the transition period for a measure adopted or maintained under paragraph 3 or any implementation period negotiated under paragraph 4; or

- b) approve the adoption of a new transitional measure under paragraph 3, in special circumstances that were unforeseen during the accession process.
7. A developing country that has negotiated a transitional measure under paragraph 3 or 6, an implementation period under paragraph 4 or any extension under paragraph 6 shall take such steps during the transition period or implementation period as may be necessary to ensure that it is in compliance with this Agreement at the end of any such period. The developing country shall promptly notify the Committee of each step.
8. The Parties shall give due consideration to any request by a developing country for technical cooperation and capacity building in relation to that country's accession to, or implementation of, this Agreement.
9. The Committee may develop procedures for the implementation of this Article. Such procedures may include provisions for voting on decisions relating to requests under paragraph 6.
10. The Committee shall review the operation and effectiveness of this Article every five years.

Article VI

Information on the Procurement System

1. Each Party shall:
  - a) promptly publish any law, regulation, judicial decision, administrative ruling of general application, standard contract clause mandated by law or regulation and incorporated by reference in notices or tender documentation and procedure regarding covered procurement, and any modifications thereof, in an officially designated electronic or paper medium that is widely disseminated and remains readily accessible to the public; and
  - b) provide an explanation thereof to any Party, on request.

2. Each Party shall list:
    - a) in Appendix II, the electronic or paper media in which the Party publishes the information described in paragraph 1;
    - b) in Appendix III, the electronic or paper media in which the Party publishes the notices required by Articles VII, IX:7 and XVI:2; and
    - c) in Appendix IV, the website address or addresses where the Party publishes:
      - i. its procurement statistics pursuant to Article XVI:5; or
      - ii. its notices concerning awarded contracts pursuant to Article XVI:6.
  3. Each Party shall promptly notify the Committee of any modification to the Party's information listed in Appendix II, III or IV.

Article VII

Notices

Notice of Intended Procurement

1. For each covered procurement, a procuring entity shall publish a notice of intended procurement in the appropriate paper or electronic medium listed in Appendix III, except in the circumstances described in Article XIII. Such medium shall be widely disseminated and such notices shall remain readily accessible to the public, at least until expiration of the time-period indicated in the notice. The notices shall:
  - a) for procuring entities covered under Annex 1, be accessible by electronic means free of charge through a single point of access, for at least any minimum period of time specified in Appendix III; and
  - b) for procuring entities covered under Annex 2 or 3, where accessible by electronic means, be provided, at least, through links in a gateway electronic site that is accessible free of charge.

Parties, including their procuring entities covered under Annex 2 or 3, are encouraged to publish their notices by electronic means free of charge through a single point of access.

2. Except as otherwise provided in this Agreement, each notice of intended procurement shall include:

- a) the name and address of the procuring entity and other information necessary to contact the procuring entity and obtain all relevant documents relating to the procurement, and their cost and terms of payment, if any;
- b) a description of the procurement, including the nature and the quantity of the goods or services to be procured or, where the quantity is not known, the estimated quantity;
- c) for recurring contracts, an estimate, if possible, of the timing of subsequent notices of intended procurement;
- d) a description of any options;
- e) the time-frame for delivery of goods or services or the duration of the contract;
- f) the procurement method that will be used and whether it will involve negotiation or electronic auction;
- g) where applicable, the address and any final date for the submission of requests for participation in the procurement;
- h) the address and the final date for the submission of tenders;
- i) the language or languages in which tenders or requests for participation may be submitted, if they may be submitted in a language other than an official language of the Party of the procuring entity;

- j) a list and brief description of any conditions for participation of suppliers, including any requirements for specific documents or certifications to be provided by suppliers in connection therewith, unless such requirements are included in tender documentation that is made available to all interested suppliers at the same time as the notice of intended procurement;
  - k) where, pursuant to Article IX, a procuring entity intends to select a limited number of qualified suppliers to be invited to tender, the criteria that will be used to select them and, where applicable, any limitation on the number of suppliers that will be permitted to tender; and
  - l) an indication that the procurement is covered by this Agreement.

Summary Notice

3. For each case of intended procurement, a procuring entity shall publish a summary notice that is readily accessible, at the same time as the publication of the notice of intended procurement, in one of the WTO languages. The summary notice shall contain at least the following information:

- a) the subject-matter of the procurement;
- b) the final date for the submission of tenders or, where applicable, any final date for the submission of requests for participation in the procurement or for inclusion on a multi-use list; and
- c) the address from which documents relating to the procurement may be requested.

Notice of Planned Procurement

4. Procuring entities are encouraged to publish in the appropriate paper or electronic medium listed in Appendix III as early as possible in each fiscal year a notice regarding their future procurement plans (hereinafter referred to as "notice of planned procurement"). The notice of planned procurement should include the subject-matter of the procurement and the planned date of the publication of the notice of intended procurement.

5. A procuring entity covered under Annex 2 or 3 may use a notice of planned procurement as a notice of intended procurement provided that the notice of planned procurement includes as much of the information referred to in paragraph 2 as is available to the entity and a statement that interested suppliers should express their interest in the procurement to the procuring entity.

Article VIII

Conditions for Participation

1. A procuring entity shall limit any conditions for participation in a procurement to those that are essential to ensure that a supplier has the legal and financial capacities and the commercial and technical abilities to undertake the relevant procurement.

2. In establishing the conditions for participation, a procuring entity:

- a) shall not impose the condition that, in order for a supplier to participate in a procurement, the supplier has previously been awarded one or more contracts by a procuring entity of a given Party; and
- b) may require relevant prior experience where essential to meet the requirements of the procurement.

3. In assessing whether a supplier satisfies the conditions for participation, a procuring entity:

- a) shall evaluate the financial capacity and the commercial and technical abilities of a supplier on the basis of that supplier's business activities both inside and outside the territory of the Party of the procuring entity; and
- b) shall base its evaluation on the conditions that the procuring entity has specified in advance in notices or tender documentation.

4. Where there is supporting evidence, a Party, including its procuring entities, may exclude a supplier on grounds such as:

- a) bankruptcy;
- b) false declarations;
- c) significant or persistent deficiencies in performance of any substantive requirement or obligation under a prior contract or contracts;
- d) final judgments in respect of serious crimes or other serious offences;
- e) professional misconduct or acts or omissions that adversely reflect on the commercial integrity of the supplier; or
- f) failure to pay taxes.

Article IX

Qualification of Suppliers

Registration Systems and Qualification Procedures

1. A Party, including its procuring entities, may maintain a supplier registration system under which interested suppliers are required to register and provide certain information.

2. Each Party shall ensure that:

- a) its procuring entities make efforts to minimize differences in their qualification procedures; and
- b) where its procuring entities maintain registration systems, the entities make efforts to minimize differences in their registration systems.

3. A Party, including its procuring entities, shall not adopt or apply any registration system or qualification procedure with the purpose or the effect of creating unnecessary obstacles to the participation of suppliers of another Party in its procurement.

Selective Tendering

4. Where a procuring entity intends to use selective tendering, the entity shall:

- a) include in the notice of intended procurement at least the information specified in Article VII:2(a), (b), (f), (g), (j), (k) and (l) and invite suppliers to submit a request for participation; and
- b) provide, by the commencement of the time-period for tendering, at least the information in Article VII:2 (c), (d), (e), (h) and (i) to the qualified suppliers that it notifies as specified in Article XI:3(b).

5. A procuring entity shall allow all qualified suppliers to participate in a particular procurement, unless the procuring entity states in the notice of intended procurement any limitation on the number of suppliers that will be permitted to tender and the criteria for selecting the limited number of suppliers.

6. Where the tender documentation is not made publicly available from the date of publication of the notice referred to in paragraph 4, a procuring entity shall ensure that those documents are made available at the same time to all the qualified suppliers selected in accordance with paragraph 5.

Multi-Use Lists

7. A procuring entity may maintain a multi-use list of suppliers, provided that a notice inviting interested suppliers to apply for inclusion on the list is:

- a) published annually; and
- b) where published by electronic means, made available continuously, in the appropriate medium listed in Appendix III.

8. The notice provided for in paragraph 7 shall include:

- a) a description of the goods or services, or categories thereof, for which the list may be used;

- b) the conditions for participation to be satisfied by suppliers for inclusion on the list and the methods that the procuring entity will use to verify that a supplier satisfies the conditions;
  - c) the name and address of the procuring entity and other information necessary to contact the entity and obtain all relevant documents relating to the list;
  - d) the period of validity of the list and the means for its renewal or termination, or where the period of validity is not provided, an indication of the method by which notice will be given of the termination of use of the list; and
  - e) an indication that the list may be used for procurement covered by this Agreement.

9. Notwithstanding paragraph 7, where a multi-use list will be valid for three years or less, a procuring entity may publish the notice referred to in paragraph 7 only once, at the beginning of the period of validity of the list, provided that the notice:

- a) states the period of validity and that further notices will not be published; and
- b) is published by electronic means and is made available continuously during the period of its validity.

10. A procuring entity shall allow suppliers to apply at any time for inclusion on a multi-use list and shall include on the list all qualified suppliers within a reasonably short time.

11. Where a supplier that is not included on a multi-use list submits a request for participation in a procurement based on a multi-use list and all required documents, within the time-period provided for in Article XI:2, a procuring entity shall examine the request. The procuring entity shall not exclude the supplier from consideration in respect of the procurement on the grounds that the entity has insufficient time to examine the request, unless, in exceptional cases, due to the complexity of the procurement, the entity is not able to complete the examination of the request within the time-period allowed for the submission of tenders.

Annex 2 and Annex 3 Entities

12. A procuring entity covered under Annex 2 or 3 may use a notice inviting suppliers to apply for inclusion on a multi-use list as a notice of intended procurement, provided that:

- a) the notice is published in accordance with paragraph 7 and includes the information required under paragraph 8, as much of the information required under Article VII:2 as is available and a statement that it constitutes a notice of intended procurement or that only the suppliers on the multi-use list will receive further notices of procurement covered by the multi-use list; and
- b) the entity promptly provides to suppliers that have expressed an interest in a given procurement to the entity, sufficient information to permit them to assess their interest in the procurement, including all remaining information required in Article VII:2, to the extent such information is available.

13. A procuring entity covered under Annex 2 or 3 may allow a supplier that has applied for inclusion on a multi-use list in accordance with paragraph 10 to tender in a given procurement, where there is sufficient time for the procuring entity to examine whether the supplier satisfies the conditions for participation.

Information on Procuring Entity Decisions

14. A procuring entity shall promptly inform any supplier that submits a request for participation in a procurement or application for inclusion on a multi-use list of the procuring entity's decision with respect to the request or application.

15. Where a procuring entity rejects a supplier's request for participation in a procurement or application for inclusion on a multi-use list, ceases to recognize a supplier as qualified, or removes a supplier from a multi-use list, the entity shall promptly inform the supplier and, on request of the supplier, promptly provide the supplier with a written explanation of the reasons for its decision.

Article X

Technical Specifications and Tender Documentation

Technical Specifications

1. A procuring entity shall not prepare, adopt or apply any technical specification or prescribe any conformity assessment procedure with the purpose or the effect of creating unnecessary obstacles to international trade.
2. In prescribing the technical specifications for the goods or services being procured, a procuring entity shall, where appropriate:
  - a) set out the technical specification in terms of performance and functional requirements, rather than design or descriptive characteristics; and
  - b) base the technical specification on international standards, where such exist; otherwise, on national technical regulations, recognized national standards or building codes.
3. Where design or descriptive characteristics are used in the technical specifications, a procuring entity should indicate, where appropriate, that it will consider tenders of equivalent goods or services that demonstrably fulfil the requirements of the procurement by including words such as "or equivalent" in the tender documentation.
4. A procuring entity shall not prescribe technical specifications that require or refer to a particular trademark or trade name, patent, copyright, design, type, specific origin, producer or supplier, unless there is no other sufficiently precise or intelligible way of describing the procurement requirements and provided that, in such cases, the entity includes words such as "or equivalent" in the tender documentation.
5. A procuring entity shall not seek or accept, in a manner that would have the effect of precluding competition, advice that may be used in the preparation or adoption of any technical specification for a specific procurement from a person that may have a commercial interest in the procurement.

6. For greater certainty, a Party, including its procuring entities, may, in accordance with this Article, prepare, adopt or apply technical specifications to promote the conservation of natural resources or protect the environment.

Tender Documentation

7. A procuring entity shall make available to suppliers tender documentation that includes all information necessary to permit suppliers to prepare and submit responsive tenders. Unless already provided in the notice of intended procurement, such documentation shall include a complete description of:

- a) the procurement, including the nature and the quantity of the goods or services to be procured or, where the quantity is not known, the estimated quantity and any requirements to be fulfilled, including any technical specifications, conformity assessment certification, plans, drawings or instructional materials;
- b) any conditions for participation of suppliers, including a list of information and documents that suppliers are required to submit in connection with the conditions for participation;
- c) all evaluation criteria the entity will apply in the awarding of the contract, and, except where price is the sole criterion, the relative importance of such criteria;
- d) where the procuring entity will conduct the procurement by electronic means, any authentication and encryption requirements or other requirements related to the submission of information by electronic means;
- e) where the procuring entity will hold an electronic auction, the rules, including identification of the elements of the tender related to the evaluation criteria, on which the auction will be conducted;

- f) where there will be a public opening of tenders, the date, time and place for the opening and, where appropriate, the persons authorized to be present;
  - g) any other terms or conditions, including terms of payment and any limitation on the means by which tenders may be submitted, such as whether on paper or by electronic means; and
  - h) any dates for the delivery of goods or the supply of services.

8. In establishing any date for the delivery of goods or the supply of services being procured, a procuring entity shall take into account such factors as the complexity of the procurement, the extent of subcontracting anticipated and the realistic time required for production, de-stocking and transport of goods from the point of supply or for supply of services.

9. The evaluation criteria set out in the notice of intended procurement or tender documentation may include, among others, price and other cost factors, quality, technical merit, environmental characteristics and terms of delivery.

10. A procuring entity shall promptly:

- a) make available tender documentation to ensure that interested suppliers have sufficient time to submit responsive tenders;
- b) provide, on request, the tender documentation to any interested supplier; and
- c) reply to any reasonable request for relevant information by any interested or participating supplier, provided that such information does not give that supplier an advantage over other suppliers.

Modifications

11. Where, prior to the award of a contract, a procuring entity modifies the criteria or requirements set out in the notice of intended procurement or tender documentation provided to participating suppliers, or amends or reissues a notice or tender documentation, it shall transmit in writing all such modifications or amended or re-issued notice or tender documentation:

- a) to all suppliers that are participating at the time of the modification, amendment or re-issuance, where such suppliers are known to the entity, and in all other cases, in the same manner as the original information was made available; and
- b) in adequate time to allow such suppliers to modify and re-submit amended tenders, as appropriate.

Article XI Time-Periods

General

1. A procuring entity shall, consistent with its own reasonable needs, provide sufficient time for suppliers to prepare and submit requests for participation and responsive tenders, taking into account such factors as:

- a) the nature and complexity of the procurement;
- b) the extent of subcontracting anticipated; and
- c) the time necessary for transmitting tenders by non-electronic means from foreign as well as domestic points where electronic means are not used.

Such time-periods, including any extension of the time-periods, shall be the same for all interested or participating suppliers.

Deadlines

2. A procuring entity that uses selective tendering shall establish that the final date for the submission of requests for participation shall not, in principle, be less than 25 days from the date of publication of the notice of intended procurement. Where a state of urgency duly substantiated by the procuring entity renders this time-period impracticable, the time-period may be reduced to not less than 10 days.

3. Except as provided for in paragraphs 4, 5, 7 and 8 a procuring entity shall establish that the final date for the submission of tenders shall not be less than 40 days from the date on which:

- a) in the case of open tendering, the notice of intended procurement is published; or
- b) in the case of selective tendering, the entity notifies suppliers that they will be invited to submit tenders, whether or not it uses a multi-use list.

4. A procuring entity may reduce the time-period for tendering established in accordance with paragraph 3 to not less than 10 days where:

- a) the procuring entity has published a notice of planned procurement as described in Article VII:4 at least 40 days and not more than 12 months in advance of the publication of the notice of intended procurement, and the notice of planned procurement contains:
  - i. a description of the procurement;
  - ii. the approximate final dates for the submission of tenders or requests for participation;
  - iii. a statement that interested suppliers should express their interest in the procurement to the procuring entity;
  - iv. the address from which documents relating to the procurement may be obtained; and
  - v. as much of the information that is required for the notice of intended procurement under Article VII:2, as is available;
- b) the procuring entity, for recurring contracts, indicates in an initial notice of intended procurement that subsequent notices will provide time-periods for tendering based on this paragraph; or

- c) a state of urgency duly substantiated by the procuring entity renders the time-period for tendering established in accordance with paragraph 3 impracticable.
5. A procuring entity may reduce the time-period for tendering established in accordance with paragraph 3 by five days for each one of the following circumstances:
- a) the notice of intended procurement is published by electronic means;
  - b) all the tender documentation is made available by electronic means from the date of the publication of the notice of intended procurement; and
  - c) the entity accepts tenders by electronic means.
6. The use of paragraph 5, in conjunction with paragraph 4, shall in no case result in the reduction of the time-period for tendering established in accordance with paragraph 3 to less than 10 days from the date on which the notice of intended procurement is published.
7. Notwithstanding any other provision in this Article, where a procuring entity purchases commercial goods or services, or any combination thereof, it may reduce the time-period for tendering established in accordance with paragraph 3 to not less than 13 days, provided that it publishes by electronic means, at the same time, both the notice of intended procurement and the tender documentation. In addition, where the entity accepts tenders for commercial goods or services by electronic means, it may reduce the time-period established in accordance with paragraph 3 to not less than 10 days.
8. Where a procuring entity covered under Annex 2 or 3 has selected all or a limited number of qualified suppliers, the time-period for tendering may be fixed by mutual agreement between the procuring entity and the selected suppliers. In the absence of agreement, the period shall not be less than 10 days.

Article XII

Negotiation

1. A Party may provide for its procuring entities to conduct negotiations:
  - a) where the entity has indicated its intent to conduct negotiations in the notice of intended procurement required under Article VII:2; or
  - b) where it appears from the evaluation that no tender is obviously the most advantageous in terms of the specific evaluation criteria set out in the notice of intended procurement or tender documentation.
2. A procuring entity shall:
  - a) ensure that any elimination of suppliers participating in negotiations is carried out in accordance with the evaluation criteria set out in the notice of intended procurement or tender documentation; and
  - b) where negotiations are concluded, provide a common deadline for the remaining participating suppliers to submit any new or revised tenders.

Article XIII

Limited Tendering

1. Provided that it does not use this provision for the purpose of avoiding competition among suppliers or in a manner that discriminates against suppliers of any other Party or protects domestic suppliers, a procuring entity may use limited tendering and may choose not to apply Articles VII through IX, X (paragraphs 7 through 11), XI, XII, XIV and XV only under any of the following circumstances:

- a) where:
  - i. no tenders were submitted or no suppliers requested participation;
  - ii. no tenders that conform to the essential requirements of the tender documentation were submitted;

iii. no suppliers satisfied the conditions for participation; or

iv. the tenders submitted have been collusive, provided that the requirements of the tender documentation are not substantially modified;

- b) where the goods or services can be supplied only by a particular supplier and no reasonable alternative or substitute goods or services exist for any of the following reasons:
  - i. the requirement is for a work of art;
  - ii. the protection of patents, copyrights or other exclusive rights; or
  - iii. due to an absence of competition for technical reasons;
- c) for additional deliveries by the original supplier of goods or services that were not included in the initial procurement where a change of supplier for such additional goods or services:
  - i. cannot be made for economic or technical reasons such as requirements of interchangeability or interoperability with existing equipment, software, services or installations procured under the initial procurement; and
  - ii. would cause significant inconvenience or substantial duplication of costs for the procuring entity;
- d) insofar as is strictly necessary where, for reasons of extreme urgency brought about by events unforeseeable by the procuring entity, the goods or services could not be obtained in time using open tendering or selective tendering;
- e) for goods purchased on a commodity market;
- f) where a procuring entity procures a prototype or a first good or service that is developed at its request in the course of, and for, a particular contract for research, experiment, study or original development.

---

Original development of a first good or service may include limited production or supply in order to incorporate the results of field testing and to demonstrate that the good or service is suitable for production or supply in quantity to acceptable quality standards, but does not include quantity production or supply to establish commercial viability or to recover research and development costs;

- g) for purchases made under exceptionally advantageous conditions that only arise in the very short term in the case of unusual disposals such as those arising from liquidation, receivership or bankruptcy, but not for routine purchases from regular suppliers; or
- h) where a contract is awarded to a winner of a design contest provided that:
  - i. the contest has been organized in a manner that is consistent with the principles of this Agreement, in particular relating to the publication of a notice of intended procurement; and
  - ii. the participants are judged by an independent jury with a view to a design contract being awarded to a winner.

2. A procuring entity shall prepare a report in writing on each contract awarded under paragraph 1. The report shall include the name of the procuring entity, the value and kind of goods or services procured and a statement indicating the circumstances and conditions described in paragraph 1 that justified the use of limited tendering.

Article XIV

Electronic Auctions

Where a procuring entity intends to conduct a covered procurement using an electronic auction, the entity shall provide each participant, before commencing the electronic auction, with:

- a) the automatic evaluation method, including the mathematical formula, that is based on the evaluation criteria set out in the tender documentation and that will be used in the automatic ranking or re-ranking during the auction;

- b) the results of any initial evaluation of the elements of its tender where the contract is to be awarded on the basis of the most advantageous tender; and
- c) any other relevant information relating to the conduct of the auction.

Article XV

Treatment of Tenders and Awarding of Contracts

Treatment of Tenders

1. A procuring entity shall receive, open and treat all tenders under procedures that guarantee the fairness and impartiality of the procurement process, and the confidentiality of tenders.
2. A procuring entity shall not penalize any supplier whose tender is received after the time specified for receiving tenders if the delay is due solely to mishandling on the part of the procuring entity.
3. Where a procuring entity provides a supplier with an opportunity to correct unintentional errors of form between the opening of tenders and the awarding of the contract, the procuring entity shall provide the same opportunity to all participating suppliers.

Awarding of Contracts

4. To be considered for an award, a tender shall be submitted in writing and shall, at the time of opening, comply with the essential requirements set out in the notices and tender documentation and be from a supplier that satisfies the conditions for participation.

---

5. Unless a procuring entity determines that it is not in the public interest to award a contract, the entity shall award the contract to the supplier that the entity has determined to be capable of fulfilling the terms of the contract and that, based solely on the evaluation criteria specified in the notices and tender documentation, has submitted:

- a) the most advantageous tender; or
- b) where price is the sole criterion, the lowest price.

6. Where a procuring entity receives a tender with a price that is abnormally lower than the prices in other tenders submitted, it may verify with the supplier that it satisfies the conditions for participation and is capable of fulfilling the terms of the contract.

7. A procuring entity shall not use options, cancel a procurement or modify awarded contracts in a manner that circumvents the obligations under this Agreement.

Article XVI

Transparency of Procurement Information

Information Provided to Suppliers

1. A procuring entity shall promptly inform participating suppliers of the entity's contract award decisions and, on the request of a supplier, shall do so in writing. Subject to paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article XVII, a procuring entity shall, on request, provide an unsuccessful supplier with an explanation of the reasons why the entity did not select its tender and the relative advantages of the successful supplier's tender.

Publication of Award Information

2. Not later than 72 days after the award of each contract covered by this Agreement, a procuring entity shall publish a notice in the appropriate paper or electronic medium listed in Appendix III. Where the entity publishes the notice only in an electronic medium, the information shall remain readily accessible for a reasonable period of time. The notice shall include at least the following information:

- a) a description of the goods or services procured;
- b) the name and address of the procuring entity;
- c) the name and address of the successful supplier;
- d) the value of the successful tender or the highest and lowest offers taken into account in the award of the contract;
- e) the date of award; and
- f) the type of procurement method used, and in cases where limited tendering was used in accordance with Article XIII, a description of the circumstances justifying the use of limited tendering.

Maintenance of Documentation, Reports and Electronic Traceability

3. Each procuring entity shall, for a period of at least three years from the date it awards a contract, maintain:

- a) the documentation and reports of tendering procedures and contract awards relating to covered procurement, including the reports required under Article XIII; and
- b) data that ensure the appropriate traceability of the conduct of covered procurement by electronic means.

Collection and Reporting of Statistics

4. Each Party shall collect and report to the Committee statistics on its contracts covered by this Agreement. Each report shall cover one year and be submitted within two years of the end of the reporting period, and shall contain:

- a) for Annex 1 procuring entities:
  - i. the number and total value, for all such entities, of all contracts covered by this Agreement;
  - ii. the number and total value of all contracts covered by this Agreement awarded by each such entity, broken down by categories of goods and services according to an internationally recognized uniform classification system; and
  - iii. the number and total value of all contracts covered by this Agreement awarded by each such entity under limited tendering;
- b) for Annex 2 and 3 procuring entities, the number and total value of contracts covered by this Agreement awarded by all such entities, broken down by Annex; and
- c) estimates for the data required under subparagraphs (a) and (b), with an explanation of the methodology used to develop the estimates, where it is not feasible to provide the data.

5. Where a Party publishes its statistics on an official website, in a manner that is consistent with the requirements of paragraph 4, the Party may substitute a notification to the Committee of the website address for the submission of the data under paragraph 4, with any instructions necessary to access and use such statistics.

6. Where a Party requires notices concerning awarded contracts, pursuant to paragraph 2, to be published electronically and where such notices are accessible to the public through a single database in a form permitting analysis of the covered contracts, the Party may substitute a notification to the Committee of the website address for the submission of the data under paragraph 4, with any instructions necessary to access and use such data.

Article XVII

Disclosure of Information

Provision of Information to Parties

1. On request of any other Party, a Party shall provide promptly any information necessary to determine whether a procurement was conducted fairly, impartially and in accordance with this Agreement, including information on the characteristics and relative advantages of the successful tender. In cases where release of the information would prejudice competition in future tenders, the Party that receives the information shall not disclose it to any supplier, except after consulting with, and obtaining the agreement of, the Party that provided the information.

Non-Disclosure of Information

2. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Agreement, a Party, including its procuring entities, shall not provide to any particular supplier information that might prejudice fair competition between suppliers.

3. Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to require a Party, including its procuring entities, authorities and review bodies, to disclose confidential information where disclosure:

- a) would impede law enforcement;
- b) might prejudice fair competition between suppliers;
- c) would prejudice the legitimate commercial interests of particular persons, including the protection of intellectual property; or
- d) would otherwise be contrary to the public interest.

Article XVIII

Domestic Review Procedures

1. Each Party shall provide a timely, effective, transparent and non-discriminatory administrative or judicial review procedure through which a supplier may challenge:

- a) a breach of the Agreement; or
- b) where the supplier does not have a right to challenge directly a breach of the Agreement under the domestic law of a Party, a failure to comply with a Party's measures implementing this Agreement, arising in the context of a covered procurement, in which the supplier has, or has had, an interest. The procedural rules for all challenges shall be in writing and made generally available.

2. In the event of a complaint by a supplier, arising in the context of covered procurement in which the supplier has, or has had, an interest, that there has been a breach or a failure as referred to in paragraph 1, the Party of the procuring entity conducting the procurement shall encourage the entity and the supplier to seek resolution of the complaint through consultations. The entity shall accord impartial and timely consideration to any such complaint in a manner that is not prejudicial to the supplier's participation in ongoing or future procurement or its right to seek corrective measures under the administrative or judicial review procedure.

3. Each supplier shall be allowed a sufficient period of time to prepare and submit a challenge, which in no case shall be less than 10 days from the time when the basis of the challenge became known or reasonably should have become known to the supplier.

4. Each Party shall establish or designate at least one impartial administrative or judicial authority that is independent of its procuring entities to receive and review a challenge by a supplier arising in the context of a covered procurement.

5. Where a body other than an authority referred to in paragraph 4 initially reviews a challenge, the Party shall ensure that the supplier may appeal the initial decision to an impartial administrative or judicial authority that is independent of the procuring entity whose procurement is the subject of the challenge.

6. Each Party shall ensure that a review body that is not a court shall have its decision subject to judicial review or have procedures that provide that:

- a) the procuring entity shall respond in writing to the challenge and disclose all relevant documents to the review body;
- b) the participants to the proceedings (hereinafter referred to as "participants") shall have the right to be heard prior to a decision of the review body being made on the challenge;
- c) the participants shall have the right to be represented and accompanied;
- d) the participants shall have access to all proceedings;
- e) the participants shall have the right to request that the proceedings take place in public and that witnesses may be presented; and
- f) the review body shall make its decisions or recommendations in a timely fashion, in writing, and shall include an explanation of the basis for each decision or recommendation.

7. Each Party shall adopt or maintain procedures that provide for:

- a) rapid interim measures to preserve the supplier's opportunity to participate in the procurement. Such interim measures may result in suspension of the procurement process. The procedures may provide that overriding adverse consequences for the interests concerned, including the public interest, may be taken into account when deciding whether such measures should be applied. Just cause for not acting shall be provided in writing; and
- b) where a review body has determined that there has been a breach or a failure as referred to in paragraph 1, corrective action or compensation for the loss or damages suffered, which may be limited to either the costs for the preparation of the tender or the costs relating to the challenge, or both.

Article XIX

Modifications and Rectifications to Coverage

Notification of Proposed Modification

1. A Party shall notify the Committee of any proposed rectification, transfer of an entity from one annex to another, withdrawal of an entity or other modification of its annexes to Appendix I (any of which is hereinafter referred to as "modification"). The Party proposing the modification (hereinafter referred to as "modifying Party") shall include in the notification:

- a) for any proposed withdrawal of an entity from its annexes to Appendix I in exercise of its rights on the grounds that government control or influence over the entity's covered procurement has been effectively eliminated, evidence of such elimination; or
- b) for any other proposed modification, information as to the likely consequences of the change for the mutually agreed coverage provided for in this Agreement.

Objection to Notification

2. Any Party whose rights under this Agreement may be affected by a proposed modification notified under paragraph 1 may notify the Committee of any objection to the proposed modification. Such objections shall be made within 45 days from the date of the circulation to the Parties of the notification, and shall set out reasons for the objection.

Consultations

3. The modifying Party and any Party making an objection (hereinafter referred to as "objecting Party") shall make every attempt to resolve the objection through consultations. In such consultations, the modifying and objecting Parties shall consider the proposed modification:

- a) in the case of a notification under paragraph 1(a), in accordance with any indicative criteria adopted pursuant to paragraph 8(b), indicating the effective elimination of government control or influence over an entity's covered procurement; and

- b) in the case of a notification under paragraph 1(b), in accordance with any criteria adopted pursuant to paragraph 8(c), relating to the level of compensatory adjustments to be offered for modifications, with a view to maintaining a balance of rights and obligations and a comparable level of mutually agreed coverage provided in this Agreement.

Revised Modification

4. Where the modifying Party and any objecting Party resolve the objection through consultations, and the modifying Party revises its proposed modification as a result of those consultations, the modifying Party shall notify the Committee in accordance with paragraph 1, and any such revised modification shall only be effective after fulfilling the requirements of this Article.

Implementation of Modifications

5. A proposed modification shall become effective only where:
- a) no Party submits to the Committee a written objection to the proposed modification within 45 days from the date of circulation of the notification of the proposed modification under paragraph 1;
  - b) all objecting Parties have notified the Committee that they withdraw their objections to the proposed modification; or
  - c) 150 days from the date of circulation of the notification of the proposed modification under paragraph 1 have elapsed, and the modifying Party has informed the Committee in writing of its intention to implement the modification.

Withdrawal of Substantially Equivalent Coverage

6. Where a modification becomes effective pursuant to paragraph 5(c), any objecting Party may withdraw substantially equivalent coverage. Notwithstanding Article IV:1(b), a withdrawal pursuant to this paragraph may be implemented solely with respect to the modifying Party. Any objecting Party shall inform the Committee in writing of any such withdrawal at least 30 days before the withdrawal becomes effective. A withdrawal pursuant to this paragraph shall be consistent with any criteria relating to the level of compensatory adjustment adopted by the Committee pursuant to paragraph 8(c).

Arbitration Procedures to Facilitate Resolution of Objections

7. Where the Committee has adopted arbitration procedures to facilitate the resolution of objections pursuant to paragraph 8, a modifying or any objecting Party may invoke the arbitration procedures within 120 days of circulation of the notification of the proposed modification:

- a) Where no Party has invoked the arbitration procedures within the time-period:
  - i. notwithstanding paragraph 5(c), the proposed modification shall become effective where 130 days from the date of circulation of the notification of the proposed modification under paragraph 1 have elapsed, and the modifying Party has informed the Committee in writing of its intention to implement the modification; and
  - ii. no objecting Party may withdraw coverage pursuant to paragraph 6.
- b) Where a modifying Party or objecting Party has invoked the arbitration procedures:
  - i. notwithstanding paragraph 5(c), the proposed modification shall not become effective before the completion of the arbitration procedures;

- ii. any objecting Party that intends to enforce a right to compensation, or to withdraw substantially equivalent coverage pursuant to paragraph 6, shall participate in the arbitration proceedings;
- iii. a modifying Party should comply with the results of the arbitration procedures in making any modification effective pursuant to paragraph 5(c); and
- iv. where a modifying Party does not comply with the results of the arbitration procedures in making any modification effective pursuant to paragraph 5(c), any objecting Party may withdraw substantially equivalent coverage pursuant to paragraph 6, provided that any such withdrawal is consistent with the result of the arbitration procedures.

Committee Responsibilities

8. The Committee shall adopt:
- a) arbitration procedures to facilitate resolution of objections under paragraph 2;
  - b) indicative criteria that demonstrate the effective elimination of government control or influence over an entity's covered procurement; and
  - c) criteria for determining the level of compensatory adjustment to be offered for modifications made pursuant to paragraph 1(b) and of substantially equivalent coverage under paragraph 6.

Article XX

Consultations and Dispute Settlement

1. Each Party shall accord sympathetic consideration to and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding any representation made by another Party with respect to any matter affecting the operation of this Agreement.

---

2. Where any Party considers that any benefit accruing to it, directly or indirectly, under this Agreement is being nullified or impaired, or that the attainment of any objective of this Agreement is being impeded as the result of:

- a) the failure of another Party or Parties to carry out its obligations under this Agreement; or
- b) the application by another Party or Parties of any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the provisions of this Agreement, it may, with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory solution to the matter, have recourse to the provisions of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (hereinafter referred to as "the Dispute Settlement Understanding").

3. The Dispute Settlement Understanding shall apply to consultations and the settlement of disputes under this Agreement, with the exception that, notwithstanding paragraph 3 of Article 22 of the Dispute Settlement Understanding, any dispute arising under any Agreement listed in Appendix 1 to the Dispute Settlement Understanding other than this Agreement shall not result in the suspension of concessions or other obligations under this Agreement, and any dispute arising under this Agreement shall not result in the suspension of concessions or other obligations under any other Agreement listed in Appendix 1 of the Dispute Settlement Understanding.

Article XXI

Institutions

Committee on Government Procurement

1. There shall be a Committee on Government Procurement composed of representatives from each of the Parties. This Committee shall elect its own Chairman and shall meet as necessary, but not less than once a year, for the purpose of affording Parties the opportunity to consult on any matters relating to the operation of this Agreement or the furtherance of its objectives, and to carry out such other responsibilities as may be assigned to it by the Parties.

2. The Committee may establish working parties or other subsidiary bodies that shall carry out such functions as may be given to them by the Committee.
3. The Committee shall annually:
  - a) review the implementation and operation of this Agreement; and
  - b) inform the General Council of its activities, pursuant to Article IV:8 of the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (hereinafter referred to as "WTO Agreement"), and of developments relating to the implementation and operation of this Agreement.

Observers

4. Any WTO Member that is not a Party to this Agreement shall be entitled to participate in the Committee as an observer by submitting a written notice to the Committee. Any WTO observer may submit a written request to the Committee to participate in the Committee as an observer, and may be accorded observer status by the Committee.

Article XXII Final Provisions

Acceptance and Entry into Force

1. This Agreement shall enter into force on 1 January 1996 for those governments<sup>1</sup> whose agreed coverage is contained in the Annexes of Appendix I of this Agreement, and which have, by signature, accepted the Agreement on 15 April 1994, or have, by that date, signed the Agreement subject to ratification and have subsequently ratified the Agreement before 1 January 1996.

---

<sup>1</sup> For the purpose of this Agreement, the term "government" is deemed to include the competent authorities of the European Union.

Accession

2. Any Member of the WTO may accede to this Agreement on terms to be agreed between that Member and the Parties, with such terms stated in a decision of the Committee. Accession shall take place by deposit with the Director-General of the WTO of an instrument of accession that states the terms so agreed. This Agreement shall enter into force for a Member acceding to it on the 30th day following the deposit of its instrument of accession.

Reservations

3. No Party may enter a reservation in respect of any provision of this Agreement.

Domestic Legislation

4. Each Party shall ensure, not later than the date of entry into force of this Agreement for it, the conformity of its laws, regulations and administrative procedures, and the rules, procedures and practices applied by its procuring entities, with the provisions of this Agreement.

5. Each Party shall inform the Committee of any changes to its laws and regulations relevant to this Agreement and in the administration of such laws and regulations.

Future Negotiations and Future Work Programmes

6. Each Party shall seek to avoid introducing or continuing discriminatory measures that distort open procurement.

7. Not later than the end of three years from the date of entry into force of the Protocol Amending the Agreement on Government Procurement, adopted on 30 March 2012, and periodically thereafter, the Parties shall undertake further negotiations, with a view to improving this Agreement, progressively reducing and eliminating discriminatory measures, and achieving the greatest possible extension of its coverage among all Parties on the basis of mutual reciprocity, taking into consideration the needs of developing countries.

8. a) The Committee shall undertake further work to facilitate the implementation of this Agreement and the negotiations provided for in paragraph 7, through the adoption of work programmes for the following items:
- i. the treatment of small and medium-sized enterprises;
  - ii. the collection and dissemination of statistical data;
  - iii. the treatment of sustainable procurement;
  - iv. exclusions and restrictions in Parties' Annexes; and
  - v. safety standards in international procurement.
- b) The Committee:
- i. may adopt a decision that contains a list of work programmes on additional items, which may be reviewed and updated periodically; and
  - ii. shall adopt a decision setting out the work to be undertaken on each particular work programme under subparagraph (a) and any work programme adopted under subparagraph (b)(i).
9. Following the conclusion of the work programme to harmonize rules of origin for goods being undertaken under the Agreement on Rules of Origin in Annex 1A to the WTO Agreement and negotiations regarding trade in services, the Parties shall take the results of that work programme and those negotiations into account in amending Article IV:5, as appropriate.
10. Not later than the end of the fifth year from the date of entry into force of the Protocol Amending the Agreement on Government Procurement, the Committee shall examine the applicability of Article XX:2(b).

Amendments

11. The Parties may amend this Agreement. A decision to adopt an amendment and to submit it for acceptance by the Parties shall be taken by consensus. An amendment shall enter into force:

- a) except as provided for in subparagraph (b), in respect of those Parties that accept it, upon acceptance by two thirds of the Parties and thereafter for each other Party upon acceptance by it;
- b) for all Parties upon acceptance by two thirds of the Parties if it is an amendment that the Committee, by consensus, has determined to be of a nature that would not alter the rights and obligations of the Parties.

Withdrawal

12. Any Party may withdraw from this Agreement. The withdrawal shall take effect upon the expiration of 60 days from the date the Director-General of the WTO receives written notice of the withdrawal. Any Party may, upon such notification, request an immediate meeting of the Committee.

13. Where a Party to this Agreement ceases to be a Member of the WTO, it shall cease to be a Party to this Agreement with effect on the date on which it ceases to be a Member of the WTO.

Non-application of this Agreement between Particular Parties

14. This Agreement shall not apply as between any two Parties where either Party, at the time either Party accepts or accedes to this Agreement, does not consent to such application.

Appendices

15. The Appendices to this Agreement constitute an integral part thereof.

Secretariat

16. This Agreement shall be serviced by the WTO Secretariat.

Deposit

17. This Agreement shall be deposited with the Director-General of the WTO, who shall promptly furnish to each Party a certified true copy of this Agreement, of each rectification or modification thereto pursuant to Article XIX and of each amendment pursuant to paragraph 11, and a notification of each accession thereto pursuant to paragraph 2 and of each withdrawal pursuant to paragraphs 12 or 13.

Registration

18. This Agreement shall be registered in accordance with the provisions of Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.

ADDITIONAL LEGAL TEXTS

Decision on Arbitration Procedures pursuant to Article XIX:8 of the revised GPA*

The Committee on Government Procurement ("the Committee"),

Noting that Article XIX:8 of the Revised Agreement on Government Procurement ("the Agreement") requires the Committee to develop arbitration procedures to facilitate resolution of objections under Article XIX:2 of the Agreement; and

Confirming the importance of Article XIX:8(b) and (c) of the Agreement to these arbitration procedures and reiterating the Parties' commitment to adopt decisions pursuant to Article XIX:8(b) and (c) of the Agreement.

Hereby adopts the following arbitration procedures to facilitate the resolution of objections under Article XIX:2 of the Agreement:

Invocation of Arbitration Procedures

1. Pursuant to Article XIX:7 of the Agreement, where the modifying Party and an objecting Party are unable to resolve an objection to a proposed modification under Article XIX:1 of the Agreement, the modifying Party or any objecting Party may refer the proposed modification to arbitration, stating the reasons for its request, by notifying the Committee no earlier than 45 days after the date of circulation of the notification of the proposed modification under Article XIX:1 of the Agreement.
2. Where two or more Parties refer the same proposed modification to arbitration prior to the appointment of all the arbitrators, the modifying Party and all objecting Parties shall agree to a single arbitration addressing all objections to the same proposed modification. If additional referrals on the same proposed modification are made after the appointment of all the arbitrators, the modifying Party and all objecting Parties shall agree to a single arbitration whenever feasible.

* Decision of the Committee of 22 June 2016 (GPA/139, of 23 June 2016).

Appointment of the Arbitrators

3. Arbitration shall be carried out by arbitrators. Unless the Parties to the arbitration otherwise agree, there shall be three arbitrators. Arbitrators shall meet the requirements set out for panelists under Articles 8(1), 8(2), and 8(9) of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes.

4. The Secretariat of the Committee shall on request from a Party to the arbitration, propose nominations for the arbitrators. The Parties to the arbitration shall not oppose nominations except for compelling reasons. Citizens of the Parties to the arbitration and government officials of the third Parties shall not be appointed as arbitrators, unless otherwise agreed by the Parties to the arbitration.

5. Where the Parties to the arbitration cannot agree on who should be appointed as arbitrators within 20 days after referring the proposed modification to arbitration, at the request of a Party to the arbitration, the Director-General shall appoint the arbitrators within 10 days, after consulting Parties to the arbitration and the Chair of the Committee.

Third Party Participation

6. Any Party to the Agreement having a substantial interest in a proposed modification brought to arbitration and having notified its interest to the Committee (referred to herein as "third Party") within 10 days after the proposed modification being referred to arbitration shall be invited to make a written submission, attend substantive meetings of the arbitrators with the Parties to the arbitration, make oral statements, and be entitled to respond to questions from the arbitrators.

Procedures

7. In its proceedings, the arbitrators shall apply the relevant provisions of the Agreement and be guided by the decision adopted by the Committee in accordance with Article XIX:8(b) of the Agreement, once it is adopted. In addition, the following working procedures shall apply:

- a) The Secretariat of the Committee shall promptly transmit to the arbitrators the applicable notification and objection under paragraph 1 or 2 of Article XIX of the Agreement. Within 10 days of the appointment of the arbitrators, and after consultations with the Parties to the arbitration, the arbitrators shall adopt a timetable for the conduct of the arbitration proceedings. The timetable should be based on the timetable included in the Annex to this Decision.
- b) Unless the Parties to the arbitration agree that it is unnecessary, the arbitrators shall hold a substantive meeting with the Parties to the arbitration. Before the substantive meeting, the Parties to the arbitration shall transmit to the arbitrators written submissions in which they present the facts of the case and their arguments.
- c) Where a Party to the arbitration submits information that it has designated as confidential to the arbitrators, the arbitrators, the other Parties to the arbitration and third Parties shall treat that information as confidential. Upon request of a Party to the arbitration, the arbitrators shall establish additional procedures necessary to preserve the confidentiality of such information.”
- d) Where a Party to the arbitration designates information in its written submissions as confidential, the Party shall, on request of another Party to the arbitration or a third Party, provide a non-confidential summary of the information contained in its submission that could be disclosed to the public.
- e) At the substantive meeting, the arbitrators shall ask the Party that has requested arbitration to present its case by making an oral submission. The Party against which the arbitration has been brought shall then be asked to present its point of view by making an oral submission.

- f) The substantive meetings of the arbitrators shall be open to the public, except where a Party to the arbitration requests that the meeting be closed to protect information designated as confidential.
  - g) The arbitrators may, at any time, put questions to the Parties to the arbitration and third Parties and ask them for explanations either in the course of the meeting or in writing.
  - h) The written submissions of the Parties to the arbitration, including any responses to questions put by the arbitrators, shall be made available to the other Party or Parties to the arbitration as well as to the third Parties. The Parties to the arbitration shall submit a written version of their oral statements made at the meeting with the arbitrators to the arbitrators, the other Party or Parties to the arbitration and to the third Parties.
  - i) The written submissions, responses to questions, and written versions of oral statements of the third Parties shall be made available to the arbitrators, the Parties to the arbitration and other third Parties, and shall be reflected in the arbitrators' report.
  - j) The deliberations of the arbitrators shall be kept confidential.
  - k) The arbitrators may seek information from any relevant source and may consult experts. The arbitrators shall provide to the Parties to the arbitration and third Parties any information provided to or received from experts. The Parties to the arbitration shall have an opportunity to comment on any input received from experts.
  - l) Any additional procedures specific to the arbitration shall be determined by the arbitrators in consultation with the Parties to the arbitration.
  - m) Subject to paragraph 7.c., nothing in these procedures shall preclude a Party to the arbitration or a third Party from disclosing statements of its own positions to the public.

8. The Rules of Conduct for the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes shall apply to each person serving as an arbitrator under these procedures and, as specified in the Rules of Conduct and the relevant provisions of the Staff Regulations, to those members of the Secretariat called upon to assist the arbitrators.

9. Where Parties to the arbitration reach a mutually agreed solution to objections to the proposed modification, they shall promptly notify the arbitrators. Upon receipt of the notification, the arbitrators shall terminate the proceedings for those Parties. The details of any mutually agreed solution shall be notified to the Committee, where any Party to the Agreement may comment.

Arbitrators' Determination

10. The terms of reference for the arbitrators shall require the arbitrators to determine:

- a) in the case of a proposed withdrawal under Article XIX:1(a) of the Agreement, whether government control or influence over the covered procurement of the entity proposed to be withdrawn has been effectively eliminated; or
- b) in the case of any other proposed modification under Article XIX:1(b), whether the proposed modification maintains a balance of rights and obligations and a comparable level of mutually agreed coverage provided in the Agreement and, where appropriate, the level of compensatory adjustment.

11. The arbitrators shall issue a report containing its reasoned determination to the Parties to the arbitration within 90 days or, in the event that the timetable is modified by the arbitrators, no later than 120 days of:

- a) the appointment of the arbitrators where an arbitration is conducted pursuant to paragraph 1.; or
- b) the request where an arbitration is conducted pursuant to paragraph 12.

The time period set out in this paragraph may be extended by mutual agreement of the Parties to the arbitration. The Secretariat of the Committee shall promptly circulate the report to the Parties to the Agreement following translation.

---

12. Where the arbitrators make a negative determination under paragraph 10.a., and where the arbitrators made no determination of compensatory adjustment under paragraph 10.b., any Party to the arbitration may request after 30 days and no later than 60 days following the circulation of the arbitrators' report that the same arbitrators, where available, shall determine the level of compensatory adjustment that would result in a comparable level of coverage and maintain the balance of rights and obligations under the Agreement. In doing so, the arbitrators shall be guided by the decision adopted by the Committee in accordance with Article XIX:8(c) of the Agreement, once it is adopted. Where any of the original arbitrators are not available, a replacement shall be appointed in accordance with paragraphs 3. to 5.

Implementation

13. The Parties to the arbitration shall accept the arbitrators' determination as final.

14. For the purposes of Article XIX:7(b)(i) of the Agreement, the arbitration procedures are completed:

- a) when a report under paragraph 11. that does not give rise to the right to further proceedings under paragraph 12. is circulated to the Parties to the Agreement; or
- b) where Parties to the arbitration do not exercise a right available to them under paragraph 12., upon the expiration of the time period set out in that paragraph.

Annex

Proposed timetable for arbitration

The arbitrators shall base the timetable adopted under paragraph 7.a. on the following:

- a) Receipt of written submissions of the Parties to the arbitration:
  - (1) Requesting Party: ----- 2 weeks
  - (2) Responding Party: ----- 2 weeks
- b) Receipt of third party submissions: ----- 1 week
- c) Substantive meeting with the arbitrators: ----- 1-2 weeks
- d) Responses to questions to Parties and third Parties to the arbitration: ----- 1-2 weeks
- e) Issuance and circulation of the arbitrators' report on its determination: ----- 4 weeks

Consistent with the provisions of paragraph 11., the arbitrators may change the above timetable and may schedule additional meetings with the Parties to the arbitration after consulting them.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT 1994)

Article III*

National Treatment on Internal Taxation and Regulation

1. The contracting parties recognize that internal taxes and other internal charges, and laws, regulations and requirements affecting the internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use of products, and internal quantitative regulations requiring the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions, should not be applied to imported or domestic products so as to afford protection to domestic production.**

2. The products of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall not be subject, directly or indirectly, to internal taxes or other internal charges of any kind in excess of those applied, directly or indirectly, to like domestic products. Moreover, no contracting party shall otherwise apply internal taxes or other internal

* Any internal tax or other internal charge, or any law, regulation or requirement of the kind referred to in paragraph 1 which applies to an imported product and to the like domestic product and is collected or enforced in the case of the imported product at the time or point of importation, is nevertheless to be regarded as an internal tax or other internal charge, or a law, regulation or requirement of the kind referred to in paragraph 1, and is accordingly subject to the provisions of Article III.

** The application of paragraph 1 to internal taxes imposed by local governments and authorities with the territory of a contracting party is subject to the provisions of the final paragraph of Article XXIV. The term "reasonable measures" in the last-mentioned paragraph would not require, for example, the repeal of existing national legislation authorizing local governments to impose internal taxes which, although technically inconsistent with the letter of Article III, are not in fact inconsistent with its spirit, if such repeal would result in a serious financial hardship for the local governments or authorities concerned. With regard to taxation by local governments or authorities which is inconsistent with both the letter and spirit of Article III, the term "reasonable measures" would permit a contracting party to eliminate the inconsistent taxation gradually over a transition period, if abrupt action would create serious administrative and financial difficulties.

charges to imported or domestic products in a manner contrary to the principles set forth in paragraph 1.<sup>***</sup>

3. With respect to any existing internal tax which is inconsistent with the provisions of paragraph 2, but which is specifically authorized under a trade agreement, in force on April 10, 1947, in which the import duty on the taxed product is bound against increase, the contracting party imposing the tax shall be free to postpone the application of the provisions of paragraph 2 to such tax until such time as it can obtain release from the obligations of such trade agreement in order to permit the increase of such duty to the extent necessary to compensate for the elimination of the protective element of the tax.

4. The products of the territory of any contracting party imported into the territory of any other contracting party shall be accorded treatment no less favourable than that accorded to like products of national origin in respect of all laws, regulations and requirements affecting their internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use. The provisions of this paragraph shall not prevent the application of differential internal transportation charges which are based exclusively on the economic operation of the means of transport and not on the nationality of the product.

5. No contracting party shall establish or maintain any internal quantitative regulation relating to the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions which requires, directly or indirectly, that any specified amount or proportion of any product which is the subject of the regulation must be supplied from domestic sources. Moreover, no contracting party shall otherwise apply internal quantitative regulations in a manner contrary to the principles set forth in paragraph 1.<sup>****</sup>

<sup>***</sup> A tax conforming to the requirements of the first sentence of paragraph 2 would be considered to be inconsistent with the provisions of the second sentence only in cases where competition was involved between, on the one hand, the taxed product and, on the other hand, a directly competitive or substitutable product which was not similarly taxed.

<sup>****</sup> Regulations consistent with the provisions of the first sentence of paragraph 5 shall not be considered to be contrary to the provisions of the second sentence in any case in which all of the products subject to the regulations are produced domestically in substantial quantities. A regulation cannot be justified as being consistent with the provisions of the second sentence on the ground that the proportion or amount allocated to each of the products which are the subject of the regulation constitutes an equitable relationship between imported and domestic products.

6. The provisions of paragraph 5 shall not apply to any internal quantitative regulation in force in the territory of any contracting party on July 1, 1939, April 10, 1947, or March 24, 1948, at the option of that contracting party; Provided that any such regulation which is contrary to the provisions of paragraph 5 shall not be modified to the detriment of imports and shall be treated as a customs duty for the purpose of negotiation.

7. No internal quantitative regulation relating to the mixture, processing or use of products in specified amounts or proportions shall be applied in such a manner as to allocate any such amount or proportion among external sources of supply.

8. (a) The provisions of this Article shall not apply to laws, regulations or requirements governing the procurement by governmental agencies of products purchased for governmental purposes and not with a view to commercial resale or with a view to use in the production of goods for commercial sale.

(b) The provisions of this Article shall not prevent the payment of subsidies exclusively to domestic producers, including payments to domestic producers derived from the proceeds of internal taxes or charges applied consistently with the provisions of this Article and subsidies effected through governmental purchases of domestic products.

9. The contracting parties recognize that internal maximum price control measures, even though conforming to the other provisions of this Article, can have effects prejudicial to the interests of contracting parties supplying imported products. Accordingly, contracting parties applying such measures shall take account of the interests of exporting contracting parties with a view to avoiding to the fullest practicable extent such prejudicial effects.

10. The provisions of this Article shall not prevent any contracting party from establishing or maintaining internal quantitative regulations relating to exposed cinematograph films and meeting the requirements of Article IV.

General Agreement on Trade in Services

Article II

Most-Favoured-Nation Treatment

1. With respect to any measure covered by this Agreement, each Member shall accord immediately and unconditionally to services and service suppliers of any other Member treatment no less favourable than that it accords to like services and service suppliers of any other country.
2. A Member may maintain a measure inconsistent with paragraph 1 provided that such a measure is listed in, and meets the conditions of, the Annex on Article II Exemptions.
3. The provisions of this Agreement shall not be so construed as to prevent any Member from conferring or according advantages to adjacent countries in order to facilitate exchanges limited to contiguous frontier zones of services that are both locally produced and consumed.

Article XIII

Government Procurement

1. Articles II, XVI and XVII shall not apply to laws, regulations or requirements governing the procurement by governmental agencies of services purchased for governmental purposes and not with a view to commercial resale or with a view to use in the supply of services for commercial sale.
2. There shall be multilateral negotiations on government procurement in services under this Agreement within two years from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement.

Article XVI

Market Access

1. With respect to market access through the modes of supply identified in Article I, each Member shall accord services and service suppliers of any other Member treatment no less favourable than that provided for under the terms, limitations and conditions agreed and specified in its Schedule.<sup>1</sup>

2. In sectors where market-access commitments are undertaken, the measures which a Member shall not maintain or adopt either on the basis of a regional subdivision or on the basis of its entire territory, unless otherwise specified in its Schedule, are defined as:

- (a) limitations on the number of service suppliers whether in the form of numerical quotas, monopolies, exclusive service suppliers or the requirements of an economic needs test;
- (b) limitations on the total value of service transactions or assets in the form of numerical quotas or the requirement of an economic needs test;
- (c) limitations on the total number of service operations or on the total quantity of service output expressed in terms of designated numerical units in the form of quotas or the requirement of an economic needs test;<sup>2</sup>
- (d) limitations on the total number of natural persons that may be employed in a particular service sector or that a service supplier may employ and who are necessary for, and directly related to, the supply of a specific service in the form of numerical quotas or the requirement of an economic needs test;

<sup>1</sup> If a Member undertakes a market-access commitment in relation to the supply of a service through the mode of supply referred to in subparagraph 2(a) of Article I and if the cross-border movement of capital is an essential part of the service itself, that Member is thereby committed to allow such movement of capital. If a Member undertakes a market-access commitment in relation to the supply of a service through the mode of supply referred to in subparagraph 2(c) of Article I, it is thereby committed to allow related transfers of capital into its territory.

- (e) measures which restrict or require specific types of legal entity or joint venture through which a service supplier may supply a service; and
- (f) limitations on the participation of foreign capital in terms of maximum percentage limit on foreign shareholding or the total value of individual or aggregate foreign investment.

Article XVII

National Treatment

1. In the sectors inscribed in its Schedule, and subject to any conditions and qualifications set out therein, each Member shall accord to services and service suppliers of any other Member, in respect of all measures affecting the supply of services, treatment no less favourable than that it accords to its own like services and service suppliers.<sup>3</sup>

2. A Member may meet the requirement of paragraph 1 by according to services and service suppliers of any other Member, either formally identical treatment or formally different treatment to that it accords to its own like services and service suppliers.

3. Formally identical or formally different treatment shall be considered to be less favourable if it modifies the conditions of competition in favour of services or service suppliers of the Member compared to like services or service suppliers of any other Member.

<sup>3</sup> Specific commitments assumed under this Article shall not be construed to require any Member to compensate for any inherent competitive disadvantages which result from the foreign character of the relevant services or service suppliers.

Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes

Article 1

Coverage and Application

1. The rules and procedures of this Understanding shall apply to disputes brought pursuant to the consultation and dispute settlement provisions of the agreements listed in Appendix 1 to this Understanding (referred to in this Understanding as the "covered agreements"). The rules and procedures of this Understanding shall also apply to consultations and the settlement of disputes between Members concerning their rights and obligations under the provisions of the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (referred to in this Understanding as the "WTO Agreement") and of this Understanding taken in isolation or in combination with any other covered agreement.

2. The rules and procedures of this Understanding shall apply subject to such special or additional rules and procedures on dispute settlement contained in the covered agreements as are identified in Appendix 2 to this Understanding. To the extent that there is a difference between the rules and procedures of this Understanding and the special or additional rules and procedures set forth in Appendix 2, the special or additional rules and procedures in Appendix 2 shall prevail. In disputes involving rules and procedures under more than one covered agreement, if there is a conflict between special or additional rules and procedures of such agreements under review, and where the parties to the dispute cannot agree on rules and procedures within 20 days of the establishment of the panel, the Chairman of the Dispute Settlement Body provided for in paragraph 1 of Article 2 (referred to in this Understanding as the "DSB"), in consultation with the parties to the dispute, shall determine the rules and procedures to be followed within 10 days after a request by either Member. The Chairman shall be guided by the principle that special or additional rules and procedures should be used where possible, and the rules and procedures set out in this Understanding should be used to the extent necessary to avoid conflict.

Article 2

Administration

1. The Dispute Settlement Body is hereby established to administer these rules and procedures and, except as otherwise provided in a covered agreement, the consultation and dispute settlement provisions of the covered agreements. Accordingly, the DSB shall have the authority to establish panels, adopt panel and Appellate Body reports, maintain surveillance of implementation of rulings and recommendations, and authorize suspension of concessions and other obligations under the covered agreements. With respect to disputes arising under a covered agreement which is a Plurilateral Trade Agreement, the term "Member" as used herein shall refer only to those Members that are parties to the relevant Plurilateral Trade Agreement. Where the DSB administers the dispute settlement provisions of a Plurilateral Trade Agreement, only those Members that are parties to that Agreement may participate in decisions or actions taken by the DSB with respect to that dispute.

2. The DSB shall inform the relevant WTO Councils and Committees of any developments in disputes related to provisions of the respective covered agreements.

3. The DSB shall meet as often as necessary to carry out its functions within the time-frames provided in this Understanding.

4. Where the rules and procedures of this Understanding provide for the DSB to take a decision, it shall do so by consensus.<sup>4</sup>

---

<sup>4</sup> The DSB shall be deemed to have decided by consensus on a matter submitted for its consideration, if no Member, present at the meeting of the DSB when the decision is taken, formally objects to the proposed decision.

SECTION I – PURPOSE AND APPLICATION

1. This Policy sets out a vision, the key principles, and policy requirements governing the procurement of goods, works, non-consulting services, and consulting services financed by the Bank (in whole or in part) through IPF operations, excluding procurement under Bank guarantees and under Bank-financed loans made by eligible financial intermediaries, for which the final recipient of loan funds is a private borrower.
2. This Policy applies to the Bank.

SECTION II – DEFINITIONS AND ACRONYMS

As used in this Policy, the capitalized terms and acronyms have the meanings set out below.

1. Anti-Corruption Guidelines: the “Guidelines on Preventing and Combating Fraud and Corruption in Projects Financed by IBRD Loans and IDA Credits and Grants.”
2. APA: alternative procurement arrangements.
3. Bank: IBRD and IDA (whether acting in its own capacity or as administrator of trust funds funded by other donors).
4. Board: the Executive Directors of IBRD or IDA, or both, as applicable.
5. Borrower: a borrower or recipient of the IPF, and any other entity involved in the implementation of the project financed by the IPF.
6. Core Procurement Principles: the principles set out in Section III.C of this Policy.
7. CPO: Chief Procurement Officer.
8. Financing: a loan, credit, or grant made by the Bank from its resources or from trust funds funded by other donors and administered by the Bank, or a combination of these.
9. IBRD: International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.
10. IDA: International Development Association.
11. IFC: International Finance Corporation.
12. Investment Project Financing (IPF): Bank Financing described in paragraph 1 of Section III of the IPF Policy.
13. IPF Policy: Bank Policy, “Investment Project Financing.”
14. Management: the President or a Manager of the Bank, or a chief officer whose functions and responsibilities include the authority to issue P&P Documents as set out by Management through terms of reference or a delegation of authority, or some or all of these persons, as applicable.

16. MIGA: Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency.
17. OPCS: Operations Policy and Country Services.
18. OPSVP: Operations Policy Vice President.
19. P&P Document: a document defined in Section II.10 of the Bank Policy, “Policy and Procedure Framework.”
20. Procurement Framework: a framework consisting of this Policy and other procurement requirements and procurement guidance adopted by Management.
21. Project Procurement Strategy for Development (PPSD): a strategy referred to in Section III.G of this Policy.
22. Procurement Plan: a plan referred to in Section III.G of this Policy.
23. Procurement Process: a process covering all the stages of procurement.
24. WBG: IBRD, IDA, IFC, MIGA.
25. WBG Sanctions Framework: a framework consisting of WBG Policy, “Sanctions for Fraud and Corruption”, and other related P&P Documents adopted by Management.

SECTION III – SCOPE

A. Vision

Procurement in IPF operations supports Borrowers to achieve value for money with integrity in delivering sustainable development. To achieve this vision, the Bank seeks assurance from Borrowers that acceptable procurement arrangements are applied to the financial resources it provides to Borrowers, and supports Borrower countries in enhancing and implementing sound procurement systems and institutions. The Bank may support country capacity building at the level of the project or as part of the country dialogue, using a range of measures—funding, technical support, and hands-on expanded implementation support (in selected cases)—depending on the specific context of the country, sector, agency, or project.

B. Preamble

This Policy is based on and, with other Bank fiduciary rules and practices, fulfils the requirements of the IBRD Articles of Agreement (Article III, Section 5(b) and IDA Articles of Agreement (Article V, Section 1(g)) to ensure that the proceeds of Bank Financing are used only for the purposes for which the Financing was granted, with due attention to considerations of economy and efficiency, without regard to political or other non-economic influences or considerations.

C. Core Procurement Principles

All procurement actions under this Policy are governed by and are consistent with the following Core Procurement Principles.

1. Value for money. The principle of value for money means the effective, efficient, and economic use of resources, which requires an evaluation of relevant costs and benefits, along with an assessment of risks, and non-price attributes and/or life cycle costs, as appropriate. Price alone may not necessarily represent value for money.
2. Economy. The principle of economy takes into consideration factors such as sustainability, quality, and non-price attributes and/or life cycle cost as appropriate, that support value for money. It permits integrating into the Procurement Process economic, environmental, and social considerations that the Bank has agreed with the Borrower. It also permits augmenting identified sustainability criteria with specific criteria in support of the Borrower's own sustainable procurement policy.
3. Integrity. The principle of integrity refers to the use of funds, resources, assets, and authority according to the intended purposes and in a manner that is well informed, aligned with the public interest, and aligned with broader principles of good governance. The Bank therefore requires that all parties involved in the Procurement Process, including without limitation, Borrowers and sub-Borrowers (and other beneficiaries of Bank Financing); bidders, consultants, contractors, and suppliers; any sub-contractors, sub-consultants, service providers or suppliers; any agents (whether declared or not); and any of their personnel, observe the highest standard of ethics during the Procurement Process of Bank-financed contracts, and refrain from fraud and corruption, as that term is defined in the Anti-Corruption Guidelines.
4. Fit for Purpose. The principle of fit for purpose applies both to the intended outcomes and the procurement arrangements in determining the most appropriate approach to meet the project development objectives and outcomes, taking into account the context and the risk, value, and complexity of the procurement.
5. Efficiency. The principle of efficiency requires that Procurement Processes be proportional to the value and risks of the underlying project activities. Procurement arrangements are generally time-sensitive and strive to avoid delays.
6. Transparency. The principle of transparency requires that the Borrower and the Bank enable appropriate review of the procurement activities, supported by appropriate documentation and disclosure. Transparency requires (i) that relevant procurement information be made publicly available to all interested parties, consistently and in a timely manner, through readily accessible and widely available sources at reasonable or no cost; (ii) appropriate reporting of procurement activities; and (iii) the use of confidentiality provisions in contracts only where justified.
7. Fairness. The principle of fairness refers to (i) equal opportunity and treatment for bidders and consultants; (ii) equitable distribution of rights and obligations between Borrowers and suppliers, bidders, consultants, and contractors; and (iii) credible mechanisms for addressing procurement-related complaints and providing recourse. Open competitive procurement is the Bank's preferred procurement approach, whenever possible, to maximize fairness of opportunity to bid. Whenever possible, the Bank requires that eligible individuals and firms be given the same opportunities to compete for Bank-financed activities.

D. Governance

1. Accountability. The concept of accountability, as it applies to the Bank and Borrowers, combines the requirements of transparency and responsibility, and holds those involved in the Procurement Process accountable for their actions (or inactions).
2. Conflict of Interest. The Bank requires that all parties involved in the Procurement Process not have a conflict of interest, unless such a conflict has been resolved in a manner acceptable to the Bank.
3. Eligibility. The Bank permits firms and individuals from all countries to offer goods, works, non-consulting services, and consulting services for Bank-financed projects, subject to other Bank rules on eligibility and participation.
4. Complaints and Contract-related Communications. Procurement-related complaints and communications related to contractual matters may be brought to the attention of the Borrower or the Bank at the appropriate stage of the Procurement Process. They make every effort to address such complaints and other communications objectively and in a timely manner, with transparency and fairness.
5. Noncompliance. If the Borrower or other parties involved in the Procurement Process do not comply with the applicable procurement requirements, the Bank may, in addition to the contractual remedies set out in the relevant legal agreement, take other appropriate actions consistent with the terms and conditions of the legal agreement and the Bank's implementation support and monitoring role.

E. Roles and Responsibilities

The Bank's and Borrower's roles and responsibilities, including in the area of procurement, are set out in paragraphs 19 and 21 of Section III of the IPF Policy. In seeking to ensure that funds are used only for the purposes for which the Financing was granted, the Bank carries out its procurement functions, including procurement oversight, under a risk-based approach.

F. Alternative Procurement Arrangements

1. Subject to paragraph 2 of this Section III.F, at the Borrower's request, the Bank may agree to (a) rely on and apply the procurement rules and procedures of another multilateral or bilateral agency or organization, and may agree to such a party taking a leading role in providing the implementation support and monitoring of project procurement activities; and (b) rely on and apply the procurement rules and procedures of an agency or entity of the Borrower.
2. The alternative procurement arrangements referred to in paragraph 1 of this Section III.F are consistent with the provisions set out in Section III.C and Section III.D of this Policy, and ensure that the WBG Sanctions Framework and Anti-Corruption Guidelines, contractual remedies set out in its legal agreements with the Borrower, and other terms and conditions necessary to address the particular circumstances of the proposed APA apply.

G. Project Procurement Strategy for Development and Procurement Plan

The Bank requires the Borrower to develop a Project Procurement Strategy for Development and a Procurement Plan for each IPF operation. The PPSD describes how the project procurement activities support the development objectives of the project. The scope and details of the PPSD take into account, and are proportional to, the relevant market, scale, risk, value, and country circumstances, including, when applicable, situations of urgent need of assistance or capacity constraints, and the specific economic, environmental, and social objectives of the project. The Procurement Plan is based on the PPSD and sets out the selection methods to be followed by the Borrower during project implementation in the procurement of goods, works, non-consulting services, and consulting services financed by the Bank.

H. Interpretation and Modification of the Policy

The Executive Directors of the Bank interpret and, as necessary, modify this Policy. Management also interprets this Policy, and recommends to the Executive Directors any necessary Policy modifications.

SECTION IV – WAIVER

The provisions of this Policy may be waived in accordance with the Bank Policy “Operational Policy Waivers”; and the Bank Procedure “Operational Policy Waivers and Waivers of Operational Requirements.”

MAPS

Methodology for Assessing Procurement Systems

METHODOLOGY FOR ASSESSING PROCUREMENT SYSTEMS (MAPS)

2018

METHODOLOGY FOR ASSESSING PROCUREMENT SYSTEMS (MAPS)

FOREWORD

Public procurement is a crucial component of public services delivery, good governance and sustainable economies with inclusive growth. Governments around the world spend approximately USD 9.5 trillion in public contracts every year. This fact means that on average, public procurement constitutes around 12%-20% of a country's GDP.<sup>1</sup> The strengthening of public procurement systems is thus central for achieving concrete and sustainable results and to build effective institutions.

The Methodology for Assessing Procurement Systems (MAPS) was initially developed in 2003/2004, thanks to the collective efforts of many stakeholders. Its goal was to assess and improve public procurement systems by providing a common tool for analysing information on key aspects of any system. MAPS has been widely used to assess the quality and effectiveness of public procurement systems and, based on the strengths and weaknesses identified, to develop strategies and implement reforms. These efforts typically focused on creating the foundation for a well-functioning public procurement system by establishing a legal, regulatory and institutional framework.

This revision to the original MAPS reflects a modern understanding of public procurement, taking account of global developments and improvements suggested by the wide array of users and stakeholders. The new MAPS is a universal tool that aims to catalyse and accelerate the implementation of modern, efficient, sustainable and more inclusive public procurement systems in all countries. MAPS assessments highlight where reforms are most needed and indicate how reforms can be best carried out.

<sup>1</sup> 12% in OECD countries and 18%-20% in the European Union; this percentage may be higher in some developing countries.

The MAPS revision was guided by several considerations:

- Value for money, reflecting the basic goal that every procurement system should be providing the required goods, works and services in an economic, efficient, effective and sustainable way.
- Transparency, reflecting the basic and commonly agreed-upon principle of disclosure to make policies, legal and institutional frameworks and information related to decisions available to the public in a comprehensible, accessible and timely manner.
- Fairness, reflecting the ambition that the public procurement process should be free from bias, ensure equal treatment and take decisions accordingly, thus ensuring integrity.
- Good governance, recognising the importance of the wider governance context on the way public procurement is conducted and how reforms to procurement are implemented. This aspect includes reflection of horizontal procurement goals, policy considerations and integrity principles.

Contextual elements have been integrated to ensure that the application of MAPS helps contribute to effectiveness. Among those considerations are national policy objectives, including targets on sustainability, support for the private sector, civil service reform, etc., as well as other factors that create an enabling environment for a well-functioning procurement system, such as good public financial management, accountability, legal certainty and workforce capacity.

The new version of MAPS is timely in the wake of the launch of the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). Like the SDGs, MAPS will be relevant for all countries, irrespective of income level or development status. MAPS is related to Goal 12, which calls for the promotion of sustainable procurement practices in line with national priorities and policies, and Goal 16, which calls for effective and accountable institutions. In addition, MAPS is anchored in the 2015 Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) Recommendation of the Council on Public Procurement and is reflective of leading international procurement frameworks such as the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) Model Law on Public Procurement (2011), the European Union (EU) Directives on Public Procurement (2014), and the procurement frameworks used by multilateral development banks, countries and implementing institutions. It provides a holistic assessment framework, establishing the criteria of an effective and efficient procurement system that all countries should strive to achieve.

The MAPS revision process was a co-operative effort that included countries and partners alike. The draft revised MAPS methodology was open to public consultations and was further vetted in a testing and piloting phase involving a diverse set of countries spanning various income categories and development situations, to ensure broad participation and contributions from the public and private sector as well as civil society.

SECTION I – USER’S GUIDE

Introduction

Objective of the User’s Guide

1. This User’s Guide aims to facilitate a consistent approach to the application of the Methodology for Assessing Procurement Systems (MAPS), focusing on how the findings can be most effectively translated into reforms.

Purpose and use of the methodology

2. MAPS is intended to provide a harmonised tool for use in the assessment of public procurement systems. The methodology is designed to enable a country, with or without the support of external partners, to conduct an assessment of its procurement system in order to determine its strengths and weaknesses. The resulting information can serve as the basis for harmonised system development and reform initiatives<sup>2</sup> that can improve capacity and address any weaknesses. The assessment also provides the country with information it can use to monitor the performance of its system and evaluate the success of the reform initiatives in improving performance. By identifying weaknesses in a country’s current system, it also offers external partners information that can help them determine risks to the funds they provide to partner countries.
3. MAPS is a universal tool. It aims to lay the foundation for a well-governed public procurement system that helps meet policy objectives, increase public trust, enhance well-being and build more prosperous and inclusive societies. It is guided by the principles value for money, transparency, fairness and good governance. The 2017 version of MAPS embodies high aspirational standards and serves as a guide toward reform, rather than setting out minimum standards that countries are universally required to attain. Depending on the conditions in a given country, for example in the case of fragile states that are vulnerable to conflict, these aspirational standards may only be achievable over a longer period.
4. The MAPS assessment is neither an audit of a procurement system, nor intended as a substitute for a fiduciary assessment by the country, a donor or other external partners, if required. It aims to provide a common assessment tool for countries and for the international community, irrespective of geographical application.

2 The terms “reform initiatives” and “system development” are used interchangeably in this methodology.

Analytical Framework (Overview)

Building blocks

5. The MAPS analytical framework consists of a core assessment methodology and a number of supplementary modules.
6. The MAPS core methodology described in this document provides a comprehensive approach for assessing procurement systems. It defines the structure for conducting a country context analysis, presents a refined indicator system for assessing the quality and performance of the system in terms of outcomes and results, and describes the key elements of the assessment process.
7. Supplementary modules are progressively being developed to complement the core assessment methodology. They focus on specific policy areas of public procurement and can be used by countries depending on their needs.

Analysis of country context

8. Section II, “Analysis of country context”, presents a structured approach for analysing the local environment, to ensure that the assessment is anchored in a country’s specific needs and that the different elements of the MAPS analytical framework are applied appropriately.
9. The context analysis draws on easily accessible information and existing data, and focuses on a number of factors essential for procurement reform. These include the country’s economic situation, its national policy objectives, the public procurement reform environment, and the relationship between the public procurement system, the public finance management and the public governance systems. The context analysis also identifies key stakeholders formally and informally linked to public procurement structures.

Indicator system

10. The MAPS indicator system is described in detail in Section III, “Assessment of public procurement systems”. It rests on four pillars: i) the existing legal and policy framework regulating procurement in the country; ii) the institutional framework and management capacity; iii) the operation of the system and competitiveness of the national market; and iv) the accountability, integrity and transparency of the procurement system.
11. Each pillar has a number of indicators and sub-indicators to assess. The indicator system has a total of 14 indicators and 55 sub-indicators, which, taken together, present the criteria for a snapshot comparison of the system against the stated principles. The indicators are expressed in qualitative and/or quantitative terms, as appropriate. Figure 1 (below) outlines the overall structure of MAPS.

12. The indicators often refer to the procurement law and to the legal framework. The reference to the procurement law is to the supreme legal instrument governing public procurement in the country. The form or nature of the supreme law varies depending on a country's legal system (common law, civil law, etc.) and on tradition.<sup>3</sup> In general, this document assumes an over-arching supreme legal instrument, then proceeds to the regulations that provide further detailed legal interpretation and detailed procedures for administering them. In some instances, legal obligations related to public procurement may also derive from memberships in international and/or regional associations or treaties. Other national laws, including on budget, construction or competition, may also impose obligations that guide public procurement. The entire set of legal instruments relating to public procurement is designated as the "legal framework".

Application of indicators

13. Each indicator and sub-indicator is preceded by a short text that outlines the elements that the sub-indicator attempts to assess and describes the nature and importance of the item in question. This aims to guide the assessor to the relevant aspects to be reviewed and to specified principles or standards. The criteria to be considered under each sub-indicator are then presented in a table titled "Assessment criteria". The assessment criteria establish the basis on which the system will be assessed (qualitative indicators). A set of quantitative indicators offers the opportunity to substantiate the assessment of several sub-indicators by taking performance-related data into account.

<sup>3</sup> Some countries have laws and others may have acts, decrees, circulars or regulations.

14. Each sub-indicator should be assessed using the following three-step approach:
- i) review of the system, applying assessment criteria expressed in qualitative terms;
  - ii) review of the system, applying a defined set of quantitative indicators;<sup>4</sup>
  - iii) identification of substantive or material gaps (gap analysis).

Step 1: Review of the system applying assessment criteria expressed in qualitative terms

15. Step 1 of the assessment is based on a qualitative review of the existing regulatory and policy framework, as well as institutional and operational arrangements, to determine whether or not the prescribed standard has been attained. Certain indicators do not lend themselves to assessment through hard evidence (i.e. facts and figures) and may require surveys or interviews with stakeholders and participants in public procurement, such as professional associations, representatives of civil society, independent media or well-recognised and respected investigative journalists, and government officials, as indicated in this guide.
16. A narrative report should provide detailed information on this comparison (that is, on the actual situation in relation to the assessment criteria) and on changes that may be under way. This narrative will enable the assessors to analyse the strengths and weaknesses of the system.

Step 2: Review of the system applying a defined set of quantitative indicators

17. Step 2 of the assessment focuses on the application of a (minimum) set of 15 quantitative indicators. These are closely related to the prevailing procurement practices in the country and are therefore often referred to as performance indicators. Quantitative indicators are useful for demonstrating results, for example by examining a sample of procurement transactions and other relevant information deemed representative of the performance of the system.
18. The narrative report should provide the detailed findings of this analysis. In countries where the necessary data is unavailable or unreliable, the particular circumstances should be explained in the narrative report.
19. Quantitative indicators are not benchmarked against set standards but can be used by the country to define baselines, set national targets and measure progress over time. Additional quantitative indicators are recommended for optional use as appropriate (refer to “Recommended quantitative indicators”).

Step 3: Analysis and determination of substantive or material gaps (gap analysis)

20. The assessment findings are further analysed and interpreted (Step 3) to identify the areas that show material or substantial gaps and require action to improve the quality and performance of the system.
21. A substantive or material gap exists when any of the following situations arises:
- The system exhibits less than substantial achievement of the stated criteria.
  - Any of the essential elements of the indicator (e.g. independence, objectivity, timeliness) are missing.
  - There is enough evidence that a provision in the legal/regulatory framework is not working as intended (i.e. factual evidence or conclusive outcome from interviews or from the analysis of procurement practices).
22. To substantiate the gaps identified in Steps 1 and 2 of the assessment, an analysis in greater depth may be conducted. This can be achieved by a more comprehensive qualitative review of existing arrangements and/or through an expanded analysis of public procurement practices (e.g. by increasing the sample size of procurement cases analysed).
23. If substantiated, the sub-indicator should be clearly marked as exhibiting a “substantive gap”, to demonstrate the need to develop adequate actions to improve the quality and performance of the system. Any deeper analysis that is conducted should be fully explained in the detailed assessment report, to ensure consistency and comparability of assessments. Additional evidence and conclusions should be reflected in the report.

24. Should the assessor identify factors likely to prevent appropriate action to improve the public procurement system, “red flags” should be assigned. These are used to highlight any element that could significantly impede the main goals of public procurement and that cannot be mitigated directly or indirectly. Such factors could also lie outside the sphere of public procurement, for example:
- Assessors/government do not agree on the assessment results (e.g. substantive gaps).
  - Other national laws or regional/international agreements impose conflicting obligations.
  - Other factors prevent improvement of the public procurement system (e.g. political economy; jurisdiction; interdependence of problems/complexity, etc.).

Limits of indicator application

25. The indicators alone cannot give a full picture of a procurement system, which is by nature complex. They should be seen as a vehicle for identifying the strengths and weaknesses of the system in broad terms. The indicators also serve as support for a more thorough analysis to be carried out by the assessor, as indicated above.
26. The application of indicators allows for professional judgements by the assessor. Subjectivity should be reduced to a minimum to ensure that assessments carried out by different assessors maintain reasonable consistency and comparability for analytical purposes. This is one of the main objectives of the methodology and of this guide. The assessor should also bear in mind that there is no single model for a procurement system and that different models have been developed world wide that may work well in one political, institutional or cultural setting, but not in another.
27. The decision on the scope of performance measurement and data collection should be made specific to the country and be based on the availability of data and the country’s objectives. The decision should consider cost effectiveness as well as the sustainability of data collection and analysis to ensure the long-term monitoring of procurement performance.
28. The application of Indicator 9 includes an analysis of selected procurement cases (“sample cases”). One of the most important steps in planning the assessment is to carefully consider the sample of cases that will be assessed. This selected review of actual procurement proceedings provides an additional means of evaluation, while recognising that a sample always represents a selected perception of reality and never the reality in its entirety. The sample should thus provide enough information to arrive at conclusions that can be regarded as valid at an aggregate level. Sampling strategies and sampling sizes need to be carefully considered, and how representative they are and their level of certainty should be clearly defined. Depending on the circumstances and the country’s strategic objectives, sampling could, for example, focus on top-spending procuring entities or, alternatively, cut across different levels of government, to cover a number of national and sub-national procuring entities. Details of the sampling approach should be disclosed in the assessment report.
29. All quantitative indicators have been aligned with procurement data required in Public Expenditure and Financial Accountability (PEFA) assessments (PEFA Performance Indicator PI-24)<sup>5</sup> for consistency in assessments and policy formulation.

Assessment Process

Planning and preparing the assessment

30. Advanced planning is needed to appropriately scope and time the assessment, define management arrangements, set up the assessment team, arrange for the collection of the information required and identify stakeholders to be interviewed or surveyed. Advance planning is especially important if the assessment will be jointly sponsored by the government and interested external partners. Planning will enable co-ordination of the work and the agreement to be reached on critical aspects of the assessment. Peer reviews, where representatives from other governments, agencies or relevant international organisations take part in the assessment exercise, can complement a MAPS exercise. Whether or not an assessment should be conducted as a peer review or whether it should involve other forms of third-party quality assurance (for example, by the MAPS secretariat) should also be decided in advance.
31. To ensure a demand-driven assessment process, the country should consider preparing a concept note covering the following questions:
- What is the primary objective(s) of conducting a MAPS assessment?
  - Are there specific issues to focus on?
  - Which parts of the government need to be covered?
  - Which parts of the MAPS methodology (core tool/supplementary modules) need to be applied to deliver the desired outcomes?
  - Who is leading the assessment and what are the different roles of the members of the assessment team?
  - Was there a MAPS assessment in the past, and what were its results?
  - Are other assessments related to public procurement available (e.g. PEFA assessment reports, political economy analyses)?
  - Which information sources are available to gather the required information?
  - Which quantitative indicators will be used for performance measurement?
  - Who are the key stakeholders who should be involved in the assessment?
  - To what extent should the assessment include the review of actual procurement cases (see Indicator 9)?
  - How will the sample be designed, and which agencies will be included?
  - How will the findings be validated and recommendations be discussed? Should the assessment involve peers/ external experts to review the assessment (refer to paragraph 39)?
  - How will the assessment results be communicated/published and used?
  - How much time, external support and budget will be needed?
32. The government can demonstrate high-level political commitment by establishing strong leadership arrangements for the assessment. To ensure cross-departmental co-operation and openness, the government should consider establishing a time-bound MAPS Assessment Steering Committee.
33. Identifying a qualified team of assessors is critical to the credibility and reliability of the exercise. Assessors should preferably be seasoned public procurement practitioners with ample knowledge of the legal, institutional and operational aspects of the subject and of internationally accepted procurement practice. They should be well-informed on the recommended use of the tool, to enhance shared understanding and to encourage consistency in its application. Assessors external to the government should work with a counterpart team from the government to facilitate access to information and logistical support. Assessors should be free of conflicts of interest that could arise from their current or previous roles.
34. Successful reforms depend on actively and appropriately engaging stakeholders throughout the process. In the early stages of the assessment, stakeholders should be engaged through appropriate communication (on the objectives, scope, process, timelines, lead entity, etc.) and targeted interviews. The “Analysis of country context” will help identify the key stakeholders that are formally and informally linked to the public procurement structures in the country.

35. It is recommended that the following categories of stakeholders be engaged: the authority in charge of the assessment (typically the regulatory authority, ministry, or centre of government), the procurement normative/regulatory body, the procurement appeals body, a selected number of procuring entities, representatives of the private sector (including the banking sector involved in financing public sector investment projects) and civil society, authorities responsible for budgeting/payment/internal controls, audit authorities, anti-corruption agencies, competition bodies, international partners engaged in the country, training institutions, the professional bodies, academia, research institutions and media.

Conducting the assessment

36. The assessment should clarify its objectives, identify the current situation and engage key stakeholders.
37. The assessment should establish a clear timetable for the following steps: data collection; analysis of findings (determination of strengths and weaknesses); and, as applicable, developing recommendations for a prioritised reform strategy intended to address any weaknesses identified.

Validation of findings

38. To ensure that the assessment process is valid and credible, it is recommended that a validation exercise involving key stakeholders be conducted. This provides an opportunity to agree on the findings of the assessment, on reform priorities and on a shared strategy for addressing key weaknesses in the system.
39. A more robust quality-assurance approach involves a review of compliance with the assessment process and assessment report with the MAPS methodology and the quality review of assessment results by the MAPS Secretariat and a designated MAPS Technical Advisory Group. This more comprehensive quality-assurance mechanism has been designed to allow for the external certification of MAPS assessments.<sup>6</sup>

Assessment Report

40. One of the main goals of carrying out an assessment based on the methodology in this document is to provide a tool that countries can use to formulate reforms, improve their national procurement systems and align them with internationally accepted good practice. The assessment process also provides a unique opportunity to learn and increase capacity for governments and partners alike. A narrative analytical report is useful to the involved governments and their external partners interested in supporting and strengthening programs. A report of this kind gives context to the assessment, providing the assessor’s evaluation of the system as a whole and of progress on the individual items assessed.
41. The suggested outline of the report is as follows:
- an executive summary of the report, with an overview of the assessment results against the four pillars mentioned in paragraph 10. The executive summary should highlight the strengths and weaknesses of the system, their relative importance, the major risks identified and their likely consequences for the efficiency of the system.
  - an introductory section that presents the background of the assessment, its scope and nature, the limitations encountered in the assessment, and any other matters essential for understanding the context and circumstances under which the assessment was carried out.
  - a section that describes the country context (see Section II, “Analysis of country context”, for further details), including:
    - i) a brief review of the most relevant aspects of the country’s political, economic and geostrategic situation;

<sup>6</sup> For further details refer to the following website: mapsinitiative.org.

- ii) the public procurement system and its relationship with the systems of public finance management and public governance;
  - iii) national policy objectives, with a focus on issues that influence public procurement;
  - iv) public procurement reform, including government ownership, reform priorities, key stakeholders, incentives and challenges that may influence the success of reforms.
- a section that discusses the findings of the assessment in relation to each of the pillars and indicators. This should also describe any existing government programmes or initiatives or those that are at an advanced stage of consideration. As appropriate, it should also consider how suitable they are for possible support by international partners. Finally, the section should describe any progress that has been made, or, alternatively, any deterioration in the system since the last assessment was carried out.
  - a section on the assessment of outstanding weaknesses in the procurement system, classifying them into categories by the risk they may pose to the system and offering suggestions as to how to keep these risks at an acceptably low level.<sup>7</sup> These suggestions may be used as the basis for a prioritised reform strategy to address any weaknesses identified.
  - the relevant sections and chapters that should be added to the report, if the report is to go beyond simply assessing the system and will propose an action plan or a reform strategy (see below, section on “Strategic planning and monitoring to prepare reforms”).
  - a section of the report providing an account of the steps taken to validate the assessment’s findings, and describing any other elements that could influence the quality of the assessment, such as references on assessors, the time frame available for the assessment, information sources, etc.
  - an annex including detailed assessment results and any evidence documenting the findings. Areas (i.e. sub-indicators) should be clearly highlighted if they exhibit less than full or less than substantial achievement of the described standard and require further action to improve the quality and performance of the system (substantive gaps).<sup>8</sup>

Strategic Planning and Monitoring to Prepare Reforms

42. The findings of the assessment inform the strategic planning process for future public procurement reform or system development. After the assessment, strategic thinking to clarify the vision, goals and time frame for improving the public procurement system should be developed. The subsequent strategic plan should take this into account and outline a range of possible solutions and indicate how they can be carried out.
43. The strategy should be realistic, aligned with other reform initiatives, ensure a balance of perspectives, and include a good mix of “quick wins”, as well as medium and long-term initiatives. A strategic plan should help guide implementation. The strategic plan should assign roles and responsibilities, define the processes of change, specify allocation of resources, timelines, a results framework, monitoring and evaluation agreements, and the preparation and communication of the strategic planning document.
44. The set of indicators applied in the MAPS assessment could form a useful basis for constructing the results framework for public procurement reforms. A few high-level indicators relating to the strategic goals of the public procurement reform should be identified. In addition, indicators for any of the initiatives included as part of the strategic plan for reform should be identified on two or even three levels: outputs, outcomes and impact.
45. Each indicator needs a baseline and a target. The baseline data is used as the starting point for measuring progress. The targets may be either short-term, medium-term or long-term, with interim milestones. Monitoring progress should allow for refinement of the initiatives and potentially the design of new initiatives to address evolving needs.

<sup>7</sup> Different dimensions of risks should be considered, e.g. fiduciary risks, development risks and reputational risks. Risks can be classified into the following categories: high, medium or low, or alternatively: high, substantial, moderate or low, depending on the risk classification system the country uses. The classification should be based on the standard dimensions of occurrence (probability) and the severity of the consequences (impact).

<sup>8</sup> An electronic assessment tool is being prepared to facilitate data collection, analysis and documentation of detailed assessment results, including supporting documents. In the meantime, an Excel file is available and should be used to present the detailed assessment results and the evidence documenting the findings.

46. A full update of a MAPS assessment should be performed whenever major changes in legislation occur or other substantive elements of the system change and/or affect the performance of the system (whether positively or negatively).

Further Information and Support

MAPS Secretariat

47. The MAPS Secretariat offers support to all users of the MAPS methodology upon request, including:
  - advice to country teams for planning and management of a MAPS assessment, including quality review of Concept Notes and Terms of References for MAPS assessments;
  - advice to MAPS assessment teams on the MAPS methodology;
  - quality review of MAPS assessment reports (in collaboration with the MAPS Technical Advisory Group), to provide certification of assessments that meet the quality standards specified.
48. Further information, templates and guidance on applying the MAPS methodology and transforming public procurement systems are available on the following website: mapsinitiative.org

SECTION II – ANALYSIS OF COUNTRY CONTEXT

Objectives and Scope

This section aims to ensure that the MAPS assessment is based on a better understanding of the context in which public procurement institutions and other stakeholders operate in a particular country. During the assessment and in developing responses to the findings, the political and institutional environment can be considered, to ensure that reforms reflect the country's needs.

For optimum efficiency, this macro-level analysis should be brief. It should draw on easily accessible information and existing data and focus on a limited number of potentially important factors for procurement reform. These factors are: i) the country's political, economic, and geostrategic situation; ii) links between the public procurement system and the public finance management and the public governance systems, iii) national policy objectives affecting public procurement and iv) the public procurement reform environment.

The context analysis should provide a thorough mapping of key stakeholders formally and informally linked to public procurement structures. This will help to engage stakeholders as part of the assessment and as part of future reform processes. Stakeholder engagement in general helps to illuminate how interests, incentives, values and ideas are shaped by formal and informal rules. It can support the development and prioritisation of actions that are feasible and realistic to implement.

The contextual information gathered at this stage can also be used to ensure a targeted application of the MAPS tool. For example, the identification of national policy objectives and key challenges helps scope the MAPS assessment, in particular for the potential application of supplementary modules.

Structure

The analysis of country context should be structured as follows:<sup>9</sup>

Analysis of country context

1. Political, economic and geostrategic situation of the country:

- i)* economic structures (e.g. population, national income level, resources at the government's disposal vs. debt, geographic location, geopolitical situation, main challenges for growth and development)
- ii)* political structures, nature of the political governance system (e.g. type of government, history/legacies in the form of government, federalism vs. centralisation/roles of the national government and sub-national governments, distinctive features in the allocation of political power, marginalised groups, levels of crime and informality, aspects of fragility or conflict, level of perception of corruption, etc.)<sup>9</sup>
- iii)* international obligations (e.g. international/regional treaties and memberships, including information on potential/pending memberships)

2. The public procurement system and its links with the public finance management and public governance systems:

- i)* nature and scope of public procurement (e.g. procurement as a proportion of GDP/government expenditures)
- ii)* key institutions (formal and informal) and their roles in operating the procurement system, including its controls
- iii)* mapping of key external stakeholders formally and informally linked to public procurement structures, their interests and avenues for engagement.

3. National policy objectives and sustainable development goals:

- i)* general reform initiatives with a focus on issues that influence public procurement
- ii)* horizontal policy objectives.

4. Public procurement reform:

- i)* public procurement reform in the past (brief history/legacies; lessons learned)
- ii)* public procurement priorities, policies, strategies and goals/targets, and their links with public sector/governance/other related reforms
- iii)* incentives that can drive reforms; challenges that can impact the success of reforms.

<sup>9</sup> Further information on how to conduct context/political economy analyses can be found in: UNDP (2012), "Institutional and Context Analysis – Guidance Note", http://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/librarypage/democratic-governance/oslo\_governance\_centre/Institutional\_and\_Context\_Analysis\_Guidance\_Note/; Overseas Development Institute (ODI) (2005), "Analytical Framework for Conducting Political Economy Analysis in Sectors", <http://www.odi.org/sites/odi.org.uk/files/odi-assets/publications-opinion-files/3898.pdf>.

<sup>10</sup> Fragility can go beyond the categorisation of "fragile states". The OECD has defined the following five dimensions: i) violence (peaceful societies); ii) access to justice for all (including control of corruption); iii) effective, accountable and inclusive institutions; iv) economic foundations and v) capacity to adapt to social, economic and environmental shocks and disasters. OECD (2015), States of Fragility 2015: Meeting Post-2015 Ambitions, OECD Publishing, Paris. <http://dx.doi.org/10.1787/9789264227699-en>.

Information Sources

The list of sources to be consulted is as follows:

- national statistics (e.g. Ministry of Finance, etc.),
- national development plans,
- indices, e.g. Doing Business project (World Bank), Government at a Glance (OECD), Country Classifications (World Bank and others), GDP growth rates, Corruption Perception Index, Global Competitiveness Report (World Economic Forum), Human Development Index (UN), etc.,
- databases on international memberships and treaties (e.g. General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs (GATT)/ Agreement on Government Procurement; OECD; regional organisations and trade agreements; signatories to the United Nations Convention against Corruption, etc.),
- previous studies/assessments,
- interviews with relevant experts or sources; critics in media.

SECTION III – ASSESSMENT OF PUBLIC PROCUREMENT SYSTEMS

Pillar I. Legal, Regulatory and Policy Framework

Pillar I assesses the existing legal, regulatory and policy framework for public procurement. It identifies the formal rules and procedures governing public procurement and evaluates how they compare to international standards. The practical implementation and operation of this framework is the subject of Pillars II and III. The indicators within Pillar I embrace recent developments and innovations that have been increasingly employed to make public procurement more efficient. Pillar I also considers international obligations and national policy objectives to ensure that public procurement lives up to its important strategic role and contributes to sustainability.

Pillar I refers to four elements of the legal, regulatory and policy framework:

- i)* the supreme legal instrument governing public procurement (laws, acts, decrees)
- ii)* regulations and other instruments that are of a more administrative nature
- iii)* procurement-related provisions in other national laws (e.g. laws governing public private partnerships and concessions, trade and competition, access to information, anti-corruption, alternative dispute resolution, state-owned enterprises, etc.)
- iv)* obligations deriving from international agreements to ensure consistency and policy coherence.

Indicator 1. The public procurement legal framework achieves the agreed principles and complies with applicable obligations.

The indicator covers the different legal and regulatory instruments established at varying levels, from the highest level (national law, act, regulation, decree, etc.) to detailed regulation, procedures and bidding documents formally in use. This indicator is divided into 12 sub-indicators (a-l), which are individually assessed.

Sub-indicator 1(a) – Scope of application and coverage of the legal and regulatory framework

The purpose of this sub-indicator is to determine: i) the structure of the regulatory framework governing public procurement; ii) the extent of its coverage; and iii) the public access to the laws and regulations.

The assessor should evaluate the adequacy of the structure of the legal framework, its clarity and the precedence of the different instruments. It is important that the legal framework is differentiated and distinguishes between laws, regulations and procedures and that precedence be firmly established, to minimise inconsistencies in application. Higher-level instruments should normally be less detailed and more stable, since their modification requires higher levels of authority. The higher a provision is placed in the hierarchy of the legal framework, the more stable it is. This means that lower-level instruments should be chosen to regulate more detailed procedures for implementation that require some flexibility (e.g. thresholds).

The assessor should evaluate the extent to which the legal framework applies to all procurement undertaken using public funds (goods, works and services, including consulting services). In addition, the assessor should assess the extent to which national legislation applies to all public bodies and sub-national governments and entities, when national budget funds are used either directly or indirectly.

One aspect to evaluate is whether the laws or regulations exclude particular agencies or areas of public expenditure from the provisions of the law (i.e. the army, defence or similar expenditures, autonomous or specialised state-owned enterprises, as well as utility companies with special or exclusive rights). This also includes assessing whether these exclusions are established by law or can be made administratively without public oversight. The assessor should also evaluate whether the public procurement law or other national laws support and regulate the contracting of other forms of public service delivery that are closely related to public procurement, such as public/private partnerships (PPPs), including concessions. (Specific characteristics are assessed under sub-indicator 1(l)).

Uniformity and universality of coverage contribute to predictability and savings in the operation of the procurement system. Access to the rules and regulations contribute to transparency, which results in more economic procurement.

Laws and policies can be made accessible by keeping them in places that are easily accessible to the public. Preferably, the information should be published on line on a single, freely accessible online portal (refer to sub-indicator 7(a)). If the information is primarily posted on the Internet, the assessor should verify whether the information is accessible to the public and regularly updated.

Assessment criteria

The legal and regulatory body of norms complies with the following conditions:

- (a) Is adequately recorded and organised hierarchically (laws, decrees, regulations, procedures), and precedence is clearly established.
- (b) It covers goods, works and services, including consulting services for all procurement using public funds.
- (c) PPPs, including concessions, are regulated.
- (d) Current laws, regulations and policies are published and easily accessible to the public at no cost.<sup>10</sup>

Sub-indicator 1(b) – Procurement methods

This sub-indicator assesses whether the legal framework includes: i) a clear definition of the permissible procurement methods; and ii) the circumstances under which each method is appropriate.

The legal framework should provide an appropriate range of procurement methods comprising competitive and less competitive procedures, when appropriate.<sup>12</sup>

The law and regulations should define the situations in which open tendering or alternatives procurement methods can be used and ensure that acceptable justification and approval levels are clearly specified. The application of procurement methods and processes should be proportional to the value and risks of the underlying project activities. This means that in procurement projects with low value or lower risks, lighter methods – such as restricted tendering, request for quotations, etc. – can be applied, when the benefits of some “process-heavier” methods are not evident or necessary. Although open (competitive) tendering should be the standard procurement method, the choice of the method should also depend on the time it takes to follow through on the procedure and strive to avoid delays.

The use of direct awards (single-source procurement) should be analysed and its justifications understood. It is also important to understand how the justifications to avoid more competitive procedures are being used in general. For example, urgency is often an excuse not to use open tendering. However, justifying single-source procurement on the grounds of an emergency should be permitted only in the exceptional circumstances of a catastrophic event, where there is an extremely important need and where any other method of procurement would be impractical given the time constraints. It should not, however, be used simply because of poor planning.

11 PEFA PI-24.3 (1)

12 The UNCITRAL Model Law on Public Procurement (2011), for example, provides terms, model definitions and procedures for different options (Refer to Chapters II-VII). When specific procurement methods are mentioned in this document, the terms established by UNCITRAL are used.

Fractioning of contracts to avoid open competition should be prohibited, when it aims at circumventing competitive rules.

The legal framework should restrict individual agencies' or procurement officials' discretion. This should result in minimal use of procurement methods that limit competition.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework meets the following conditions:

- (a) Procurement methods are established unambiguously at an appropriate hierarchical level, along with the associated conditions under which each method may be used.
- (b) The procurement methods prescribed include competitive and less competitive procurement procedures and provide an appropriate range of options that ensure value for money, fairness, transparency, proportionality and integrity.
- (c) Fractioning of contracts to limit competition is prohibited.
- (d) Appropriate standards for competitive procedures are specified.

Sub-indicator 1(c) – Advertising rules and time limits

This sub-indicator assesses whether: i) the legal framework includes requirements to publish procurement opportunities as a matter of public interest and to promote transparency; ii) there is wide and easily accessible publication of business opportunities; and iii) there is adequate time provided between publication of opportunities and the submission date, consistent with the method and complexity of the procurement, to prepare and submit proposals.

Time between publication of the invitation for prequalification applications, or for an open tender and the submission of proposals, depends on the complexity of the procurement and the level of competition expected. If foreign bidders are expected to compete, this is a factor to consider. The law and regulations should establish the criteria for setting the minimum time between the call for proposals and their submission. The timelines may be shortened in case of electronic transmission of procurement notices and bidding documents.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework meets the following conditions:

- (a) The legal framework requires that procurement opportunities are publicly advertised, unless the restriction of procurement opportunities is explicitly justified (refer to indicator 1(b)).
- (b) Publication of opportunities provides sufficient time, consistent with the method, nature and complexity of procurement, for potential bidders to obtain documents and respond to the advertisement. The minimum time frames for submission of bids/proposals are defined for each procurement method, and these time frames are extended when international competition is solicited.
- (c) Publication of open tenders is mandated in at least a newspaper of wide national circulation or on a unique Internet official site where all public procurement opportunities are posted. This should be easily accessible at no cost and should not involve other barriers (e.g. technological barriers).
- (d) The content published includes enough information to allow potential bidders to determine whether they are able to submit a bid and are interested in submitting one.

Sub-indicator 1(d) – Rules on participation

This sub-indicator assesses the policies that regulate participation and selection, to ensure that they are non-discriminatory. As a general principle, firms, including qualified foreign firms, should not be excluded from participating in a procurement process for reasons other than lack of qualifications, and only in accordance with clearly specified rules on eligibility and exclusions.

There may be cases in which the legal framework will allow restrictions that require purchasing from or associating with domestic firms, or that mandate the inclusion of a minimum of locally manufactured content. Many countries also allow price preferences for domestic firms. Such local content requirements or preferences should be in line with the country's international obligations (e.g. the World Trade Organization-Agreement on Government Procurement, association agreements or free-trade agreements ratified by the country). Excessive price preferences or other concessions for certain groups of bidders can deter competition and reduce efficiency. The assessor should evaluate whether the provisions are adequate and justified, and make sure that they do not undermine the economy and efficiency of the system. The regulatory framework should not oblige foreign firms to associate with local firms or to establish subsidiaries in the country as a condition of bidding. These conditions may promote oligopolistic or monopolistic conditions, rather than promoting the development of local industry, and can become a de facto barrier to competition.

Registration should not be a barrier to participation in a procurement process.

The law should provide for exclusions for criminal or corrupt activities, debarment, subject to due process, and for the prohibition of commercial relations in cases of criminal activity. Firms or individuals that have been the subject of a conviction by final judgment for one of the following reasons should be excluded from participation: participation in a criminal organisation; corruption as defined in the national law of the contracting authority or the firm/individual; fraud; terrorist offences or offences linked to terrorist activities, or inciting or aiding or abetting or attempting to commit such an offence; money laundering or terrorist financing; child labour; and all forms of trafficking in human beings.

The process for reaching decisions on administrative debarment (e.g. failure to perform in earlier contracts, etc.) should be clearly defined, including the process related to any possible appeals. Other legitimate exclusions (e.g. prohibition of commercial relations by law or adherence to UN Security Council sanctions) should be prescribed. Additionally, there may be international agreements that limit participation to members of the agreements.

Participation of state-owned enterprises should be governed by rules that create a level playing field for all competitors and should not be granted preferential treatment in the form of subsidies or tax exemptions, etc.

The legal framework should detail the procedures that can be used to assess a bidder’s eligibility and ability to perform a specific contract. This assessment can be combined with the procurement documents as part of the specific procurement, or it can be initiated as a separate exercise that is conducted before full offers are requested.

In highly complex procurement, use of multi-stage procedures (for example, pre-qualification or competitive dialogue) can make the procurement more efficient by ensuring that only eligible and qualified participants are included. It can also save money by limiting the number of participants that incur the expense of putting together a comprehensive bid. The circumstances under which multi-stage procedures may be used should be clearly defined, to ensure that they are not abused or used as a method for limiting competition by overstating the qualification requirements. .

Assessment criteria

The legal framework meets the following conditions:

- (a) It establishes that participation of interested parties is fair and based on qualification and in accordance with rules on eligibility and exclusions.
- (b) It ensures that there are no barriers to participation in the public procurement market.
- (c) It details the eligibility requirements and provides for exclusions for criminal or corrupt activities, and for administrative debarment under the law, subject to due process or prohibition of commercial relations.
- (d) It establishes rules for the participation of state-owned enterprises that promote fair competition.
- (e) It details the procedures that can be used to determine a bidder’s eligibility and ability to perform a specific contract.

Sub-indicator 1(e) – Procurement documentation and specifications

The sub-indicator assesses the degree to which the legal framework specifies the content of procurement documents, to enable suppliers to understand clearly what is requested from them and how the procurement process is to be carried out.

Procurement documents should contain sufficient information to enable the submission of responsive tenders/bids/proposals and to establish the basis for a transparent evaluation and award process. Details of the requirements included in the procurement documents should be neutral and refer to international standard specifications where possible or other officially recognised norms that are essentially equivalent to the ones specified. The legal framework should permit and encourage the use of output-based (functional) specifications to promote innovation, when appropriate.

It is important that the content requirements for procurement documents are relevant to making an award decision. Information that is not needed for the process should not be required as part of the submission. Excessive information and documentation requirements are considered to cost money and can reduce competition or lead to disqualification of potential bidders on grounds of unnecessary requirements.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework meets the following conditions:

- (a) It establishes the minimum content of the procurement documents and requires that content is relevant and sufficient for suppliers to respond to the requirement.
- (b) It requires the use of neutral specifications, citing international norms when possible, and provides for the use of functional specifications where appropriate.
- (c) It requires recognition of standards that are equivalent, when neutral specifications are not available.
- (d) Potential bidders are allowed to request a clarification of the procurement document, and the procuring entity is required to respond in a timely fashion and communicate the clarification to all potential bidders (in writing)

Sub-indicator 1(f) – Evaluation and award criteria

This sub-indicator assesses: i) the quality and sufficiency of the legal framework provisions in respect to the objectivity and transparency of the evaluation process; and, ii) the degree of confidentiality maintained during the process, to minimise the risk of undue influences or abuse.

Pre-disclosed and objective criteria are essential for efficiency, fairness and transparency in the evaluation of bids and proposals. Objectivity means that there is little room for subjective interpretation of the criteria by the evaluator. Vague criteria (e.g. an award to the bid/proposal most convenient for the interests of the state) are not acceptable.

Evaluating and considering the price alone does not in all cases ensure value for money. The principle of value for money requires the evaluation of relevant costs and benefits, along with an assessment of risks and non-price attributes and/or life cycle costs, as appropriate. The legal framework should therefore permit the use of price and non-price attributes and/or the consideration of life cycle costs and environmental/social characteristics, as appropriate in the relevant procurement to ensure value-for-money decisions.

The procuring entity needs to identify the bidders that meet the qualification criteria stipulated in the procurement document, in accordance with applicable rules on eligibility and exclusions. The submitted bid/proposal needs to be substantially responsive. The contract should be awarded to the bidder whose bid/proposal has been determined to offer the lowest evaluated price/cost (if price/cost is the sole criterion) or whose bid/proposal has been determined to be the best evaluated bid/proposal based on the award criteria defined in the procurement document.<sup>13</sup>

Technical capacity and quality are usually key criteria for selection of a large number of procurement processes, including complex procurement, infrastructures, framework agreements or consulting services. While technical qualifications can be assessed by a pass/fail review, in some cases, a scored evaluation of technical qualification against stated criteria is considered necessary to select the most advantageous proposal. The law should specify how this aspect is to be considered. The law should also lay out the conditions under which selection of consulting services may be based exclusively on technical capacity and when price and quality considerations are appropriate.

For cases in which a combination of price/cost and technical capacity or other requirements is permitted by law, the law or regulations should require that the procurement documents state: i) the relative weight to be allocated to the criteria; and ii) the manner in which these criteria are combined. When life-cycle costing is used, the method by which the contracting entity will determine the life-cycle costs (e.g. the consideration of net present value) and the data the bidders should provide to make this determination, should be specified. The regulatory framework should prohibit the use of evaluation and award criteria different from those set out in the procurement documents.

Confidentiality and regulated communications with the bidders during the pre-tendering, tendering and evaluation period are necessary to avoid abuse and undue interference in the process. The pre-tendering and tendering include the corresponding clarifications, and the evaluation period runs from the conclusion of the bid opening to the point at which the award of the contract is decided and announced.

Information related to the evaluation process and results should be disclosed to interested parties after the evaluation is complete. There should be rules of disclosure that protect information provided by bidders that is of proprietary nature, or commercially or financially sensitive.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework mandates that:

- (a) The evaluation criteria are objective, relevant to the subject matter of the contract, and precisely specified in advance in the procurement documents, so that the award decision is made solely on the basis of the criteria stipulated in the documents,
- (b) The use of price and non-price attributes and/or the consideration of life cycle cost is permitted as appropriate to ensure objective and value-for-money decisions.
- (c) Quality is a major consideration in evaluating proposals for consulting services, and clear procedures and methodologies for assessment of technical capacity are defined.
- (d) The way evaluation criteria are combined and their relative weight determined should be clearly defined in the procurement documents.
- (e) During the period of the evaluation, information on the examination, clarification and evaluation of bids/proposals is not disclosed to participants or to others not officially involved in the evaluation process.

Sub-indicator 1(g) – Submission, receipt and opening of tenders

This sub-indicator assesses how the legal framework regulates the reception of tenders<sup>14</sup> and tender opening. Public opening of tenders is a means of increasing the transparency of an open tendering exercise. In cases in which the law prescribes public opening of tenders, bidders or their representatives should be permitted to attend, as well as others with a legitimate interest in the outcome (e.g. representatives of civil society organisations). Opening immediately after the deadline for submission of tenders reduces the possibility of loss or alteration of proposals or submissions.

The exception to this rule may be opening of pre-qualification submissions, including expressions of interest or opening of technical proposals for consulting services (which are not priced), in which case they may be opened privately, followed by a simple notification to all participants of the list of submissions.

14 In this context, the term “tender” is used interchangeably with “bids” or “proposals”.

The law or regulations should establish the information that should be read and recorded for open tendering:

- names and addresses of the bidders
- date and condition the tender was received (to determine compliance with formal requirements)
- tender prices
- any withdrawals or modifications to tenders duly submitted
- any alternative offers requested or permitted (name of bidder, tender prices).

Records should be retained and be available for review and audit purposes.

Clarity on how bids are submitted is critical in minimising rejection of otherwise compliant proposals. The law and the regulations should set out clear provisions in this respect. For example, the number of copies, the sealing and marking of envelopes and in the case of electronic bidding, the security and confidentiality requirements should all be specified.

The bids should be kept secure and confidential prior to bid opening and until after contract award. Publication requirements notwithstanding (refer to sub-indicator 7(a)), the system should at all times take into account the legitimate needs for protection of trade secrets and proprietary information and other privacy concerns, as well as the need to avoid disclosing information that can be used by interested parties to distort competition in the procurement process. The legal framework should include definitions and provisions to unambiguously identify and protect specific sensitive information.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework provides for the following provisions:

- (a) Opening of tenders in a defined and regulated proceeding, immediately following the closing date for bid submission.
- (b) Records of proceedings for bid openings are retained and available for review.
- (c) Security and confidentiality of bids is maintained prior to bid opening and until after the award of contracts.
- (d) The disclosure of specific sensitive information is prohibited, as regulated in the legal framework.
- (e) The modality of submitting tenders and receipt by the government is well defined, to avoid unnecessary rejection of tenders.

Sub-indicator 1(h) – Right to challenge and appeal

The purpose of this indicator is to assess whether the legal framework establishes: i) the right to challenge<sup>15</sup> decisions or actions and to appeal; ii) the matters that are subject to review; iii) the time frame for such reviews; and iv) the different stages in the review process.

Confidence in a procurement system is a powerful incentive to competition. A fundamental part of this is the establishment of the right to challenge decisions or actions by initiating a review of procurement decisions and to appeal by an efficient and functionally independent process. Even though the first review is normally carried out by the procurement entity, there should be an administrative/judicial review body that is independent of the procuring entity. This means that this body has no direct interest in the procurement process, does not report to the procuring entity, and, ideally, is a separate agency or entity.

The legal framework should provide for the right of a participant in a procurement proceeding to challenge decisions or actions by a procuring entity. This can be done by asking for a review if the participant believes he/she is entitled to claim that he/she has suffered or may suffer loss or injury because of the alleged noncompliance of a decision or action with the provisions of the law.

Applications for a review (challenge) should be submitted to the institution in charge<sup>16</sup> within defined time periods. If the challenges relate to the terms of the solicitation, pre-qualification or pre-selection, they should be submitted prior to the deadline for presenting bids. Challenges relating to other decisions or actions should be submitted prior to the entry into force of the procurement contract, or within the standstill period following the notification of award, if applicable.

The institution in charge of the review should be required to take appropriate actions within a defined time frame (e.g. decide if the application shall be entertained or dismissed and if procurement proceedings shall be suspended; notify the applicant and other participants in the procurement proceedings; take and issue its decision).

The legal framework should provide for the right to appeal a decision following a first review to an independent body (appeals body) within specified timelines. This right should extend to cases in which the institution in charge of the review has failed to issue a decision. The appeals body should have the authority to order the suspension of procurement proceedings, dismiss an application where it decides that it is without merit or was not presented within the specified deadlines, and take and issue decisions appropriate in the circumstances. This should include the authority to confirm, overturn or revise a decision taken by the procuring entity or to prohibit the procuring entity from following a procedure that is not in compliance with the provisions of the law observing defined time frames. The legal framework should specify the range of available remedies in compliance with good international practice.<sup>17</sup>

Appeals to and decisions by the independent appeals body should be public by law and posted in easily accessible places, preferably on a central online platform within specified timelines. The publication of decisions allows interested parties to be better informed as to the consistency and fairness of the process. Publications should be in line with legislation protecting sensitive information.

This sub-indicator is closely linked to Indicator 13 (Efficiency of appeals mechanism).

Assessment criteria

The legal framework provides for the following:

- (a) Participants in procurement proceedings have the right to challenge decisions or actions taken by the procuring entity.
- (b) Provisions make it possible to respond to a challenge with administrative review by another body, independent of the procuring entity that has the authority to suspend the award decision and grant remedies, and also establish the right for judicial review.
- (c) Rules establish the matters that are subject to review.
- (d) Rules establish time frames for the submission of challenges and appeals and for issuance of decisions by the institution in charge of the review and the independent appeals body.
- (e) Applications for appeal and decisions are published in easily accessible places and within specified time frames, in line with legislation protecting sensitive information.
- (f) Decisions by the independent appeals body can be subject to higher-level review (judicial review).

16 In many countries, the procuring entity is in charge of responding to an application for a first review (challenge). In some countries, complaints may be sent directly to the independent appeals body.

17 For example, the UNCITRAL Model Law on Public Procurement (2011), Chapter VIII. Challenge proceedings, Article 9, describes the range of actions that should be at the disposal of an appeals body.

Sub-indicator 1(i) – Contract management

The purpose of this sub-indicator is to assess whether the legal framework establishes the following: i) functions and responsibilities for managing contracts; ii) methods to review, issue and publish contract amendments in a timely manner; iii) requirements for timely payment; and iv) dispute resolution procedures that provide for an efficient and fair process to resolve disputes during the performance of the contract.

To ensure complete and timely implementation of the contract, the following functions and responsibilities for managing contracts should be defined in the legal and regulatory framework:

- monitoring the timely delivery of goods, works and services, including consulting services (“products”)
- inspection, quality control, supervision of civil works and final acceptance of products;
- monitoring of contract performance clauses designed to ensure social or environmental standards, e.g. compliance with International Labour Organization core conventions, application of specific environmental management measures for construction works, etc.
- review, issuance and publication of contract amendments
- examination of invoices and timely processing of payments, including administration of guarantees
- handling of disputes/termination of contracts.

The legal framework should determine the conditions for contract amendments and extensions, to ensure economy and avoid the arbitrary limitation of competition. The legal framework should also define suppliers’ rights in case of late payment.

Disputes during the performance of a contract are a common occurrence. Naturally, disputes can be resolved through judicial proceedings. In some countries, however, litigation may take years to conclude, and the costs may be prohibitive. To avoid long delays in resolving disputes, it should be the policy of the country to accept alternative dispute resolution (ADR). Methods of ADR refer to any means of settling disputes outside the courtroom. Arbitration and mediation are two major forms of ADR.

A framework should be in place that provides for fair and timely resolution, including procedures to enforce the final outcome of a dispute resolution process. For example, there should be an Arbitration Law in the country and the law should be consistent with generally accepted practices for neutrality of arbitrators, due process, expediency and enforceability. The country could accept as a matter of course international arbitration as appropriate. The following are some proposed examples providing for enforcement of the final outcome of an arbitration process: i) the country is a member of the New York Convention on enforcement of international arbitration awards; and ii) the country has procedures to enable the winner in a dispute to seek enforcement of the outcome by going to the courts.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework provides for the following:

- (a) Functions for undertaking contract management are defined and responsibilities are clearly assigned,
- (b) Conditions for contract amendments are defined, ensure economy and do not arbitrarily limit competition.
- (c) There are efficient and fair processes to resolve disputes promptly during the performance of the contract.
- (d) The final outcome of a dispute resolution process is enforceable.

Sub-indicator 1(j) – Electronic procurement (e-Procurement)

This sub-indicator assesses the extent to which the legal framework addresses, permits and/or mandates the use of electronic methods and instruments for public procurement. The more sophisticated the use of electronic technologies, the more specific are the standards needed to ensure consistent application of the technology, provide for unrestricted and full access to the system, and ensure privacy and security of data and authentication. The use of electronic methods requires standardised formats, technical equipment and connection arrangements, and procedures to grant unrestricted and full access to the e-Procurement system.

An important part of using electronic methods in procurement is the requirement for governments to inform potential bidders which parts of the processes will be managed electronically (e.g. availability of procurement documents, communication, bid submission, contract awards, billing and payments, etc.). The legal framework also needs to clarify whether conventional paper-based procurement is still allowed, whether in parallel or as an alternative to the electronic procurement proceedings.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework meets the following conditions:

- (a) The legal framework allows or mandates e-Procurement solutions covering the public procurement cycle, whether entirely or partially.
- (b) The legal framework ensures the use of tools and standards that provide unrestricted and full access to the system, taking into consideration privacy, security of data and authentication.
- (c) The legal framework requires that interested parties be informed which parts of the processes will be managed electronically.

Further analysis: MAPS Module e-Procurement

Sub-indicator 1(k) – Norms for safekeeping of records, documents and electronic data

The ability to look at implementation performance depends on the availability of information and records that track each procurement action. This information is also important for the functioning of both internal and external control systems, as it provides the basis for review.

A system for safekeeping of records and documents should cover the entire procurement process, including contract management, and, at a minimum, include either physical and/or electronic:

- public notices of procurement opportunities
- the procurement method, including justification
- a complete set of bidding/selection documents, including clarifications and any amendments
- bid/proposal opening records
- evaluation reports, including clarifications sought and provided during the evaluation process
- award decisions, including all elements on which the decision was based
- award notices (if applicable)
- formal challenges (requests for review and appeals) by bidders and outcomes
- final signed contract documents and amendments
- contract variations, modifications and changes
- certificates and reports of inspection, quality control and acceptance
- claims and dispute resolutions
- payments
- disbursement data (as required by the country's financial management system)
- any correspondence, meeting notes and minutes, including contract negotiations (if applicable).

There should be a document retention policy that is compatible with the statute of limitations in the country for investigating and prosecuting cases of fraud and corruption and with the audit cycles. There should also be established security protocols to protect records, either physical or electronic.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework provides for the following:

- (a) A comprehensive list is established of the procurement records and documents related to transactions including contract management. This should be kept at the operational level. It should outline what is available for public inspection including conditions for access.
- (b) There is a document retention policy that is both compatible with the statute of limitations in the country for investigating and prosecuting cases of fraud and corruption and compatible with the audit cycles.
- (c) There are established security protocols to protect records (physical and/or electronic).

Sub-indicator 1(l) – Public procurement principles in specialised legislation

Many countries have adopted specialised legislation governing procurement by entities in the utilities sector, such as water, energy, transport, postal services, etc., and/or regulating the selection and award of concession contracts and other forms of PPPs. This sub-indicator assesses whether public procurement principles (e.g. competitive procedures, transparency, fairness, value-for-money decisions) and related laws apply across the entire spectrum of public service delivery as appropriate.

It is important to understand the competition policies that apply to different sectors and what the specific conditions for conducting public procurement processes in these sectors are. Given the possibility that special or exclusive rights may exist governing the supply or operation of these entities, the market in which these entities operate may be restricted. The range of available procurement methods, the situation in which they can be used, the thresholds, advertising rules and time limits, transparency requirements, risk allocation, challenge and appeals mechanisms and so on, may be regulated in a manner specific to the sector.

Similar questions apply to the selection and contracting of concessions and/or other forms of PPPs. The assessor should describe the government's policy related to PPPs and evaluate to what extent public procurement principles and laws apply in the process of establishing partnerships with private firms. Alternative or supplementary legislation/regulation should be described. Responsibilities for developing policies and supporting the implementation of PPPs should be clearly assigned.

Assessment criteria

The legal and regulatory body of norms complies with the following conditions:

- (a) Public procurement principles and/or the legal framework apply in any specialised legislation that governs procurement by entities operating in specific sectors, as appropriate.
- (b) Public procurement principles and/or laws apply to the selection and contracting of public private partnerships (PPP), including concessions as appropriate.
- (c) Responsibilities for developing policies and supporting the implementation of PPPs, including concessions, are clearly assigned.

Further analysis: MAPS Module on Public Private Partnerships (PPP)

Indicator 2. Implementing regulations and tools support the legal framework.

This indicator verifies the existence, availability and quality of implementing regulations, operational procedures, handbooks, model procurement documentation and standard conditions of contract. Ideally the higher-level legislation provides the framework of principles and policies that govern public procurement. Lower-level regulations and more detailed instruments supplement the law, make it operational and indicate how to apply the law to specific circumstances. This indicator consists of four sub-indicators (a-d).

Sub-indicator 2(a) – Implementing regulations to define processes and procedures

This sub-indicator aims at verifying the existence, clarity, accessibility and comprehensiveness of regulations to the law that further detail and clarify its application. Regulations are an important aspect of a procurement system, as they provide the detail that explains and enables the application of the legal framework in a variety of applications. Regulations should be available to the public in a single accessible place.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There are regulations that supplement and detail the provisions of the procurement law, and do not contradict the law.
- (b) The regulations are clear, comprehensive and consolidated as a set of regulations readily available in a single accessible place.
- (c) Responsibility for maintenance of the regulations is clearly established, and the regulations are updated regularly.

Sub-indicator 2(b) – Model procurement documents for goods, works and services

Model documents of good quality create level playing fields, improve overall procurement standardisation, promote competition and increase confidence in the system. Potential suppliers are more willing to participate when they are familiar with the documents and their interpretation. Model documents should contain the basic required clauses that will be incorporated into contracts. This enables participants to evaluate the cost and risk of mandatory clauses when fulfilling a contract for the government. Model documents should also refer to the standstill period, if applicable, and address the right to challenge decisions or actions and to appeal. If model documents are not available, there should be, at a minimum, a set of standard and mandatory clauses and templates that will help in the formulation of the procurement documents.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There are model procurement documents provided for use for a wide range of goods, works and services, including consulting services procured by public entities.
- (b) At a minimum, there is a standard and mandatory set of clauses or templates that reflect the legal framework. These clauses can be used in documents prepared for competitive tendering/bidding.
- (c) The documents are kept up to date, with responsibility for preparation and updating clearly assigned.

Sub-indicator 2(c) – Standard contract conditions

This sub-indicator focuses on standard contract conditions for public sector contracts covering goods, works and services, including consulting services that set forth the basic provisions that will be included in a contract with the government. Standard contract conditions, also often referred to as general contract conditions (GCC), are based on the laws in the country and generally reflect the commercial codes that deal with contracts between parties. Contract conditions often influence pricing. It is thus important that participants in procurement proceedings know the conditions under which they will perform a contract before they submit a price. The standard contract conditions provide information that enables participants to understand the allocation of risk between parties to a contract as well as other obligations that the signatories to the contract will incur.

It is important that the government establish standard contract conditions that are fair and balanced and reflect laws that impact contracts and their performance. Standard contract conditions should also cover some practical aspects of contract implementation, e.g. general conditions on inspection, quality control and final acceptance of products, and general procedures relating to invoicing and payment. Standard contract conditions should also include provisions on dispute resolution. Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), specifically through arbitration, should conform to international standard wording and be used as appropriate. Contract templates can provide an additional source of predictability for participants.

Standard contract conditions need to be mandatory in their use and not subject to negotiations on terms and conditions of contract.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There are standard contract conditions for the most common types of contracts, and their use is mandatory.
- (b) The content of the standard contract conditions is generally consistent with internationally accepted practice.
- (c) Standard contract conditions are an integral part of the procurement documents and made available to participants in procurement proceedings.

Sub-indicator 2(d) – User’s guide or manual for procuring entities

This sub-indicator covers the existence of a user’s guide or manual for procuring entities. This is an important implementation tool that can help provide staff with information that incorporates the law, policy and procedures and helps turn policy into practice. Such tools are more important as a system becomes more decentralised. Creating a manual or user’s guide is often a function of a normative/regulatory body and can help create a consistency of application within the government procurement system. Although not a substitute for training, a manual can contribute to building and maintaining capacity and provides an easy reference for users. Guidance should be specific and comprehensive.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There is (a) comprehensive procurement manual(s) detailing all procedures for the correct implementation of procurement regulations and laws.
- (b) Responsibility for maintenance of the manual is clearly established, and the manual is updated regularly.

Indicator 3. The legal and policy frameworks support the sustainable development of the country and the implementation of international obligations.

This indicator assesses whether horizontal policy objectives, such as goals aiming at increased sustainability, support for certain groups in society, etc., and obligations deriving from international agreements, are consistently and coherently reflected in the legal framework, i.e. whether the legal framework is coherent with the higher policy objectives of the country. The indicator is broken down into two sub-indicators (a-b), which are individually assessed.

Sub-indicator 3(a) – Sustainable Public Procurement (SPP)

The 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development promotes public procurement practices that are sustainable in accordance with national policies and priorities (Sustainable Development Goal 12.7).<sup>18</sup> Following up on more general information gathered in the analysis of the country context (Section II), this sub-indicator assesses whether:

- i)* the country has adopted a policy and an implementation plan to implement Sustainable Public Procurement (SPP)<sup>19</sup> in support of national policy objectives
- ii)* the legal and regulatory framework includes provisions on the inclusion of sustainability criteria in public procurement
- iii)* those provisions require a well-balanced application of sustainability criteria to ensure value for money.

To be effective, SPP should be incorporated in programmes that are part of the country's sustainable development strategy, and their objectives should be consistent with the objectives of public procurement, such as economy, efficiency and transparency, as articulated in Pillar I. An in-depth assessment determining the status quo as well as opportunities for SPP should be conducted to inform the strategic planning process for SPP. The strategic plan should include objectives, indicators and targets in support of national policy objectives. Implementation of SPP should take into account the capacity and training/development needs of the procurement workforce, the development and application of new tools and techniques, prioritisation of measures, impact assessment methodologies to measure the effectiveness of SPP, and the provision of guidance material. It is also necessary to decide which institution is best suited to manage and oversee the nationwide deployment of SPP and/or whether new institutions need to be established (e.g. certification institutions or product-testing facilities).

Assessment criteria

- (a) The country has a policy/strategy in place to implement SPP in support of broader national policy objectives.
- (b) The SPP implementation plan is based on an in-depth assessment; systems and tools are in place to operationalise, facilitate and monitor the application of SPP.
- (c) The legal and regulatory frameworks allow for sustainability (i.e. economic, environmental and social criteria) to be incorporated at all stages of the procurement cycle.
- (d) The legal provisions require a well-balanced application of sustainability criteria to ensure value for money.

18 United Nations General Assembly: "Transforming our World: The 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development", Resolution 70/1 adopted by the General Assembly on 25 September 2015. A/RES/70/1. Goal 12.7: "Promote public procurement practices that are sustainable, in accordance with national policies and priorities." <https://sustainabledevelopment.un.org/post2015/transformingourworld>.

19 Sustainable Public Procurement (SPP) promotes the integration of the three pillars of sustainable development: economic development, social development and environmental protection. Goals of SPP typically focus on reducing demand for resources and minimising any negative impact of goods, works or services across their life cycle. They also aim to ensure fair terms of contracts, including ethical, human rights and employment standards, and to promote diversity and equality throughout the supply chain, for example by providing opportunities for small and medium-sized enterprises or by supporting training and skill development. SPP can also include methods that support innovation.

Sub-indicator 3(b) – Obligations deriving from international agreements

Membership in international and/or regional associations or binding international/regional agreements may result in legal obligations relating to public procurement and may shape a country's procurement system. Based on the general information gathered in Section II on the country context, this indicator assesses i) the existence of procurement-related provisions in binding international agreements and ii) the consistent reflection of those obligations in national procurement laws and regulations.

A recognition of the international context is necessary for understanding the presence of certain provisions in the national law and, in some cases, might explain a lack of compliance with certain parameters laid out in this methodology. As noted in Section I, "User's Guide", procurement systems are based on different models. The focus in assessing this indicator is thus to provide clarity on international obligations that impact public procurement in a country and to determine whether relevant provisions have been consistently adopted in the national legal and policy framework for procurement.

Assessment criteria

Public procurement-related obligations deriving from binding international agreements are:

- (a) clearly established
- (b) consistently adopted in laws and regulations and reflected in procurement policies.

Pillar II. Institutional Framework and Management Capacity

Pillar II assesses how the procurement system defined by the legal and regulatory framework in a country is operating in practice, through the institutions and management systems that make up overall governance in its public sector.

Pillar II evaluates how effective the procurement system is in discharging the obligations prescribed in the law, without gaps or overlaps. It assesses: i) whether it is adequately linked with the country's public finance management system; ii) whether institutions are in place in charge of necessary functions; and iii) whether the managerial and technical capacities are adequate to undertake efficient and transparent public procurement processes.

Indicator 4. The public procurement system is mainstreamed and well integrated with the public financial management system.

This indicator focuses on how well integrated the procurement system is with the public financial management system. Two sub-indicators (a-b) are assessed under Indicator 4, given the direct interaction between procurement and financial management, from budget preparation to planning treasury operations for payments.

Sub-indicator 4(a) – Procurement planning and the budget cycle

Formulation of annual or multi-annual budgets is based on the outcomes or outputs that the government and its agencies expect to achieve in a given period. Overall government or sector strategies are the basis for this exercise. These determine the multi-year planning, the associated operating plans for each fiscal period and the procurement of goods, works and services necessary to implement the plans. Proper preparation of budgets needs reliable cost data and timetables for planned procurement. Multi-year budgeting and financing should be encouraged, since this offers opportunities for optimising the procurement cycle.

Procurement plans need to be periodically updated, as the budget may be updated and revised to reflect changes in the timing of contracts. Empirical data, such as the actual cost of goods, works and services, provide excellent information for predicting their costs in future budget years. Understanding the timing of major contracts can also help predict cash-flow needs within the government, help make timely payments, and reduce the extra costs associated with delaying completion of contracts and not having adequate funds to finance full performance.

A feedback mechanism should be set up to ensure that the budgetary and financial management systems are providing timely information on contracts covering major budget expenditures, to support the overall financial management system.

Assessment criteria

The legal and regulatory framework, financial procedures and systems provide for the following:

- (a) Annual or multi-annual procurement plans are prepared, to facilitate the budget planning and formulation process and to contribute to multi-year planning.
- (b) Budget funds are committed or appropriated in a timely manner and cover the full amount of the contract (or at least the amount necessary to cover the portion of the contract performed within the budget period).
- (c) A feedback mechanism reporting on budget execution is in place, in particular regarding the completion of major contracts.

Sub-indicator 4(b) – Financial procedures and the procurement cycle

This sub-indicator assesses whether budget laws and financial procedures adequately support the procurement process, i.e. the preparation and timely solicitation and award of contracts, contract execution and timely payments. The systems for procurement, budget and financial management should interact closely: once procurement decisions are made, corresponding actions should be initiated on the budget and financial side. On the other hand, there should be safeguards in the system precluding initiation of procurement actions unless funds have been allocated to the procurement in question.

Assessment criteria

The legal and regulatory framework, financial procedures and systems should ensure that:

- (a) No solicitation of tenders/proposals takes place without certification of the availability of funds.
- (b) The national regulations/procedures for processing of invoices and authorisation of payments are followed, publicly available and clear to potential bidders.*

* Quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 4(b) assessment criterion (b):

- invoices for procurement of goods, works and services paid on time (in % of total number of invoices).

Indicator 5. The country has an institution in charge of the normative/regulatory function.

This indicator refers to the normative/regulatory function in the public sector and its proper discharge and co-ordination. The assessment of the indicator focuses on the existence, independence and effectiveness of these functions and the degree of co-ordination between responsible organisations. Depending on the institutional set-up chosen by a country, one institution may be in charge of all normative and regulatory functions. In other contexts, key functions may have been assigned to several agencies, e.g. one institution might be responsible for policy, while another might be in charge of training or statistics. As a general rule, the normative/regulatory function should be clearly assigned, without gaps and overlaps. Too much fragmentation should be avoided, and the function should be performed as a well-co-ordinated joint effort. Four sub-indicators (a-d) are to be assessed.

Sub-indicator 5(a) – Status and legal basis of the normative/regulatory function

The normative/regulatory function and its responsibilities are created by the legal and regulatory framework. This is to ensure that the institution entrusted with the functional responsibilities has an appropriate level of authority, which enables it to function effectively. Alternatively, the legal and regulatory framework may assign the key functions described in sub-indicator 5(b) to different agencies on a clearly defined basis.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The legal and regulatory framework specifies the normative/regulatory function and assigns appropriate authorities formal powers to enable the institution to function effectively, or the normative/regulatory functions are clearly assigned to various units within the government.

<sup>20</sup> In case comprehensive data is not available, this quantitative indicator should be applied when reviewing a sample of procurement cases. Refer to sub-indicator 9(c).

Sub-indicator 5(b) – Responsibilities of the normative/regulatory function

The normative/regulatory institution or the institutions entrusted with the normative/ regulatory tasks should have a defined set of responsibilities that include but are not limited to the following:

Assessment criteria

The following functions are clearly assigned to one or several agencies without creating gaps or overlaps in responsibility:

- (a) providing advice to procuring entities
- (b) drafting procurement policies
- (c) proposing changes/drafting amendments to the legal and regulatory framework
- (d) monitoring public procurement
- (e) providing procurement information
- (f) managing statistical databases
- (g) preparing reports on procurement to other parts of government
- (h) developing and supporting implementation of initiatives for improvements of the public procurement system
- (i) providing tools and documents, including integrity training programmes, to support training and capacity development of the staff responsible for implementing procurement
- (j) supporting the professionalisation of the procurement function (e.g. development of role descriptions, competency profiles and accreditation and certification schemes for the profession)
- (k) designing and managing centralised online platforms and other e-Procurement systems, as appropriate.

Sub-indicator 5(c) – Organisation, funding, staffing, and level of independence and authority

The normative/regulatory function needs to have a high level and authoritative standing in government to be effective, including a degree of independence to enable it to carry out its responsibilities without interference. Adequate funding is necessary to ensure proper staffing and resources to keep the services at the level of quality required.

The head of the normative/regulatory function needs to command sufficient authority within the governance structure to enable the function to exercise its responsibilities.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The normative/regulatory function (or the institutions entrusted with responsibilities for the regulatory function if there is not a single institution) and the head of the institution have a high-level and authoritative standing in government.
- (b) Financing is secured by the legal/regulatory framework, to ensure the function's independence and proper staffing.
- (c) The institution's internal organisation, authority and staffing are sufficient and consistent with its responsibilities.

Sub-indicator 5(d) – Avoiding conflict of interest

The normative/regulatory function should be free from possible conflicts of interest. Even the appearance of a conflict of interest may undermine confidence in the system and will need to be resolved. The function's responsibilities should therefore provide for separation of duties and clarity, i.e. be structured so as to avoid conflicts of interest. Some functions are not compatible. In particular, individuals or a group of individuals should not be in a position both to perpetrate and to conceal errors or fraud in the normal course of their duties. Individuals should not be directly involved in procurement operations (e.g. as members of evaluation committees), and at the same time be in charge of monitoring/auditing procurement practices or acting on behalf of an appeals body (refer to sub-indicator 12(b)).

This sub-indicator is linked to sub-indicator 14(a).

Assessment criteria

- (a) The normative/regulatory institution has a system in place to avoid conflicts of interest.*

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 5(d) assessment criterion (a):

- Perception that the normative/regulatory institution is free from conflicts of interest (in % of responses).

Source: Survey.

Indicator 6. Procuring entities and their mandates are clearly defined.

This indicator assesses: i) whether the legal and regulatory framework clearly defines the institutions that have procurement responsibilities and authorities; ii) whether there are provisions for delegating authorities to procurement staff and other government officials to exercise responsibilities in the procurement process, and iii) whether a centralised procuring entity exists. There are two sub-indicators (a-b) to be assessed.

Sub-indicator 6 (a) – Definition, responsibilities and formal powers of procuring entities

The legal and regulatory framework should clarify which institutions (or set of institutions) are legally defined as procuring entities. In a centralised system, this may be a centralised procurement body and/or national-level ministries, public bodies and state-owned enterprises or utilities with special or exclusive rights granted by the state. In a decentralised system, procuring entities may cut across all levels of government (e.g. provincial level ministries and public bodies, local communities, etc.). Some countries have established hybrid systems.

The legal and regulatory framework should clearly define the responsibilities of procuring entities. Responsibilities typically range from procurement planning to managing all stages of the procurement process in accordance with the law. Responsibilities should also include the requirement to establish a designated, specialised procurement function with the necessary management structure, capacity and capability to undertake its duties and responsibilities efficiently and effectively and to assess the results of procurement processes.

There should be provisions in the legal and regulatory framework for delegating decision-making authority (e.g. awarding and executing contracts; acceptance of contractual obligations and initiating payments). Delegation of authority to procuring entities and accordingly to procurement staff and other government officials is a key to a well-functioning system, especially when procurement is decentralised. Without delegation, the system tends to function inefficiently, which can lead to an excessive concentration of decision making under a few individuals without the training or knowledge to make procurement decisions. Decision-making authority should be delegated to the lowest competent levels consistent with the risks associated and the monetary sums involved. Procurement officers should be immune from political interference and should act as the lead in procurement issues.

Assessment criteria

The legal framework provides for the following:

- (a) Procuring entities are clearly defined.
- (b) Responsibilities and competencies of procuring entities are clearly defined.
- (c) Procuring entities are required to establish a designated, specialised procurement function with the necessary management structure, capacity and capability.*
- (d) Decision-making authority is delegated to the lowest competent levels consistent with the risks associated and the monetary sums involved.
- (e) Accountability for decisions is precisely defined.

* Quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 6(a) assessment criterion (c):

- procuring entities with a designated, specialised procurement function (in % of total number of procuring entities).

Source: Normative/regulatory function.

Sub-indicator 6 (b) – Centralised procurement body

Establishing a centralised procurement body (central procuring entity) may enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of a decentralised procurement system. A centralised procurement body might be in charge of consolidating the procurement needs of several public entities; soliciting and concluding framework agreements from which all public entities could call upon according to their needs (e.g. based on electronic catalogues); managing complex procurement, or procurement requiring specialised legal or technical expertise, etc.

If a country establishes a centralised procurement body, the legal and regulatory framework should clearly define the body's responsibilities, formal powers and accountabilities. Processes should be clearly described to ensure an efficient workflow and appropriate communication with the "client" institution (public entity) responsible for service delivery.

In small countries or in countries emerging from conflict situations, procurement capacity is stretched. Here, it may be best to have a centralised procurement body that is responsible for all government procurement, capable of assuring consistency, standardisation and professionalism of the procurement function.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The country has considered the benefits of establishing a centralised procurement function in charge of consolidated procurement, framework agreements or specialised procurement.
- (b) In case a centralised procurement body exists, the legal and regulatory framework provides for the following:
  - Legal status, funding, responsibilities and decision-making powers are clearly defined.
  - Accountability for decisions is precisely defined.
  - The body and the head of the body have a high-level and authoritative standing in government.
- (c) The centralised procurement body's internal organisation and staffing are sufficient and consistent with its responsibilities.

Indicator 7 – Public procurement is embedded in an effective information system.

The objective of this indicator is to assess the extent to which the country or entity has systems to publish procurement information, to efficiently support the different stages of the public procurement process through application of digital technologies, and to manage data that allows for analysis of trends and performance of the entire public procurement system.

The indicator captures the availability, accessibility, integration and reliability of public procurement information systems. Digital technologies, such as online portals and more comprehensive e-Procurement systems, have the potential to significantly increase the efficiency, effectiveness and transparency of public procurement. They support the creation of a state-of-the-art public procurement system, strengthen the accountability framework, and establish the technical foundation for performance measurement. The indicator also assesses the extent to which the system works in practice, by determining the share of public procurement information published and by measuring the uptake of e-Procurement and the availability of statistical information.

There are three sub-indicators (a-c) to be assessed.

Sub-indicator 7(a) – Publication of public procurement information supported by information technology

The objective of this sub-indicator is to determine:

- i)* the existence and capacity of the procurement information system in the country
- ii)* the accessibility of the information system
- iii)* the coverage of the information system
- iv)* whether the system provides one-stop-service (to the extent feasible) where those interested can find information on procurement opportunities and outcomes.

Public access to procurement information is essential to transparency and creates a basis for social audit by interested stakeholders. Public information should be easy to find, comprehensive and user friendly, providing information of relevance. The assessor should be able to verify easy access and the content of information made available to the public.

In particular, the system should provide for the publication of annual or multi-annual procurement plans, information related to specific procurement such as advertisements or notices of procurement opportunities, procurement method, contract awards including amendments, payments and appeals decisions, linkages to rules and regulations and other information that is relevant to promote competition and transparency (e.g. the law on access to information). For practical purposes, the collection and dissemination of information should focus on procurement above a set value that reflects established thresholds for use of competitive procedures.

The concept of open contracting requires that the government provide an adequate and timely degree of transparency in each phase of the procurement process to stakeholders. This includes specific procurements and the performance of the entire public procurement system, including visibility of the flow of public funds. To support this vision of open contracting in the procurement system, the information system should be extended to include the full set of bidding documents, evaluation reports (or summaries thereof), full contract documents including technical specifications as well as implementation details, in accordance with the legal and regulatory framework, including legislation protecting specific sensitive information (refer to sub-indicator 1(g)).

Information should be consolidated in one place. A centralised online portal should be created for this purpose if the technology is available in the country. Commitment, backed by requirements in the legal/regulatory framework, should ensure that procuring entities duly post the information required on a timely basis. To facilitate searches, information should be published in an open and structured, machine-readable format using unique identifiers and classifications (open data format).

Assessment criteria

The country has a system that meets the following requirements:

- (a) Information on procurement is easily accessible in media of wide circulation and availability. Information is relevant, timely and complete and helpful to interested parties to understand the procurement processes and requirements and to monitor outcomes, results and performance.
- (b) There is an integrated information system (centralised online portal) that provides up-to-date information and is easily accessible to all interested parties at no cost.
- (c) The information system provides for the publication of: *
  - procurement plans
  - information related to specific procurements, at a minimum, advertisements or notices of procurement opportunities, procurement method, contract awards and contract implementation, including amendments, payments and appeals decisions
  - linkages to rules and regulations and other information relevant for promoting competition and transparency.
- (d) In support of the concept of open contracting, more comprehensive information is published on the online portal in each phase of the procurement process, including the full set of bidding documents, evaluation reports, full contract documents including technical specification and implementation details (in accordance with legal and regulatory framework).
- (e) Information is published in an open and structured machine-readable format, using identifiers and classifications (open data format).*
- (f) Responsibility for the management and operation of the system is clearly defined.

* Quantitative indicators to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 7(a) assessment criterion (c):

- key procurement information published along the procurement cycle (in % of total number of contracts)<sup>22</sup>:
- invitation to bid (in % of total number of contracts)

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 7(a) assessment criterion (e):

- Share of procurement information and data published in open data formats (in %).

Source: Centralised online portal.

Sub-indicator 7(b) – Use of e-Procurement

This sub-indicator assesses:

- i)* the extent to which e-Procurement is currently used in the country's public sector
- ii)* the capacity of government officials to manage and use e-Procurement systems, and/or
- iii)* the existence of a country strategy to implement e-Procurement.

As a starting point, the assessor should evaluate to what extent and in which form e-Procurement has been implemented in the country. The narrative report should summarise the findings.

e-Procurement is usually implemented gradually and can take different forms. Countries typically start by establishing centralised online portals, used to publish general information related to public procurement (laws, regulations, manuals, templates, etc.). These portals often develop into more refined applications, providing for the publication of procurement plans, bidding opportunities, contract awards, decisions on procurement challenges and appeals, training courses, etc., and can enable sharing reusable open data on public procurement.

More advanced applications include supplier registries and transaction-based e-Procurement systems, which electronically support the entire procurement and contract implementation process (e.g. e-Tendering, e-Catalogues, e-Reverse Auctions, e-Contract Management). These systems deliver a wealth of data necessary for performance measurement and procurement statistics.

Applications can also provide the full procure-to-pay cycle, enabling the integration of the e-Procurement system with financial systems. Other systems as tax, information management or business intelligence systems can also be integrated with e-Procurement systems.

The sub-indicator also assesses whether government officials are adequately skilled to plan, develop and manage e-Procurement systems and reliably and efficiently use them in practice. Suppliers need to be enabled and to have incentives to participate in e-Procurement solutions. In low-technology environments, additional efforts on the part of the government may be necessary to ensure that all companies (including micro, small and medium-sized enterprises) have equal access to a public procurement market increasingly dominated by digital technology. For example, creating decentralised entrepreneurial centres could be considered. These could provide free Internet access, training and support in using the e-Procurement system, significantly improving companies' chances of doing business with public entities.

21 PEFA PI-24.3 (2).

22 PEFA PI-24.3 (3, 4, 5, 6).

If e-Procurement has not yet been implemented, it should be assessed whether the government has adopted an e-Procurement roadmap based on an e-Procurement readiness assessment.

Assessment criteria<sup>23</sup>

- (a) e-Procurement is widely used or progressively implemented in the country at all levels of government.*
- (b) Government officials have the capacity to plan, develop and manage e-Procurement systems.
- (c) Procurement staff is adequately skilled to reliably and efficiently use e-Procurement systems.
- (d) Suppliers (including micro, small and medium-sized enterprises) participate in a public procurement market increasingly dominated by digital technology.*
- (e) If e-Procurement has not yet been introduced, the government has adopted an e-Procurement roadmap based on an e-Procurement readiness assessment.

Sub-indicator 7(c) – Strategies to manage procurement data

Statistical information on procurement is essential to evaluate the policies and the operation of the system. Statistics also provide a means for monitoring performance of the system and compliance with the legal and regulatory framework. Statistical information can also be a tool for procurement planning and market analysis. To ensure comprehensiveness and efficiency, the system should be based on data available in e-Procurement or other information technology systems.

Assessment criteria

- (a) A system is in operation for collecting data on the procurement of goods, works and services, including consulting services, supported by e-Procurement or other information technology.
- (b) The system manages data for the entire procurement process and allows for analysis of trends, levels of participation, efficiency and economy of procurement and compliance with requirements.
- (c) The reliability of the information is high (verified by audits).
- (d) Analysis of information is routinely carried out, published and fed back into the system. *

23 The application of a centralised online portal is assessed under indicators 1(a), 1(h), 7(a), 7(b) and 13(c).

* Quantitative indicators to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 7(c) assessment criterion (d):

Indicator 8. The public procurement system has a strong capacity to develop and improve.

This indicator focuses on the strategies and ability of the public procurement systems to develop and improve. Three aspects should be considered:

- i)* whether strategies and programmes are in place to develop the capacity of procurement staff and other key actors involved in public procurement
- ii)* whether procurement is recognised as a profession in the country's public service
- iii)* whether systems have been established and are used to evaluate the outcomes of procurement operations and develop strategic plans to continuously improve the public procurement system.

There are three sub-indicators (a-c) to be assessed.

Sub-indicator 8(a) – Training, advice and assistance

The purpose of this sub-indicator is to verify existence of permanent and relevant training programmes for new and existing staff in government procurement. These programmes are essential for maintaining the supply of qualified procurement staff to procuring entities. Another objective is to assess the existence and quality of advisory services on procurement matters for public entities, potential suppliers and the general public.

The evaluator should look at the curricula of the existing programmes and judge their relevance, nature, scope and sustainability. A well-functioning system should be:

- i)* based on a “skills gap inventory” to match the needs of the system
- ii)* be sufficient in terms of content and frequency
- iii)* provide for evaluation of the training programme and monitoring of progress in addressing capacity issues.

The assessment should include verification of advisory services or help desks that offer advice to public or private sector parties on application and interpretation of policy and rules.

The training strategy should be closely linked to and integrated with other measures intended to develop the capacity of other key actors involved in public procurement. In particular, refer to the following sub-indicators: 8(b): Professionalisation of the procurement function; 10(a): Programmes to build capacity in the private sector; 11(a): Programmes to build the capacity of civil society; and 14(d): Integrity training programmes for the procurement workforce.

24 PEFA PI-24.1.

25 PEFA I-24.2.

Assessment criteria

There are systems in place that provide for:

- (a) substantive permanent training programmes of suitable quality and content for the needs of the system.
- (b) routine evaluation and periodic adjustment of training programmes based on feedback and need.
- (c) advisory service or help desk function to resolve questions by procuring entities, suppliers and the public.
- (d) a strategy well-integrated with other measures for developing the capacity of key actors involved in public procurement.

Sub-indicator 8(b) – Recognition of procurement as a profession

Public procurement is often performed by civil servants of varying educational and professional backgrounds. Ideally, procurement officers are considered specialised professionals, rather than officials with a purely administrative function. The purpose of this sub-indicator is to determine whether procurement is recognised as a profession in the country's public service. This includes designating specific functions for procurement positions at various professional and management levels. Job descriptions should be in place for these positions and the qualifications and competencies specified. Remuneration and career progression should reflect the particular professional status, and appointments and promotions should be competitive and based on qualifications and professional certification. Ongoing professional development, policies and programmes for staff development and training should be carried out. Staff performance should be evaluated on a regular and consistent basis.

Assessment criteria

The country's public service recognises procurement as a profession:

- (a) Procurement is recognised as a specific function, with procurement positions defined at different professional levels, and job descriptions and the requisite qualifications and competencies specified.
- (b) Appointments and promotion are competitive and based on qualifications and professional certification.
- (c) Staff performance is evaluated on a regular and consistent basis, and staff development and adequate training is provided.

Further analysis: MAPS Module on Professionalisation

Sub-indicator 8(c) – Monitoring performance to improve the system

The evaluation of the effectiveness of the public procurement system, from individual procurements to the system as a whole, can be a major driver of performance improvements. The results of procurement processes should periodically and consistently be assessed to measure the performance, effectiveness and savings of the procurement system. While procuring entities themselves should be at the forefront of performance measurement and continuous improvement programmes at the entity level, the procurement normative/regulatory institution should support these efforts as well. This institution can harmonise, monitor and evaluate the performance of the procurement system as a whole.

Performance management frameworks should be developed that focus on both quantitative and qualitative aspects. The quantitative indicators included in MAPS provide a good starting point for a performance measurement system that addresses both levels and can evolve over time. Additional and more specific impact assessment methodologies may need to be developed depending on the country's development objectives.

The analysis of data and the planning of improvements require specific competencies. A strategic plan (or action plan) should be developed to structure reform initiatives. A results framework should supplement it to monitor the implementation of the planned reforms. A results framework typically includes goals, actions, indicators with baselines and targets, and timelines for reform. Performance targets should be presented in a format that is clear about what is being measured and how it is being measured (method of calculation and data sources). Responsibilities and necessary resources need to be defined.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The country has established and consistently applies a performance measurement system that focuses on both quantitative and qualitative aspects.
- (b) The information is used to support strategic policy making on procurement.
- (c) Strategic plans, including results frameworks, are in place and used to improve the system.
- (d) Responsibilities are clearly defined.

Pillar III. Public Procurement Operations and Market Practices

This Pillar looks at the operational efficiency, transparency and effectiveness of the procurement system at the level of the implementing entity responsible for managing individual procurements (procuring entity). In addition, it looks at the market as one means of judging the quality and effectiveness of the system in putting procurement procedures into practice. This Pillar focuses on how the procurement system in a country operates and performs in practice.

Indicator 9. Public procurement practices achieve stated objectives.

The objective of this indicator is to collect empirical evidence on how procurement principles, rules and procedures formulated in the legal and policy framework are being implemented in practice. It focuses on procurement-related results that in turn influence development outcomes, such as value for money, improved service delivery, trust in government and achievement of horizontal policy objectives.

The assessment of Indicator 9 requires the selection and review of a sample of actual procurement transactions (files). Sampling methods and size determine the representativeness of the assessment results (refer to Section I – User's Guide, paragraph 28). If the sample is small but strategically targeted, the assessment can still provide a useful snapshot or illustration of how procurement operates and performs on the ground. In any case, the assessment findings need to be analysed and interpreted with caution, to ensure credibility and fairness of the process and to achieve a better understanding of the country's procurement system as a whole.

For a more comprehensive assessment of procurement practices targeted specifically at a procuring entity level, refer to the MAPS Module for Entity Level Assessments.

Sub-indicator 9(a) – Planning

During the planning stage of procurement, the basic conditions governing the entire procurement process are established. It is at the onset of the procurement process that the influence on achieving defined objectives is highest. This step of the procurement process is usually performed in close collaboration with the internal client.

Sub-indicator 9(a) assesses whether a thorough needs analysis has been conducted, followed by market research, to inform the development of optimal procurement strategies (in particular for major procurement). It evaluates whether the desired results have been defined and if this entailed economic and/or environmental or social impacts aligned with national policy objectives. It should be assessed whether requirements and/or desired outcomes of the individual procurement have been clearly described, either in tight product/service specifications or through an output/outcome-based definition of requirements (functional specifications).<sup>26</sup>

Assessment criteria

- (a) Needs analysis and market research guide a proactive identification of optimal procurement strategies.
- (b) The requirements and desired outcomes of contracts are clearly defined.
- (c) Sustainability criteria, if any, are used in a balanced manner and in accordance with national priorities, to ensure value for money.

<sup>26</sup> In comparison, sub-indicator 4(a) focuses on the preparation of annual or multi-annual procurement plans to support budget planning and cash flow of procurement operations. Once the budget has been formulated, during the planning stage of an individual procurement transaction, the basic conditions governing the entire procurement process need to be established.

Sub-indicator 9(b) – Selection and contracting

This sub-indicator focuses on the objective of achieving value for money through appropriate determination of procurement methods and approaches, competition, transparency and fairness in selecting suppliers, including the quality of procurement documents and process efficiency.

The sub-indicator assesses the extent to which procurement has followed a competitive procedure (or not). It provides specific information on the use of procurement methods authorised in the law. The sub-indicator also assesses whether procedures for bid submission, receipt and opening have resulted in an appropriate level of competition.

Moreover, the sub-indicator assesses whether appropriate and fair techniques have been applied in the bid evaluation and award stage to determine best value for money, and whether the entire selection process has been carried out effectively, efficiently and in a transparent way.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Multi-stage procedures are used in complex procurements to ensure that only qualified and eligible participants are included in the competitive process.
- (b) Clear and integrated procurement documents, standardised where possible and proportionate to the need, are used to encourage broad participation from potential competitors.
- (c) Procurement methods are chosen, documented and justified in accordance with the purpose and in compliance with the legal framework.
- (d) Procedures for bid submission, receipt and opening are clearly described in the procurement documents and complied with. This means, for instance, allowing bidders or their representatives to attend bid openings, and allowing civil society to monitor bid submission, receipt and opening, as prescribed.
- (e) Throughout the bid evaluation and award process, confidentiality is ensured.
- (f) Appropriate techniques are applied, to determine best value for money based on the criteria stated in the procurement documents and to award the contract.
- (g) Contract awards are announced as prescribed.
- (h) Contract clauses include sustainability considerations, where appropriate.
- (i) Contract clauses provide incentives for exceeding defined performance levels and disincentives for poor performance.
- (j) The selection and award process is carried out effectively, efficiently and in a transparent way. *

*Recommended quantitative indicators to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 9(b) assessment criterion (j):

- average time to procure goods, works and services
- number of days between advertisement/solicitation and contract signature (for each procurement method used)
- average number (and %) of bids that are responsive (for each procurement method used)
- share of processes that have been conducted in full compliance with publication requirements (in %)
- number (and %) of successful processes (successfully awarded; failed; cancelled; awarded within defined time frames)

Source for all: Sample of procurement cases.

Sub-indicator 9(c) – Contract management in practice

This sub-indicator assesses the extent to which goods, works or services, including consulting services procured, are delivered according to the contract agreement in terms of time, quality, cost and other conditions stated in the contract, for the efficient and effective delivery of public services. The sub-indicator assesses cost and time overruns, including for payments to be made to suppliers. The sub-indicator also reviews whether opportunities for the improvement of procurement practices are analysed based on both metrics and stakeholder feedback.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Contracts are implemented in a timely manner.*
- (b) Inspection, quality control, supervision of work and final acceptance of products is carried out.*
- (c) Invoices are examined, time limits for payments comply with good international practices, and payments are processed as stipulated in the contract.
- (d) Contract amendments are reviewed, issued and published in a timely manner.*
- (e) Procurement statistics are available and a system is in place to measure and improve procurement practices.
- (f) Opportunities for direct involvement of relevant external stakeholders in public procurement are utilised.*
- (g) The records are complete and accurate, and easily accessible in a single file.*

Indicator 10. The public procurement market is fully functional.

The objective of this indicator is primarily to assess the market response to public procurement solicitations. This response may be influenced by many factors, such as the general economic climate, policies to support the private sector and a good business environment, strong financial institutions, the attractiveness of the public system as a good, reliable client, the kind of goods or services being demanded, etc. There are three sub-indicators (a-c) to be assessed.

27 PEFA Indicator PI-24.1

28 Preferably split into the different process phases, to cover the concept of open contracting more specifically.

Sub-indicator 10(a) – Dialogue and partnerships between public and private sector

Public procurement depends on the partnership that should exist between the government and the private sector. This partnership creates the public procurement marketplace in which the government is the buyer and the private sector is the supplier of the needed goods, works or services. Dialogue between the government and the private sector is thus imperative, and the voice of the private sector needs to be heard with regard to national procurement objectives, changes to the legal and institutional framework and practices by the government that may undermine the competitive effectiveness of the private sector. This sub-indicator reviews whether there are forums for dialogue between the government and the private sector.

Information and training programmes on public procurement should be regularly offered for the private sector, either by the government or in co-operation with private institutions. These programmes should include approaches tailored to the needs of small businesses, to support supplier diversity, and should include a module on ethics and integrity in public procurement.

Sub-indicator 10(a) is closely linked to Indicator 11 (Disclosure of information and civil society engagement).

Assessment criteria

- (a) The government encourages open dialogue with the private sector. Several established and formal mechanisms are available for open dialogue through associations or other means, including a transparent and consultative process when formulating changes to the public procurement system. The dialogue follows the applicable ethics and integrity rules of the government.*
- (b) The government has programmes to help build capacity among private companies, including for small businesses and training to help new entries into the public procurement marketplace.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 10(a) assessment criterion (a):

- perception of openness and effectiveness in engaging with the private sector (in % of responses).

Source: Survey.

Sub-indicator 10(b) – Private sector's organisation and access to the public procurement market

This sub-indicator looks at the capacity within the private sector to respond to public procurement in the country. An important aspect to assess is the organisational capacity of the small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs)<sup>29</sup> and the access they have to information and other services (including information technology) to promote their participation. A well-organised and competitive private sector should result in keen competition, better prices and an equitable distribution of business. Competition for large contracts should not be concentrated in a relatively small number of firms.

There should be no major systemic constraints (e.g. inadequate access to financing, contracting practices, etc.) inhibiting the private sector's capacity to access the procurement market.

Participation in competition for public contracts depends on many conditions, including some that are controlled by or 29 In some countries, the scope includes micro enterprises (MSMEs).

within the control of the government. Examples for measures that can improve access by the private sector to the government marketplace are:

- i) access to financing
- ii) procurement methods and procedures that are proportionate to the risk and value in question
- iii) reasonable contracting provisions that are seen to fairly distribute risks associated with performance of contracts
- iv) fair payment provisions that help offset the cost of doing business with the government
- v) effective appeals mechanism and dispute resolution
- vi) user-friendly and easily accessible e-Procurement systems.

Alternatively, when the conditions are difficult for the private sector, the degree of competition will suffer. A survey of private sector participants should be carried out to help assess this. The narrative of the assessment should describe the main constraints.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The private sector is competitive, well-organised, willing and able to participate in the competition for public procurement contracts.*
- (b) There are no major systemic constraints inhibiting private sector access to the public procurement market.

- total number and value of contracts awarded to domestic/foreign firms (and in % of total)

Sub-indicator 10(c) – Key sectors and sector strategies

The public procurement market is usually very broad, covering numerous sectors with different needs and interests. Performing a sector market analysis helps to determine sector-related risks (in terms of expenditure, competition, environmental impact, socio-economic risks, etc.) and the government's scope to influence specific market segments.

Based on the government's priority spending areas, key sectors associated with the procurement of goods, works, and services should be identified. This information can be utilised to conduct targeted assessments of relevant sector markets and to secure collaboration with sector market participants in a specific and meaningful way, e.g. to strengthen integrity, sustainability and/or innovation in public procurement.

<sup>30</sup> Survey on appropriateness of conditions should cover: access to credit, procurement methods and procedures, contracting provisions, fair payment provisions, and effective appeals mechanisms and dispute resolution as described above.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Key sectors associated with the public procurement market are identified by the government.
- (b) Risks associated with certain sectors and opportunities to influence sector markets are assessed by the government, and sector market participants are engaged in support of procurement policy objectives.

Pillar IV. Accountability, Integrity and Transparency of the Public Procurement System

Pillar IV includes four indicators that are considered necessary for a system to operate with integrity, that has appropriate controls that support the implementation of the system in accordance with the legal and regulatory framework, and that has appropriate measures in place to address the potential for corruption in the system. It also covers important aspects of the procurement system, which include stakeholders, including civil society, as part of the control system. This Pillar takes aspects of the procurement system and governance environment to ensure they are defined and structured to contribute to integrity and transparency.

Indicator 11. Transparency and civil society engagement strengthen integrity in public procurement.

Civil society, in acting as a safeguard against inefficient and ineffective use of public resources, can help to make public procurement more competitive and fair, improving contract performance and securing results. Governments are increasingly empowering the public to understand and monitor public contracting. This indicator assesses two mechanisms through which civil society can participate in the public procurement process: i) disclosure of information and ii) direct engagement of civil society through participation, monitoring and oversight. There are three sub-indicators to be assessed (a-c).

Sub-indicator 11(a) – An enabling environment for public consultation and monitoring

This indicator assesses the following: i) whether a transparent and consultative process is followed when changes are formulated to the public procurement system, ii) whether programmes are in place to build the capacity of civil society organisations to support participatory public procurement, and iii) whether effective feedback and redress mechanisms are in place for matters related to public procurement.

Assessment criteria

- (a) A transparent and consultative process is followed when formulating changes to the public procurement system.
- (b) Programmes are in place to build the capacity of relevant stakeholders to understand, monitor and improve public procurement.
- (c) There is ample evidence that the government takes into account the input, comments and feedback received from civil society.

Sub-indicator 11(b) – Adequate and timely access to information by the public

The right of the public to access information has been fully integrated in the MAPS indicator system. The following aspects have been highlighted in the sub-indicators referenced below:

- The laws, regulations, and policies governing public procurement are published and easily accessible to the public at no cost (sub-indicator 1(a));
- All stakeholders have adequate and timely access to information in each phase of the public procurement process related to specific procurements (in accordance with legal provisions protecting specific sensitive information) and access to other information that is relevant to promote competition and transparency (refer to sub-indicator 7(a));
- Free access to this information is preferably provided through a centralised online portal and open data standards (sub-indicator 7(a)).

The assessors should revisit the indicators referenced above to conclude whether the separately assessed, multifaceted requirements, in combination with identified actual procurement practices in the country, result in a conclusive and coherent picture in terms of adequate disclosure. The information disclosed should promote a meaningful understanding of the matter as a precondition for effective participation. This sub-indicator assesses whether overall, the amount and nature of transparency and available information supports the integrity of public procurement, including the visibility of the flow of public funds.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Requirements in combination with actual practices ensure that all stakeholders have adequate and timely access to information as a precondition for effective participation.

Sub-indicator 11(c) – Direct engagement of civil society

This sub-indicator assesses the extent to which i) the laws, regulations, and policies enable the participation of citizens in terms of consultation, observation, and monitoring and ii) whether the government promotes and creates opportunities for public consultation and monitoring of public contracting.

The legal and regulatory framework might establish the obligation or an opportunity for the government to consult the public in the planning process, e.g. prior to large-scale or environmentally or socially sensitive procurements. In some countries, citizens are, under clearly specified conditions and subject to signing a statement of confidentiality, permitted or encouraged to act as observers in procurement proceedings. Citizens could also be permitted to be officially involved in the monitoring of performance and contract completion, for example through the application of innovative techniques such as geotagging or in the context of social audits. The assessor should describe in detail the rights and conditions stipulated in the law.

Assessors should take into account the evidence provided through the review of procurement practices (Indicator 9) when evaluating assessment criteria (b) below.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The legal/regulatory and policy framework allows citizens to participate in the following phases of a procurement process, as appropriate:
- the planning phase (consultation)
  - bid/proposal opening (observation)
  - evaluation and contract award (observation), when appropriate, according to local law
  - contract management and completion (monitoring).
- (b) There is ample evidence for direct participation of citizens in procurement processes through consultation, observation and monitoring.

Indicator 12. The country has effective control and audit systems.

The objective of this indicator is to determine the quality, reliability and timeliness of the internal and external controls. Equally, the effectiveness of controls needs to be reviewed. For the purpose of this indicator, “effectiveness” means the expediency and thoroughness of the implementation of auditors’ recommendations. The assessors should rely, in addition to their own findings, on the most recent public expenditure and financial accountability assessments (PEFA) and other analyses that may be available. This indicator has four sub-indicators (a-d) to be assessed.

Sub-indicator 12(a) – Legal framework, organisation and procedures of the control system

This sub-indicator assesses i) whether the country's laws and regulations provide for a comprehensive control framework, ii) whether the institutions, policies and procedures as defined in the law are in place and operational, and iii) whether the existing control framework adequately covers public procurement operations.

National legislation establishes which agencies are responsible for oversight of the procurement function. Even though there is no universal model, it is important that the basic principles of oversight and control exist in the legal and regulatory framework of the country and that they are applied globally. This sub-indicator looks at the institutional set-up of the control framework to assess the existence of a functioning control framework for public procurement. The following are key elements of a functioning control framework:

- i)* There should be provisions to establish internal control and management procedures that focus on checks and balances for processing procurement transactions, on payment controls and on expenditure commitment controls. Expenditure commitment controls ensure that the procuring entity's payment obligations, arising from contracts, remain within the limits of budget allocations.<sup>31</sup>
- ii)* Regular and adequate feedback to management on the adequacy and effectiveness of the internal control systems is provided through an internal audit function (or internal audit institution). Among other things, this function scrutinises the reliability and integrity of financial and operational information, the effectiveness and efficiency of operations and programmes, and compliance with laws, regulations and contracts.<sup>32</sup>
- iii)* A high-quality external audit is a required for ensuring accountability and creating transparency in the use of public funds. The Supreme Audit Institution (SAI) should be independent from the executive branch, and its mandate should enable the SAI to carry out a full range of audit activities, specifically financial, compliance and performance audits. Adherence to international auditing standards should ensure a focus on significant and systemic PFM issues in reports as well as, among other tasks, providing an opinion on the functioning of internal control and procurement systems.<sup>33</sup>
- iv)* Internal audit and internal control systems assist external auditors and enable performance audit techniques to be used that look at the effectiveness and application of internal control procedures, instead of looking at individual procurement actions.
- v)* The legislature (or other body responsible for public finance governance) should review and act on the findings of the SAI.<sup>34</sup>

The assessor should verify that the institutions, policies and procedures as defined in the law are in place and operational. The assessment should determine whether the existing controls framework pays sufficient attention to public procurement, e.g. by addressing specialised procurement audits.

31 PEFA covers internal controls on nonsalary expenditure in PI-25.

32 Refer to PEFA PI-26.

33 Refer to PEFA PI-8 and PI-30.

34 Refer to PEFA PI-31.

Assessment criteria

The system in the country provides for:

- (a) laws and regulations that establish a comprehensive control framework, including internal controls, internal audits, external audits and oversight by legal bodies
- (b) internal control/audit mechanisms and functions that ensure appropriate oversight of procurement, including reporting to management on compliance, effectiveness and efficiency of procurement operations
- (c) internal control mechanisms that ensure a proper balance between timely and efficient decision-making and adequate risk mitigation
- (d) independent external audits provided by the country's Supreme Audit Institution (SAI) that ensure appropriate oversight of the procurement function based on periodic risk assessments and controls tailored to risk management
- (e) review of audit reports provided by the SAI and determination of appropriate actions by the legislature (or other body responsible for public finance governance)
- (f) clear mechanisms to ensure that there is follow-up on the respective findings.

Sub-indicator 12(b) – Co-ordination of controls and audits of public procurement

This sub-indicator assesses whether internal controls, internal audits and external audits are well defined, co-ordinated, sufficiently resourced and integrated to ensure the consistent application of procurement laws, regulations and policies and the monitoring of performance of the public procurement system, and that they are conducted with sufficient frequency.

Internal control routines, procedures and standards should be clearly defined (ideally in an internal control manual) and complied with. There should also be written standards for the internal audit unit (or function), to perform both compliance and performance audits related to procurement and to convey issues to management, depending on the urgency of the matter. A regular periodic reporting to management should take place throughout the year to provide timely information and enable management action.

Sufficient information needs to be retained to allow auditors to verify that the written internal control procedures are adhered to. Internal and external audit plans should be co-ordinated, at least annually, to ensure adequate oversight and a reduction of duplication. Written procedures and standards (e.g. a manual) for conducting procurement audits (both on compliance and on performance) should be formulated to ensure that internal and external audits are harmonised and mutually reinforcing. Audits should be carried out at least annually.

This sub-indicator also assesses the existence of clear and reliable reporting lines to relevant oversight bodies. This includes the reporting of credible suspicions of breaches of laws and regulations to the competent authorities, without fear of reprisals. Imprecise or lax controls and inadequate reporting impact the enforcement of the laws and regulations and create ample risk for fraud and corruption.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There are written procedures that state requirements for internal controls, ideally in an internal control manual.
- (b) There are written standards and procedures (e.g. a manual) for conducting procurement audits (both on compliance and performance) to facilitate co-ordinated and mutually reinforcing auditing.
- (c) There is evidence that internal or external audits are carried out at least annually and that other established written standards are complied with.*
- (d) Clear and reliable reporting lines to relevant oversight bodies exist.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 12(b) assessment criterion (c):

- number of specialised procurement audits carried out compared to total number of audits (in %).
- share of procurement performance audits carried out (in % of total number of procurement audits).

Source: Ministry of Finance/Supreme Audit Institution.

Sub-indicator 12(c) – Enforcement and follow-up on findings and recommendations

The purpose of this indicator is to review the extent to which internal and external audit recommendations are implemented within a reasonable time. This may be expressed as the percentage of recommendations implemented within the time frames established in the law or within six months, a year, more than a year or never implemented.

Reasons should be documented in case certain recommendations were not implemented.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Recommendations are responded to and implemented within the time frames established in the law.*
- (b) There are systems in place to follow up on the implementation/enforcement of the audit recommendations.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 12(c) assessment criterion (a):

- Share of internal and external audit recommendations implemented within the time frames established in the law (in %).

Source: Ministry of Finance/Supreme Audit Institution.

Sub-indicator 12 (d) – Qualification and training to conduct procurement audits

The objective of this indicator is to confirm that there is a system in place to ensure that auditors working on procurement audits are adequate to the task. They should receive adequate training and they should be selected following criteria that explicitly require that they demonstrate sufficient knowledge of the subject to conduct high-quality procurement audits, including performance audits. Auditors should normally receive formal training on procurement requirements, principles, operations, laws and regulations and processes. Alternatively, they should have extensive experience in public procurement or be supported by procurement specialists or consultants. Auditors, including external resources, should be selected in a fair and transparent way and be fully independent.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There is an established programme to train internal and external auditors to ensure that they are qualified to conduct high-quality procurement audits, including performance audits.*
- (b) The selection of auditors requires that they have adequate knowledge of the subject as a condition for carrying out procurement audits; if auditors lack procurement knowledge, they are routinely supported by procurement specialists or consultants.
- (c) Auditors are selected in a fair and transparent way and are fully independent.

Indicator 13. Procurement appeals mechanisms are effective and efficient.

Pillar I covers aspects of the appeals mechanism as it pertains to the legal framework, including creation and coverage. This indicator further assesses the appeals mechanisms for a range of specific issues regarding efficiency in contributing to the compliance environment in the country and the integrity of the public procurement system. There are three sub-indicators (a-c) to be assessed.

Sub-indicator 13(a) – Process for challenges and appeals

This sub-indicator looks at the process that is defined for dealing with challenges or appeals and sets out some specific conditions that provide for fairness and due process.

- i)* Decisions are rendered on the basis of available evidence submitted by the parties.
- ii)* The first review is carried out by the entity specified by law.
- iii)* The appeals body (or authority) has enough authority to enforce its decisions.
- iv)* The time frames specified for the submission and review of challenges/appeals and issuing of decisions do not unduly delay the procurement process or make an appeal unrealistic.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Decisions are rendered on the basis of available evidence submitted by the parties.
- (b) The first review of the evidence is carried out by the entity specified in the law.
- (c) The body or authority (appeals body) in charge of reviewing decisions of the specified first review body issues final, enforceable decisions. *
- (d) The time frames specified for the submission and review of challenges and for appeals and issuing of decisions do not unduly delay the procurement process or make an appeal unrealistic.

- number of appeals.

Source: Appeals body.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 13(a) assessment criterion (c):

- number (and percentage) of enforced decisions.

Source: Appeals body.

Sub-indicator 13(b) – Independence and capacity of the appeals body

This indicator<sup>35</sup> assesses the degree of autonomy that the appeals body has from the rest of the system, to ensure that its decisions are free from interference or conflict of interest. It is crucial that the body is not involved in any capacity in procurement transactions or in the process leading to contract award decisions. The body should not charge fees that inhibit access by concerned parties.

The indicator assesses the efficiency and capacity of the appeals body and its ability to enforce the remedy imposed. The assessors should review whether the conditions and time frames for review and decisions are precise and reasonable, and whether processes for submission and resolution of challenges are clearly defined and followed by the appeals body. They should also be publicly available.

Assessors should evaluate whether the appeals body i) exercises its authority to suspend procurement proceedings, ii) applies the full range of remedies specified by law, iii) issues decisions within the time frame specified in the law/regulations, and iv) issues decisions that are binding on all parties (without precluding subsequent access to judicial process). The appeals body needs to be adequately resourced and staffed to fulfil its functions.

Assessment criteria

The appeals body:

- is not involved in any capacity in procurement transactions or in the process leading to contract award decisions
- does not charge fees that inhibit access by concerned parties
- follows procedures for submission and resolution of complaints that are clearly defined and publicly available
- exercises its legal authority to suspend procurement proceedings and impose remedies
- issues decisions within the time frame specified in the law/regulations*
- issues decisions that are binding on all parties
- is adequately resourced and staffed to fulfil its functions.

* Quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 13(b) assessment criterion (c):

- appeals resolved within the time frame specified in the law/exceeding this time frame/unresolved (Total number and in %).

Source: Appeals body.

35 This indicator is fully aligned with PEFA PI-24.4.

Sub-indicator 13(c) – Decisions of the appeals body

The appeals system needs to be seen as operating in a fair manner. The system should require that decisions be rendered only on relevant and verifiable information presented. In addition, such decisions need to be unbiased, reflecting the consideration of the evidence presented and the applicable requirements in the legal/regulatory framework.

It is also important that the remedy imposed in the decision be consistent with the findings of the case and with the available remedies provided for in the legal/regulatory framework. Decisions of the appeals body should deal specifically with process issues, and the remedies should focus on corrective actions needed to comply with the process.

Decisions should be published in a timely manner and as stipulated in the law. Preferably, decisions should be published on the centralised online portal mentioned in sub-indicator 7(b).

Assessment criteria

Procedures governing the decision making process of the appeals body provide that decisions are:

- (a) based on information relevant to the case.
- (b) balanced and unbiased in consideration of the relevant information.*
- (c) result in remedies, if required, that are necessary to correcting the implementation of the process or procedures.*
- (d) decisions are published on the centralised government online portal within specified timelines and as stipulated in the law.*

Indicator 14. The country has ethics and anti-corruption measures in place.

This indicator assesses i) the nature and scope of anti-corruption provisions in the procurement system and ii) how they are implemented and managed in practice. This indicator also assesses whether the system strengthens openness and balances the interests of stakeholders and whether the private sector and civil society support the creation of a public procurement market known for its integrity. There are seven sub-indicators (a-g) contributing to this indicator.

Sub-indicator 14(a) – Legal definition of prohibited practices, conflicts of interest, and associated responsibilities, accountabilities and penalties

This indicator assesses the existence of legal provisions that define fraudulent, corrupt and other prohibited practices (“prohibited practices”) and set out the responsibilities and sanctions for government employees, individuals or firms indulging in such practices.

The legal provisions should also address issues concerning situations involving conflicts of interest and incompatibility. Provisions should include mechanisms to identify and declare where conflict of interests exist, to mitigate risks and make this information easily accessible to decision makers. The law should prohibit the intervention of active public officials and former public officials for a reasonable period after leaving office (cooling-off period) in procurement matters in ways that benefit them, their relatives and business or political associates, financially or otherwise.

Sanctions should include the exclusion of firms or individuals that have been the subject of a conviction by final judgment for fraud, corruption or other prohibited practices, as defined in the national law of the procuring entity or the firm/individual (refer to sub-indicator 1(d)).

There may be cases where there is a separate anti-corruption law (e.g. anti-corruption legislation) that contains such provisions. This arrangement is appropriate insofar as the effects of the anti-corruption law are the same as if they were in the procurement law.<sup>36</sup>

The legal, regulatory and policy framework should be consistent with obligations deriving from legally binding international anti-corruption agreements, e.g. the United Nations Convention Against Corruption (UNCAC).

Assessment criteria

The legal/regulatory framework provides for the following:

- (a) definitions of fraud, corruption and other prohibited practices in procurement, consistent with obligations deriving from legally binding international anti-corruption agreements.
- (b) definitions of the individual responsibilities, accountability and penalties for government employees and private firms or individuals found guilty of fraud, corruption or other prohibited practices in procurement, without prejudice of other provisions in the criminal law.
- (c) definitions and provisions concerning conflict of interest, including a cooling-off period for former public officials.

Sub-indicator 14(b) – Provisions on prohibited practices in procurement documents

This sub-indicator assesses the extent to which the law and the regulations compel procuring agencies to include references on fraud, corruption and other prohibited practices, conflict of interest and unethical behaviour, as defined in the law in the procurement and contract documents. Instructions could include a requirement for bidders to issue a self-declaration assuring that the bidder has not engaged in any prohibited practices and has not been prosecuted or convicted of fraud, corruption or other prohibited practices. This sub-indicator is related to sub-indicator 2(b) on Content for model documents, but is not directly addressed in that sub-indicator.

The assessment should verify the existence of the provisions in the procurement and contract documents and enforceability of such provision through the legal/regulatory framework. The procurement and contract documents should include <sup>36</sup> Prohibitions against bribery could be contained in a country’s penal code, specific anti-corruption legislation, or other legislation, such as competition legislation. In addition, prohibitions against bribery by companies (“legal persons”) are sometimes contained in the same legislation as the prohibitions against natural persons, or separate legislation on corporate liability for corruption offences and sometimes other economic offences as well (e.g. money laundering).

the definitions of what is considered fraud and corruption and other prohibited practices, and the consequences of committing such acts.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The legal/regulatory framework specifies this mandatory requirement and gives precise instructions on how to incorporate the matter in procurement and contract documents.
- (b) Procurement and contract documents include provisions on fraud, corruption and other prohibited practices, as specified in the legal/regulatory framework.

Sub-indicator 14(c) – Effective sanctions and enforcement systems

This indicator concerns the enforcement of the law and the ability to demonstrate this by actions taken. Evidence of enforcement is necessary to demonstrate to the citizens and other stakeholders that the country is serious about fighting corruption.

Assessors should determine whether procuring entities are required to report allegations of fraud, corruption and other prohibited practices to the law enforcement authorities, and whether there is a clear procedure in place for doing this.

Assessors should review whether the procedure is systematically applied in practice, and whether reports pursuant to such a procedure are consistently followed up by the law enforcement authorities.

The assessor should verify that systems and procedures are in place to suspend/debar firms and individuals from participating in procurement proceedings (refer to sub-indicator 1(d)). The assessor should evaluate whether the procedures ensure due process and whether they are consistently applied. For example, the system should include a register of debarred firms and individuals that is easily accessible to all procuring entities. Procuring entities should be required to consult this register and consistently exclude debarred firms and individuals from participation in a procurement process.

The assessor should also be able to obtain at least some evidence of prosecution and punishment for fraudulent, corrupt or other prohibited practices. The assessor should retrieve figures on the number of cases reported through the system, and number of cases prosecuted. If the ratio of cases prosecuted to cases reported is low, the narrative should explain the possible reasons.

Assessment criteria

- (a) Procuring entities are required to report allegations of fraud, corruption and other prohibited practices to law enforcement authorities, and there is a clear procedure in place for doing this.
- (b) There is evidence that this system is systematically applied and reports are consistently followed up by law enforcement authorities.
- (c) There is a system for suspension/debarment that ensures due process and is consistently applied.
- (d) There is evidence that the laws on fraud, corruption and other prohibited practices are being enforced in the country by application of stated penalties.*

Sub-indicator 14(d) – Anti-corruption framework and integrity training

This sub-indicator attempts to verify whether an anti-corruption framework is in effect, and if so, its extent and nature and any other special measures in place, such as integrity training programmes that can help prevent and/or detect fraud and corruption specifically associated with public procurement.

A comprehensive anti-corruption framework normally includes all the stakeholders in the procurement system, assigns clear responsibilities to all of them, and assigns a high-level body or organisation (e.g. and anti-corruption commission) with sufficient standing and authority to be responsible for co-ordinating and monitoring the programme. The functions assigned to the anti-corruption body will differ from country to country. For example, anti-corruption bodies could be in charge of providing secure channels for reporting suspected corruption, have investigative powers, and collect and disclose information on beneficial ownership, following good international practice.

The procuring entities are responsible for running and monitoring a transparent and efficient system and for providing public information to promote accountability and transparency. To strengthen awareness and to clarify responsibilities and reporting requirements and channels in case of attempted or suspected fraud or corruption in procurement, integrity training programmes should be developed and offered as a co-ordinated effort (involving procuring entities, the anti-corruption body and normative/regulatory institutions). The procurement workforce should be obliged to participate in this training on a regular basis.

The control organisations (supreme audit authority) and the legal oversight bodies (e.g. the parliament or congress) are responsible for detecting and denouncing irregularities or corruption. The civil society organisations are responsible for social audits and for monitoring of procurement to protect the public interest. These may include NGOs, academia, unions, chambers of commerce and professional associations, and the press. The judiciary also participates, often in the form of special anti-corruption courts and dedicated investigative bodies that are responsible for investigating and prosecuting cases of corruption. There are normally government public education and awareness campaigns as part of efforts to change social behaviour in respect to corrupt practices and tolerance. Anti-corruption strategies usually include the use of modern technology to promote e-Procurement and e-government services, to minimise the risk of facilitation payments, identify “red flag” situations, indicate potential corruption, and support annual reporting to enhance awareness and open dialogue.

The assessor should assess the extent to which all or some of these actions are organised as a co-ordinated effort. This also includes sufficient resources, commitment by the government and the public, the extent to which they are mostly isolated and left to the initiative of individual agencies or organisations.

Assessment criteria

- (a) The country has in place a comprehensive anti-corruption framework to prevent, detect and penalise corruption in government that involves the appropriate agencies of government with a level of responsibility and capacity to enable its responsibilities to be carried out.*
- (b) As part of the anti-corruption framework, a mechanism is in place and is used for systematically identifying corruption risks and for mitigating these risks in the public procurement cycle.
- (c) As part of the anti-corruption framework, statistics on corruption-related legal proceedings and convictions are compiled and reports are published annually.
- (d) Special measures are in place for the detection and prevention of corruption associated with procurement.
- (e) Special integrity training programmes are offered and the procurement workforce regularly participates in this training.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 14(d) assessment criterion (a):

- percentage of favourable opinions by the public on the effectiveness of anti-corruption measures (in % of responses).

Sub-indicator 14(e) – Stakeholder support to strengthen integrity in procurement

This indicator assesses the strength of the public and the private sector in maintaining a sound procurement environment. This may be made manifest in the existence of respected and credible civil society groups that have a procurement focus within their agendas and/or actively provide oversight and exercise social control. Civil society organisations can only play a meaningful role as third-party monitors when they have government guarantees to function and when their work is generally promoted and accepted by the public. Media, where free and well-informed, can also play an active role in addressing integrity and ethical behaviour in public procurement.

Assessors should also evaluate whether business associations promote anti-corruption frameworks to be implemented by suppliers. The supply side can become an active partner in supporting integrity, by establishing internal compliance measures. Programmes could for example focus on codes of ethics, integrity training for staff and/or improved internal control measures.

The welcoming and respectful attitude of the government and the quality of the debate and the contributions of all interested stakeholders are an important part of creating an environment where integrity and ethical behaviour is expected and deviations are not tolerated.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There are strong and credible civil society organisations that exercise social audit and control.
- (b) There is an enabling environment for civil society organisations to have a meaningful role as third-party monitors, including clear channels for engagement and feedback that are promoted by the government.
- (c) There is evidence that civil society contributes to shape and improve integrity of public procurement.*
- (d) Suppliers and business associations actively support integrity and ethical behaviour in public procurement, e.g. through internal compliance measures.*

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 14(e) assessment criterion (c):

- number of domestic civil service organisations (CSOs), including national offices of international CSOs actively providing oversight and social control in public procurement.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 14(e) assessment criterion (d):

- number of suppliers that have internal compliance measures in place (in %).

Sub-indicator 14(f) – Secure mechanisms for reporting prohibited practices or unethical behaviour

This sub-indicator assesses the following: i) whether the country provides, through its legislation and institutional set-up, a system for reporting fraudulent, corrupt or other prohibited practices or unethical behaviour; and ii) whether such legislation and systems provide for confidentiality and the protection of whistle-blowers. The system should be seen to react to reports, as verified by subsequent actions taken to address the issues reported. In case a reporting intake system is established and data is generated indicating the number of investigations conducted and actions taken, this information should be taken into account.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There are secure, accessible and confidential channels for reporting cases of fraud, corruption or other prohibited practices or unethical behaviour.
- (b) There are legal provisions to protect whistle-blowers, and these are considered effective.
- (c) There is a functioning system that serves to follow up on disclosures.

Sub-indicator 14(g) – Codes of conduct/codes of ethics and financial disclosure rules

The country should have in place a code of conduct/ethics that applies to all public officials. In addition, special provisions should be in place for those involved in public procurement. Financial disclosure requirements for public officials have proven very useful in helping to prevent unethical or corrupt practices. Regular training programmes should be conducted for all public officials, to raise and sustain awareness of the requirements and ensure the effective implementation of these measures.

37 Disclosure of such details is generally not a requirement. Supplier database should include filing details on compliance.

Assessment criteria

- (a) There is a code of conduct or ethics for government officials, with particular provisions for those involved in public financial management, including procurement.*
- (a) The code defines accountability for decision making, and subjects decision makers to specific financial disclosure requirements.*
- (a) The code is of mandatory, and the consequences of any failure to comply are administrative or criminal.
- (a) Regular training programmes are offered to ensure sustained awareness and implementation of measures.
- (a) Conflict of interest statements, financial disclosure forms and information on beneficial ownership are systematically filed, accessible and utilised by decision makers to prevent corruption risks throughout the public procurement cycle.

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 14(g) assessment criterion (a):

- share of procurement entities that have a mandatory code of conduct or ethics, with particular provisions for those involved in public financial management, including procurement (in % of total number of procuring entities).

* Recommended quantitative indicator to substantiate assessment of sub-indicator 14(g) assessment criterion (b):

- officials involved in public procurement that have filed financial disclosure forms (in % of total required by law).

GLOSSARY

Accountability (in public management)	Managers are held responsible for carrying out a defined set of duties or tasks, and for conforming with rules and standards applicable to their posts.
Appeals body	Independent body in charge of reviewing decisions of a specified first review body. The appeals body may be an administrative or judicial review body. The appeals body needs to be independent from the procuring entity and should not be involved in any capacity in procurement transactions or in the process leading to contract award decisions.
Budget	A comprehensive statement of government financial plans, which include expenditures, revenues, deficit or surplus and debt. The budget is the government's main economic policy document, demonstrating how the government plans to use public resources to meet policy goals and to some extent, indicating where its policy priorities lie.
Capability	The skills-based ability for an individual, group or organisation to meet obligations and objectives; also referred to as "know-how".
Capacity	The ability to meet obligations and objectives based on existing administrative, financial, human and infrastructure resources.
Civil servant	An employee of the state who would continue to be a state employee if the government changes. In addition, civil servants are employees covered under a specific public legal framework or other specific provisions.
Civil society organisation (CSO)	The multitude of associations around which society voluntarily organises itself and which represent a wide range of interests and ties. These can include community-based organisations, indigenous people's organisations and nongovernment organisations.
Competition	A situation in a market in which firms or sellers independently strive for the patronage of buyers to achieve a particular business objective, e.g. profits, sales and/or market share. Competition in this context is often equated with rivalry. Competitive rivalry between firms can occur when there are two firms or many firms. This rivalry may take place in terms of price, quality, service or combinations of these and other factors that customers may value. Competition is viewed as an important process by which firms are forced to become efficient, offering a greater choice of products and services at lower prices. It gives rise to increased consumer welfare and allocative efficiency. It includes the concept of "dynamic efficiency", by which firms engage in innovation and encourage technological change and progress.
Competition bodies	Government agencies, which formulate competition policies and/or regulate and enforce competition laws.
Corruption	Abuse of public or private office for personal gain.
Effectiveness	The extent to which the activities' stated objectives have been met
Efficiency	Achieving maximum output from a given level of resources used to carry out an activity.
e-Procurement	The integration of digital technologies in the replacement or redesign of paper-based procedures throughout the procurement process

Good governance	Governance characterised by participation, transparency, accountability, rule of law, effectiveness, equity, etc. Good governance refers to the management of government in a manner that is essentially free of abuse and corruption and with due regard for the rule of law.
Governance	The exercise of political, economic and administrative authority
Gross domestic product (GDP)	The standard measure of the value of the goods and services produced by a country during a given period. Specifically, it is equal to the sum of the gross value added of all resident institutional units engaged in production (plus any taxes, and minus any subsidies, on products not included in the value of their outputs). The sum of the final uses of goods and services (all uses except intermediate consumption) measured in purchasers' prices, less the value of imports of goods and services, or the sum of primary incomes distributed by resident producer units.
Horizontal policy objectives	Any of a variety of objectives of an economic, environmental and social nature (such as sustainable green growth, the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, innovation, standards for responsible business conduct or broader industrial policy objectives), which governments increasingly pursue through use of procurement as a policy lever (sometimes referred to as "secondary" policies, in contrast with the so-called "primary" objectives of delivering goods and services in a timely, economical and efficient manner).
Indicator	A quantitative or qualitative measure derived from a series of observed facts that can reveal relative positions in a given area.
Innovation	The implementation of a new or significantly improved product, good, service or process, or a new organisational method.
Integrity	The use of funds, resources, assets and authority according to the intended official purposes, and in a manner that is well informed and aligned with the public interest and broader principles of good governance.
PEFA	Public Expenditure and Financial Accountability (PEFA) Performance Measurement Framework ( www.pefa.org )
Performance	The ability of an entity to acquire resources economically and use those resources efficiently and effectively in achieving performance targets.
Performance Information	Performance information can be generated by both government and nongovernmental organisations, and can be both qualitative and quantitative. Performance information refers to metrics/indicators/general information on the inputs, processes, outputs and outcomes of government policies/programmes/organisations, and can be ultimately used to assess their effectiveness, cost effectiveness and efficiency. Performance information can be found in statistics; the financial and/or operational accounts of government organisations; performance reports generated by government organisations; evaluations of policies, programmes or organisations; or spending reviews, for instance.

Policy	A consistent course of action designed to meet a goal or objective and respond to an issue or problem identified by the state as requiring action or reform. It is implemented by a public body (ministry, agency, etc.), although elements may be delegated to other bodies. Examples include a public policy to tackle climate change, educational reform, or support for entrepreneurship. A public policy is, or should be, linked to the government programme and its strategic planning. It is often given a formal framework through legislation and/or secondary regulations, especially in countries with a system of civil law. It is given practical effect through a defined course of action, programmes and activities. It is, as necessary, funded from the state budget. A priority policy is a policy that matters more than others for the achievement of the government's strategic objectives. The responsibility for taking forward a public policy may rest with the relevant line ministry, or, in the case of policies that cut across ministerial boundaries, may be shared by relevant ministries.
Procurement document	A document issued by the procuring entity that sets out the terms and conditions of the given procurement. Invitation to participate in procurement proceedings (e.g. invitation to tender, participate in request for proposal proceedings or an electronic reverse auction). Alternative terms: solicitation document or tender document.
Procuring entity	A public entity (agency) conducting procurement in compliance with the applicable law. The terms "procuring agency" or "procurement body" are often used synonymously. Procuring entities can belong to any level of government (national, provincial or municipal level). They can represent different arms of government (branches, ministries, departments, etc.) or they could be constituted as state-owned enterprises or bodies.
Public procurement	The process of identifying what is needed; determining who the best person or organisation is to supply this need; and ensuring that what is needed is delivered to the right place, at the right time and for the best price; and that all this is done in a fair and open manner;
Public procurement cycle	The sequence of related activities, from needs assessment through competition and award to payment and contract management, as well as any subsequent monitoring or auditing.
Public servant	A term used to identify those who are employed by government-funded organisations. Some countries use both "public servant" and "civil servant" when describing government-funded employees, with "public servant" having a broader application (e.g. encompassing doctors, teachers, local government officials, etc.) than "civil servant", which would include employees working in the central government.
Public services	Services that are performed for the benefit of the public or its institutions. Public services are provided by government to its citizens, either directly (through the public sector) or by financing private provision of services. The term is associated with a social consensus that certain services should be available to all, regardless of income. Even where public services are neither publicly provided nor publicly financed, for social and political reasons, they are usually subject to regulation that extends beyond the regulation applying to most economic sectors.
Public (open) tender	Refers to the process whereby a procuring entity invites bids that should be submitted within a finite deadline. It is often used for a bidding process that is open to all qualified bidders (open tender) and where sealed bids are opened in public for scrutiny and are chosen on the basis of stated award criteria. In the context of sub-indicator 1(g), the term "tender" is used interchangeably with "bids" or "proposals".
Public-private partnership	A contract (institutional relationship) between public and private actors for the co-operative provision of a public good or service. The essential element is some degree of private participation in the delivery of goods or services traditionally in the public domain. Private actors may include both for-profit and not-for-profit organisations.

Regulation	The term regulation covers the diverse set of instruments by which governments impose requirements on enterprises and citizens. Regulations include all primary laws, formal and informal orders, subordinate regulations, administrative formalities and rules issued by nongovernmental or self-regulatory bodies to whom governments have delegated regulatory powers.
Specific sensitive information	Refers to legitimate needs for protection of trade secrets and proprietary information and other privacy concerns, as well as the need to avoid disclosing information that can be used by interested parties to distort competition in the procurement process. The country's legal framework should include definitions and provisions to unambiguously identify and prohibit the disclosure of specific sensitive information.
State-owned enterprise	Countries have different definitions of state-owned enterprises. The OECD offers the following definition for comparative purposes: "any corporate entity recognised by national law as an enterprise, and in which the state exercises ownership" (OECD, 2015, OECD Guidelines on Corporate Governance of State-Owned Enterprises, 2015 Edition, OECD Publishing, Paris. http://dx.doi.org/10.1787/9789264244160-en .)
Supplier	A party that supplies goods, works, or services, i.e. in this context, "supplier" implies contractors and service providers that include consulting firms or others.
Sustainability	(a) Use of the biosphere by present generations while maintaining its potential yield (benefit) for future generations; and/or  (b) non-declining trends of economic growth and development that might be impaired by natural resource depletion and environmental degradation.
Sustainable development	Development "that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs", World Commission on Environment and Development (1987), Our Common Future, http://www.un-documents.net/our-common-future.pdf .
Sustainable Public Procurement (SPP)	A "process whereby organisations meet their needs for goods, services, works and utilities in a way that achieves value for money on a whole life basis in terms of generating benefits not only to the organisation, but also to society and the economy, whilst minimising damage to the environment", Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (2006), "Procuring the Future: Sustainable Action Plan: Recommendations from the Sustainable Procurement Task Force", London, in: http://collections.europarchive.org/tna/20080530153425/http://www.sustainable-development.gov.uk/publications/procurement-action-plan/documents/full-document.pdf .
Transparency	An environment in which the objectives of policy, its legal, institutional and economic framework, policy decisions and their rationale, data and information related to policies, and the terms of agencies' accountability, are provided to the public in a comprehensible, accessible and timely manner.
Trust	Trust is broadly understood as holding a positive perception about the actions of an individual or an organisation. Trust gives us confidence that others will act as we might expect in a particular circumstance. While trust may be based on actual experience, in most cases, trust is a subjective phenomenon, reflected in the eyes of the beholder.
Value for money	Value for money is a term used in different ways to convey the effective, efficient and economic use of resources. In the context of public procurement, it can be defined as the most advantageous combination of cost, quality and sustainability to meet defined requirements. Cost means consideration of the whole life cost and risks; quality means meeting a specification which is fit for purpose and sufficient to meet the requirements; and sustainability comprises economic, social and environmental benefits.

I. Procedural History

1. On May 23, 2002, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID” or the “Centre”) received from Siemens A.G. (“Siemens” or “Claimant”) a request for arbitration against the Argentine Republic (“Respondent”, “Argentina” or “Government”). On June 7, 2002, the Centre acknowledged receipt of the request in accordance with Rule 5 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings (“Institution Rules”) and informed the Claimant that it would not take further action until it had received the prescribed lodging fee as provided by Institution Rule 5(1)(b). On June 13, 2002, the Centre acknowledged receipt of the prescribed lodging fee by the Claimant and transmitted a copy of the request to Argentina and to the Argentine Embassy in Washington, D.C. in accordance with Institution Rule 5(2).

2. According to Article 36(3) of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States (“the Convention”), the Secretary-General of the Centre registered the request for arbitration on July 17, 2002. In accordance with Institution Rule 7, the Secretary-General notified the parties on the same date of the registration of the request and invited them to proceed to constitute an Arbitral Tribunal as soon as possible.

3. On August 7, 2002, the parties agreed that the Arbitral Tribunal would consist of three arbitrators, one arbitrator to be appointed by each party and the third, who shall serve as the President of the Tribunal, to be appointed by the agreement of the parties. The Claimant appointed Judge Charles N. Brower, a U.S. national, and the Respondent appointed Professor Domingo Bello Janeiro, a Spanish national. However, the parties failed to agree on the appointment of the third, presiding arbitrator. On October 21, 2002, the Claimant requested that the third, presiding arbitrator be appointed in accordance with Article 38 of the Convention and Rule 4 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for Arbitration Proceedings (“Arbitration Rules”).

4. After consulting the parties, Dr. Andrés Rigo Sureda, a national of Spain, was appointed by the Centre as the third, presiding arbitrator. In accordance with Rule 6(1) of the Arbitration Rules, on December 19, 2002, the Secretary-General notified the parties that all three arbitrators accepted their appointment and that the Arbitral Tribunal was deemed to be constituted and the proceedings to have begun on that date. On the same date, pursuant to ICSID Administrative and Financial Regulation 25, the parties were informed that Mr. Gonzalo Flores, Senior Counsel, ICSID, would serve as Secretary of the Arbitral Tribunal. The Tribunal held its first session with the parties in Washington, D.C. on February 13, 2003.

5. Mr. Guido Santiago Tawil of M. & M. Bomchil and Mr. Peter Gnam of Siemens A.G. represent the Claimant. Messrs. Tawil and Gnam represented the Claimant at the first session. Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino, Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, represents the Respondent. Messrs. Ignacio Suárez Anzorena and Carlos Lo Turco, acting on instructions from the then Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, and Mr. Osvaldo Siseles, from the Ministerio de Economía, represented the Respondent at the first session.

6. During the first session, the parties agreed that the Tribunal had been properly constituted in accordance with the ICSID Convention and the Arbitration Rules and that they did not have any objections to any members of the Tribunal. It was also noted that the proceedings would be conducted under the Arbitration Rules in force since September 26, 1984.

7. During the first session, the parties also agreed on several other procedural matters, which were later set forth in the written minutes signed by the President and the Secretary of the Tribunal. Regarding the written submissions, the Tribunal, after consulting with the parties, fixed the following time limits for the presentation of the parties' pleadings: The Claimant would file a Memorial within 90 (ninety) days from the date of the first session; the Respondent would file a Counter-Memorial within 90 (ninety) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Memorial; the Claimant would file a Reply within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent would file a Rejoinder within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Reply.

8. The Tribunal further noted that, according to the Arbitration Rules, the Respondent has the right to raise any objections to jurisdiction no later than the expiration of the time limit fixed for the filing of its Counter-Memorial, and that, in the event that the Respondent would raise objections to jurisdiction, the following schedule would apply: the Claimant would file its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction within the same number of days used by Argentina to file its objections to jurisdiction, but in any event, the Claimant would have a minimum of 60 (sixty) days to file its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction; the Respondent would file its Reply on jurisdiction within 30 (thirty) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction; and the Claimant would file its Rejoinder on jurisdiction within 30 (thirty) days from its receipt of the Respondent's Reply on jurisdiction. It was also agreed that, if the Respondent would raise any objections to jurisdiction and proceedings would be resumed following the filing of such objections (because the Tribunal dismisses the objections or because it decides to join them with the merits of the dispute), the calendar agreed for the merits would recommence, and the Respondent would have the remaining number of days at the date of the filing of its objections to jurisdiction for the filing of its Counter-Memorial on the merits.

9. On March 14, 2003, the Claimant filed its Memorial on the merits and accompanying documentation.

10. On March 24, 2003, Ms. Claudia Frutos-Peterson, ICSID, Counsel, replaced Mr. Flores as the Secretary of the Tribunal.

11. On April 8, 2003, the parties agreed that the hearing on jurisdiction would take place on January 20-22, 2004, in Washington, D.C.

12. By letter of June 10, 2003, the Argentine Republic requested an extension of time due to the institutional succession in the Argentine Government to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits and/or to raise any objections to the jurisdiction of the Centre until August 4, 2003. By letter of June 18, 2003, the Claimant objected to the extension requested by the Respondent.

13. On June 23, 2003, due to the particular circumstances, the Tribunal granted the extension sought by Argentina and informed the parties that if Argentine filed its Counter-Memorial without objecting to jurisdiction, the Claimant, if requested, would be granted a similar extension of time to file its Reply on the merits. The Tribunal further noted that if the Argentine Republic filed any objections to jurisdiction, the Claimant would have the same number of days used by the Argentine Republic to file such objections for the filing of its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction.

14. On July 1, 2003, Mr. Horacio Daniel Rosatti informed the Tribunal that he had been appointed Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina.

15. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 41(1), on August 4, 2003, the Respondent filed a Memorial raising objections to the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal. In its Memorial on jurisdiction, Argentina requested the Tribunal for a 45 (forty-five) day extension of the time limit to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits in the event that the Tribunal would declare that it has competence over this matter.

16. Pursuant to Arbitration Rule 41(3), on August 7, 2003, the Tribunal suspended the proceedings on the merits.

17. After inviting the Claimant to present any observations on the time limit extension requested by the Respondent, the Tribunal informed the parties on August 21, 2003, that it was premature to decide on the extension of the time limit to file the Counter-Memorial on the merits requested by Argentina.

18. On October 16, 2003, the Claimant filed its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction. On November 17, 2003, the Respondent filed its Reply on jurisdiction.

19. On December 10, 2004, the Respondent requested to postpone the hearing on jurisdiction scheduled for January 20-22, 2004 until February 15, 2004. On December 11, 2004, the Tribunal invited the Claimant to present any observations to the Respondent's request. On the same date, the Claimant presented its observations asking the Tribunal to reject the Respondent's request and to maintain the previous agreed schedule for the hearing on jurisdiction.

20. After considering the Respondent's request to postpone the hearing on jurisdiction, the Claimant's observations thereon, the fact that the development of the proceeding would not be affected due to the brevity of the postponement requested, the availability of the parties, and the agreement of the same to have a two-day hearing, the Tribunal, by letter of December 19, 2003, informed the parties of its decision to schedule the hearing on jurisdiction on February 3 and 4, 2004.

21. On December 24, 2003, the Claimant filed its Rejoinder on jurisdiction.

22. As previously decided by the Tribunal, the hearing on jurisdiction took place in Washington, D.C. on February 3 and 4, 2004. At the hearing, the Claimant was represented by Mr. Guido Santiago Tawil, Mr. Peter Gnam, Mr. Stephan Signer and Ms. María Inés Corrá. Messrs. Tawil and Gnam addressed the Tribunal on behalf of the Claimant. The Respondent was represented by Ms. Andrea Gualde, Ms. Ana Badillos, and Mr. Jorge Barraguirre from the Procuración del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, as well as by Messrs. Osvaldo Siseles from the Ministerio de Economía, and Mr. Roberto Hermida from the Embassy of Argentina in Washington, D.C. Ms. Gualde and Mr. Barraguirre addressed the Tribunal on behalf of the Respondent. During the hearing, the Tribunal also questioned to the parties in accordance with Arbitration Rule 32(3).

23. On July 2, 2004, the Respondent requested to extend its 45-day extension request to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits to 75 days, in the event that the Tribunal would declare that it had jurisdiction.

24. On August 3, 2004, the Tribunal issued its Decision on Jurisdiction, which is part of this Award, declaring that the dispute was within the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal.

25. On that same date, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 1, establishing the timetable for the continuation of the proceeding, after taking into consideration the reasons expressed by the Respondent in its requests for an extension of the time limit to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits and the observations of the Claimant. The timetable was decided as follows: the Respondent was to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits within 60 (sixty) days, counting from the date of that Procedural Order; the Claimant was to file its Reply within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent was to file its Rejoinder within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Reply. Two alternate dates were set for the hearing on the merits, and the parties were asked to inform the Secretariat on the number of days needed for the hearing.

26. On August 10, 2004, both parties requested the hearing on the merits to be held on April 4-15, 2005. Additionally, the Claimant reserved its right to request an extension, if needed, to file its Reply, in the understanding that such an extension should not change the hearing dates already set.

27. On August 16, 2004, Argentina notified the appointment of Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino as Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina.

28. On August 19, 2004, the Tribunal confirmed that the hearing on the merits was to be held on April 4-15, 2005, and that, if needed, the Tribunal would additionally be available on April 18-19, 2005. (Later on the parties confirmed to the Tribunal that there would be no need to extend the hearing to April 18-19, 2005).

29. On September 24, 2004, Argentina requested an additional extension of 15 (fifteen) days of the time limit to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits due to the recent appointment of Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino as Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina. By letter of September 29, 2004, the Claimant objected to the extension requested by the Respondent. After considering the Respondent's request and the Claimant's observations, the Tribunal, by letter also of September 29, 2004, granted the 15 day extension requested by the Respondent to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits, on the understanding that a similar extension, if requested, would be granted to the Claimant, and informed the parties that no further extensions would be authorized. The Tribunal also invited the parties to directly exchange their filings in Buenos Aires to avoid further delays.

30. In accordance with the Tribunal's decision, the Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial on the merits on October 19, 2004. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent requested the production of certain documents by the Claimant: (i) forward contract in US dollars ("dollars or "$"), (ii) financial statements of Siemens IT Services, S.A. ("SITS") from its commencement of business in Argentina, and (iii) financial statements of Siemens for the same period with respect to the registration of all operations transacted between SITS-Siemens and the rest of the affiliates of the Claimant parent corporation. By letter of December 1, 2004, the Claimant informed the Tribunal that it would submit, together with its Reply, a copy of SITS' financial statements for the fiscal years ended September 30 of 1997 to 2003 and the Annual Reports of Siemens for the fiscal years ended September 20 of 1997 to 2003.

31. On December 1, 2004, the Respondent filed an application to disqualify the President of the Tribunal under Article 57 of the Convention. On December 7, 2004, in accordance with Arbitration Rule 9(6), the two co-arbitrators informed the parties that the proceedings were suspended and that the schedule for the parties' submissions and the date for the hearing on the merits were to be maintained.

32. On December 14, 2004, the Claimant requested a 15-day extension to file its Reply on the merits, which was due on December 20, 2004. By letter of December 21, 2004, the two co-arbitrators granted the extension requested by the Claimant, in accordance with the Tribunal's letter of September 29, 2004. Accordingly, the Claimant was to file its Reply on the merits no later than January 4, 2005. The Claimant filed its Reply on the merits on December 27, 2004. However, due to the suspension of the proceedings, the Claimant's Reply was circulated neither to the Tribunal nor to Argentina. After considering several communications exchanged by the parties regarding whether to provide a copy of the Claimant's Reply to the Respondent, the co-arbitrators decided, with the agreement of the parties, that a copy of the Claimant's Reply be delivered directly to the Respondent in Buenos Aires and that the Respondent was to file its Rejoinder within 60 (sixty) days from the receipt of the Claimant's Reply, i.e., no later than March 14, 2005.

33. By letter of February 3, 2005, the co-arbitrators, having considered the parties' request to delay for some days the hearing on the merits, granted such request.

34. On March 2, 2005, the Respondent requested a 15-day extension to file its Rejoinder due to translation difficulties. On March 3, 2005, the Claimant expressed its opposition to granting the extension.

35. On March 10, 2005, the Secretariat sent the parties Judge Brower's and Professor Bello Janeiro's separate opinions concerning Argentina's proposal for disqualification. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 9, the proceeding was to remain suspended pending a decision on the disqualification proposal, and, therefore, the date for the hearing on the merits was postponed indefinitely. In addition, the 15-day extension requested by the Respondent to file its Rejoinder was granted, which was then to be filed no later than March 29, 2005.

36. On March 16, 2005, the Deputy Secretary-General of ICSID informed the parties that in accordance with Article 58 of the ICSID Convention, the Chairman of the Administrative Council was to decide on the Respondent's proposal for disqualification as the other members of the Tribunal were divided on the proposal. In addition, the Deputy Secretary-General also informed the parties that, because the President of the Tribunal had been a staff member of the World Bank and as proceeded in an earlier similar ICSID case, the request would be sent to the Secretary-General of the Permanent Court of Arbitration ("PCA") at The Hague to provide his recommendation on the disqualification proposal.

37. As directed, on March 29, 2005, the Respondent filed its Rejoinder on the merits.

38. On April 8, 2005, the parties were informed that the PCA would not hold a hearing with the parties, as requested by Argentina, but that it had agreed to receive any additional written information from the parties, besides that already filed by them and provided by ICSID to the PCA. Accordingly, the parties were informed on April 11, 2005, that considering Argentina's intention to send such additional information, the decision by the Secretary-General of the PCA on the disqualification proposal was postponed until April 15, 2005. On such a date, the Secretary-General of the PCA sent his recommendation to ICSID. Based on that recommendation, the Secretary-General of ICSID informed the parties on April 15, 2005 that the disqualification proposal was not sustained. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 9, the proceeding was resumed with the composition of the Arbitral Tribunal unchanged.

39. On April 15, 2005, two letters from the Respondent, dated December 7, 2004 and February 25, 2005, that had been received while the proceedings were suspended, were circulated. In its letters, the Respondent insisted on its request for the production of evidence by the Claimant of: (i) a copy of the "forward" contract, and (ii) a copy of SITS' financial statements and Siemens' annual reports for the periods therein indicated. The Respondent also requested a 30-day period for the examination of such documents.

40. On April 18 2005, the Claimant requested that the hearing on the merits be scheduled to take place at the earliest possible time.

41. By letter of April 25, 2005, the Claimant, by invitation of the Tribunal, filed its observations on the Respondent's letters of December 7, 2004 and February 25, 2005.

42. On April 26, 2005, the Tribunal informed the parties that the hearing on the merits would be held on October 10-21, 2005, in Washington, D.C.

43. Between June 7, 2005 and July 28, 2005, the parties exchanged multiple communications regarding the Respondent's document request. The Tribunal granted the Claimant and the Respondent, respectively, time to present observations with respect to the Respondent's document request, as well as with respect to the different documents presented by the Claimant in this regard, (Tribunal's letters of June 7 and 27, 2005, and July 15 and 26, 2005). On September 2, 2005, after taking note of the Respondent's letter of August 17, 2005, objecting to the documents provided by the Claimant in connection with the Respondent's document request, as well as the Claimant's response of August 22, 2005, the Tribunal informed the parties that the information filed by the Claimant was not the information that the Tribunal had requested on July 15, 2005. Consequently, the Tribunal ordered the Claimant to furnish the requested information no later than September 8, 2005.

44. On September 2, 2005, the parties filed a document with their comments on the Tribunal's directives concerning the organization of the hearing on the merits. In addition, the parties requested the Tribunal to fix a time limit in order for the parties to file additional documents to be used during the hearing. According to the agreement of the parties, such documents were to be limited to: (i) new issues brought up by the Respondent, its experts or witnesses in its Rejoinder; (ii) documents in support of the examination of witnesses and experts, and (iii) documents related to events that occurred after the parties' pleadings.

45. As instructed by the Tribunal, on September 9, 2005, the Claimant filed accounting information in connection with Siemens Nixdorf

Informationssysteme A.G. (“SNI”)’s investment in SITS. The Tribunal, by letter of September 12, 2005, invited the Respondent to make any observations on the documents filed by the Claimant no later than September 29, 2005.

46. Between September 9, 2005 and September 15, 2005, in accordance with the Tribunal’s instructions of September 2, 2005, the parties informed the Tribunal of the names of the witnesses and experts that they were planning to examine and cross examine during the hearing as well as their agreement on the order of appearance for the witnesses and experts. (Respondent’s letters of September 9 and September 14, 2006, and Claimant’s letter of September 15, 2006).

47. On September 15, 2005, the Tribunal set September 23, 2005 as a deadline for the parties to object to the additional documents that were to be filed respectively by the Claimant and the Respondent.

48. As instructed by the Tribunal, the parties filed their respective additional documents on September 16, 2005, and on September 21, 2005, the Claimant submitted further information with respect to the capital contributions made by SNI in SITS.

49. On September 27, 2005, following the Tribunal’s invitation of that same date, the Respondent made certain observations with regard to the information filed by the Claimant on September 9 and 21, 2005 in connection with SNI’s investment in SITS.

50. On September 28, 2005, the Claimant rebutted the observations made by the Respondent by letter of September 23, 2005, with regard to the additional documents that had been filed by the Claimant on September 16, 2005.

51. In connection with the Respondent’s observations filed on September 27, 2005, the Claimant, by letter of October 3, 2005, offered, among other things, to submit, if the Tribunal so requested, a copy of SITS’s books related to its expenditures, as well as any other additional documentary information that the Tribunal may consider appropriate.

52. On October 4, 2005, having taken into account the parties’ communications with regard to their additional documents, the Tribunal informed the parties of its decision to: (i) reject certain additional documents filed by the Respondent, which referred to an issue that had been known to the Respondent since 1998, and had not been previously raised; (ii) request explanations from both parties with regard to certain additional documents; (iii) admit other additional documents filed by the Claimant for the reasons stated by the Claimant's letter of September 28, 2005; and (iv) subject the admission of certain exhibits filed by the Claimant to the timely submission of further explanations from the Claimant in such respect. The Tribunal set October 6, 2005 as the deadline for the parties to provide the information therein requested, and the parties did so.

53. By letter of October 4, 2005, the Claimant agreed to the modification of the schedule for the appearance of the witnesses and experts during the hearing requested by the Respondent by a letter of that same date.

54. On October 5, 2005, following the Tribunal's invitation of October 3, 2005, the Respondent filed observations with regard to the Claimant's objections raised on September 30, 2005 to the inclusion of Mr. Claudio Antonio Michalina as a member of Argentina's delegation to the hearing on the merits. According to the Claimant, Mr. Michalina was not part of the legal team, but rather an assistant to one of the Respondent's witnesses, Mr. Daniel Eduardo Martín.

55. All the pending matters raised before the Tribunal were decided on October 7, 2005, before the hearing on the merits took place. The Tribunal ratified the rejection of the Respondent's submission of certain additional documents, because they had been known to the Respondent since 1998. The Tribunal also decided that Mr. Michalina could attend the hearing because each party decides who attends the hearings in its representation. Regarding the Claimant's accounting information requested by the Respondent, the Tribunal decided to accept the information provided by the Claimant, to take note of the Claimant's willingness to submit SITS' accounting books, should the Tribunal need them, and to declare that the Claimant had complied with the filing of the supporting documents in connection with SNI's investment in SITS.

56. On October 7, 2005, the Respondent, referring to the Claimant's letter of September 28, 2005, ratified its objections of September 23, 2005 to the new evidence filed by the Claimant.

57. The hearing on the merits took place on October 10-17, 2005, in Washington, D.C., present at the hearing were:

58. As per request of the Tribunal, the Claimant filed during the hearing SITS's accounting books ("Mayor", "Caja" and "IVA") for the relevant periods.

59. As instructed by the Tribunal, on November 23, 2005, the parties filed their post-hearing briefs.

60. On November 23, 2005, the Respondent filed certain observations concerning the additional accounting information provided by the Claimant during the hearing and, on November 30, 2005, filed a report with accompanying documentation on the accounting documents provided by the Claimant, as well as on "the assessment conducted and Siemens A.G.'s claim for damages". The Respondent's letter of November 23, 2005 was contested by the Claimant on December 21, 2005. The Tribunal invited the Respondent to present any observations on this letter by January 14, 2006.

61. On January 17, 2006, the Claimant noted that the Respondent had not filed observations on the Claimant's letter of December 21, 2005 before the deadline set by the Tribunal, and requested the Tribunal to declare the proceeding closed pursuant to Arbitration Rule 38(1).

62. On January 26, 2006, the Respondent informed the Tribunal that it had not received the Tribunal's letter of December 27, 2005, and rejected the Claimant's request for the closure of the proceeding.

63. On January 30, 2006, the Claimant sent a letter reiterating that the deadline established by the Tribunal for the Respondent to file any observations on its letter of December 27, 2005 had lapsed, and insisted on its request to the Tribunal to declare the proceedings closed.

64. On February 1, 2006, the Respondent sent its observations on the Claimant's letter of December 21, 2005, as well as supporting documentation to justify why they had not received the Tribunal's letter of December 27, 2005.

65. On February 16, 2006, the Tribunal, after considering the Respondent's communications of January 26 and February 1, 2006, and that of the Claimant of January 30, 2006, decided: (i) to accept the explanations given by the Respondent with regard to its delay in filing observations to the Claimant's letter of December 21, 2005; (ii) to admit the Respondent's letter of February 1, 2006; and (iii) to invite the Claimant to make, no later than February 23, 2006, any observations it might have. The Claimant filed its observations on February 17, 2006.

66. On March 1, 2006, the Respondent sent a letter in reply to the Claimant's letter of February 17, 2006, to which the Claimant answered on March 9, 2006. On March 13, 2006, the Tribunal informed the parties of its decision to disregard such communications because they had not been requested by the Tribunal, and the parties had already had several occasions to raise the observations they had deemed pertinent in such regard (Respondent's letters of November 23 and 30, 2005, January 26 and February 1, 2006, and Claimant's letters of December 21, 2005, January 17, 30, and February 17, 2006).

67. On March 31, 2006, the Respondent requested the Tribunal to reconsider its decision of March 13, 2006. On April 13, 2006, the Tribunal confirmed its decision of March 13, 2006 for the reasons there established.

II. The Jurisdiction of the Tribunal

68. Argentina has invited the Tribunal to review its finding on jurisdiction in light of recent decisions in the cases of Plama Consortium Ltd. v. Republic of Bulgaria<sup>1</sup> and Salini Costruttori, S.p.A. & Italstrade, S.p.A. v. Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan<sup>2</sup> on the application of the most-favored-nation clause (“MFN clause”). The Claimant has for its part referred to the decision of the tribunal in Gas Natural SDG S.A. v. the Argentine Republic<sup>3</sup> which reaches similar conclusions as Emilio Agustín Maffezini v. Kingdom of Spain<sup>4</sup> and the Tribunal on the scope of the MFN clause. The Tribunal will not review what it has already decided; it is inappropriate at this stage of the proceedings and the Tribunal has no doubt about its findings. The Tribunal will limit itself to observe that the cases adduced by the Respondent deal with the application of the MFN clause to situations not akin to the instant case. Indeed, in Plama and Salini v. Jordan, tribunals faced extensions of the MFN clause to situations widely different from the facts considered by the Tribunal or for that matter considered in Maffezini or Gas Natural. The Claimant in Salini sought to include, through the application of a MFN clause, an umbrella clause where the basic treaty had none. In Plama, there was no ICSID clause in the basic treaty. There had never been any question that the parties to these proceedings agreed to ICSID jurisdiction and the issue was avoidance, through the MFN clause, of a procedural requirement that Argentina has consistently dispensed within the investment treaties it has concluded since 1994.

III. Applicable Law

1. Positions of the Parties

69. Siemens argues that the Treaty on the Mutual Protection and Promotion of Investments between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Argentine Republic, dated July 9, 1991 (“Treaty”), contains an explicit choice of law in Article 10(5) which mandates the Tribunal to decide the merits of the dispute “on the basis of this Treaty, and, as the case may be, on the basis of other treaties in force between the Contracting Parties, the internal law of the Contracting Party in whose territory the investment was made, including its rules of private international law, and on the general principles of international law”. Siemens then refers to Article 42(1) of the Convention which directs the Tribunal to look first to the rules agreed by the parties. In this case, the rules agreed by the parties are the provisions of the Treaty that constitute a special bilateral regime with respect to the matters regulated by it.

70. Siemens argues further that, in the case of lacunae, general international law applies and it has a corrective role in the sense that it controls and prevails over domestic law. In this respect, Siemens refers to Professor Weil's statement on the relationship between domestic law and international law under Article 42(1) of the Convention, to wit: "[...] no matter how domestic law and international law are combined, under the second sentence of Article 42(1), international law always gains the upper hand and ultimately prevails."<sup>5</sup> Siemens also refers to the Draft Articles on Responsibility of States adopted by the International Law Commission ("ILC") ("Draft Articles"), which state: "The characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful is governed by international law. Such characterization is not affected by the characterization of the same act as lawful by internal law."<sup>6</sup>

71. Siemens contends that this conclusion is reinforced by Article 7(1) of the Treaty which provides:

"If the laws and regulations of either Contracting Party or obligations under international law existing at present or established hereafter between the Contracting Parties in addition to this Treaty contain a regulation, whether general or specific, entitling investments by nationals or companies of the other Contracting Party to a treatment more favorable than is provided for by the Treaty, such regulation shall to the extent that it is more favorable prevail over this Treaty."

Therefore, the Claimant argues that Argentine law may prevail over the provisions of the Treaty only to the extent that it provides treatment to the investment more favorable than the Treaty. Conversely, those provisions of domestic law that may be less favorable are not applicable.

<sup>6</sup> Article 3 of the Draft Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, adopted by the International Law Commission. Claimant's LA No. 49.

72. In any case, according to Siemens, the host State's domestic law is relevant only with respect to factual issues as held by the doctrine and the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") in Case Concerning Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia (Germany v. Poland):

"From the standpoint of International Law and of the Court which is its organ, municipal laws are merely facts which express the will and constitute the activities of States, in the same manner as do legal decisions or administrative measures. The Court is certainly not called upon to interpret the Polish Law as such; but there is nothing to prevent the Court's giving judgment on the question whether or not, in applying that law, Poland is acting in conformity with its obligations towards Germany under the Geneva Convention."<sup>7</sup>

73. Furthermore, Siemens points out that, as held by the Annulment Committee in Compañía de Aguas del Aconquija S.A. and Vivendi Universal v. the Argentine Republic<sup>8</sup> and the tribunal in Técnicas Medioambientales TECMED, S.A. v. the United Mexican States<sup>9</sup>, governmental measures that are lawful under domestic law are not necessarily in conformity with international law. Siemens concludes that domestic law is only relevant as evidence of Argentina's measures and conduct and needs to be analyzed through the lens of international law.

74. Argentina contends that there is no express agreement between the parties as to the law applicable to the dispute and that the Treaty does not indicate the law to be applied and, therefore, the Tribunal should apply the municipal law of Argentina. In this respect, Argentina affirms that the constitutional law of Argentina is the first source of law to be applied, and explains that the Argentine Constitution recognizes the right to property and the right of the State to regulate it provided it is done by law and subject to principles of reasonableness and equality. As further explained by Argentina, these principles mean that restrictions on individual rights must be warranted by the facts and meet a social necessity or convenience and the limitation must be in line with the ends sought. Argentina further points out that, under Article 75(22) of the Constitution, treaties rank above the law and, under Article 27, treaties must conform to the principles of public law set by the Constitution.

75. Argentina draws to the Tribunal's attention that the constitutional reform of 1994 recognized a number of international instruments on human rights to have constitutional rank. Argentina claims that the human rights so incorporated in the Constitution would be disregarded by recognizing the property rights asserted by the Claimant given the social and economic conditions of Argentina.

2. Considerations of the Tribunal

76. The Tribunal has been established under the provisions of the Treaty and the ICSID Convention. Under Article 42(1) of the Convention, the Tribunal is obliged to apply the rules of law agreed by the parties. The Treaty provides that a tribunal established under the Treaty shall decide on "the basis of this Treaty, and, as the case may be, on the basis of other treaties in force between the Contracting Parties, the internal law of the Contracting Party in whose territory the investment was made, including its rules of private international law, and on the general principles of international law." By accepting the offer of Argentina to arbitrate disputes related to investments, Siemens agreed that this should be the law to be applied by the Tribunal. This constitutes an agreement for purposes of the law to be applied under Article 42(1) of the Convention.

77. In regards to the arguments whether international law is referred to in the Treaty or the Convention as a corrective to municipal law or as a filler of lacunae in that law, the Tribunal refers to the finding of the Annulment Committee in Wena Hotels Limited v. Arab Republic of Egypt in the sense that: "The law of the host State can indeed be applied in conjunction with international law if this is justified. So too international law can be applied by itself if the appropriate rule is found in this other ambit.”<sup>10</sup>

78. The Tribunal has found that it has jurisdiction over breaches of the Treaty and will review the conduct of Argentina as a State party to the Treaty in respect of the commitments undertaken in the Treaty. In so doing, and as stated by the Ad Hoc Committee in Vivendi II, the Tribunal’s inquiry is governed by the Convention, by the Treaty and by applicable international law. Argentina’s domestic law constitutes evidence of the measures taken by Argentina and of Argentina’s conduct in relation to its commitments under the Treaty.

79. In any case, the Treaty is not a document foreign to Argentine law. As explained by Argentina, the Constitution and treaties entered into by Argentina with other States are the supreme law of the nation, and treaties have primacy over domestic laws.<sup>11</sup> In this respect, the Tribunal notes the reference made by Argentina to international human rights law ranking at the level of the Constitution after the 1994 constitutional reform and implying that property rights claimed in this arbitration, if upheld, would constitute a breach of international human rights law. This argument has not been developed by Argentina. The Tribunal considers that, without the benefit of further elaboration and substantiation by the parties, it is not an argument that, prima facie, bears any relationship to the merits of this case.

80. The allegations of the parties will require that the Tribunal interpret the Treaty. In this respect and as a general matter, the Tribunal recalls that the Treaty should be interpreted in accordance with the norms of interpretation established by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 (“Vienna Convention”). The Vienna Convention is binding on the parties to the Treaty. Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention requires that a treaty be “interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.”

IV. The Facts

81. On August 26, 1996, Argentina called for bids on the provision of an integral service for the implementation of an immigration control (“the DNM<sup>12</sup> sub-system”), personal identification (“the RNP<sup>13</sup> sub-system”) and electoral information (“the DNE<sup>14</sup> sub-system”) system (“the System” or “the Project”), including the provision of all equipment necessary for data processing and the intercommunication of such equipment, start-up, technical support and maintenance services, and preparation, printing and home delivery of national identity cards (“DNIs”).

82. For the purpose of participating in the bidding, Siemens, acting through SNI, a company legally integrated into Siemens, created SITS, a domestic Argentine company as required by the Bidding Terms and Conditions. SITS was organized as a special purpose company and used by Siemens for the exclusive purpose of investing in the Project.

83. SITS submitted a bid which included, as required by Argentina, a statement declaring that: (i) SNI had been integrated into Siemens since 1992, Siemens being the owner of 100% of SNI’s stock; (ii) SNI was controlled by Siemens, which appointed SNI’s directors and instructed them in relation to SNI’s activities and projects; and (iii) as a result of SNI’s integration into Siemens, the latter was jointly and severally liable for SNI’s obligations towards third parties.

84. Argentina selected SITS’ bid taking into consideration Siemens’ credentials and financial soundness. The contract for the provision of the System (“the Contract”) was awarded to SITS by Decree No. 199/98. The Contract between SITS and Argentina was executed on October 6, 1998 and approved by Decree 1342/98. The Contract took effect on November 21, 1998.

85. The compensation for the services to be provided under the Contract consisted of the price of each DNI issued, including home delivery and DNI updates, the fees for the immigration proceedings processed through the System and the price for printing the voting rolls. All prices in the Contract were denominated in Argentine pesos (“pesos” or “AR$”). At the time, pesos were convertible into dollars at par pursuant to the Convertibility Law.

86. The Contract had a six-year term as from its effective date – November 21, 1998 - and was automatically renewable twice for a three-year term, i.e., for a total of twelve years, unless a notice of intent to the contrary had been given by either party. However, the parties had agreed to give such notice only if the purpose of the Contract had been fully met.

87. The execution of the Project had two stages: a System engineering stage, which consisted of designing the System specifications and acquiring the computer hardware, software and telecommunications networks necessary for its implementation, and a System operation stage, to be managed by the Government. SITS would receive compensation only during this second stage.

88. Production of DNIs was scheduled to begin in August 1999 and extend to the whole country. To this effect, it was necessary for the Argentine government to reach agreements with the Provinces and the City of Buenos Aires (“the External Circuit”).

89. In August 1999, Argentina requested SITS to postpone production of the new DNIs. According to the minutes signed by SITS and the Government, the postponement was due to an extraordinary increase in demand for DNIs because of the short period left before the elections scheduled on October 24, 1999, and to the fear that the introduction of the new mechanisms under such circumstances would burden the public with inconveniences that should be avoided.<sup>15</sup> Thus DNIs production was postponed to October 1, 1999 for foreign residents’ DNIs and November 1, 1999 for Argentine citizens’ DNIs. Production of the respective DNIs started on those dates.

90. In the October election, Mr. Fernando de la Rúa became President-elect. The new authorities took office on December 10, 1999.

91. The DNM sub-system started to operate on February 1, 2000 and its operation was halted on February 2, 2000. On that date, SITS requested an explanation for the interruption. On February 7, SITS was informed that the operation of the sub-system required a governmental authorization. The sub-system continued to be interrupted indefinitely.

---

<sup>15</sup> Minutes dated August 18, 1999, approved by Decree No. 1054/99. Exhibit 40 to the Memorial.

92. On February 24, 2000, Argentina suspended the production, printing and distribution of all new DNIs because, in the case of foreigners' DNIs, the RNP sub-system printed the left thumbprint at the place reserved for the right thumbprint. Argentina prohibited SITS from introducing any modification to the System to correct this problem.

93. These two suspensions occurred in the context of statements made by Government officers to SITS and Siemens in January 2000 to the effect that the Government would seek to renegotiate the DNIs price, and increase the number of free-of-charge DNIs.

94. In March 2000, the Government set up a special commission under the Ministry of the Interior to review the Contract and propose a course of action ("the Commission"). During the negotiations that ensued, Siemens made several proposals and agreement was reached with the Commission on a proposal on November 10, 2000. The Commission sent the negotiated proposal to the Government and the Government gave Siemens a "Contract Restatement Proposal" identical in its terms to the proposal submitted by the Commission for the Government's approval.

95. Siemens' representatives met with the President of Argentina on December 19, 2000. Allegedly he promised to issue the decree approving the negotiated terms of the Contract Restatement Proposal by December 31, 2000. When the decree was not issued, Siemens addressed several notes in February 2001 to the Minister of the Interior expressing concern over the delay.<sup>16</sup> The Minister replied on March 12, 2001 and attributed the delay to the required intervention of controlling agencies.<sup>17</sup>

96. In November 2000, the Argentine Congress approved the Economic-Financial Emergency Law ("the 2000 Emergency Law") which empowered the President to renegotiate public sector contracts. This law became effective two days before the Contract Restatement Proposal was submitted by the Commission to the Minister of the Interior. The Government proposed to include the Contract under the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law and Siemens did not object, in the belief, according to Siemens, that this step would speed up the approval of the Contract Restatement Proposal.

97. The Minister of the Interior was replaced and, in March 2001, the new Minister, Mr. Mestre, claimed to be unaware of the Contract Restatement Proposal. On May 3, 2001, SITS received a new Draft Proposal from the Government which differed from the Contract Restatement Proposal. On May 8, 2001, SITS replied commenting on the new terms, and requesting the exhibits to the proposal which had not been enclosed. The Minister informed Siemens that the new proposal was not negotiable and, on May 18, 2001, the Contract was terminated by Decree 669/01 under the terms of the 2000 Emergency Law. SITS filed an administrative appeal which was rejected by Decree 1205/01.

V. Allegations of the Parties

98. The Tribunal will now describe at length the allegations of the parties as they relate to the facts of the dispute.

1. Memorial

99. In its Memorial, Siemens has framed its claim in the context of the Treaty, the Convertibility Law of 1991, Decree No. 2128/91, and the State Reform Law of 1989. Siemens contends that it entered into the Project based on the assurance of the authorities' commitment and the legal security framework provided by these instruments.

100. Siemens explains that significant investments were made during 1999 and further investments were made in 2000, due to Argentina's requirements as a prerequisite for resuming income-generating operations, for an aggregate amount of $284 million up to May 18, 2001. Additional expenses exceeding $9.1 million were incurred after termination of the Contract and until September 2002.

101. Siemens claims that the following results were achieved:

- (i) as regards the DNM sub-system, establishment of the immigration information center, and the immigration flows and border control systems at three locations; the Government first hindered this component from becoming operational and later hindered its functioning, but Argentina has nonetheless benefited from better processing, follow-up and control of immigration proceedings, and the generation of single, non-duplicate files for each alien, containing all identification data, which reduced tampering possibilities;
- (ii) as regards the RNP sub-system, the engineering stage was completed by August 1999 and it became operational by August 19, 1999, the electronic loading of the Remaining Human Potential File (“Back Record Conversion” or “BRC”) was performed (by December 1999, 45.8 million individual records had been digitalized), an ID personalization center was completed, hardware and software were acquired, buildings were fitted, the communications network was implemented, training courses were held, more detailed and demanding System applications were developed, and a pilot test not required under the Contract was performed. However, because of the measures taken by Argentina, only 3,189 DNIs were issued over a period of 147 days as opposed to 12,000 DNIs foreseen as the initial daily average;
- (iii) as regards the DNE sub-system, the electoral information component was completed by August 1999, and SITS carried out the processing, printing and distribution of provisional lists and final voting rolls for the national elections of October 24, 1999; and
- (iv) physical and IT security equipment and technical support were provided by SITS to the three implementation agencies.

102. Siemens explains that the investments were financed through capital contributions by Siemens through SNI in the amount of $27 million, through loans made by one of the wholly owned subsidiaries or in minor amounts by local financial institutions (later refinanced by Siemens directly or through SNI and totaling approximately $242 million), and through non-financial funding by the Siemens Group in the amount of $15 million approximately up to May 18, 2001. Siemens further explains that the investments were exclusively applied to the Project since SITS was a special purpose company used by Siemens only for the execution of the Project.

103. Siemens alleges that, during the first year of the Contract, Argentina failed to make budgetary provision for the obligations it had undertaken under the Contract, to provide facilities for Project development, to assign appropriate personnel to fill the different positions and take the corresponding training courses. Siemens also alleges that Argentina delayed approval of the Functional Operational Model (“FOM”) during seven months notwithstanding its relevance, failed to execute with the provincial authorities the agreements to carry out production of the new DNIs throughout the country, failed to adopt the measures necessary to replace the existing DNIs by those issued through the System, and failed to discontinue the manual system of issuing DNIs. Siemens observes that these breaches of the contractual obligations were noted by the independent auditor hired by the Government.

104. Siemens recalls that in the context of these failures, in August 1999, Argentina requested SITS, on account of the October elections, to postpone commencement of the new DNIs production until October 1, 1999 for foreign residents and November 1, 1999 for Argentine citizens. Later Argentina requested that the discontinuation of the old DNIs be postponed to November 30, 1999, except for certain jurisdictions for which a new deadline of January 31, 2000 was established.

105. According to Siemens, after the October elections, the new authorities failed to make budgetary provision for the second year of the Project and to enter into agreements with the provincial authorities. Argentina also delayed providing the technical definitions essential to complete the immigration component and, as a result, it did not start to operate until February 1, 2000.

106. Siemens refers to the suspension of the DNM sub-system on February 2, 2000, allegedly because of lack of authorization to operate the sub-system given that public funds were at issue. According to Siemens, the requirement of such authorization was not provided for in the Contract and was not required for the border control component of the DNM sub-system. Siemens alleges that SITS never got an adequate response and was never paid for the documents actually processed.

107. Regarding the suspension of production of DNIs on February 24, 2001, Siemens affirms that this is a technical inconsistency that could have been quickly solved by modifying one sentence in the printing software. Siemens recalls that Article 17 of the Contract established a procedure in the event that errors were detected but, instead of respecting it, the Argentine authorities prohibited SITS from introducing any correction while the Contract was in effect.

108. According to Siemens, since January 2000 the newly elected authorities had made public announcements reported in the press indicating their intention to renegotiate the Contract to obtain a reduction in the DNI price, a larger number of free DNIs and a postponement of the discontinuation of the manual system. Siemens submits that the actions taken in February 2000 by Argentina suspending the two income-generating activities of the Project had the objective of pressuring SITS to re-negotiate the Contract at the point at which most of the investment for the Project had been made.

109. Siemens explains that, during the renegotiation of the Contract with the Commission from March to November 2000, each proposal made by SITS was rejected and resumption of the operation of the System was subject to ever more demanding economic concessions. In November 2000, as explained by Siemens, the parties agreed on the basic terms on which the Contract would be reinstated and the immediate System operation would be resumed, namely, a $5 reduction in the price of the DNIs (in part to be compensated by a $3 increase in airport passengers' fees to be passed on to SITS), an increase in the annual free-of-charge DNIs from 75,000 to 250,000, and a reduction in the immigration and voting roll printing fees. Siemens draws to the attention of the Tribunal that the Ministry of Finance authorities opined favorably on the new terms as also did the RNP, DNM and DNE. The restated terms were set forth in the Contract Restatement Proposal provided by the Government to Siemens on November 30, 2000 with the understanding that this proposal would now be formalized by the Government.

110. Siemens explains that the 2000 Emergency Law was published on November 21, 2000 and that, in order to facilitate the approval of the terms agreed, the Commission proposed to include the Contract under the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law in a note to the Minister of the Interior dated November 23, 2000.<sup>18</sup> The Minister declared the Contract subject to the 2000 Emergency Law by Resolution No. 1779 of December 6, 2000.<sup>19</sup>

111. Siemens alleges that, when in March 2001 a new Minister of the Interior was appointed, he claimed to be unaware of the agreement reached between the two parties and the undertaking made by the President. The new Minister ordered, on April 6, 2001, the inclusion in the administrative file of the minutes, dated October 30, 2000, of a meeting of Directors of Provincial Registry Offices rejecting the Contract continuation. According to Siemens, he also instructed Sindicatura General de La Nación (“SIGEN”), RPN, DNM and DNE to re-analyze matters related to the Contract and these agencies reached different conclusions from when they reviewed the Contract Restatement Proposal.

112. Siemens refers to the new Draft Proposal presented to Siemens on May 3, 2001 with terms significantly different from those negotiated, mainly, reduction of the number of DNIs to be issued to almost one half as it did the effective term of the Contract, and elimination of the obligation to discontinue issuance of the old DNIs. Siemens points out that the exhibits referred to in the Proposal were not furnished to SITS. According to Siemens, the only purpose of this proposal was to trigger a rejection and create an excuse to terminate the Contract. In its Reply on May 8, Siemens recalled that the parties had already reached an agreement and certain aspects had already been implemented, and that the changes indicated above were unacceptable because they changed completely the economic-financial equation, and requested the missing exhibits to complete the evaluation. The Minister responded immediately indicating that failure to accept such proposal as a whole would result in early termination of the Contract. In fact, even when the proposal was presented to Siemens as a draft, the instruction of the Minister was that the Proposal was to be notified for acceptance or rejection.<sup>20</sup>

113. Siemens argues that such a proposal was only an illegitimate tool to avoid liability for frustrating the Contract. In this respect, inter alia, Siemens points out a number of irregularities in the proceedings for the Contract termination, such as the failure to obtain the Ministry of Economy's consent to subject the Contract to the 2000 Emergency Law and factual inaccuracies, e.g. the covering letter from the Minister of the Interior to the President submitting Decree 669/01 stated that the Contract costs were beyond the capabilities of the Government notwithstanding that there were no supporting budgetary reports and in November 2000 the Ministry of Economy had opined otherwise,<sup>21</sup> and the Government had approved the budget for the proposed restated terms of the Contract which in turn had been approved by Congress on December 12, 2000 and the President on December 29, 2000.<sup>22</sup> Siemens also points out that said letter reports errors in the System without supporting evidence (errors which were disregarded by the President), it uses the Provinces' opposition to the Project notwithstanding that the Contract was undertaken by Argentina itself within its exclusive powers,<sup>23</sup> and it exaggerates deliberately the costs based on RPN's analysis.

114. Siemens points out that the Contract was terminated on the sole grounds of the 2000 Emergency Law, which termination was ratified by Decree No. 1205/01 rejecting SITS's appeal against Decree 669/01. Siemens recalls that Argentina denied SITS access to the administrative file for purposes of filing the appeal and presenting evidence in support of its claims. Siemens alleges that the administrative file was not made available until Siemens reported the secret handling of the file and Siemens had filed the claim under the Treaty. After Contract termination, Siemens claims that Argentina caused delays in the transfer and reception of equipment and in the assessment of the compensation, and never returned the performance bond, which had lost its purpose once Argentina terminated the Contract unilaterally. According to Siemens, SITS continued to provide technical support, train personnel as agreed in cases of Contract termination, assigned to the Government ownership of the computer hardware, the installed communications equipment and fittings and the non-exclusive licenses for use of application software, and requested the Ministry of the Interior to arrange for the transfer of the satellite links.

115. Siemens points out the passivity of the Government during the months that followed the termination of the Contract and that in November 2001, the Ministry of the Interior called the SITS' sub-contractors to conduct a test and assess the possibility of resuming production of the DNIs without Siemens. According to Siemens, the tests conducted in Casa de Moneda were satisfactory and Casa de Moneda proposed to produce DNIs through the System provided by SITS.

2. Counter-Memorial

116. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina alleges that Siemens raised false expectations by the statements made in the bid for the Contract. Siemens had stressed its experience and that of its sub-contractors in high-performance secure systems to meet automated data and image-capturing requirements for issuing passports, foreign resident documents, drivers licenses, visas, frequent traveler cards, health plan cards and DNIs, but in reality neither Siemens nor SNI had been involved in projects of a similar size because no country in the world had undertaken a project of the complexity, size and significance of the Project. According to Argentina, Siemens and SNI lacked the technical expertise to provide a comprehensive service involving the operation and support of a secure and reliable personal identification, migration control and electoral information system.

117. As regards Siemens' claim that Argentina delayed the approval of the FOM and it is at fault for the non-implementation of the External Circuit,

Argentina argues that Siemens presents a traditional notion of contracts with the parties' obligations bearing a relationship of interdependence and does not take into account the particularities and complexities surrounding the procurement of information technology products and services. Argentina explains that the Contract is a turnkey information technology contract including tailored software development and it is inevitable that there will be some uncertainty as to the actual completion date of the work.

118. Argentina alleges that in this type of contract the reporting and advisory duties of the information technology service provider and product supplier play a key role in maintaining the balance between the parties. Argentina recognizes that it received assistance from technical personnel who participated in the guideline-setting stages for the technical definition of the System, but this is not sufficient, argues Argentina, to eliminate the imbalance in technical expertise level between the parties.

119. As regards the approval of the FOM, Argentina describes how, a few days before the deadline for the presentation of the FOM, it requested SITS to deliver the working papers so that RNP's technical staff could advance with the examination of the FOM. SITS never provided the documentation requested. Argentina refers to a number of communications sent to SITS that show the delay in the acceptance of the FOM by Argentina was due to inconsistencies in the FOM proposed by SITS. To further support its argument, Argentina refers to two reports prepared by RNP on the weaknesses of the FOM submitted by SITS and the security of the FOM. In brief terms, several items in the FOM submitted by SITS did not comply with applicable law, were defined on a general or incomplete basis, or failed to provide specifications for the security, audit, and quality and management control of the System. Argentina infers from the foregoing that SITS' technical qualifications were not sufficient to perform the Contract and that it used the Project to gain experience.

120. As regards the External Circuit, Argentina explains that SITS and Argentina through RNP agreed that the proposed model could not be implemented as described in the Contract and SITS was requested to design an External Circuit taking into account the following general guidelines: (i) flexible terms for a gradual regional implementation; (ii) installation of computers in the Manual Data Capture Centers under the charge of SITS to facilitate form scanning; (iii) set-up of scanning and quality control centers in every provincial capital, for purposes of resolving any possible rejection of the applications in the applicant's location; and (iv) the maintenance by the contractor of the investment levels that had originally been agreed.

121. Argentina further explains that it is not surprising that the Provinces were not interested in signing framework agreements for the External Circuit since they were not advantageous from an economic point of view; under them, the Provinces would receive lower compensation while the expenses they had to incur for the System to work efficiently were higher. Argentina also refers to the nature of its federal system of government where the Government cannot oblige the Provinces to enter into agreements to cooperate in the performance of functions that belong to the Federal Government.

122. Argentina argues that SITS was aware of the circumstances of the country, it had admitted that the design of the External Circuit was not consistent with the social reality of Argentina and it was necessary to do a comprehensive review of the design, the External Circuit could not be implemented until the FOM was approved on condition that SITS fulfilled certain requirements, and, in the agreement signed between Argentina and SITS on November 26, 1999, the Coordinator of the Project at RNP and the SITS' Project Director were empowered to introduce amendments to the System set-up schedules and in the size of the Electronic Data Capture Centers.

123. Argentina also argues that, given the long presence of Siemens in the country and as a product and service provider to the public sector, SITS should have been aware of the political issues that would necessarily have an impact on the performance of some stages of the Contract and compliance with its obligations.

124. Argentina alleges that data capture for the External Circuit could not be set up in the Provinces because of the suspension of manufacturing, printing and distribution of DNIs on February 24, 2000. Argentina alleges also non-compliance by SITS with its obligation to deposit the source codes in escrow and transfer them to the Government upon completion of the Contract. Argentina affirms that without the source codes it could not properly operate the System after termination of the Contract. Furthermore, Argentina had detected errors in the System and the source codes were necessary to correct SITS' work.

125. Argentina contends that, contrary to Siemens' claim that Argentina did not comply with the schedule provided for in the Contract to cease issuing DNIs manually, SITS had agreed to reformulate the terms of the Contract applicable to begin issuing new DNIs and consented to the extension of the term for the discontinuation of manual DNI issuance.

126. Argentina explains that the Contract did not amend the law regulating when DNIs are issued and updated. The law requires that a DNI be issued when a baby is born and this document is updated when the child reaches school age. Then a photograph is added to the identity document and the right thumb fingerprint is stamped on the document. This DNI is replaced when a person turns sixteen and a new photograph is taken. Then this DNI is updated when a person turns thirty. In order to determine whether the Project was economically advantageous, SITS should have calculated the number of DNIs that had to be replaced.

127. According to Argentina, the RNP sub-system was the most important undertaking since the revenues it would generate would guarantee the expected return on the investment made by Siemens, and it was precisely in the design of this sub-system that SITS failed to comply with its obligations. On February 23, 2000, the RNP head of the Aliens Division reported that federal police officers had discovered that on two DNIs belonging to foreigners the fingerprint was incorrectly identified, e.g., the left thumbprint was identified as the right thumbprint. Argentina explains that the technical report states that the fingerprint experts verified that the fingerprints had been correctly taken by RNP staff. The head of the RNP Aliens Division concluded that the error was in the design of the System which was entrusted exclusively to the Claimant, which defeated the purpose of implementing an information technology system to avoid the risk of human error.

128. Argentina contests that Article 17 of the Contract was applicable in that situation. Argentina explains that such article is intended to regulate the parties' conduct in the event of any possible physical error of the identity document and not an error involving the inappropriate design.

129. Argentina then turns to the 2000 Emergency Law and points out that this law provided that the events of force majeure foreseen in sections 53 and 54 of Law No. 13,064 were considered to have occurred, that within 30 days the Government should determine the contracts subject to the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law, that government contracts would not be terminated if the continuation of the works or the performance of the contract was possible on the basis of the "shared sacrifice" principle, and that compensation payable in the case of those contracts revoked on grounds of convenience, merit and advisability would not include lost profit or unproductive expenses.

130. Argentina further points out that in no circumstances did the Contract entail the privatization of the System's operation and that the goal of the Commission established by Resolution No. 263/00 was to find a solution ensuring the continuity of the Contract given the crisis in Argentina. Argentina explains the doctrine of unforeseeability that would apply in the emergency situation:

"There is certainly no obligation for the Government to compensate the contractor as the events causing the contractual imbalance are totally beyond the Government's control. There is nothing that would prevent the strict and specific application of the contract provisions and thus the termination of the contract [...] However, no benefit for the public interest can be derived from this situation; quite the contrary, the public interest will not be satisfied by the abrupt interruption of the service provision. Thus, the doctrine of unforeseeability or unforeseeable risk may be applied to these cases. According to the doctrine, the Government has to provide assistance to the concessionaire, sharing the risks that unpredictability might have arisen for purposes of avoiding a total collapse of the licensed service.”<sup>24</sup>

131. Argentina further explains that it is obliged to revoke a public contract when the public need that would be satisfied by the contract disappeared or new public demands require that it be terminated. Revocation by reason of public interest is one of the cases of a Government’s liability for lawful actions and entails the obligation to compensate the contractor whose individual right is sacrificed for the sake of the public, but compensation shall not include lost profits or unproductive expenses.

132. Argentina disputes Siemens’ affirmation that the Government took advantage of the passing of the 2000 Emergency Law allegedly to accelerate the implementation of the agreement concluded with Siemens. Argentina explains that it is correct that SITS participated in the report prepared by the Commission, but it is not correct that such report had to be considered by the Government and SITS as a formal and final renegotiation proposal. According to Argentina, the report was an initial contract renegotiation proposal which included the Contractor’s point of view.

133. Argentina also questions the position taken by Siemens in respect of the role of SIGEN and its refusal to furnish the cost structure of SITS’ services. According to Argentina, SIGEN was unable to determine the reasonableness of compensation to SITS because it had not access to conclusive information about the cost of the services. Argentina disputes the allegation that the reduction of the original DNIs price reflected SITS’ share of the sacrifice to continue with implementation of the Contract. Argentina recalls in this respect that Article 4.6.2 of the Contract required disclosure of SITS’ cost structure where extraordinary and unforeseeable events materially and adversely affect the original economic and financial equation of the Contract.

134. Argentina also takes issue with the characterization by the Claimant of the 2000 Emergency Law as an instrument devised to hurt the Claimant. Argentina also contests the truthfulness of the assertion by Siemens that it has been penalized by pursuing this arbitration and lists a number of public sector contracts won by Siemens in recent years. According to Argentina, Siemens continued to do business with the Government and with other public sector players and provided new services after the termination of the Contract.

135. Argentina describes the steps involved in the reception of SITS' assets to justify the delay, which it also ascribes to lack of cooperation by SITS at that stage. Indeed, according to Argentina, SITS refused to participate in the asset verification process because the inventories already submitted by SITS included all necessary specifications for asset identification. In fact, according to Argentina, SITS' inventories in most cases referred to total quantities without a breakdown that would permit actual verification of the assets' existence and their relevance to the System. Argentina claims that, in contrast, the Notary General's Office recorded the asset verification proceedings, including a list of the assets present in the various agencies belonging to the System and unequivocal information regarding each and every asset.<sup>25</sup>

136. Argentina also refers to the issue of the verification of certain computer equipment stored at the Siemens National Route 8 plant in San Martin County in the Province of Buenos Aires. Argentina claims that the Government was only informed of the existence of such equipment in a presentation made by SITS to the Asset Reception Committee on September 4, 2001. Argentina explains the difficulties that this revelation presented for the Government as, among other matters, it was uncertain whether these assets were part of the assets to be transferred under Article 10.7 of the Contract and, if they were, it was unclear whether or not the Government should actually receive them because of SITS' refusal to transfer title to those assets until payment was made to SITS. The Asset Reception Committee decided to accept the National Route 8 assets on December 17, 2001 and that on December 20, 2001, both parties should agree on a procedure to receive them. The serious events that happened on that date led to the worst ever political and institutional crisis in Argentina, but once the new authorities were in place in Argentina, the Asset Reception

137. Then Argentina describes the performance tests of the various sub-systems at RPN, DNE and DNM and affirms that in all three cases the technicians concluded that the sub-systems were not operative. Argentina explains that SITS was invited to attend the tests but refused the invitation. Furthermore, the tests had to be carried out without access to the source codes that SITS should have turned over to Argentina at Contract termination. According to Argentina, without the source codes it was not possible to determine the degree of progress by SITS regarding the purpose of the Contract and it was not possible to conduct an accurate appraisal.

138. Argentina provides the breakdown of the appraisal conducted by the TTN, which in the aggregate amounts to AR$71,735,510, and explains that the items appraised would be valuable only if, among other matters, SITS would deliver the source codes, the licenses for basic software and databases, and the use of SITS’ software licenses. Argentina reports that the TTN pointed out that it was not certain that all licenses could be transferred as their respective contracts did not provide for such possibility.

139. As regards the performance bond, Argentina argues that it ends on termination of the Contract, provided that the Contractor has fulfilled its obligations under the Contract, which has not been the case. Argentina in this respect particularly emphasizes the fact that the source codes and the software licenses have not been delivered by SITS to the Government.

3. Reply

140. In its Reply, the Claimant notes that Argentina recognizes the fundamental facts of the case and the events that frustrated Siemens’ investment. The Claimant takes issue with the argument that Argentina was the weaker party because of an alleged technology gap. The Claimant points out this cannot be true when Argentina had designed the Bidding Terms and Conditions, defined the characteristics of the service, and reserved the right to control and manage the tasks during Contract performance.

141. Siemens disputes that there was a mutually agreed renegotiation process. According to Siemens, the Government took advantage of the sunk cost of Siemens' investment to impose a renegotiation process not provided for in the Contract. Siemens also questions the arguments based on security concerns. Siemens first points out that lack of security or reliability of the System was not the subject of any discussion between the parties during the performance of the Contract, that these arguments were developed after the Contract termination, and that the only audit report issued during the term of the Contract on the security of the System was submitted to the authorities by the external security auditor appointed by the Government, which audit report concluded that the System reasonably complied with the security standards required by the Contract. According to Siemens, this is confirmed by the termination of the Contract with no finding of fault on the part of the Contractor (Decree 669/01) and the ratification of the termination in September 2001 after the SIGEN reports had been issued (Decree 1205/01).

142. Siemens also points out that the security concerns of the old system which motivated the tender (Decree 1310/94) for a new system are still valid, while the security and reliability of the System was never questioned before this arbitration. Siemens surmises that if the real concern had been security, then the logical course of action would have been to allow the Contract's performance, instead of discontinuing the Project and preserving the system that caused the documentary emergency from which Argentina is still suffering.

143. Siemens argues that Argentina distorts reality and deliberately intends to confuse the situation that led to the passage of the 2000 Emergency Law with the economic and political crisis that resulted in the enactment of Emergency Law No. 25,561 in 2002. Siemens explains that, contrary to the description made by Argentina, the 2000 Emergency Law only declared the fiscal accounts in emergency and empowered the new administration to repudiate certain contracts concluded by its predecessor. According to Siemens, the emergency was not related to "extraordinary and unforeseeable" events unrelated to the State as claimed by Argentina, because public deficits fail to meet such qualifications: the events that led to the enactment of the 2000 Emergency Law were attributable exclusively to the State itself.

144. Siemens contests Argentina's allegations regarding its technical qualifications. Siemens recalls that in the bidding process SITS was allocated the best ratings in terms of experience in the implementation and or administration of the System, and in project integration and capacity to handle the Project. Siemens recalls that Argentina holds Siemens in such high regard that it has repeatedly requested its intervention in other public projects, even after the Contract's termination.

145. Siemens dismisses Argentina's allegations regarding defects in the Contract and recalls that, in compliance with Decree No. 1310/94, the Ministry of the Interior approved the Bidding Terms of Conditions through Resolution No. 2183/96, stating in the whereas clauses that RPN, DNM, DNE, the Ministry of the Interior, the Attorney General's office and SIGEN had been involved in their preparation. RPN, DNM and DNE prepared reports for the Technical Evaluation Committee which concluded: "it may be inferred from the technical reports received, from which contents this Committee finds no reasons to depart,"<sup>26</sup> that the bidders have complied with all the provisions referring to the items and amounts tendered, and that "it is appropriate to share the conclusions reached by the Technical Agencies consulted [RNP, DNM, DNE], that SIEMENS IT's rating is 13.03% higher than the rating [...]."<sup>27</sup> Furthermore, it is Siemens' contention that:

"Only Argentina was in a position to identify its own political, economic and social needs involved in the System. It was also the one that had the duty to set the requirements consistent with its own capabilities and limitations. Contrary to its claims, it was Argentina and not the Contractor that had the duty to inform its contractual party of the economic, political or social limitations that could be encountered in the design, implementation and subsequent development of the Project."<sup>28</sup>

146. As regards the delayed approval of the FOM and the allegation by Argentina that SITS lacked the technical capacity to perform the Contract, Siemens asserts that the reasons that delayed FOM approval were not of a technical nature that could be ascribed to SITS, but originated in the indolent attitude of the Government and its lack of cooperation with SITS.

147. Siemens contests the presentation made by Argentina on the failure of implementing the External Circuit and the implication that it was Siemens that designed this circuit and determined its need. According to Siemens, the model incorporating the External Circuit was created by Argentina taking into account the country's geographical extent and the rules applicable to its personal identification and registration activity. Furthermore, Argentina has justified not making the necessary budget allocations on the basis of ignorance of the characteristics required for the buildings allocated to the External Circuit. Siemens claims that this is not a valid reason because Argentina had all the information to purchase the properties and prepared a budget estimate months later when the System was paralyzed.

148. As regards the failure to discontinue the production of the old manually produced DNIs, Siemens recalls that the "cut-over" criterion was a basic commitment of Argentina under the Contract and an essential component of the Project, that, in any case, Argentina did not meet the new deadlines agreed reluctantly by SITS, and that the error detected by the police occurred several months after the original date of the "cut-over" and after the new deadlines.

149. Siemens contends that the decision to suspend the for-profit-operations of the System were arbitrary. In the case of the fingerprint error, Siemens insists that it originated in a mistaken software sentence found in the programming of one of the applications. According to Siemens, SITS acknowledged the error and offered to correct it immediately, but the Government decided to suspend provisionally the processing of DNIs for Argentine nationals and foreigners throughout the System. The decision remained in effect until the termination of the Contract.

150. Siemens contests the interpretation given by Argentina to Article 17 of the Contract. This Article does not distinguish between design errors and errors related to individual documents; it simply refers to a DNI that may have errors resulting from any cause, whether attributable to SITS or the Government.

151. Siemens recalls that the services provided by SITS to the DNM and DNE were accepted by the relevant agencies and that, in the case of the DNM sub-system, its operation was suspended because of the alleged lack of formal authorization for the launch of the sub-system after one day of operation and not because of the flaws that Argentina now points out, supported by a report of SIGEN of September 2001, four months after termination of the Contract and eighteen months after the suspension of the sub-system operation. According to Siemens, the sub-system is in use by DNM to this date.

152. Siemens questions the use of the technical studies presented by Argentina in this arbitration when the Government did not consider that SITS had committed breaches to allow the Contract's termination, nor did it ever notify SITS of the serious breaches now invoked in accordance with the procedures provided for in the Contract, nor imposed any sanctions whatsoever based on the alleged inconsistencies of the System. According to Siemens, SIGEN produced its reports months after the System had started to operate with express approval of RPN, and after the authorities had already decided to terminate the Contract. Siemens claims that Argentina did not convey the reports or their recommendations to SITS or Siemens and refers to Article 10.2 of the Contract, which provides that:

“Following Systems implementation, but prior to their being put into operation, the security and high degree of inviolability of the Systems shall be tested and certified by a world-class auditor appointed by mutual agreement of the parties. The inexistence of observations from the State's Security Officer shall imply the acceptance of the Systems' security and inviolability test results.”

153. Siemens affirms that the only auditing reports provided for in the Contract determined the reasonable accomplishment of the System's security standards, including the initial stage, SITS' compliance with its contractual obligations, and the Government's non-compliance with theirs. Siemens points out that these reports were ignored by the Government and excluded from the administrative files, probably, Siemens surmises, because their outcome was deemed unfavorable to Argentina.

154. Siemens recalls that two months prior to the creation of the Commission, and days before the suspension of for-profit operations, the new authorities declared publicly before informing SITS of their intentions that the Contract had to be reviewed. Siemens also recalls that the technical aspects were irrelevant in the discussions to renegotiate the Contract, and that the issues discussed were limited to the reduction in the number of DNIs, migration proceedings prices, the redesign of the External Circuit, the progressive discontinuance of the manual system as opposed to the "cut-over", an increase in the amount of free-of-charge DNIs, etc. Siemens submits that these were not "external circumstances" or an "extraordinary and unforeseeable event that materially affected the equilibrium of the relationship", but reflected the opposition of the new Administration to the obligations undertaken by its predecessor. Siemens notes that, with a high degree of political opportunism, the Government took advantage of the fact that by then most of the investment for the Project had been made.

155. Siemens questions the correctness of the ius variandi as understood by Argentina. First, Siemens refers to the acknowledgement by Argentina that the power of the Government to vary the terms may be exercised only to the extent to which the economic balance of the contract is preserved. However, Siemens points out that Argentina neglects to mention the limitations to the ius variandi. Indeed, the authority of the State to modify the terms and conditions of the contract does not affect those provisions pertaining to compensation and financial advantages, since it would be contrary to the principle of good faith and to business security to allow the State to modify the contract unilaterally and reduce compensation. Siemens refers to the limitations imposed by the Argentine Constitution and law, in particular the property safeguard (Article 17 of the Constitution), the proportionality principle (Article 28 of the Constitution), the pacta sunt servanda rule (Article 1197 of the Civil Code) and the principle of good faith (Article 1198 of the Civil Code).

156. Siemens argues that, when Argentina called for foreign investment to carry out its public sector transformation in 1990, Argentina assumed that some of the legal features of the public contract could discourage investors and deliberately self-limited its public powers and prerogatives. Siemens points out that one of the most important limitations was directed at preventing the unilateral modification or termination of contracts, even if ostensibly in the ‘public interest.’<sup>29</sup> Thus Article 33.6 of the Contract provides that, “Any change or amendment to this Contract shall be agreed upon by the parties and set forth in writing.” Article 26.1 limits early termination by the State to cases of SITS’ fault, and Article 3.5.2 limits early termination by the State until all existing DNIs issued as of the date of the Contract had been replaced.

157. Siemens submits that “if the State does not comply with the previously described limitations, it would be in breach of its duties and it should be accountable for its wrongful acts by fully compensating the contractor for having deprived it of its vested rights and/or having frustrated its legitimate expectations (as appropriate).”<sup>30</sup> Siemens also points out that Argentina does not specify any new events that would justify a different assessment of the public interest as it was when the Contract was awarded; a change of Administration is not a valid legal ground. The renegotiation of the Contract was initiated, not as an exercise of Argentina’s discretionary powers, but as an attempt to depart from its contractual obligations.

158. Siemens insists that there was “no mutual will to renegotiate following a change in circumstances, but a coerced process involving substantial alterations of the initial conditions to the detriment of SITS, strongly conditioned by the fact that – the investment already being made – the State suspended the operations of the income generating systems [sub-systems] [...]”<sup>31</sup>

159. Siemens recalls the Argentine Supreme Court constitutionality test for emergency measures that restrict individual rights, namely, they may last only as long as necessary to allow the cause of the measures to disappear, and “Even where a more intense exercise of police power is recognized in emergency circumstances, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that an individual’s own property cannot be taken without a declaration of public use and prior compensation.”<sup>32</sup> The application of the 2000 Emergency Law to terminate the Contract was a political decision and not, as alleged by Argentina, the result of events “absolutely alien and independent from the administrative activity.”<sup>33</sup>

160. Siemens contends that the disclosure of SITS’ cost structure was necessary only at a later stage and points out that, during the 14 months of negotiations prior to SIGEN’s report in March 2001, this issue was never raised. Furthermore, the Contract was based on a price cap and the cost to Argentina did not depend on SITS’ cost structure, the conditions of Article 4.6.2 of the Contract had not been met and the 2000 Emergency Law did not trigger them, and even the Draft Proposal of May 2001 did not require any disclosure.

161. Siemens notes that there was no “shared sacrifice” and that the burden was exclusively on SITS is particularly evident in the May 2001 Draft Proposal intended to provoke a rejection from SITS and to justify the termination of the Contract on the basis of the 2000 Emergency Law. Siemens asserts that its reply to the proposal was not a rejection, but that it only insisted on the need to reach a solution that would respect the parties’ rights and previous commitments, and requested the missing annexes for a correct assessment of the proposal.

162. Siemens recalls that the new Minister of the Interior ordered new reports from RNP, DNM and DNE and that these agencies issued reports in April 2001 that differ from those issued in December 2000, particularly in the case of RNP. The proposal of May 2001 shows that technical issues were not relevant and the disclosure of the cost structure was not required by the State at the time of formulating such proposal. The State had not required it as a condition of the

Contract when it was awarded nor was it part of the November 2000 Contract Restatement Proposal.

163. Siemens points out that it was denied access to the administrative file until August 2001 –three months after termination of the Contract – and then it realized that: the file had been started on December 13, 2000, it included documents dated from as early as January 2000, and reports favorable to the Contract's continuation were absent. According to Siemens, such reports apparently had been included in the file and then removed without indicating the reason; notably, the SWIPCO reports were missing and were also ignored in the Counter-Memorial.

164. Siemens then refers to the contracts that Argentina has reported in the Counter-Memorial to have been terminated under the 2000 Emergency Law to respond to the claim of discrimination, and argues that these contracts were not comparable, that main contracts involving foreign investments had been formally excluded, that most of them had been renegotiated and not terminated and that the two public works terminated were in the end terminated because of the contractors' fault. Siemens points out that a passport contract between a local company and the State is not included in the list presented by Argentina, and was not subject to the 2000 Emergency Law notwithstanding how expensive it was.

165. Siemens claims that, after termination of the Contract, the behavior of Argentina was as arbitrary as before, namely, it denied access of SITS to the administrative file, subjected SITS' compensation to the performance and to the physical tests of the System after it had been in the power of the State since its transfer and over which SITS had lost control a long time before, excluded SITS from the tests at Casa de Moneda, and issued reports unfavorable to SITS without notifying SITS or including them in the administrative file. Siemens claims that Argentina's lack of good faith is confirmed by bringing before this Tribunal a large number of contractual breaches absent any actual decision of the Government pertaining to the Contract.

166. Siemens affirms that SITS took every possible action to overcome the difficulties placed in its way by Argentina and to avoid the expropriation of the Contract and recover its investment.

167. Siemens points out that it took Argentina 28 months to receive the assets transferred from SITS. Siemens recalls how Argentina did not take measures for the orderly transfer of the non-exclusive licenses for the use of the applications software or the contract for the supply of satellite link services, and all links between SITS' help desk and the System were cut in May 2001. Siemens claims that the passive behavior of Argentina caused losses and jeopardized the System. Hence, SITS could not agree to any physical, performance or functionality test carried out by the Government after its damaging attitude.

168. Siemens notes the positive results of the test at Casa de Moneda in order to verify the overall operation of the System. Siemens refers to the following statement in a letter provided by the President of Casa de Moneda to the Under-Secretary of the Interior reporting on the test results:

“As per your request, I would like to inform you the positive result of the verification test of the operativity [sic] of the General Persons Identification System that forms part of the Argentine and International Public Bidding Process No. 01/96, the contract of which was terminated by Decree 669/01.

Therefore, it has been verified that it is possible to print identity documents at the plant.”<sup>34</sup>

169. Siemens also points out that SITS' sub-contractors who were present at the tests reported that they “[...] evidenced the successful operation of the systems set up for the production of DNIs, and that pursuant to Section 2 of Decree No. 669/2001 those systems were received by the Government.”<sup>35</sup> Siemens refers to press reports on the satisfactory functioning of the System

notwithstanding attempts by officials of RNP to prevent its operation to the extent that floppy disks and software applications containing important information for the issuance of the DNIs mysteriously were lost.<sup>36</sup>

170. Siemens maintains that the source code issue lacks any merit. First, source codes were excluded from the Contract. The Government, prompted by a question of SITS seeking confirmation that the only right to be acquired by the Ministry of the Interior over the software would be a non-exclusive use license, replied: “The requirement included in the bidding terms and conditions related to the software is that the Ministry of the Interior be transferred a permanent and non-exclusive use license”, and “the bidder or contractor may assign all or a portion of the ownership rights over the software if it so accepted.”<sup>37</sup> Siemens affirms that there is no reference in the Contract to software source codes and, to have access to them, Argentina would need to negotiate directly with the software copyright owners.

171. Siemens recalls that software and source codes are protected by Argentine law and international law and that no third party has the right to access, reproduce, execute, adapt and modify them without the copyright holder’s express authorization.

172. Siemens notes that the Respondent never demanded compliance with Article 10.12 of the Contract prior to this arbitration. As the evidence attached to the Counter-Memorial shows, this article was invoked by Argentina for the first time in April 2002, nearly a year after Contract termination and after the provision had lost its effect. Furthermore, the allegation made by Argentina that defects had been detected in the System that require access to the source codes to be corrected is an argument first made by Argentina in its Counter-Memorial.

4. Rejoinder

173. In its Rejoinder, Argentina points out that it is striking that, notwithstanding the contractual concerns expressed by Siemens in this arbitration, it never saw fit to initiate the dispute settlement provisions set out in Article 30 of the Contract. Argentina emphasizes the seriousness of the breaches of the Contract by SITS, and that Siemens agreed to renegotiate the Contract and to the application of the 2000 Emergency Law to the renegotiation. Siemens was aware of the consequences of renegotiating under that law. Argentina explains that the final proposal was prepared after receiving the opinions of the General Department of Legal Affairs of the Ministry of the Interior and of SIGEN. Argentina also points out that the delay in compensation can be attributed to institutional changes but also to the lack of cooperation of SITS with the Asset Reception Committee.

174. Argentina clarifies that it is true that Siemens won the bid on the basis of Siemens' qualifications as technology leader but the System failed to perform the task identifying and registering individuals pursuant to Law No. 17,671. Argentina affirms that the FOM was never approved and hence the System never existed, only some functions worked.

175. Argentina questions the political motivations alleged by the Claimant at each step of the way. Argentina points out that the FOM approval process already showed before the change of Government that SITS lacked the technical expertise required. The FOM was approved on November 26, 1999, subject to the observations made by RNP, and Argentina allowed SITS to start printing the DNIs beforehand so that SITS could recover its investment. As regards the External Circuit, Argentina clarifies that it was refused by the Provinces because of economic reasons, that it would have been irresponsible to oblige the Provinces considering how onerous the model was and the impossibility of continuing efficiently with the development of the Project, and that SITS agreed with the Government on November 26, 1999 to empower the project coordinator of RNP and the project manager of SITS, together with the Provincial Directors of Vital Records, to amend the schedules of implementation, composition and size of the Electronic Data Collection Centers and established December 20, 1999 as the deadline for implementation.

176. Argentina dismisses the contention that no budgetary allocations were made and refers to pertinent provisions of the budget laws for 1999, 2000 and 2001, and alleges that it would have been irresponsible on the part of Argentina to use the budget to develop a faulty product.

177. Argentina maintains that the manual system to issue DNIs could not be suspended because the System as such never worked. The mistake detected by Argentine police officers was not a minor mistake; it was a major design error in the sub-system. The DNM component also failed; it was installed in less than 10% of the places and presented gross validation mistakes. Argentina argues that SITS failed to bring any action against the measures taken and only objected to Decree 669/01 and then for reasons different from those adduced here.

178. Argentina insists that Article 17 of the Contract referred only to errors related to the physical support and not to the design of the software, that it was essential for the Government to secure the continuation of the System, that the interruption was not a penalty, and that the mistake in the fingerprint did not give rise to the revision of the Contract.

179. Argentina observes that Siemens has not objected to any of the safety-related questions in the report of SIGEN; it simply asserts that it was not notified. In respect of the date when the report was issued, Argentina dismisses the point made by Siemens since surely a report needs some time to be prepared and the date of the report is the date of its completion. Furthermore, Argentina notes that SITS was aware of the preparation of the report since its representatives attended the audit meetings organized by SIGEN.

180. Argentina asserts that at no time has it affirmed that the Contract was rescinded by the Contractor's fault. The reports of the various agencies were used to revise the Contract but the rescission was done under the 2000 Emergency Law. Argentina alleges that it did not inform SITS of any breaches nor imposed any sanctions because it was its intention to preserve the Contract and affirms that at all times it acknowledged that the rescission was a consequence of the economic and financial emergency.

181. Argentina affirms that it does not confuse the emergency of 2000 with that of 2002; the circumstances detected in 1999, which gave rise to the 2000 Emergency Law, are the background to the crisis that burst in December 2001. Argentina asserts that the two crises are linked, contrary to the argument made by Siemens.

182. Argentina explains that the Commission had no power to reach agreement with SITS and, therefore, it could not commit or oblige the State. Argentina describes the Contract Restatement Proposal prepared by the Commission as an internal preparatory document indicating SITS' point of view.

183. Argentina further explains that the report of SIGEN was an internal report of the Administration, and that due to their importance and effects some documents are published on its website. Thus there is nothing surprising that SITS learned of its existence that way rather than through a formal notice. Argentina understands the business reasons for SITS' disagreement with the changes resulting from SIGEN's report, but it does not understand the refusal of SITS to reveal its cost structure which would have assisted the Government in finding a more rapid and favorable solution for the parties.

184. Argentina takes issue with the statements by Siemens that only Siemens was required to do its part in aid of the shared sacrifice principle. To maintain the Contract as Argentina tried to do, adapting it to the economic circumstances of Argentina and its population represented a cost to Argentina over simply letting the Contract collapse.

185. Argentina argues that, when the Claimant did not accept 10 of the 21 points in the Draft Proposal, Argentina concluded that the points accepted by SITS were not sufficient to meet its savings expectations, and that Siemens may not argue now that it did not reject the proposal and that the State frustrated the Contract. Argentina recalls that SITS was informed that the 2000 Emergency Law had passed and that the Contract should not be excluded from it since the Contract was not a privatization contract, and affirms that the purpose of Argentina, when it included the Contract under the 2000 Emergency Law, was not to rescind the Contract but rather to reach an agreement that guaranteed its survival. According to Argentina, Resolution MI No. 1779/00 was clear in stating that the proposal made to the Contractor could be modified by the Contractor, but in such case the Government could reject the modification and rescind the Contract.

186. Argentina recalls that the System never reached the C2 Security Level required under Annex II, Appendix I of the Contract for the configuration installed in the Document Production Centre (“DPC”) and the Central Scanning Center. Argentina explains that SIGEN security reports in respect of the RPN and DNM were started by SIGEN on December 21, 2000, and February 21, 2001, respectively. The reports show that the Contract needed to be revised and redrafted not only because of errors in the design related to printing of fingerprints but also because of failures in IT security. Argentina explains that, because the Contract was rescinded under the 2000 Emergency Law and not for non-performance reasons, it was not necessary to have the final conclusions of the three audits carried out by SIGEN. On the other hand, according to Argentina, the SIGEN audits are a relevant element to bear in mind for the appraisal of property and equipment delivered by SITS upon termination of the Contract.

187. Argentina argues that the scope of the audit conducted by Pistrelli was limited because of its terms and the time when it took place, and may not be used validly to refute the recourse to SIGEN. Pistrelli’s audit was in the nature of desk work and could analyze the System only in a preliminary phase because it had not started to operate as a whole. On the other hand, affirms Argentina, SIGEN carried out an integral audit after the System operated and the Project was halted due to a mistake in its design. Argentina recalls that RPN criticized the Pistrelli audit and requested elaboration of a number of points and that, as of April 17, 2000, the authorities had not been able to prove whether the security changes requested by RPN had been incorporated.

188. Argentina observes that SITS refused to participate every time tests were carried out in spite of several invitations made by the Government. Argentina also points out that SITS refused to participate in the asset reception process notwithstanding official invitations to this effect. Thus SITS did not participate in the physical cross-checking, operative cross-checking or performance cross-checking because: (i) the inventories of assets already furnished contained accurate specifications, and (ii) since termination of the Contract it had not been in charge of the operation of the System, did not have access to the equipment and did not know the physical and operative situation.

189. Argentina acknowledges that SITS has the right to compensation and that it has taken all the measures leading to satisfy it.

190. Argentina confirms that the contractual performance bond has not been returned because there has been no compliance of SITS with Article 10.12 of the Contract regarding deposit of the source codes and with Article 10.7 regarding the delivery of licenses for the use of applications software. According to Argentina, the return of the performance bond is not required until the Asset Reception Committee issues a decision as to compliance by SITS with its contractual obligations.

191. Argentina maintains that the agreements between SITS and the sub-contractors have been transferred to the State and that the amount to be paid is included in the amount of compensation assessed by the TTN.

192. Argentina takes exception to the allegation that it has not been diligent in respect of the transfer of the non-exclusive licenses and the satellite links. Argentina contends that the licenses have not been delivered because delivery was subject by SITS to prior payment by the Government. As regards the assignment of satellite links, it was the choice of Argentina to continue or not with the same provider.

193. Argentina rebuts the statements of Siemens on the test of Casa de Moneda. In the first place, the test was conducted outside the asset reception process and there was no reason to invite SITS since the Contract by then had been terminated. Furthermore, Argentina affirms that the test was not as successful as the Claimant pretends since documents were printed only and not produced and, even with the assistance of sub-contractors, it was not possible to make the System work appropriately.

194. Argentina then turns to the source codes issue and re-affirms that the codes were necessary for the purpose of determining the extent of compliance by SITS with its obligations within the framework of the 2000

Emergency Law and Resolution ME No. 3/2001. Argentina also questions the statement of Siemens that Argentina had never raised the issue of compliance with Article 10.12. Argentina in fact requested the source codes at the request of the TTN and SITS breached Article 10.12 by not providing them. Argentina explains that the value of the source codes has been included in the assessment carried out by the TTN.

VI. Merits of the Dispute

195. Argentina has based its defense on its submission that the claim of Siemens is grounded on issues of contractual performance, while Siemens maintains that its claim is based on breaches of the Treaty, including the breach of the umbrella clause – Article 7(2) of the Treaty. The Tribunal will address this question first and, before turning its attention to the other specific claims related to expropriation, fair and equitable treatment, and arbitrary and discriminatory measures, it will consider the relevance of SITS’ and Siemens’ agreement to the Contract Restatement Proposal and alleged agreement of SITS and Siemens to include the revision of the Contract under the framework of the 2000 Emergency Law.

1. Umbrella Clause

a) Positions of the Parties

196. The Tribunal will start by recalling the specific arguments of the parties on the meaning of Article 7(2) of the Treaty. This article reads as follows:

“Each Contracting Party shall observe any other obligation it has assumed with regard to investments by nationals or companies of the other Contracting Party in its territory.”

197. Siemens argues that Argentina breached Article 7(2) of the Treaty by failing to comply with its obligations with regard to Siemens’ investment. According to Siemens, such obligations may be contractual obligations in agreements between States and investors or broader undertakings contained in the States’ national investment legislation. The effect of Article 7(2) is to protect investments against interferences with contractual rights and licenses elevating them to violations of the Treaty regardless of breaches of Articles 2 and 4. Siemens observes that this conclusion is even more compelling if the State does so in bad faith, for political reasons and lacking public purpose. Siemens also finds that this conclusion is confirmed by Article 10(1), which covers all “[d]isputes concerning investments in the sense of this Treaty between a Contracting Party and a national or company of the other Contracting Party [...]”

198. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina reviews the history of the umbrella clauses and in particular refers to the concept of the essential base of the claim introduced in Woodruff v. Venezuela<sup>38</sup> and used in Vivendi II for purposes of determining the validity of the forum choice in the contract. Argentina finds further support in its argumentation in Ronald S. Lauder v. the Czech Republic<sup>39</sup>, Alex Genin, Eastern Credit Limited, Inc. and A.S. Baltoil v. the Republic of Estonia<sup>40</sup>, CMS Gas Transmission Company v. Argentine Republic<sup>41</sup> and SGS Société Générale de Surveillance S.A. v. Islamic Republic of Pakistan.<sup>42</sup> In the latter case, Argentina points out that the tribunal insisted that the text of the clause has to be unambiguous and that there must be clear and convincing evidence of the purpose of the umbrella clause to elevate contractual claims to treaty claims. Argentina also finds support in SGS Société Générale de Surveillance S.A. v. Republic of the Philippines since both SGS tribunals were moved by the goal of preventing the transformation of contractual claims into international claims.

199. Argentina points out that the tribunal in SGS v. Philippines restricts the commitments to which the clause is applicable: “For Article X(2) to be applicable, the host State must have assumed a legal obligation, and it must have been assumed vis-à-vis the specific investment – not as a matter of the application of some legal obligation of a general character. This is very far from elevating to the international level all ‘the municipal, legislative or administrative or other unilateral measures of a Contracting Party.’<sup>43</sup> Furthermore, according to Argentina, if there is an exclusive contractual forum selection clause, the forum specified in the contract is the forum with jurisdiction over contractual matters.

200. Applying these considerations to the instant case, Argentina argues that “the clause can only be invoked vis-à-vis an Investment Agreement in the case of breach of the Agreement and not vis-à-vis a concession contract governed by domestic administrative law and containing an agreed upon forum clause. Siemens intentionally confuses the Investment Agreement with the investment, terms that are not equivalent and cannot be merged.”<sup>44</sup>

201. In its Reply, Siemens affirms that Article 7(2) includes obligations arising from a contract. Siemens finds that the attempt by Argentina to distinguish between an investment agreement and domestic utility contracts has no support under the terms of investment treaties or in their ordinary meaning. Siemens points out that Articles 7(2) and 10(1) use the term “investments”, which is broadly defined and that claims raised under an umbrella clause are additional to and independent of claims based on the other protections under the Treaty. According to Siemens, under an umbrella clause, “any violation of a contract thus covered, becomes a violation of the BIT. The consequence is that the BIT’s clause on dispute settlement becomes applicable to a claim arising from the breach of the contract.”<sup>45</sup>

202. Siemens argues that case law supports its claims under article 7(2) of the Treaty. First, it refers to the criticism of the SGS v. Pakistan in SGS v. Philippines which termed that decision unconvincing because it failed to give any clear meaning to the umbrella clause. Siemens points out that the facts of the instant case are different because SGS v. Pakistan did not involve any allegation of sovereign interference with the Contract. Second, Siemens recalls the conclusion of the tribunal in the Philippines case: “[the umbrella clause] makes it a breach of the BIT for the host state to fail to observe binding commitments, including contractual commitments, which it has assumed with regard to specific investments.”<sup>46</sup> Third, Siemens rebuts the argument of Argentina that a more specific provision shall take precedence over a more general one. Relying on the opinion of Professor Christoph Schreuer, Siemens contends that this argument in fact favors Siemens’ position:

“The dispute settlement clause in the BIT is merely a standing offer to investors. By accepting that offer an investor perfects a specific arbitration agreement. The ICSID arbitration agreement, as perfected through the institution of proceedings, applies only to the specific dispute. By contrast, the dispute settlement clause in the Contract refers to any dispute arising from the Contract. It follows that the ICSID arbitration agreement is the more specific one. The principle generalia specialibus non derogant, should work against the contractual forum selection clause and in favor of ICSID.”<sup>47</sup>

Fourth, Siemens rejects the arguments on the essential claim base and the contractual forum clause for having been already rejected by the Tribunal in its decision jurisdiction.

203. Argentina in its Rejoinder denies as a primary submission that there were any breaches of its obligations towards the Claimant and, if the Tribunal would consider otherwise, then these would be a contractual matter to be determined by the proper law of the Contract and not international law. Furthermore, Argentina contests the meaning attributed by the Claimant to the umbrella clause, and points out that, in the case of SGS v. Philippines, the wording of the clause was different and it referred to “specific” investments, and that, in any case, the tribunal found that the umbrella clause did not “convert the issue of the extent or content of such obligations into an issue of international law.”<sup>48</sup> Argentina explains that the case law provides very little authority to support the approach embraced by the Claimant and that SGS v. Pakistan and Salini v. Jordan<sup>49</sup> are evidence of the unwillingness of arbitral tribunals to embark on the resolution of contractual disputes. Argentina concludes by reminding the Tribunal that the approach proposed by the Claimant would re-write the Treaty, depart from the classical approach to the arbitral function under international law, and bring into play the provisions of Article 52 of the Convention.

b) Considerations of the Tribunal

204. The Tribunal considers that Article 7(2) has the meaning that its terms express, namely, that failure to meet obligations undertaken by one of the Treaty parties in respect to any particular investment is converted by this clause into a breach of the Treaty. Whether an arbitral tribunal is the tribunal which has jurisdiction to consider that breach or whether it should be considered by the tribunals of the host State of the investor is a matter that this Tribunal does not need to enter. The Claimant is not a party to the Contract and SITS is not a party to these proceedings.

205. In regards to the scope of Article 10(1), the Tribunal concurs with the submission that reference to disputes related to investments would cover contractual disputes for purposes of the consent of the parties to arbitration given the wide meaning of the term “investments” and the terms of Article 7(2). However, to the extent that the obligations assumed by the State party are of a contractual nature, such obligations must originate in a contract between the State party to the Treaty and the foreign investor as, for instance, in the SGS cases.

206. The Tribunal does not subscribe to the view of the Respondent that investment agreements should be distinguished from concession agreements of an administrative nature. Such distinction has no basis in Article 7(2) of the Treaty which refers to “any obligations”, or in the definition of “investment” in the Treaty. Any agreement related to an investment that qualifies as such under the Treaty would be part of the obligations covered under the umbrella clause. The Tribunal does not find significant, for purposes of the ordinary meaning of this clause, that it does not refer to “specific” investments. The term “investment” in the sense of the Treaty, linked as it is to “any obligations”, would cover any binding commitment entered into by Argentina in respect of such investment.

2. Consent of Siemens and SITS

207. The positions of the parties related to the argument advanced by Argentina to the effect that SITS or Siemens agreed to the measures taken by Argentina have already been described. The Tribunal recalls that such argument is based on the fact that SITS and Siemens agreed to the Contract Restatement Proposal in November 2000, that no administrative appeal was filed by SITS except with respect to Decree 669/01, and that they did not object to the ministerial Resolution placing the Contract under the regime of the 2000 Emergency Law.

208. As regards the agreement to the Contract Restatement Proposal, Argentina itself contends that it was a preliminary agreement that was not binding. In any case, Argentina modified the proposal and SITS did not accept certain terms of the revised proposal. Thus it is difficult to understand how it can be held that SITS or Siemens have agreed to the Contract Restatement Proposal if its terms were not an agreement but, as argued by Argentina, an internal document in which the views of the private party were expressed and Argentina did not accept them.

209. The argument on the consent of Siemens and SITS to the application of the 2000 Emergency Law to the Contract is even more puzzling to the Tribunal. It is expected that individuals and companies will obey the law; it is not a question of choice, as would be the option to accept a negotiated proposal.

210. It is a matter of dispute between the parties as to whether Siemens or SITS did not object to the application of the 2000 Emergency Law regime to the Contract because they were led to believe by the Respondent that this would speed up the administrative processing of the Contract Restatement Proposal. Whatever the reasons for not objecting, Argentina always had the power to apply the 2000 Emergency Law to the Contract, irrespective of the position of Siemens or SITS on the matter, and it did. It is clear from the evidence that the expectation of Siemens was that the Contract Restatement Proposal would not be modified even if this may have been possible under the 2000 Emergency Law. It would lack logic that a high official of Siemens would be received by President de la Rúa to plead that a decree be issued on terms different from those negotiated.

211. To conclude, the Tribunal considers that, for purposes of evaluating the measures taken by Argentina in light of its commitments under the Treaty, the allegations based on the consent of Siemens or SITS are not relevant.

212. The Tribunal will now turn to the other specific commitments under the Treaty alleged by Siemens to have been breached by Argentina. Since the parties understand these commitments differently, not only as they apply to the facts of this case but also in their meaning, the Tribunal will describe first in respect of each commitment the arguments made by the parties on its scope and meaning.

3. Expropriation

a) Positions of the Parties

213. Siemens argues that its investment has been expropriated indirectly as a result of measures taken by Argentina. According to Siemens, whether or not Argentina intended to expropriate its investment is irrelevant, what is of essence is the actual effect of the measures on the investors' property: "measures that indirectly, but effectively, deprive an investor of the use or enjoyment of its investment, including the deprivation of the whole or a significant part of the economic benefit of property, are as expropriatory as the seizure of an investor's formal title to its property."<sup>50</sup>

214. Siemens further argues that contractual rights and the right to complete a project are part of the property rights that may be expropriated and that government measures that frustrate such assurances and substantially deprive investors of their rights to have them respected amount to an expropriation.

215. According to Siemens, irrespective of whether or not the purpose of a State measure affects its legality, it does not affect the State's obligation to compensate the investor promptly, adequately and effectively; as plainly stated in Article 4(2) of the Treaty, the public purpose of expropriatory measures by either State party in no way alters the legal obligation to compensate investors affected by those measures. Failure to provide prompt, adequate and effective compensation renders the expropriation unlawful whether or not it is for a public purpose.

216. Siemens claims that the acts and omissions of Argentina were expropriatory measures that substantially deprived Siemens of the use and enjoyment of its investment, and significantly reduced its value without payment of any compensation. Siemens relied on the following assurances given and obligations undertaken by Argentina: (i) replacement of all DNIs previously issued by new DNIs issued through the System; (ii) discontinuation of the issuance of manual DNIs; (iii) implementation of the System on a nationwide basis; (iv) processing of immigration proceedings through the System and payment of the corresponding fees; and (v) adoption of all measures necessary to fulfill the obligations under the Contract and regular collection of SITS' revenues resulting from the fees and prices paid by the users.

217. According to Siemens, these assurances constituted essential conditions of its investment and Argentina was aware of its meaning as recognized in the report of the Commission:

“Progressive replacement of all DNIs [...] is actually the State's guarantee rather than an obligation of the contractor, and defines the value of the contract [...]

[...] the contract term, which is defined as a six-year term that may be extended for two three-year periods, prescribes a mechanism that guarantees returns on the investment made; this relates to the need to have all existing DNIs replaced by the ones dealt with in the contract

218. Siemens affirms that the acts and omissions of Argentina qualify as “measures” under Article 4(2) of the Treaty. According to Siemens, the term “measures” is an all encompassing term for any actions attributable to a State that may affect an investment and includes acts performed by its different organs and subdivisions. In the case of its investment, Siemens refers to the following measures that resulted eventually in its expropriation:

(i) From the date of execution of the Contract and up to August 1999 Argentina failed to meet the obligations it had undertaken to allow the performance of the Contract on schedule; it did not make the necessary budget allocations, it did not provide the funds and human resources necessary to make the system operational, it delayed approval of the FOM, it failed to execute agreements with the Provinces, and it did not adopt the statutory and executive measures necessary to carry out the replacement of existing DNIs by those issued through the System.

(ii) Argentina pressed SITS into postponing the initial date for DNI production because of the then upcoming elections and into agreeing to postpone until January 31, 2000 discontinuation of the manual issuance of DNIs.

(iii) Argentina failed: (A) to adopt alternative measures to implement the System throughout its territory even when the RNP had the exclusive power to issue the DNIs and gather the information to produce them, (B) to provide budget allocations for the Project for the year 2000, (C) to provide the technical definitions to complete implementation of the immigration proceedings system and the imposition of new requirements not included in the new Project, and (D) to provide the facilities to implement the External Circuit to extend the System throughout the national territory.

(iv) Argentina notified Siemens in January 2000 that it intended to reduce the originally agreed-upon prices in the Contract and that agreement to the reduction was a condition for the continuation of the Contract and, in February 2000, unjustifiably halted immigration processing and DNI production through the System.

(v) The negotiations that ensued were concluded in November 2000 with the promise that the System's revenue-generating operations would immediately resume, and to speed approval of the new contractual terms the Contract was subjected to the Emergency Law of 2000. Notwithstanding assurances of the President of the Republic that a decree would be issued approving the new terms before the end of the year, the new terms were never approved.

(vi) New terms were proposed by Argentina in May 2001 on a take it or leave it basis without providing the basic elements for an evaluation of the proposal. The new proposal was not acceptable to SITS, which indicated its willingness to consider alternatives. Argentina terminated the Contract on May 18, 2001 invoking the power granted under the 2000 Emergency Law and without reference to any technical or other reason related to the fulfillment of the Contract by SITS.

(vii) After termination of the Contract, Argentina failed to pay compensation, although it had acknowledged its obligation to do so, denied the right of defense to SITS when SITS filed an appeal against Decree 669/01, failed to receive the equipment, facilities and instruments used in Project execution, and refused to return the Contract performance bond although it was mandatory to return it at Contract termination.

(viii) Siemens' investment was the only foreign investment expropriated under the 2000 Emergency Law and the public purpose invoked to terminate the Contract was merely an excuse to legitimize the measure adopted by the Government for political convenience, since economic studies carried out by the Ministry of Economy had recommended renegotiation of the terms agreed by the parties.

219. Siemens concludes by affirming that the aggregate of these measures amounts to a creeping expropriation of its investment and submits that, notwithstanding that Argentina's conduct constitutes a case of creeping expropriation, it seems reasonable to consider May 18, 2001, the date of Decree 669/01, as the date of expropriation for valuation purposes. Siemens adds that the Treaty states that the value of an investment for purposes of compensation is determined by reference to the date before the intention to expropriate became known, and, therefore, the effects of the taking itself and any act related to the taking, including threats to take the asset concerned, that may have diminished the value of the property or enterprise on the date of the taking, shall not be considered in the valuation and that Siemens is entitled to compensation for any loss suffered before or after May 18, 2001 caused by Argentina's creeping expropriation.

220. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina denies that it expropriated Siemens' investment and draws the Tribunal's attention to the following sentence of Article 4(2) of the Treaty: "The legality of the expropriation, nationalization or similar measure, and the amount of the indemnification should be reviewable through ordinary legal proceedings." Based on this sentence, Argentina asserts that it is entitled to apply this review option to any future decision of the Tribunal in connection with the alleged expropriation.

221. Argentina challenges the qualification of events by Siemens. It is Argentina's contention that for events to lead to an expropriation each one of them should affect the investment adversely. However, when the main feature of a contract is to provide one set of goods -the System in the instant case-, it is not possible to speak of successive acts, either the Contract is thwarted or not. Argentina argues that Siemens is unable to provide evidence that the alleged expropriatory events affected the investment adversely. In this respect, Argentina refers to the statement of Siemens that it agreed to renegotiate the Contract not only to save it but also because the Government had promised to resume the System's operation. This means, according to Argentina, that the Contract would not have been thwarted and there could not be a creeping expropriation. Argentina finds support for its line of argument in Generation Ukraine, Inc. v.

Ukraine, which admitted difficulty in finding many cases that fall under the creeping expropriation category and stated:

“A plea of creeping expropriation must proceed on the basis that the investment existed at a particular point in time and that subsequent acts attributable to the State have eroded the investor’s rights to its investment to an extent that is violative of the relevant international standard of protection against expropriation.”<sup>52</sup>

222. Argentina then develops the argument that Siemens’ claim is a purely contractual claim and international law does not include regulations on contracts, as acknowledged in Saudi Arabia v. Arabian American Oil Company (Aramco), Robert Azinian, Kenneth Davitian & Ellen Baca v. The United Mexican States<sup>53</sup>, and by Professor Brownlie<sup>54</sup>. Furthermore, Siemens has not contributed evidence showing, as stated by the Annulment Committee in Vivendi II, clear conduct contrary to the relevant standard in the circumstances of the case. Argentina disputes the relevance of the Iran-US Claims Tribunal case law because the law applicable to the cases before that tribunal is different from the law applicable in this arbitration. That tribunal has to rule on contractual disputes, can apply commercial usages and has highly discretionary powers in deciding the applicable law. Argentina reminds the Tribunal that the applicability of the legal principles developed by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal was explicitly rejected in Pope & Talbot, Inc. v. Canada<sup>55</sup> and S.D. Myers, Inc. v. The Government of Canada<sup>56</sup>. Argentina also argues in detail the inapplicability to the instant case of holdings by the tribunals adduced by Siemens regarding acquired international rights: (i) Aramco was concerned with the application of international law to a contract that included its own stabilization clause, (ii) Revere Cooper & Brass,

Inc. v. Republic of Burundi<sup>58</sup> was concerned with the revocation of a permit to operate in a free trade zone, (iv) CME Czech Republic B.V. (the Netherlands) v. The Czech Republic<sup>59</sup> was not concerned with contractual guarantees by a State, and (v) the findings of CME were contradicted by Lauder.

223. Argentina questions how Siemens has drawn the line to delimit the State's legitimate actions from actions entitling an investor to compensation. Argentina argues that, if the effect of depriving a person of its property is the criterion for this purpose, then any regulation would be expropriatory because regulations have a damaging effect on regulated parties. Argentina refers to the proportionality test advanced by Tecmed between the measures taken and the public interest pursued by them, and to the deference due to the State when it defines issues of public policy. Thus this requires a more complex analysis than proposed by Siemens.

224. Argentina finds support in recent arbitral awards - Consortium RFCC v. Royaume du Maroc<sup>60</sup>, Waste Management, Inc. v. United Mexican States<sup>61</sup>, Generation Ukraine, SGS v. Philippines - for arguing that a breach of treaty is not a breach of contract, it is not enough to qualify a contractual breach as a treaty violation, there should be a reasonable effort by the investor to obtain compensation through the domestic channels under the law applicable to the contract, and the State should not have used its sovereign powers to amend pre-existing legal situations and the parties' rights and obligations. In this respect, Argentina affirms that:

225. Argentina also affirms that, like the Philippines in the SGS case, it had “not issued any act (law or decree in sovereign function) aimed at disregarding the possible contractual rights of SITS. Should there be any debt, it would still exist.”<sup>63</sup>

226. Argentina requests the Tribunal to focus on two aspects of Generation Ukraine. First, arbitral tribunals do not exercise the function of an administrative review agency. Second, arbitral tribunals should consider the changes in the economy of the State hosting the investments when assessing the investor’s legitimate expectations. Argentina also calls the attention of the Tribunal to the holding in Waste Management II, to the effect that international expropriation law is not meant to eliminate the ordinary risk assumed by foreign investors, and to the fact that, under the Contract, SITS took responsibility for the business risk.

227. Argentina denies that it gave Siemens any warranty or profitability assurance, and claims that Siemens agreed to revise the Contract when faced with the failure of the essential features of the System and the substantial alteration of the economic conditions under which the Contract was intended to be carried out. Argentina contends that Siemens must comply with the Contract before requesting its fulfillment and lists as breaches of the Contract concealed from the Tribunal the following: delay in the design of the FOM and the Security Operating Model, the imperfect designs for the Security Operating Model, the External Data Capture Circuit and fingerprint taking, ignorance of the Argentine personal identification system, failure to deliver the source codes, vulnerability of the System, and the hindrances placed by SITS during the entire reception process, including its refusal to participate.

228. In any case, pleads Argentina, even if the arguments of Argentina were rejected, the mere “effect” criterion applied by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal would not result in an expropriatory effect of the alleged actions of Argentina under Argentine law applicable to the Contract.

229. In its Reply, Siemens rejects the allegation of Argentina that, under Article 4(2), it has the right to submit to review before the local courts the potential award of this Tribunal. Siemens explains that this Article grants the investor, who is the only party affected by the expropriation measures, the right to challenge the legality of the expropriation and the amount of the compensation in ordinary judicial proceedings.

230. Siemens then questions the definition of expropriation used by Argentina in its allegations, namely, that expropriation may occur only directly or through measures that autonomously and independently affect the investment adversely, that deprivation of or substantial interference with contractual rights does not constitute an expropriation under international law, and that the effect of the measure should completely thwart the investment or be unreasonable,

231. Siemens notes that the Treaty includes measures tantamount to expropriation and explains that provisions on indirect expropriation are usually generic statements given the great variety of possible measures. Siemens refers to the findings by the tribunals in Compañía del Desarrollo de Santa Elena S.A. v. The Republic of Costa Rica,<sup>64</sup> CME, Metalclad Corporation v. The United Mexican States,<sup>65</sup> Tippetts, Abbett, McCarthy, Stratton v. TAMS-AFFA Consulting Engineers of Iran,<sup>66</sup> Middle East Cement Shipping and Handling Co.

S.A. v. Arab Republic of Egypt<sup>67</sup> and Tecmed to show the endorsement of the notion of indirect expropriation by arbitral tribunals; such expropriation takes place by a variety of measures that by themselves would not necessarily be expropriatory or adversely affect the investment, nor would they need to be intended to be expropriatory. Siemens refers to scholarly opinion on the notion of creeping expropriation:

“In some, if not most other, creeping expropriations, however, that intent [to expropriate], though possibly present at some level of the host state’s government, will be difficult, if not impossible to discern. Discrete acts, analyzed in isolation rather than in the context of the overall flow of events, may, whether legal or not in themselves, seem innocuous vis-à-vis a potential expropriation. Some may not be expropriatory in themselves. Only in retrospect will it become evident that those acts comprised part of an accretion of deleterious acts and omissions, which in the aggregate expropriated the foreign investor’s property rights.”<sup>68</sup>

232. Siemens alleges that an analysis of Biloune and Marine Drive Complex Ltd. v. Ghana Investments Centre,<sup>69</sup> Tradex Hellas S.A. v. Republic of Albania,<sup>70</sup> Santa Elena, Tecmed, Generation Ukraine and Iran-US Claims Tribunal jurisprudence shows that expropriatory measures that take place step by step should be analyzed in their aggregate effects and not “autonomously and independently” as argued by Argentina. Siemens concludes that the termination of the Contract was not the only expropriatory step but the last of a clear chain of measures taken by Argentina since 1999 that destroyed the value of Siemens’ investment.

233. Siemens disputes Argentina's assertion that there cannot be expropriation following contractual breaches and repudiation of the Contract. Siemens refers to the opinion of Professor Schreuer, who states that:

"[...] the mere fact that the investment was made on the basis of a contract does not preclude a violation of the BIT [the Treaty]. Nor does an allegation of contract violations mean that a BIT claim cannot arise from the same facts. The standards are simply different. It is incumbent upon the Claimant to demonstrate a violation of the BIT. This task is not made impossible or more onerous by the simultaneous existence of contract violations."<sup>71</sup>

234. Siemens further disputes the argument that, when a contract is subject to a domestic legal system, expropriation of rights under the contract would be precluded. Siemens maintains that the law governing a particular contract and whether contractual rights may be expropriated are two distinct and unrelated questions; contractual rights may be expropriated as tangible property may be expropriated. Siemens also questions the argument that a contract cannot be governed by international law unless it contains a stabilization clause: "the decisive point is that the absence of a stabilization clause does not mean that the contract cannot be the object of an expropriation. The expropriation of rights under a contract containing a stabilization clause would merely give rise to an additional claim for violation of that clause."<sup>72</sup>

235. Siemens recalls that Article 1 of the Treaty defines as protected investments "every kind of asset" and specifically "rights to funds used to create economic value or to any performance with an economic value" and "concessions conferred by public law entities." Siemens alleges that judicial practice unanimously supports a wide concept of property that includes rights under contract, e.g., the decisions in Rudloff<sup>73</sup>, Norwegian Shipowners<sup>74</sup>, Factory at Chorzów<sup>75</sup>, and the case law of the Iran-US Claims Tribunal.

236. According to Siemens, a breach of contract or actions affecting contract rights may constitute an expropriation when: (i) the breach consists of one or part of a series of acts that combine to effect a creeping expropriation; (ii) the breach is of such fundamental nature that it goes to the heart of the promised performance and adversely affects the continuance of the project concerned; (iii) regulatory conduct denies contract rights or requires their alteration; (iv) specific contract rights or rights under a contract as a whole are repudiated, and (iv) a stabilization clause is breached. Siemens affirms that most of these situations apply in the instant case.

237. As regards the argument that Argentina did not act in its sovereign capacity, Siemens finds the argument implausible given termination of the Contract by decree, rejection of the appeal by decree, and termination based not on contractual grounds but on the 2000 Emergency Law. Furthermore, Argentina has argued that a decisive reason for the termination was that a substantial number of Provinces refused to participate in the implementation of the Project.

238. Siemens explains that the purpose of the measures is not a criterion to determine whether an expropriation has occurred. Under Article 4(2) of the Treaty, public purpose is a criterion for the expropriation's legality, "Similarly, proportionality and reasonableness may play a role in assessing whether the power to expropriate has been exercised properly. But these criteria do not affect the question whether an expropriation exists or not."<sup>76</sup> Commenting on the cases relied on by Argentina, Siemens observes that they relate to regulatory takings, while Siemens was deprived of its investment through measures taken directly against it and not through regulatory measures.

239. Siemens rejects the argument that it needed to seek prior recourse through domestic channels and observes that this is an attempt to reintroduce an argument already put forward at the jurisdictional stage. Siemens explains that, under Article 26 of the Convention, the Contracting Parties waive the local remedies rule unless they state otherwise, which Argentina has not done and, in any case, SITS and the Claimant made every reasonable effort to obtain correction of Argentina's measures through domestic means, including an administrative appeal against Decree 669/01. Contrary to the factual situation in the cases of Waste Management II and Generation Ukraine adduced by Argentina, in the instant case Siemens' loss is persistent, irreparable, caused by the Government and not by low-level officials whose acts of maladministration might easily be corrected.

240. Siemens also dismisses the argument that it may not be entitled to claim under the Treaty because it allegedly failed to perform its own obligations. Siemens observes that Article 4(2) does not impose any duty with regard to the investor; there is no defense based on the failure to comply with the other party's duties.

241. Argentina in its Rejoinder affirms that Siemens fails to draw the line between a contractual breach and the expropriation of an agreement, and clarifies that it referred to Waste Management II in its argument because the tribunal in that case established criteria for expropriation of an agreement, namely, an effective repudiation of the property rights of the investor which prevents it from exercising them entirely or to a substantial extent, and not redressed by remedies available to the claimant. Argentina emphasizes the reasonableness of the measures taken as part of the expropriation concept and as held by the European Court of Human Rights and Tecmed.

242. Argentina contends that the measures were taken under the usual and ordinary forms of terminating an agreement and Siemens failed to reply to its arguments and focused instead on whether the measures were taken in the exercise of its ius imperium. Argentina insists that there is a requirement of making a reasonable effort on the part of the investor to obtain correction in the domestic jurisdiction, and that this is a substantive requirement to distinguish between an act of maladministration from an act which constitutes an expropriation, "not because there is a requirement of exhaustion of local remedies but because the very reality of conduct tantamount to expropriation is doubtful in the absence of a reasonable – not necessarily exhaustive – effort by the investor to obtain correction.”<sup>77</sup> In this respect, Argentina argues that SITS failed to comply with its essential duties and agreed to re-negotiate the Contract to conform to the fiscal possibilities of the State and the pocketbook of the people.

243. Argentina takes issue with the contention of Siemens that the defense of non-performance does not apply because investors may assert their rights under the Treaty. Argentina argues that the exception non adimpleti contractus is equally a principle of international law. Argentina maintains that the conditions set in Waste Management II for contract expropriation are not met in this case. According to Argentina, the actions taken before Decree 699/01 were in response to technical errors and failures to deliver on the part of SITS and its sub-contractors. Argentina insists that the termination of the Contract by Decree 669/01 was not only based on economic considerations but also on technical grounds after receiving independent advice. Therefore, Decree 669/01 was a legitimate, rational and proportionate response to a disappointing and inadequate performance of SITS’ contractual obligations; it was not an expropriatory measure since “[i]t left intact the Claimant’s contractual rights, and in particular the ability to have recourse to the national courts of Argentina to challenge acts of its contractual partner which it considered to have breached the Contract.”<sup>78</sup>

244. Argentina further develops the argument that investment treaties are not a guarantee of profits to foreign investors and contends that if Decree 669/01 were to be considered expropriatory by the Tribunal, then the expropriation is a lawful expropriation because “it was a reasonable and proportionate response to a national fiscal crisis; it was carried out for a public purpose; it was not discriminatory on national or any grounds; and the decree contained within its terms provision for compensating SITS for cancellation of the Contract.”<sup>79</sup> Argentina explains that there were at least two major public policy reasons for the termination of the Contract: the massive fiscal crisis which necessitated cutting back projects involving a high level of public expenditure, and the inability or unwillingness of a substantial number of Provinces to participate in the Project given the fiscal crisis.

b) Considerations of the Tribunal

245. Before considering the arguments dealing with expropriation proper, the Tribunal will address the issue of contractual claims as opposed to treaty claims which has been argued by the parties in the context of the asserted breach of Article 4(2) and also of Article 7(2) (the umbrella clause). Subsequently, the Tribunal will discuss whether under Article 4(2) the findings of this Tribunal are subject to review by the ordinary courts, whether each individual measure in a creeping expropriation needs to be considered autonomously, whether the proper law of the Contract is relevant for purposes of expropriation, whether intent of the State to expropriate is necessary or only the effects of the State's measures need to be considered, whether an expropriation has taken place, and, if so, whether it conformed with the Treaty requirements.

i) Treaty claims and Contract Claims

246. Argentina has argued that at no time in the course of the dispute with SITS it took measures that could be regarded as an exercise of its police powers as a State, including when it terminated the Contract under the 2000 Emergency Law. The Tribunal considers that Argentina's view of when a State acts iure imperii is exceedingly narrow and inconsistent with the arguments advanced by Argentina itself.

247. The distinction between acts iure imperii and iure gestionis has its origins in the area of immunity of the State under international law and it differentiates between acts of a commercial nature and those which pertain to the powers of a State acting as such. Usually States have been restrictive in their understanding of which activities would not be covered by their immunity in judicial proceedings before the courts of another State. Here we have the reverse situation where the State party posits a wide content of the notion of iure gestionis.

248. In applying this distinction in the realm of investor-State arbitration, arbitral tribunals have considered that, for the behavior of the State as party to a contract to be considered a breach of an investment treaty, such behavior must be beyond that which an ordinary contracting party could adopt and involve State interference with the operation of the contract:

“ Pour qu’il y ait droit à compensation il faut que la personne de l’exproprié prouve qu’il a été l’objet de mesures prises par l’Etat agissant non comme cocontractant mais comme autorité publique. Les décisions aux cas d’expropriation indirecte mentionnent toutes l’ ‘interférence’ de l’Etat d’accueil dans l’exercice normal, par l’investisseur, de ses droits économiques. Or un Etat cocontractant n’ ‘interfère’ pas, mais ‘exécute’ un contrat. S’il peut mal exécuter ledit contrat cela ne sera pas sanctionné par les dispositions du traité relatives a l’expropriation ou à la nationalisation à moins qu’il ne soit prouvé que l’Etat ou son émanation soit sorti(e) de son rôle de simple cocontractant(e) pour prendre le rôle bien spécifique de Puissance Publique. ”<sup>80</sup>

249. Waste Management II distinguished a number of categories to determine whether it was faced with a matter of contract non-performance or expropriation. In the first category are those cases “where a whole enterprise is terminated or frustrated because its functioning is simply halted by decree or executive act, usually accompanied by other conduct.”<sup>81</sup> In the second category fall instances of “acknowledged taking of property, and associated contractual rights are affected in consequence.”<sup>82</sup> The third category includes cases “where the only right affected is incorporeal.”<sup>83</sup> In the latter cases, “the mere non-performance of a contractual obligation is not to be equated with a taking of property, nor (unless accompanied by other elements) is it tantamount to expropriation. Any private party can fail to perform its contracts, whereas nationalization and expropriation are inherently governmental acts.”<sup>84</sup>

250. The tribunal in SGS v. Philippines excluded as a treaty claim the debt owed to SGS because there had not been a “law or decree enacted by the

Philippines attempting to expropriate or annul the debt, nor any action tantamount to an expropriation [...] A mere refusal to pay a debt is not an expropriation of property, at least where remedies exist in respect of such a refusal.”<sup>85</sup>

251. In the Jalapa Railroad case, the US-Mexican Mixed Claims Commission decided: “Here the Government of Veracruz stepped out of the role of contracting party and sought to escape vital obligations under its contract by exercising its superior governmental power.”<sup>86</sup>

252. In Salini v. Jordan, the tribunal held:

“Only the State, in the exercise of its sovereign authority (puissance publique), and not as a Contracting Party, has assumed obligations under the bilateral agreement. [...] In other words, an investment protection treaty cannot be used to compensate an investor deceived by the financial results of the operation undertaken, unless he proves that his deception was a consequence of the behavior of the receiving State acting in breach of the obligations which it had assumed under the treaty.”<sup>87</sup>

253. What all these decisions have in common is that for the State to incur international responsibility it must act as such, it must use its public authority. The actions of the State have to be based on its “superior governmental power”. It is not a matter of being disappointed in the performance of the State in the execution of a contract but rather of interference in the contract execution through governmental action.

254. In the instant case, what actions did Argentina take to step out of its role as a contractual party? In the first place, Argentina issued Decree 669/01 on the basis of the 2000 Emergency Law. Argentina has advanced the argument that termination of the Contract by Decree 669/01 was based not only on the fiscal emergency but also on the failures of the Contractor. This is not a credible argument inasmuch as Decree 669/01 and Decree 1205/01 did not provide for termination based on non-performance and Argentina itself has manifested in these proceedings that at no time had it affirmed that the Contract was rescinded by the Contractor's fault.<sup>88</sup>

255. Argentina itself has argued that the Tribunal should defer to Argentina in deciding what is in the public interest of Argentina, and should consider the measures taken by Argentina – the 2000 Emergency Law and Decree 669/01 - as a response by the State to the impending financial and social crisis. The Tribunal has no intention of second guessing the considerations that led Argentina to declare a fiscal emergency in 2000. At this stage, the Tribunal simply notes that this argument is not consistent with the submission that Decree 669/01 was a measure taken as a simple contracting party. Whether Decree 669/01 is a measure in breach of the Treaty is a question that the Tribunal will address later.

256. In the view of the Tribunal, Decree 669/01 is not the only measure that can be attributed to Argentina as a State. Argentina used its governmental authority on other occasions. First, Argentina interfered in the contractual relationship with SITS by requiring changes in the economic equation when the change of Government occurred and nearly a year before the fiscal emergency was declared. Argentina has claimed that, as a State, it has a right under administrative law to request changes in a contract. The Tribunal considers that, irrespective of whether the changes requested were or were not within the ius variandi of the State (a disputed matter between the parties), this is a right that Argentina claims as a State in order to control the deteriorating fiscal situation in the country. This is an assessment by the State related to the public interest and not one that would pertain to a regular contractual party.

257. Second, Argentina failed to enter into the agreements with the Provinces related to the External Circuit. The Tribunal considers this matter to be beyond a contractual breach because Argentina relies on its political structure to excuse itself from the obligation undertaken and because it relied on it as a matter of policy for terminating the Contract. As a State, Argentina should know what is possible for it to do (or not to do) with respect to its Provinces and the extent to which it may honor its commitments because of its own political structure.

258. Third, the permanent suspension of the two main components of the Project –the RPN sub-system and the DNM sub-system – also falls in the non-contractual category. The fact that an authorization was needed and never given for the immigration component is clearly a governmental act which had no basis in the Contract and its need came to light only when the DNM sub-system started to operate and in the context of Argentina expressing its intention to renegotiate the Contract. The alleged authorization requirement is suspect because the Contract had been drafted by Argentina and all the agencies that were involved later when the Contract was in effect had previously reviewed the terms of the Contract. The “provisional” suspension of the RPN sub-system is reasonable in terms of checking and correcting errors; what exceeds the contractual role and does not fit with Argentina’s legitimate security concerns is that SITS was not allowed to correct the error and that the manual system is still in effect as it was when the Contract was open for bids. During the Contract renegotiation, the resumption of the RPN sub-system was not linked to security concerns.

259. Fourth, Decree 669/01 provides for compensation to be paid. Argentina has not paid compensation, using arguments that go beyond its rights under the Contract. We refer to the issue of the source codes. SITS may or may not have complied with Article 10.12. At this stage it is immaterial because the Contract has been terminated and this article only required that the source codes be deposited with a notary public until the termination of the Contract. There is no provision of the Contract that requires delivery of the source codes to Argentina at Contract termination. There are provisions covering delivery of non-exclusive licenses but not of source codes. This is such an important matter in the technology field, as Argentina itself has argued, that it could not have been left to interpretation and guesswork. If it had been really intended ab initio that the source codes would have to be delivered to Argentina, the Contract would have specifically provided for this obligation. This is confirmed by the answer given by the Ministry of the Interior to Question No. 48 of SITS during the bidding stage of the Contract. The Minister had been asked to confirm that, under Article 95 of the Contract, the Ministry of the Interior's only right in respect of the software would be a non-exclusive license to its use. The Minister replied that the Bidding Terms and Conditions required that a permanent and non-exclusive license of use of the software be transferred to the Ministry. The Minister added: "This notwithstanding the bidder or the contractor may transfer in full or in part the property rights to the software if it would be acceptable [to the bidder or the contractor]." <sup>89</sup>

260. The Tribunal concludes that, in the actions listed above, Argentina acted in use of its police powers rather than as a contracting party even if it attempted at times to base its actions on the Contract. As to the other allegations made by Siemens, they relate to delays, non-budgetary allocations, or continuation of the manual system to issue DNIs and are actions that, in the context, could be construed as acts of a contractual party or of the sovereign acting as such. They are not essential to a finding of expropriation and the Tribunal will not consider them.

ii) Ordinary Courts' Review of the Legality of the Expropriation and of the Amount on Account of the Compensation under Article 4(2) of the Treaty

261. Article 4(2) provides that the legality of the expropriation, nationalization or equivalent measure, and the amount of compensation, may be subject to review by the ordinary courts. Argentina has reserved its right to apply this review option to any future decision of the Tribunal in connection with the expropriation. The context of the sentence does not support any right of Argentina in that respect. Article 4(2) is concerned with expropriation, nationalization or measures tantamount to either taken by the parties to the Treaty, and with the compensation paid. It is that expropriation or nationalization or compensation that is subject to the review of the ordinary courts, not a decision by this Tribunal. The objective of the sentence in question is to ensure that the investor has access to the ordinary local courts to review actions by the Government. It is a right that the parties accord to the investor, not to themselves, in relation to decisions of this Tribunal.

iii) Autonomy of the Measures constituting Creeping Expropriation

262. Argentina has argued that each measure alleged by the Claimant to be part of the process that results in a creeping expropriation must have an adverse effect on the investment, and that in the instant case it is not possible to speak of successive acts because if agreement had been reached on the renegotiated Contract, the Contract would not have been thwarted, to use Argentina's own words.

263. By definition, creeping expropriation refers to a process, to steps that eventually have the effect of an expropriation. If the process stops before it reaches that point, then expropriation would not occur. This does not necessarily mean that no adverse effects would have occurred. Obviously, each step must have an adverse effect but by itself may not be significant or considered an illegal act. The last step in a creeping expropriation that tilts the balance is similar to the straw that breaks the camel's back. The preceding straws may not have had a perceptible effect but are part of the process that led to the break.

264. We are dealing here with a composite act in the terminology of the Draft Articles. Article 15 of the Draft Articles provides the following:

“(1) The breach of an international obligation by a State through a series of actions or omissions defined in aggregate as wrongful occurs when the action or omission occurs which, taken with the other actions or omissions, is sufficient to constitute the wrongful act”.

265. As explained in the ILC's Commentary on the Draft Articles:

“Paragraph 1 of Article 15 defines the time at which a composite act 'occurs' as the time at which the last action or omission occurs which, taken with the other actions or omissions, is sufficient to constitute the wrongful act, without it necessarily having to be the last of the series.”

266. The concept could not be better explained.

iv) Expropriation of Contractual Rights and Proper Law of the Contract

267. Argentina has linked the argument about expropriation of contractual rights and the law applicable to the Contract and assumes that unless a contract is internationalized through a stabilization clause, it is not susceptible of expropriation. The fact that the Contract is subject to Argentine law does not mean that it cannot be expropriated from the perspective of public international law and under the Treaty. The two issues are unrelated. The Contract falls under the definition of “investments” under the Treaty and Article 4(2) refers to expropriation or nationalization of investments. Therefore, the State parties recognized that an investment in terms of the Treaty may be expropriated. There is nothing unusual in this regard. There is a long judicial practice that recognizes that expropriation is not limited to tangible property. The Tribunal will refer, for the sake of brevity, to the findings of the Permanent Court of Arbitration (“PCA”) in the case of the Norwegian Shipowners’ Claims and the Permanent Court of International Justice (“PCIJ”) in the Factory at Chorzów Case.

268. The PCA held that “[...] whatever the intentions may have been, the United States took, both in fact and in law, the contracts under which the ships in question were being or were to be constructed.”<sup>90</sup> The PCIJ found that:

“[...] it is clear that the rights of the Bayerische to the exploitation of the factory and to the remuneration fixed by the contract for the management of the exploitation and for the use of its patents, licenses, experiments, etc., have been directly prejudiced by the taking over of the factory by Poland. As these rights related to the Chorzów factory and were, so to speak, concentrated in that factory, the prohibition contained in the last sentence of Article 6 of the Geneva Convention applies in all respects to them.”<sup>91</sup>

269. These findings on the issue are conclusive and have been followed by ICSID and NAFTA tribunals, and the Iran-US Claims Tribunal. The Respondent has taken exception to the relevance of cases decided by the latter tribunal on the basis of the law applicable to those cases. The Tribunal considers that the findings of that tribunal are significant in that they show the consistency of approach on this matter by different international jurisdictions.

v) Intent to Expropriate

270. Argentina has argued against taking into consideration only the effect of measures for purposes of determining whether an expropriation has taken place. The Tribunal recalls that Article 4(2) refers to measures that “a sus efectos” (in its Spanish original) would be equivalent to expropriation or nationalization. The Treaty refers to measures that have the effect of an expropriation; it does not refer to the intent of the State to expropriate. The quotation of the finding of the PCA in Norwegian Shipowners refers to “whatever the intentions”<sup>92</sup> of the US were when the US took the contracts. A different matter is the purpose of the expropriation, but that is one of the requirements for determining whether the expropriation is in accordance with the terms of the Treaty and not for determining whether an expropriation has occurred.

vi) Was the Investment Expropriated?

271. The Tribunal has identified a series of measures that Argentina took which cannot be considered as measures based on the Contract but on the exercise of its public authority. Of all these measures, Decree 669/01 by itself and independently can be considered to be an expropriatory act. It was not based on the Contract but on the 2000 Emergency Law, it was a permanent measure and the effect was to terminate the Contract. Had it not been for Decree

669/01, and if a revised contract proposal had been agreed, the measures taken previously by themselves might not have had the effect and permanence required to be considered expropriatory, but, as no agreement was reached and the measures were never revoked, they stand as part of a gradual process which, with the issuance of Decree 669/01, culminated in the expropriation of Siemens' investment.

272. Contrary to the facts of the cases adduced by Argentina, the acts identified by the Tribunal as measures leading to the expropriation are acts of Argentina, decided at the highest levels of government, and not "simple acts of maladministration by low level officials." For that reason, Argentina's argument that simple acts of maladministration by low-level officials should be pursued in the local courts lacks validity in the circumstances of the instant case.

vii) Was the expropriation in accordance with the Treaty?

273. The Treaty requires that the expropriation be for a public purpose and compensated. The Tribunal finds that there is no evidence of a public purpose in the measures prior to the issuance of Decree 669/01. It was an exercise of public authority to reduce the costs to Argentina of the Contract recently awarded through public competitive bidding, and as part of a change of policy by a new Administration eager to distance itself from its predecessor. On the other hand, the public purpose of the 2000 Emergency Law was to face the dire fiscal situation of the Government. This is a legitimate concern of Argentina and the Tribunal defers to Argentina in the determination of its public interest. However, while the Tribunal would be satisfied in finding that an expropriation has occurred based only on Decree 669/01, and that the public purpose pursued by this Decree, in the context of Argentina's fiscal crisis and the 2000 Emergency Law, would be sufficient to meet the public purpose requirement of expropriation under the Treaty, the Tribunal cannot ignore the context in which Decree 669/01 was issued, nor separate this Decree from the other measures taken by Argentina in respect of the investment that culminated in its issuance. Decree 669/01 became a convenient device to continue the process started more than a year earlier long before the onset of the fiscal crisis. From this perspective, while the public purpose of the 2000 Emergency Law is evident, its application through Decree 669/01 to the specific case of Siemens' investment and the public purpose of same are questionable. In any case, compensation has never been paid on grounds that, as already stated, the Tribunal finds that are lacking in justification. For these reasons, the expropriation did not meet the requirements of Article 4(2) and therefore was unlawful. The Tribunal will examine the issues of compensation after addressing the alleged breaches of other obligations of Argentina under the Treaty.

4. Fair and equitable treatment

a) Positions of the Parties

274. Siemens argues that the obligation to treat an investment fairly and equitably requires arbitral tribunals to take into account the totality of the circumstances in each case. The proposition that investments shall have fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security constitutes the “overriding obligation”, and other standards must be applied as part of this general one. According to Siemens, fair and equitable treatment and full protection and legal security are intended to accord foreign investors broad protection, including a stable and predictable investment environment. Predictability is an essential element of stability, the rules and practices that affect investments must be predictable. A State violates the fair and equitable treatment standard when it fails to respect the specific assurances that it had given to investors as an inducement to invest and on which investors relied in making the investment

275. Siemens contends that Argentina provided assurances that SITS would be allowed to complete the Project and obtain the earnings that were the price of the System in an investment environment that was and would remain stable and predictable. To induce Siemens to invest in the Project, Argentina granted SITS the right to implement the complete and integral provision of the System and to issue all the DNIs to replace those existing on the date of the Contract, and all new DNIs and their renewals after the System entered into operation. The investment logically had to be made before the System startup and the return on the investment was dependent on the issuance of the DNIs and the processing of immigration proceedings.

276. According to Siemens, the acts and omissions previously described destroyed irreparably the legal framework for Siemens' investment, and at all times prior to the unilateral termination of the Contract Argentina promised that the Project would continue and the operation of the System would be resumed. Furthermore, due to Siemens' claim for compensation, Siemens has faced serious problems in other activities in Argentina.

277. Siemens argues that the standard of just and equitable treatment requires stable investment environments by ensuring transparency and predictable rules and practices, which in turn mean that the investor may rely on the undertakings made by the State to the investor. Additionally, fair and equitable treatment means freedom from coercion and harassment, due process and good faith. According to Siemens, RNP interposed serious obstacles to the regular performance of the DNI sub-system, the new authorities after the elections abused the vulnerable position of SITS and the renegotiation process announced in January 2000 was carried out under the threat of the early cancellation of the Contract. Siemens claims that Argentina committed gross procedural improprieties by interrupting the income generating activities, by denying SITS' access to the administrative records, by denying SITS the right to be heard on the May 2001 proposal and withholding information necessary for the decision of SITS on the proposal, by failing to meet the core requirements for terminating the Contract under the 2000 Emergency Law, and by removing administrative files pointing to the Government's failures. Furthermore, after termination of the Contract, SITS was denied information on the background of Decree 669/01 and evidence in support of its position, internal reports were issued without notice to SITS or without recording them in the administrative file, and SITS was excluded from the DNI sub-system test carried out together with SITS' former sub-contractors.

278. According to Siemens, the actions referred to above show also lack of good faith in the conduct of Argentina; in particular, the May 2001 proposal was done in bad faith to trigger the Contract's termination. Siemens adds non-payment of compensation, keeping the Contract performance bond, not taking responsibility for the sub-contractors' claims and the fact that all the alleged contractual breaches on which Argentina bases its defense were never notified to SITS or Siemens.

279. In its Counter-Memorial, as regards the violation of the full protection and security obligation, Argentina argues that the Claimant has failed to allege how this breach had taken place and affirms that this obligation refers only to physical damage. Then Argentina objects to the concept of fair and equitable treatment advanced by Siemens. Argentina argues that fair and equitable treatment means no more than the minimal treatment afforded by international law. It certainly does not mean that it gives arbitral tribunals the power to decide on the basis of equity. Argentina refers approvingly to the interpretation on this point by the NAFTA Free Trade Commission ("FTC"), recent investment treaties signed by the US and the findings of tribunals in Genin, S.D. Myers and Azinian.

280. Argentina disagrees with Siemens on the application of the standard of just and equitable treatment to the facts of the case. Argentina refers to the principle of good faith enshrined in this standard, how this standard applies equally to investors and States and how Siemens breached it during the failed negotiation that led to the rescission of the Contract. Thus Siemens systematically refused to reveal its cost structure; and "[i]n a demonstration of bad faith, Siemens went along with negotiations with the Commission named by the Argentine Government, by successive reductions in the final price of IDs."<sup>93</sup> Siemens also accepted the inclusion of the Contract in the 2000 Emergency Law and is prevented now by the doctrine of estoppel to claim that it was unaware of the implications, for "if its intention was to save the contract, it should have undertaken to bear the consequences that resulted from this emergency and adjust its expectations and claims so as to reach the shared burden of sacrifice" established by this law.<sup>94</sup> The need for shared sacrifice, according to Argentina, stems from the good faith that the parties owe each other, and fair and equitable treatment “in essence constitutes a guarantee of appropriate and reasonable treatment and that this should be viewed and analyzed taking into consideration the concrete and specific historical circumstances of the treatment. Fair and equitable treatment contains elements of good faith, consistency and reasonableness, which should be evaluated always bearing in mind the events that originated this arbitration.”<sup>95</sup>

281. Argentina also contends that the System did not provide the intended security and refers the Tribunal to the multiple security deficiencies pointed out in the audit performed by the Argentine authorities. In this respect, Siemens is responsible for SITS’ failures. It is not possible to make a claim for events affecting the subsidiary and at the same time avoid the legal consequences of the subsidiary’s acts.

282. As a final argument under this heading, Argentina alleges that SITS and Siemens consented to the 2000 Emergency Law in a case of normative acquiescence. Argentina refers in this respect to the Preah Vihear Temple case where the ICJ found: “It is an established rule that the plea of error cannot be allowed as an element vitiating consent if the party advancing it contributed by its own conduct to the error, or could have avoided it, or if the circumstances were such as to put that party on notice of a possible error.”<sup>96</sup> Argentina argues that Thailand, the party pleading error, can be substituted by the Claimant and SITS, which “accepted the emergency and their incorporation to the emergency legal system.”<sup>97</sup>

283. In its Reply, Siemens affirms that the allegation of Argentina that the conduct of SITS or Siemens lacks good faith because of the failure to reveal the cost structure is misplaced. Indeed, Article 2(1) addresses the duties of the State to the investors and not the reverse, and neither the Contract nor the 2000 Emergency Law required such disclosure. As for the doctrines of estoppel and acquiescence invoked by Argentina, Siemens points out that both doctrines had their origins in inter-State relations and it is doubtful that they can be extended to the area of investor-State relations. Siemens claims that there is no statement of fact by Siemens on which Argentina could have relied to its own detriment, and as regards acquiescence to the law, Siemens observes that the applicability of legislation does not depend on the assent or protest of foreign investors or of any other party subject to the law, and the fact that SITS did not take legal action against Resolution No. 1779/00 of the Ministry of the Interior does not mean that Siemens waived its rights under the Treaty against an uncompensated expropriation or other actions violating the Treaty's substantive standards.

284. Siemens denies that the protection accorded by the standard of fair and equitable treatment is the minimum required of States under international law:

“An interpretation that is in accordance with the BIT’s object and purpose would also have to give some independent meaning to the fair and equitable treatment standard. An interpretation that reduces its meaning to standards that are contained already in customary international law would deprive it of any independent meaning and would make the provision redundant. The application of the general principles of international law is already mandated by Article 10, paragraph 5 of the BIT. If Article 2(1) of the BIT providing for fair and equitable treatment is to have an independent meaning it must be in addition to the general principles of international law.”<sup>98</sup>

285. Siemens points out that the Neer standard has been rejected consistently in recent decisions: (i) in ELSI, the ICJ considered that to be a breach of the standard State conduct needs to show “a willful disregard of the process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of judicial propriety”, (ii) in Mondev Intl. Ltd. v. The United States of America and Loewen Group, Inc. and Raymond L. Loewen v. the United States of America, the tribunals used the adjectives “improper and discreditable”, (iii) in Loewen, Waste Management and MTD, the tribunals considered discrimination against foreigners an important indicator of failure to respect fair and equitable treatment, and (iv) in Waste Management and MTD the tribunals used terms such as arbitrariness, idiosyncrasy, injustice, lack of good faith, lack of due process and proportionality.<sup>99</sup>

286. As regards the views of Argentina on the scope of “full protection and security”, Siemens observes that the Treaty goes further than most investment treaties when it refers to “legal” security and this reference is “a strong indication that the provision, as contained in the BIT [Treaty], goes beyond mere physical violence and extends to the investor’s legal position.”<sup>100</sup> Siemens refers to the following measures or omissions that deprived it of its protection and legal security: failure to make the budgetary allocations, suspension of the income-generating activities, renegotiation of the Contract under extreme pressure, and abusive use of the 2000 Emergency Law to terminate the Contract.

287. In its Rejoinder, Argentina argues that, given the failure of SITS to perform its obligations under the Contract and the circumstances of fiscal stringency, the issuance of Decree 669/01 could not be considered an arbitrary, grossly unfair, idiosyncratic measure, nor did it involve lack of due process. Argentina contests the broad interpretation of fair and equitable treatment by Siemens and takes issue with the approach taken by Tecmed and MTD in applying this standard of protection. Argentina considers that the standard applied by these tribunals does not reflect an accurate international standard. Argentina submits that fair and equitable treatment does not encompass the protection of legitimate expectations and the establishment of a stable investment environment.

288. Argentina also submits that, even if the Tribunal were to apply an expanded concept of fair and equitable treatment, there was no violation of this standard by Argentina. Argentina refers to the fact that the Claimant had never raised the political motivation of Argentina's acts before this arbitration and had consented to the acts that it now questions. Argentina submits that Siemens agreed on the laws that it now questions and that is, among other reasons, why there was no violation of the Treaty by Argentina. Argentina wonders what legitimate expectation can be affected by acts of the State to which the investor has consented.

b) Considerations of the Tribunal

289. The parties' allegations raise issues about the scope of standard of fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security and its relevance in this case. As regards the scope, the parties hold different views on whether the obligation to treat an investment fairly and equitably refers to the minimum standard of treatment of aliens under customary international law or requires from the State a higher standard of conduct more in consonance with the objective of the Treaty. They also differ on whether "security" refers to physical security or to security in a wider sense. The Tribunal will first address these two issues.

290. In their ordinary meaning, the terms "fair" and "equitable" mean "just", "even-handed", "unbiased", "legitimate".<sup>101</sup> As expressed in the Treaty preamble, it is the intention of the State parties to intensify their economic cooperation, and their purpose to create favorable conditions for the investments of the nationals of a party in the territory of the other, while recognizing that the promotion and protection of such investments by means of a treaty may serve to stimulate private initiative and improve the well being of both peoples. It follows from the ordinary meaning of "fair" and "equitable" and the purpose and object of the Treaty that these terms denote treatment in an even-handed and just manner, conducive to fostering the promotion and protection of foreign investment and stimulating private initiative. The parties to the Treaty show by their intentions and objectives a positive attitude towards investment. Terms such as "promote" or "stimulate" are action words that indicate that it is the intention of the parties to adhere to conduct in accordance with such purposes. This understanding is confirmed by Article 2(1) of the Treaty, whereby each party even undertakes to promote the investments of nationals or companies of the other party.

291. The specific provision of the Treaty on fair and equitable treatment is found also in Article 2(1) after the commitment to promote and admit investments in accordance with the law and regulations and as an independent sentence: “In any case [the parties to the Treaty] shall treat investments justly and fairly (“En todo caso tratará las inversiones justa y equitativamente”).”<sup>102</sup> There is no reference to international law or to a minimum standard. However, in applying the Treaty, the Tribunal is bound to find the meaning of these terms under international law bearing in mind their ordinary meaning, the evolution of international law and the specific context in which they are used.

292. Argentina has indicated its support for the interpretation of Article 1105 of NAFTA by the FTC. The Tribunal observes first that this article bears the heading “Minimum Standard of Treatment.” Paragraph 1 of this article states: “Each Party shall accord to investments of investors of another Party treatment in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.” As interpreted by the FTC and as indicated in the title of the article, the standard of treatment is the minimum required under customary international law.

293. The question whether fair and equitable treatment is or is not additional to the minimum treatment requirement under international law is a question about the substantive content of fair and equitable treatment. In 1927, the US-Mexican Mixed Claims Commission considered in the Neer case that a State has breached the fair and equitable treatment obligation when the conduct of the State could be qualified as outrageous, egregious or in bad faith or so below international standards that a reasonable and impartial person would easily recognize it as such. This description of conduct in breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard has been considered as the expression of customary international law at that time. For the Tribunal the question is whether, at the time the Treaty was concluded, customary international law had evolved to a higher standard of treatment.

294. It will be useful for this purpose to review the cases referred to by the parties in support of their differing positions. Argentina has particularly relied on Genin. In that case, the tribunal without engaging in a textual analysis of the fair and equitable treatment clause in the US-Estonia BIT considered this requirement to be an international minimum standard, which could only be breached by “a wilful neglect of duty, an insufficiency of action falling far below international standards, or even subjective bad faith.”<sup>103</sup> That tribunal found that, in the circumstances of the case, Estonia did not breach the duty of fair and equitable treatment; however, it hoped that the “Bank of Estonia will exercise its regulatory and supervisory functions with greater caution regarding procedure in the future,”<sup>104</sup> and observed that “the awkward manner by which the Bank of Estonia revoked EIB’s license, and in particular the lack of prior notice of its intention to revoke EIB’s license and of any means for EIB or its shareholders to challenge that decision prior to its being formalized, cannot escape censure.”<sup>105</sup>

295. After the interpretation of the FTC, several tribunals established under NAFTA have held that the customary international law to be applied is the customary international law as it stood when that treaty was concluded and not in 1927. In Mondev, the tribunal held that “the content of the minimum standard today cannot be limited to the content of customary international law as recognized in arbitral decisions in the 1920s.”<sup>106</sup> The same tribunal noted that the State party in the dispute agreed that the international standard of treatment has evolved as all customary international law has, and that the two other State parties to NAFTA also agreed with this point.<sup>107</sup> Therefore, that tribunal considered that:

“the FTC interpretations incorporate current international law, whose content is shaped by the conclusion of more than two thousand bilateral investment treaties and many treaties of friendship and commerce. Those treaties largely and concordantly provide for ‘fair and equitable’ treatment of, and for ‘full protection and security’ for, the foreign investor and his investments.”<sup>108</sup>

And found that “To the modern eye, what is unfair or inequitable need not equate with the outrageous or the egregious. In particular, a State may treat foreign investment unfairly and inequitably without necessarily acting in bad faith.”<sup>109</sup>

296. The tribunal in Loewen came to a similar conclusion: “Neither State practice, the decisions of international tribunals nor the opinion of commentators support the view that bad faith or malicious intention is an essential element of unfair and inequitable treatment or denial of justice amounting to a breach of international justice.”<sup>110</sup>

297. After reviewing arbitral awards under NAFTA, the tribunal in Waste Management II reached the conclusion that:

“the minimum standard of treatment of fair and equitable treatment is infringed by conduct attributable to the state and harmful to the claimant if the conduct is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice, or involves a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety – as might be the case with a manifest failure of natural justice in judicial proceedings or a complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process. In applying this standard it is

<sup>109</sup> Ibid., para. 116. The tribunal in ADF affirmed the same point: “what customary international law projects is not a static photograph of the minimum standard of treatment of aliens as it stood in 1927 when the Award in the Neer case was rendered. For both customary international law and the minimum standard of treatment of aliens it incorporates, are constantly in a process of development.” *ADF Group, Inc. v. relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.”<sup>111</sup>

298. The parties have also referred to Tecmed, which describes just and equitable treatment as requiring:

“treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investment and comply with such regulations.”<sup>112</sup>

299. It emerges from this review that, except for Genin, none of the recent awards under NAFTA and Tecmed require bad faith or malicious intention of the recipient State as a necessary element in the failure to treat investment fairly and equitably, and that, to the extent that it has been an issue, the tribunals concur in that customary international law has evolved. More recently in CMS, the tribunal confirmed the objective nature of this standard “unrelated to whether the Respondent has had any deliberate intention or bad faith in adopting the measures in question. Of course, such intention and bad faith can aggravate the situation but are not an essential element of the standard.”<sup>113</sup> That tribunal also understood that the conduct of the State has to be below international standards but not at their level in 1927 and that, as in Tecmed and Waste Management II, the current standard includes the frustration of expectations that the investor may have legitimately taken into account when it made the investment.

300. The Tribunal has already noted that the standards of conduct agreed by the parties to the Treaty indicate a favorable disposition to foreign investment. The purpose of the Treaty is to promote and protect investments. It would be inconsistent with such commitments and purpose and the expectations created by such a document to consider that a party to the Treaty has breached its obligation of fair and equitable treatment only when it has acted in bad faith.

301. The Tribunal will now turn to the question of the meaning of full protection and security. According to Argentina, “security” refers only to physical security while the Claimant attributes to this term a wider meaning, in particular because the Treaty refers to “legal security.”

302. The Tribunal first notes that, although the parties have argued the application of this standard as a single standard, the Treaty provides for the fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security under two different Articles. The parties do not seem to have found this separation to be significant and the Tribunal will not dwell further on this point. The Tribunal also notes that Argentina in its arguments did not address the fact that security was qualified by “legal” in this instance.

303. As a general matter and based on the definition of investment, which includes tangible and intangible assets, the Tribunal considers that the obligation to provide full protection and security is wider than “physical” protection and security. It is difficult to understand how the physical security of an intangible asset would be achieved. In the instant case, “security” is qualified by “legal”. In its ordinary meaning “legal security” has been defined as “the quality of the legal system which implies certainty in its norms and, consequently, their foreseeable application.”<sup>114</sup> It is clear that in the context of this meaning the Treaty refers to security that it is not physical. In fact, one may question given the qualification of the term “security”, whether the Treaty covers physical security at all. Arguably it could be considered to be included under “full protection”, but that is not an issue in these proceedings.

304. Based on this understanding of fair and equitable treatment and full protection and legal security, the Tribunal will now consider whether the actions of Argentina, identified by the Tribunal as actions taken by Argentina acting as a State, constitute a breach of this obligation.

305. Argentina has argued that Siemens and its subsidiary, for whose conduct Siemens is responsible, acted in bad faith because they accepted the laws of Argentina and alleged before this Tribunal political motives which were never denounced during the long lasting re-negotiation of the Contract. Siemens has argued likewise that it was never notified under the Contract of all the failures that have been alleged by Argentina in these proceedings. The parties' response to these arguments is similar: both parties were intent on reaching a renegotiated agreement that ultimately proved elusive.

306. The Tribunal considers that neither party may hold against the other positions that it may have taken during a good faith negotiation.<sup>115</sup> In any case, acceptance of laws or regulations should not be held against a company which has accepted them by the Government that adopted them. As stated elsewhere by the Tribunal, to comply with the law is not understood to be an optional matter. In this respect, the arguments advanced by Argentina on acquiescence and estoppel are misplaced and have already been dealt with by the Tribunal.

307. On the other hand, the Tribunal finds without merit the argument made by Siemens that since filing its claim Siemens has encountered difficulties to operate in Argentina. This statement is contradicted by the affirmation in Siemens' Reply that Argentina holds Siemens in such high regard that it has repeatedly requested its intervention in other public projects, even after the Contract's termination

308. To conclude, the Tribunal finds that the initiation of the renegotiation of the Contract for the sole purpose of reducing its costs, unsupported by any declaration of public interest, affected the legal security of Siemens' investment. The Tribunal also finds that when a government awards a contract, which includes among its critical provisions an undertaking of that government to conclude agreements with its provinces, the same government can not argue that the structure of the State does not permit it to fulfill such undertaking. This runs counter to the principle of good faith underlying fair and equitable treatment. The arguments made to justify delay in paying compensation without basis in the Contract or Decree 669/01 and the denial of access to the administrative file for purposes of filing the appeal against Decree 669/01 show lack of transparency of Argentina in respect of the investment, particularly when Argentina itself has manifested in these proceedings that at no time had it affirmed that the Contract was rescinded due to the Contractor's fault.<sup>116</sup>

309. For these reasons, the Tribunal finds that the full protection and legal security and fair and equitable treatment obligations under the Treaty have been breached by Argentina.

5. Arbitrary and Discriminatory Measures

a) Positions of the Parties

310. Siemens argues that, based on the plain meaning of "arbitrary", the measures adopted towards Siemens' investment meet the test of arbitrariness: "not governed by any fixed rules or standard", "performed without adequate determination of principle and one not founded in nature of things", "without cause based upon the law", or "failure to exercise honest judgment", "characterization of a decision or action taken by an administrative agency [...] [as] willful and unreasonable action without consideration or in disregard of facts or law or without determining principle."<sup>117</sup>

311. According to Siemens, the intentional frustration of the performance of the Contract when all the investment had been made to put the System into operation was arbitrary. The measures were unreasonable, taken unilaterally without due cause or justification. They caused serious damage to Siemens for which it has not been compensated. The measures were also discriminatory in intent and effect. No other investor was treated like Siemens, no measures such as those imposed on Siemens' investment were adopted by Argentina concerning contracts or investments of similar importance, in particular, no other public contract was terminated by Argentina under the 2000 Emergency Law and compensation has never been paid. These discriminatory measures impaired Siemens' ability to manage, use and enjoy its investment.

312. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina argues that the measures it adopted were reasonable in proportion to their purpose and of general application. Thus, they were neither arbitrary nor discriminatory. Argentina refers to the concept of arbitrariness defined by the ICJ in ELSI: "It is a willful disregard of due process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of juridical propriety;"<sup>118</sup> and the arbitral tribunal in Genin: "any procedural irregularity that may have been present would have to amount to bad faith, a willful disregard of due process of law or an extreme insufficiency of action."<sup>119</sup> According to Argentina, the measures it took were in defense of vital security of the State, to keep the data on its inhabitants secure since otherwise it would violate rights enshrined in international treaties on the protection of human rights.

313. Argentina also questions the qualification as arbitrary of the delay in approving the FOM. The FOM presented by SITS was not in a condition to be approved and Argentina showed diligence by requesting in advance information that would have helped in speeding up the approval process and that SITS did not provide. According to Argentina, a government may not be accused of being arbitrary when it tries to protect and preserve the confidentiality of the data on its inhabitants.

314. As to the meaning of "discriminatory", Argentina contends, based on ELSI and S.D. Myers, that, for a measure to be discriminatory, the measure has to be harmful, favor a national against a foreign investor and be intended to discriminate. Argentina argues that the measures it took were intended to protect its citizens and as such could not be considered discriminatory. Furthermore, the measures taken in relation to Siemens' investment had nothing to do with any differential treatment vis-à-vis any other investor group in the same situation because Siemens was in a unique situation.

315. In its Reply, Siemens insists that in terms of Article 2(3) of the Treaty actions are arbitrary if they are opposed to the rule of law or surprise a sense of juridical propriety, or if a measure harming an investor cannot be justified in terms of rational reasons that are related to the facts. Siemens contests the argument of “voluntary consent” or “acquiescence” by SITS and affirms that what occurred was an abusive exercise of the State’s authority that left SITS powerless. According to Siemens, Argentina’s measures were “arbitrary because they dismantled the entire legal framework that had led Siemens to conduct its investment, contrary to the expectations of any reasonable and impartial person. The political motivation behind Argentina’s actions only serves to emphasize the arbitrariness of the measures adopted.”<sup>120</sup>

316. As regards discriminatory treatment, according to Siemens, the criterion is whether the foreign investor has been treated less favorably than domestic investors or investors of other nationalities; de facto discrimination is sufficient even without violation of the host State’s domestic law. Siemens argues that the measures taken towards Siemens’ investment were not of a general nature; the Contract is the only significant contract terminated which involved a foreign investor and the only foreign investment terminated unilaterally under the 2000 Emergency Law.

317. In its Rejoinder, Argentina recalls that the Contract was unique in terms of its scope, importance, duration and expense. Argentina explains how the Contract could not be compared to the passport issuance contract that the Claimant adduced as evidence of discrimination. Passports are not obligatory, while DNIs are. In the face of an economic crisis, Argentina had a right to protect its interests and those of its citizens. The measures taken by Argentina in response to “the fiscal emergency were of general operation, for a public purpose and did not introduce unreasonable discrimination.”<sup>121</sup> Argentina further explains that the fact that public utilities were excluded from the 2000 Emergency law does not mean that the crisis did not impact their rights, e.g., foreign companies that invested in the natural gas transport and distribution agreed to defer adjustment of their fees as permitted in their contracts sixteen months before the termination of the contract. Argentina concludes by asserting that, given the enormous costs of the Contract, “it cannot be said that the measures taken to terminate it early were unfair, unjust or disproportionate to the extent of the problem in hand.”<sup>122</sup>

b) Considerations of the Tribunal

318. In its ordinary meaning, “arbitrary” means “derived from mere opinion”, “capricious”, “unrestrained”, “despotic.”<sup>123</sup> Black’s Law Dictionary defines this term as “fixed or done capriciously or at pleasure; without adequate determining principle”, “depending on the will alone”, “without cause based upon the law.” There is also abundant case law on the interpretation of this term to which the parties have referred. The Tribunal considers that the definition in ELSI is the most authoritative interpretation of international law and it is close to the ordinary meaning of the term emphasizing the willful disregard of the law. The element of bad faith added by Genin does not seem to find support either in the ordinary concept of arbitrariness or in the definition of the ICJ in ELSI.

319. In the instant case, certain measures taken by Argentina do not seem to be based on reason. Argentina has explained that an authorization was needed to start the operation of the DNM sub-system, but has failed to explain why the authorization was never given after the investment was made and the DNM sub-system had started to operate. Similarly, the Tribunal does not question the importance to the vital interests of Argentina to have secure identification of individuals, but applied to the suspension of the RPN sub-system such argument would have justified requiring an immediate correction of the error. No evidence has been submitted that the error could not be corrected. Instead, SITS was denied the possibility of correcting the error. While the Tribunal could accept that there may have been reasons to justify the temporary suspension of the DNM and RPN sub-systems, the Tribunal finds its permanent suspension arbitrary.

320. As to discriminatory measures, under Article 3(1) and (2) of the Treaty, the parties undertook to treat each other's nationals and companies not less favorably than they treat their own investors or those of a third party. Whether intent to discriminate is necessary and only the discriminatory effect matters is a matter of dispute. In S.D. Myers, the tribunal considered intent "important" but not "decisive on its own."<sup>124</sup> On the other hand, the tribunal in Occidental Exploration and Production Company v. Republic of Ecuador found intent not essential and that what mattered was the result of the policy in question.<sup>125</sup> The concern with the result of the discriminatory measure is shared in S.D. Myers: "The word 'treatment' suggests that practical impact is required to produce a breach of Article 1102, not merely a motive or intent." The discriminatory results appear determinative in Marvin Roy Feldman Karpa v. United Mexican States,<sup>126</sup> where the tribunal considered different treatment on a de facto basis to be contrary to the national treatment obligation under Article 1102 of NAFTA.

321. The Tribunal concurs that intent is not decisive or essential for a finding of discrimination, and that the impact of the measure on the investment would be the determining factor to ascertain whether it had resulted in non-discriminatory treatment. The Claimant has based its arguments mainly on the fact that the Contract was the only major contract, and the only contract with a foreign investor, terminated under the 2000 Emergency Law, while the contract of the Government with an Argentine national to issue passports was allowed to stand notwithstanding the high costs associated with it. The Respondent has explained to the Tribunal that the Contract was unique and that the mandatory nature of DNI justified the difference in treatment. The Tribunal considers that, while there are aspects in the actions of Argentina that seem discriminatory, the allegations of the Claimant have not been fully substantiated. Given the holdings of the Tribunal under other protections of the Treaty, the Tribunal finds it unnecessary to determine whether Argentina breached the non-discriminatory treatment obligation.

VII. Compensation

1. Positions of the Parties

322. Siemens claims that it is entitled to receive full and comprehensive compensation for the breaches of the Treaty and to recover the fair market value of its wrongfully expropriated investment, calculated for valuation purposes immediately before the date of expropriation of May 18, 2001; the loss of profits or lucrum cessans and the additional damage caused as a result of the expropriatory measures and acts, including those damages claimed by subcontractors and suppliers of Siemens and/or SITS regarding the Project and caused by Argentina's expropriation. In addition, Siemens claims pre and post-award interest of 6% compounded annually.

323. Siemens argues that the expropriation was unlawful because it did not meet the conditions of the Treaty and international law, namely, it did not serve a public purpose, it did not satisfy the formal and substantive requirements of due process, it did not comply with the legal standards of treatment set forth in the Treaty and no compensation was paid. Based on the Factory at Chorzów case, Siemens pleads that an illegal dispossession leads to a twofold obligation: first, the obligation to restore the property in question or, if this is not possible, to pay compensation corresponding to its value; and second, there is an obligation to pay damages for any additional losses sustained as a consequence of the taking.

324. Siemens observes that the value of the asset expropriated is not affected by whether or not an expropriation is lawful, but the amount of compensation due to an investor may be significantly affected. In the instant case, Siemens claims that the value of the property at the moment of the taking plus interest to the day of payment is a legal floor, and calls upon the Tribunal to add any potential consequential damages so as to "wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed.”<sup>127</sup>

325. Siemens considers as appropriate the definition of fair market value in Starrett Housing Corp. v. The Islamic Republic of Iran: “[T]he price that a willing buyer would pay to a willing seller in circumstances in which each had good information, each desired to maximize his financial gain, and neither was under duress or threat.”<sup>128</sup>

326. Siemens argues that the fair market value includes the lost future profits that the enterprise would have gained had it been allowed to continue to operate, points out that SITS was a single project company, and affirms that its future revenues and profits were ascertainable on the basis of the commitments made by Argentina. Siemens refers to Norwegian Shipowners, LETCO and the concurring opinion of Judge Brower in Amoco International Finance Corporation, which stated that “[...] where the expropriated property consists of contract rights, the compensation must be defined by the anticipated net earnings that would have been realized, as well as one can judge, had the contract been left in place until completion.”<sup>129</sup>

327. Siemens claims that SITS, as a single project company, had foreseeable and ascertainable revenues and profits based on the commitments made by Argentina. Furthermore, any negative effect of the taking itself or the measures related to the taking must be excluded from the valuation. According to Siemens, a State may not reduce its obligation to pay compensation simply by creating a situation in which expropriation is to be feared before it occurs or by breaching contractual obligations or other duties to the foreign investor.

328. According to Siemens, the appropriate method of valuation is the book value method in its variant of actual investments. Based on this method, Siemens claims that, as of May 17, 2001, the value of its investment amounts to US$283,859,710. Siemens affirms that this amount is comparable to the amounts that could be obtained with the application of other alternative methods of valuation. In addition, Siemens claims to be entitled to US$124,541,000 on account of lucrum cessans.

329. Siemens also claims additional damages based on the unlawful nature of the expropriation measures and the behavior of Argentina prior to and after the date of expropriation. On this account, Siemens claims: (i) the costs incurred for maintaining a skeleton operation in Argentina to allow the conclusion of the Project, (ii) storage costs because of a 20-month delay in the transfer of assets to the Government, (iii) training costs and costs of technical support services provided by SITS during a period in excess of 75 days after May 18, 2001 pursuant to Article 26.3 of the Contract, (iv) damages claimed or that may be claimed by subcontractors involved in the Project's execution as a result of the expropriation, (v) unpaid invoiced services of SITS to the DNE agency in 1999, and (vi) the costs of this arbitration and of counsel. According to Siemens, subcontractors' damages amount to US$44,678,462 and the aggregate amount of the other items is US$9,397,899.

330. Siemens claims pre-award compounded interest at the rate of 6% per annum so that it is fully compensated for the loss suffered and considers that May 18, 2001 should be the date of expropriation for valuation purposes, including for the assessed value of the lost profits. In the case of the additional damages, interest shall be applied from the dates in which they have been caused.

331. Argentina argues in its Counter-Memorial that Siemens is not entitled to the compensation it has claimed: First, the Treaty in Article 4(2) states that compensation shall correspond to the value of the investment expropriated. Argentina interprets the reference to "value" of the investment – as opposed to "fair market value" - to exclude future profits. To support this point, Argentina reviews its own treaty practice and offers examples in four categories ranging from compensation on the basis of fair market value of the investment to the classical Hull formula, or a partial Hull formula or "the value" of the investment as in the case of the Treaty. Argentina alleges that there is no uniformity in the doctrine on the level of compensation.

332. Argentina questions the cases relied on by Siemens to argue the extent of the damages claimed. According to Argentina, in Maffezini, neither lucrum cessans nor future profits were redressed, and full compensation awarded in the Factory at Chorzów case does not correspond to fair market value. Argentina requests the Tribunal to apply the principles of Tecmed, a case that Argentina finds strikingly similar to this case and quotes approvingly its reasoning under Mexican law. Argentina affirms that Argentine law applicable to this case and the 2000 Emergency Law to which Siemens consented do not grant the compensatory right claimed by Siemens.

333. Argentina also questions the currency of the claimed compensation. Argentina argues that it did not guarantee the value of the investment in terms of dollars. Argentina points out that the Contract was not a dollar contract and that Siemens entered into a forward dollar contract to secure US$190 million, the same amount of the alleged loans made by the parent company to its Argentine affiliate. The existence of such contract, according to Argentina, proves that Siemens never intended to enter into a contract with Argentina in a foreign currency.

334. Argentina explains that under Decree 669/01 for Siemens to be compensated in the amount calculated by the Appraisals Tribunal in accordance with the Contract, the applicable law and the Treaty, Siemens has to deliver real assets in condition to be used, otherwise Argentina would not receive any consideration for its compensation. To achieve this objective, the Appraisals TTN established the following conditions: delivery of the source codes, executable programs correctly set up and approved, delivery of the licenses for base software, databases and other necessary utilities, delivery of the licenses for application software of the sub-contractors, delivery of documentation related to applications, systems and training proved as to its usefulness, and ability to use the Contractor's software licenses.

335. Argentina criticizes the valuation carried out by Siemens' expert. Argentina points out that: (i) he did just office work and had not checked the market values to confirm that the amounts charged by suppliers to SITS reflect the usual market practices, (ii) he did not consider whether the intra-Siemens

Group transfers were carried out at arm's length, (iii) he did not carry out the task personally and did not perform any due diligence, (iv) he accepted all of Siemens' assumptions at face value without verifying them, (v) he affirms to have applied the book value method when he never analyzed where the alleged funds of Siemens were invested and the same analysis should have been done in respect of SITS' liabilities, (vi) he maintains that the book value method and the discounted cash flow analysis reach the same result when the figures are different, and (vii) he made a number of mistakes in calculating future income. Furthermore, the supporting documentation of the valuation is lacking.

336. In its Reply, Siemens argues that it is entitled to full compensation and that "investment value" has to be given its plain and ordinary meaning. Siemens points out that: (i) the Treaty does not qualify the reference to investment value, (ii) "value" in its ordinary meaning is defined as "[t]he monetary worth or price of something; the amount of goods, services, or money that something will command in an exchange," and (iii) in a free market economy the exchange is conducted on the market. Therefore, "the plain and ordinary meaning of 'value' is what one may expect to obtain in exchange for something, that is to say its 'fair market value.'"<sup>130</sup>

337. Siemens observes that the legal authorities referred to by Argentina relate to the general debate on the extent of compensation under customary international law and not to the interpretation of the Treaty which contains a clear standard of full compensation. Siemens refers to CME where the tribunal, drawing its conclusions from the Factory at Chorzów case, ruled that "genuine value" in Article 5 of the Netherlands-Czech Republic BIT meant the fair market value of the investment. Siemens also refers to Biloune which held that the fair market value, which takes into account future profits, is the most accurate measure of value of the expropriated property.

338. On the issue of future profits, Siemens draws the attention of the Tribunal to how the ILC has expressed the principle that lost profits are awarded where there is a reliable basis for the expectation of future income:

“In cases where lost future profits have been awarded, it has been where an anticipated income stream has attained sufficient attributes to be considered a legally protected interest of sufficient certainty to be compensable. This has normally been achieved by virtue of contractual arrangements or, in some cases, a well-established history of dealings.”<sup>131</sup>

According to Siemens, the contractual provisions concerning the production, issuance and price of the DNIs and other fees constituted a “legally protected interest of sufficient certainty.”<sup>132</sup>

339. Siemens points out that Argentina refers to documents which are 30 and 45 years old and pertain to debates already settled. Furthermore, in Tecmed, and contrary to what Argentina has alleged, the tribunal awarded compensation in accordance with the provisions of the relevant investment treaty, on the basis of the market value of the assets concerned, lost profits and compound interest.

340. Siemens argues that, for purposes of Siemens’ claim of expropriation under international law, the domestic law of Argentina and the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law are irrelevant.

341. Siemens also contends that, in any case, it is entitled to fair market value on the basis of the Treaty’s most-favored-nation clause and other investment treaties signed by Argentina that specifically provide for such valuation of expropriated assets.

342. Siemens contests the affirmation by Argentina that there was no unlawful expropriation and affirms that the requirements of public benefit, compensation and compliance with the general principles of treatment provided for in the Treaty had not been respected by Argentina. Siemens insists on full damages and, given the unlawful nature of the expropriation, consequential damages all paid in dollars. In this respect, Siemens recalls that the investment was made in dollars and argues that the forward contract itself proves this point. Siemens adds that it is entitled to the value of the investment immediately before the date of the taking when the peso had parity with the dollar. Siemens also recalls that, as it explained at the jurisdictional stage, its right to compensation under the Treaty is distinct from SITS' rights under the Contract and domestic law, and that Argentina never offered nor even approved any compensation under the 2000 Emergency Law.

343. Siemens points out the shortcomings of the valuation report of the TTN, among others: (i) it was never submitted to SITS for consideration, (ii) it was prepared long after termination of the Contract and a long time after SITS lost control and supervision of the System, (iii) it evaluated items individually rather than the System as a whole, and (iv) it was not done in the currency of the investment. According to Siemens, the appraisal done by the TTN does not even reflect the compensation due to SITS under the 2000 Emergency Law.

344. Siemens further points out that Argentina fails to provide a proper response for the sub-contractors' claims and the excuses for withholding the performance bond under the Contract are unsustainable and constitute another arbitrary measure taken by Argentina.

345. As regards Argentina's criticisms of the valuation report prepared by Siemens' expert, Siemens argues that Argentina has misunderstood the task of the expert, which was to evaluate the loss suffered by Siemens on the investment and not to evaluate SITS' loss under the Contract under Argentine law. According to Siemens, it was not the task of this expert to value individual assets: "Valuing hardware and software on a part by part basis, when the very condition of those items are now the result of the expropriation, would provide no support in valuing Siemens A.G.'s investment in the contractual right to operate the System and to generate revenue and return on its investment."<sup>133</sup> Siemens adds that Argentina ignores the fact that the financial statements and accounting records relied on by the expert had been audited by a leading auditing firm – KPMG -, and refers to case law showing the appropriateness of the use of audited accounting records to carry out a valuation task. According to Siemens, Argentina also ignores the fact that SITS was a single project company, which should answer the criticism that the expert never examined where the alleged funds of Siemens were invested. Regarding the costs of the investment, Siemens contends that, if Siemens' global price was the lowest in the bidding for the Contract, the individual cost and prices of the components would also be lowest or extremely competitive compared to other tenders.

346. In its Rejoinder, Argentina argues that the fair market value of an expropriated property as the measure of compensation for an expropriated investment is not always applicable when an expropriation becomes necessary for social policy reasons. If this would not be the case, it would be a serious limitation on State sovereignty, and no social or economic reforms could be accomplished by poorer nations. Argentina maintains that it had effectively become bankrupt, and that to maintain that an expropriation is only lawful if full market compensation is payable is incompatible with the principle of self-determination. Argentina refers in this respect to professor Brownlie's statement that: "The principle of nationalization unsubordinated to a full compensation rule may be supported by reference to principles of self-determination, independence, sovereignty and equality."<sup>134</sup> Argentina also refers to the statement of the European Court of Human Rights in James v. UK, which held that Article 1 of the First Protocol does not "guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances. Legitimate objectives of 'public interest' such as pursued in measures of economic reform or measures designed to achieve greater social justice, may call for less than reimbursement of full market value."<sup>135</sup>

347. Argentina affirms that these considerations are applicable to the situation in Argentina and are entirely consistent with the Treaty. Argentina concludes that, even if there was an expropriation, the Claimant would not be entitled to more than the direct losses and not to the lucrum cessans.

2. Considerations of the Tribunal

348. The Tribunal will address the following issues raised by the parties: applicable law for purposes of determining compensation, the meaning of “value” of the investment, currency of compensation, whether compensation should include lucrum cessans and consequential damages, on what evidence it should be based, the amount of compensation, the applicable rate of interest, and whether it should be simple or compound interest.

a) Applicable Law

349. The Tribunal has found that Argentina took measures that had the effect of expropriating the investment and that such expropriation is in breach of the Treaty, and hence unlawful. The Tribunal has also found that the Respondent breached its obligations to provide fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security and that it adopted arbitrary measures in respect of the investment. The law applicable to the determination of compensation for a breach of such Treaty obligations is customary international law. The Treaty itself only provides for compensation for expropriation in accordance with the terms of the Treaty.

350. The Draft Articles are currently considered to reflect most accurately customary international law on State responsibility. Article 36 on “Compensation” provides:

“1. The State responsible for an internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to compensate for the damage caused thereby, insofar as such damage is not made good by restitution.

2. The compensation shall cover any financially assessable damage including loss of profits insofar as it is established.”

351. This Article relies on the statement of the PCIJ in the Factory at Chorzów case on reparation:

“The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act – a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals – is that reparation must, so far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed.”<sup>136</sup>

352. The key difference between compensation under the Draft Articles and the Factory at Chorzów case formula, and Article 4(2) of the Treaty is that under the former, compensation must take into account “all financially assessable damage” or “wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act” as opposed to compensation “equivalent to the value of the expropriated investment” under the Treaty. Under customary international law, Siemens is entitled not just to the value of its enterprise as of May 18, 2001, the date of expropriation, but also to any greater value that enterprise has gained up to the date of this Award, plus any consequential damages.

b) Value of the Investment

353. In the Factory at Chorzów case, the PCIJ asked the experts to calculate the value of the undertaking as of the date of the taking and as of the later date of its prospective judgment, and such value to include the lands, buildings, equipment, stocks and process, supply and delivery contracts, goodwill and future prospects. It is only logical that, if all the consequences of the illegal act need to be wiped out, the value of the investment at the time of this Award be compensated in full. Otherwise compensation would not cover all the consequences of the illegal act. While the Tribunal has determined that the Treaty does not apply for purposes of determining the compensation due to Siemens, which is governed by customary international law as reflected in Factory at Chorzów, it is worth noting that the PCIJ, as the Treaty itself, refers to the value of the investment without qualification. To reach its conclusion, the PCIJ did not need to have “value” qualified by “full”. The Tribunal is satisfied that the term “value” does not need further qualification to mean not less than the full value of the investment. Having reached this conclusion, it is unnecessary for the Tribunal to discuss the argument advanced by the Claimant that it is entitled to the fair market value of its investment on the basis of the MFN clause in the Treaty.

354. Argentina has pleaded that, when a State expropriates for social or economic reasons, fair market value does not apply because otherwise this would limit the sovereignty of a country to introduce reforms in particular of poor countries. Argentina has not developed this argument, nor justified on what basis Argentina would be considered a poor country, nor specified the reforms it sought to carry out at the time. Argentina in its allegations has relied on Tecmed as an example to follow in terms of considering the purpose and proportionality of the measures taken. The Tribunal observes that these considerations were part of that tribunal's determination of whether an expropriation had occurred and not of its determination of compensation. The Tribunal further observes that Article I of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights permits a margin of appreciation not found in customary international law or the Treaty.

c) Method of Valuation

355. The Claimant has proposed that compensation be calculated on the book value of the investment and that lucrum cessans be arrived at through discounting an estimate of profits calculated as a percentage of the revenues that SITS would have received if the Project would have run its course on the basis of the prices for its services set forth in the Contract. Usually, the book value method applied to a recent investment is considered an appropriate method of calculating its fair market value when there is no market for the assets expropriated. On the other hand, the DCF method is applied to ongoing concerns based on the historical data of their revenues and profits; otherwise, it is considered that the data is too speculative to calculate future profits. Normally the two methods are regarded as alternative means of valuing the same object. Here, however, Siemens's expert has applied the two in tandem because, under the terms of the Contract, all Siemens' costs would be incurred before the first peso of revenue would be realized. Therefore, Siemens has calculated its claimed loss of profits by applying a notional profit percentage to its projected future net revenues under the Contract, and then discounting those claimed profits to their present value via the DFC method, to which it then has added the book value of its costs actually incurred, i.e., its “sunk costs”, which due to the actions of Argentina never will be able to produce the projected (or any) revenues. In other words, Siemens claims: (i) the present value of its estimated lost profits or lucrum cessans, plus (ii) the costs it actually incurred, which were “wasted” in the effort to produce the revenues from which those profits would have been derived.

356. Siemens has defended its approach on the basis that SITS had already by May 18, 2001 incurred most Project development costs, the future costs could be estimated with reasonable certainty based on existing service contracts, and the prices for the delivery of SITS’ services were known as were the number of DNIs to be produced. For these reasons, Siemens has argued that an estimate of the present value of future profits could be calculated to complement the book value of the investment. In this respect, the Lemar Report uses the rate of profits on sales projections presented to the board of Siemens at the time the Project was proposed for approval. At that time, the estimated profit rate was 18%. Expert Lemar reduces it to 16% because of developments during the first year of the Contract. Furthermore, Siemens’ expert compares this estimated profit rate to other companies operating in Argentina with prices subject to State regulation, substantial upfront infrastructure investment cost to deliver the service, and the intention of the Government that they would produce a reasonable return to the owners of the investment.<sup>137</sup> For this purpose, the expert uses information from the Argentine Comisión Nacional de Valores, Bloomberg Services and the National Gas Authority of Argentina. Mr. Lemar arrives at a cross-sector average profit rate of 16%.<sup>138</sup> Thus similar to that projected by Siemens as adjusted.

357. While the Tribunal understands the reasons for the admittedly unusual approach followed by Siemens and considers that it has merit in the particular circumstances of this case, it has some concerns, as later explained, about how the valuation has been calculated, including the valuation of the lucrum cessans.

358. The parties have taken different approaches in respect of what is the adequate evidence of Siemens' investment. For the Claimant, the audited financial statements of SITS are sufficient evidence of the amounts invested. For Argentina, there is a need to show how each dollar or peso was spent and relate each dollar or peso to the item financed with it. Argentina has insisted that the Tribunal use an expert to analyze the accounts of SITS and ensure that the amounts spent by SITS were spent for purposes of carrying out the Project.

359. The Claimant has pointed out that the Project consisted of a made-to-order integrated system to be carried out by a single purpose company –SITS- as required by Argentina itself. Siemens contends that the financial statements properly audited are sufficient evidence of Siemens' investments, that the financial statements of SITS were audited by KPMG, and that no evidence has been presented to question KPMG's audit.

360. The approach advanced by Argentina responds to the need to assess the value to Argentina of Siemens' investment for purposes of applying Decree No. 669/01. The Tribunal has to apply customary international law. Accordingly, the value of the investment to be compensated is the value it has now, as of the date of this Award, unless such value is lower than at the date of expropriation, in which event the earlier value would be awarded. It is not the value of the investment to Argentina but the value of the investment in terms of the sums invested in the Project. The Project had started to operate and no convincing evidence has been submitted showing that the funds intended for the Project made available to SITS, as loans or equity, were not used for the intended purpose. The valuation made by the Respondent was made from a perspective different from that required under customary international law months after the Contract was terminated. For these reasons, the Tribunal saw no merit in prolonging the proceedings and engaging an expert to analyze the accounts of SITS and where the funds had been invested.

e) Currency of Compensation

361. Argentina has argued that the Contract is denominated in pesos and that it had not guaranteed to Siemens the parity of the peso in effect at the time it entered into the Contract. This assertion is correct but it has to be considered in the context of the requirement that the consequences of the illegal act be wiped out. It would be hardly so if the parity of the currency would be added as yet another risk to be taken by the investor after it has been expropriated. In the instant case, the Claimant has pleaded that the Tribunal accept May 18, 2001 as the date of expropriation. The Tribunal has considered that the issuance of Decree 669/01 was determinant for purposes of its finding of expropriation and it is also the date that would be in consonance with Article 15 of the Draft Articles on the date of occurrence of a composite act. On May 18, 2001, the peso was at par with the dollar. If such obligation would have been met, the Claimant would have been compensated in pesos convertible at that rate. Therefore, the Tribunal concludes that compensation shall be paid in dollars.

f) Amount of Compensation

362. Siemens claims $283,859,710 as the book value of the investment to May 17, 2001.

363. Under the Contract (Annex VIII), SITS committed itself to invest $201,486 million ("Plan de Inversiones" dated June 25, 1998 ("the Investment Plan")) and the variable costs such as satellite links, distribution costs of documents, overheads and operational expenses listed in page 2, paragraph 1.1 of Annex VIII. It is clear from the Contract that the total investment would include the items for which an amount is specified in the Investment Plan and those variable costs for which no estimated amount is given.

364. At the time of the 2000 SWIPCO audit, financed by SITS but carried out for the account of the Respondent, SITS had spent 126,235,000 pesos compared with the 241,486,000 envisaged in the Investment Plan. Both figures are exclusive of the variable costs for which no amount was specified in the Investment Plan.

365. After termination of the Contract and for purposes of the valuation carried out by the TTN, SITS claimed to have invested AR$158,106,542. As explained in the report of the TTN of December 27, 2002,<sup>139</sup> AR$47,237 pesos of that amount correspond to subcontractors' invoices and the remainder to invoices of companies in the Siemens group. In addition, SITS claimed "non-productive expenses" (AR$44,452,193), interest on investments and "non-productive expenses" (AR$25,260,008 and AR$8,332,985, respectively), capital contributions (AR$27 million), close-down costs (AR$31 million), certain paid and unpaid invoices (AR$13,100,000), subcontractors' claims (AR$40 million) and lucrum cessans (AR$254,942,070), for a total in excess of AR$444 million. The TTN considered, pursuant to the terms of Decree 669/01, only the AR$158,106,542 on account of investments and valued them at AR$72,161,510.

366. Argentina in its comments of November 23, 2005 on the accounting information provided by Siemens asserts that the investment made reached AR$107,472,398.23. The Claimant disputes the amount and currency of the latest value attributed to the investment by Argentina, and of the valuation of the TTN. The Claimant also points out, inter alia, that "non-productive expenses" and interest have been excluded, notwithstanding the submission of the related invoices by SITS to the Ministry of the Interior on July 22, 2001.

367. Mr. Lemar, the Siemens' expert, has concentrated on the financing of SITS and has calculated the book value by adding Siemens' capital contributions, the loans made to SITS and the corresponding interest, as recorded in SITS's financial statements for 2001. Mr. Lemar concludes that the book value of Siemens' investment at May 17, 2001 was $283,859,710.

368. The Tribunal observes, that except for Mr. Lemar's, none of the valuations listed above respond to the criteria that need to be applied by the Tribunal and, as explained forthwith, the Tribunal has difficulty in accepting the value of the investment as calculated by Mr. Lemar. The Tribunal will use as a starting point SITS' audited financial statements. They have been audited by a highly qualified firm of independent auditors, which confirmed the reliability of the accounting records, and no evidence has been submitted to the Tribunal which proves otherwise. Mr. Lemar has capitalized all interest paid by SITS. Prima facie, capitalization of interest during the development phase of an investment is normal practice. However, the financing of the Project was highly leveraged. Siemens paid-in 27 million pesos in equity and financed the rest primarily by three-month credit at 12.08% in 1999, twelve-month credit at 9% in 2000 and again with three-month credit at 14% in 2001. The high interest charged to the Project and the short-term nature of the credit raise the issue of the extent to which it is appropriate to recognize the full amount of interest claimed as part of the value of the investment since it is a way of building into book value what otherwise would have to be earned as profits. The Tribunal considers that it is appropriate to capitalize interest on loans made to SITS for the Project, but in case of loans made by Siemens or its subsidiaries such interest should reflect the actual cost of funds to Siemens because the Tribunal's task is to determine the loss of Siemens itself. Therefore, the Tribunal will proceed to calculate<sup>140</sup> the respective percentage of loans made to SITS by third parties, and Siemens and its subsidiaries and the costs of funds to the latter.

369. According to the funding data in the table in paragraph 3.7 of the Lemar Report, total loan funding by Siemens and its subsidiaries was AR$224,906,029 and loan funding by others AR$12,194,531 up to April 30, 2001, and AR$225,726,812 and AR$17,241,306 up to May 31, 2001. The Tribunal has adjusted these figures to May 17, 2001 by assuming that debt funding by Siemens, its subsidiaries and third parties increased at a steady daily rate during the month of May. The result is debt funding to May 17 of AR$225,356,136 by Siemens and its subsidiaries, and AR$14,962,117 by third parties. Therefore, Siemens and its subsidiaries provided 93.8% of all loans made to SITS and third parties provided 6.2%.

370. For purposes of determining an appropriate interest rate on loans made by Siemens or its subsidiaries, the Tribunal observes that, as a general matter, corporations of Siemens' size and creditworthiness hedge a substantial portion of the interest rate risk inherent in their fixed rate borrowings through floating interest rate swaps. Hence, the cost of borrowing that should be taken into account is the floating rate that Siemens could have achieved using interest rate swaps during the life of the Contract from November 26, 1998 to May 17, 2001. The average of such interest rate during this period was 2.35%.<sup>141</sup>

371. Now the Tribunal turns to the percentage of interest payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries that would be appropriate to capitalize based on the assumed cost of funds to Siemens in addition to interest payments paid to third parties. To arrive at such percentage, it is necessary to calculate the ratio of 2.35% to the annual average interest rate charged to SITS as reflected in SITS' financial statements.<sup>142</sup> Thus, 2.35% is: (i) 18.35% of 12.08% (the average interest rate charged in fiscal year 1998-1999), (ii) 26.11% of 9% (the average interest rate charged in fiscal year 1999-2000), and (iii) 16.78% of 14% (the average interest rate charged in fiscal year 2000-2001). Therefore, the percentage of interest payments to be capitalized out of payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries is 18.35% in 1998-1999, 26.11% in 1999-2000 and 16.78% in 2000-2001.

372. As recorded in its financial statements, SITS paid on account of interest: AR$150,828 in fiscal year 1997-1998, AR$1,383,596 in fiscal year 1998-1999, AR$12,156,499 in fiscal year 1999-2000 and AR$16,950,704 up to May 17, 2001,<sup>143</sup> for a total of AR$30,642,627. Of that amount, 93.8% would correspond to payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries: AR$1,297,813 in fiscal year 1998-1999,<sup>144</sup> AR$11,402,796 in fiscal year 1999-2000 and AR$15,899,760 in fiscal year 2000-2001 up to May 17, 2001, for a total of AR$28,600,639. The remainder AR$2,041,988 was paid by SITS to third parties. The Tribunal will now apply to the amounts paid by SITS to Siemens and its

<sup>143</sup> During the full fiscal year 2000-2001 SITS paid AR$27,017,497 on account of interest. This amount needs to be adjusted to May 17, 1991 because SITS' fiscal year ran until September 30. For this purpose, the Tribunal has assumed that interest accrued at the same rate each day, divided the amount of interest payments made by 365, multiplied the daily rate by the number of days between May 17 and September 30 -136 days- and deducted the result -AR$10,066,793- from the amount of interest paid that fiscal year. This brings the amount of interest payments between October 1, 2000 and May 17, 2001 to AR$16,950,704.

subsidiaries the yearly percentages arrived at in the preceding paragraph with the following results: AR$234,255 represents 18.35% of the interest paid to Siemens and its subsidiaries in fiscal year 1998-1999, AR$2,977,270 represents 26.11% of such payments made in fiscal year 1999-2000 and AR$2,667,979 represents 16.78% of those made in fiscal year 2000-2001 up to May 17, 2001. These three items add up to AR$5,879,504. The Tribunal will allow that amount of interest paid to Siemens and its subsidiaries plus AR$2,041,988 paid to third parties for a total of AR$7,921,492 to be capitalized for purposes of the calculation of the book value of Siemens' investment. Therefore, the book value calculated by Siemens' expert Lemar should be reduced by the difference between the aggregate amount of interest payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries - AR$28,600,369 - and AR$5,879,504, namely, AR$22,720,865.

373. The book value calculation by Mr. Lemar includes two other items that the Tribunal finds inappropriate. First, in note 5 to SITS' financial statements for fiscal year 2000-2001 under the heading of "Resultados extraordinarios", there is an entry on "Constitución previsión de otros créditos" with an amount of AR$42,253,305. This item cross-refers to note 4.5, which explains that this amount corresponds to tax credits that have been provisioned in full because of the uncertainty regarding their recoverability and have been charged as extraordinary losses. The Tribunal holds the opinion that it is incorrect to include this amount in the book value of SITS for purposes of compensation. Indeed, the tax credits had not been realized because of SITS' lack of revenues. Hence, the amount of AR$42,253,305 should also be subtracted from the calculation of the book value.

374. Second, the Tribunal refers again to note 5 to the financial statements of SITS for fiscal year 2000-2001 and to the item on "Constitución previsión para riesgos relacionados con la rescisión del contrato" under the heading of "Resultados extraordinarios." An entry of AR$10,445,000 is listed on that account. Since the Tribunal has allowed compensation for consequential damages, as explained later, the provisioning for risks related to Contract termination would lead to double counting and is disallowed for purposes of the book value calculation.

375. To conclude the book value calculation, the Tribunal decides that such value is the value claimed by Siemens minus the amounts disallowed above on account of excessive interest rates, tax credits and risks associated with Contract termination. The amounts corresponding to these items add up to AR$75,419,170, which when subtracted from AR$283,859,710 claimed by Siemens reduce the book value of the investment to AR$208,440,540.

376. As the Tribunal has noted, it has been a matter of controversy whether to use funds invested as a measure of the value of the investment or how these funds have been used. The Tribunal has looked into the use of funds as recorded in the financial statements themselves and the result of such examination confirms the adjusted book value set forth above. The Tribunal has taken into account the items in the financial statements that correspond to the Project as such, “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost”. It emerges from note 5 to SITS’ 2001 audited financial statements (“Estado de resultados” under the heading of “Resultados extraordinarios”) that, in 2001 and because of the termination of the Contract, SITS wrote off AR$39,777,220 of intangible assets, AR$49,678,876 of “bienes de uso” and AR$123,127,297 of “project costs”. These three items add up to AR$212,583,393.

377. The audited financial statements reflect the financial situation of SITS on September 30, 2001 and the Tribunal has the task to value the investment of Siemens at May 17, 2001. Therefore, the Tribunal has considered it appropriate to compare the aggregate amount of funds applied to “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost” between September 2000 and September 2001, to assume that these funds were applied at the same daily rate through the period, and to subtract from the difference the amount corresponding to the 136 days between May 17 and September 30, 2001. These assumptions correspond, mutatis mutandis, to those applied by expert Lemar to the sources of funds to calculate the value of the investment to May 17, 2001. The financial statements for 2001 show that SITS spent AR$20,741,994 in “project cost” during the year and AR$8,973,678 on “bienes de uso” (no funds were applied to intangible assets). These two items add up to AR$29,715,672. This amount prorated by 365 days results in a daily application of funds to such items of AR$81,412.8, which multiplied by 136 is equal to AR$11,072,140. The subtraction of this amount from AR$212,583,393 (the sum expended on account of “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost”) results in AR$201,511,253, which the Tribunal considers a reasonable approximation to the amount applied to “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost” up to May 17, 2001. When the allowed capitalized interest of AR$7,921,492 is added to this amount we arrive at AR$209,432,745. A result slightly higher than the book value, which can be explained by the adjustments that need to be made to reflect the value of the investment on May 17, 2001.

378. Siemens further claims $124,541,000 on account of loss profits before taxes.

379. The Tribunal considers that the amount claimed on account of lost profits is very unlikely to have ever materialized for the following reasons:

380. First, in considering the estimated rate of profit on sales, the Tribunal recalls that the calculation of the Claimant assumes the issuance of 33 million DNI. The Tribunal considers that this amount is excessive taking into account that the Claimant accepted to make the investment with a guaranteed minimum of 24 million DNI (Article 16(b) of the Contract).<sup>145</sup> Therefore, the estimated amount of revenues of AR$889,147,000 calculated by the Claimant needs to be reduced by AR$270 million (30 pesos per each DNI multiplied by 9 million) to AR$619,147,000.

381. Second, the amount of AR$619,147,000 includes a 21% value added tax (Article 4.4 of the Contract) equal to AR$107,455,000, which needs to be subtracted and results in AR$511,692,000. Applying to this amount the 16% profit rate results in profits before applicable taxes of AR$81,870,000 over the life of the Contract.

382. Third, the discount rate to be applied to the estimated profits should reflect the cost of money and the country and business risks. According to Siemens' own expert, this should be a rate within a range of 11% and 15%. Mr.

<sup>145</sup> The TTN points out in its report that the license of Printrak that SITS held to print DNIs was valid for printing only 24 million documents. Exhibit 161 to the Counter-Memorial, folio 15.

Lemar himself has offered a calculation using a rate in the middle of such range - 13%. The Tribunal considers this rate appropriate taking into account the country and business circumstances of the operation and the cost of funds.

383. Fourth, Siemens' expert has discounted the profits over the expected life of the Contract assuming that it would not be extended. It was possible for the Contract to be extended for an additional six years. It would not be unreasonable to assume that delays would have occurred in the normal course of Project operation given the novelty and complexity of the Project; it is undisputed by the parties that it was the first of its kind. Furthermore, the analysis performed by Mr. Lemar to take into account the three-month delay in Project start-up shows the sensitivity of profits to delays in the timing of revenues. A delay of three months resulted in a drop of 2% in the profit rate notwithstanding the addition of AR$29 million in revenues for printing of electoral roles which had been underestimated in an earlier calculation. An extension of the Contract to 9 or 12 years would have had devastating effects on the profit rate.

384. Fifth, the profits would have been subject to a corporate profits tax.

385. For these reasons, the Tribunal concludes that Siemens is not entitled to any compensation on account of profit loss.

386. Additionally, Siemens has claimed $9,178,000 for post-expropriation costs incurred by SITS in continuing a skeleton operation, $219,899 for unpaid invoices by the Government in relation with the voters list of 1999, $44,678,462 for sub-contractors' claims, and the return of the performance bond.

387. The Tribunal considers that the claim on account of post-expropriation costs is justified in order to wipe out the consequences of the expropriation. As regards the sub-contractors' claims, Argentina has affirmed to have taken the necessary measures to ensure that these claims are transferred to Argentina. The Tribunal acknowledges this affirmation and decides that Argentina shall hold the Claimant, its subsidiaries and affiliates, wherever located, harmless from, and indemnify same in respect of, any claims heretofore or hereafter asserted against any of them by any of the following subcontractors to SITS in relation to the Contract: Boldt S.A., Correo Argentino S.A., Printrak International/Printrak de Argentina S.R.L., Imaging Automation Inc., Impsat S.A., SWIPCO Argentina S.A., Mojacar S.A., Indra Spain and Indra Argentina, and Oracle.

388. Since the Contract was terminated on grounds other than performance, it is congruent that the performance bond be returned promptly to Siemens or SITS, as its agent for this purpose. Should the bond not have been returned 30 days after the date of this Award, Argentina shall pay the Claimant the amount of the bond.

389. As for the amount claimed on account of services rendered and unpaid, the Tribunal considers that, since such amount is not disputed and would normally be considered an asset forming part of the value of the investment, the Respondent shall compensate Siemens for the full amount claimed.

g) Interest

390. The Claimant has requested that the Tribunal award compound interest at the rate of 6% per annum and that interest accrue as from May 18, 2001 for compensation on account of the expropriated investment and as from the date costs were incurred in the case of compensation for additional damages. The Lemar Report takes into account a number of options before arriving at the conclusion that 6% would be an appropriate rate to apply based on the consideration that this is the rate that Siemens used as its average corporate borrowing rate in appraising investments and in considering funding costs in 2001-2003. The rate of 6% has also been advanced in Professor Schreuer's opinion on the basis of arbitral practice.

391. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent does not comment on the issue of the applicable rate of interest. In its Rejoinder, Argentina simply disputes the rate of interest claimed since the Treaty provides that interest be paid at "the usual bank rate." No alternative interest rate is proposed nor is any reason adduced to question how the Claimant has arrived at that rate. Argentina seems to presume that “the usual bank rate” would be different but without specifying what this bank rate should be.

392. In its Rejoinder, the Respondent objects to the award of compound interest, it considers that this is an inappropriate case for awarding compound interest without offering reasons why this would be so, and responds to the Claimant’s assertion that compounding of interest is in line with the principle of full damages as follows:

“That may theoretically be the case if in fact the investor has borrowed elsewhere to make good the loss of the money which it is said it should have received. But nowhere is it claimed that this Claimant was obliged to make good any financial losses by itself borrowing money at compound interest rates from banks. Thus, the claim for loss of the interest on interest which it is said would have been earned is unfounded in fact as well as being entirely speculative. This element of the Claim amounts to an attempt by the Claimant to unjustly enrich itself in the circumstances of this case.”<sup>146</sup>

393. Argentina further objects to the date of May 18, 2001 as the date from which interest would accrue. It argues that, since the Treaty is silent on this point, it would be artificial to attribute most losses as from that date and speculative and complex to establish dates when the additional damages occurred.

394. The Tribunal will address first the applicable rate of interest, then turn to the questions of the date as from which interest should accrue and whether interest should be simple or compounded.

395. As an expression of customary international law, Article 38 of the Draft Articles states:

“1. Interest on any principal sum payable under this Chapter shall be payable when necessary in order to ensure full reparation. The interest rate and mode of calculation shall be set so as to achieve that result.

---

2. Interest runs from the date when the principal sum should have been paid until the date the obligation to pay is fulfilled.”

396. Thus, in determining the applicable interest rate, the guiding principle is to ensure “full reparation for the injury suffered as a result of the internationally wrongful act.”<sup>147</sup> The Tribunal considers that the rate of interest to be taken into account is not the rate associated with corporate borrowing but the interest rate the amount of compensation would have earned had it been paid after the expropriation. Since the awarded compensation is in dollars, the Tribunal considers that the average rate of interest applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit is an appropriate rate of interest. The average of such rate from May 18, 2001 to September 30, 2006 is 2.66%.<sup>148</sup>

397. For purposes of erasing the effects of the expropriation, interest should accrue from the date the Tribunal has found that expropriation occurred, namely, May 18, 2001, in respect of the book value of the investments made for the Project up to that date. Compensation for post-expropriation costs incurred after May 18, 2001 should accrue interest as from the date on which they were incurred. Since this would not be practical for calculation purposes given the multiple dates involved, the Tribunal considers that interest on post-expropriation costs shall accrue as of January 1, 2002, date by which most of these costs had been incurred ($9,339,863 out of a total claimed of $9,807,638). As for interest on unpaid Government bills, interest should accrue from January 1, 2000 since they relate to services rendered in 1999.

398. In the eventuality that Siemens or any of its affiliates or subsidiaries would be held liable for any of the claims of the sub-contractors related to the Contract, interest shall accrue from the date of payment of any such claim. Furthermore, in the eventuality that the performance bond is not returned by the Respondent within 30 days of the dispatch of this Award to the parties, interest shall accrue on the amount of the bond as from 30 days after the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties and until such amount has been fully paid.

399. As regards compounding of interest, the question is not, as argued by Argentina, whether Siemens had paid compound interest on borrowed funds during the relevant period but whether, had compensation been paid following the expropriation, Siemens would have earned interest on interest paid on the amount of compensation. It is in this sense that tribunals have ruled that compound interest is a closer measure of the actual value lost by an investor. As expressed by the tribunal in Santa Elena:

“[w]here an owner of property has at some earlier time lost the value of his asset but has not received the monetary equivalent that then became due to him, the amount of compensation should reflect, at least in part, the additional sum that his money would have earned, had it, and the income generated by it, been reinvested each year at generally prevailing rates of interest.”<sup>149</sup>

400. Similarly have held the tribunals in Metalclad and Wena Hotels. The Ad Hoc Committee in Wena Hotels decided that it was within the tribunal’s power to take the option of compound interest as an alternative compatible with the objectives of prompt, adequate and effective compensation and compensation that reflects the market value of the investment immediately before the expropriation.<sup>150</sup>

401. For these reasons, the Tribunal concludes that interest shall be compounded and be compounded annually.

VIII. Costs

402. In order to take into account that the Claimant has not fully prevailed in these proceedings, the Tribunal determines that each party shall bear its own legal costs, and that Argentina and Siemens shall be responsible for 75% and 25%, respectively, of the fees and expenses of the Tribunal and the costs of the ICSID Secretariat.

IX. Decision

403. Having carefully considered the parties' arguments in their written pleadings and oral submissions and for the reasons above stated the Tribunal unanimously decides:

1. that the Respondent breached Article 4(2) of the Treaty by expropriating Claimant's investment without complying with its terms;
2. that the Respondent breached Articles 2(1) and 4(1) of the Treaty by failing to accord fair and equitable treatment and full protection and legal security to the investment of the Claimant;
3. that the Respondent has breached Article 2(3) of the Treaty by the arbitrary measures taken in respect of the investment of the Claimant;
4. that the Respondent shall pay forthwith to the Claimant compensation in the amount of $208,440,540 on account of the value of its investment, $9,178,000 on account of consequential damages and $219,899 on account of unpaid bills for services rendered by SITS to the Government;
5. that the Respondent shall forthwith, and in no event later than thirty (30) days from the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties, deliver to Claimant (or SITS as its agent for this purpose) the Contract performance bond provided by SITS (insurance policy No. 000589772) for an amount of $20 million);
6. that the Respondent shall hold the Claimant, its subsidiaries and affiliates, wherever located, harmless from, and indemnify same in respect of, any claims heretofore or hereafter asserted against any of them by any of the following subcontractors to SITS in relation to the Contract: Boldt S.A., Correo Argentino S.A., Printrak International/Printrak de Argentina S.R.L., Imaging Automation Inc., Impsat S.A.,

SWIPCO Argentina S.A., Mojacar S.A., Indra Spain and Indra Argentina, and Oracle;

7. that the Respondent shall pay to the Claimant interest compounded annually on the sums listed in point 4 of this decision at the rate of 2.66%, which is the average rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit from May 18, 2001 to September 30, 2006; such interest to accrue as from May 18, 2001 in the case of compensation on account of the value of the investment, January 1, 2000 in the case of compensation on account of unpaid bills by the Government, and January 1, 2002 in the case of compensation on account of consequential damages, all until the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties;
8. that, in the eventuality that the Respondent had not paid in full the sums referred to in this decision thirty (30) days after the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties, the Respondent shall pay to the Claimant interest compounded annually on the unpaid sum at the rate set forth in point 7 of this decision; such interest to accrue as from thirty (30) days after the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties until such amount has been fully paid;
9. that the Respondent shall, in the eventuality that the Respondent has not delivered the bond referred to in point 5 of this decision to the Claimant (or SITS as its agent) thirty (30) days after the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties, forthwith pay to the Claimant the full amount of the bond. Such amount to bear interest compounded annually at the rate set forth in point 7 of this decision until fully paid;
10. that the Respondent shall, in the eventuality that Siemens or any of its affiliates or subsidiaries would be held liable for any claims of the sub-contractors listed above, pay interest compounded annually at the rate set forth in point 7 of this decision on any amount paid to satisfy such liability; such interest to accrue from the date of payment of any such amount;

11. that any funds to be paid pursuant to this decision shall be paid in dollars and into an account outside Argentina indicated by the Claimant and net of any taxes and costs;
12. that each party shall bear its own costs and counsel fees;
13. that the Respondent and the Claimant shall be responsible for 75% and 25%, respectively, of the fees and expenses of the arbitrators and the costs of the ICSID Secretariat; and
14. that all other claims are dismissed.

3. SUMMARY OF THE ARBITRAL PROCEEDINGS

3.1 INITIATION OF THE ARBITRATION AND CONSTITUTION OF THE ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL

10. On 11 March 2005, the Claimant filed its Request for Arbitration with the Secretary-General of the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID”). With respect to the “method of appointment of the Tribunal and appointment of arbitrator,” ¶¶ 72 of the Request set forth the following:

The Treaty does not set forth any particular method of appointment of the Tribunal. Having regard to Article 37 of the Convention and Rule 2 of the ICSID Arbitration Rules, Parkerings proposes that the Tribunal consist of three arbitrators, one appointed by each party and the President of the Tribunal appointed by agreement of the parties.

11. Under ¶¶ 73 of the Request for Arbitration, the Claimant appointed as its arbitrator Dr. Julian D. M. Lew, Q.C. On 21 June 2005, ICSID informed the parties that Dr. Lew had accepted his appointment as arbitrator.
12. On 17 March 2005, ICSID addressed to the Respondent a copy of the Request for Arbitration.
13. On 22 April 2005, ICSID requested, in accordance with Rule 2(1)(c) of the Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings (Institution Rules), that the Claimant communicate to the Centre, on the one hand, “information concerning the consent of Parkerings-Compagniet AS to submit the dispute with the Republic of Lithuania to ICSID,” and, on the other hand, “evidence of entry into force of the bilateral investment treaty between the Government of the Republic of Lithuania and the Government of the Kingdom of Norway of June 16, 1992.” The Claimant provided the requested information by letter dated 29 April 2005.
14. On 16 May 2005, the Secretary-General of ICSID issued a “Notice of Registration,” stating that the Request for Arbitration, as supplemented by counsel for the Claimant’s letter of 29 April 2005, had been registered in the Arbitration Register. He also invited the parties to “communicate [...] any provisions agreed by them regarding the number of arbitrators and the method of their appointment.”

15. By letter dated 27 May 2005, the Respondent informed ICSID that “it raises no objection to the Parkerings-Compagniet AS proposal regarding the Arbitral Tribunal consisting of three arbitrators.”
16. By letter dated 8 August 2005, the Respondent requested an extension of the 15 August 2005 deadline for the constitution of the Tribunal to 15 September 2005. By letter dated 12 August 2005, the Claimant declared that it did not object to such time extension.
17. By letter dated 9 September 2005, counsel for the Respondent appointed the Honorable Marc Lalonde P.C., O.C., Q.C. as arbitrator. On 15 September 2005, ICSID informed the parties that Mr. Lalonde had accepted his appointment.
18. On 3 October 2005, counsel for the parties jointly informed ICSID of the parties’ agreement to appoint Dr Laurent Lévy as President of the Tribunal. By letter dated 10 October 2005, Dr Lévy accepted his appointment.
19. On 12 October 2005, ICSID informed the parties that all three arbitrators had accepted their appointment and that the Arbitral Tribunal was deemed to have been constituted and the proceedings to have begun on that same day.

3.2 FIRST SESSION OF THE TRIBUNAL

20. The Arbitral Tribunal held a first session on 25 November 2005 in London, UK. In addition to the Members of the Tribunal and the Secretary, the following persons attended the hearing:
  - (i) Representing Parkerings:
    - Ms. Carita Wallgren, Roschier Holmberg, Attorneys Ltd.,
    - Mr. Gaetan J. Verhoosel, Debevoise Plimpton LLP, and
    - Mr. Zilvinas Kvietkus, Norcous & Partners.
  - (ii) Representing Lithuania:
    - Mr. Paulius Koverovas, State Secretary of the Ministry of Justice of the Republic of Lithuania,
    - Mr. Constantine Partasides, Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer LLP,
    - Mr. Noah Rubins, Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer LLP, and
    - Ms. Renata Beržanskienė, Law Office Adamonis, Beržanskienė and partners Sorainen Law Offices.

21. A sound recording was made of the hearing, copies of which were sent to the parties. The Secretary also prepared summary minutes of the session, a certified copy of which was sent to the parties on 18 January 2006.
22. At the outset of the hearing, a number of procedural issues were dealt with. In particular, it was agreed that, pursuant to Article 44 of the ICSID Convention, the proceedings would be conducted in accordance with the ICSID Arbitration Rules in force since 1 January 2003. It was also agreed that the place of the proceedings would be Paris, France, and that, in accordance with Article 22 of the ICSID Arbitration Rules, the language of the proceeding would be English. During the course of the session, the parties acknowledged that the Tribunal has been duly constituted.
23. The Arbitral Tribunal and the parties agreed on the following time table:

The Claimant shall file its memorial on the merits by February 10, 2006;

The Respondent shall file its counter-memorial on the merits, any jurisdictional objections and any request for bifurcation of the proceeding by June 12, 2006;

The Claimant shall file its observations on the Respondent's request for bifurcation, if any, by July 3, 2006;

A pre-hearing conference limited to pending procedural questions will be held in Paris on August 28, 2006; and

A hearing on the merits or on jurisdiction or on both will be held in Paris on November 6-10, 2006.

3.3 PRE-HEARING WRITTEN PHASE

24. On 17 January 2006, the Claimant filed a request for the production of documents.
25. On 20 January 2006, the Respondent acknowledged receipt of the Claimant's document production request, and filed its comments thereon.
26. On 24 January 2006, the President of the Tribunal invited, on the one hand, the Claimant to submit its reply to the Respondent's observations within four days, and, on the other hand, the Respondent to submit its rejoinder within four days of the reply. The President of the Tribunal also invited the Respondent to gather and communicate to the Claimant all the documents that it accepted to produce without awaiting a decision from the Tribunal.
27. By letter dated 27 January 2006, counsel for the Claimant informed the Tribunal that the parties had agreed upon the following production schedule, subject to the agreement of the Tribunal:

1. By February 6, 2006, Respondent shall: (i) produce to Claimant the documents responsive to categories (a), (b), (d), (e), (f), (g), and (h) of the Application; and (ii) inform Claimant whether and, if so by when, it expects to be in a position to produce to Claimant the documents responsive to categories (c), (i), (j), (k), (l), and (m) of the Application.

2. If by February 6, 2006, Respondent confirms a schedule for the production of the documents responsive to categories (c), (i), (j), (k), (l), and (m), the parties shall endeavor to reach an agreement on any adjustments to the schedule of the arbitral proceedings required by such proposed schedule, on the understanding that: (i) any such adjustments shall not affect the August 28, 2006 pre-hearing conference or the evidentiary hearing scheduled for November 6-10, 2006; (ii) Claimant's Memorial shall be due by a date no earlier than February 17, 2006; and (iii) any extension accorded to Claimant, at a minimum, shall not diminish the amount of time allotted to Respondent for the submission of its Counter-Memorial.

3. Should the parties have any dispute over the scope or schedule of production proposed by Respondent by February 6, 2006 in accordance with ¶¶ 1 or 2 above, they shall promptly submit such dispute to the Tribunal for resolution. The parties agree that, should such a dispute arise, Claimant's Memorial shall be due by a date no earlier than February 17, 2006, and the parties shall consult to agree on a mutually acceptable schedule for submissions, again with the understanding that the August 28, 2006 pre-hearing conference and the evidentiary hearing scheduled for November 6-10, 2006 shall not be affected and that such schedule, at a minimum, shall not diminish the amount of time allotted to Respondent for the submission of its Counter-Memorial.

28. Counsel for the Claimant added that "in light of the [...] agreed Schedule, Claimant withdraws the Application at this time. Claimant's right to revive the Application in whole or in part is reserved in accordance with ¶ 3 of the Schedule."

29. By letter dated 17 February 2006, counsel for the Claimant informed the Tribunal that the parties had agreed on the following further adjustments to the schedule of the arbitral proceedings, subject to the agreement of the Tribunal:

- Claimant shall submit its Memorial on February 24, 2006.
- Respondent shall submit its Counter-Memorial on June 26, 2006.
- Claimant shall file its observations on Respondent's request for bifurcation, if any, by July 17, 2006;

The dates scheduled for the pre-hearing conference (August 28, 2006) and the evidentiary hearing (November 6-10, 2006) remain unchanged.

30. On 17 February 2006, the Secretary wrote to the parties to confirm the new schedule for the submission of written pleadings as agreed upon by the parties.

31. On 27 February 2006, the Secretary received the Claimant's Memorial, with accompanying documentation (two witness statements, one expert report, exhibits numbered CE 1 through CE 259, and authorities numbered CA 1 through CA 57), under cover of a letter dated 24 February 2006

32. By letter dated 5 June 2006, the Claimant filed, in agreement with the Respondent, the following additional documents to complement its submission of 24 February 2006:

- (i) a supplemental statement by Mr. Carlos Lapuerta responding to corrected parking revenue data provided by Respondent following submission of Mr. Lapuerta's expert report on February 24, 2006;*
- (ii) four new exhibits (CE 260-263) consisting of documents produced by Respondent on May 22, 2006 in response to a supplemental document request by Claimant, including excerpted translations; and*
- (iii) in accordance with Arbitration Rule 25, the annexed list of corrections of accidental errors in Claimant's February 24, 2006 submission, as well as corrected versions of four exhibits submitted with Claimant's Memorial and/or their translations (CE 21, 54, 70 and 247). This list and these corrected exhibits were previously provided to Respondent on May 4, 2006.*

33. By letter dated 27 June 2006, counsel for the Respondent sought “the Tribunal’s approval of the parties’ agreement to grant the Republic an extension for the filing of its Counter-Memorial until July 24, 2006, subject to the following two conditions: (i) the Republic’s commitment not to seek any bifurcation of the proceedings; and (ii) the maintenance of the remainder of the schedule as agreed at the procedural hearing (including the dates of the August 2006 pre-hearing/preliminary conference on procedural questions and the November 2006 hearing on the merits).” Counsel for the Respondent further confirmed that “the Republic will comply with the above conditions and will be filing its Counter-Memorial within the agreed deadline.”
34. By email of 28 June 2006 and letter dated 30 June 2006, the Secretary informed the parties of the Tribunal’s approval of their agreement to extend the time limit for the filing of the Counter-Memorial until 24 July 2006.
35. On 25 July 2006, counsel for the Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial and accompanying documents (two witness statements, one expert report, exhibits numbered RE 1 through RE 94, and authorities numbered RA 1 through RA 49).
36. On 28 August 2006, the Tribunal, the parties, and the Secretary held a pre-hearing telephone conference, at the close of which the President of the Tribunal issued directions regarding the parties’ opening statements and the evidence that counsel for the parties would wish to present during the hearing. The President of the Tribunal further authorized the Claimant to file, by 15 September 2006 at the latest, two additional statements of new witnesses as well as new exhibits, provided that the issues discussed in the additional witness statements and the new exhibits be strictly limited to rebuttal of allegations made by the Respondent in its written submission or by the Respondent’s witnesses, and do not pertain to allegations already made by the Claimant or contemplated by its witnesses in prior submissions. The President also authorized the Respondent to file, by 20 October 2006 at the latest, additional statements of new witnesses (in principle, no more than two) or supplemental statements of existing witnesses, as well as additional exhibits, provided that the facts discussed in these additional/supplemental witness statements and exhibits be strictly limited to rebuttal of allegations made by the Claimant’s new witnesses or of the contents of the Claimant’s additional exhibits. The President of the Tribunal invited the parties to inform the Tribunal, by 27 October 2006 at the latest, which additional witness(es) would be called for oral examination and which adjustments would need to be made with respect to the sequence and timing of witness examination. Finally, the President of the Tribunal issued the following additional directions:
- Witnesses will be allowed in the hearing room at any time (i.e before and after their examination). Either party may, however, apply for the exclusion of one or more witnesses from the hearing room, at certain or all times. To avoid wasting time on procedural issues during the hearing week, counsel are invited to confer before filing any such application.
  - The issue whether counsel shall have the opportunity to make oral closing statements and/or to file post-hearing briefs shall be discussed at the hearing. The Tribunal shall issue a determination in this respect by Wednesday 12 November 2006 at the latest, upon request from the parties, if not ex officio.

- Upon agreement between the parties, the hearing shall end on Friday at 1:30 p.m. at the latest.

37. On 15 September 2006, Parkerings filed:

- two additional statements of new witnesses (Björn Öberg and Sigitas Burnickas);
- two new legal authorities that had allegedly only been issued and become available after Parkerings' submission of 24 February 2006 (CA 58 and CA 59); and
- 37 new exhibits (CE 264-CE 300).

38. On 20 October, Lithuania filed:

- two additional statements of new witnesses (Jonas Endriukaitis and Ingrida Simonyte);
- two new legal authorities (RA 50 and RA 51); and
- 9 new exhibits (RE 95-RE 103).

39. On the same date, Parkerings filed five additional documents (CE 301-CE 305).

40. On 30 October 2006, Lithuania wrote that it had no objection to the Claimant's submission of Exhibits 301-305. On the same date, Lithuania filed additional documents (RE 104 – RE 108). The Claimant did not object to the new exhibits.

3.4 THE EVIDENTIARY HEARING

41. On 27 October 2006, the Claimant addressed to the Tribunal a letter regarding the witnesses it would put forward at the hearing. On 30 October 2006, the Respondent filed a similar communication in this respect.

42. The evidentiary hearing was held in Paris on 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 November 2006, in the course of which the following witnesses and experts were heard:

1. Mr. Bjørn Havnes
2. Mr. Sigitas Burnickas
3. Mr. Jonas Tamulis
4. Mr. Björn Oberg
5. Professor Gintautas Bartkus
6. Mr. Robertas Staskevicius
7. Mr. Raivydas Rukstele

8. Mr. Jonas Endriukaitis
  9. Ms. Ingrida Šimonytė
  10. Mr. Carlos Lapuerta
  11. Mr. Tim Giles
43. During the hearing, the Claimant filed additional documents (CE 306 – CE 311) and two additional authorities (CA 60 and CA 61)
  44. Shortly after the hearing, the Arbitral Tribunal and the parties agreed on the procedural follow-up to the hearing. In particular, they agreed that the parties would file simultaneous post-hearing briefs on 8 December 2006; the parties would file simultaneous reply post-hearing briefs consisting in a short letter response within one week of the first submission; and the parties would submit their respective statements on costs jointly with their post-hearing briefs and a statement summarizing the costs by 22 December 2006.

3.5 THE POST-HEARING BRIEFS

45. The parties simultaneously filed their first post-hearing briefs on 8 December 2006.
46. On 15 December 2006, Parkerings sent a letter to the Tribunal which identified errors in Lithuania's Counter-memorial and Lithuania's post-hearing brief.
47. On 22 December 2006, the parties filed their statement of costs.
48. On 19 January 2007, the Tribunal informed the parties that it did not find necessary to hold an additional hearing.
49. On 9 May 2007, Parkerings filed a revised statement of costs.
50. On 25 May 2007, the Tribunal declared the proceedings closed in accordance with Rule 38(1) of the Arbitration Rules.

4. MAIN FACTS RELATING TO THE MERITS OF THE DISPUTE

4.1 THE TENDER

51. Following Lithuania's gradual transition between 1991 and 1997 from a Soviet Republic to a candidate for EU membership and a market economy, the Municipality of the City of Vilnius decided to create a modern, integrated parking system for the City of Vilnius, in order to control traffic and protect the integrity of the City's historic Old Town.
52. The Municipality announced a tender (the "Vilnius Tender") for the purpose of obtaining private investment in connection with the design and operation of this parking system, including the construction of two multi-storey car parks ("MSCP").

53. On 13 November 1997, the “Organisation of Investment Development Tender Regulations” was approved by the Board of Vilnius City by Decision No. 1819V (RE 7). The Mayor charged the “Commission on Organization of Tenders for the Lease of Land Plots” with the organization of investment development tenders, and appointed his advisor, Robertas Staskevicius, as “head of the working party” (RE 7). The Commission retained the services of a Dutch consulting firm, Tebodin Consultants and Engineers (“Tebodin”), for technical advice on the tender process.

4.1.1 The Bidders

54. Of the seven potential bidders which responded to the City’s tender and expressed an interest in the construction of MSCP (RE 8), only two returned signed letters of intent to the City (RE 9 and RE 10). These two bidders (the “Bidders”) were Egapris, a Lithuanian waste management company, and the “Getras Consortium” composed of Getras, a French investor acting through its Lithuanian subsidiary, UAB Getras Lietuva, and three Lithuanian partners, namely AB Ekinsta, Bank Hermis, and UAB Savy.
55. Together with a Swiss company, Egapris submitted a proposal (“Investment Project Vilnius Parking System”) to construct “automated car parking lots and garages.” More specifically, according to Egapris’ proposal, the funds were to be invested, inter alia, in ticket machines, MSCP, and various equipments and tools (RE 13).
56. The Getras Consortium, on the other hand, proposed, in its business plan on the “development and exploitation of car parking lot system in Vilnius city,” the construction of two underground parking lots near the Opera and Ballet Theatre, on the one hand, and the Railroad Station, on the other hand. The Getras Consortium predicted that the construction of the facilities could be completed within six years (RE 12).
57. On 7 July 1998, Tebodin issued an “Evaluation of Proposals for the Parking System in Vilnius – Final Report” (RE 16). In this Final Report, Tebodin concluded that “the Egapris proposal generates higher risk to Vilnius Municipality. The quality provided to Vilnius’ residents a[n]d other system users will be lower and the risk of inconvenience is therefore higher. The parking offered by GETRAS may be constructed without any increased risk, following the rules for parking design (by the European Parking Association).[...]”
58. A new commission created by the City, known as the “Investment Development Commission” (the “Commission”), in turn, issued the following recommendation:
- Considering evaluation done by international experts, to suggest to Vilnius city Board to approve consortium Vilniaus miesto urbanistinis vystymas (enterprise Getras, share company Ekinsta, private limited liability company Savy, share company bank Hermis, Lietuvos vystymo bankas) as a further negotiation partner in the contest of Investment Development regarding creation of Vilnius city parking lots system [(RE 16)].*
59. The City thereafter instructed that a second stage of negotiations take place with the above-mentioned two entities (Egapris and the Getras Consortium) under the existing tender. Indeed, on 10 September 1998, the Board of Vilnius City issued the following Decision No. 1709V:

1. To approve the consortium Vilniaus miesto urbanistinis vystymas (company Getras, public company Ekinsta, private company Savy, share company bankas Hermis, Lithuanian Development Bank) and private company Egapris as further partners of negotiations in the Investment development tender for the development of Vilnius city car parking system.
  2. To obligate the commission for organization of investment development tenders to select, by 10 October 1998, one object at a time from the 1st stage of Multi-storey parking investment project program for technical planning in the following manner: 1) consortium Vilniaus urbanistinis vystymas, 2) private company Egapris [(RE 19)].
60. The City then transferred the responsibility of the tender process to the Commission and replaced Tebodin with a German firm, MAS Consult, which was to provide services with respect to further submissions by Egapris and the Getras Consortium (RE 22).
61. In the course of a meeting held in March 1999, the Bidders advised the City that they did “not agree to construct multi-storey parking lots without being entitled to manage the on-street parking system” (RE 24). The City agreed to grant to the Bidders the management of the on-street parking system as well.

4.1.2 Parkerings

62. Parkerings was established in 1996. The founder and managing director of Parkerings since 1999 is Roger Skaug. Parkerings' majority shareholder, through the majority holding in Indre by Eindom AS, is Skips AS Tudor (“Skips”), an investment firm with a diversified industrial portfolio ultimately controlled by Mr. Wilhelm Wilhelmsen. Mr. Wilhelmsen is a well-known Norwegian entrepreneur and chairman of the Wilh. Wilhelmsen Group, a publicly listed conglomerate and a global leader in the car carrier industry. Skips acquired its participation in Eindom AS/Parkerings from Conceptor, a Norwegian development company, in December 2000.
63. With a view to participating in the Vilnius Tender, Parkerings incorporated Baltijos Parkingas UAB (“BP”), its wholly-owned Lithuanian subsidiary (CE 195).
64. On 8 April 1999, Egapris informed the City that BP would join the Egapris bid. A power of attorney signed on that date indicated that Egapris authorized, inter alia, “Mr. Jonas Tamulis – the consultant of UAB ‘Baltijos Parkingas’, ” and “Mr. Roger Skaug – the director of ‘Parkerings – Compagnies AS” to “lead negotiations regarding ‘Vilnius City on-street parking and construction of multi-storey car parks and creation of a unified system’ conducted by the municipality” (RE 25). A consortium agreement (the “Consortium Agreement”) was signed by Egapris and BP on 14 April 1999. Egapris and BP thereafter formed the “Egapris Consortium” (RE 26). The Consortium Agreement provided, inter alia, the following:
1. By this agreement the Parties agree to establish a consortium and to participate jointly as consortium in the tender for the design, establishment and implementation of Vilnius City parking system announced by Vilnius City municipality, in such a way broadening financial and technical possibilities to satisfy the tender requirements.
  2. The Parties agree that from now on the Consortium shall participate in the tender, shall render offers and carry on negotiations as indivisible person, instead of UAB

“Egapris”, all the rights and obligations whereof related with the participation in the tender, shall be transferred to the Consortium.

3. The Parties undertake to jointly participate in negotiations with the representatives of Vilnius City municipality, taking into account the possibilities and aims of each other, by giving the preference to reasonable agreement to render efforts to the municipality only after agreement on the joint implementation, financial and technical sources thereof. The negotiations shall be carried out by the joint negotiation group [...].
4. The shareholders of UAB “Baltijos parkingas” – Parkerings Compagniet AS, a Norwegian enterprise, shall render technical consultations to consortium and provide the consortium with know-how, necessary for the successful completion of negotiations and implementation of the agreement with the City. UAB “Baltijos parkingas” shall be responsible for preparing all information and proposal as required by Vilnius City Municipality. UAB “Egapris” shall provide all required information on the company and technical information on equipment planned to be used. [...] [(RE 26)]

65. In April 1999, UAB Savy left the Getras Consortium.

4.1.3 The Award of the Bid to the Egapris Consortium

66. On 25 May 1999, the Getras Consortium, on the one hand, and the Egapris Consortium, on the other hand, submitted summary letters outlining the terms of their final proposals.

67. The proposal prepared by the Getras Consortium read as follows:

6. Investment obligations
  - 6.1 The construction of multi-storey car parks:
    - 6.1.1 The Consortium obliges to construct approximately 14 multi-storey car parks, i.e. to create approximately 5300 multi-storey parking places, taking into consideration the prepared Vilnius city parking plan.
    - 6.1.2 The Consortium obliges to project and construct not less than a minimal number (2) of multi-storey car parks within one year from the beginning of the construction works.
    - 6.1.3 The Consortium obliges to construct approximately 14 multi-storey car parks within 8 years from the beginning of the construction of the first two car parks, taking into consideration the prepared Vilnius city parking plan and the commercial validity.
    - 6.1.4 The Consortium obliges to invest necessary funds, not less than 120 million Litas, into the construction of multi-storey car parks during the defined period.
    - 6.1.5 The Consortium obliges to perform all necessary investments and works related to the construction of multi-storey car parks under the approved parking plan and schedule.
  - 6.2 The Consortium obliges to install ticket machines, serving for on-street parking places in Vilnius city under the plan and requirements, approved by the Municipality.
    - 6.2.1 The Consortium obliges to install 1 ticket machine for 15 on-street parking places. Ticket machines will be installed within 3 months after the signing of the Agreement, after interception of parking activities from SP UAB “Komunalinis ūkis”. [(emphasis added)]

- 6.2.2 The Consortium obliges to perform all other investments related to on-street parking under the parking plan, approved by the Municipality.
- 6.2.3 The Consortium obliges to invest not less than 1800 Litass for one available and to be created in the future on-street parking place.
- 6.3 The Consortium obliges to invest into the development of car parks, transferred under the exploitation agreement.
- 6.4 All investments into the development of the parking system, established in the Agreement, will be performed by declaring contests (including for constructional works and machinery supply).

[...] [(RE 27)]

68. In turn, the proposal dated 25 May 1999, prepared by the Egapris Consortium read as follows:

- 6. Investment obligations
  - 6.1 Construction of multi-storey car parks:
    - 6.1.1 The Consortium undertakes to construct not less than 10 multi-storey car parks, i.e. to develop not less than 3000 multi-storey parking places.
    - 6.1.2 The Consortium undertakes to start designing a minimum number (2) of multi-storey car parks immediately after the Signature of this Agreement and to commence their construction immediately after receipt or permits from relevant institutions and the Municipality.
    - 6.1.3 The Consortium undertakes to construct not less than two multi-storey car parks each year starting from 2000, subject to the general parking plan.
    - 6.1.4 During a defined period of time, the Consortium undertakes to invest in the construction of multi-storey car parks not less than LTL 140 million. This period will depend on the terms for approval of the general parking plan, the results of the pre-project works and the possibility to obtain requisite building permits from relevant institutions.
    - 6.1.5 The Consortium undertakes to make all necessary investments and to perform the works all in connection with the constitution of multi-storey parking lots according to the approved parking plan.
  - 6.2 The Consortium undertakes to install ticket machines serving the on-street parking places in the city of Vilnius according to the requirements approved by the Municipality, ensuring the possibility to make settlements in cash and by different types of cards.
    - 6.2.1 The Consortium undertakes to install, within 6 months as from the signature date of the Agreement, requisite number of ticket machines in the currently existing on-street parking places.
    - 6.2.2 The Consortium undertakes to install in Vilnius city, within 24 months as from the signature date of the Agreement, not less than 350 ticket machines according to the parking plan approved by the Municipality.
    - 6.2.3 The Consortium undertakes to install in total not less than 350 ticket machines in Vilnius city and to place 1100 parking signs according to the parking plan approved by the Municipality, upon receipt of relevant permits from the Municipality, the Police and other institutions.
    - 6.2.4 The Consortium undertakes to make other investments relating to the on-street parking according to the parking plan approved by the Municipality.
    - 6.2.5 The Consortium undertakes to invest not less than LTL 10,3 million in the on-street parking.

6.2.6 The Consortium will seek to build not less than 6000 on-street parking lots within the 5 years period.

6.3 All investment in the development of the parking system contemplated in this Agreement will be made by way of tender (Including tenders for construction and equipment supply works).

[...] [(RE 28)]

69. MAS Consult thereafter issued a report recommending that the City refrain from naming a winner (RE 29). With respect to the technical aspects of the project, MAS Consult stated that “it is foreseen that the awarded tender will have to construct and develop 3,000 multi-storey parking spaces, as well as to automate and manage 6,000 on-street parking spaces (the data may be corrected in the process of preparation of the parking layout)” (RE 29).
70. On 6 June 1999, the Commission, on the other hand, “approve[d] the position suggested by the negotiation group to orientate in further negotiations to a 10-year agreement validity term [...]” (RE 30). The Commission concluded that “taking into consideration the agreement validity terms suggested by the consortium of UAB Egapris and UAB Baltijos parkingai and the consortium Vilniaus miesto urbanistinis vystymas [...], and having adopted the initial position regarding the agreement validity term [mentioned above], the proposal of the consortium of UAB Egapris and UAB Baltijos parkingai [was] more favourable to Vilnius City Municipality” (RE 30). The Commission therefore resolved to “recommend to the committees of Vilnius City Council and the Board of Vilnius City to consider the possibility of negotiations on the conditions of the agreement with the consortium of UAB Egapris and UAB Baltijos parkingai, and to familiarize them with the proposals made by the consortium Vilniaus miesto urbanistinis vystymas” (RE 30).
71. On 29 July 1999, the Egapris Consortium sent to the City a first draft agreement (the “First Draft” ). Article 7.3 read: “The Municipality undertakes to insure the investments of the Consortium partners against political risk” (RE 33).
72. By decision No. 1478V issued on 19 August 1999, the Board of the City of Vilnius “approve[d] the Consortium of UAB Egapris and UAB Baltijos parkingas as further partner of negotiations regarding the creation of conditions for development of Vilnius city parking system” (RE 35), thus awarding the bid to the Egapris Consortium.

4.2 THE AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE EGAPRIS CONSORTIUM AND THE VILNIUS MUNICIPALITY

4.2.1 The Negotiations Regarding the Agreement

73. In the course of a negotiation meeting held on 19 October 1999, the representatives of the Municipality, UAB Komunalinis ūkis, MAS Consult, and the Egapris Consortium discussed the issue of the “collection of parking fee and distribution thereof between the Municipality and the Consortium” (RE 36). According to the minutes of this meeting, it was “proposed to divide the parking fee in pay parking places into two parts – local charges for the Municipality and the fee for the Consortium; the relative part of the local charge, as compared to the total fee, will be defined in further stages of negotiation; it will be approved by Vilnius City Council; [...] (RE 36). The solution proposed for the on-street parking concession was thus that of a hybrid fee, according to which the parking fee would be divided into a local parking fee component, on the one hand, which the Egapris Consortium would collect for the City and give to the latter in its entirety, and a service fee component, on the other hand, which would not be a parking fee and which the Egapris Consortium would therefore be entitled to keep.

74. During meetings held on 23 and 28 October 1999, the issue of the “mechanism and legal grounds for granting land to the Consortium for construction of multi-storey car parks” was discussed (RE 37 and RE 38).
75. According to the minutes of the meeting of 23 October 1999, it was resolved that “the negotiation group of VCM [“Vilnius City Municipality”] [would] analyse the draft ‘Basic provisions of the Joint Venture Agreement’ submitted by the Consortium, defining the proposals of the latter regarding granting of land for the construction of multi-storey car parks, and [would] submit its comments and recommendations” (RE 37).
76. At the meeting of 28 October 1999 regarding the “use of land plots intended for multi-storey car parks and the obligations of VCM and the Consortium relating thereto,” “VCM propose[d] that all multi-storey car parks be considered as infrastructure objects and that formation of land plots in the location of the parking lots be postponed until the expiry of the agreement with the Consortium. The Consortium [, in turn] wishe[d] that VCM prepared a project anticipating the mechanism of such land use, which would be analysed by the Consortium and which would be discussed in the course of further negotiations” (RE 38).
77. On 20 December 1999, MAS Consult issued a “Report on negotiations with the Consortium of UAB Egapris and UAB Baltijos Parkingas”. The report provided that (RE 39):

2.3.1 The Consortium shall:

- work out the parking plan on the basis whereof the parking system will be developed;
- develop the parking system in the manner defined in the Agreement and the parking plan as approved by the Municipality:
  - Building at least 450 ticket machines;
  - Building of at least 10 multi-storey car parks
  - Co-ordination of all actions with the Municipality and performance thereof in the manner prescribed by the European Standards;

2.3.2 The Municipality shall:

- consider and determine the changes in the level of public parking order and the fees, consider and adopt the decisions regarding the normative acts and issues relating to parking, adopt the decision on the approval of the parking plan;
- provide the Consortium with the full information requisite for the preparation of the parking plan, as well as the information concerning the existing parking system, give necessary assistance and ensure participation of its employees in the preparation of the parking plan;

- transfer the right to the Consortium allowing to collect local charges in the street parking place and set the limits of the extra fee that can be collected by the Consortium for the parking.

78. On 28 December 1999, the Sorainen Law Office issued, at the City's request, a legal opinion (the "Sorainen Memo"), based on the "legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania which were in effect on December 27, 1999" (CE 11). This Memo discussed, in particular, the issue of the legality of the hybrid fee, stating, in substance, that Lithuanian courts were likely to view both components of the parking fee as a unitary whole and, therefore, to consider them as being regulated by the Law on Fees and Charges. According to the Sorainen Memo, if the fee were to be treated as a unitary whole, then the collection of money by the Egapris Consortium would be contrary to the law, due to the fact that the initial tender did not provide for such payment to be made to the concessionaire by the City. Indeed, with respect to this issue, the Sorainen Memo opined the following:

[...] In view of the provisions of Article 5.1.3 of the Agreement, a conclusion should be drawn that the local fee, which, in accordance with Articles 2 and 3 of the Law on [sic] of the Republic of Lithuania on Local Fees, may be fixed for the time vehicles were parked in the on-street parking places designated by the Vilnius City Council, will be comprised partly for the vehicle parking time in the public on-street parking places designated by the Vilnius City Council. In this instance, the legal basis of the remaining part of the fee for the vehicle parking time in the on-street parking places designated by the Vilnius City Council, which in accordance to Article 5.1.3 of the Agreement goes to the Consortium, becomes questionable.

We are of the opinion that any tax, fee or payment of any kind, which is paid or is demanded to be paid, including the exceptions applied to certain person categories, for the vehicle parking time in on-street parking places designated by the Vilnius City Council, is the regulatory subject-matter of the aforementioned Law on the Republic of Lithuania on Local Fees, and should be considered the local fee, as it is defined in Article 2 of the same Law with all the ensuing consequences (Article 7 of the aforementioned Law).

While analyzing the legality of the commitment of the Municipality to transfer the right to collect a fee for vehicle parking time and for violations of the Parking Regulations for on-street parking places designated by the Vilnius City Council, we draw the conclusion that the legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania do not create any legal obstacles to make such a commitment and exercise its existing right, which is a precondition of such obligation.

Whereas the legal basis of the fee, which goes to the Consortium according to articles 5.1.3-5.1.7 of the Agreement for the vehicle parking time for on-street parking places designated by the Municipality Council, raises doubts. Such conclusion shall be drawn due to the following reasons, listed hereinafter:

- 1) Vehicle parking lots are the property, which belongs to the Municipality by the Public property right, which was obtained by basis of the Law on State property transfers to the property of Municipalities based on Law or created anew;
- 2) The Consortium does not obtain ownership of vehicle parking lots on the grounds of the Law on Lease or other grounds to administrate the property, for the usage of which the arbitrary fee may be collected from users of parking places.
- 3) Any fee or other payment for vehicle on-street parking places designated by the Vilnius City Council, in our opinion, is the regulatory subject-matter of the Law of the Republic of Lithuania on Local Fees, and should be considered a local fee, as it is defined in Article 2 of the same Law.

In view of what was presented in clause 3 hereinbefore, we would take the view that the legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania and contractual deeds and obligations, indicated in the Agreement of the Municipality and the Consortium, do not create sufficient and clear legal ground for the Consortium to have a right to collect a portion of the fee for vehicle parking time for on-street parking places designated by the Municipal Council, which is derived from the entire fee, established in Article 5.1.3, less local charges approved by the Municipality Council. [...] [(CE 11)]

79. On the other hand, a legal opinion prepared of 29 December 1999 by Lideika, Petrauskas, Valiūnas ir Partneriai (or “Lawin” firm), the Lithuanian legal counsel of the Egapris Consortium, provided that the hybrid fee was in accordance with the law. Indeed, this opinion provided the following:

Following your request, we would like to comment the legal situation relating to collection of payment for car parking in places designated by the Municipality (streets and squares). The agreement between Vilnius City Municipality and the Consortium establishes that such payment will consist of local charges and the portion of payment falling on the Consortium.

The portion of payment falling on the Consortium is to be legally qualified as payment for service, which will be rendered by the Consortium to car drivers. The scope of this service is the development of parking system in the city and its administering. Car parking in pay place is to be qualified as a behaviour of a driver expressing his/her will to use the service rendered by the Consortium and to pay for it according to the rate set by the Consortium [(RE 40)].

80. On 29 December 1999, the Vilnius City Council adopted Decision No. 482, approving the draft agreement between the parties, and authorizing Mayor Imbrasas to sign the agreement with the Egapris Consortium on behalf of the Municipality (CE 12). On the same day, the City also adopted Decision No. 483 regarding the performance of the Agreement (RE 41).

4.2.2 The Agreement

81. On 30 December 1999, the Egapris Consortium and the Municipality signed an agreement (“the Agreement”)(CE 13). The Agreement was signed by each of the Egapris Consortium members. According to the Agreement, BP and Egapris were jointly and severally liable for the Egapris Consortium’s performance of the Agreement (Article 1.2 of the Agreement).
82. The Agreement pertained to the creation, development, maintenance and enforcement of the public parking system in the City of Vilnius. More specifically, the Agreement provided for an exclusive concession to operate the city’s street parking and to operate ten MSCP.
83. The Consortium was granted an exclusive right to act as a “sole partner of the Municipality” for the organization, maintenance, development and enforcement of the public parking system in the areas of the City of Vilnius designated by the Agreement. Article 1.2 of the Agreement defined the terms “sole partner of the Municipality” as “a person, that is granted the exclusive rights to collect local charges and penalties for violation of parking regulations in the streets and squares as established in the city Council, and to construct multi-storey car parks in the locations specified in Annex No. 1 to this Agreement.”

84. Thus, the Egapris Consortium was granted an exclusive thirteen-year right to operate all the street parking, that is specifically to collect the parking fees, and to enforce the parking regulations namely through the clamping of vehicles. With respect to the Consortium's right to enforce parking regulations through clamping, the Agreement foresaw the transition to a fine system as soon as the applicable legislation would have been passed (Article 5.3.4 of the Agreement).

85. With respect to the parties' liability, Article 7.2.1 of the Agreement provided the following:

The liability of the Parties deriving from the terms and conditions of the present Agreement is understood as responsibility for the actions of the Party itself or failure to perform such actions due to which the undertakings of the Party will not be properly, fully and in due time fulfilled. Neither Party shall be liable and no sanctions shall be imposed on it if the breaches of this Agreement will occur due to the actions or failure to act by the other Party or any other third party, as well as due to irresistible forces (force majeure), as defined in the Government Resolution No. 840 "On the Approval of Rules for Release from Liability due to Irresistible Forces (force majeure)" dated 15 July, 1996.

86. The latter Resolution provided the following:

1. The term "force majeure" shall serve to define extraordinary circumstances that cannot be foreseen or avoided, or removed by using any means.

[...]

2. A party shall not be financially held liable for failure to perform any of its obligations if it is capable of proving that:

2.1 it has failed to fulfill the obligations due to the obstacle being beyond its control;

2.2 it cannot be anticipated that at the moment of entering into the contract the party could have foreseen that obstacle or its [e]ffect on the ability to perform the obligations;

2.3 it could not avoid or overcome the obstacle or at least its effect;

3. The obstacles, mentioned in clause 2 hereof, may arise as a result of the following events below:

3.5 lawful or unlawful acts of state government institutions (except for those acts which, pursuant to other contractual provisions, were taken by a party requesting release from liability [...]) [(RE 5)].

4.2.2.1 The Consortium's Obligations under the Agreement

87. Under the Agreement, the Consortium was to comply, inter alia, with the following main obligations.

88. First, the Consortium was to "initiate, prepare, co-ordinate and submit to Vilnius city Council for approval a plan of public parking system in Vilnius city [(the "Parking Plan")] [...]" (Article 1.4.2 of the Agreement; see also Article 2.1.1 of the Agreement). The Parking Plan was to "include parking signs, parking zones, the recommended fee structure, parking control and regulations, and conditions and priorities for construction of multi-storey car parks. Upon preparation and approval of the Parking plan the Parties [were to] agree upon its implementation schedule” (Article 1.4.2 of the Agreement). “ The objective of the Parties [was] to design a plan which [could] provide the basis for a detailed regulation of traffic flow and parking” (Article 2.1.3 of the Agreement).

89. The Consortium was to create, manage and operate the “public parking system for Vilnius city, including installation of ticket machines and construction of multi-storey car parks, complying with the Standards; [...] invest into the present parking system in order to establish the public parking system and structure of Vilnius city in accordance with the approved plan, terms and conditions of this Agreement; [and] plan and design the modifications of the current parking system in accordance with the Agreement and the approved Parking plan and carry out the investments related thereto” (Article 1.4.2 of the Agreement).
90. The key elements of the so-called “Investment Program” were the following:
- the Consortium constructs multi-storey car parks – no less than 10 in total;
  - the Consortium improves the current street parking system (purchases and installs equipment, trains the employees, purchases other equipment, including IT hardware, vehicles etc.);
  - the Consortium installs 450 new ticket machines with the terms established in the schedule of implementation of the Parking plan;
  - the Consortium installs new parking signs and traffic flow control signs – approximately 1050 signs;
  - the Consortium creates integrated parking information system;
  - the Consortium develops the street parking system according to the Standards and this Agreement;
  - the Consortium develops the street infrastructure according to this Agreement, the Joint Activity Agreement and the approved Parking plan (Sub-Clause 4.1.1 of the Agreement). (CE 13, Article 4.1.1)
91. With respect to MSCP, the Consortium had to “plan, design, and construct multi-storey car parks in accordance with the laws and regulations of the Republic of Lithuania and in a line with this Agreement, the Parking plan and its implementation schedule in order to develop an adequate car parking structure and capacity” (Sub-Clause 1.4.2 of the Agreement). The Consortium was to construct no less than ten MSCP in the city of Vilnius, “two [...] every year during the life-time of this Agreement, except for the first year” (Article 4.4.5 of the Agreement), in the locations specified in Annex No. 1 to the Agreement. The full ownership of the MSCP was to be retained by the Consortium (CE 13).
92. The Agreement provided the following with respect to the planning and construction process of the MSCP:
- 4.4.2 After the Municipality issues the full collection of the design conditions, in each individual case the parties shall sign the Joint Activity Agreement, [...] in the form of Annex No. 8. [setting forth the time allocated for the design and construction of the MSCP] [...].*

4.4.3 Not later than within 9 months after the Joint Activity Agreement is signed, unless the shorter term is established in the Joint Activity Agreement, the Consortium shall prepare and co-ordinate the design project of a multi-storey car park [which] shall be submitted to the Municipality. After the design projects are approved, the Municipality, with the participation of the Consortium, shall obtain construction permits in the name of itself and/or the Consortium, or the Consortium, with the participation of the Municipality, shall obtain construction permits in the name of itself and/or the Municipality.

4.4.4 After the Municipality obtains the construction permits in the name of the Municipality and/or Consortium [...], the [latter] shall construct said car parks in accordance with this Agreement and the Joint Activity Agreement [...], and shall ensure that the multi-storey car parks are constructed and made ready for use pursuant to the Procedure for Approving of the Constructions for Use STR.1 1.01:1996, approved by Order No. 108 of the Ministry of Construction and Urban Development as of 23 August 1996, and not later than within 24 months after the construction permits were issued, unless the Joint Activity Agreement provides for the shorter period.

4.4.8 Within [twenty] one day after the date of this Agreement, the Consortium shall evaluate the preliminary locations for construction of multi-storey car parks specified in Annex No. 1, and shall indicate two locations for which the detailed plans are already prepared and shall file applications for the issue of design conditions. The Municipality of Vilnius City shall, upon receipt of the application submitted by the Consortium, issue to the Consortium the collections of the design conditions for the specified locations, whereupon the Consortium shall commence the design works under the terms of this Agreement.

93. With respect to street parking, “the Consortium [undertook] to install 450 new ticket machines within the period established in the schedule of implementation of the Parking plan in the spaces of the streets and squares of Vilnius City which locations are defined by the Decision of the Vilnius city Council and correspond to the parking program. [...] The additional locations of the streets and squares where the Consortium shall be granted the right to collect payments for the parking of vehicles, shall be established by the Decision of the Vilnius City Council in accordance with the Parking plan approved according to the established procedure after the ticket machines in the above mentioned places are installed by the Consortium accordingly with the schedule of implementation of the parking plan” (Articles 4.3.1 and 4.3.2 of the Agreement).

4.2.2.2 The Municipality’s Obligations under the Agreement

94. Article 1.5.1 of the Agreement provided that “in order to achieve its aims and create favourable conditions for the Consortium to fulfill its obligations under this Agreement, the Municipality shall, within the [?] time limits of its competence, undertake the following:”

- to consider and establish the public parking order in the city and the adjustments of parking fee level taking into account suggestions and recommendations made by the Consortium and the needs of the city’s population;
- to refrain from any amendments to the present city parking order that would deteriorate the Consortium’s possibilities and conditions for implementing of its obligations hereunder. This obligation does not include the adjustments to local duties if such adjustments are made before March 1, 2000, in accordance with the conditions of this Agreement;

- to assign to the Consortium the right to collect local charges established by the Vilnius city Municipality Council, including penalties imposed for the violation of the parking order, in the streets and squares as defined by the Vilnius city Council in accordance with the conditions of this Agreement and the approved parking plan;
- within one month from the date of coming into force of the Agreement to hand over to the Consortium all necessary information (agreements for use of the parking spaces) related to the parking in the streets and squares specified in Annex No. 4 to this Agreement [(Annex No.4: list of streets and squares in which car-parks have been equipped pursuant to the established procedure and in which the Consortium, consisting of UAB Baltijos parkingas and UAB Egapris, will have the right to collect local duty, clamp vehicles for the non-observance of the provisions relating to the Collection of Charges established for the owners of the vehicles (drivers) for the use by the latter of watched car-parks in the streets and squares of Vilnius and to collect charges for the unclamping of the vehicles)];
- timely and in accordance with appropriate procedure to consider legislative and regulatory issues related to parking, including parking signs, penalty level and structure (clamping, other means of blocking of the vehicle or a fine charge notice);
- in accordance with the terms and conditions of this Agreement and valid legal acts to consider and make decisions regarding the approval of the public parking system plan as worked out by the Consortium;
- to ensure the way of use of the land plots, permits and approvals necessary for the construction of multi-storey car parks in accordance with the conditions of the Joint Activity Agreement attached as Annex No. 8 hereto;
- to consider and determine the fee structure and fee rates for street and ground parking in accordance with the conditions and procedure established by this Agreement;
- to ensure the service rendering according to the city maintenance and cleaning rules;
- to use all its efforts in order to ensure that the necessary decisions of the institutions not subordinated to the Municipality are taken for successful development of the parking system (including appropriate modifications of the laws and other statutory acts, relevant traffic signs, fee levels and structure, use of land and other relevant issues);
- to provide the Consortium with all information necessary for drawing up of the Parking plan which information is defined in Annex No. 3, or provide with a possibility to get access to such information and photocopy it, and to ensure the participation of appropriate Municipality's subdivisions within the limits of their competence in the process of the drawing up of such plan. The Parties understand that the Municipality does not possess all the information necessary for the drawing up of the plan and that this may affect the quality of the Parking plan;
- not to extend agreements concluded prior to the Agreement, if that does not constitute the breach of such agreement, and to refrain from making any new agreements that would impede creation of the unified parking system in the city according to the conditions of this Agreement;
- to provide the Consortium with the possibility to use the city GIS in the process of drawing up the Parking plan;
- to fulfill all other obligations under this Agreement.

95. The Agreement specifically provided, under Article 1.5.2 in fine, that “undertakings of the Municipality shall be limited to the scope of its competence, or the competence of institutions subordinated to it.”

4.2.2.3 Revenue Sharing Mechanism under the Agreement

96. The Consortium - which had to prepare the Parking Plan - was responsible for the equity and debt financing for the construction of the MSCP and the establishment of the Parking Plan. In order to ensure that the Consortium would obtain a reasonable return on its investments, Article 5 of the Agreement provided that the proceeds of the maintenance and enforcement of the Vilnius public parking system would be shared among the parties to the Agreement. The Consortium was entitled to three different income streams.
97. First, in accordance with its exclusive right to operate for thirteen years all the street parking in the city, collect the parking fees, and enforce the parking regulations through the clamping of vehicles, the Consortium was entitled to a service fee portion of the public parking fee that it was to collect. The public parking fee indeed consisted contractually of two elements: a local charge for the Municipality and a service fee for the Consortium.
98. With respect to the determination of the local charge and the service fee, Articles 5.1.1, 5.1.2, and 5.1.3 of the Agreement provided that “the Consortium shall collect charges established by the Vilnius City Council for the duration of parking in the places of streets and squares that are determined by the Municipality Council, and shall transfer such charges to the account indicated by the Vilnius City Municipality. [...] The local charges for the parking time of the vehicles in the places of streets and squares that are determined by the Municipality Council shall be fixed by the Vilnius City Council according to the Law On Local Charges for the Republic of Lithuania. [...] The local charges constitute a part of the parking fee for the parking time in the places of streets and squares that are determined by the Vilnius City Council. The other part of the parking fee falls upon the Consortium.” The part of the fee that was allowed to the Consortium thus depended on the amount of the local charge for one hour of parking established by the Vilnius City Council, its ceiling being fixed in the Agreement under Article 5.1.3.
99. The service fee was to be fixed either by the Consortium, in which case it was to be calculated in accordance with the provisions of Articles 5.1.3.1 through 5.1.3.5 of the Agreement, or by separate agreement between the parties, in which case it was to be calculated in accordance with Article 5.1.4 of the Agreement. The Consortium was to collect the entire amount and then transfer the portion corresponding to the local charges to the Municipality.
100. Second, the Consortium was entitled to the full amount of the parking fees it would collect in MSCP.
101. In this respect, Article 3.1.5 of the Agreement provided that “multi-storey car parks constructed shall not be transferred to the Municipality, and they will remain the property of the Consortium or its members. All rights regarding management and operation of the multi-storey car parks shall be retained by the Consortium or the companies established by it.” According to the Agreement, there was no time limitation on the right to operate MSCPs. Furthermore, Article 5.1.9 of the Agreement stipulated that “the parking fee for the parking time in the multi-storey car parks owned by the Consortium shall be fixed by the Consortium.”

102. Third, the Consortium was entitled to seventy percent of unclamping charges. It was the Consortium’s right to enforce parking regulations thus generating an independent revenue stream. Indeed, the Agreement granted to the Consortium the right to collect “clamping fees” for the release of each clamped vehicle, seventy per cent of which the Consortium was entitled to keep, the remaining thirty per cent going to the Municipality.

103. In this respect, Articles 5.1.11, 5.1.12, and 5.1.13 of the Agreement provided the following:
